THE ILIAD: A COMMENTARY GENERAL EDITOR G.S. KIRK

Volume VI: books 21–24 NICHOLAS RICHARDSON

PUBLISHED BY THE PRESS SYNDICATE OF THE UNIVERSITY OF CAMBRIDGE The Pitt Building, Trumpington Street, Cambridge, United Kingdom

CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY PRESS The Edinburgh Building, Cambridge CB2 2RU, UK http://www.cup.cam.ac.uk 40 West 20th Street, New York, NY 10011-4211, USA http://www.cup.org 10 Stamford Road, Oakleigh, Melbourne 3166, Australia Ruiz de Alarcón 13, 28014 Madrid, Spain

© Cambridge University Press 1993

This book is in copyright. Subject to statutory exception and to the provisions of relevant collective licensing agreements, no reproduction of any part may take place without the written permission of Cambridge University Press.

> First published 1993 Reprinted 1996, 2000

Printed in the United Kingdom at the University Press, Cambridge

A catalogue record for this book is available from the British Library

Library of Congress Catalogung in Publication data Kirk, G. S. (Geoffrey Stephen) The Iliad, a commentary Includes bibliographical references and indexes. Contents: v. t. Books 1 · 4 · v. 6. Books 21 · 24 Nicholas Richardson. 1. Homer. Iliad. 2. Achilles (Greek mythology) in literature. 3. Trojan War in literature. 1. Richardson, N. J. (Nicholas James). II. Homer. Iliad. III. Title. PA4037.K458 1985 883'.01 84-11330

> ISBN 0-521-30960-3-hardback ISBN 0-521-31209-4 paperback

> > ٨O

GNRAL DIT RG.S. KIRK

olu · · · oks 1–

The Iliad: a commentary

Volume vI: books 21-24

This volume is dedicated to Jenny, Alexis, Penelope, Andrew and Catherine and to the memory of H. C. A. Gaunt, T. E. B. Howarth, F. W. King, J. G. Stow This is the sixth and final volume of the major Commentary on Homer's Ili 1. ued under the General Editorship of Professor G. S. Kirk. It consists of introductory chapters dealing with the structure and main themes of the poem, book division, the end of the Ili in relation to the Odyssey, and the critic' m and interpretation of the Homeric poems in antiquity. The commentary follows. (The Greek text is not included.) This volume contains a consolidated index of Greek words in all six volumes. This project is the first large-scale commentary in English on the Iliad for nearly one hundred years, and takes special account of language, style, thematic structure and narrative technique, as well as of the cultural and social background to the work.

The Commentary is an essential reference work for all students of Greek literature, and archaeologists and historians will also find that it contains matters of relevance to them.

CONTENTS

•

| Preface | page xi |
|--|----------------|
| Abbreviations | xiv |
| INTRODUCTION | |
| 1 Structure and themes | 1 |
| (i) Structure | I |
| (ii) Themes | 14 |
| 2 Two special problems | 20 |
| (i) Book division | 20 |
| (ii) The end of the Iliad in relation to the Odyssey | 21 |
| 3 Homer and his ancient critics | 25 |
| (i) From Homer to Aristotle | 25 |
| (ii) The Hellenistic period | 35 |
| (iii) Rome (to the Augustan period) | 40 |
| (iv) Later Greek criticism | 43 |
| (v) Neoplatonists and Christians | 46 |

COMMENTARY

| Book 21 | 51 |
|--------------------------------------|-----|
| Book 22 | 105 |
| Book 23 | 164 |
| Book 24 | 272 |
| General index to Volume VI | 363 |
| Index of Greek words for all volumes | 369 |

•

PREFACE

It is just over a century since Walter Leaf published the first edition o his great commentary on the lliad (1886-8), in which he set out 'to offer a guide to students anxious to know more of Homer than they can learn from elementary school-books'. It is a mark of the difference between the Victorian age and ours that what a business man and banker could then accomplish in his spare time should now require the sustained energies and varied expertise of five classical scholars. One of the advantages, however, of this collaboration has been the range of different approaches adopted throughout these six volumes, for it is as true today as in Leaf's time that 'when once the strict limits of a verbal commentary are passed, it is hard to know which path to choose from the many which open into the world revealed to us by the Homeric poems'.

That this venture has indeed been a genuine work of collaboration is largely due to the careful guidance and painstaking labours of its general editor Geoffrey Kirk, to whom I wish to pay the warmest tribute of thanks, not only for his original invitation to take part, but also for his sharp-eyed diligence and determination in seeing the project through to its completion. It is a rare privilege to join a group of scholars in studying one of the Homeric poems at such a detailed level over a prolonged period of time, and in the process the Commentary itself has come to resemble an old and familiar friend, much-loved in all its singularities, even if tiresome at times, and to which one ' ultimately reluct nt to bid farewell. For thi opportunity I am profoundly grateful.

Some particular biases and shortcomings should be mentioned here. Had I attempted a more comprehensive review of modern econdary literature, this work would have been scarcely begun, let alone finished. I tried as a rule to approach the text with a fresh mind and to analyse my own response to it, before considering the views of others. I have al o attempted to keep in mind the needs of a varied audience: despite its technicalities I should like th's volume to be accessible (for example) to undergraduates as well as to the increasingly select company of specialists. Professional scholars may feel that at times too subjective a note ounded, wherea students may sometimes find the style too compressed and technical. It has not proved entirely easy to strike the right balance, nd it was only as the work progressed that a more natural and leisurely style of commentary seemed to develop of its own accord

Preface

In the last volume of this eries cross-references are inevitably numerous, and I hope that this will be re arded as a useful aid, rather than as a deterrent to reading. I have also paid particular attention to what struck me as the i dividuality of Homer's language, as an antidote to excessive concern for its formular quality (cf. M. W. Edwards, vol. v, pp. 53-5 and Richardson in Bremer, HBOP 165-84), and I hope that the frequency of references to unusual words will not irritate the reader. It must be admitted that I have relied mainly on LSJ and concordances in doing this, and have only checked a sample of words with the data base of the Thesaurus Lingua Graecae (including nearly all 'absolute hapaxes'). It would certainly be interesting to make more extensive earches, but I do not think that the overall picture would be substantially altered by doing so.

The first part of the Introduction, on structure and themes, is not intended as a dogmatic or canonical statement of received opinions (which would be impossible), but rather as an exploration of some of the possibilities. In the section on structure a good deal of space has been given to theories of ring composition, if only in order to draw attention to what seemed a rather neglected approach. The discussion of themes is inevitably somewhat impressionistic, given the allowances of space.

The roll-call of the who have contributed to the making of this volume is long, and even then I am conscious that some names must have been omitted. Love of Homer (and of Greek literature) dates from my school days at Winchester, where besides those masters named in the dedication I am grateful for the teaching of J. B. Poynton and Colin Badcock. It was fostered at Oxford by many, including my tutor Colin Hardie and supervisor Martin West, and by the encouragement of Hugh Lloyd-Jones. As a tutor myself, I owe a great deal to the work and inspiration of my colleagues, especially Jasper Griffin, Colin Macleod, Richard Rutherford and Oliver Taplin. I have also gained immeasurably from the constant contact with Homer and the stimulus of fresh responses provided by teaching pupils over 23 years at Merton. In 1962 I had the good fortune to work at Mycenae with the late Lord William Taylour, Barbara Craig, Lisa French and others. Enthusiasm for the archaeology of the Late Bronze and Early Iron Ages, encouraged also by the teaching of the late Dorothea Gray, has remained strong ever since.

Like lexicographers, all commentators are shameless plagiarists. I have found Leaf invaluable, and have gained much from Malcolm Willcock's concise but perceptive commentary. Ameis-Hentze I have not used systematically but from time to time. For book 23 Chantraine and Goube are useful, and for book 24 Colin Macleod has set a standard I could not hope to equ I. I al owe much to the new series of commentaries on the Odyssey, edited by Alfred Heubeck and others, and to Martin West's work on Hesiod.

Work on the book itself was made possible above all by four terms of sabbatical leave granted by my College between 1985 and 1991. At all stages I have received many detailed comments on my drafts and constant encouragement from my collaborators, and it has been a great pleasure to share the work with them all. In addition, Richard Rutherford read through and commented on the whole work. I am especially grateful to him, and al o to Jasper Griffin, for discussion of the Introduction. My debt to Oliver Taplin is long-standing: he lent me his own commentary on lliad 22.1-120 (including some notes by Colin Macleod), and more recently the opening chapter of his new book Homeric Soundings, and I have enjoyed our stimulating discussions of Homer over many years. John Boardman, Vassos Karageorghis and Mervyn Popham have all een the commentary on book 23, and I have benefited greatly from their detailed observations on some of the archaeological issues in that Book.

Preface

Many others have helped with specific questions, by sending me their own works, and in various other ways, and it is impossible to list them all. I am aware of debts of thanks to my colleague at Merton Tom Braun, Jan Bremer, Hector Catling, Joost Crouwel, Malcolm Davies, Vincenzo di Benedetto, Garth Fowden, Oliver Gurney, Irene de Jong, James Hooker, Gregory Hutchinson, Peter Jones, Robert Lamberton, Françoise Létoublon, Edmond Lévy, Franco Montanari, Judith Mossman, Roger Moorey, Peter Parsons, Simon Pembroke, Angeliki Petropoulou, Walter Potscher, Maurice Pope, James Porter, Simon Pulleyn, Christopher Smith, Maro Theodossiadis and Stephanie West.

My greatest practical debt is to Rachel Chapman, who (as Rachel Woodrow) produced three successive and virtually impeccable drafts of the whole work from my execrable script over a period of six years. Her immeasurable patience and astounding accuracy must be my only excuse for failing to carry out this long and tediou labour myself, and I c nnot th nk her adequately for all that she has done over such a long period. Like the other authors in thi s ries, I have very much appreciated the care taken by the staff of the Press in the production of these volumes, and wish to thank Pauline Hire for her diplomatic and patient assistance throughout, and Susan Moore for her highly skilful and nsitive copy-editing.

Finally 1 am immensely grateful to my wife Jenny and our children for their tolerance of much scholarly eccentricity and for rescuing me from excessive absorption in the past. To them I dedicate this book, and also to the memory of four of my teachers at Winchester, ένθα με το πρώτον λιγυρής ἐπέβησαν ἀοιδής.

Merton College, Oxford July 1991 N. J. R.

A.M.D.G.

ABBREVIATIONS

Books

- Alexiou, Ritu I Lam nt M. Alexiou, The Ritual Lament in Greek Tradition (Cambridge 1974)
- Ameis-Hentze K. F. Ameis and C. Hentze, Homers Ilias (Leipzig 1913; repr. Amsterdam 1965)
- Apthorp, MS Evidence M. J. Apthorp, The Manuscript Evidence for Interpoatio in Homer (Heidelberg 1980)
- Arch. Hom. Archaeologia Homerica: Die Denkmäler und das frühgriechische E s, edd. F. N at and H.-G. Buchholz (Göttingen 1967-)
- Arend, Scenen W. Arend, Die typischen Scenen bei Homer (Berlin 1933)
- Beazley, ABV J. D. Beazley, Attic Black-figure Vase- ainters (Oxford 1956)
- Beck, Stellung G. Beck, Die St llung d s 24 Buches der Ilias in der alten Epentradition (diss. Tübingen 1964)
- Bolling, External Eviden e G. M. Bolling, Th Ext nal Evidence for Interpolation in Homer (Oxford 1925)
- Bremer, HBOP Ho : Bey nd Oral Poetry, edd. J. M. Bremer, I. J. F. de Jong, and J. Kalff (Amsterdam 1987)
- Buffière Mythes d'Homère F. Buffière, Les M thes d'Homère et la ensie recque (Paris 1956)
- Burkert, Religion W. Burkert, Greek Religion: Archaic and Classical (Oxford 1985); Eng. trans. by John Raffan of Gri ch's h R ligio der rch i chen und klassischen Epoch (Stuttgart 1977)
- Cà la, In 'Omerici F. C' sola, I ni Omeri i (Rome 1975)
- Chantraine, Dict. P. Chantraine, Dictionnaire étymologique de la langue gr cq (Paris 1968-80)
- Chantraine, GH P. Chantraine, Grammaire hom riqu 1-11 (Paris 1958-63)
- Chantraine and Goube P. Chantraine and H. Goube, Homère, Iliade XYIII (Paris 1972)
- Chios Chios: a Conferenc at the Homereion in Chios 1986, edd J. Boardman and C. E. Vaphopoulou-Richardson (Oxford 1986)
- Coldstream, Geom tric Grece J. N. Coldstream, Geometric Greece (London 1977)
- Cook, Troa J. M. Cook, Th Troad: an Archaeo ogical and Topographical Study (Oxford 1973)

- Crouwel, Chariots J. H. Crouwel, Chariots and Other M ans of Transport in Bronze Age Greece (Amsterdam 1981)
- Davies, EGF M. Davies, Epicoru Graecorum Fragmenta (Göttingen 1988)
 Deichgräber, Letzte Gesang K. Deichgräber, 'Der letzte Gesang der Ilias', Abhandlungen der Mainzer Akademie der Wissenschaften und Literatur, Geistes- und sozialwiss. Klasse, 1972, No. 5
- de Jong, Narrators I. J. F. de Jong, Narrators and Focalizers: the Presentation of the Story in the Iliad (Amsterdam 1987)
- Delebecque, Cheval E. Delebecque, Le Cheval dans l'Ilia (Pari 1951)
- Denniston, Particles J. D. Denniston, The Greek Particles (and edn, Oxford 1951)
- Edwards, HPI M. W. Edwards, Homer, Poet of the Iliad (Baltimore and London 1987)
- Elliger, Darstellung der ndschaft W. Elliger, Die D rs ellung chaft in der griechischen Dichtung (Berlin 1975)
- Erbse H. Erbse, Scholia Graeca in Homeri Iliadem 1-VII (Berlin 1969-88)
- Fenik, TBS B. C. Fenik, Typical Battle Scenes in the Iliad (Herm s Einzelschriften 21, Wiesbaden 1968)
- Fenik, Tra iti n B. C. Fenik, ed., Hom : Tr iti d I v ti (Le'den 1978)
- Fittschen, Sagend rst 11 ngen K. Fittschen, Untersuc ngen Z B gi Sagendarstellungen bei den Griechen (Berlin 1969)
- Fränkel, Gleichniss H. Fränkel, Die homerischen Gleichnisse (Göttingen 1921)
- Friedrich, Verwundung W. H. Friedrich, Verwundung und Tod in der Ilias (Göttingen 1956)
- Frisk H. Frisk, Griechisches Etymologisches Wörterbuch (Heidelberg 1954-73)
- Gardiner, Sport E. N. Gardin r, Gre k Athl ti Sports r Fs' ls (Lo don 1910)
- Gordesiani, Kri erien er Schriftlichkeit R. Gordesiani, Krit d Schriftlichkeit und Mündlichkeit im homerischen Epos (Frankfurt 1986)
- Griffin, HLD J. Griffin, Homer Life and De th (Oxford 1980)
- Grube, Greek and Roman Critics G. M. A. Grube, The Greek and Roman Critics (London 1965)
- Hainsworth, Od. Alfred Heubeck, Stephanie West and J. B. Hainsworth, A C mmen ry H mer's Odyssey vol. 1 (Oxford 1988)
- Hall, Barbarian E. Hall, Inventing the Barbarian (Oxford 1989)
- Hardie, Cosmos and Imperium P. R. Hardie, Virgil's Aeneid: Cosmos Imperium (Oxford 1986)
- Harris, Athletes H. A. Harris, Greek Athletes and Athletics (London 1964)
- Helbig, Homerische F os W. Helbig, Das hom rische Epos aus en Denkmälern erläuters: archäologische Untersuchungen (2nd edn, Leipzig 1887)

- Heubeck, Od. Alfred Heubeck and Arie Hoekstra, A Commentary on Hom s Odys y vol. 11 (Oxford 1989)
- Higbie, Measure and Music C. Higbie, Measu a d Music: En ambement and Sentenc Structure in he Iliad (Oxford 1990)
- Hoekstra, Od. Alfred Heubeck and Arie Hoekstra, A Commentary on Homer's Odyssey vol. 11 (Oxford 1989)
- HyDem, HyAp, HyHerm, HyAphr Hom r. Hymns to Demeter, Apollo, Hermes, Aphrodite
- Johansen, Ili i E rly Greek Art K. F. Johansen, The Iliad in Early Greek Art (Copenhagen 1967)
- Kakridis, Ho R visited J. T. Kakridis, Homer Revisited (Lund 1971)
- Kak idi, Resea ches J. T. Kakridis, Hom ric R searches (Lund 1949)
- Kirk, Songs G. S. Kirk, Th Songs of Homer (Cambridge 1962)
- Krischer, K nven 'T. Krischer, Formale Ko 1 tion n der hom rischen Fpik (München 1971)
- Kullmann, Quellen W. Kullmann, Die Quellen d Ilias (Wiesbaden 1960)
- Kurtz and Boardman, Burial Customs D. C. Kurtz and J. Boardman, Greek Buria Cust (London 1971)
- Lamberton, Homer the Theologin R. W. Lamberton, Homer the Theologian: Neoplatonist Allego ical Reading an the Growth of the Epic Tradition (Berkeley 1986)
- Lamberton and Keaney, Homer's Ancient Read rs R. W. I amberton and J. Keaney, edd., Homer's Ancien Readers: the Hermeneutics of Greek Epic's Earliest Exceptes (Princeton 1992)
- Leaf W. Leaf, The Iliad 1-11 (2nd edn, London 1900-2)
- Leaf, Troy W. Leaf, Troy (London 1912)
- Lefkandi I M. Popham, L. H. Sackett and P. G. Themelis, edd., Lefkandi I. The Ir n Age (London 1980, 2 vols.)
- Lehrs, D Aristarchi studiis K. Lehrs, De Aristarchi studiis homericis (3rd edn, Leipzig 1882; repr. Hildesheim 1964)
- Leumann, HW M. Leumann, Homerische Wörter (Basel 1950)
- Lfgr xi on s frühgri ch'sch n Epos, edd. B. Snell and H. Erbse (Göttingen 1955-)
- LIMC xic Iconographicum Mythologiae Classic 1.1- (Zürich 1981-)
- Lohmann, Andromache-Szenen D. Lohmann, Die Andromache-Szenen in der Ilias (Hildesheim 1988)
- Lohmann, Reden D. Lohmann, Die Komposition der Reden in der Ilias (Berlin 1970)
- Lorimer, HM H. L. Lorimer, Homer and the Monuments (London 1950)
- L-P E. Lobel and D. L. Page, Poetarum Lesbi rum Fra menta (Oxford 1955)

- LSJ H. Liddell, R. Scott and H. S. Jones, A Gr ek-English Lexicon (9th edn, Oxford 1940)
- Macleod, Iliad XXIV C. W. Macleod, Homer, Ili Book XXIV (Cambridge 1982)
- Martin, Language of Heroes R. P. Martin, The Language of Heroes: Speech and Perfo anc in t Iliad (Ithaca 1989).
- Mazon P. Mazon, Homère, Iliade, Tome IV, Chants xix-xxiv (Paris 1981)
- Meister, Kunstsprache K. Meister, Die homerische Kunstsprache (Leipzig 1921)
- Monro, HG D. B. Monro, A Grammar of the Homeric Dialect (2nd edn, Oxford 1891)
- Moulton, Similes Carroll Moulton, Similes in the Ho 'c Poems (Hypomnemata 49, Göttingen 1977)
- Mueller, Iliad M. Mueller, The Iliad (London 1984)
- M-W R. Merkelbach and M. L. West, edd., Fragmenta Hesiodea (Oxford 1967)
- Nagler, Spont neity M. N. Nagler, Spontaneity and Tradition: a Study in th Oral Art of Homer (Berkeley and Los Angeles 1974)
- Neumann, Gesten und Gebard G. Neumann, Gesten G bär en in griechischen Kunst (Berlin 1965)
- Nilsson, GgrR M. P. Nilsson, Geschichte der griechischen R ligion 1 (3rd edn, München 1967)
- OCT Oxford Classical Texts: Homeri Opera 1-V: 1-11 (Iliad) edd. D. B.
 Monro and T. W. Allen (3rd edn, Oxford 1920); 111-1V (Odyssey) ed.
 T. W. Allen (2nd edn, Oxford 1917-19); V (Hymns, etc.) ed. T. W. Allen (Oxford 1912)
- Owen, Story of the Ili E. T. Owen, The St ry of the Il' (Toronto 1946)
- Parker, Miasma Robert Parker, Miasma (Oxford 1983)
- Parry, nguage A. Parry, The Language of Achill s Other Papers (Oxford 1989)
- Parry, MHV A. Parry, ed., The Making of Homeric Vers. The Collected Papers of Milman Parry (Oxford 1971)
- Pfeiffer, History of Classic I Sch I rship R. Pfeiffer, History of Classical Scholarship from the Beginnings to he Hellenistic Age (Oxford 1968)
- PMG Poetae Melici Graeci ed. D. L. Page (Cambridge 1962)
- Reiner, Die rituelle Totenklage E. Reiner, Die rituelle Totenklage der Grie hen (Stuttgart-Berlin 1938)
- Reinhardt, IuD K. Reinhardt, Die Ilias und ihr Dichter, ed. U. Hölscher (Göttingen 1961)
- Richardson, Hymn to Demeter N. J. Richardson, The Hom ric Hymn to Demeter (Oxford 1974)

xvii

Abbreviations

- Ruijgh, TE piqu C. J. Ruijgh, Autour de 'TE pique': études sur la syntaxe grecque (Amsterdam 1971)
- Schadewaldt, Aufbau W. Schadewaldt, Der Aufbau der Ilias (Frankfurt am Main 1975)
- Schadewaldt, Iliasstudien W. Schadewaldt, Iliasstudien (Leipzig 1938)
- Schadewaldt, VHWW W. Schadewaldt, Von Homers Welt und Werk (3rd edn, Stuttgart 1959)
- Scheibner, Aufbau G. Scheibner, Der Aufbau des 20 und 21 Buches der Ilias (Leipzig 1939)
- Schulze, Quaestiones Epicae W. Schulze, Quaestiones Epicae (Gütersloh 1892)
- Segal, Mutilation of the Copse C. Segal, The Theme of the Mutilation of the Corpse in the Iliad (Leiden 1971)
- Shipp, St ies G. P. Shipp, Studi s in the guage of Homer (2nd edn, Cambridge 1972)
- Silk, Iliad M. S. Silk, The Ilia (Cambridge 1987)
- Stanford, Ul sses Them W. B. Stanford, Th Ulysses Them (Oxford 1968)
- Stengel, Opferbrauch P. Stengel, Opferbrauche der Griechen (Leipzig 1910)
- Strasburger, Kl inen Kämpfer G. Strasburger, Die kleinen Kämpfer der Ilias (diss. Frankfurt 1954)
- Thornton, Supplication Agathe Thornton, Hom r's Iliad: its Composition and th Motif of Supplication (Göttingen 1984)
- Usener, Verhältnis der Odyssee zur Ilias K. Usener, Beobachtungen zum Verhältnis der Odysse z r Ilias (Tübingen 1990)
- van der Valk, Researches M. H. A. L. H. van der Valk, Researches on the Text n Scholia of th Ili 1-11 (Leiden 1963-4)
- Ventris and Chadwick, Docum nts M. Ventris and J. Chadwick, Documents in Mycenaean Gre k (2nd edn, Cambridge 1973)
- von Kamptz, Personennamen Hans von Kamptz, Homerische Personennamen (Göttingen 1982)
- von der Mühll, H p mn a P. von der Mühll, Kritisches Hypomnema zur Ilias (Basel 1952)
- Wace and Stubbings, Companion A. J. B. Wace and F. H. Stubbings, A Com anion to Homer (London 1962)
- Wackernagel, Kleine Schriften J. Wackernagel, Klein Schriften (Göttingen 1953-79)
- Wackernagel, Sprachlich Unt is ch ngen J. Wackernagel, Sprachliche Untersuchungen zu Homer (Göttingen 1916)
- Wade-Gery, Poet of Ili H. T. Wade-Gery, P t of th Ilia (Cambridge 1952)
- Wehrli, Allegorischen D utun F. Wehrli, Zur Geschichte der allegorisch n Deutung Homers im Altertum (Leipzig 1928)

Abbreviations

- West, Greek Metre M. L. West, Greek Metre (Oxford 1982)
- West, Od. Alfred Heubeck, Stephanie West and J. B. Hainsworth, A C m ry o Homer's Odyssey vol. 1 (Oxford 1988)
- West, Pt lemaic Papyri S. West, The Ptolemaic Papyri of Homer (Köln and Opladen 1967)
- West, Theogony M. L. West, Hesiod, Theogony (Oxford 1966)
- West, Works and Days M. L. West, Hesiod, Wo ks and Days (Oxford 1978)
- Whitman, HHT C. H. Whitman, Homer and the Heroic Tradition (Cambridge, Mass. 1958)
- Wilamowitz, IuH U. von Wilamowitz-Moellendorf, Di II H (Berlin 1916)
- Wilamowitz, Untersuchungen U. von Wilamowitz-Moellendorf, Homerisch Untersu ungen (Berlin 1884)
- Willcock M. M. Willcock, The Iliad of Homer 1-II (London 1978-84)

Journals

| AJA | A eri an Jo I of Archa ology |
|---------------|---|
| А , јр | American Journal of Philology |
| A R | Archaeological R ports |
| BICS | Bulletin of the Institute of Classical Studies |
| BSA | Annual of he British School at Athens |
| CJ | Classical Journal |
| СР | Classical Philology |
| CQ | Classical Quarterly |
| CR | Classical Review |
| G&R | Greece and Rome |
| HSCP | Harvard Studies in Classical Philology |
| јнs | Journal of Hellenic Studies |
| MDAI(A) | Mitteilungen des Deutschen Archäologischen Instituts (Athen. Abt) |
| MDAI(R) | Mitteilungen des Deutschen Archäologischen Instituts (Röm. Abt.) |
| MH | Museum Helveticum |
| PCPS | Proceedings of the Cambridge Philological Soci ty |
| REA | R vu d s u s anci nnes |
| ТАРА | Transactions of the American Philological Association |
| rcs | Yale Classical Stu i s |
| ZPE | Zeitschrift für Papyrologie and Epigraphik |

NOTE

The text used is the OCT (see Abbreviations). As in previous volumes 'll.' means 'the lliad', 'Od.' 'the Odyssey'. Early epic fragments are cited from both the OCT and Davies.

xix

Abbreviations

1 marks the beginning or end of a verse. The abbreviation '(etc.)' after a Greek word means that the total includes all relevant terminations. Greek names are transliterated according to the rules laid down in vol. 1, x. References to the scholia follow the system set out in vol. 1 pp. 41ff., i.e. 'Arn/A' means 'Aristonicus in MS A', etc. 'Schol. Ge' means the ' cholia in codex Genavensis 44'. Papyri of Homer are cited as in the OCT, except that 'schol. pap. XII (Erbs)' r fers to the commentary (probably by Ammonius) in P.Oxy. 221, printed in Erbse vol. v, pp. 78–121, and 'pap. 249 and 271 (Mazon)' in the notes on 21.513 and 22.255 refer to the numbering in Mazon's Budé edition. 'MSS' refers to manuscripts after c. A.D. 600.

INTRODUCTION

1. Structure and themes

Ut pictura poesis: erit quae si propius stes te capiat magis, et quaedam si longius abstes.

Horace, Ars poetica 361-2.

Das Organische ist schwer begreifbar.

Schadewaldt, Iliasstudien 159.

(i) tructure

That the lliad, despite its size and complexity, is a poem with a coherent structure would probably not be contested by many nowadays. How that structure may be analysed, however, is still an open question. Aristotle's characterization of it as a unified plot with beginning, middle and end might seem a simple and uncontroversial starting-point, but equally hi comparison of an epic or dramatic work to a living organism serves as a warning against over-simplification. In the end one may well come to the conclusion that there are several possible ways of describing the poem's construction, none of which definitely excludes the others.

Some of these have already been briefly reviewed by G. S. Kirk in his Introduction to books 1-4 (pp. 44-7), where he considers the merits and disadvantages of dividing the poem into sections of four or six books, or a 'three-movement' structure. Before examining any such theories, however, it would be as well to emphasize that the division of the lliad into twenty-four books was surely not a feature of its original conception (see pp. 21-2). These divisions do, in fact, usually come at natural breaks in the narrative, but these are not always the most significant ones, and in some cases (for example between books 20 and 21) the division cuts into what is better regarded as a single sequence of events. The Odyssey seems to fall quite easily into four-book sections, and one can readily conceive that this might correspond to a series of separate recitations (e.g. two a day over period of three days), whereas a four-book structure does not seem to work so well for the Iliad.¹ Books 1-4 can be seen as an extended prologue, if one likes, before the first main episode of the actual fighting (the arist ia of Diomedes), but 4.422ff. seem to mark a new start with the beginning of serious fighting, and the break at the end of book 4 is not a strong one. The end of book 8 works much better: it coincides with the end of a day's fighting, and the narrative clearly builds up to a climax here, before the Embassy to Akhilleus. It might be po sible to see this as the end of the first major 'movement' of the battle, with the Greeks suffering a reversal and the plan of Zeus beginning to take real effect. Thus if one thinks in terms of three major 'movements' (corresponding perhaps roughly to Aristotle's beginning, middle and end, or to the three parts of a trilogy), 1-8 could theoretically form the first. In reality, however, book 9 continues the action of that day into the night, and the Greek leaders only go to bed after the return of the Embassy from Akhilleus. The Doloneia is clearly an interlude (whether original or not), and it seems more appropriate therefore to see the second movement of the poem as beginning with book 11, the dawn of the great day of battle which extends right through to 18.239-42.

The end of book 12 also marks a high point in the action, the moment when Hektor breaks through the Achaean Wall and the Greeks flee to the ships, and this is followed by a major retardation (books 13-14), when Poseidon rallies the Greeks and Zeus is put to sleep by Here. The end of 12 falls quite close to the poem's central point, and it shows Hektor at his most terrible and destructive (12.437-68: see on 12.457-66; also vol. 1V, p. 39, on the summary at 13.345-60). On the other hand, within the great battle of books 11-18 it is off-centre, and the breach in the Wall is only the first major event in the sequence leading up to 16.122-4, where the first Greek ship is fired. The death of Patroklos at the end of book 16 could also be seen as a moment of climax, marking the end of either a four-book section or the econd third of the poem, but again the action is carried over into the struggle for his body, which stretches forward a far as 18.238.

The case for a division into four sections of six books is also briefly discussed by G. S. Kirk (vol. 1, p. 45). It would theoretically be possible to see book 6 as the end of an introductory block, in which the main characters are presented to us, 12 as the central climax, and 18 as marking the turning-point before Akhilleus' return to fight. But again, as Kirk shows, such an analysis is somewhat arbitrary and unsatisfactory.

n recent scholarship there has been a stronger tendency to emphasize the idea of a tripartite structure or 'three-movement' compo ition, one which could correspond to recitation over three days, but would not necessarily coincide with the ancient book-divisions. An early exponent of this approach was J. T. Sheppard, whose (now unfashionable) Pattern of the Iliad (London 1922) saw the first movement as stretching up to the end of the Emb y to Akhilleus (1-9), the second as covering the single long day of the central books of fighting (11-18), and the last as reaching from the dawn of 19.1-2 to the end of the poem, from the reconcili tion of Agamemnon and Akhilleus to the funeral of Hektor. Within these sections he attempted a more detailed structural analysis, and he pointed to some recurrent themes which helped to emphasi e the poem's structure, p rticularly at the beginning and end (cf. especially Pattern of the Iliad 204-10). In this way he anticipated and helped to inspire the later and more elaborate 'ring composition' analyses of J. L. Myres and C. H. Whitman.

¹ A case has, however, been made by Thornton, Supplication 46ff. See also vol. iv, p. 39.

Structure and themes

A similar analysis was made by H. T. Wade-Gery in his Pot of 1 Iliad (Cambridge 1952) 15-16. His three recitations covered books 1-9, 10-18.353 (when Patroklos' body is received by Akhilleus), and 18.354 to the end of 24. Schadewaldt (Aufb 24) likewise divides the poem into books 1-9, 11-18 and 19-24, and he points to the fact that the action of both books 9 and 18 extends into the night, at the end of the first two movements, with these two nightfalls coming appropriately at the close of the first two days of recitation. He too goes on to give a more detailed structural analysi of the poem, into seven separate parts (39-74).³

The three-movement theory has most recently been advocated by O. Taplin (Homeric Soundings, Oxford 1992). He emphasizes the recurrence of major motifs at key points in the composition, i.e. books 1, 9-11, 18-19 d 24 (which he sees as major weight-bearing scenes, or the four dividing piers of a three-arched structure), especially the quarrel and reconciliation o Akhilleus and Agamemnon, the episodes where Thetis visits Akhilleus (in 1, 18 and 24), and the recurrent scenes of supplication or pleas for ransom, involving Khruses in 1, the Embassy in 9 and Priam in 24. He points out that references to 'tomorrow' are clustered most frequently towards the ends of the first and second movements (at 8.470-2, 8.497-565, 9. 40, 9.356-61, 9.682-3, 9.707-9, and 18.134-7, 18.254-83, 18.303-4), thereby supporting Schadewaldt's observation about the nights of books 9 and 18, since these references would act as signposts for an expectant audience at the end of the day's recitation.

These views are clearly attractive, whether or not one accepts the suggestion of a three-day period for recitation. One might object that divi 'on into books 1 to 9, 11 to 18, and 19 to 24 would make the last movement noticeably horter than the other two, but that is not n cess rily a dr wback. Despite the variety of views over exactly where the divisions should fall, one may still gree that analysis into three major movements can be a significant and valuable way of articulating the poem, drawing attention to some of the most important episodes in the development of the plot, and emphasizing their relationship.

^{*} Cf. also Silk, Iliad 37: his three parts consist of books 1-9, 10-17, 18-24

Structure and themes

A different form of structural analysis advocated by some modern scholars is ring composition. This does not necessarily conflict with other types of division. The first to argue this in detail was Myres in 1932, taking his cue from Sheppard.³ Unfortunately Myres' attempt to see the poem as analogous to early Greek art, and especially to large-scale Geometric vas paintings, was received sceptically by many scholars. A priori, however, there seems no reason why an epic poet (especially one whose own visual imagination was so highly developed) should not have thought of his work as a series of 'panels' in a large-scale visual structure, as Myres argued.

Ring composition itself is certainly a fundamental technique of Homeric epic (see vol. v Introduction, pp. 44–8), and again there seems no a priori reason why a poet should not use this technique (whether fully consciously or not) in the construction of his whole work as well as in composing episodes or scene. Myres drew attention to a series of remarkable correspondences between the opening and closing sections of the Iliad. Of these, the ones which have most impressed recent scholars are those between books 1 and 24, whereby the themes of book 1 are echoed in reverse order in the final Book.⁴ But Myres also saw detailed parallelism between books 2 and 23, 3 and 22, and so on. Somewhat unexpectedly, however, he viewed book 9 as the centre-piece of the whole structure, and this involved some awkward and unconvincing expansion and compression in other parts of his overall schema ('Last book' 280).

A similar analysis, made independently of Myres, was attempted by ³ J. L. Myres, 'The last book of the lliad', JHS 52 (1932) 264-96 (referred to here as 'Last book'). An interesting earlier attempt to compare the lliad's narrative atructure with Geometric art was made by Fr. Stählin, 'Der geometrische Suil in der Ilias', Philolo 23 78 (1923) 280-301. He bases his theory to a large extent on the movements of the fighting to and fro over the plain of Troy. By coincidence Thornton uses the ebb and ow of battl as one of the main criteria in her analysis of the poem's composition (Supplication 46-63 and 150-63), although she does not seem to know of Stählin's analysis. For a more recent attempt to draw analogies between the lliad and late Geometric art, and between the Odyssey and early Orientalizm art, see B Andreae and H. Flashar, 'Strukturaquivalenzen zwischen den homerischen Epen und der frühgriechischen Vasenkunst', Potica 9.2 (1977) 217-65. They argue, however, that the lliad has a basically triadic structure (books 1-7, 8-18, 19-24).

* Parallel verses were already noted in 1876 by R. Peppmüller in his Commentar dvierundzwanzigsten Buches der Ilias (Berlin 1876). C. Rothe (Die Ilias als Dichtung, Paderborn 1910, 329) more perceptively used the parallelism in the act'on and time-scheme of the two books as evidence for unity of composition. Cf. also Stahlin, op. cit 296-301, and for other forerunners of Myres cf. Beck, Stellung 53 n. 1. The parallelism between books 1-3 and 22-4 is already noted by C. M. Bowra, Tradition and Design in the Iliad (Oxford 1930) 15-17. After Myres see especially Whitman, HHT 256-60, Beck, Stell ng 53-65, Reinhardt, IuD 63-8, Lohm nn, R 169-73, N acleod, Ili XXIV 32-4, Muell , Il 64-5, 166-76, Silk, Iliad 24, 38-9. Whitman (HHT 249-84, and chart at end of book). His schema is more evenly distributed, since he sees books 11-15 as the main central panel, with 9 answered by 16, 8 by 17, and so on. Once again, however, Whitman's analogies with Geometric art, together with the fact that he pursued hi analysis into such detail, led to his theory being given a sceptical reception.

The most recent exponent of this approach is R. Gordesiani, in Kriteri der Schriftlichkeit d Mu i hkeit i homerischen Epos (Frankfurt 1986) 26-67. This makes book 12 central, with 11 balanced by 13, and so on. The variations between these three scholars over the central section of the poem re notable, suggesting that such theories become progr ively less satisfactory as one approaches the central episodes.

It seems nevertheless worthwhile to review this type of analysis, and above all to ask, if one accepts the comparison between books 1 and 24, how far into the poem it might be justifiable to see such ring composition as extending. Could it be carried right through, or is it most prominent at beginning and end as a narrative frame, and if so, does it gradually fade out as we approach the central part of the work? What follows is an attempt to examine this question in more detail, but it should be treated as an exploratory essay of a somewhat speculative kind.

Book 1 is clearly marked off from what follows, just as book 24 stands apart from what precedes to some extent (see on 2.1-2 and 24.1-21): they form the Prologue and Epilogue to the work. Book 1 begins with a proem referring to Akhilleus' wrath as the cause of many deaths, and to the unburied bodies which were to be the prey of dogs and birds (1-5). Book 24 ends with the most famous example of these, Hektor, receiving burial. As the poem begins with Akhilleus, so it ends with Hektor (1.1, 24.804). The first scene of book 1 has been described as a miniature version of the main plot (Schadew ldt, Ili st ien 147-8; see also R. J. Rabel, A7P 109 (1988) 473-81): the dishonour shown by Agamemnon to Apollo's priest leads to disaster (due to divine displeasure), and this is followed by aton ment nd reconciliation. The theme of the old priest's supplication (here rejected) is picked up in book 9, with the Embassy to Akhilleus, and this in turn is echoed by Patroklo' supplication of him in 16, but it is mirrored and reversed most clearly in 24, when old Priam comes to Akhilleus and is received by him, and this is emphasized by several close verbal echoes (see on 24.501-2, 24.556-8, 24.560-2, 24.568-70, 24.571).

In book t the rejection of Khruses leads to the plague and funeral pyres of the Greeks (1.50-2). Apollo, who sets the poem's action in motion (1.8-10), is here een as bringer of divine punishment and death. In book 24 Apollo again sets in motion the train of events (32-54), but this leads to reconciliation and the partial restoration of moral order with the funeral of Hektor. In both cases, however, Apollo shows himself to be a god concerned with the moral qualities of pity and respect, for Khruses and for Hektor. Moreover, his rôle at the beginning and end is not confined to these passages. In book 1 he appears in the central and final scenes, as god of purification and healing, and of music and dance (313-17, 430-74, 601-4), and in 24 he is mentioned at the beginning (18-21) as the god who preserves Hektor's body from disfigurement, and this is echoed once more near the end in Hekabe's lament (757-9). In this last passage Apollo's 'gentle darts' bring death, but it is an honourable and beautiful one, in balanced contrast with the terrible effect of his arrows in book 1 (43-52).⁸

Structure and themes

The plague in book t leads to the quarrel of Akhilleus and Agamemnon and the seizure of Briseis, and this in turn to Thetis' visit to her son. Meanwhile the journey to Khruse to return Khruseis and appease Apollo is described. Thetis then visits Zeus and begs for his help. Finally Here quarrels with Zeus, and Hephaistos makes peace. The sequence is repeated in reverse in 24: the dispute in heaven over Hektor's body, where Here again leads the opposition, is followed by Zeus's summoning of Thetis, with orders to Akhilleu to yield to entreaty, her visit to her son (see on 126-42), and finally by Priam's journey and the ransoming of Hektor (cf. Myres, 'Last book' 287-8 and fig. 8, Whitman, HHT 259, M cleod, Ilia XXIV 33). The opening theme of Agamemnon's violent conduct is divided between the scenes involving Khruseis and Briseis, who are to some extent doublets (cf. Reinhardt, IuD 42ff.), and this complicates the parallelism with the last Book, but nevertheless the overall correspondences seem clear enough.

To these must be added a certain degree of parallelism in the timescheme of the two Books.⁴ The plague lasts nine days, and on the tenth Akhilleus summons an mbly (1.53-4). On the twelfth day after thi Thetis visits Zeus and Here quarrels with Zeus (1.493ff.). In book 24 this scheme is reversed: on the twelfth day (i.e. since Hektor's death: see on 31) the gods quarrel and debate the fate of the body. That night Priam visits Akhilleus, nd at dawn next day he returns to Troy (695-7). The preparations for Hektor's pyre last nine days, and on the tenth the body is burnt (664-5, 784-7; see on 660-7, nd 788-801 for further echoes of book 1).

Myres and Whitman went on to argue for a further correspondence of days between books 2-8 and 11-23, but their counts do not tally with each other. There is some confusion here, which seems due to the fact that the three days of books 19-23 (Akhilleus' aristeia, Patroklos' funeral and the Games) are to be included within the twelve-day period mentioned at 24.31

^{*} Cf. also 24.602-9, where Apollo and Artemis kill the Niobids, in punishment for Niobe's boasting.

⁴ Myres, 'Last book' 285-7, Whitman, HHT 257-8, Macleod, Iliad XXIV 32-3. Beck, Stilling 53ff., has useful criticism and discussion.

Structure and themes

(see comment). One cannot therefore count these three days as parate and parallel to the three days following book 1, as Myres and Whitman do. It does, however, look as if the poet may be echoing the time-scheme of the opening Book at the close, at least in his emphasis on the periods of nine plus one and twelve days. On its own this is not a particularly significant point, given the tendency of Homeric epic to use these lengths of time elsewhere, but it does add another element to the overall correspondences of the two Books.

It is natural and appropriate that Homer should recapitulate motif and scenes at the end in such a way as to reflect the opening of his poem and to give a sense of closure, especially in relation to the major themes of quarrel and reconciliation, anger and appeasement, supplication rejected and received. It is possible that the ending of the Odyssey (whether part of the original composition or not) is similarly designed to echo some of the leading themes of the opening episodes.⁷ Moreover, the prominence of Apollo at the beginning and end of the Ili d may be partly p r lleled by his rôle at the climax of the Odyssey, where the killing of the suitors occurs on the feast-day of the archer-god (20.276-8, 21.265-8). It would be tempting to see this as a sign that the poems could have been designed for recitation at one of the great festivals of Apollo, such as the Delian one described in the Homeric Hymn to Apollo (146-76, and cf. Wade-Gery, Poet of Iliad 16-17), but of course other occasions are possible (see vol. IV, Introduction, p. 38).

That book 2 is broadly paralleled by book 23 is less obvious, but seems nonetheless true. After the compressed and dramatic narrative of book 1, the pace slows almost to a halt, and the focus 1 broadened to encompass the armies as a whole, and especially the Greek army, its leaders and its men. their actual statistics (in the C t logue of Ships) and their morale. As with much of the material in books 2-7, we are looking back here towards the beginning of the Trojan War, the portent at Aulis and the marshalling of the ships, and over its subsequent course. Book 23 (although different in general tone from book 2) again gives us a final panorama o the Greeks and their leaders, and as with much of the material in the later parts of the poem, it anticipates developments beyond the end of the poem, especially in some of the events of the Games (see on 262-897). A specific link between these two Books is the fact that the main action of both is sparked off by a dream scene, in book 2 the deceptive Dream ent by Zeus to Agamemnon (1-36), in 23 the dream of Akhilleus in which Patroklos' ghost tells him to bury his body as soon as po sible, nd speaks of Akhilleus' own imminent death (62-108). These are the only extended dream scenes in the llia (unl we count 24.682-9, which ' not actually said to be a dream; 10.496-7and 22.199-201 are brief references), whereas they are commoner in the Odyssey. Their r rity in the lli strengthens the case for seeing a parallelism between them, as a marker of the balance between these two Books.⁴

¹ Cf. Myres, 'Last book' 267; Heubeck on Od. 24.413-548, 451-62, 472-88. For a survey of views on the ending of the Odysser cf. S. West, 'Laertes revisited', PCPS 215 (1989) 113-43.

The correspondences between books 3 and 22 are much closer. The duel of Paris and Menelaos, which needs to be considered together with its immediate sequel, the breach of the truce by Pandaros in book 4, takes us back to the origins of the War, with the conflict between the two contestants for Helen, and the original guilt of the Trojans as accomplices of Paris is echoed within the poem in Pandaros' treachery (cf. especially 4.155-68, where Agamemnon predicts their ultimate punishment by Zeus). With this inconclusive affair we should contrast the duel of Akhilleus and Hektor, which seals Troy's fate. But there are more specific links which suggest that the poet may be aware of what he is doing here. Book 3 begins with Paris coming forward boldly to i sue a challenge to fight, but retreating in dismay at the sight of Menelaos, like a man seeing a snake in the mountain-glens (15-37). Hektor rebukes him, and he then offers to fight a duel with Helen's former husband (38-75). In 22 Hektor waits to fight Akhilleus outside the Scaean gate, undeterred by the pleas of his parents, like a deadly mountainsnake waiting in its lair to attack a man (93-7; see comment), but when Akhilleus comes nearer he flees (131-7). Again the two imiles act as signposts for the parallelism between the two duels, and the scene in 22 gains in irony by comparison with 3, where Hektor rebuked Paris for his cowardice.

At 3.121ff. Iris comes to Helen, disguised as a daughter of Priam, and finds her at home weaving a tapestry depicting the sufferings of the Trojans and Greeks on her behalf. She invites her to come and watch the duel from the walls, and Helen goes out, wearing her veil, and shedding a tear, accompanied by two maids, to the Scaean gate. There follows the Teikhoskopia, where she joins Priam and the other elders and identifies some of the Greek leaders for him (146-244). In book 22 Priam again watches from the walls (25ff., where 46-8 re emble 3.236-8). After Hektor's death he and Hekabe lament him (405-36), while Andromakhe, unaware of his death, is at home weaving a decorative tapestry (440-1

^{*} It is natural that nearly all of the heroes, including some minor ones, who compete in the Games should be mentioned in the Catalogue of Ships; only Epeios is not. But it is possibly igni cant that at the end of the Achaean Catalogue th poet hould pause to discuss who were the best horses and men, and in doing so should single out those of Eumelos (763-7; cf. 713-15). Both Eumelos and his horses only reappear in the chariot-race (23.288ff.). If this passage in book 21 an anticipation of the Games it is also appropriate that in the following passage the poet should describe how Akhilleus' Myrmidons console their inactivity with athletic exercises (773-5).

Structure and them s

echoes 3.125-6). Hearing the lamentation she rushes out, telling two of her maids to come with her, and when she reaches the wall and sees Hektor dead he faints, and her head-dress and veil fall from her head (437-74). She then recovers and utters her own lament (475-515). There is a poignant contrast here between the unhappy woman in book 3 who was the cause of the War, and who wishes she and her present husband were dead, and the innocent wife in 22 whose fate is linked so closely to that of Troy's defender.

In book 3 the Teikhoskopia is followed by the solemn ceremony of oath-taking between Agamemnon and Priam, laying down condition for the duel, including the return of Helen and her property and further compensation by the Trojans if Menelaos wins (245-302). Priam then leaves, unable to bear to see the fight (303-13). In 22 Hektor debates whether to return Helen and the property, and offer in addition to divide all Troy's wealth between the two sides, but rejects this as useless (111-30). When he confronts Akhilleus he proposes that they make a divinely sanctioned pact that the victor will return the body of his enemy, but Akhilleus replies that no such agreements or oaths are conceivable between them (254-69), and he again rejects Hektor's final plea for burial (337-54). In books 3-4 the Trojans are morally on the wrong footing with regard to their oaths, whereas in 22 it is Akhilleus who, in rejecting the normal conventions of war and in his subsequent mistreatment of the body, will eventually arouse the gods' displeasure (cf. 22.356-60, 24.23-76, 24.107-19). The ceremonial formality of the duel in 3 (cf. also the duel between Aia and Hektor in 7) contrasts with the complete lack of such formality in 22.

At the end of the duel in book 3 Paris is rescued by Aphrodite, concealed in a cloud, and Menelaos is left vainly searching for him (380-461). There follows a debate in heaven over Troy's fate (4.1-74), involving a proposal by eus for a peaceful solution, countered by Here's violent protest. This leads to Athene's deception of Pandaros (75-104). These motifs of divine rescue, debate, and deceit recur a number of times els where, and so it may be less significant, but it is still interesting that we find them at the end of book 21 and in 22. Here Agenor, whose duel with Akhilleus anticipates Hektor's in various ways, is rescued by Apollo, who decoys Akhilleus into vainly pursuing Apollo himself (21.595-605; 21.597-8 ~ 3.380-2). In 22 Zeus propos to rescue Hektor, but Athene protests strongly and he yields to her, as he had yielded to Here in book 4 (22.166-87; 22.185 ~ 4.37, 22.186-7 = 4.73-4). Athene then deceives Hektor into facing Akhilleus (226-305). In both cases the various divine manoeuvres are designed to bring a stage cl r Troy's eventual fall. It is also striking that the motif of divine rescue, which is used to clase the duel in book 3, should occur to the poet at the end of 21, just before the duel with Hektor, at point where it has much less functional significance than some of the other motifs we have considered, as well as in the course of 22 itself, where rescue is proposed but rejected.

The rest of book 4 consists of preliminaries to the first clash of both armies, with Agamemnon's review of his troops and leaders, which seems to be a further stage of the process of general survey of the armies seen in book 2 and the Teikhoskopia (cf. 4.223-421 with comments). Finally battle is joined (422-544). The next major episode, however, is the aristeia of Diomedes in book 5. It has often been observed that Diomedes is a more straightforward and les tragic counterpart to Akhilleus (cf. Reinhardt, luD 124), and his exploits here resemble in various respects those of Akhilleus in books 20-1, the corresponding section at the end of the poem.

In particular, both heroes have duels with Aineias, ending with Aineias' divine rescue (5.166-453, 20.158-339), both fight with gods, and in both cases the pro-Greek gods triumph in conflict with the pro-Trojan ones. The Aineias episodes naturally evoke other parallels, such as the references to his ancestors Tros and Ganymede, and the divine Trojan horses (5.221-3, 5.260-73. 20.221-35), and there are parallels of phrasing in the duels themselves (see on 5.167, 5.302-10, 5.311-12, 20.259-352, 20.285-7, 20.288-91, 20.319).

There are, however, even closer resemblances between the scenes in 5 and 21 where Aphrodite and Ares are wounded (5.330-430, 5.711-909, 21.385-434; cf. also 21.505-14). In 5 Aphrodite is wounded by Diomedes with Athene's aid and Athene and Here exult over her, and in 21 with Here's support she is knocked out by Athene, who triumphs over her. In 5 Aphrodite is then consoled on Mt Olumpos by her mother Dione, a motif obliquely echoed by Zeus's consolation of Artemis in 21 (505-14, where 509-10 = 5.373-4). In 5 Here and Athene prepare, with Zeus's permision, to fight Ares, and Diomedes and Athene together wound Ares, who goes to Zeus to complain. In the Theomachy the gods are fighting with eus's expre permission (20.23-5), and Ares is knocked out by Athene in a scene which explicitly echoes the one in 5: Ares angrily recalls his earlier defeat at 21.396-9, and his treachery in helping the Trojans instead of the Greeks is mentioned in both cases (5.832-4, 21.412-14).

The ignominious treatment of these pro-Trojan deities in both episodes is contrasted with the dignity of Apollo. In 5 he warns Diomedes that mortals should not try to fight against gods, and rescues Aineias, setting him down in his temple at Pergamon and creating an image of him to be fought over (432-53). In 21 he refuses to fight Poseidon, saying that it is absurd for gods to fight over mere mortals (461-7), and at the end of the Theomachy he enters Troy to protect it, persuades Agenor to face Akhilleus, and then rescues him and enables the Trojans to escape (515-17, 538-611).

Thes parallels between the two aris 'ai of Diomedes and Akhilleus can be explained as due to the general thematic resemblances of the two episodes, and one can view the Theomachy in 20-1 as echoing the earlier conflicts of the gods in 5. A further thematic link (suggested by Myres, 'Last book' 281-2) is less obvious, but worth considering: the tailpiece to Diomedes' aristeia is his meeting with Glaukos in book 6, ending with the exchange of arms, where Diomedes gains gold armour for bronze (6.234-6). This motif of the hero's acquisition of new golden armour, which here comes at the end of his most successful exploits, in the case of Akhilleus precedes and heralds his entry to battle, with the creation of the new divine armour by Hephaistos in book 18. The episode in 6 is relatively minor and has puzzled scholars (see on 6.234-6), whereas the theme is greatly expanded in 18, but it may be that the thematic links between Diomedes and Akhilleus have helped to suggest its introduction in book 6. In terms of ring composition the appearance of this motif after Diomedes' aristeia and before that of Akhilleus would fit the overall hema well.⁹

Structure and themes

After the battle scenes of books 5-6 come Hektor's visit to Troy and his meetings with his mother Hekabe, Helen and Paris, and Andromakhe. In structural terms these quieter, domestic episodes may be counterbalanced by the scenes in books 18-19 in the Greek camp, of Thetis' second visit to Akhilleus (leading to her vi it to Hephaistos), the reconcili tion of Agamemnon and Akhilleus, and the accompanying laments for Patroklos. In both cases we are made acutely aware that the leading heroes themelves, Hektor and Akhilleus, are soon to die (cf. 6.367-8, 6.407-93, 18.94-126, 19.408-24), and both accept this fact in similar words (cf. especially 6.486-9, 18.115-21). We see both heroes reactin to the emotional pres sures of those most dear to them. Akhilleus has no wife or children with him at Troy, but in lamenting Patroklos he also thinks of his father and son, back at home (19.321-37). Hektor's preoccupation with his pressing duty as a oldier is such that he refuses hi mother's offer of wine and Helen's of a seat (6.258-68, 6.354-62), as Akhilleus, because of his grief for Patroklos. refuses to eat until he has fought, although here this motif assumes far greater significance (19.199-214, 19.303-8).

After book 6 the case for structural correspondences of this kind becomes less strong. Book 7 contains the formal duel of Hektor and Aias, followed by a truce for burial of the dead of both sides and the building of the Achaean Wall. The first day of fighting ends (undramatically) at 7.380, and the truce occupies two more days (see on 7.433). Book 8 covers one more whole day of fighting. It begins with the momentous decree of Zeus forbidding the gods to intervene, which is lifted in book 20. Battle is joined and fortunes fluctuate, but after Here and Athene have been pr vented from helping the Greeks the Trojans are dominant and the plan of Zeus is clearly taking effect (cf. especially Zeus's prophecy at 470-83). The scene is set for the Embassy to Akhilleus in book 9.

[•] Other possible links are the parallel glorification by Athene of Diomedes at 5.1-8 and Akhilleus at 18.202-31, and the echo at 21.462-6 of the simile comparing men to leaves at 6.146-9.

As Kirk observes (vol. 11, pp. 230–1, 293), by contrast with what precedes books 7 and 8 seem les clearly motivated within the poem's design, although the building of the Wall is an important preliminary to the great central battle, and book 8 does move the plot an important stage further forward. In terms of overall ring composition one might well be inclined to see Akhilleus' rejection of the Embassy in book 9 as answered (to some extent) by 16, where he allows Patroklos to fight (Whitman, HHT 279–83). The opening scene of 9, where Agamemnon weeps like a dark spring (13–15), ' echoed in the simile describing Patroklos' tears (16.2–4), a marker which could be regarded as similar to the two dreams in 2 and 23, or the similes at the beginning of 3 and 22. Akhilleus' renewal of his complaint about Agamemnon (16.49–63: see comments) clearly echoes book 9 (especially 644–55), and when the first ship is fired he allows Patroklos to fight, again mindful of his promis to Aias in 9 (16.122–9).

At the same time, Akhilleus' rejection of Agamemnon's offer in 9 is not finally reversed until their meeting in 19, and equally the fighting in 16, especially the major duels of Patroklos with Sarpedon and Hektor, if they do have a structural counterpart in the earlier books, could possibly find this in the duel of Aias and Hektor in 7.¹⁰ We are then left with the narratives of more general fighting in 8 and 17, both of which broadly show the Greeks under increasingly severe pressure, and both have a similar function. As 8 prepares for the plea to Akhilleus in 9, 0 17 sets the scene for Akhilleus' final entry into battle, whose prologue occurs in 18 (cf. 165-238). The scene with which 8 ends, however, the Trojan assembly on the plain by night, in which Hektor confidently predicts the defeat of the Greeks, is only answered or balanced at 18.243-314 (see comments), the corresponding assembly at nightfall where he refuses to take Pouludamas' advice to withdraw into Troy (18.303-4 = 8.530-1; cf. Whitman, HHT 277-8).

Thus in these parts of the poem it would still be theoretically possible to discover certain major corresponding episodes, but the sequence would become less regular. We have now reviewed the first nine and last nine books, leaving only the interlude of the Doloneia and books 11-15. In 11-12 the Greeks suffer a series of major reverses, with the wounding of several leaders, Hektor's aristeia, and the battle for the Wall. In 13-14 they enjoy a respite and some majo successes, aided by Poseidon and Here's ¹⁰ Cf. or example Gordesiani, Kriterien der Schriftlichkeit 32-3, 44-6.

Structure and them s

deception of Zeus, until Hektor is eventually knocked out by Telamonian Aias and the Trojans flee. This process is again reversed in 15 after Zeus has awoken, when further prophetic speech by Zeus (49-77) looks forward as far as the capture of Troy. This is echoed by another programmatic passage at 592-614, and it marks the beginning of a major forward movement in the plot, which then advances without any more large-scale retardations until the end of the poem. Meanwhile the other main strand of the plot has been spun between books 11 and 15, with Patroklos' mission to Nestor and consequent delay to help Eurupulos (11.596-848), resumed at 15.390-405 when he sets off to return to Akhilleus' hut. Book 15 builds up to a great climax (rather as 12 does, but still more intensely), with the aristeia of Telamonian Aias, as the Greeks are forced back step by step to the defence of the ships, culminating in repeated calls by the leaders of both sides to fight harder (especially 484ff., 56off., 661ff., 773ff.), and a great eries of similes (592-636). There is o strong break at the end of this Book and the battle for the ships continues directly at 16.102ff., after the dialogue o Patroklos and Akhilleus.11

This surely illustrates the important fact that any structural correspondences such as have been suggested here between the earlier and later parts of the poem must be seen as in counterpoint with the main forward movement of the narrative, which works in a series of increasing waves, with peaks and corresponding troughs between them. The difference depends on whether one considers the poem from a static, visual point of view (as in Myres' and Whitman's theories), or from a dynamic and aural one. An audience unfamiliar with the work can only do the latter, but a composer who has developed and expanded his work gradually over a long period of time can do both. In fact, it is probably best to view any ring-composition theory of this kind from the standpoint of the poet who is operating on th level both of detailed composition and also of large-scale planning. In doing the latter he will naturally take most care over the opening and closing parts of his work, where consequently we find the clearest correspondences, providing the narrative 'frame' (cf. Whitman, HHT 258-9, Mueller, Ilia 175, Silk, Iliad 39).

Thus we begin with the intensely compressed action of book 1, followed by the broader, panoramic view of 2. The focus then narrows to the duel and its aftermath in 3-4, and this is followed by the major battle sequence in 5 in which the first aristeia is described and Greek natural supremacy is emphasized. Then come the quieter but emotionally charged episodes in Troy which arise from this, and so on. The poet is working with large-scale

¹¹ For the structure of books 11-15 see also on 11.426-7 (11-13 seem to form 'some kind of internal unit') and on 14.1-152, 15.262-404.

Structure and th mes blocks of scenes of contrasting character, just as he constantly maintains variety of pace and tone at a more detailed level. The overall pattern of the poem seems to fall broadly into three main sections or 'panels', the opening one with Akhilleus' withdrawal, leading up to book 9, the central Books of the great battle, whether we see thi as running from 11 to Patroklos' intervention in 16 or (perhaps more convincingly) from 11 to 18, and the closing section involving Akhilleus' return to fight. In terms of the poem's larger theme of the War as a whole, the first part is to some extent retrospective and the last is prospective, and the balance and contrasts are clearest between the opening and closing sections.

The visual analogies suggested by the ring-composition theory are, as had been said, only one type of approach. Given the fundamentally formular character of Homeric composition, certain leading themes will tend to recur several times throughout a large-scale composition, and here compari on with musical motifs (or leitmotifs) also can be relevant.¹² It has been the special merit of Schadewaldt and Reinhardt and their followers that they have concentrated attention on the significance of such recurrent themes, the interrelationships between different episodes which they suggest, and the effects of foreshadowing and anticipation which they involve (vol. v, pp. 7–10). Typical motifs and themes have already been considered in vol. 11 (pp. 15–27), and composition by theme is discussed in vol. v (pp. 11–23).¹³ Something more, however, needs to be said briefly in conclusion about the poem's major themes and their development.

(ii) Themes

Any ttempt to categori e such themes 1 bound to be somewhat arbitrary and impressionistic, even more so than in the case of analyses of structure. Nevertheless, such analysis can be illuminating, whether it is purely internal, considering only the poem itself, or comparative, identifying narrative motifs and patterns shared with other literary works.

¹⁸ This suggests one of the dangers inherent in any approach which tries to carry ring composition too far, if this involves singling out particular episodes as significantly b 1 need at the expense of others of a similar type: for example, the duels in 7 and 16, as opposed to those of 16 and 22 which also have close links with each other.

¹⁸ Cf. also Edwards, HPI 7-12 and 61-70, and 'Topos and transformation in Homer', in Bremer, HBOP 47-60

Stru ture and th mes

beginning from the quarrel of Agamemnon and Akhilleus (1.6-7), tracing the immediate cause of this and following its consequences. Passion leads to strife, in this case a form of $\sigma \tau \dot{\alpha} \sigma_i \varsigma$ within the Greek army, due to a dispute over a woman. This theme mirrors the cause of the Trojan War itself, the passion of Paris for Helen, which led to the strife between Greeks and Trojans. Similar processes are at work both internally (within one society) and externally (between different peoples). Attempts to mend the quarrel of the Greek leaders are as fruitless as efforts to resolve the War peacefully, and whole nations suffer from the passions of their rulers (as Horace says in his summary of the Iliad's significance in Epist. 1.2.6-16). The leading theme of the poem is thus linked closely to the broader theme which makes it an Ili, the Trojan War as a whole. In both ca. s, the outcome f strife is the death of many on both sides (1.3-5). Passion, war, and death are the basic ingredients which go to make up much of this work.

The opening lines, however, also introduce another essential element: the poet begins by asking a goddess to sing of the wrath, and concludes the proem with 'and the plan of Zeus was fulfilled' (1.5). The narrative of the quarrel starts by asking, not what human action sparked it off, but 'which of the gods' (1.8). Behind the sufferings of mortals lies the will of the gods, and only divine inspiration can enable the singer to know what are the hidden springs of human action. The relationship of gods and men is as much a theme of the poem as the ones we have already identified. Moreover, it is closely linked to these, ince death and immortality are oppo ite sides of a ingle concept, and this is what divides men and gods most fundamentally. This boundary is more clearly marked in the lliad than in other early Greek epics.

Divine will governs the order of the world, and this order is defined in terms of such concepts as µoipa, a word most often used in the lliad in the context of a man's life and death, but one which can also be applied more generally to aspects of human society and its ordering. Thus from the specific theme of gods and men we move on naturally to the broader issues of social order and heroic ethics, such themes as honour (Tiufi), respect (αίδώς) and pity (έλεος), and the conventions governing behaviour between different classes of people, men and women, rulers and ruled, Greeks and non-Greeks, old and young, one's family, Exivor, suppliants, and so on. These ethical issues take us beyond the specific terms of the Iliad's story (in contrast to others), but they help to define the limits within which it operates. The working-out of the consequences of passion, war and strife en very much in ethical terms. How f r particular form of conduct, is such as those of Agamemnon and Akhilleus, Hektor and Paris, Patroklos and others, are justified, the nature of human responsibility for error, the operation of what Homeric poetry describes as arn, and the processes of restitution, reconciliation and atonement: all of these are ethical issues fundamental to the poem, and help to give it its moral character. Ultimately, it is surely to a large extent these aspects, together with the poet's insight into human character, which lead us to regard this as one of the greatest works of European literature still today.

Although the lliad encompasses the Trojan War as a whole together with many earlier events, and although the poet's geographical terms of reference are wide, the essential plot is highly concentrated. In this resp ct it is very different from the Odyssey. It covers the events of a limited number of days, and its main scenery i the plain of Troy, which (like the battlefields of northern France in the First World War) has few features or landmarks. The starkness of the setting is impressive: the destructive forces of War have obliterated nearly all creative aspects of nature and landscape. It has been observed too that there is hardly any 'weather' in the poem's action, beyond the monotonous recurrence of sunris , noon and sunset, the welcome respite of nightfall and the ominous return of dawn, and the supernatural phenomena of thunder and lightning, eerie mists blotting out the battlefield, or bloody rain, all signs of divine involvement in the conflict.

The range of dramatis ersona of the action itself is also limited almost entirely to the distant world of gods and heroes, warriors whose life seems to be devoted mainly to fighting. It is very noticeable in this respect how relatively slight and debatable are the differentiating marks which might distinguish the Greeks from their eastern enemies, the Trojans and their allies.14 The main distinction on the human level is not between Greeks and oreigners, but between different levels of society, rulers and ruled (βασιλῆες and $\delta \tilde{\eta} \mu o s$). We see very little of the latter in the Iliad. The only really 'unheroic' characters are Thersites and Dolon, and even they may perha s belong rather to the 'upper' than the 'lower' classes (see comment on 2.212). Both names suggest that they represent types. The scenes involving them offer interludes of comic relief. They are close in tone and content to the Odyss, and it is significant that Odysseus is prominent in both of them. The episode with Thersites resembles the boxing-match in which he beats up the beggar Iros (Od. 18.1-107; see also on 23.784), and the Doloneia displays his special Odyssean skills in deception. In the Games for Patroklos we meet a similar comic character from a lower order of society, Epeios (the carpenter of the Wooden Horse) in the boxing and weight-throwing events (see on 653-99, 665, 840). In general, however, in the poem's action on the human level we do not find the range of characters which appears in the Odyssey, such as slaves, farmers, craftsmen and merchants, and which makes that poem seem so much closer to the life of the poet's own day. Even priests or seers often appear in the Iliad only to be killed, and may themselves be aristocratic.

¹⁴ Cf. the scepticism of Hall, Barbarian, especially 19-55; but for some possible differences between the two d see on 21.130-2, 24.495-7, 24.719-22 (para. 4).

This bleak concentration of theme and focus is to some extent relieved by the similes, with their vivid and refreshing vignettes of the world of the poet and his audience, the peaceful, everyday world of Ionia in the eighth century B.C., filled with such a wealth of details of landscape, weather, country and domestic life, and so on. The Shield of Akhilleus also gives us a microcosm of the contemporary world, in its main aspects of war and peace, countryside and town. The poignant domestic scenes of life in Troy and of Hektor's family add great depth, but essentially they heighten the path of the War, with all its human loss. Hektor's impending death hangs heavy over his meetings with his family in book 6. On the Greek side we have the shadowy figures of the captive women, among whom only Brise is briefly but movingly characterized (1.348, 19.282-302), and the many moving references to the families who have been left at home. These reach their culmination in the meeting between Priam and Akhilleus in book 24, where the theme of fathers and sons, important throughout, is most powerfully represented by Priam's appeal (see on 24.486-506, and vol. v, p. 10).

As a foil to the bleakness of the human tragedy there is the 'divine comedy' of Olympian society, with its scenes of family quarrels and feuds. Without such contrasts the endless tale of killing would seem unbearable. Yet even the gods, for all their apparent freedom from care, are in fact inextricably and p ionately involved in human affairs, and are themselves deeply affected by the sufferings of those whom they love (cf. especially Griffin, HLD 179-204).

We have briefly reviewed the broader thematic outlines of the poem: passion and its moral effects ($\pi \acute{\alpha} \acute{\theta} o_{5}$ and $\check{\eta} \acute{\theta} o_{5}$), war and peace, gods and men, Achaeans and their enemies. Within thi framework we might ask whether it is possible to define certain leading motifs (or 'narrative patterns') which recur ignificantly throughout the work and help to give the poem its shape. This may well be an even more subjective venture than our speculat ons so far, but nevertheless worth the attempt.

The Trojan War itself begins with the abduction of a woman, and this motif is repeated in the quarrels of Khruseis and Briseis, involving the anger of (successively) Apollo, Agamemnon and Akhilleus. This pattern occurs also in the story of Demeter and the rape of Persephone. Both Demeter and Akhilleus withdraw in anger, causing devastation. Attempts are made to appease them with offers of recompense, but these fail. Eventually they do return, and there is a reconciliation with the offending parties.¹⁸ This narrative pattern governs the plot of the Iliad up to book 19. Interwoven with it is another major theme, that of the death of the hero's closest friend, his grief and subsequent vengeance: this strand of the story effectively begins with book 11 and takes us up to book 22 or 23 (Edwards, HPI 8-9, 63). It is this above all which gives the plot its most tragic quality. The story could well have ended there, with Hektor's death or Patroklos' burial, but the typical theme of the fate of a dead warrior's body is here developed into a remarkable conclusion, with Priam's visit to Akhilleus to recover his son's corps (Edwards, HPI 9-10, 79-81).

¹⁸ Cf. M. L. Lord, 'Withdrawal and return: an epic story pattern in the Homeric Hymn to Demeter and in the Homeric Poems', CJ 62 (1967) 241-8; Edwards, HPI 62,

Structure and th m s

These three themes are, however, themselves closely linked by repeated patterns. All three involve grief or anger at the loss of a loved one (Helen, Khruseis, Briseis; Patroklos, Hektor), the infringement of honour which this implies, and the need to recover what has been lost (although in the case of Patroklo and Hektor this can only be the body). In the case of the women and Patroklos anger and grief lead to vengeance and the desire for compensation.

A motif which recurs significantly throughout is that of supplication, and this has been seen by some as one of the key themes of the poem (cf. especially Thornton, Su plication 113-42). In book 1 the rejected supplication of Agamemnon by Khruses leads to his prayer to Apollo for vengeance, and Akhilleus' request to Thetis leads to her successful supplication of Zeus. In 9 the Embassy, although not originally seen as supplication, is viewed in these terms by Phoinix and Diomedes (9.501, 9.502-12, 9.698): this again fails. In 16, however, Akhilleus yields to Patroklos' plea to pity the Greeks, to the extent that he allows him to fight instead. Finally, having refused Hektor's repeated requests for burial in book 22 (the culmination of all the 'suppliant scenes' which occur in the actual fighting), he gives way at last to Priam.

Agathe Thornton argues that this motif is closely linked to the theme of $d\tau\eta$. Agamemnon is a victim of this because of his treatment of Khruses and Akhilleus, and Akhilleus because of his own refusal to give way to the Embassy. This leads to the involvement of Patroklos (cf. especially 11.602-4). Patroklos too fails to heed Akhilleus' warning not to attack Troy, and is implicated in the process as a largely innocent victim, and equally Hektor is doomed because he refuses the advice of Pouludamas in book 18. These examples take us beyond the suppliancy theme itself. But the close association between Prayers (A1T01) and Ate is clearly expressed in Phoinix' speech to Akhilleus (9.496-514), where he describes how Prayers are the daughters of .eu himself, who come fter Ate to heal the harm; if one hears them they help one, but if one rejects them they ask Zeus to send Ate as retribution. This clear warning is not heeded by Akhilleus, who loses Patroklos as a result. But in the end, after his reconciliation with Agamemnon and Hektor's death, he accepts the orders of Zeus (himself the guardian of suppliants) to hear the prayers of Priam (cf. Thornton, Supplication 135-6, 140-1). This theme of suppliancy thus does much to articulate nd shape the main movement of the plot, as well as carrying great weight in terms of the poem's moral significance.

Finally, Akhilleus' rejection and later acceptance of the claims upon him of his fellow-men highlight another essential aspect of the poem, that of the isolation of this hero from society, which is linked to hi fore nowledge of impending death. This theme was to have powerful repercussions in later Greek literature, especially in the tragedies of Sophocles, several of whose heroes seem to have inherited from Akhilleus their own rugged and solitary grandeur.

To isolate, as we have done, certain themes in this way from the complexity of such a vast work is clearly a highly selective process, and it would be possible to argue that the poem's significance depends as much on other factors as it does on these. One might object that more weight should be given to the themes of honour $(\tau_1\mu_1)$ and fame $(\kappa\lambda_1 \log)$, which are fundamental to heroic narrative, and which govern the behaviour of all the leading characters in the poem. Alternatively, in stressing the emotional and moral aspects, have we failed to give due value to the role of the poem as a historia document in antiquity, and one with great patriotic appeal? One can point in this respect to certain crucial themes, such as the extraordinary concept of a single, united expedition of Greek peoples against their eastern neighbours in the heroic age, the strains and stresses involved in holding this together, the lack of clarity over the expedition's overall command, and the resulting clash of leaders with different claims to pre-eminence. The picture presents is in this respect curiously imilar to that of the which the Ili Odyssey, where settled government is disrupted by the absence of the titular ruler of Ithac and the issue of succession to the kingship is unclear. It is hard to believe that such situations have no historical basis, and this suspicion ' confirmed by Hesiod, whose Works and Days is remarkably outspoken against the local rulers, who are portrayed as corrupt and greedy (cf. for example his δωροφάγους βασιλήσς of Erga 38-9 with the accusation that Ag memnon i a δημοβόρος βασιλεύς at Il. 1.231). By contrast, Hesiod's picture of the honest peasant farmer and his lazy, dishonest brother has its clo e counterpart in the loyal and disloyal retainers of Odysseus.

Such historical or semi-historical issues are, however, rather shared between the llia and Odyssey than peculiar to one poem. Further discussion of them would be beyond the scope of this Introduction, but see J. B. Hainsworth, vol. m (pp. 32-53).

2. Two pecial problem

(i) Book division

There is no positive evidence that the division of the Iliad or Odyssey into twenty-four books, numbered with the letters of the Ionic alphabet, was made before the Alexandrian period. In the fifth and fourth centuries B.C. several authors refer to episodes or sections of both poems by titles, such as Δ_{100} η_{500} $\dot{\alpha}_{107761}$ (Hdt. 2.116, quoting 6.289-92), $\Sigma\kappa\eta_{117}$ pou mapáboois, Neão kartáloyos (Thuc. 1.9.4, 1.10.4), Λ_{1701} , Teixouaxía (Pl. Crat. 428c, Ion 539B), 'Alkívou $\dot{\alpha}m\delta\lambda\alpha\gamma\sigma_5$ (Pl. Rep. 614B, Arist. Po t. 1455a2, Rhet. 1417a13), Nímtpa (Arist. Poet. 1454b30). It i ignificant that Herodotu quotes part of book 6 as from Diomedes' aristeia (which is the title of book 5 in our MSS), and that the reference in the Po ti s to the 'story told to Alkinoos' is not to part of Odyssey 9-12, but to Od. 8.521ff. This indicates that in the classical period such titles did not correspond with our bookdivi 'ons, and taken by it lf th' tend to suggest either that the div' ion was not yet made, or that if it was, it was not so widely used as to affect the older division by episodes.¹⁶

The evidence of the Ptolemaic papyri is hard to assess.¹⁷ There is nothing to m rk the end or beginnin of a book of Homer in surviving papyri of the third or second century B.C., but few contain the junction between two books, and the left-hand margin is complete in only one case. In two papyri of the Odyssey, thought to belong to the second half of the third century B.C., the beginning of a roll or column apparently corresponded with Od. 9.1 and 21.1, and the second of these may possibly have contained only book 21. A few (3 or 4?) imilar cases are thought to occur in the later Ptolemaic period, but not all of these are certain. On the other hand, from the first century A.D. onward the end of a book is regularly marked by a coronis and title. Moreover, the first attestation of book-numbering in Alexandrian scholarship is in the late second century B.C., the Commentary on Ξ (book 14) of Apollodorus of Athens (cf. Erbse III 557).

The only ancient authors who attribute the division of the poems into 24 books to particular scholars are Ps.-Plutarch (Vita Hom. 2.4) and Eustathius (5.29ff.). The first makes it the work of τῶν γραμματικῶν τῶν περl 'Aplσταρχον, the econd (whose whole account is confused) 'Aristarchus and after him Zenodotus'. Against Ps.-Plutarch's attribution to Aristarchus

¹⁶ A long catalogue of such titles for episodes is given by Aelian (VH 13.14).

¹⁷ Cf. West, Ptolemaic P pyri 20-5.

Two special problems

(or Aristophanes) it has been argued that they would surely have made Od. 23.296 the end of a book, since they regarded th' as the 'end of the Od 35'. But this would have resulted in a book of only 296 verses, which could well have been regarded too short. Lachmann nd Wilamowitz a ued that the division was made by Zenodotus, who is also thought to have composed an essay on the number of days in the lliad.¹⁰ Alternatively, it has been suggested that the innovation made by the Alexandrian holars was not the division into books, but simply the use of letters of the alphabet for them, the div' ion itself being older.¹⁰

Those who prefer an earlier date for the book-division tend to associate it with rhapsodic practice, and the use of the term payoola for a book might support this.¹⁰ But this clashes with the evidence that titles of ep'sodes ran over book-divisions before the Hellenistic period. To some extent, however, the divisions presumably d'd correspond with rhapsodic breaks, in so far as they came at significant breaks in the narrative. It has also been rgued that the division works better for the llud than for the Odyssey, where it results in some rather short books, and that the Alexandrians would have been more rational.²¹ But once the division was made for one poem, it is not surpri ing that the me system should have been imposed on the other.

It must be admitted that the evidence is not sufficient to allow us to give a precise date for book-division. Even the early Ptolemaic papyri which seem to have begun a roll or column at (for example) Od. 9.1 or 21.1 may well have done so simply because these marked the beginning of significant sections of the poem (Ody eu' account of hi W nderings, and the Trial of the Bow). But such evidence as there is does seem to point to the Alexandrian period as the time when this innovation was made, rather than to an earlier date.²²

(ii) The end of the lliad in relation to the Odyssey

It has often been claimed that book 24 is clos r in language and theme to the Odyssey than the rest of the lliad is, but very varying conclusions have been drawn from this claim.²³

* Cf. Mazon, lec. cit., J. A. Notopoulos, HSCP 68 (1964) 11-12, West, Pappri 20 and West, Od. 39-40, G. P. Goold, Illinois Classical Studies 2 (1977) 26-90.

³¹ West, Ptolemaic Papyri 19 and West, Od. 40 n. 19.

¹⁸ See also vol. IV, p. 31 n. 47 'after Apollonius Rhodius'. O. Taplin, Homeric So ungs (Oxford 1992) 285-93, has a detailed examination of the actual book-divisions of the lited in relation to the poem's narrative structure.

¹³ Peppmüller listed Odyssean features and argued that book 24 was later than most of the Odyssey (Commenter des vierundzwanzigsten Buches der Ilias, Berlin 1876, xxxi-xl). Some later analysts followed him, others (e.g. Cauer and Wilamowitz) thought that 24 and the Odyssey

¹⁰ Cf. Pfeiffer, His ory o Classical Scholars p 116-17, Wilamowitz, Untersuchun en 369, and Nickau, RE XA (1972) s.v. Zenodotos (3), 6-7.

¹⁸ Cf. P. Mazon, Introduction & FII (Paris 1912) 198ff

Two special problems

First we must ask whether in fact 24 really does differ from the rest of the lli in this respect. My own impression is that it does. To begin with, one can see this simply from a survey of the density of comments which look specifically to the Odyssey for parallels rather than the lliad, i.e. about one in 5 or 6 verses of book 24, a frequency much greater than in other parts of this Commentary.³⁴ This survey covers a wide range of features – linguistic, stylistic and thematic – and on its own tells one little. It is also open to the objection that a commentator already aware of earlier attempts to connect book 24 to the Odyssey is more likely to notice such parallels here than elsewhere. However, the resemblances are particularly impressive when one considers the structure of scenes in 24.

It is surely significant that the narrative of the Odyssey opens in a way which is very close to the opening part of 24 (see on 22-76, 33, 33-4, 38, 77-119). The gods take pity on Odysseu as they do on Hektor, despite the hostility of Poseidon to Odysseus and the pro-Greek gods to Hektor. Athene's protests to Zeus in both Odyssey 1 and 5 resemble those of Apollo in Iliad 24. In each case Zeus agrees, and a double plan is put into action, which involves sending Athene and Hermes to Telemakhos and Kalupso, just as Zeus sends Iris to Thetis nd then to Priam in the Iliad. Hermes is also involved in the case of Hektor: unable to steal the body, he later come instead to escort Priam on his journey. Moreover, the beginning of Apollo's protest at the hard-heartedness of the gods is echoed by Kalupso when she is visited by Hermes (24.33, Od. 5.118), although here the motif is used in a different way; the journey of Iris to Thetis resembles that of Hermes to Kalup 0, both being described by a simile about fishing were the work of the same poet or circle of poets. Leaf (n 536) held that this Book 'resembles I, K, and Ψ , in its kinship to the Odyssey, but to a greater degree than any of them', concluding that 'if in the Mñviş we have the Aischylos, in this last book we have at once the Sophokles and Europides of the Epos'. But F. M. Stawell, in Homer and the Iliad (London 1909) 93ff. and 238ff., argued, with detailed evidence, that book 24 was no more Odyssean in style and language than books 1 or 22.1-404. Cf. from the same 'old unitarian' camp J. A. Scott, The Unity of H mer (Berkeley 1921) 73-105.

Later Reinhardt (IuD 469-505) took up arms against the analysts and reviewed some of the main parallels, arguing in favour of the strong influence of book 24 on the Odyssey. He was followed by Beck, who noted more cases of possible influence (Stellung 102-9, and Philologues 109 (1965) 1-29). Deichgräber, however (Letzle Gesang 114-17), observed that the similarities could be due to the use of common traditional material.

A brief attempt to identify some Odyssean features in the lluad is made by E. K. Borthwick, Odyss Elements in the lliad (Inaugural Lecture given at Edinburgh University on 2 May 1983). The relationship of the Odyssey to the lliad is revi wed more generally by R. B. Rutherford, in 'From the lliad to the Odyssey', BICS 38 (1991-2). Cf. also Usener, V is der Odyssee zur Ilias.

¹⁴ The frequency naturally varies widely, e.g. 1 in 45 verses of book 5, 1 in 10 of book 22, 1 in 13 of book 23. A short episode such as the sea-journey to Khruse (1.430-87) may be exceptional (about 1 in 6.5), and the subject-matter accounts for this (see on 1.432-9, 434); but I do n t believe that the density is so high over any other whol Book.

(24.80-2, Od. 5.51-4); and Hermes' journey at 24.331-48 is echoed closely at Od. 5.29-49.

The preparations for Priam's journey involve a number of motifs which recur in the Odyssey, especially the details of the gifts and the waggon, Hekabe's reactions, and the libation, prayer and omen before departure (see on 150, 190, 191-2, 200-16, 228, 229-37, 259-61, 263, 264, 277-8, 281-321, 292-8, 308-13). The journey itself, and the return to Troy next day, naturally have parallels in Odyssean overland journeys. But it is the major episode where Hermes and Priam meet and talk which bears the closest resemblance to Odyssean scenes, especially those of Hermes' visit to Kalupso, hi meeting with Odysseus in book 10, and other meetings between Athene and Odysseus or Telemakhos (see on 333-48, 347-8, 348, 349-442, 360-3, 375-7, 397-8). There is also a significant parallel here between the piety of Priam and that of Laertes at the end of the Odyssey (see on 425-8), which is one aspect of a larger issue, that of the parallelism between the endings of the two epics, both of which involve a sympathetic study of the aged father of one of the leading heroes, as well as the description of a funeral, and a 'moral ending'.

The portrayal of Akhilleus' quarters, and of Priam's visit and supplication, again have their closest parallels in the Odyssey (see especially on 469-691, and on 448-56, 450-1, 452-3, 472-6, 475-6, 482-4, 553-5, 558, 587-90, 633-76). Akhilleus' great speech of consolation to Priam (518-51) has many Odyssean features of expression (see on 518, 524, 525-6, 527-33, 529-30, 538-40, 543-6), and its moral themes (the importance of endurance, the uselessness of grief, the need to accept the will of the gods, etc.) find their clearest echoes in the Odyssey. Moreover, given the close relationship which we have seen between this Book and the opening of the Odyssey, it seems only natural to believe that Zeus's words at Od. 1.32-43, about how men blame the gods unfairly for all their troubles, take up and comment on Akhilleus' words about the Jars of Zeus at 24.527-33 (as bT on 527-8already surmised; see on 527-33).

Among many other parallels one deserves to be singled out here: Hekabe's and Helen's laments, with their restrained pathos, seem to be echoed together in the touching speech of Odysseus' mother's ghost to him in the Nekuia, when she describes how she died of longing for him and for his gentleness (Od. 11.197-203; see on 757-9, 768-72).

Finally, as Macleod rightly says (Iliad XXIV 15), at the end of the Iliad the gods 'appear as what they are throughout the Odyssey, the guarantors of justice and kindness among mortals'. The moral tone of book 24, on both the divine and human levels, anticipates that of the Odyssey, just as much as its language, themes and scenic construction.

What conclusion are we to draw from these observations? Clearly there is a range of possible explanations, as always in such cases of epic parallels. Few nowadays would agree with the old analytical view that book 24 is later than and influenced by the Odyssey. More would side with Reinhardt, seeing the Odyssey as the work of a poet particularly heavily influenced by this part of the Iliad. Some, however, will prefer Deichgraber's view, that the resemblances are due to common use of traditional elements. This last view may seem to some extent satisfactory, but on its own it is surely not enough to explain what appear to be such major differences between this Book and the rest of the Iliad. It is surely more likely that the composer of the Odyssey had the end of the Iliad especially in mind, whether or not both poems are by the same author. It is, however, tempting to go a step further, and to see the similarities as due to the fact that when Homer gave the end of the lliad the form it has, the Odyssey was already taking shape in his mind: i.e. not only is a single poet the composer of both, but their composition actually overlapped to some extent. Thus we find that not only does the Iliad itself form a great and complex ring-structure, whose end echoes and resolves the themes of its beginning, but it is also inseparably linked or dovetailed thematically with the Odyssey, as if the two works could really almost be regarded as one great epic continuum, stretching from the Wrath of Akhilleus to the safe homecoming and triumph of the last of the heroes, Odysseus.

Two special problems

۰.,

(i) From Homer to Aristotle²³

The Homeric poems, and especially the Odyssey, have much to say about singers and audiences, and it is possible to construct from them a kind of ars poetica.²⁶ The singer's status, his ethical, didactic and commemorative roles, the emotional impact of song, the questions of originality, of poetic technique and inspiration, of credibility, truth and fiction: these are all themes which are reflected in what the poet himself says, and they anticipate much that will be important in later criticism. The Odyssey even contains the first example of explicit criticism of epic song, together with an answer to this. When Phemios sings of the painful return of the Achaeans from Troy, Penelope weeps, and then asks him to change the subject, because it is so distressing for her personally. Telemakhos replies:

My mother, why do you begrudge the faithful bard the right to give pleasure in whatever way his mind prompts him? It is not bards who are to blame; no, surely Zeus is to blame, who allots to mortal men whatever he wishes for each. And this man should not be criticized if he sings of the Danaans' fate: for men always give more renown to that song which is the latest to circulate among its hearers. (1.346-52)

It can also be argued that the Odyssey itself, in its implied ideals of survival at all costs, homecoming and domestic harmony, forms the first commentary on - and criticism of - the Iliad.²⁷ What is clear, at any rate, is that the composer of the Odyssey has learnt a great deal from the extraordinary

۰.

ţ

²⁸ A version of much of this section appears as 'Aristotle's reading of Homer and its background' in Lamberton and Keaney, Homer's Ancient Readers.

²⁶ Cf. especially W. Marg, Homer über die Dichtung (2nd edn, Münster 1971), H. Frankel, Early Greek Poetry and Philosophy (Oxford 1975) 6-25, J. Svenbro, La Parole et le marbre (Lund 1976) 11-45, Macleod, Iliad XXIV 1-8 and Collected Essays (Oxford 1983) 1-15, G. B. Walh, The Varieties of Enchantment (Chapel Hill 1984), C. Segal, 'Bard and audience in Homer', in Lamberton and Keaney, Homer's Ancient Readers, S. Goldhill, The Poet's Voice (Cambridge 1991) 56-68.

³⁷ Cf. J. Griffin, in Bremer, HBOP 101: 'The poet of the Odyssey is aware of the llied and, in important respects, composing in response to it; his response makes him the first of literary critics'; and ibid. 102: 'A marvellous creation ... fit for the greatest of all heroes; yet grim and terrifying, immoderate, never to be repeated. That, perhaps, was the final judgment of the Odyssey on the Iliad.' Cf. also R. B Rutherford, 'From the Iliad to the Odyssey', BICS 3^8 (1991-2).

achievement of the earlier poem, and his work may well be seen as a poetic reflection on the lliad, as well as a complement to it.

One of the most fundamental issues which the narrative of the Odyssey seems to reflect, whereas there is no hint of this in the Iliad, is the question of the fictional character of epic. By making Odysseus himself the supreme master of false tales, by telling the incredible tales of his wanderings in his own mouth, and then by stressing on two occasions his resemblance to a skilful singer whose words carry conviction, however strange they may be (Od. 11.363-9, 17.513-21), the poet indirectly draws attention to this issue. It is surely significant that the verse which describes the disguised Odysseus' skill in deceiving his own wife by his narrative, $Ioke \psieidea \pio\lambda\lambda \lambda \lambda ieu$ trivioioiv duoia (19.203), is so close to that of Hesiod's Muses in their $famous address to him (Th. 27-8): Tokev <math>\psieidea \pio\lambda\lambda \lambda \lambda ieu i the tale$ Muses pose the problem explicitly: if they can sing both truth and crediblefiction, how is one to distinguish between them?

During the archaic period this will be a growing preoccupation Solon's dismissive πολλά ψεύδονται άσιδοl (fr. 29 West) anticipates the more detailed criticisms of the sixth-century B.c. philosophers Xenophanes, Heraclitus and probably also Pythagoras, and Stesichorus' explicit rejection of the Homeric and Hesiodic accounts of Helen and the Trojan War. Xenophanes is concerned to combat the epic portrayal of the gods as anthropomorphic and fallible, and the popular acceptance of Homer as a religious teacher (D-K 21 B 10-12, 14-16). Heraclitus attacks the philosophical authority of both Homer and Hesiod (22 A 22, B 40, 42, 56, 57, 106). Hesiod's breadth of learning ($\pi o \lambda v \mu \alpha \theta i \eta$) should not be mistaken for wisdom (B 40), and Homer, although wiser than all other Greeks, was unable to solve a children's riddle, the riddle of the lice (B 56). Homer and Archilochus deserve to be expelled from poetic contests and flogged, presumably on moral grounds, and for misleading people (B 42). According to later legend, Pythagoras was said to have seen Homer and Hesiod being punished in the Underworld, because of their lies about the gods (Hieronymus of Rhodes, fr. 42 Wehrli). Meanwhile Stesichorus produced his own version of the story of Helen, in which she never went to Troy, but stayed in Egypt throughout the War, whilst a phantom of her appeared at Troy (PMG 192-3). The phantom Helen was destined later to have philosophical repercussions, as a symbol of human illusion for Euripides, Plato, and the Neoplatonists.28

³⁹ Revising Homer's version of the Trojan War remained a popular game throughout antiquity: cf. especially Hdt. 2.112-20, Dio Chrys Or 11, Philostratus, Heroscus, and the accounts ascribed to Dictys and Dares.

Such attacks, however, did not prevent people from appealing to Homer as a historical source for political reasons, as Athens is said to have done early in the sixth century in her dispute with Megara over Salamis (Arist. Rhet. 1375b30). The Athenian claim to Sigeum in the Troad was based at least partly on their participation in the Trojan War, as portrayed in the lliad (Hdt. 5.94.2). We hear more of such appeals later, during the Persian Wars (Hdt. 7.161.3, 7.169, 7.171, 9.27.4). The authority of Homer in sixth-century Athens is shown most clearly by the regulation that the Homeric poems alone should be recited at the Panathenaia (Lycurgus, In Leocratem 102, Isocrates, Paneg. 159, Pl. Hipparchus 228B).²⁰ Although we are never explicitly told that 'Homer' means exclusively the lliad and Odyssey, that is probably what is meant by the fourth-century B.C. authors who first mention this rule, and it seems quite possible that these two poems were already being distinguished from the other early epics loosely associated by tradition with Homer's name.

Towards the end of the sixth century, we begin to hear of an attempt to meet the attacks of the philosophers on their own ground through allegory, in the work of Theagenes of Rhegium, who is said to have been the first to use this method. The context in which this is mentioned is that of allegorical interpretations of the Theomachy in lliad 20 and 21, in terms of the conflict both of physical elements and also of moral or psychological forces (D-K 8.2). This episode makes a natural starting-point for such interpretations, although exactly what Theagenes' own theory was is unclear. However, it looks as if he discussed the Homeric text in some detail, since a variant reading is ascribed to him in the Scholia (D-K 8.3), and he is said to have been the first person to write on Homer's poetry, life and date, as well as on the Greek language in general (8.1, 1A). Thus we find linguistic study already closely linked to allegorical interpretation at this early stage of scholarship.

These various responses to Homer or epic in general continue through the literature of the fifth century. Pindar is clearly sensitive to philosophical criticism of the kind expressed by Xenophanes, and he is also concerned with problems of truth, credibility, and the fictional character of poetry. The classic case is his rationalization of the myth of Pelops in Olympian 1, where he comments on the deceptive charm of poetic tales ($\mu \tilde{U} \theta 01$), their power of lulling us into accepting the marvellous and fabulous as credible (0. 1.25ff.). More specifically, in Nemean 7, he speaks of Homer's exaggeration of the truth about Odysseus, and the way in which he persuades us to suspend our disbelief: 'I think that the story of Odysseus was exaggerated beyond what he experienced, because of the sweet words of Homer: for there is an impressive dignity about his fictions and winged craft, and poetic skill deceives, leading astray with fables: the generality of men has a blind heart' (N. 7.20ff.). At the same time, however, the shame of the suicide of Ajax was counterbalanced by the honour paid to him by Homer, 'who set all his valour upright again, telling of it in accordance with his wand of wondrous verses, as a theme for later singers to play on' (I. 4.41ff.). And just before his criticism of Homer in Nemean 7 he refers to the idea of commemorative poetry as a 'mirror for noble deeds' (N. 7.14-16). Here already we see the tension between the ideas of epic song as commemoration, reflecting a true image, and poetic fiction as a distorting medium.²⁰

۰.

^{} Cf vol. 1v, pp. 30-1.

Like Pindar, the historians Herodotus and Thucydides attempt a rationalizing approach. Herodotus argues that Homer's story of Helen at Troy cannot be true, for if she had been there the Trojans would surely have given her back, and he accepts the alternative version which left her in Egypt. Homer, he says, knew the truth, but rejected it as less appropriate $(\epsilon \dot{\nu} \pi \rho \epsilon \pi \dot{\eta} \varsigma)$ for his poetry (2.112-20). He also observes here that the epic Cypria cannot be Homer's work, as it disagrees with the Iliad over Paris' journey to Troy (2.117). Elsewhere (4.32) Herodotus doubts whether the Epigonoi is Homeric. Thucydides draws detailed deductions about the historical nature of the Trojan War and early Greek society from Homer and other epic poetry, whilst stressing the tendency of poets to exaggeration (1.1-22). Thucydides' respect for Homer as a source is striking, although there is a strong note of disparagement in Perikles' funeral speech, where he says that Athens does not need a Homer to sing her praises, nor any poet whose verses will give a momentary pleasure, only to be contradicted by the truth of history (2.41.4).

So far we have to some extent been considering attitudes to epic as a whole, rather than more detailed discussion of Homer or anything approaching literary criticism in a modern sense. Close analysis and discussion of problems there must always have been, and this is already attested for Theagenes, but it is with the sophists that such discussion begins to emerge into the foreground.³¹ This was encouraged by their special interest in language and also in the use of poetic texts to underpin their own theories. Echoes can be detected in chapter 25 of Aristotle's Poetics and in the surviving fragments of his Homeric Problems (see below). Debate about the detailed interpretation of a text (such as Simonides' poem on virtue in Plato's Protagoras) led naturally to the search for the underlying sense, the Unfovoic. For men like Protagoras, the early poets were really sophists in disguise,

•

- -

¹⁰ On these passages of Pindar see also Richardson, 'Pindar and later literary criticism in antiquity', Papers of the Liverpool Latin Seminar 5 (1985) 384-9, F. J. Nisetich, Pind and Homer (Baltimore 1989), and G. Nagy, Pinder's Homer (Baltimore 1990) especially 414-37.

²¹ Cf. Richardson, PCPS 201 (1975), 65-81.

clothing their philosophical wisdom in a popular dress (Pl. Prot. 316D-E, Theast. 180C-E). From this could develop more elaborate and extraordinary allegorical constructions, such as that of Metrodorus of Lampsacus, interpreting the whole of the Iliad in terms of Anaxagoras' cosmology (D-K $61 \land 3-4$).⁸⁸ Philodemus describes such theories as the work of maniacs, and they were liable to give the whole practice of allegory a bad name.

Anaxagoras himself seems to have been far more cautious: he is said to have been 'the first to show that Homer's poetry concerned valour and justice' $(D-K_{59} \land 1_{$11})$. This sounds not so very different from the popular view reflected in Aristophanes' Frogs, that Homer teaches 'marshalling of armies, forms of valour, arming of men for war' (1034ff.). This kind of ethical or educational approach is echoed by Niceratus in Xenophon's Symposium, when he says that his father Nicias made him learn the whole of Homer's poetry by heart, as part of the education of a gentleman (3.5). Later on he claims him as a source of information on all kinds of ethical and practical subjects (4.6-7), as does the rhapsode Ion in Plato's dialogue (537Aff.). It is, incidentally, in these contexts that we hear the names of the various supposedly leading interpreters of the Homeric poems. Apart from Metrodorus, these include Stesimbrotus of Thasos, Anaximander and Glaucon. It is surely significant that we know so little about most of them: their views and theories about the poems were overtaken by those of later critics. But Stesimbrotus was the teacher of the first person definitely known to have 'edited' the text of Homer, the epic poet Antimachus of Colophon: here we seem to glimpse the beginnings of scholarship in its later Hellenistic and modern sense.³³

Many of the major sophists, on the other hand, are known to have used Homeric themes and characters as vehicles for the expression of their own ethical or rhetorical ideas. We see this clearly in the debate between Socrates and Hippias over the relative merits of Akhilleus' and Odysseus' characters (Pl. Hippias Minor), in Gorgias' Helen and Palamedes, or in the Aias and Odysseus of Antisthenes. The long list of essays on Homeric subjects ascribed to Antisthenes includes many which probably set out to draw moral lessons from the poems (PCPS 201 (1975) 77-81). Socrates himself seems to have been fond of using Homer to illustrate a point, if we can judge from Xenophon and Plato, and sometimes this takes the form of moral allegory: for example the Sirens' charms strike at those ambitious for fame, and it was gluttony that turned Odysseus' men into swine, and self-restraint that saved Odysseus himself (Xen. Mem. 2.6.10-12, 1.3.7). In Plato's

۰.

^{*} For details see PCPS 201 (1975) 68-70.

Cf. Pfeiffer, History of Classical Scholarship 35-6. But Antimachus' edition may have been rather a critical work, discussing a series of emendations: cf. N. G. Wilson, CR 19 (1969) 369.

Apology (28c) Socrates defends himself from the charge of deliberately courting death by appeal to the precedent of Akhilleus.

This moralizing view of Homer may well have found its culmination as far as the classical period is concerned in the early fourth-century Mouseion of Alcidamas. In this he seems to have collected traditional stories about the early poets, including the old tales of the contest of Homer and Hesiod and their respective deaths, in order to illustrate the moral value of their works. It is likely that this is one of the works which Plato has in mind when he attacks such an approach in book 10 of the Republic, and questions whether Homer ever was of any practical or civic use to anyone.³⁴ Alcidamas seems to have admired Homer's poems especially for their ethical realism, and he called the Odyssey a 'fine mirror of human life' (Arist. Rhet. 1406b12). He also spoke of the honours paid to Homer and other poets, a theme which Plato again treats with sarcastic scepticism.

By contrast with this type of viewpoint the sophist Protagoras (D-K 80 A 30) gives us what seems to be the first example of interpretative criticism of a more structural type, embedded by chance in a papyrus commentary on lliad 21 (see on 205-327). He apparently observed that the battle of Akhilleus with the river-god Skamandros was designed to form a transition from Akhilleus' previous exploits to the battle of the gods ('and perhaps also to increase Akhilleus' importance', adds the scholiast). Thus, in addition to showing a linguistic interest in Homer, exemplified by his criticism of the poet for addressing the Muse in the imperative (D-K 80 A 29), Protagoras may have taken a broader interest in the poet's compositional techniques. But such instances are rare and hard to detect at this period.

The attitude of Plato to Homer is deeply divided: on the one hand a deep and abiding love of the poet, whose influence on him (as Longinus observed: 13.3-4) can be detected at every turn (he quotes him some 150 times²⁶); on the other, strong misgivings about the rôle of poetry in the philosophical life. His own work may be viewed as a philosophical alternative to traditional literary forms, especially epic and drama, and his own myths as designed to replace those of Homer and Hesiod. At the end of the Republic (614B2-3) the story of Er is said to be 'not a tale told to Alkinoos, but rather that of a courageous man ...' (où ... 'Alxivou ye dmologov ... $d\lambda\lambda' d\lambda kluou \mu b dv dv dp ds ...).$ Homeric fiction gives way to a tale which conveys philosophical truth in mythical form.

Allegory for Plato, although he plays with this method from time to time, is no answer to the problem of poetry. There is no way of discovering

۰.,

- •

M Cf. Richardson, CQ, 31 (1981) 1-10.

^{*} Cf. G. E. Howes, 'Homeric quotations in Plato and Aristotle', HSCP 6 (1895) 153-210, J. Labarbe, L'Homère de Platon (Liège 1949).

whether or not a particular interpretation of the text is correct. You cannot prove this philosophically, and even if you could ask the poet, he could not tell you. Poets are mouthpieces of divine inspiration, hence essentially irrational, unable to give an account ($\lambda \delta \gamma o \varsigma$) of what they mean. Poetry is of no use as a direct source of knowledge.²⁴

On the other hand, the emotional power of epic and dramatic poetry is immeasurable. The intense sensations of pity and fear, already noted by Gorgias in his Defence of Helen (D-K 82 B 11.9), are experienced by Ion the rhapsode and his audience at the high points of his recitation of Homer (Ion 535B-C). In the Republic the potentially damaging effect of such emotional scenes in Homer and tragedy on our own characters is one of the main themes in Plato's attack on poetry, combined with the more direct onslaught on the falsehood of poetic portrayals of gods and heroes. The stories, untrue and immoral as they are, influence our own behaviour in turn, and the insidious pleasure which they arouse must be resisted. Finally, in book 10, comes the deeper attack on artistic µíµnois in general, as an illusory portrayal of what is itself only a world of appearances. Here the old idea of narrative or dramatic poetry as a mirror of life, and hence as morally valuable, is explicitly rejected.

Despite the attack on Homer as the 'first of the tragedians' in the Republic, Plato clearly has a deeper admiration for him than for the tragedians themselves: in the Laws, for example, he dismisses tragedy as suitable for women, teenagers, and the general crowd, whereas epic is for older and wiser men (658D-E). The end of the Republic throws down the challenge which will lead to Aristotle's defence of both Homer and tragedy, when Socrates invites poetry to produce a justification of her value, 'as we are conscious of the fascination which she holds for us', especially when she is approached through the medium of Homer (607B-8B).

Plato's philosophical views hardly constitute an interpretation, although he often quotes the poet to illustrate a point, thereby sometimes suggesting a particular interpretation of individual passages. Aristotle, on the other hand, is said to have 'discussed Homer in detail in many dialogues, admiring and praising him' (Dio Chrys. Or. 53.1). There was a strong ancient tradition that Aristotle gave his pupil Alexander the Great a special text of the lliad. Alexander's own passion for Homer must derive in part from Aristotle's influence, and the work On Kingship which he wrote for Alexander can hardly have failed to make use of Homer for this purpose.⁴⁷ In his surviving works Aristotle quotes Homer some 114 times, with a strong bias towards the lliad (as in the case of Plato), and these quotations show his fondness for the poet, whom like Plato he often uses for illustration.²⁶ For example in the Nicomachean Ethics the observation that people do not like to be reminded of benefits conferred on them is backed up by a reference to the scene of Thetis' supplication of Zeus in lliad 1, where she tactfully omits to mention the service she had done for him in the past in rescuing him from an Olympian conspiracy, although Akhilleus had reminded her of it (EN 1124b12-17). This surely shows a close and sensitive psychological reading of the text, whether or not the observation is originally due to Aristotle himself.

۰.

^{*} For Plato's views on allegory cf. J. Tate, CQ 23 (1929) 142-54, 24 (1930) 1-10, S. Weinstock, Philologue 82 (1926) 121-53.

³⁷ Cf. Pfeiffer, History of Classical Scholarsh 71-2, Aristotle, Fragments, ed. Rose, 408-9.

The Aristotelian work entitled Homeric Problems (frr. 142-79 Rose) must reflect the whole tradition of detailed discussion of the text down to Aristotle's time as well as his own observations, and chapter 25 of the Poetics is a summary of the same subject, with an attempt for the first time to systematize the methods which can be used to solve difficulties.³⁹ Here he states the fundamental principle, so often ignored by both earlier and later critics, that poetry is not subject to the same criteria as other arts and sciences (1460b13-15). If a scene achieves the kind of effects which are described in the Poetics as desirable, then minor faults of accuracy, coherence, and so on, are irrelevant. With this simple observation most of the trivial objections of earlier pedants such as Zoilus are swept away. Thus, the pursuit of Hektor by Akhilleus is impossible in practice, but the dramatic effect is overwhelming (1460b23-6). Moral criticisms (such as those raised by Plato and others) can be answered by appealing to historical context or the conventions of the poet's day: for instance in the Problems Aristotle compares Akhilleus' brutal treatment of Hektor's body with a later Thessalian practice, to show that it was not unique to this scene in Homer (fr. 166). Religious beliefs may simply reflect those of Greek society at that stage of development, and so it is misguided to attack them from a modern viewpoint. Careful examination of the poetic context is also important in dealing with moral issues. For instance, Agamemnon lets Ekhepolos off military service, on payment of a horse, and this sounds like bribery (Iliad 23.295ff.): but he was right, said Aristotle in the Problems, to prefer a good horse to a useless man (fr. 165)! Alternatively, if something is untrue or historically impossible, it may be justified as idealization. Finally, many ۰.

- •

M Cf A. Römer, 'Die Homercitate und die homerische Frage des Aristoteles', Sutzb. Bayer. Akad. (1884), 264-314, and G E. Howes, HSCP 6 (1895) 210-37.

¹⁰ Cf. vol. 1V, p. 23; Pfeiffer, History of Classical Scholarship 69ff., Römer, op. cit., R. Wachsmuth, De Aristotelis studiis Homericis capita selecta (Berlin 1863), M. Carroll, 'Aristotle's Poetics Ch. XXV in the light of the Homeric Scholia' (diss. Baltimore 1895), A. Gudeman, RE XII 251 1ff., H. Hintenlang, 'Untersuchungen zu den Homer-Aporien des Aristoteles' (diss. Heidelberg 1961), A. R. Sodano, Rendiconti dell' Accademia di Archeologia, Lettere e Belle Arti di Napoli 40 (1960) 227-78, G. L. Huxley, Proceedings of the Royal Irish Academy C 79 (1979) 73-81.

minor problems of interpretation and consistency can be solved by adopting a more flexible approach to the text and considering alternative ways of taking it, instead of assuming that the first or most obvious interpretation must be correct. To us these principles may seem largely obvious, but it is surprising how easily they can be forgotten by modern as well as ancient critics.⁴⁰

The Homeric Problems constituted a preliminary ground-clearing exercise of a practical kind in preparation for the more theoretical approach of the Poetics as a whole. In the main body of this work Aristotle is primarily interested in tragedy, and sees Homer very much in dramatic terms. But despite his eventual conclusion in chapter 26 that tragedy is superior to epic because of its greater dramatic immediacy and concentration (reversing Plato's preference for epic), his intense admiration for Homer shines through again and again. Here for the first time the fundamental differences between the Iliad and Odyssey and other epic poems are clearly stated. Homer is outstanding for his dramatic qualities and his portrayal of character through speeches (1448b34-6, 60a5-11). His plots, even if necessarily less strictly unified than those of tragedy, are far more so than those of other ep'c poets, whose works are essentially episodic and often centred on a single character or concerned with a sequence of unrelated actions, rather than aiming at unity of action (51a16-30, 59a30-b7, 62b3-11). He was the first to use all the forms and parts of epic (as defined in Aristotle's chapters on tragedy), and to do so successfully, and he surpasses all others in style and thought (59b12-16). Moreover he has taught other poets the art of making fictions plausible (60a18ff.), and in his more marvellous episodes his brilliance conceals the improbability in a way which a lesser poet could not have achieved (60a34-b2). Given Aristotle's generally evolutionary approach it is really very remarkable that he should see the Homeric poems as so highly developed artistically, although they stand relatively early in his conspectus of literary development.

Aristotle provides the answers to Plato's main attacks on epic and tragedy in his discussion of the nature of poetic imitation, and his account of the kompons achieved by tragedy. The first reinstates poetry in general as a philosophically serious pursuit, and the second gives to tragedy a special value on the emotional plane. Aristotle never explicitly ascribes to epic a similar cathartic function, but the close analogies he draws between epic and tragedy do surely imply that epic can act in a similar way. More specifically the fact that epic in his view should have reversals, recognitions and sufferings ($\pi\alpha\theta\eta\mu\alpha\tau\alpha$), and should produce similarly powerful effects

۰.

ţ

^{*} Cf. W. B. Stanford's lively book Enomies of Postry (London 1980) for a demonstration of this fact.

of ExplayEy, must point this way. The implication of Aristotle's final comparison of epic and tragedy is most probably that the kind of pleasure which both should arouse is similar and should be associated with an emotional kd@apois, but that tragedy does this more powerfully and effectively than epic. At the same time, the lliad is evidently much closer to tragedy than the Odyssey, for it is concerned above all with suffering and emotion ($\pi d \otimes o_5$), whereas the Odyssey is primarily concerned with $\hbar \otimes (59b14-15)$, and its happy ending is more like that of a comedy (53a30-9). Where the Odyssey seems to come closest to tragedy in Aristotle's view is in its recurrent use of the device of recognition (59b15). This is a theme to which Aristotle devotes considerable attention, and it surely deserves more than it has received in modern criticism both of Homer and the Poetics.⁴¹

Aristotle's admiration for Homer is focused especially on the extraordinary skill with which he creates a single, unified story out of a vast and highly diversified body of material, incorporating many subsidiary episodes without allowing us to lose sight of the main theme. When he comes to discuss the differences between epic and tragedy (in chapter 24), he shows that epic has certain significant advantages because of its much greater scale. This gives it grandeur (and the heroic metre adds to this, by its more stately character), and also allows for more variety, which is linked to its more episodic nature. The chief technique for creating this variety is the description of different sequences of events which are happening at the same time, i.e. the epic poet's ability to freeze one sequence and shift the scene, returning later to the point where he left off. This superiority of epic is connected with its narrative mode, because events do not have to be enacted visually. This also gives it greater scope for 'the marvellous' (to θαυμαστόν), as in the pursuit of Hektor, which would be impossible on the stage. Here Aristotle picks up the criticisms of earlier readers such as Pindar and Thucydides of the tendency of epic poetry to exaggeration, but makes a special poetic virtue out of this, rather than a fault. He goes on to link it with Homer's exceptional skill in creating plausible fictions, which is based on the building-up of enough realistic circumstantial detail to make his fantasies credible. This again is presumably particularly a feature of the more leisurely descriptive and narrative mode of epic as opposed to tragedy, and it leaves us with the paradox that Homer's mastery of fiction is especially to his credit, whereas in the past it was as the master of truth that he was most admired.

Although much of what Aristotle says here apparently applies to epic in general, it is clear that it is really Homer whom he has in the forefront of his mind throughout. This does not mean that he would have recommended taking him as the model for a new epic poem, which he explicitly says should be much shorter, in fact as it turns out about the length of Apollonius' Argonautica (1459b17-22). There is conflict here between his intense admiration for the Homeric poems, which prevents him from criticizing them as too long and complex or too episodic, and his preference for a more compressed and unified structure. But he did not set out to write a treatise on epic in the Poetics, and so we must not press him too hard for consistency on this subject. Doubtless he could have replied that in works on the scale of the Homeric poems one must take a broad view of the overall effect, and not subject them to the kind of detailed scrutiny which might be appropriate to works on a smaller scale.

• .

- • 、

⁴¹ Terence Cave's Recognitions (Oxford 1988), however, redresses the balance; cf. also Sheila Murnaghan, Disguise and Recognition in the Odysser (Princeton 1987), Richardson, 'Recognition scenes in the Odyssey and ancient literary criticism', Papers of the Liverpool Latin Seminar 4 (1983) 219-35, S. Goldhill, The Poel's Voice (Cambridge 1991) 1-24.

Aristotle's whole approach to poetry is conditioned by his status as Plato's successor, and this affects his view of Homer too. He shares Plato's intense love and admiration for the poet, and wishes to rescue him from the attacks of Plato and earlier philosophers and critics. To do so, however, he shifts the focus right away from the preoccupation with the gap between Homer's portrayal of divine or heroic ethics and later moral beliefs, and also between the aesthetic criteria suitable for an early epic poem and those governing the literature of the classical period. The essential criterion is no longer that of literal truth but of dramatic effectiveness and credibility, and in aesthetic terms Aristotle's approach, although technical, is extremely flexible. Homer's status as the ancestor of tragedy allows him the credit for having anticipated in so many respects the most powerful form of poetry ever conceived, and at the same time his use of the epic narrative mode gave him a wider scope, which enabled him to become the supreme 'master of fiction' at a remarkably early stage in its development.

(ii) The Hellenistic period

The work of the three major Alexandrian scholars has been discussed by R. Janko in his Introduction to vol. 1V.⁴² As he says, Zenodotus' criteria for establishing a genuine text seem to show no awareness of Aristotle's work on Homeric problems, and although Aristophanes was more conservative he was also over-inclined to object to passages on grounds of impropriety. Aristarchus, however, set out to distinguish what was truly Homeric in this tradition from what he regarded as 'Cyclic' interpolations, in a way which could be considered as following broadly in Aristotle's footsteps, and his approach is a good deal more enlightened than that of his predecessors.⁴³ Many of his critical observations remain immensely valuable today. Nevertheless, he can still employ the same kind of ethical and aesthetic criteria as earlier scholars in a way which Aristotle would have considered narrowminded. Whether he actually knew the Poetics itself directly is doubtful, since an ancient tradition held that the esoteric works of Aristotle disappeared from circulation for a century or so, in the early second century B.C.⁴⁴ The Homeric Questions, however, and On Poets of Aristotle will have been available to him, and would have given a reasonable idea of his views.

۰.

ţ

⁴² See also J. Porter, 'Hermeneutic lines and circles: Aristarchus and Crates on Homeric exegesis', in Lamberton and Keaney, Homer's Ancient Readers.

The early Stoic philosophers took a lively interest in the interpretation of poetry, for which they favoured a broadly allegorical approach. It remains, however, very questionable whether any of them actually went in for extensive allegorical readings of the Homeric poems, as opposed to selecting particular passages or myths in order to support their own philosophical theories.45 Their chief purpose seems to have been to identify the gods of Homer and Hesiod with cosmic elements and forces, using etymology to support these identifications, an approach which is recognizably similar to the allegorical methods of earlier philosophers. It is true that according to Dio Chrysostom (Or. 53.4) Zeno followed the lead of Antisthenes in arguing that 'the poet has written some things according to opinion and others according to truth, in order to save Homer from apparent self-contradiction where inconsistencies are supposed to exist in his narrative'. Dio adds that whereas Antisthenes stated the principle without elaboration Zeno demonstrated it in detail (δ δ è ka θ ' èkao tov tŵv $i\pi i\mu$ pous $i\delta \eta\lambda\omega\sigma\epsilon\nu$). If, however, he had wanted to allegorize the poems in a thorough-going way, he would presumably have tried to show that even the most objectionable passages were true if correctly understood, as the later allegorist Heraclitus did.44 There is no trace of allegorical interpretation of specific Homeric episodes in what little we know of Zeno's Homeric Problems, and in his essay On How to Listen to Poetry he may have suggested ways of reconciling mythology with modern religion and ethics, as Plutarch does in his work with this title, but without necessarily using physical allegory.47

⁴⁴ For some specific parallels between Aristarchus and Aristotle see Porter, 'Hermeneutic lines and circles', section t, H. Erbse, Beiträge zum Verständnus der Odyssee (Berlin 1972) 166-77; cf. also R. Meijering, Literary and Rh torual Theories in Greek Scholia (Groningen 1987).

4 Strabo 608-9, Plut. Selle 26.

⁴⁶ Cf. Wehrli, Allogorischen Deutung, Ph. de Lacy, 'Stoic views on poetry', AJP 69 (1948) 241ff., Buffière, Mythes d'Homère, and A. A. Long, 'The Stoics as readers of Homer', in Lamberton and Keaney, Homer's Ancient Readers.

 Cf. Wehrli, Allegorischen Deutung 65.

¹⁷ For specific interpretations by Zeno cf. SVF 1 frr. 100, 103, 153-70. Plutarch's essay (Mor. 142-378) gives an excellent survey of traditional moralizing approaches to Homer, and of how the poet's educational value could be preserved against criticism. Cf. D. Babut, Plutarque et le Stoicisme (Paris 1969) 87ff., L. J. R. Heirman, 'Plutarch de audientis poetis' (diss. Leiden 1972), and the commentary on this essay by E. Valgiglio (Turin 1973).

•

- •

Cleanthes' interests seem also to have been mainly etymological (SVF 1535, 539-42, 546-7) and this is even more the case with Chrysippus (SVF 11 1021, 1061-1100). The Concise Hellenic Theology of Cornutus in the first century A.D. is a dry handbook which shows the heaviest debt to these early Stoic methods, and it is significant that it betrays no real interest in poetry for its own sake. We perhaps come a little closer to such an interest in the work of Zeno's pupil Ariston of Chios, if it is the case that he attached importance to euphony, and held that the trained ear, rather than reason, should be the judge of this.⁴⁴

The two main surviving works of Homeric allegory are the Homeric Problems of Heraclitus (usually thought to be c. first century A.D.) and the essay On the Life and Poetry of Homer attributed to Plutarch. Heraclitus' book belongs to the general class of works which set out to defend Homer against the attacks of Plato - works which proliferated in the first and second centuries A.D.48 He owes a certain amount to the early Stoics, but much also to other earlier and later allegorists, although the question of his sources is still a matter of debate.⁵⁰ The other work (which seems to be later than Heraclitus) is a diverse compilation which aims to show Homer as master of all arts, including (besides poetry and rhetoric) physics, ethics and theology.⁴² It uses allegory as one of its techniques of interpretation, drawing on the Stoics but also showing a marked Neopythagorean tendency. It sets out to make Homer the ancestor of all philosophical schools, an idea satirized by Seneca (Ep. 88.5): as he says, if Homer is master of many conflicting doctrines then he must be really master of none.⁵⁸ Stoic allegories also find a place from time to time in the Homeric Scholia and Eustathius, but again mediated by and combined with later sources.⁴⁴

Apart from the Alexandrian scholars the most important and original figure in Homeric scholarship of the Hellenistic period is Crates of Mallos, a contemporary of Aristarchus, who criticized many of his theories.⁴⁴ Crates in turn expressed his own estimate of his superiority over Alexandrian

• .

^{*} Ariston's views have to be reconstructed from the criticisms of Philodemus, and so remain rather uncertain: cf. C. Jensen, Philodemus über die Gedichte (Berlin 1923) 128ff

^{*} Cf. S. Weinstock, Philologus B2 (1926) 145ff.

^{*} Cl. Buffière's introduction to the Budé edition of Heraclitus (Paris 1962).

³¹ On its character, date, and relationship to Plutarch's works cf. Wehrli, Allegorischen Deutong 3ff., Bernadakis, Plutarch vii (Leipzig 1896) ixff., Buffière, Mythes & Homire 72ff., Babut, Plutarque et le Stoicime 161ff.

M Cf. also Philodemus' criticism (RA. 11 1 1 Sudhaus).

⁴⁴ Cf. K. Reinhardt, De Graccorum theologia capita duo (Berlin 1910) 77ff., van der Valk, Researches 1 479ff.

¹⁴ Cf. J. Helck, 'De Cratetis Mallotae studiis criticis quae ad Iliadem spectant' (diss. Leipzig 1905) and De Cratetis studiis ... quae ad Odysseam spectant (Progr. Dresden 1914), Wehrli, Allegorischen Deuteng 40ff., H. J. Mette, Sphairopoila (Munich 1936) and Parateresis (Halle 1952), Pfeiffer, History of Classical Scholarshi 238-45, Porter in Lamberton and Keaney, Homer's Ancient Readers.

scholarship by his proud claim to be a κριτικός, rather than a mere γραμματικός, and he defined the critic's task as πάσης λογικής ἐπιστήμης ἐμπειρον είναι, in contrast to the narrow philological interest of the γραμματικός (fr. 17 ed. Mette, Sphairopoiia). As with the earlier Stoics, by whom he was influenced, it is doubtful whether Crates went in for extensive and detailed allegory of the poems as a whole. A reasonable interpretation of a reference to him by Philodemus is that he was much less extreme in his approach than Metrodorus (see p. 29 above). His allegorical views were also combined with a good deal of more routine philological work on the text. Moreover where he does allegorize this is in connexion with his specific interest in Homer as a potential source of cosmology and scientific knowledge.

An example of this is his interpretation of Agamemnon's shield (II. 11.32-40) as a 'representation of the cosmos' (Mette, Sphairopoiia fr. 23a-c), which seems to have been worked out in considerable detail, if we can judge from Eustathius (828.39ff.).⁵⁵ The shield's complex workmanship (it is called $\pi o \lambda v \delta \alpha (\delta a \wedge v)$ mirrors that of the cosmos, and it is 'man-encircling' because the human race forms part of this. Its ten concentric bronze circles represent the 'brazen heaven' (II. 17.425), corresponding to the five parallel circles, i.e. the two 'colures' which link the solstitial and equinoctial points, the galaxy, zodiac and horizon. The stars are represented by its twenty bosses of white tin (and so the central boss of black wixios is presumably the earth). It resembles the aegis of Athene (II. 5.738ff.), Zeus's daughter, and Agamemnon himself is compared to Zeus (2.478, 10.5ff.), again suggesting the shield's significance.

The Shield of Akhilleus is the subject of even more extensive allegories of a similar kind, in both Heraclitus' Homeric Problems (43-51) and Eustathius (1154.42ff.). These differ from each other, and that of Heraclitus looks as if it might well derive ultimately from Crates, as he takes great trouble to establish Homer's knowledge of a spherical earth (44-7; cf. On the Life and Poetry of Homer 104-6, 109-10). This in turn was one of the main aims of Crates.³⁶ By contrast, Eustathius names his source as Demo, a learned lady mentioned as an allegorist by him and the Scholia elsewhere.⁸⁷

Crates' scientific interest led him to discuss details of Homeric astronomy and geography both in the Shield of Akhilleus and elsewhere. Thus he

• .

- • 、

⁴⁶ For details of this, the various ancient allegories of the Shield of Akhilleus, and their possible relevance to Virgil's Shield of Aeneas see also Hardie, Cosmos and Imperium 340-6, and 'Imago mundi: cosmological and ideological aspects of the Shield of Achilles', JHS 105 (1985) 11-31.

²⁴ Cf. Mette, Spharropoila 43ff., Wehrli, Allegorischen Deutung 28ff. Heraclitus differs from Crates, however, in his explanation of the Homeric phrase 80h vóf (Heracl. 45, Crates fr. 28a Mette), and his direct source may be Posidonius (cf. D.L. 7.144).

^{*} On Demo see Reinhardt, De Graecorum theologia 48ff., Kroll, RE Suppl. m 331ff.

interpreted the doves ($\pi t\lambda \epsilon_{103}$) which bring ambrosia to Zeus in Od. 12.62ff. as the Pleiades (frr. 26a and 27) and he may well be the source of an allegory of Nestor's cup (II. 11.632-5) given by Asclepiades of Myrlea, in which the doves on the cup are the Pleiades, its golden studs are stars, and the cup itself is again a 'representation of the cosmos' (Ath. 489pff.).

It had been traditional to locate the voyages of Odysseus in the western Mediterranean, although such speculation was dismissed by Eratosthenes with the famous remark that 'you will find the places visited by Odysseus when you have discovered the name of the cobbler who sewed up the bag of the winds' (Strabo 1.2.15)! Aristarchus also believed that such speculation was misplaced, and he disagreed with Crates, who wished to locate the wanderings in the Atlantic or 'Outer Sea'.⁴⁴ Crates ingeniously suggested that the Laestrygonians lived in the distant north, because Homer says that a herdsman there can earn a double wage, and that 'the paths of day and night are close together' (Od. 10.81ff.), which he took to imply the short summer nights of the far north. Likewise the Cimmerians, living at the edge of Ocean, under perpetual cloud and darkness (Od. 11.13ff.), must be near one of the Poles, and he preferred to read 'Cerberians' here (frr. 37-8). In his spherical earth Hades was at the Antipodes, and Ocean ran both along the equator and from north to south, dividing the earth into four equal sections (frr. 34-5). His cosmology was equally symmetrical, and even the allegorist Heraclitus finds somewhat far-fetched Crates' interpretation of Hephaistos' fall to earth (11. 1.590-4), where his arrival on Lemnos at sunset is explained as meaning that Zeus wished to measure the universe, and so threw two firebrands at equal speed, from heaven to earth and from east to west, one being Hephaistos, the other the Sun (Heraclitus 27).

This concentration on the harmony and balance of the cosmos is surely echoed by Crates' view of the aesthetic aspect of Homer's poetry. Like Ariston he seems to have emphasized the importance of euphony and good composition as the sources of the pleasure of poetry. Behind this there must lie the atomist tradition (cf. Democritus, D-K 68 B 21?) which saw close analogies between στοιχεία as elements of the cosmos and as the letters from which words and so discourse in general are composed, a tradition taken seriously also by Lucretius (1.196-8, 2.686-94).⁵⁹

Suetonius (De grammaticis et rhetoribus 2) treats as a landmark in the development of scholarship at Rome the visit of Crates in 168 B.C. He came

۰,

l

⁴⁰ Cf. Lehrs, De Aristarchi studiis 241ff., Mette, Sphairopolia fr. 31. An echo of the controversy appears in P. Oxy. 2888 col. iii.1ff.

¹⁰ Cl. Jensen, Philodenus über die Gedichie 146ff., Wehrli, Allegorischen Deunug 49ff., Mette, Parateresis 59ff., J. Porter, Cronache Ercolaucsi 19 (1989) 149-78 (especially 171-4); also P. Friedländer, 'Patterns of sound and atomistic theory in Lucretius', in Probleme der Lukrezforschung ed. C. J. Classen (Hildesheim 1986) 291-307.

on a mission from the King of Pergamon, broke his leg in a drain, and spent his convalescence giving lectures there. It was these lectures which first stimulated the Romans to pursue the more detailed study of poetry. But it was not only Roman scholarship which benefited, for it seems highly likely that Crates was one of the influences which led later Roman poets to take both cosmology and allegory in general so seriously.⁶⁰

(iii) Rome (to the Augustan period)*1

Study of Homer at Rome must really date at least from the time of Livius Andronicus' translation of the Odyssey into Saturnian verse in the late third century B.C. Livius seems to have used some form of Homeric glossary for this, if not a more detailed commentary.⁶² The choice of the Odyssey rather than the Iliad is interesting, as the Romans, like the Greeks, quoted the Iliad far more, although both were used as school texts. The legends linking Odysseus with southern Italy and Sicily must have made him popular, and Livius himself probably came from Tarentum.⁶³

But it was Ennius who claimed to have inherited the soul of Homer, in a vision in which Homer is clearly portrayed as a source of philosophical knowledge of the cosmos.44 Ennius' introduction of hexameter verse also marks the beginning of a more truly Hellenized literature at Rome. This is the time when we begin to hear of quotations of Homer by leading Romans such as Cato the Elder, Aemilius Paullus, and his son, the younger Scipio. Lucilius, Scipio's friend, reflects Hellenistic literary theory when he says that Homer's critics do not find fault with his work as a whole but only with individual parts of it (401-10 Warmington).46 Among such common subjects of criticism he mentions Homer's marvels, his ficta monstra such as Polyphemus and his giant walking-stick (520-3).44 About this time or soon afterwards the Iliad was also translated into Latin hexameters by both Cn. Matius and Ninnius Crassus (Fragmenta Poetarum Latinorum, ed. Morel, pp. 48-9, 51). Later, Cicero's versions of passages from Homer are more interesting, and his frequent quotations in letters are a good index of the semi-proverbial character of much of Homer for the cultured Romans of the

•

t

- • 、

[•] Cf. Hardie, Cosmos and Imperium 27-9 (etc.).

⁶¹ See especially J. Tolkichn, 'De Homeri auctoritate in cottdiana Romanorum vita', Jahrb. für class. Phil. Suppl. 23 (1896-7) 221-89, and Homer und die romische Poesie (Leipzig 1900), A. Ronconi, Interpreti Latini di Omero (Turin 1973).

⁴⁹ Cf. Ronconi, op. cit. 13ff., H. Fränkel, 'Griechische Bildung in altrömischen Epen', Hermes 67 (1932) 306ff.

^{*} On Odysseus in Italy cf. E. D. Phillips, JHS 73 (1953) 53ff.

⁴⁴ On Ennius' vision cf. Hardie, Cosmos and Imperium 76-83.

⁴ Cf. C. O. Brink, Horace on Postry 1 (Cambridge 1963) 6off., and II (Cambridge 1971) 359ff.

^{*} Cf. Quint. 8.3.34, 4.24, [Longinus] 9.14.

late Republic.⁹⁷ Most curious of all is the llias Latina, an epitome of the lliad in 1,070 verses which is influenced by Virgil and Ovid, and which devotes over half its lines to the first five books.⁹⁰ Together with the later prose accounts of the Trojan War attributed to 'Dictys' and 'Dares' this poem became an important source for the western Middle Ages, when knowledge of Greek was lost.

The admiration of Lucretius for Homer is clear (cf. especially Lucr. 1.124-6, 3.1037-8), but for both explicit criticism and implicit interpretation we must turn rather to Horace and Virgil. The first part of Horace's second epistle (Ep. 1.2.1-31) reads almost like a summary of the whole earlier tradition of moralizing interpretation of Homer, especially of the *Odyssey.*⁴⁹ Horace declares Homer to be a better guide to ethics than the philosophers Chrysippus and Crantor. The Iliad shows clearly the effects of passion as a disruptive force in human society; the Odyssey by contrast gives us in Ulysses a valuable model of virtue and wisdom, portraying his broad experience of the world, his endurance, resilience, and resistance to temptations, which preserved him from the fate of his companions. They in their turn, like the worthless suitors of Penelope or the idle youth of Alkinoos' court, may be regarded as models of ourselves: unless, that is, we can rouse ourselves from our lethargy and get down to some useful work! Otherwise we too shall suffer the evil effects of our passions.

In his Ars poetica Horace's concern is as much aesthetic as moral, and in his approach to Homer he treads closely in the footsteps of Aristotle. Thus the brief, allusive proem to the Odyssey is contrasted with the typically inflated 'cyclic' prelude, and he praises Homer's rapidity in moving directly in medias res, his avoidance of a tediously chronological structure, his unity of plot, and the credibility of his fictions (136-52). But, as Lucilius had observed, in works on such a scale some faults are inevitable, and yet they do not spoil the effect of the whole (347-60).

Like Horace, Virgil shows in his Aeneid that he has learnt from Aristotle and later Hellenistic critics how to follow in Homer's track, to imitate his virtues and also as far as possible to avoid his faults.⁷⁸ Like Horace too, he clearly views Homer through the moral and cosmological spectacles of earlier Greek critics and philosophers.⁷¹ Aeneas' adventures represent his ۰.

t

¹⁷ Cf. Fragmenta Poeterum Latinorum, ed. Morel, pp. 73-7, Tolkichn, De Hom. auctoritate 259ff., Ronconi, op. cit. 41ff., V. Clavel, De M. T. Cicerone Graccorum interprete (Paris 1968).

^{*} Cf. Postae Latini minores m 3, ed. Vollmer, and Tolkiehn, op. cit. 96ff.

⁶⁰ Cf. E. Kaiser, MH 21 (1964) 109ff., 197ff., J. Moles, Papers of the Liverpool Latin Seminar 5 (1985) 34-9, together with S. Eidinow, CQ 40 (1990) 566-8.

¹⁹ Cf. especially R. Heinze, Virgils opische Technik (3rd edn, Leipzig and Berlin 1915), G. Knauer, Die Aeneis und Homer (Göttingen 1964), R. R. Schlunk, The Homeric Scholia and the Aeneid (Ann Arbor 1974).

²¹ For Homeric allegory and the Aeneid see especially Hardie, Cosmos and Imperium.

progress towards the divinely ordained goal of Rome's foundation, taking us a stage further along the road towards the spiritual epics of Dante or Milton, but this notion of a moral or spiritual Odyssey is already present in ancient readings of the Odyssey itself. Aeneas is to a certain extent a hero with Stoic characteristics, in his submission to fate, his control of his emotions, and his triumph over fortune through endurance, although Virgil wisely never allows this aspect to obliterate his human fallibility.

Virgil's gods too are on the whole more remote and august than those of Homer, above all in the Iliad. Direct intervention in human affairs, especially to do harm, is usually through intermediary figures (Aeolus, Somnus, Allecto, etc.), avoiding some of the problems which Homer had posed for Plato, and there are clear signs of physical or cosmological allegory here: Jupiter's will is identical to Fate, Juno represents the elemental forces of disorder, Venus those of harmony; and just as Here was equated with air, so Juno is mistress of the powers of the air or winds (1.78ff., etc.), Diana is the moon (9.403ff.), Apollo the sun (11.912ff.), and Iris the rainbow (4.700ff., etc.).72 Virgil seems to allude to earlier interpretations of divine epithets, such as those which linked Pallas with $\pi \dot{\alpha} \lambda \lambda \epsilon_{iv}$ or Tritonia with TPEIV (1.39ff., 2.169ff., 2.226ff.).78 Moreover, where Homer has divine comedy, such as the scandalous tale of Ares and Aphrodite (Od. 8.266-366), in his parallel scene Virgil substitutes a cosmology sung by Atlas' pupil lopas (Am 1.740ff.). The song of Demodokos had already been interpreted as a cosmic allegory (cf. Heraclitus, Homeric Probl ms 69, Ps.-Plut. On th Life and Poetry of Hom r 99-101), and Cleanthes had made Atlas a representation of Stoic Providence.74

One of the most acute problems of Homeric criticism was the credibility of Homer's speciosa miracula, as Horace called them. Virgil on the whole avoids the more fantastic aspects of the scenes he imitates, and where he does introduce the bizarre or supernatural it is usually for a specific purpose linked to his main narrative aims, as for example in his omens, visions and prophecies. And as Odysseus' travels were described in the words of the hero himself, a device by which the poet could distance himself from his fictions, so too Virgil's account of the visit to the Underworld ends with Aeneas and the Sibyl leaving by the gate of false dreams (16.893-9). This episode resembles the myths of Plato, designed as fictional images of philosophical truth, and the Neoplatonist character of the vision of Rome's future and the doctrine of reincarnation supports this form of interpretation.⁷⁶

7 Cf. Heinze, op. ct. 293ff., Knauer, op. ct. 289-90.

۰.

- -

t

¹⁸ Schlunk, op. cit. 17ff. In general cf. G. J. M. Bartelink, Etymologiserung bij Vergilius (Amsterdam 1965).

¹⁴ Knauer, op. cit. 168 n. 2, Buffière, Mythes d'Homère 150, 168ff., Hardie, Cosmos and Imperium 52-60.

⁷⁶ Cf. also Hardie, Cosmos and Imperium 66-83, D. A. West, 'The bough and the gate', in Oxford Readings in Vergil's Aeneid, ed. S. J. Harrison (Oxford 1990) 224-38.

These are just a few of the ways in which Virgil shows himself sensitive to the earlier history of Homeric interpretation and criticism, so that the Aeneid in turn becomes a 'reading' of the Homeric poems, just as the Odyssey could be viewed as a commentary on the Iliad.

(iv) Later Greek criticism

Much of the significant literary criticism of later antiquity bears a heavy debt to Aristotle's pioneering work, and this is especially true of the treatise On Style attributed to Demetrius, whose date is uncertain, but must be somewhere between the third and first century B.C.⁷⁴ In his discussion of what he defines as the four main styles, plain, grand, elegant and forceful, Demetrius quotes many examples from Homer, especially to illustrate the grand style. It is clear that many of his quotations are standard, as they occur either in Aristotle himself, or in later sources such as Quintilian, Dionysius of Halicarnassus and Ps.-Plutarch's Life and Poetry of Homer, or else are singled out for praise by the Homeric Scholia.

Demetrius shows a special interest in euphony, sound effects and rhythm, an interest which he shares with Dionysius and the exegetical Scholia.⁷⁷ In his discussion of language and figures of speech he builds on Aristotelian foundations, and many of his detailed observations are interesting and memorable. For example, he preserves for us the dictum of Theophrastus, that not everything should be given lengthy treatment with full details, but some things should be left for the hearer to grasp and work out for himself: for if he infers what is omitted by you he becomes no longer just your hearer but your witness, and one who is also more favourable, since he thinks himself intelligent, and that you have given him the opportunity to exercise his mind. To tell your hearer everything as if he were a fool suggests that you are underrating him (222).

This is related to the Homeric narrative principle formulated by Aristarchus of το σιωπώμενον, whereby the poet takes many things for granted, or alludes to them in passing.⁷⁰

Dionysius' treatise On the Arrangement of Words (composed in the Augustan period) is the work of a versatile essayist and historian.²⁹ His originality for us lies primarily in the fact that he is the first surviving critic who attempts a close critical analysis of extended passages of literature. Dionysius himself claims to be breaking new ground here (4), and it is clear that he finds his task a difficult one. He is concerned above all with the effects of word-order, ۰.

⁷⁸ Cf. Grube, Greek and Roman Critics 110-21, D. C. Innes in D. A. Russell and M. Winterbottom, Ancient Literary Criticism: the Principal Texts in New Translations (Oxford 1972) 171-215.

¹⁷ Cf. Richardson, CQ 30 (1980) 283-7. ²⁸ Cf. Richardson, CQ 30 (1980) 271.

[&]quot; Cf. the Loeb edition of Dionysius by S. Usher, vol. 11 (1985) 3-243.

sound and rhythm, and he sees Homer as a master-craftsman in all these respects (cf. 16 δ δή πολυφωνότατος ἀπάντων ποιητῶν Όμηρος, etc.). A good instance of Dionysius' technique at work is his elaborate analysis of Od. 11.593-8, the famous description of Sisuphos in Hades (20).⁸⁰ Dionysius' account of how the words and rhythms mirror the sense is obscure in some details, but he is undoubtedly right to draw attention to these aspects of the poet's technique. As Pope put it:

> See Dionysius Homer's thoughts refine, And call new beauties forth from ev'ry line!

> > (Essay on Criticism 665-6)

It is probably to the late Hellenistic and early Roman periods that much of the critical and interpretative material preserved in the bT Scholia belongs, and they are an invaluable source for us, filling out the more sketchy and theoretical picture given by the critics. A detailed discussion of what they have to offer is given in CQ 30 (1980) 265-87.⁶¹ Likewise, we can gauge the extent of ancient discussion of Homeric speeches from the many works of rhetorical theory which quote and analyse them.^{} Perhaps the best summary, however, of the value of the Homeric poems as a whole for the ancient orator is given by Quintilian (10.1.46-51). As Okeanos is the origin of all waters, so Homer omnibus eloquentiae partibus exemplum et ortum dedit, a claim which Quintilian goes on to illustrate with admirable concision.

The most unexpected and original work of ancient literary criticism is the treatise On the Sublime attributed to Longinus, which must belong to the first century A.D. or later.⁸³ More than any other ancient writer, the author of this work succeeds in expressing for us his sense of Homer's genius and superiority to all man-made rules of art, although at the same tume he believes that natural genius does need to be controlled and guided by certain methods and precepts (2.1-2).

The origins of his enthusiasm for Homer must lie in the earlier admiration (reflected as we have seen in Plato and Aristotle) for his more dramatic and emotionally charged episodes and for his ability to evoke wonder and surprise (ro boupcorov, herranfts: cf. [Longinus] 1.4). It is in the famous ninth chapter, one of the finest passages of ancient criticism, that he has most to say about the poet as a model of greatness of thought (the first of Longinus'

⁶⁰ CL the Index to Spengel, Rhst. gr. 11 518-22, PL-Plut. On the Life and Poetry of Homer 15-90, 161-74, Dionysius of Halicarnassus, Opuscula (ed. Usener and Radermacher) 11 310fL, etc.

⁴⁴ Cf. D. A. Russell's edition (Oxford 1964), Grube, Greek and Roman Critics 340-53.

• .

- -

^{*} Cf. Demetrius 72 for a briefer allusion.

¹¹ See also R. Meijering, Literary and Rhetorical Theories in the Greek Scholia (Groningen 1987), and K. Snipes, 'Literary interpretation in the Homeric Scholia: the similes of the Iliad', AJP 109 (1988) 196-222.

five sources of sublimity).⁸⁴ Here it is especially his descriptions of the supernatural that are singled out for praise, such as the cosmic leap of Here's horses (11. 5.770-2), the introduction to the Theomachy (11. 21.388 + 20.61-5), and Poseidon's journey across the sea (11. 13.18ff. + 20.60). To these are added two heroic examples, the awful silence of Telamonian Aias in the Underworld (Od. 11.563) and Aias' prayer to Zeus for light (11. 17.645-7). It is during this discussion that he makes the celebrated remark that 'Homer has done his best to make the men of the Trojan War gods and the gods men',⁸⁴ commenting that such episodes as the Theomachy are 'blasphemous and improper unless interpreted allegorically' (9.7).

These examples (combined most remarkably with quotation from the account of Creation in Genesis 1) lead on to the memorable passage contrasting the lliad with the Odyssey as works of $\pi d\theta o_5$ and $\hbar \theta o_5$ respectively.⁵⁶ The Odyssey is a work of old age, essentially an epilogue to the lliad. It is all story-telling, in which the fabulous and incredible have replaced the dramatic intensity of the earlier poem. Odysseus' wanderings are like the 'dreams of Zeus',⁶⁷ although they are still the work of genius, and in the descriptions of Odysseus' household realism has replaced emotional power, making them a kind of 'moral comedy'. In this comparison there are many points which recall earlier criticism, but nowhere else are the differences between the two poems so well expressed.

Another celebrated passage is the discussion of literary imitation (13.2-14), where a list of those authors traditionally seen as most inspired by Homer is given – Herodotus, Stesichorus, Archilochus, and above all Plato – and the nature of this form of inspiration is discussed. Here Plato's greatness of style is seen as the direct result of his aspiration to reach Homer's height. This paradoxical view of Plato as the inheritor of Homer's genius rather than his enemy is common among the Neoplatonists, one of whose aims was to put an end to the ancient quarrel between poetry and philosophy.⁸⁰

Finally this work gives us the classic statement of the superiority of fallible greatness over mediocre perfection (32.8-36.4): it is better to be

۰,

l

⁶⁴ Cf. Gibbon's comment (quoted by Russell in his edition of Longmus, 89): 'The ninth chapter is one of the finest monuments of antiquity ... I almost doubt which is most sublime, Homer's Battle of the Gods or Longinus' apostrophe to Terentianus upon it '

^{*} Of. Cic. Tusc. 1.65 fingebat have Homerus et humana ad doos transferebat; divina mallem ad nos; Philostr. Her. 2.19.

[•] Cf. C. Gill, 'The ethes/pathos distinction in rhetorical and literary criticism', CQ 34 (1984) 149-66.

⁴⁷ Cf. Hor. AP 359, Quint. 6.2.29, 10.1.46, Plut. Mor. 7098, Dio Chrys. Or. 11.129.

Cf. S. Weinstock, Philologus 82 (1926) 121-53, Buffière, Mythes & Homire 19ff., Rumeli on [Longinus] 13.3 (pp 116ff.).

like Homer or Plato, who aim high and sometimes fail, than to play safe and never leave the ground. Sublimity raises man to the divine level and it is this which guarantees immortality to literature. And yet, he adds, ideally nature's greatness should be aided by art, if true perfection is to be achieved (36.4).

After the technicalities of Hellenistic scholarship, the elaborate systems of rhetoric and the complex ingenuities of the allegorists, to read 'Longinus' on Homer is like emerging from the cloud enveloping a great mountain's lower slopes, and suddenly seeing around one the towering Alpine peaks. These peaks were there, but as we struggled painfully upwards through the mists of learning and speculation we could not see them clearly. The view may be selective, neglecting the quieter beauties of the valleys, but no other ancient work did so much in the immediately pre-Romantic period in Europe to encourage admiration for the genius of Homer, who was in so many ways far removed from the politer standards of that age.

(v) Neoplatonists and Christians

Glimp es of a Neoplatonic or Neopythagorean view of Homer have already been detected in Ennius' vision of the poet and in Aeneas' visit to the Underworld. But explicit Neoplatonist allegorization of Homer begins to appear in the first centuries A.D., from Plutarch onwards, and continues down to its final flowering in the work of Proclus, in the fifth century.⁴⁰ The first figures of real significance are Numenius and Cronius, in the later second century A.D., but their ideas are preserved only by later authors, especially the third-century author Porphyry in his essay on the Cave of the Nymphs in the Odyssey (13.102-12).⁴⁰

Porphyry himself also wrote a Homeric Questions, some of which survives intact, and parts of which are quoted in the Homeric Scholia.⁹¹ This marks the culmination in antiquity of scholarly work on Homeric problems, drawing on Aristotle and his predecessors and on later scholarship. To this work we owe the famous principle that Homer is his own best interpreter:

⁴⁸ Cf. especially Buffière, Mythes d'Homère 393-582, A. D. R. Sheppard, Studies on the 5th and 6th Essays of Proclus' Commentary on the Republic (Hypomnemata 61, Göttingen 1980), Lamberton, Homer the Theologian, and his 'The Neoplatonists and the spiritualization of Homer', in Lamberton and Keaney, Homer's Ancient Readers.

▶ For Porphyry's De Aniro Nympharum cf. his Opuscula Selecta, ed. A. Nauck (Teubner 1886), and the translations by Buffière, Mythes d'Homère 395-616, and R. Lamberton (Barrytown, N.Y.: Station Hill 1983).

¹⁹ Quaestionum Homericarum ad Iliadem/Odysseam Reliquiae, ed. H. Schrader (2 vols., Teubner 1880-90), and Quaestionum Homericarum liber I, ed. A. R. Sodano (Naples 1970). Schrader's reconstruction of the lost work is, however, very speculative: cf. H. Frbse, Beitrage zur Überlieferung der Iliasscholien (Zeternata 24, Munich 1960) 17-77.

۰.,

- •

t

ώς αὐτὸς μὲν ἐαυτὸν τά πολλὰ "Oμηρος ἐξηγεῖται (Quaest. hom., ed. Sodano, p. 1.12-14), a principle which corresponds with the actual practice of Aristarchus, whether or not he actually stated it in these terms.⁹²

Porphyry's combination of this traditional type of exegesis (which itself sometimes uses allegory as one of its techniques) with the systematic allegory of his Cave of the Nymphs is not really so unusual as has been thought, for the evidence suggests that earlier allegorists from Theagenes onwards, and especially Crates, could go in for a similar combination of interests, and allegory itself developed from a close study of the language of texts.⁴⁴ His De antro itself, however, has been described as 'the earliest surviving interpretive critical essay in the European tradition'.⁴⁴ It is certainly the most remarkable and imaginative reading of Homer which survives from antiquity.

The passage in Odyssey 13 describes a cave in the bay of Phorkus, the old man of the sea, in Ithaca, where Odysseus is landed on his return home. At the bay's head is an olive tree, and nearby is the lovely, shadowy cave, which is sacred to the Naiads. In it there are bowls and amphorae of stone, where bees make their honey, and great stone looms, where the nymphs weave robes of sea-purple. It has two springs of ever-flowing water, and two entrances to north and south, the first for mortals, the second for gods. Later, Athene and Odysseus store his treasures in the cave and sit beneath the sacred olive tree to plan the suitors' destruction (366ff.).

Porphyry dismisses the suggestion that this is simply a real cave and nothing more, and equally that it is just poetic fantasy. The poet wishes us to ask what he really means by this detailed and mysterious description. The answer is that the cave is the material world, as in Plato's Republic, and the Naiads are souls, whose sea-purple robes on stone looms represent flesh and blood covering the bones of material bodies, by which the souls become incarnate. The honey bees are the souls of the just, bees being holy and honey symbolic of purity and freedom from corruption. The souls enter and leave the cave by the two doorways, entering as mortals and leaving as divine (and the symbolism of north and south is elaborately explained). The olive tree is sacred to Athene, goddess of wisdom, and it is at the head of the harbour because wisdom governs the world. Athene herself being born from Zeus's head. The olive's leaves are dark and light, symbolizing the hope of suppliants, who hold an olive branch, of passing from darkness to light, and the evergreen olive's fruit is a reward for labour as in the prizes of olive oil at the Panathenaia, just as the eternal Wisdom gives us prizes for running life's race.

۰.

ţ

^{*} Cf. Pfeiffer, History of Classical Scholarship 226-7.

^{} Cf. Richardson, PCPS 201 (1975) 67ff., Lamberton, Homer the Theol an 109-10.

^{} Lamberton, Homer the Theologian 120.

Odysseus lays aside his material possessions and sits down beneath the olive tree with Athene, who transforms him into a beggar. So we must humble ourselves, give up our material concerns, and deliberate with Athene how to overcome the treacherous passions which are our enemies. Odysseus himself is the man who endures all the stages of reincarnation, until he is finally freed from the world of matter, when he 'arrives at a place where men do not know the sea', according to Teiresias' prophecy (Od. 11.121ff.).

This extraordinary allegory could hardly be further removed from the limpid simplicity of Homeric narrative style, but it is a remarkable testimony to the regenerative power of Homeric poetry, which could still evoke such interpretations after nearly a thousand years of tradition. Porphyry's allegory (based on the works of Numenius and Cronius) fits into the wider context of Neoplatonist views on the poems in general, for which one needs to look especially to Proclus.⁸⁵ In these the Trojan War itself becomes an image of life on earth, Helen being the beauty of the world of the senses over which souls struggle. The Trojan Helen herself is only an είδωλον, as in Stesichorus and Euripides, this world being only an image of reality. Troy or Ilion represents matter (ῦλη, Ιλύς), and the Greeks are souls which eventually escape and return to their true, spiritual home. The ten-year War symbolizes the ten periods of 1,000 years of successive reincarnations. As we have seen, Odysseus' wanderings again represent the soul's exile, the sea is the material world, and his trials are the soul's conflict with passions and temptations, leading to her final victory.

These wider allegories are explicitly prompted by the aim of defending Homer against the criticisms of Plato, and of reconciling poet and philosopher, and this aim is linked to an elaborate theory of poetry which restores the status it had originally enjoyed, as capable of expressing the highest forms of truth about the world⁹⁶. From the work of Porphyry or Proclus it is a very easy step to that of the early Christian apologists (especially Justin, Clement and Origen), who set out to defend Christianity against the pagan tradition, using allegory either to reinterpret Biblical myths or else to show how Greek myths really foreshadowed the truths of Christianity.⁹⁷ In this complex process Homer played an important rôle, and on the whole he continued to enjoy a relatively privileged status as the conveyor of divinely

•

- •

^{*} Cf. Sheppard, op. cit., Lamberton, Homer the Theologian 197-232.

[&]quot; Cf. Lamberton, Homes the Theologian 162-97.

¹⁷ Cf. especially H. Rahner, Griechische Mythen in christliche Deutung (Zurich 1957), G. Glockmann, Homer in der fruhchristlichen Literatur bis Justinus (Berlin 1968), N. Zeegers-Van der Vorst, Les Citations des poètes grecs chez les apologistes chrétiens du Ile siècle (Louvain 1972), J. Daniëlou, A History of Christian Doctrine 11. Gospel Message ind Hellenistic Culture (London 1973), J. Pépin, Mythe et alligorie (2nd edn, Paris 1976), Lamberton, Homer the Theolo ian, especially 78-82, 233ff.

inspired truth, despite the general hostility of the apologists towards pagan religion and myths. Through this channel the allegorical tradition passed to Byzantium, to the Latin Middle Ages, and ultimately into the Renaissance.

Viewed from a modern perspective, ancient criticism and interpretation of Homer may well seem curiously unbalanced, especially because of its emphasis on morality and its allegorical tendencies. But we should bear in mind first of all the unique status of the Homeric poems in antiquity, and secondly the fact that all forms of literary interpretation are in a certain sense a form of allegory, since they seek to draw out of a text more than is directly expressed by the words themselves. This applies as much to modern criticism of Homer as to ancient, and from this viewpoint it is not unreasonable to see this present series of commentaries on the Iliad as the continuation of a tradition which stretches back through Byzantium to Alexandria, and beyond this to the first tentative efforts to expound the poem of which we are aware, in the fifth and sixth centuries B.C.

¹⁶ This is not the place to pursue the story further. For Byzantium and the Renaissance cf. R. Browning and A. Grafton in Lamberton and Keaney, Homer's Ancient Readers, P. Cesaretti, Allegoristi di Omero a Bisanzio (Milan 1991). For general surveys of later interpretation of Homer cf. G. Finsler, Homer in der Neuzeit (Leipzig 1912), J. L. Myres and D. Gray, Homer and his Critics (London 1958), H. Clarke, Homer's Readers (Newark 1981). Stanford, Ulysses Theme, follows the fortunes of Odysseus through the centuries, as do B. Rubens and O. Taplin in An Odyssey round Odysseus (London 1989), and K. C. King does the same for the hero of the Iliad in Achilles: Paradigms of the War Hero from Homer to the Mid le Ages (Berkeley 1987). For Homer in English, French and German literature and criticism see also G. de F. Lord, Homeric Reneissance: the Odyssey of George Chopman (London 1956), D. Knight, Pope and the Heroic Tradition (Yale 1951), D. M. Foerster, Homer is English Criticism (Yale 1959), H. A. Mason, To Homer through Pope (London 1972), K. Simonsuuri, Homer's Origunal Genius (Cambridge 1979), N. Hepp, 'Homère en France au xvi^{} siècle', Atti della Accademia d lle Scienze di Torino. Classe di scienze morali, storiche et filologiche 96 (1962) 383-508, and Homère en France au xvii^{} siècle (Paris 1968), T. Bleicher, Homer in der deutschen Literatur 1450-1740 (Stuttgart 1972).

۰.

l

COMMENTARY

BOOK TWENTY-ONE

This Book cannot be considered separately from book 20. The framework of both consists in the scenes describing the Battle of the Gods. At the opening of book 20 Zeus urged the gods to intervene directly in the conflict (a reversal of the situation at the beginning of book 8), on the grounds that otherwise Akhilleus might sack Troy before the due time; and a grandiose passage described the cosmic effects of their entry into battle (47-66). After this prelude to the Theomachy the theme of direct conflict between the gods was left suspended, while Akhilleus clashed with Aineias, skirmished with Hektor, and killed other Trojans. It is resumed at 21.328-514, where a series of actions between opposing deities takes place (cf. 14.402-522n., for a similarly suspended sequence).

The earlier part of book 21 leads up to this through a succession of climactic scenes, centred on the theme of the battle in and with the river Skamandros. The Book opens with a brief but vivid description of half of the Trojans trapped and slaughtered in the river (1-33), followed by two major scenes in which Lukaon (34-138) and Asteropaios (139-201) are killed and their bodies disposed of in the stream. These actions arouse Skamandros' anger. He appeals to Akhilleus to desist, and then begins to attack him directly and protect the Trojans. In danger of being overwhelmed Akhilleus prays to Zeus, and is encouraged by Poseidon and Athene. Skamandros in turn calls to Simoeis for support, and begins to overpower his opponent (205-327).

This conflict between Akhilleus and the river-god, itself an intensely dramatic episode, leads into what is really the first major scene of the Theomachy, the clash of Skamandros and Hephaistos, water and fire (328– 82), already foreshadowed in the list of divine combatants at 20.33-40 (and 67-74). Once again the tone of this scene is intense and powerful.

By contrast, the battles or squabbles of the major Olympian deities, Athene and Here against Ares, Aphrodite and Artemis, together with Hermes' light-hearted avoidance of conflict with Leto, may at first seem trivial, although Apollo's refusal to fight his uncle Poseidon strikes a deeper note (383-513). The tone is similar to that of the scenes in book 5, where ۰.

Athene helps Diomedes to defeat Aphrodite and Ares, and there are echoes of these scenes which should probably be seen as part of a larger pattern of correspondences between the 'Diomedeia' and books 20-1 (see Introduction, 'Structure and themes'). But the divine battles in book 21 do have their functions within the poet's design. Not only do they give a cosmic dimension to Akhilleus' own aristeia, forming a series of stages leading up to the final confrontation between him and Hektor (cf. the interesting early comment on this technique by the sophist Protagoras, cited on 205-327), but throughout the Books in which Akhilleus is in action there also run the themes of the imminent threat of Troy's destruction and of its constant postponement. Skamandros' defeat by Hephaistos eliminates one divine protector, the city's chief river-god (cf. 21.372-6, where he swears not to defend Troy on the day of its sack); and the rout of three other pro-Trojan deities symbolizes their powerlessness against the forces of Here and Athene (cf. especially Athene's vaunt at 428-33). The lack of dignity with which this is accomplished has moral implications, suggesting the false position of the gods who are supporting a city doomed for Paris' treachery: his actions were instigated by Aphrodite, leading to the hateful war of which Ares is the embodiment (compare 5.832-4 and 21.412-14, where Athene accuses Ares himself of treachery in deserting the Greeks for the Trojans). On the Theomachy see also 383-513n.

The one god who preserves an awe-inspiring dignity on the Trojan side is Apollo, and it is appropriate that after the other deities have withdrawn he should enter Troy, in order to protect it from destruction. The Book closes with a rapid sequence of scenes which form a prelude to book 22 and anticipate some of its themes (see on 514-611).

The analysis by Scheibner (Aufbau) makes many excellent points on this part of the poem. See also Whitman, HHT 272-3 on the structure of books 20-1, and Bremer's discussion of the role of the gods in terms of narrative technique in HBOP 31-46.

1–33 Prelud : many of the Trojans take refuge in the river Skamandros, and are slaughtered by Akhilleus

In this opening scene the similes of slaughter and panic (13-16, 22-6 and 29) are a continuation of those (of forest fire and threshing) at the end of book 20 (490-9). For other sequences of similes running over bookdivisions, see on 9.4-8, 16.823-6.

1-16 The sound-patterns of this passage are analysed by A. B. Lord in Wace and Stubbings, Companion 200-1, and cf. Elliger, Darstellung der Landschaft 72-3. The references to the river in 1-2 and 15-16 frame the description, and it is mentioned in the centre of the passage (8). Descriptions of river-battles of this kind seem to be rare in earlier Near Eastern literature, but cf. the Egyptian accounts of the battle of Kadesh (A. Gardiner, The Kadesh Inscriptions of Ramesses II, Oxford 1960, 10, 30, 39-41), where the Hittites are said to be driven into the Orontes and massacred, and a Hittite story of someone (Tudhalijas?) being driven into and pursued across a river, published by K. K. Riemschneider, Journal of Cuneiform Studies 16 (1962) 110-21.

• .

- • 、

I-II This long periodic sentence, with quite heavy enjambment, acts as an excellent introduction to the scene of carnage.

1-3 = 14.433-4, 24.692-3. The ford is mentioned as a landmark in all these passages, rather than as a crossing-place. The scholia are in doubt whether $\pi \circ \rho \circ \sigma$ means 'ford' or 'stream', but it is usually taken as the former. It has not featured as part of an actual battle scene until now, since at 14.433-9 it is a resting-place for Hektor on the way back to the city.

The phrases which the poet uses to refer to the river Skamandros in this Book and elsewhere form an extensive formular system.

Nominative

143, 212, 228 ποταμός βαθυδίνης | 329, 20.73 μέγας ποταμός βαθυδίνης | 130 ποταμός περ έθρροος άργυροδίνης | 304 | εύρὺ βέων ποταμός 16 | πλῆτο βόος κελάδων

Cf. 12.21 δτός τε Σκάμανδρος |

Accusative

8 ές ποταμόν είλεῦντο βαθύρροον ἀργυροδίνην 206 πὰρ ποταμόν πεφοβήατο δινήεντα | 603 πὰρ ποταμόν βαθυδινήεντα Σκάμανδρον | 25 ποταμοΐο κατὰ δεινοΐο βέεθρα | 332 | Ξάνθον δινήεντα 352 τὰ περὶ καλὰ βέεθρα ἅλις ποταμοΐο πεφύκει

Cf. 7.329 Εθρροον άμφι Σκάμανδρον |

Genitive

1-2 = 14.433-4, 24.692-3: άλλ' ότε δη πόρον Ιξον Ευρρείος ποταμοίο Ξάνθου δινήεντος δν άθάνατος τέκετο Ζεύς

15 Ξάνθου βαθυδινήεντος | 148 Σκαμάνδρου δινήεντος | 268 μέγα κύμα διϊπετέος ποταμοΐο | 326 πορφύρεον δ' άρα κύμα διίπετέος ποταμοΐο (διϊπετέος ποταμοΐο 16.174, 17.263, 3× Od.)

۰,

ı

Cf. also (above) 21.25 ποταμοΐο κατά δεινοίο βέεθρα | 11.499 | δχθας πάρ ποταμοΐο Σκαμάνδρου

Dative

Cf. 5.36 επ' ήιδεντι Σκαμάνδρω |

Note also the use of:

21.9 αΙπά βέεθρα | ~ 8.369 Στυγός ύδατος αΙπά βέεθρα | 238, 244, 361, 382 καλά βέεθρα | (see on 238) 352 (above) τά περί καλά βέεθρα άλις ποταμοΐο πεφύκει 354 | οί κατά καλά βέεθρα 365 | ῶς τοῦ καλά βέεθρα 218 ἑρατεινά βέεθρα | (see comment)

See also Elliger, Darstellung der Landschaft 54.

g-11 bT comment on Akhilleus' feat of dividing the enemy into two groups, and pursuing some towards the city and others into the river. Cf. 16.394-8, where Patroklos drives the Trojans towards the ships and cuts off their retreat, and 10.363-4.

4-5 There may be a hint of retribution in this reference to the previous day's troubles for the Greeks. For 4 cf. 6.41 πρός πόλιν, $\tilde{\eta}$ περ ol άλλοι άτυζόμενοι φοβέοντο, and 21.554 φεύγω, τ $\tilde{\eta}$ περ ol άλλοι άτυζόμενοι κλονέονται.

6 πεφυζότες: only here, 528, 532, and 22.1, always of the Trojans, whereas we have πεφεύγοι at 609, πεφευγότες Od. 1.12. The original formation was probably *πεφυγγότες, which became πεφυζότες on the analogy of φύζα, after the loss of the digamma (Chantraine, Dict. s.v. φεύγω 1). The poet may use it in preference to πεφευγότες because he wants to suggest the noun φύζα ('rout'), a stronger expression than ψυγή.

Merce δ' "Hon: this was later used to support the allegorical identification of Here with air (cf. Buffière, Mythes d'Homère 106ff.). Herë's intervention seems perfunctory, but such brief interventions are a feature of this Book. The mist stops the Trojans from escaping to the city, but the poet says no more about the fate of this group.

B badúppoov: elsewhere of Okeanos $(2 \times Il., 2 \times Od.)$. Cf. 130 ποταμός περ έθρροος άργυροδίνης. άργυροδίνης is used likewise of Peneios at 2.753.

g-10 The noise and confusion are emphasized by the onomatopoeic words πατάγω, βράχε, Ιαχον, ἀλαλήτω (so T). βραχεῖν is most often used of the clash of armour, but it occurs again at 387 in a similar verse, σύν δ' ξπεσον μεγάλω πατάγω, βράχε δ' εὐρεῖα χθών. For αἰπὰ ῥέεθρα see on 8.369.

12-16 This vivid simile catches in only three verses the effect of the Trojan panic. dxpl5 (only here in Homer) can mean 'locust', 'grasshopper'

• 1

t

or 'cricket', but as it is presumably destructive here, 'locust' seems the best equivalent; cf. M. Davies and J. Kathirithamby, Greek Insects (London 1986) 135-44, and Gow on Theorr. Id. 5.108 and CR 6 (1956) 92. The scholia say that this method of driving locusts out of the crops was practised in Cyprus, but it would presumably have been familiar to the poet's audience also. There is a parallel to this simile in the Flood story as told in the Mesopotamian epic Atrahasis. Cf. S. Dalley, Myths from Mesopotamia (Oxford 1989) 32-3: 'Nintu was wailing ... | Would a true father (?) have given birth to the [rolling?] sea | (so that) they could clog the river like dragonflies?'

The contrast of fire and water foreshadows the conflict of Hephaistos and Skamandros, as does the association of Akhilleus with fire, which is frequent in books 18-22: see on 22.317-21.

12 The scholia note how the tone of the simile is raised by the language, especially βιπῆς and ἡερθονται ('take wing').

16 κελάδων: 'sounding'; cf. 18.576 πάρ ποταμόν κελάδοντα. ἐπιμὶξ Ιππων τε καὶ ἀνδρῶν resembles 11.525 ἐπιμἰξ Ιπποι τε καὶ αὐτοί and 23.242 καίοντ' ἐπιμἰξ Ιπποι τε καὶ ἀνδρες.

17 & dioyevils: dioyevils is used of various herces, $7 \times II$, but only here with a definite article. Cf. & $\gamma \epsilon \rho \omega v r.33$ with comment.

Akhilleus leaves his spear on the bank, but at 67–70 he is using it again. As Aristarchus observed (Arn/A), this is a typical example of the poet's economy in taking unimportant details for granted (KOTÀ TÒ GIGMTÉMEVOV). Cf. bT 1.449 etc., and CQ 30 (1980) 271.

18 KEKAIµévov µupikījoiv is a suitable topographical detail. See on 350-1, and cf. 6.39, 10.466-7. Solµovi loos (9× 11.) is usually applied to a sudden destructive attack.

19 Cf. 23.176 χαλκῷ δηϊόων' κακά δὲ φρεσί μήδετο ἔργα.

20-1 Cf. to.483-4 (with KTEIVE ... yaïa instead of $\tau i \pi \tau \epsilon ... i \delta \omega p$). The substitution of aluari i $\delta \omega p$ for the more usual aluari yaïa (3× ll.) creates a rare type of hiatus.

22-6 This simile makes a good companion to the previous one. There the movement was from land to water: here pursuer and pursued are both in the water (cf. bT).

22 μ eyakhtnş is used elsewhere of a ship $(3 \times II.)$ or the sea (Od. 3.158). It is usually translated 'with mighty hollow', 'capacious' (cf. Leaf, LSJ). But the influence of kỹtoş is surely felt, and the poet perhaps intended 'monstrous'. Cf. Od. 12.96-7 δελφϊνάς τε ... και εί ποθι μεῖζον έλησι | κῆτος ..., the only other instance of dolphins in Homer.

23 λιμένος εύόρμου: the epithet occurs only here in ll.; cf. Od. 4.358, 9.136 λιμήν εύορμος.

24 Cf. 3.25 $\mu \alpha \lambda \alpha$ y $\alpha \beta \tau \epsilon \kappa \alpha \tau \epsilon \sigma \theta \epsilon \epsilon$, in the same position in the verse, in a simile about a lion.

۰,

l

26 πτῶσσον ὑπὸ κρημνούς: the river has steep banks (cf. 171-5, etc.). πτῶσσον ('cowered') is effective, as at 14.

26-32 Akhilleus takes twelve prisoners, to be offered as a blood-price for the killing of Patroklos. He had vowed to do this when Patroklos' body was first brought back to him (18.336-7), and he fulfils his promise at 23.175-6. Within the action of the lliad itself prisoners are not taken elsewhere: see on 11.111, 130ff.

28 This is suitably solemn: a four-word verse with heavy spondaic rhythm at the beginning.

29 τεθηπότας ήθτε νεβρούς: cf. 4.243 with comment. τεθηπώς recurs at 64 of Lukaon. This is the third simile from the animal world in this section, each one belonging to a different element (air, water, land).

30-1 There is pathos, emphasized by αὐτοί, in the use of the captives' own clothing to tie them up: so bT. The thongs are usually taken as belts. For ἐῦτμήτοισιν Ιμᾶσιν | cf. 10.567(n.), and for ἐπὶ στρεπτοῖσι χιτῶσι cf. 5.113 διὰ στρεπτοῖο χιτῶνος with comment. The best sense for στρεπτός is probably 'strongly-woven'.

34-138 Akhilleus meets Priam's son Lukaon, whom he had previously captured and sold. Ransomed by Eetion of Imbros, Lukaon had eventually returned to Troy. He supplicates Akhilleus, who kills him, throws him into the river, and makes a contemptuous speech over him which angers the river-god

This famous scene has been described as 'the climax of the set of supplications in battle' (Griffin, HLD 56 n. 12), although one should really reserve this description for Hektor's plea at 22,337-60. It is also the climax of all the contests involving lesser warriors (Strasburger, Aleinen Kampfer 85). Akhilleus has already refused to spare Tros, a significant anticipation of this scene (20.463-72). At 11.101-12 Agamemnon killed Priam's sons Isos and Antiphos, whom Akhilleus had previously captured and ransomed. A similar motif occurs in the combat between Aineias and Akhilleus in book 20, where we hear of how Aineias had been attacked and pursued by Akhilleus on a previous occasion, but escaped (89-96, 187-94). This was when Akhilleus sacked Lurnessos and Pedasos, and Pedasos was the home of Lukaon's mother (21.84-7). There is another thematic link in that on this occasion Apollo is disguised as Lukaon when he urges Aineias to fight Akhilleus (20.81). We had already heard of Lukaon at 3.333, where Paris put on his breastplate before his duel with Menelaos (cf. Schadewaldt, lliasstudien 49, Fenik, TBS 82-3). Cf. also Akhilleus' killing of Poludoros (20.407-18): both are sons of Priam and Laothoe, and are linked at 21.84-91, 22.46-53.

bT (34) comment on this scene as an example of $\pi\epsilon\rho$ intersio, and add that the details make the story vividly realistic. The basic structure is typical, consisting of (a) the meeting of the two warriors, (b) speeches, and (c) conflict, but in other respects it is highly individual.

•

- • .

34-48 These verses form one long periodic structure, explaining Lukaon's situation.

36-7 This is similar to the surprise attack on Aineias when he was cattle-herding, and on Isos and Antiphos when tending sheep, although here Akhilleus comes at night. Akhilleus refers to his many sleepless nights of campaigning at 9.325-7. άλωή here means 'orchard'.

37-8 έρινεον... ὄρπηκας: a 'whole and part' construction. Cf. 24.58, Od. 18.396. ὅρπηξ occurs only here in Homer; cf. Hes. Erga 468, etc.

The verses are reminiscent of 4.485-6 (simile), where a chariot-maker cuts down a poplar to make a felloe for a chariot: $\tau \eta \nu \mu \ell \nu \theta' d\rho \mu \sigma \tau \sigma \eta \eta \eta \eta$ $d\nu \eta \rho \sigma t \theta \omega \nu \sigma \sigma \delta \eta \rho \omega | \ell\xi \ell \tau \sigma \mu', \delta \phi \rho \sigma true \kappa \delta \mu \psi \eta \pi \epsilon \rho \kappa \sigma \lambda \ell \iota \delta t \delta \phi \rho \omega$. On the $d\nu \tau \nu \gamma \epsilon \varsigma$ ('chariot-rails') see Lorimer, HM 326; J. Wiesner, Arch. Hom. F 15-16. The scholia and Eustathius object to the use of wild fig branches for a rail, as being easily broken, but according to Theophrastus (HP 5.6.2) wild fig being tough is easily bent, and so was used to make hoops for garlands and other things. In Theocr. Id. 25.247ff. it is heated in order to be bent into a chariot-felloe.

39 ἀνώϊστον: 'unforeseen' (cf. οἰομαι); only here in Homer (ἀνωϊστί Od. 4.92), emphasizing the irony and pathos of Lukaon's fate after he had already escaped death once at Akhilleus' hands. After the enjambment of 34-8 the end-stopped verse is powerful.

40-8 These verses summarize Lukaon's past life and adventures, about which we hear again at 54-9, 74-96.

40-1 Euncos, son of Iason and Hupsipule, supplies wine to the Greek army from Lemnos at 7.467-75. At 23.740-9 we learn what the price of Lukaon was ($\delta vov \ 8\delta \omega \alpha \dots$ 'invov $\delta \eta \beta$ E $\delta v \eta \delta \beta$ 746-7): a very valuable silver mixing-bowl of Sidonian workmanship, given by Euncos to Patroklos; from 21.79 it appears that this was worth a hundred oxen! By this precious object the poet links the fates of Lukaon and Patroklos. See 23.740-9n., and cf. Griffin HLD 17-19 on other cups with symbolic significance.

tripadot: 'exported for sale'; a orist of reput (related to reptw). This a orist form occurs several times in book 21 (58, 78, 102, 454), and 4 times in Od. 14-15.

42-4 Lukaon was ransomed by a family friend, Eetion of Imbros, who has the same name as Andromakhe's father and the father of the Trojan Podes (17.575). He sent him to Arisbe on the Hellespont (cf. 2.836), perhaps for safe-keeping there. ὑπεκπροφυγών (cf. 20.147) implies that Lukaon had to slip away unnoticed in order to get home.

45-8 There is strong pathos in the contrast between Lukaon's brief spell of happiness among his family and friends and his impending death. For the twelfth day as a significant one cf. 1.425, 1.493, 24.31, 24.413 etc. Verses 46-7 are echoed at 80-4, 92-3.

۰.

47-8 There is grim irony in the addition of και ούκ εθέλοντα νέεσθαι, especially as νέσμαι is normally used of returning home (cf. νόστος). Lukaon's several journeys and homecoming are only the prelude to his final journey to the house of Hades. Cf. 23.51 νεκρόν ... νέεσθαι ύπο ζόφον ήερόεντα. For και ούκ έθέλοντα cf. 36.

49-53 Lukaon's helplessness is emphasized by this complex sentence, in anticipation of his desperate plea for salvation. His lack of armour enables Akhilleus to recognize him at once (cf. bT). γυμνόν is emphatic at the beginning of the verse: cf. e.g. 17.122, 17.693, 18.21, 22.510. For οὐδ' ἔχεν ἔγχος cf. 22.293 οὐδ' ἄλλ' ἔχε μείλινον ἔγχος (Hektor).

53-63 Akhilleus' speech of amazement is full of mocking irony. He speaks of Lukaon almost as if he had already been killed at their previous encounter, and there is word-play in 56-7, which would normally refer to death, but can be taken also of Lukaon's westward voyage into slavery.

53-4 = 20.343-4 (54 = 13.99, 15.286 followed by olov $\delta \eta \dots$).

57 olov 84 often occurs after an exclamation or similar sentence, e.g. 13.633, 15.287, 17.587, Od. 1.32, 5.183, 11.429.

57-63 Akhilleus contrasts Lukaon's escape from the sea with his coming journey under the earth (59 \sim 63).

58 Añuvou és hyaténu: cf. 2.722 (dative). The island was sacred to Hephaistos. The perfect form $\pi\epsilon\pi\epsilon\rho\eta\mu\epsilon\nu$ s occurs only here. The later perfect passive of $\pi\epsilon\rho\nu\eta\mu$ is $\pi\epsilon\pi\rho\eta\mu\alpha$, $\pi\epsilon\pi\rho\alpha\mu\alpha$.

59 There is striking alliteration, assonance and echo here: $\underline{m} \delta v \tau \sigma_5 \ \underline{\delta} \Delta \delta_5 \ \underline{m} \sigma \lambda v \overline{\eta}_5$, $\underline{\delta} \ \underline{m} \sigma \lambda v \overline{\sigma}_5 \ \underline{\delta} \ \underline{$

60-1 Cf. 20.257-8 άλλ' άγε θάσσου | γευσόμεθ' άλλήλων χαλκήρεσιν έγχείησιν (cf. Od. 20.181, 21.98).

61 Sopa ISwhat EvI ppeolv η SE Saelw is a unique expression. Cf. Sopa ISwhat were $(3 \times 11., 1 \times 00.)$, Sopa Saelw $(2 \times 11., 1 \times 00.)$. The expanded expression is presumably designed to increase the irony.

62 KETOEV is euphemistic for Hades.

63 yỹ φυσίζοος is an adaptation of φυσίζοος αία (3.243, Od. 11.301, in both cases of the Dioskouroi: see on 3.243-4). There is a variant reading φυσίζωος here, which occurs in late Greek (and cf. schol. pap. XII (Erbse) col. II 2, 4). Leaf would like to read γαΐα φῦσίζωος, ἢτε κρατερόν περ ἐρύκει, for no good reason. As at 3.243, Od. 11.301, there is surely an effect of contrast in the idea of the life-giving, or grain-bearing, earth keeping a dead hero. Actually it will be the sea which finally receives him: 125-7! The repetition of the verb at the end of 62 and 63 (cf. 59) is emphatic.

• .

64–72 Akhilleus' attack coincides dramatically with Lukaon's assumption of a suppliant position, as he slips in under the thrust of the spear and seizes his opponent's knees with one hand, and the spear with the other to prevent another throw. bT observe that the scene is described in a very graphic way. The significance of gestures is maintained later in this episode, when Lukaon lets go of the spear and sits down with hands outspread in despair (Reinhardt, IuD 436–9). For scenes of supplication in Homer and later literature cf. J. Gould, 'Hiketeia', JHS 93 (1973) 74–103 (esp. 80–1 on Lukaon and other rejected suppliants in Homer). See also 1.512-13n, 20.463–72n., and Thornton, Supplication 111-42.

64 For τεθηπώς see on 29.

65–6 Schol. pap. XII (Erbse) col. II 5–11 refer to Stesichorus (PMG 273) in a discussion of these verses, possibly in order to give a parallel for a long speech by someone about to die, who wishes to gain time.

67-70 T assumes that Akhilleus does not throw his spear, but thrusts with it, following Aristarchus' rule that οὐτάζω is only used of thrusting (cf. Lehrs, De Aristarchi stu iis 51ff.). Verses 67-9 resemble in construction 20.468-9, where Tros seizes Akhilleus' knees as Akhilleus strikes him.

69-70 έγχείη... læμένη = 20.279-80 (without χροός... άνδρομέοιο). In 70 έστη is effective. For the rest of the verse cf. 15.317, 21.168, again of spears sticking in the ground (λιλαιόμενα -ομένη χροός άσσι). Aristotle commented on these personifications of inanimate objects in ep²c as examples of vivid metaphorical expression (Rhet. 1411b31-12a10). See also 4.126n. άμεναι is from άω ('take one's fill'). άνδρομέοιο ('human') is usually an epithet of skin, flesh or blood (cf. 17.571, 20.100, 4× Od.).

78 This additional gesture of supplication shows Lukaon's terror.

73 Aristarchus (Did/A) did not read this verse in his text. The majority of MSS read $\lambda i \sigma \sigma \delta \mu \epsilon v \sigma \sigma$ instead of $\phi \omega v \eta \sigma \sigma \sigma$, and Didymus reports a variant koi β ' $\delta \lambda \phi \phi \nu \rho \delta \mu \epsilon v \sigma \sigma$. A speech of supplication is introduced simply by $\epsilon \lambda i \sigma \sigma \epsilon \tau \sigma$ you vous at 6.45, by you vous to at 11.130 and by $\lambda i \sigma \sigma \epsilon \tau \sigma$ you vou $\mu \epsilon v \sigma \sigma$ at 15.660. Cf. also Od. 10.264-6, where most MSS and two papyri omit 265. The verse occurs after $\lambda i \sigma \sigma \epsilon \tau \sigma$ at Od. 8.344-6, and after you vou $\epsilon \lambda \lambda i \tau \sigma v \epsilon \sigma$ at Od. 10.481-2 (although here too some MSS omit it). Van der Valk defends it, reading $\lambda i \sigma \sigma \delta \mu \epsilon v \sigma$ (Researches II 490ff.), but it could well be an addition, as Apthorp argues (MS Evidence 147-52, 195-7).

74-96 Lukaon's speech is both a plea for mercy and a lament for his death, which he foresees as virtually inescapable. He begins by appealing to his claim on Akhilleus as one who has received hospitality from him as a captive, a fact which creates a religious bond between them (cf. Gould, op. cil. 79). The rest of the speech emphasizes his misfortune in meeting Akhilleus again after his escape, the pathos of his mother's loss of both her sons, and finally the fact that, although he is Priam's son, he does not have the same mother as Hektor, the chief target of Akhilleus' hatred.

۰.

74 Cf. Od. 22.312 = 344 (Leodes and Phemios), youvound o', 'Obvore' o' of μ' albeo kal μ' Elénoov. Akhilleus has, however, lost his sense of albig and Eleos: cf. especially 24.44-5, and see on 22.82. The relationship of this scene to those in Od. 22 (where Leodes is killed but Phemios spared) is discussed by Usener, Verhaltnis der Odyssee zur Ilias 131-40.

75-6 These verses mean that Lukaon already has a suppliant claim on Akhilleus (cf. bT): he is 'as good as a suppliant'. For dvri here cf. 8.163, Od. 8.546. Verse 76 puzzled the early critics of Homer, and Stesimbrotus of Thasos explained it on the grounds that non-Greeks such as Lukaon only ate bread made of barley (cf. PCPS 201 (1975) 73-4)! Presumably it means that when captured Akhilleus was the first Greek with whom Lukaon shared bread (cf. Od. 6.175, 7.301, 8.462, schol. A and Porphyry). 'It would be incongruous to offer food, the source of life, to someone, and then take away his life. And he mentions Demeter to evoke religious scruples... One should admire the poet's inventiveness: in putting a speech in an enemy's mouth he still finds a plausible argument for his salvation' (bT).

79 Lukaon implies that Akhilleus has profited greatly by his earlier capture. ἀλφάνω occurs only here in Il.; cf. Od. 15.452, 17.250, 20.383, always of profits from the sale of people.

80-5 Lukaon's agitation produces a run of enjambed verses with sentence-breaks in mid-verse, or 'skewed' sentences as defined by Higbie, Measure and Music 77, 112-20; cf. 24.469-76 with comment.

So It looks as if Lukaon had to pay back to Eetion the price of his freedom. We also learn that Euneos made a profit of two hundred per cent on his buying and selling of this slave. The scholia oddly took $\lambda \psi \eta \nu$ as an optative referring to Lukaon's hope of being rescued again (cf. 99), which is impossible. It must be a orist passive indicative.

80-4 These verses recall 46-7 ($\theta\epsilon\delta \sim \mu \delta \delta \rho \alpha$), and 80-1 are echoed by 155-6.

83 For this kind of assumption of divine hostility cf. 2.116 etc. and Parker, Miasma 201.

84-5 μινυνθάδιον δέ με μήτηρ γείνατο ...: cf. 1.352 μήτερ, έπεί μ' Ετεκές γε μινυνθάδιόν περ έόντα (Akhilleus); 15.612 (Hektor). All three are doomed: cf. 106ff. Lukaon's use of this phrase suggests a bond with Akhilleus. The emphasis on Laothoe leads up to his final plea (95-6).

85-7 Laothoe and her father Altes, ruler of Pedasos, are mentioned again by Priam at 22.48-51 in connexion with Lukaon and Poludoros. The

•

Leleges (cf. 10.429, 20.96) were one of the peoples of the Troad, and Pedasos and the river Satnioeis must lie in the southern Troad (see on 6.21-2).

85-6 Άλταο... Άλτεω: for the epanalepsis cf. 157-8, 2.671-3, etc. The variant Άλτα(0) could be the original reading in 86 (cf. Leaf). Akhilleus has sacked Pedasos (20.92), and this may have given rise to the variant reading άνασσε in 86 (some city texts, one papyrus and several MSS). Aristarchus read the present, probably rightly: the city seems to be still inhabited at 6.34-5: ναῖε δὲ Σατνιόεντος ἐϋρρείταο παρ' δχθας | Πήδασον αἰπεινήν.

87 almheis occurs only here as an alternative for almeivos, and then in Hellenistic poetry. Our MSS read und instead of $\ell \pi i$, but Strabo (605) argues for $\ell \pi i$, since Satnioeis is a river, not a mountain (cf. T).

88 On Priam's polygamy see 24.495-7n.

89-91 Cf. 20.407-18 for Poludoros' death. For despotophoess cf. 555, 23.174, and onto despotophow -env 18.336, 23.22 (all of Akhilleus); Od. 22.349 (in a suppliant speech again). This shocking word evokes greater pity for Lukaon. For $\pi pu\lambda$ for ('armed warriors') see on 5.744. Poludoros' rash courage was emphasized at 20.411-12.

ga Ecorral: the variant Ecoral would be more vivid, and is possibly right.

93 ἐπεί β' ἐπέλασσέ γε δαίμων: the formula recurs at 15.418, and for the divine agency cf. 47, 82-4.

94-6 Verse 94 = 1.297 etc. $(7 \times Il., 6 \times Od.)$; 96 ~ 17.204 ($\tau o \tilde{v} \delta \dot{\eta} \dots$). The repetitions give no grounds for believing the verses to be an addition (as Leaf argues). All that Lukaon has said leads up to this final, desperate plea.

95 δμογάστριος: the word recurs at 24.47, and thereafter rarely, in late Greek. Zenodotus read loyάστριος, comparing 24.496 lñs ex υηδύος, but no other compounds of to occur in Homer (cf. Arn/A).

96 Evnfa: 'with this epithet of Akhilleus' friend he thinks he may soften him, by teaching him to emulate his friend's kindness' (bT). Ironically, the reference to Patroklos' death only sparks off Akhilleus' bitter reply. The verse echoes 17.204, in the speech by Zeus prophesying Hektor's death, when he puts on Akhilleus' armour after killing Patroklos, and the epithet is nearly always applied to Patroklos in the poem (see on 23.252).

97-8 Cf. 11.136-7, where Agamemnon refuses to spare the two sons of Antimakhos, especially 137 μ Ei λ IXIOIS Enteroriv, duel λ IKTOV 5' $\delta \pi$ ' discovery (see comment).

99-113 Akhilleus' speech sums up the difference between the 'normal' conditions of war, before Patroklos' death, and the brutality of the present situation. He accepts Lukaon's allusion to their earlier bond of $\xi v \alpha$, calling him $\phi i \lambda o \beta$ (106), and thereby suggesting a sense of sympathy which is developed in the reference to his own impending death, although at the same time there is a note of bitter irony in his use of the word 'friend'. The contrast with the ferocity of Agamemnon (6.46ff., 11.131fl.) is striking. Cf. Griffin (HLD 55): 'Agamemnon is ruthless and unreflective; Achilles kills in a passionate revenge, but not in blind ferocity. He sees his action in the perspective of human life and death as a whole, the perspective which puts slayer and slain on a level, so that it is more than a mere colloquialism that he calls Lycaon "friend" as he kills him.' Cf. also W. Marg, Die Antike 18 (1942) 175-6; Schadewaldt, VHWW 26off. Nevertheless, we must not exaggerate Akhilleus' sympathy here: the contemptuous tone of 122-35 shows us his other side.

۰,

The structure of the speech is effective. It begins with a single-verse sentence, rejecting Lukaon's plea. The main reason is then given in two balanced, contrasting sentences, $100-2 \pi plv \mu tv \dots$ and $103-5 v v \delta' \dots$ (note also $102 \text{ Tp} \omega v \dots$, $105 \text{ kcl} \pi \alpha v \tau \omega v \text{ Tp} \omega v \dots$). The 'consolatory' section which follows (106ff.) consists of a series of short, staccato sentences with no enjambment, often with a break at the caesura. The questions (106, 108) add to the tone of familiarity. Finally a solemn three-verse sentence announcing Akhilleus' own death expands the point of 110, leaving behind a strong sense of the inevitability of the whole process of mutual slaughter.

99 vhmie: the opening word of Akhilleus' speech at once obliterates any hopes of mercy (cf. bT). For vhmie at the beginning of a verse in a speech cf. 16.833 (Hektor to the dying Patroklos), 18.295 (Hektor to Pouludamas), 22.333 (Akhilleus to the dying Hektor). See also on 2.38, and vol. v, Introduction, p. 43.

100-2 Leaf notes the rarity of $\pi \rho lv$ as a conjunction in this position, i.e. preceding the main clause (cf. Od. 14.229), and the unique combination of $\pi \rho lv \ldots \tau \delta \phi \rho \alpha \ldots$ Thus $\pi \rho lv$ carries an unusually heavy emphasis here. $\epsilon \pi i \sigma \pi \epsilon \bar{i} v \alpha \bar{i} \sigma \mu \rho v \bar{j} \mu \alpha \rho$ is also a unique expression, instead of the normal $\pi \delta \tau \mu \rho v \epsilon \pi i \sigma \pi \epsilon \bar{i} v$, although $\alpha \bar{i} \sigma \mu \rho v \bar{j} \mu \alpha \rho$ alone is formular. For τi cf. 9.645.

103-5 Cf. 47-8, 82-4, 92-3. Akhilleus confirms Lukaon's fear and generalizes his experience. 'Ιλίου may represent 'Ιλίου (cf. 2.518n.). In 105 καl emphasizes πάντων. πέρι δ' αὖ ... παίδων incidentally answers Lukaon's plea that although Priam's son he is not Hektor's full brother.

106-7 In 106 the juxtaposition of friendship and death makes a bitter contrast, and káttôave kai Πάτροκλος echoes άλλά ... θάνε και σύ. For a similar sentiment cf. 15.139-40, where Athene consoles Ares for the loss of his son. Callisthenes, Aristotle's nephew, is said to have quoted 107 to Alexander at the time when Alexander had begun to turn against him (Plutarch, Alex. 54). For δ περ σέο πολλόν άμείνων cf. 7.114, 16.709.

In later Greek literature the reflection that all men must die is a standard motif in speeches of consolation for the death of a loved one (e.g. Menander Rhetor ed. Russell and Wilson p. 162, with comments), and Akhilleus himself has already referred to the fact that not even Herakles, dearest of men to Zeus, escaped death, in relation to his own impending fate (18.115-21). Here however this theme seems to serve primarily to justify Akhilleus' desire for revenge. See also on 18.117-19.

109 πατρός ... άγαθοῖο, θεά ... μήτηρ: chiastic contrast of noble father and divine mother.

110 Eπι stands for Eπεστι (cf. Od. 11.367). This was Aristarchus' interpretation, and it seems likely to be correct.

III-I3 Cf. the solemn prophecies of Troy's fall at 4.164-8, 6.448-9ξσσεται ήμαρ ότ' άν ποτ' όλώλη "Ιλιος Ιρή ..., and see on 4.163-5. In III the careful enumeration of the three parts of the day, unique in Homer, adds to the solemnity of Akhilleus' prediction. δείλη occurs only here in Homer, but is common later. Cf. δείελος at 232, Od. 17.606 δείελον ήμαρ (Od. 17.599 δειελιήσας). In 112 Άρη probably means 'in battle'.

113 'He is confident that no one will kill him in close combat' (bT and schol. pap. XII (Erbse)). Akhilleus appears uncertain whether he will die from a spear-cast or arrow-shot, although at 277-8 he says that his mother prophesied his death from 'Apollo's swift shafts', which suggests an arrow. More details about his death are given at 18.96, 19.416-17. 22.359-60: all of these together fit the story in the Aithiopis and later literature in which Akhilleus was shot by the arrow of Paris, with Apollo's aid (Homer, OCT vol. v, p. 106.7-9 = Davies, EGF p. 47.20-3, Apollodorus, Epit. 5.3, Virgil, Aen 6.56-8, Ov. Met. 12.597ff.). For the increasing prominence of the theme of Akhilleus' death in Iliad 18-24 see on 18.95-6.

114-19 The strong enjambment in this description of Lukaon's killing binds the whole sequence of actions closely together. Verses 117-18 are particularly vivid, with the monosyllabic $\delta \tilde{v}$ standing at the beginning of the verse. Cf. the analysis by Friedrich, Verwundung 100-2.

EI4 Cf. 425. The other parallels for λύτο γούνατα καὶ φίλον ἦτορ are all Odyssean (8×). Cf. γούνατ' ἕλυσεν $|8 \times II.;$ φίλον ἦτορ $|14 \times II.$

115-17 Cf. 14.495-7, and for xeipe merdoo og also 4.523, 13.549. In these passages, however, the victim spreads out his hands after he has been struck or as he is dying. Here Lukaon lets go of Akhilleus' spear and knees before he is struck, which Gould suggests may symbolize the fact that he is 'no longer a suppliant in the full ritual sense when he is killed' (op. cit. 81). But Lukaon's gesture really indicates his despair. Cf. the paralysis of Deukalion at the prospect of his impending death, at 20.480-2.

117–19 For 117–18 cf. 16.339–40 d d' $i\pi'$ obatos adzéva beive | $\Pi\eta v$ édews, $\pi a v$ d' elaw édu fiqos, and for fiqos adphases cf. Od. 16.80, 21.341, ll.

۰.

10.256 $\phi d\sigma \gamma \alpha v \sigma v d\mu \phi \eta \kappa \epsilon_5$. The rare phrase perhaps draws attention to the effectiveness of this prolonged stab wound (Friedrich, Verwundung 102). Verse 119 = 13.655.

120-38 Akhilleus' unnecessary and contemptuous action and his insulting speech anger the river-god, who begins to think of direct intervention. For this type of thematic anticipation cf. vol. v, Introduction. p. 21.

122-3 The scholia report a variant ήσο, which comes from Od. 18.105, 20.262, and cannot be right here. σ' ώτειλήν | σΙμ' gives us three accusatives together, unless σ' is $\sigma(01)$ as in 1.170. Aristarchus firmly supported ώτειλήν against ώτειλής (the reading of most of our MSS), which looks like an attempt to correct the text. Normally a corpse was washed before burial: here the fish will lick it clean. ἀπολιχμᾶν occurs only here in Homer; cf. $\lambda_1\chi_1$ μῶν Hes. Th. 826, $\lambda_1\chi_1$ μάζειν Aspis 235, etc. ἀχηδέες means 'uncaring' (cf. 24.526). But the κῆδος which they will not provide is above all that of proper burial and mourning, and the point is stressed by οὐδέ σε μήτηρ ... γοήσεται.

123-5 Akhilleus picks up Lukaon's references to his mother (84ff.). Lukaon's funeral procession and burial will be replaced by his journey down the river to the sea. άλος εύρέα κόλπον is a unique variation of the formula θαλάσσης εύρέα κόλπον (18.140, Od. 4.435). As the maternal earth receives the dead normally, so here the sea will do so, in its 'ample bosom'. For οὐδέ σε μήτηρ | ἐνθεμένη λεχέεσσι γοήσεται cf. 22.352-3, 22.86-7 (both to Hektor, the first by Akhilleus). For other references to the grief of parents or family in vaunting speeches cf. 14.501ff., 17.27-8.

126-7 Usually an unburied body suffers mutilation from dogs and birds (1.4-5 etc.). This is a grim variation on the theme, in which the effect is made more eerie by the vivid picture of the fish darting through the dark waves, just under the rippling surface of the sea, as the pallid corpse floats among them. Soon we shall hear how Asteropaios' flesh actually is devoured by eels and fish (203-4). Cf. Segal, Mutilation of the Corpse 30-2.

μέλαιναν φρĩχ' ὑπαίξει means 'will dart up to [or under] the dark ripple'. For φρίξ cf. 7.63-4, 23.692, Od. 4.402 (always in association with μέλας). άίσσω always has a long α elsewhere in Homer, but usually a short one in later poetry. The variant ὑπαλύξει was actually preferred by Philetas and Callistratus, because they took φρίξ as meaning 'chill' and thought that the fish avoided the cold by diving to the bottom! ὅς κε φάγησι ('who shall eat') implies intention. The phrase ἀργέτα δημόν only occurs elsewhere at 11.818, in a similar context: ἄσειν ἐν Τροίη ταχέας κύνας ἀργέτι δημῷ. The colour contrast with μέλαιναν φρῖκα is vivid.

128 The opening spondaic word $\phi\theta\epsilon i\rho\epsilon\sigma\theta'$ is emphatic and contemptuous.

130-5 These verses were athetized by Aristophanes, who thought that they had been added to give a reason for the river's anger. He also objected to the use of $\delta\eta\theta\dot{\alpha}$ (131), perhaps because he took it here as meaning 'often' (as Arn/A do). Probably the underlying reason was that Aristophanes found the verses shocking (cf. Pl. Rep. 391B). Didymus suggests that as Aristarchus did not defend them he may have agreed with Aristophanes.

•

130-2 For ποταμός ... έθρροος άργυροδίνης cf. 8. δηθά means 'over a long period' ('depuis longtemps'). The verbal echo δή δηθά perhaps underlines the ironic tone.

A bull is sacrificed to Alpheios at 11.728, and river-gods could themselves be portrayed as bulls or as bull-headed in later art and literature. At 237 the river will actually be described as bellowing like a bull. Skamandros has a priest (5.77-8), as Sperkheios has a sanctuary and altar at his springs, where sheep are offered (23.147-8). On the cult and iconography of rivergods see Nilsson, GgrR 236-40, Burkert, Religion 174-5.

Sacrifices to river-gods were commonly lowered into the water itself. Horses were thrown into the sea by the Argives at a place where a freshwater spring rises (Pausanias 8.7.2; cf. Fraser's note), and the Rhodians were said to throw a chariot and four horses into the sea as an offering to the sun each year (Festus p. 190 ed. Lindsay). But the custom of sacrificing horses to rivers is not typically Greek. The Magi in Xerxes' army sacrificed white horses to the river Strymon (Hdt. 7.113), and horse-sacrifices were common among the Scythians (Hdt. 4.61), Massagetai (Hdt. 1.216) and Parthians (Tac. Ann. 6.37). It is possible that the custom mentioned by Akhilleus is intended to be specifically Trojan rather than Greek, pace Hall (Barbarian 43-4).

136-8 For Skamandros' growing anger see on 120-38

137 The variant $\phi \phi v \phi \phi$ for $\pi \phi v \phi \phi$ recurs at 249 in a similar phrase, and it was the reading of Aristophanes there, whereas Aristarchus (Arn/A) read $\pi \phi v \phi \phi$. But $\pi \phi v \phi \phi$ is used elsewhere in the context of fighting (11.601, 16.568, etc.).

139-204 Akhilleus fights Asteropaios, kills him, and leaves his body in the river

The form of the fight is as follows:

- 139–47 Akhilleus attacks Asteropaios, whose genealogy is given. Asteropaios stands his ground.
- 148-60 Akhilleus asks his name and origin and Asteropaios tells him.
- 161-8 Asteropaios throws both spears at once, hits Akhilleus' shield with one, and grazes his arm with the other.
- 169-72 Akhilleus throws and misses, and the spear sticks in the riverbank.

۰,

- 173-82 Akhilleus attacks with his sword, as Asteropaios tries unsuccessfully to pull the spear out or break it, and Akhilleus kills him with a blow in the stomach.
- 182-99 He strips his armour and boasts over the body.
- 200-4 He then pulls out the spear, and leaves the body to be eaten by the eels and fish.

Although much of the structure is typical (see especially on 16.335-41, and Fenik, TBS 145-6), the poet uses the river-setting for significant details and also Asteropaios' own character. He was mentioned at 12.102, 17.217, 17.351-5, but not in the Catalogue at 2.848. He is the son of Pelegon, and grandson of the great river Axios, the modern Vardar, which flows down through Macedonia into the sea near Salonika (see on 2.848-50). Special prominence is given to his parentage here (and apart from Axios his parents and grandparents are only mentioned here in the Ilia). Akhilleus explicitly stresses that the river Skamandros has been of no more help to him than his own ancestry (184-99). The poet has chosen this particular victim carefully: there is a cruel irony in the manner of his death (203-4), and his descent from Axios is an added reason for Skamandros' support (145-6), and for his anger at his death (cf. bT 145-6, 192). Is he Homer's own creation?

Asteropaios is a formidable opponent, who does remarkably well. He stands up to Akhilleus and is the only hero who actually succeeds in wounding him slightly. He does not give up after his initial failure, but tries bravely to pull Akhilleus' spear from the bank. His ambidexterity is an added advantage (162-3). All this is in marked contrast with the preceding scene, where Lukaon was utterly helpless from the start.

141 Πηλεγόνος: Pelegon is presumably the eponymous ancestor of the Pelagones, who lived in the region of the Axios (Pelagonia). Cf. Strabo 331 (fr. 38 and 39, Eust. 1228.12). The Pelagones were sometimes identified with the Giants (Call. Hy. 1.3; cf. also Philodemus, De pietate 248v, p. 25 Gomperz, quoted by Erbse on Schol. 21.141), and the name Periboia appears again as that of the daughter of Eurumedon, king of the Giants and wife of Poseidon, at Od. 7.56-9 (where 57 ~ 142 here). Asteropaios aroused considerable interest later: a monograph on him was written by Ptolemy Pindarion (Wilamowitz, Kleine Schriften 1v 143), and schol. pap. XII (Erbse, on 21.163) cites a fragment of lyric poetry about him (PMG 501).

For Agios eupopteopos cf. 2.849 etc. Agiou eupo peovros. eupopteopos recurs only in Nonnus and Quintus of Smyrna.

145 Exert Súo Soupe: a warrior often carries or brandishes two spears, but here both will be used together (162-8).

•

t

- • 、

τ46 δαϊκταμένων ('slain in battle') only recurs at 301; cf. άρηfφατος, άρηϊκτάμενος. It is echoed by έδαiζε (147).

148-51 Verses 148-9 = 6.121-2, in the meeting of Glaukos and Diomedes, which this episode resembles (see below). In 150 TIS TOOEV EIS avopow occurs nowhere else in Il., but 7× Od. (1.170 etc.). Cf. 6.123 TIS dè où tooi, ϕ tooire, kataovntov avopomov; and similar enquiries at 15.247 and 24.387. Verse 151 = 6.127. This grim statement implies that 150 also asks about Asteropaios' parentage.

152-60 Asteropaios' reply is brief and to the point, being largely composed of conventional motifs. The last sentence suggests that he does not want to waste time exchanging the courtesies of heroic war. His opening question was more effective as an introduction to Glaukos' famous comparison of men to leaves (6.145). Like Glaukos, Asteropaios too gives his parentage but not his name, which would be unnecessary. Cf. 24.397, Od. 6.196, 15.267.

155 δολιχεγχής is an absolute hapax. For other descriptions of the Paeonians see on 16.287-8.

155-6 fibe ... $\epsilon \lambda h \lambda o u \theta \alpha$ is very similar to 80-1. The motif of the latecomer to the war occurs at 10.434, 13.361, 13.792-4, 16.811, and here it adds to the poignancy of the hero's death. Asteropaios could theoretically have been mentioned in the Catalogue, since less than ten days have elapsed since the events of book 2. Hence a verse was inserted in some texts into the Paeonian entry after 2.848, in order to introduce him (cf. T on 21.140, schol. pap. XII (Erbse) 21.155).

158 This verse is omitted by several MSS. It is a variant of 2.850, which a few MSS read here. It might be thought to weaken the brevity of this speech, but it is natural for Asteropaios to dwell on his ancestry, and cf. the repetition at 85-6.

162 Πηλιάδα μελίην: Eustathius (1229.39) notices the variety of expressions for Akhilleus' spear in this episode: 169 μελίην Ιθυπτίωνα, 172 μείλινον έγχος, 178 δόρυ μείλινον Alaxίδαο, 200 χάλκεον έγχος.

άμαρτη ... άμφίς: Asteropaios throws both spears at once (sc. βάλεν).

x63 περιδέξιος occurs only here in Homer (cf. Aristophanes etc.); it must mean 'ambidextrous' in this context. ἀμφιδέξιος would not fit the metre.

165 = 20.268. On its own (i.e. apart from 20.269-72) this line most naturally implies that the gold layer is on top (see on 20.268-72).

166-8 έπιγράβδην ('with a graze') occurs only here in Homer; cf. Orph. Lithica 365. χειρός means 'arm' here, and ή δέ in 167 is the spear. Verse 168 resembles 15.317 (and see 21.69-70n.).

169-70 βυπτίωνα occurs only here, and means 'straight-flying'; cf. 20.99 τοῦ δ' θὺ βέλος πέτετ'. Zenodotus' reading βυκτίωνα, supposed to mean 'straight-grained', is ingenious but less relevant. Verse 170 is very similar to 140.

۰,

ı

E71-2 'It is dramatically effective for Akhilleus to be wounded and to miss his opponent' (T). μ toromayls occurs only here in early Greek literature (cf. Nonn. D. 1.233), and means 'driven into the ground up to the middle'. This anticipates Asteropaios' hopeless struggle to pull the spear out. Aristarchus preferred μ toromaxls (Did/A), which is read by some manuscripts, and was presumably intended to mean 'quivering up to [or in] the middle'.

174-9 Asteropaios' desperate efforts to pull out the spear and then to break it are vividly described. For $\tau pls \dots \beta lns (176-7)$ cf. Od. 21.125-6. $\mu \epsilon \theta ln \mu \iota$ with the genitive is a normal construction. Most manuscripts read $\beta ln \sigma \beta ln$, neither of which is probable. The pattern 'three times ... but on the fourth ...' is a common one: see on 22.165, and for $\tau pls \dots \tau pls \dots \tau \delta$ be $\tau \ell \tau p \sigma \tau \sigma \dots$ see also on 16.702-6. In 178 & Cal ('to break') is from & $\tau v \nu \mu$.

εδο-i παρ' δμφαλόν ... κάλυψεν = 4.525-6 (see comment). χολάδες only occurs in these two passages in Homer; cf. HyHerm 123, etc.

18a ένι στήθεσσιν όρούσος: this brutal action goes beyond that of Hektor at 16.862-3.

183 = 13.619, 17.537. At 23.560-2 and 807-8 Akhilleus will offer Asteropaios' breastplate and sword as prizes in the funeral games for Patroklos.

184-99 The main theme of Akhilleus' speech of triumph, the genealogical comparison, is standard in heroic confrontations: cf. especially Aineias at 20.200-58 (with comments). But he displays an arrogance which goes still further than his speech over Lukaon's body (the opening of which is echoed at 184). The contemptuous and constant references to rivers (185, 186, 190, 191, 192, 196) rise to a magnificent, cosmic climax in the dismissal of even Okeanos, the source of all the waters of the world, as no match for the thunderbolt of Zeus. It is a superb piece of rhetoric, but seriously miscalculated, for Akhilleus himself will soon prove to be no match for Skamandros, whom he dismisses so boldly at 192-3.

184–5 Kpovlωvos | παισίν refers to Akhilleus' ultimate descent from Zeus (188–9). ἐκγεγαῶτι (read by Aristarchus, Arn/A, and most MSS) is preferable to the accusative here, as it stands in a clause which is independent of the infinitive ἐριζέμεναι and so follows the construction of τοι.

186-7 φησθα refers to 157. γένος, meaning 'offspring' (cf. 6.180, 9.538) or 'by birth', balances γενεήν. Notice the parallel structure of these verses, as in 20.206-9, 1.280-1, etc.

190-1 τῶ ('therefore') seems slightly incongruous here (rather in the manner of children arguing who say 'so there!'). μ μ ... αντε are virtually equivalent to 'just as ... so'.

۰.

For άλιμυρηέντων cf. Od. 5.460, where it refers specifically to the river's mouth, where it meets the sea. This stately compound was later thought to suggest the actual sound of the river running into the sea: cf. Eust. 1230.42 of έν τῆ άλι μυρόμενοι, τουτέστι μετά ῆχου βέοντες... και ώς ἂν συνηθέστερόν τις είποι, μορμύροντες; Leaf 'where it murmurs against the brine'. The basic sense of μύρομαι is not certain (cf. Chantraine, Dict.; Frisk).

αντε is Aristarchus' reading for δ' αντε (cf. 4.238). ποτάμοιο is elliptical, meaning 'than the offspring of a river'.

192-3 Akhilleus means Skamandros, rather than Axios. For 193 cf. 8.210 ούκ αν Εγωγ' έθέλοιμι Διί Κρονίωνι μάχεσθαι.

194 Akheloos, the great river of north-west Greece, and the longest one in Greece, was always regarded as specially important, and in later literature the name was sometimes used as a metonym for 'water' in general (cf. Erbse on schol. 194). It is mentioned only here in Homer, although another river of this name in Lydia occurs at 24.616.

For oùst in 194 Aristarchus wanted to read ours. ours ... oust is perfectly possible (Denniston, Particles 193), and may be what he intended (rather than ours ... ours). For oust ... oust ... ('not even ... nor') cf. Kühner-Gerth 11 294.

195 Megacleides and Zenodotus wanted to omit this verse, in order to make Akheloos the origin of all rivers, and Pausanias' text does not seem to have read it (8.38.10). Aristarchus and virtually all our MSS keep it. Modern scholars have tended to side with Zenodotus, but the line is surely genuine. How could Akheloos be the origin of the whole sea? Verse 195 accords with 14.201, 14.246 (see comments); cf. also Hes. Th. 337-70, where Okeanos is the father of rivers and springs, and A. Lesky, Tha tha (Vienna 1947) 81-2.

For $\beta\alpha\vartheta\nu\rho\rho\epsilon i\tau\alpha\sigma$...' Accavoio cf. Hes. Th. 265 'Accavoio $\beta\alpha\vartheta\nu\rho\rho\epsilon i\tau\alpha\sigma$, and 18.607 ποταμοίο μέγα σθένος 'Accavoio. Leaf rightly calls this 'one of the most majestic lines ever written'. The polysyllabic phrase at each end of the verse frames the simpler μέγα σθένος in the centre, with a balanced structure of epithets and nouns. The splendid compound epithet $\beta\alpha\vartheta\nu\rho\rho\epsilon i\tau\eta\varsigma$ occurs only here in Homer (cf. Hes. Th. 265), and the repeated πάντης ... πάσα ... πάσαs ... and alliteration of 196-7 add to the effect. Cf. the grandeur of 7.422 έξ ἀκαλαρρείταο βαθυρρόου 'Accávoio, and 14.246, 18.399.

197 postara: only here in Homer; cf. HyDem 99, etc.

199 $\sigma\mu\alpha\rho\alpha\gamma\eta\sigma\eta$: a vivid word for the crack and rumble of thunder and a memorable ending to this speech. Elsewhere in Homer it occurs only at 2.210, of the sea breaking on the shore, and 2.463, of the Asian meadow, crowded with clamorous birds (see on 2.462-3). Cf. Hes. Th. 679, 693 (Titanomachy).

• .

200 The poet here carefully notes Akhilleus' recovery of his only spear, which Asteropaios was unable to draw from the river-bank.

201-4 These verses echo the theme of 120-7. $du\phi \in \pi i vov \tau o$ (203), 'tended', is ironic, as at 23.184. It is used of care for a wounded man at 4.220 and 16.28. As in the cruel parody of Lukaon's funeral, the care of Asteropaios' body falls to the eels and fish, who attack the place where his flesh is most tender. $i \gamma \chi \epsilon \lambda v_s$ only recurs at 353 in Homer; cf. Archilochus 189 West, etc.

204 The four-word verse with its repeated participles ('cropping ... shearing') dwells dispassionately and clinically on this unpleasant scene, before our attention is diverted elsewhere. The fact that $\frac{1}{2}p\frac{1}{1000}$ is usually applied to animals peacefully cropping grass, grain etc. adds to the macabre incongruity, and the precise word $\frac{1}{1000}$ ('around the kidneys') appears to be an absolute hapax. See also Richardson in Bremer, HBOP 170.

205–327 Skamandros intervenes. Akhilleus' slaughter of the Paeonians arouses the river, who asks him to desist. When Akhilleus fails to comply he complains to Apollo and then pursues Akhilleus over the plain. Akhilleus appeals to Zeus, and Poseidon and Athene come to his aid. Akhilleus attacks the river, who asks Simoeis for help and begins to overpower him

This is an intensely dramatic episode, in which we sense something of Akhilleus' own elemental power. In one or two places, however, the course of events has seemed to some readers slightly disjointed. Akhilleus apparently agrees to the river's request to drive the Trojans out of his waters and not to choke his streams (221), but Skamandros at once complains to Apollo, and Akhilleus then leaps into the water (227-34). Is this a sign that the poet originally had a version without the episode of Akhilleus' actual fight with the river (cf. Leaf)? That seems most unlikely, as there would be little point in introducing Skamandros at all. Akhilleus in fact only agrees to drive the Trojans out of the river, but refuses to stop slaughtering them, and his defiant words at 224-6 cause the river-god to make his appeal to Apollo. A further apparent difficulty is that at 291-2 Poseidon promises Akhilleus that the river will soon desist, but this only happens after Hephaistos' intervention at Here's request (328-82). It looks as if the poet is duplicating the motif of divine aid in order to show us the weight of support behind Akhilleus, and also as a preparation for the actual conflict between the gods at 385-514. The fight with the river is itself a stage in this process of climax, as was acutely observed by the sophist Protagoras (schol. pap. xII (Erbse) on 240).

205 Παίονας Ιπποκορυστάς: see 16.287-8 with comment.

• .

- •

t

207-8 Cf. 16.451-2 ένι κρατερή ύσμινη | χέρσ' ύπο Πατρόκλοιο ... δαμήναι.

209-12 Cf. 5.677-80, where Odysseus kills several Lycians, especially 679-80 και νύ κ' έτι πλέονας Λυκίων κτάνε δῖος 'Οδυσσεύς,] ei μ h αp' δξυ νόησε μέγας κορυθαίολος "Εκτωρ ...; and for this sequence in general (catalogue of victims followed by hostile intervention, often divine) see on 16.415-18.

Mudon is perhaps related to the Paeonian place-name Amudon (2.849, 16.288). It is also the name of a Paphlagonian (5.580). Cf. von Kamptz, Personennamen 309. Ophelestes is possibly an Illyrian name (von Kamptz 148-9, 256). It is applied to a Trojan at 8.274.

213 A few MSS omit this verse, perhaps because of homoeoteleuton with 212. It could, however, have been added because it was thought that the river-god could not address Akhilleus unless he took human form, and if it were not there we should not really regret its absence. Aristarchus (Did/A) found support for both $\epsilon l \sigma \alpha \mu \epsilon \nu \sigma s$ and $\epsilon l \delta \delta \mu \epsilon \nu \sigma s$, and both forms occur elsewhere (see on 16.710-11). $\epsilon \kappa \phi \theta \epsilon \nu s \epsilon \sigma \tau \sigma$ (or $\epsilon \kappa \phi \theta \epsilon \nu s \epsilon \sigma \tau \sigma$) is the reading of a few MSS for $\epsilon \phi \theta \epsilon \nu s \epsilon \sigma \tau \sigma$, and is much better with the genitive construction. Aristarchus' omission of $\delta \epsilon$ (Did/A) produces an awkward asyndeton.

214-21 Skamandros' request is courteous, considering Akhilleus' behaviour so far.

224-25 περί ... ἀνδρῶν means 'beyond all men'. For αἴσυλα ῥέζεις see on 5.403-4. The emphatic runover word ἀνδρῶν and θεοὶ αὐτοἱ frame 215.

216-17 The Geneva scholia say that Skamandros' real intention is to lure Akhilleus into the water to drive out the Trojans, so that he can then be destroyed. This is supported by Scheibner (Aufbau 36), but seems overingenious.

218 εραττεινά βέεθρα: a unique phrase, particularly effective by contrast with the river's pollution (cf. bT), a contrast implied also by 219-20 (especially άλα δĩαν); Arn/A misses the point. See also on 238, and Richardson in Bremer, HBOP 171.

220 The verse is made ugly by the repeated sigmatism, and the echo of στειν-..., suggesting the horror of the scene. For άιδήλως ('destructively'), cf. άιδηλος 2.455, etc.

B21 $dy\eta \mu' dyn occurs only here in$ Il., twice in*Od.*, both times in the same phrase as here <math>(3.227, 16.243).

223-7 Akhilleus' assent is at best very perfunctory, referring presumably to Skamandros' request at 217, and the main weight of his reply is on his desire for more slaughter. In 225-6 "Εκτορι... ἀντιβίην go together. ¶ KEV ... ¶ KEV ... ('whether ... or ...') seems better than placing a colon after ἀντιβίην and making this a separate 'either ... or ...' sentence (¶ ... ¶ ...).

۰,

229-32 Apollo was last seen rescuing Hektor from Akhilleus at 20.443-54, and he is not mentioned again until 435. For the time being nothing comes of this appeal to him, but the poet wants to concentrate on Skamandros himself at this point, and the appeal stresses the river-god's desperation. In fact, Apollo does fulfil Zeus's instructions at 515-611, where 516-17 recall 20.30.

Zeus's actual instructions were that the gods should give aid to both sides, lest Akhilleus should sack Troy (20.23-30). What Skamandros says is perfectly in accord with this. True, Zeus had said nothing about a time-limit, but the point presumably is that the gods should continue to give support throughout the day's fighting.

231-2 Tρωσł ... ἀμύνειν resembles 15.255 (of Apollo). For the limit indicated by 231-2 cf. 11.193-4, 17.454-5. The phrase δείελος όψε δύων suggests that originally δείελος referred to the setting sun, but the etymology is not certain. σκιάζειν occurs only here in Homer; cf. Hes. Th. 716 (κατά δ' ἐσκίασαν), etc.

233-50 Virtually all this passage concentrates on the river's actions. The style and structure reflect this: notice the very high frequency of enjambment, especially periodic and progressive. In 18 verses these two types occur 12 times, i.e. 66%, more than twice as often as the average frequency noted by Parry (MHV 254: 24.8% in 600 verses of lliad 1-6). This is naturally accompanied by a high frequency of internal pauses. The effect is of a great piling-up of sentences, as the river deploys all its forces to defeat Akhilleus. Verses 241-8 are discussed by Higbie, Measure and Music 118-19. She also notes the low density of formulae in this passage.

234 The compound analogew occurs only here in Homer, later in fifthcentury literature. For olopart ouw cf. 23.230, the only other occurrence of the phrase in Homer, Hes. Th. 109, 131, and see Richardson on HyDem 14. One should perhaps read outww (Chantraine, GH 1 372).

235 πάντα δ' ὅρινε ῥέεθρα κυκώμενος: the triple trochaic break in each of the first three feet has a restless effect which suits the theme of confusion; see on 406-11.

236 = 344. For $\delta\lambda$ is toav a minority of MSS read toav $\delta\lambda$ is, which Leaf prefers on the grounds that the F of $\delta\lambda$ is is usually observed, although cf. 17.54 $\delta\theta'$ $\delta\lambda$ is in the same position, again with $-\lambda$ is before a vowel. But in any case $\delta\lambda$ is hardly ever occurs before the bucolic diaeresis (Od. 15.77, 15.94 only), whereas it is common after the main caesura.

237 μεμικώς ήῦτε ταῦρος: perhaps because (as later) rivers were seen as sometimes taking the form of a bull. Schol. B refers here to Archilochus' portrayal of Akheloos as a bull, in his fight with Herakles (fr. 287 West). Cf. S. Tr. 10-14, with P. E. Easterling's comments; also Atrahasis (S. Dalley, Myths from Mesopotamia, Oxford 1989, 31): 'The Flood roared like a bull.'

٠.,

238 σάω: cf. 16.363 (3rd person sing. impf. as if from σάωμι). καλά βέθρα recurs 6× in book 21, but nowhere else in II. (cf. Od. 11.240). So it need not be merely 'formular'. See on 218.

239 T and Eustathius (1233.64) acutely observe that the repeated -not endings suggest the broad and calm expanse of the river, as saviour of the Trojans. This effect is increased by the slow pace of the spondaic opening and the way in which the words grow in length.

240 Schol. pap. XII (Erbse) compares Od. 11.243-4 (Turo and Poseidon): πορφύρεον δ' άρα κῦμα περιστάθη οῦρεϊ Ισον, | κυρτωθέν, κρύψεν δὲ θεὸν θνητήν τε γυναϊκα.

241-2 The Shield was Hephaistos' work, and so its mention here is particularly suitable (so T). For $\epsilon l\chi\epsilon$ in 242 a minority of MSS read $\epsilon l\alpha$, which is possible.

243-6 'Ex pição is relevant, as this tree has deep roots: hence it carries all the bank with it' (bT). $\delta_1 \omega \theta_0 \tilde{\nu}$ occurs only here in Homer, later in Herodotus etc. $\gamma_0 \tilde{\nu} \rho_0 \omega \sigma_0 \tilde{\nu}$ means 'dammed'. See on 5.87-8, 15.356-7. The fallen tree enables Akhilleus to escape from the water.

246-7 The variant $\lambda \mu \nu \eta_5$ for $\delta \nu \eta_5$ is less suitable in this context, where the river is in motion. In 247 the variant $\pi \epsilon \delta \partial \nu \delta \epsilon$ (A, schol. pap. XII) may have been designed to avoid the genitive $\pi \epsilon \delta \partial \nu \delta \epsilon$ (A, schol. pap. XII) may have been designed to avoid the genitive $\pi \epsilon \delta \partial \nu \delta \epsilon$ (A, schol. pap. XII) may have been designed to avoid the genitive $\pi \epsilon \delta \partial \nu \delta \epsilon$ (A, schol. pap. XII) may have been designed to avoid the genitive $\pi \epsilon \delta \partial \nu \delta \epsilon$ (A, schol. pap. XII) may have been designed to avoid the genitive $\pi \epsilon \delta \partial \nu \delta \epsilon$ (A, schol. pap. XII) may have been designed to avoid the genitive $\pi \epsilon \delta \partial \nu \delta \epsilon$ (A, schol. pap. XII) may have been designed to avoid the genitive $\pi \epsilon \delta \partial \nu \delta \epsilon$ (A, schol. pap. XII) may have been designed to avoid the genitive $\pi \epsilon \delta \partial \nu \delta \epsilon$ (A, schol. pap. XII) may have been designed to avoid the genitive $\pi \epsilon \delta \partial \nu \delta \epsilon$ (A, schol. pap. XII) have been designed to avoid the genitive $\pi \epsilon \delta \partial \nu \delta \epsilon$ (A, schol. Ge 21.256), and schol. pap. XII (Erbse, on 246-7) answers this pedantic charge.

249-50 ἀκροκελαινιόων means 'with darkening crest', a vivid Homeric hapax (cf. Nonnus, D. 18.156) which fills the first hemistich. Cf. 13.799 κυρτά φαληριόωντα. For lva... ἀλάλκοι cf. 137-8, and for μ iν... Ἀχιλλῆα (e.g.) Od. 6.48.

251-64 The river's pursuit of Akhilleus is expressed in two contrasting similes, a short and rapid one describing Akhilleus' flight, and a more leisurely and detailed one for the pursuit.

251-6 This description is similar to that of 22.138-44: 138 Indetons t = 139 - 42 simile of hawk, that of 22.138-44: 138 Indetons t = 139 - 42 simile of hawk, that t = 139 - 42 simile of hawk, the second state t = 139 - 42 simile of hawk, the second state t = 139 - 42 simile of hawk, the second state t = 139 - 42 simile of hawk, the second state t = 139 - 42 simile of hawk, the second state t = 139 - 42 simile of hawk, the second state t = 139 - 42 simile of hawk, the second state t = 139 - 42 simile of hawk, the second state t = 139 - 42 simile of hawk, the second state t = 139 - 42 simile of hawk, the second state t = 139 - 42 simile of hawk, the second state t = 139 - 42 simile of hawk, the second state t = 139 - 42 simile of hawk, the second state t = 139 - 42 simile of hawk, the second state t = 139 - 42 simile of hawk, the second state t = 139 - 42 simile t = 139 - 429 simile t = 139 - 429 simile t = 139

252 δσον τ' έπι δουρός έρωη: for this and similar estimates of distance see on 15.358-9.

252-3 Eagle-similes occur elsewhere at 15.690 (Hektor), 17.674 (Menelaos), 22.308 (Hektor), Od. 24.538 (Odysseus). In all these passages it is the eagle's swoop which is described, except in book 17 where it is primarily its sharp sight. Philetas read $\delta\mu\mu\alpha\tau$ ' for $0\mu\alpha\tau$ ' in 252, and some scholars read $\mu\epsilon\lambda\alpha\nu\delta\sigma\sigma\sigma\sigma$ ('black-eyed'), but cf. $0\mu\eta\sigma\epsilon(\nu)$ 22.140, 22.308 = Od. 24.538, and 16.752 $0\mu\alpha\lambda$ to $\tau\sigma\sigma$ ('black-boned'), apparently relying on Democritus' view that eagles have black bones (68 B 22 D-K)! Aristarchus wanted to read TOV as enclitic for TIVOS, although the Homeric form is TEV. The problem here was the use of the article with $\theta\eta\rho\eta\tau\eta\rho\sigma$, but this can be explained as identifying the type of eagle concerned, 'a dark one, the hunter'. It may be the one described at 24.316 as $\mu\rho\rho\phi\nu\delta\nu$ $\theta\eta\rho\eta\tau\eta\rho'$, $\delta\nu$ Kal TEPKV $\delta\nu$ Kaléousiv, although they are possibly distinguished in Arist. HA 9.32. Cf. A. Ag. 115, Fraenkel ad loc., W. G. Arnott, CQ 29 (1979) 7-8. Ingeniously, Ahrens conjectured $\mu\epsilon\lambda\alpha\nu\delta\rho\sigma\sigma\nu$ for $\mu\epsilon\lambda\alpha\nuos$ TOV, because the eagle in Archilochus 178 (West) is black-tailed.

۰,

253 κάρτιστος: this is echoed in Arist. HA 9.32, 618b26, where the black eagle is said to be κράτιστος. For $\delta \varsigma$ τε ... ὥκιστος πετεηνῶν cf. 15.238 (Apollo compared to a hawk).

254 έπι στήθεσσι ... κονάβιζε: cf. 13.497-8, with comment.

257-64 This is one of Homer's most attractive and lively similes. Part of its effect comes from the contrast between the violent scene of the river-god's pursuit and the peaceful picture of the gardener. Cf. the simile likening the destruction of the Greek wall by Apollo to a child destroying a sand-castle at 15.361-4. The scholia notice the change of style here: 'he moves from the powerful style to the plain and florid' (bT; cf. schol. Ge). Douris of Samos failed to see this, and censured the simile as inappropriate to the scene described (FGH 76.89). Demetrius however singles it out as a model of vividness (ivdpy sia) arising from precise, detailed description (On Style 209). Virgil's admiration is shown by his imitation at G. 1.104-10. There is another agricultural simile at 346-7, where the wind dries a newly watered plot of land, a good contrast with this one.

The remarkably high frequency of hapax legomena adds greatly to the precision of the simile ($\delta\chi\epsilon\tau\eta\gamma\delta\varsigma$, $\mu\delta\kappa\epsilon\lambda\lambda\alpha$, $d\mu\delta\rho\eta$, $\psi\eta\phi l\varsigma$, $\delta\chi\lambda\epsilon iv$, $\pi\rho\alpha\lambda\eta\varsigma$): cf. Richardson in Bremer, HBOP 172-3. $\delta\chi\epsilon\tau\eta\gamma\delta\varsigma$ is rare later, but $\delta\chi\epsilon\tau\delta\varsigma$, $\delta\chi\epsilon\tau\epsilon\delta\epsilon v$ are commoner. For $d\pi\delta\kappa\rho\eta\eta\sigma$, $\mu\epsilon\lambda\alpha\nu\delta\delta\rho\sigma\nu$ cf. 16.160 (with comments on 16.156-63). In 258 $\delta\delta\sigma\tau\tau$ is preferable to the variant $\delta\delta\sigma\tau\sigma\varsigma$. $\mu\delta\kappa\epsilon\lambda\lambda\alpha$ ('mattock') recurs in the fifth century, but cf. Hes. Erga 470 (etc.) $\mu\alpha\kappa\epsilon\lambda\eta$, $d\mu\delta\rho\eta$ ('trench') is doubtful in Sappho fr. 174 L-P and is found in Hellenistic poetry. It survived in Thessalian and crops up now and then in late prose. $\xi\chi\mu\alpha\tau\alpha$ ($4\times$ 11.) means 'impediments' here. $\psi\eta\phi$ ('pebble') recurs in Hipponax (128.3 West) etc.; $\psi\eta\phi\phi\varsigma$ occurs nowhere in archaic literature.

In 261 there is assonance of χ , κ and λ , and $\kappa\epsilon\lambda\alpha\rho\nu\zeta\epsilon\nu\nu$ is onomatopoeic (cf. 11.813, Od. 5.323). $\delta\chi\lambda\epsilon\nu$ recurs in fifth-century literature, but cf. 12.448, Od. 9.242 for $\delta\chi\lambda\zeta\epsilon\nu$. $\pi\rho\alpha\lambda\eta\varsigma$ ('sloping') reappears in Hellenistic poetry, and survived in Cypriote, Arcadian and Laconian. For $\phi\theta\alpha\nu\epsilon\nu$ with α cf. 9.506, 10.346.

264 Ocol ... avopow: this gnomic hemistich, which only occurs here, neatly rounds off the comparison. Such aphorisms are more usually expressed by characters in the poem than by the narrator (cf. vol. v, Introduction, p. 6).

265-98 Akhilleus' inability to resist leads him to complain to Zeus, and Poseidon and Athene encourage him.

265-71 For boodkt b' opphosie ... rooodkt $\mu \nu \dots$ cf. 22.194-7. In 266-7 Akhilleus has the impression that all the gods are against him. For burnertos morapoio see on 16.174. In 269 $\pi\lambda$ dZe means 'struck', apparently the basic sense of the verb (Chantraine, Dict. s.v.); cf. 12.285, Od. 5.389, and see on 17.750-1. In all four passages the verb is used in connexion with water. In 268-71 the river seems at one moment to be pounding Akhilleus' shoulders, whilst at another its current undermines his legs. $\nu\pi$ tpente ('eat away from below', 'undercut') is a vivid compound found only here and in Quintus of Smyrna (9.377).

272–83 Akhilleus' complaint to Zeus is not untypical of the disappointed Homeric hero: cf. 3.365 (Menelaos), 8.236 (Agamemnon), 12.164 (Asios), 13.631 (Menelaos), all beginning Zeũ πάτερ ... But Akhilleus' protest also reveals his greatness: it is not death he fears, but an ignoble death. Cf. the famous prayer of Aias at 17.645-7, that the Greeks may perish at least in the daylight (bT ad loc., [Longinus] 9.10, and bT 21.273, 21.276, 21.279).

273-4 $\omega_5 \ldots \sigma \alpha \tilde{\omega} \sigma \alpha i$ means 'to think that not one of the gods has undertaken to rescue me, pitiful as I am'. The complex word-order may be due to the tendency of pronouns to come early in the sentence (see on 347). Emeira $\ldots \pi \alpha \delta \sigma \omega i$ implies 'if I escape I should not mind dying later'.

276-8 Akhilleus' disappointment suggests that Thetis' prophecy of a heroic death had consoled him (see on 113). In II. θέλγειν and related words are only used of the gods (12.255, 14.215, 15.322, 15.594, 21.604, 24.343). Verse 278 is a powerful four-word one, framed by λαιψηροΐς ... βελέεσσιν, to describe his death.

279-30 'Not just death in battle, but at the hands of the best of the enemy, is his wish' (bT). For $\delta_5 \dots \delta_{100705}$ cf. 23.348. The vulgate reading $\tau \epsilon \tau \rho \alpha \phi'$ (for $\gamma' \epsilon \tau \rho \alpha \phi'$) is found only here and as a variant at 23.348, whereas $\epsilon \tau \rho \alpha \phi \sigma \sigma$ as intransitive is regular in Homer. Verses 277-80 are echoed by Sophocles (Ph. 334-6):

- ΝΕ. τέθνηκεν, άνδρὸς οὐδένος, θεοῦ δ' ὑπο, τοξευτός, ὡς λέγουσιν, ἐκ Φοίβου δαμείς.
- Φί. άλλ' εύγενής μέν ό κτανών τε χώ θανών.

281-3 Verse 281 = Od. 5.312, at the end of a speech in which Odysseus fears an unheroic death at sea and wishes he had died at Troy, where he would have won fame and received proper burial (cf. A. B. Lord, The Singer of Tales, Cambridge, Mass. 1960, 196-7, and Usener, Verhältnis der Odyssee zur Ilias 141-7 for comparison of these two scenes). Virgil's Aeneas echoes them both (Aen. 1.94-101). In 282 $\ell p \chi \theta \ell v \pi \alpha$ means 'trapped'. $\omega_5 \pi \alpha \delta \alpha$ oupoppov stresses the pathetic and dishonourable nature of this fate. oupoppos only occurs here in Il., $7 \times Od$. For $\ell v \alpha v \lambda o_5$ ('torrent-bed') see on 16.70-1, and for $\alpha \pi o \ell p \sigma \eta$ of water sweeping someone away cf. 329, 6.348.

۰,

t

284-6 It is unusual for gods to appear together to encourage a hero. Their failure to do much more than give encouragement was explained by Aristotle as due to the fact that it was Hephaistos who was Skamandros' opponent (schol. pap. XII (Erbse) on 286; cf. bT on 288-91). However, Athene does in fact give Akhilleus the strength to resist the river-god (299-304).

285 It is also unusual in the lliad for the human form taken by a deity to be so unspecific. Cf. 13.357, where Poseidon particularly wants to remain anonymous. At 213 the river wishes Akhilleus to know who he is, and presumably the same applies here.

χειρί δὲ χεῖρα λαβόντες: this phrase occurs only here for the usual formula with a singular verb, ἐν δ' ἄρα οἱ φῦ χειρί. Cf. 6.233 χεῖράς τ' άλλήλων λαβέτην καὶ πιστώσαντο.

287 roïon: unless this is a careless use of a formula, it presumably means 'among them' (cf. Od. 5.202, 7.47). But the verse could be a later addition (see on 290-2, 298).

Gods and other visionary personages commonly say 'be not afraid'. Cf. 24.153-4, 24.171-4 with comments, and for unter ti topsei also Od. 7.50-1.

389 έπιταρρόθω: cf. 5.808 τοίη ol έγών έπιτάρροθος ήα (~ 828), etc., and 4.390 τοίη ol έπίρροθος ήεν Άθήνη, etc. The derivation of έπιτάρροθος is unknown; see on 4.389-90.

290-2 Aristarchus athetized 290 because Poseidon does not give his own name, although he had taken the form of a man, and so Akhilleus could not know his identity (Arn/A). It is certainly true that when a god reveals himself as such he normally does give his name (see Richardson on HyDem 268). Schol. pap. XII (Erbse) adds that on his departure Poseidon does not encourage Akhilleus by any clear sign, and Skamandros' violence does not abate (305-6). Seleucus defended the verse in a work Kortà Tŵv 'Apiortápxou σημείων, pointing out that Poseidon and Athene had already indicated their divinity by their pledge of greeting and by verse 289; and he also answered a criticism of Zηνός Εποινήσαντος on the grounds that Zeus had not sent them, by saying that this could be taken for granted (κοτά τὸ σιωπώμενον). It comes as a surprise, therefore, to learn that in another work (Διορθωτικά) Seleucus athetized 290-2! These verses were not in the Cretan edition (schol. pap. XII (Erbse)).

Znuds Emainformation may simply refer to Zeus's permission to the gods to intervene in the battle. But 292 is a weak verse: $\lambda\omega\phi\bar{\alpha}v$ on its own (without genitive or participle) is odd, and the verb otherwise only occurs in Homer at Od. 9.460 ($\lambda\omega\phi\eta\sigma$ ese kakāv); and où de elosal autos is rather pointless. All three verses may be a later addition. In this case, 287 might also have been added. Cf. Bolling, External Evidence 189-90. Apthorp however defends the verses (MS Evidence 77-8).

•

t

- • 、

293 αί κε πίθηαι: cf. 1.207 with comment (Athene to Akhilleus), Od. 1.279 (Athene in disguise to Telemakhos) σοί δ' αὐτῷ πυκινῶς ὑποθήσομαι, αί κε πίθηαι.

295–7 'l λ_1 ó ϕ_1 : the 'only example of $-\phi_1$ from a proper name and equivalent to pure gen. without local reference' (Shipp, Studies 307). On these forms cf. Chantraine, GH 1 238–9. The poet could have used 'l λ_1 ou (or 'l λ_1 oo?) as at 104. ÖS KE ϕ_1 Yn01 means 'whoever of the army escapes'. For δ_1 δ_0 μεν δ_2 τοι εύχος άρξοθαι cf. the variant at 2.15 δ_1 δ_0 μεν δ_2 οι εύχος άρξοθαι.

298 Only Poseidon has spoken, unless we omit 287 and 290, but in itself this is not a serious objection. Cf. 10.349, where Didymus quoted 298 in support.

299-304 The gods' intervention enables Akhilleus to hold his own against Skamandros for the time being. There follows a brief, vivid picture of the flooded plain, with weapons and corpses floating everywhere, and Akhilleus in the midst.

301–2 Cf. A. Ag. 659–60 δρώμεν άνθοῦν πέλαγος Alγαῖον νεκροῖς | άνδρῶν 'Αχαιῶν ναυτικοῖς τ' ἐρειπίοις, and Virgil, Aen. 1.100–1 ubi tot Simois correpta sub undis | scuta virum galeasque et fortia corpora volvit. For δαϊκταμένων αίζηῶν cf. 146.

302-4 For $\tau o \tilde{v} \delta' \dots \ell \pi \eta \delta \alpha$ cf. 269 $\delta \delta' \dot{v} \psi \delta \sigma \tau$ mosoiv $\ell \pi \eta \delta \alpha$, with you'var' $\ell \delta \dot{\alpha} \mu v \alpha$ at the end of 270. $\pi \rho \delta_0 \delta' \delta' \cdots \delta v'$ low means 'as he rushed straight on against the current'. This need not mean that Akhilleus is going 'upstream', but rather that he holds his footing against the current. For $\delta v' \ lov cf. Od. 8.377$, where the sense is 'straight upwards' (cf. Hainsworth). $\delta \chi \epsilon v$ ('checked') is read by Aristarchus and a few of our MSS, against the vulgate $\delta \chi \epsilon v$, and is clearly the more precise word here. The second hemistich of 304 picks up 299, rounding off this passage about Akhilleus' response.

305-27 Skamandros appeals again, this time to Simoeis. Once more nothing comes of this (cf. Eust. 1237.47, and see on 229-32); but it gives the opportunity for a magnificent speech, which characterizes the rivergod. As at 233-50 enjambment is frequent, with emphatic runover words. At 312-15 there is a series of vivid verses with a sense-pause at the caesura, as Skamandros gives a list of urgent instructions to his brother (see also detailed comments on 311-15). At 316-23 he threatens Akhilleus with a new form of burial, in a picturesque description which echoes the ironic theme of Akhilleus' own treatment of Lukaon and Asteropaios (122-35, 200-4), and is similar to the type of mocking speech made by a successful warrior over his opponent (cf. Scheibner, Aufbau 99 n. 2).

۰.

305-7 For 305 cf. 248 oùbé t' $\ell\lambda\eta\gamma\epsilon$ beds $\mu\ell\gamma\sigma\varsigma$, and for $\lambda\eta\gamma\epsilon\nu\mu\ell\nu\sigma\varsigma$ see on 13.424. Kópusse dé kũµa means 'reared up his crested wave'; cf. 4.424 πόντω μέν τε πρῶτα κορύσσεται (with comment), etc. The use of the active here may be a secondary development; cf. 2.273 πόλεμόν τε κορύσσων, Leumann, HW 210. For the river Simoeis see on 5.773-4, where the confluence of the two rivers is mentioned.

310 For κατά μόθον in this position cf. 18.159, 18.537.

311-12 The rhythm of $d\lambda\lambda^2$ επάμυνε τάχιστα marks the urgency. δροθύνειν is normally used of rousing persons in the lliad; cf. Od. 5.292 πάσας δ' δρόθυνεν άέλλας.

313-15 loth is imperative singular, like $\delta \alpha i \nu u$ (9.70). The opening spondaic word, the lengthening of δt and the simplicity of $\mu t \gamma \alpha \kappa \tilde{\nu} \mu \alpha$ all contribute to the impression of a single, towering wave. The onomatopoeia and assonance of $\delta \rho \nu \mu \alpha \gamma \delta \delta \nu$ down are effective, as also the parallelism of $\delta \rho \delta \theta \nu \nu \omega \cdots \delta \rho \nu \mu \alpha \gamma \delta \delta \nu \cdots$. The heavy, spondaic phrase $\phi_{1T} \rho \tilde{\omega} \nu \kappa \alpha \lambda \alpha \tilde{\omega} \nu$ recurs at 12.29, where Poseidon destroys the Greek wall. The indefinite expression $\delta \gamma \rho \nu \omega \kappa \delta \rho \alpha$ is probably derogatory as at 8.96 (see on 22.38). For $\delta s \delta \eta$ $\nu \tilde{\nu} \nu \kappa \rho \alpha \tau t \epsilon i$ cf. 5.175, 16.424 | $\delta \sigma \tau i s \delta \delta \epsilon \kappa \rho \alpha \tau t \epsilon i \ldots$, and for $\mu t \mu \rho \nu \epsilon \nu \delta' \delta \gamma \epsilon I \sigma \alpha \theta \epsilon \rho \delta \sigma i c f. 5.440-1 \mu \eta \delta t \theta \epsilon \rho \delta \sigma \nu i \ell \delta \epsilon \phi \rho \rho \nu t \epsilon \nu$.

316–17 'He has excellently listed all the attributes on which Akhilleus especially prided himself, his courage, appearance, and armour' (bT). Cf. 3.54–5 oux av toi xpaloun kibapis tá te bãp' 'Appobitns, | ñ te koun tó te eldos, ôt' èv kovinoi miyeins. Tá teúxea kalá means 'those arms of his, fine as they are'. veióbi occurs only here in Homer; cf. Hes. Th. 567 etc., and ll. 10.10 veióbev.

317-18 The arms lying in the mud of the river bed make a memorable picture, which contrasts with the flotsam of armour at 300-1. Cf. Clarence's dream of drowning in Richard III (Act 1 Sc. 1V 24-33):

Methought I saw a thousand fearful wracks; A thousand men that fishes gnaw'd upon; Wedges of gold, great anchors, heaps of pearl, Inestimable stones, unvalu'd jewels, All scatter'd in the bottom of the sea. Some lay in dead men's skulls; and in those holes Where eyes did once inhabit, there were crept, As 'twere in scorn of eyes, reflecting gems, That woo'd the slimy bottom of the deep, And mock'd the dead bones that lay scatter'd by.

•

- • 、

318-19 The sound-patterns are noticed by T (319): strong repetition of κ in 318, and of σ and χ in 319 (silt and shingle silently sweeping over the bones). Duty ('mud', 'slime') is a Homeric hapax (cf. Hdt. 2.7, etc.).

329 είλύσω ψαμάθοισιν: instead of the usual winding-sheet his body will be wrapped in sand. Cf. Od. 14.135-6 ή τόν γ' εν πόντω φάγον ίχθύ ς, όστέα δ' αύτοῦ | κεῖται ἐπ' ήπείρου ψαμάθω είλυμένα πολλη.

This is the only example in Homer of $\epsilon l\lambda \dot{\omega}$ in the active (cf. Aratus 432). It is probably a secondary formation from the perfect passive $\epsilon l\lambda \dot{\omega} \omega$ (Chantraine, GH 1 131, 442). The variant $l\lambda \dot{\omega} \omega$ (I will slime him down with sand', Leaf) does not occur in surviving literature. The assonance of $l\lambda \dot{\omega} \sigma \ldots \epsilon l\lambda \dot{\omega} \omega$ is effective.

χέραδος is another Homeric hapax; cf. Sappho 145, Alcaeus 344 L-P etc. It means either 'shingle' or else all the rubbish and silt collected in the river-bed. The variant σχέραδος was supported by πολυσχέραδος in Euphorion fr. 25 Powell (schol. Ge), but χέραδος (neuter) is the regular form. It is probably related to χέρμας ('stone') and perhaps also χαράδρα ('ravine'); cf. Chantraine, Dict. s.v.

320-1 Cf. the collecting of the bones after Patroklos' and Hektor's funerals at 23.252-3, 24.792-4; $\delta\lambda\lambda\epsilon\gamma\sigma\nu$ is used in this context at 23.253. $\delta\sigma\varsigma$ is another rare word for silt, only here in Homer. Cf. Nicander, Th. 176, Charito 2.2, and $\delta\sigma\omega\delta\eta\varsigma$ A. Supp. 31. This great heap of silt will be Akhilleus' burial-mound!

323 $\tau \nu \mu \beta 0 \chi \delta \eta s$: this (genitive of $\tau \nu \mu \beta 0 \chi \delta \eta$) is the reading of Crates, whereas Aristarchus (Arn/A) read $\tau \nu \mu \beta 0 \chi \delta \eta \sigma (\alpha i)$, the aorist of $\tau \nu \mu \beta 0 \chi \delta \epsilon \tilde{i} v$, which occurs at Hdt. 7.117 and elsewhere. For $\chi \rho \epsilon \omega \mu \nu \ell \sigma \tau \alpha i$ with genitive cf. 9.75 etc. The aorist infinitive is not elided elsewhere, and $\tau \nu \mu \beta 0 \chi \delta \eta \sigma \alpha i$ $\mu \nu$ would be a very awkward expression (cf. Leaf). $\tau \nu \mu \beta 0 \chi \delta \eta$ occurs nowhere else, but cf. A. Th. 1022 $\tau \nu \mu \beta 0 \chi \delta 0 \varsigma$, S. Ant. 848 $\tau \nu \mu \beta \delta \chi \omega \sigma \tau \varsigma$.

324-7 This is really the climax of the episode so far, as the river-god raises himself aloft in a single towering wave, 'seething with foam and blood and corpses'. The incongruity is like that in James Elroy Flecker's poem The Old Ships:

Who knows how oft with squat and noisy gun ... The pirate Genoese Hell-raked them till they rolled Blood, water, fruit and corpses up the hold.

κυκώμενος ... θύων ... μορμύρων ἀφρῷ ... πορφύρεον all contribute to the idea of a seething, boiling wave. μορμύρειν is onomatopoeic, and always used elsewhere in the formula ἀφρῷ μορμύρων -οντα (18.403, 5.599). πορφύρεον can be translated here 'heaving', or 'surging': cf. 1.482, Od. 2.428, 11.243, and πορφύρειν, with Chantraine, Di t. s.v. For πορφύρεον

• .

... ἀειρόμενον cf. Od. 11.243-4 (quoted in comment on 240). κατά δ' ήρεε Πηλείωνα means 'and he began to overpower the son of Peleus'.

328-82 Here asks Hephaistos to burn up the plain and the river, and he does so, until Skamandros asks him to stop, and promises Here not to help the Trojans any more. She agrees, and Hephaistos desists Hephaistos' attack on Skamandros was anticipated at 20.36 and 40, and 73-4 (if those verses are original), and it leads in turn to the battle between the other gods (21.383-514). For later interpreters this opposition of fire and water gave a starting-point for cosmic interpretations of the Theomachy (cf. Buffière, Mythes d' Homère 100ff.). Hephaistos has a Trojan priest at 5.9-10, but is named among pro-Greek gods at 15.214. Herē is closely associated with her son here, as (for example) in 1.571-600.

331 κυλλοπόδιον: 'little club-foot'; see on 18.369-71. Aristarchus (Arn/A) considered the epithet inappropriate here, but it is possible that he did not actually athetize the verse (cf. Erbse ad loc.). Plutarch (Mor. 35c) points out that in Homer such an address is not a reproach: evidently the epithet was defended by some as a sign of familiarity.

331-2 $\alpha v \tau \alpha \dots \epsilon l v \alpha :$ 'for it was against you, as we supposed, that swirling Xanthos was matched in battle'. This refers back to the pairing of these two gods at 20.73-4 (cf. $\alpha v \tau \alpha \dots$ at 73).

333 άλλ' ἐπάμυνε τάχιστα: the repetition of this from 311 stresses the opposition of water and fire, and the fact that Here's appeal answers that of Skamandros to his brother.

πιφαύσκεο δέ φλόγα πολλήν: note the strong plosive alliteration. For πιφαύσκεσθαι ('manifest') cf. 12.280, of snow sent by Zeus. It is an unusual word to apply to the elements, suggesting their divine or portentous nature.

334-5 Violent winds or storms in Homer are often seen as the result of more than one wind blowing at once: 2.145, 9.5, 11.306-7, 16.765, 23.194-230, Od. 5.295-6, 5.331-2. apyeorão Nóroio refers to a south wind which clears the sky of clouds; cf. 11.306. eloopai ('I shall hasten'), is from Iepai; cf. Chantraine, GH 1 293, 412. Zenodotus took it as 'I shall know', reading opoaoa, and η in 336. $\xi \delta \lambda \delta \delta \epsilon v$ occurs nowhere else.

336-7 άπό ... κήσι is a tresis and κήσι optative. φλέγμα occurs only here in early Greek literature. Later it is nearly always used in a medical sense (Hdt. 4.187, Hippocrates, etc.).

338 $\frac{1}{2}$ $\frac{1}{2}$

341-2 ἀκάματον πῦρ ... θεσπιδαές πῦρ: note the elegant variation of

•

t

- • 、

formulae. They serve different functions, after a consonant or a vowel, and σ_{xiy} geomodely would be unattractive.

343-56 The theme of 'burning' is emphasized by the constant repetitions throughout this passage: $343 \dots \pi \bar{\nu} \rho$ δαίετο, καϊε δέ νεκρούς ..., $345 \pi \bar{\alpha} \nu \delta'$ έξηράνθη πεδίου ..., $347 \dots \dot{\alpha} \gamma$ ξηράνη ..., $348 \bar{\omega}_5$ έξηράνθη πεδίου παν, κάδ δ' άρα νεκρούς, $349 \kappa \bar{\eta} \epsilon \nu \dots \phi \lambda \dot{\delta} \gamma \alpha \pi \alpha \mu \phi \alpha \nu \dot{\delta} \omega \sigma \alpha \nu$, $350 \kappa \alpha i \omega \tau \sigma \dots$, $351 \kappa \alpha i \epsilon \tau \sigma \delta^2 \dots Cf.$ also $353 \tau \epsilon i \rho \sigma \nu \tau' \dots$, $355 \tau \epsilon i \rho \dot{\delta} \mu \nu \nu \sigma \dots$. There is a good deal of assonance and alliteration throughout. The two passages describing the burning of the plain and the river are balanced (343-9 and 350-6, with transitional sentence at 349; see also on 350-6). The whole episode brilliantly describes the gradual, inexorable spread of the blaze, until it finally attacks the river-god himself.

343-4 $\pi\rho\omega\tau\alpha\mu\nu$ is not answered until 349. The scholia here (and at 365) raise the question why Akhilleus was not affected by the fire, and compare the way in which Skamandros kept the Trojans in his waters without their coming to harm (238-9).

344 = 236. cútóv is masculine, and at 236 refers to the river, whereas here it ought to refer to the neuter million. The verse could be an example of careless repetition by the poet, or a later expansion.

345-9 For the simile, again drawn from the peaceful and orderly life of the farmer, see on 257-64. Again there is a high proportion of unusual words: both $\xi\eta\rho\alpha(vev)$ and $d\gamma\xi\eta\rho\alpha(vev)$, though common later, occur only here in Homer, veoapôn's nowhere else; $i\theta\epsilon(\rho ev)$ is virtually unique ($i\theta\epsilon(\rho ev)$ Orph. Arg. 932). Hesychius explains $i\theta\epsilon(\rho ev)$ with $i\pi\epsilon(\mu\epsilon)\epsilon(\sigma)$, $d\xi(\omega ev)$, but the derivation is unknown. If it is related to $i\theta\epsilon(\rho a ev)$ the sense 'comb', 'rake' would be reasonable. $d\lambda\omega\eta$ can be used of any piece of cultivated land or of a threshing-floor, and it is not clear exactly what the agricultural process involved here is supposed to be.

346 For ώς δ' ότ' όπωρινός Bopins cf. Od. 5.328, in a simile of chaff being blown about. νεοαρδία means 'freshly watered'.

It is interesting to find $\mu\nu$ outside the relative clause, when $\delta_5 \tau_{15} \mu\nu$ would have been possible. Enclitic pronouns tend to come in second place in the sentence, or as near the opening as possible: cf. Wackernagel, Kleine Schriften 1 1-103, especially 3-4.

350-6 Hephaistos' effect on the river is expressed in two balanced sentences of three verses each (350-2, 353-5), with a third single-verse sentence describing the burning of the river itself. Note the emphatic position of kalovto ... kaleto ... telpovt' ... kaleto (cf. kñev 349), and the careful parallelism of 350 with 351, and of 352 with 354 (which incidentally helps to explain the use of tá as a heavy syllable at the beginning of 352).

•

350-1 The trees are elm, willow, tamarisk; the plants celandine (?), reeds, galingale (for $\lambda\omega\tau\delta\varsigma$ see on 14.347-8). On the realism of this description of the banks of Skamandros see Leaf, Troy 10: 'Today the river-channel through the plain is marked by the line of low willows and elm bushes ... and the tamarisks spread from the banks in thick copses, making with their young shoots at the end of April conspicuous patches of dull crimson.'

350 πτελέαι τε και Ιτέαι: Leaf reads simply και (for τε και), with one MS, because the digamma of Iτέαι is observed at Od. 10.510. But one should not expect consistency over this point in Homer.

351 Cf. Od. 4.603 \clubsuit Evl µEv $\lambda\omega\tau\delta\varsigma$ πολύς, Ev δè κύπειρον. Θρύον occurs as the name of a place by the Alpheios at 2.592, HyAp 423 (cf. II. 11.711 Θρυδεσσα). It is not certain which plant is referred to here as $\lambda\omega\tau\delta\varsigma$, celandine, trefoil, and clover all being suggested (see on 14.348).

352 τα περl ...: see on 3.355-60, and Chantraine, GH 1 103.

353 rtipovτ': 'were troubled', 'were distressed'; it is always a strong word in Homer and later. For εγχέλυές τε και Ιχθύες cf. 203. Athenaeus (299D) says that the eels show how deep down the fire has reached, as they live in the slime of the river-bed. of κατά δίνας is like 11.535, 20.500 al περί δίφρον.

354 $\kappa \nu \beta i \sigma \tau \omega \nu$: 'one could not find a more expressive word' (bT). The alliteration of kappa in this verse underscores the verb.

355 πολυμήτιος 'Ηφαίστοιο: this is the only place in Homer where πολύμητις is used not of Odysseus, and in the nominative ($18 \times 11., 68 \times 0d$.). Cf. 367 'Ηφαίστοιο βίηφι πολύφρονος, Od. 8.297, 8.327 πολύφρονος 'Ηφαίστοιο; II. 1.571 'Ηφαιστος κλυτοτέχνης, 1.608 etc. 'Ηφαιστος ... Ιδυίησι πραπίδεσσι. The four-word verse effectively closes this part of the description. For its structure cf. 363.

356 καίετο δ' ls ποταμοΐο: this is not exactly a periphrastic use of ls, as the river's strength is really being burned away. Cf. 23.720 κρατερή δ' έχεν is 'Οδυση̄οs, and is άνέμου -010 2× 11., 3× Od. The digamma of is is usually observed (at least 2× 11., 8× Od.), but cf. 17.739 for another neglect (Chantraine, GH t 143).

357 The verb avrigepizer recurs at 488. At 411 Isogapizers/avrigepizers are variants (and at 357 Isogepizer occurs in some MSS). Cf. avrigepisson 1.589, 21.482, Od. 16.238.

358 σοl y' ... φλεγέθοντι: 'against you, blazing thus with fire'.

359-60 Skamandros seems to say 'as long as you stop, then for all I care, he can drive the Trojans out straight away, and put an end to Troy'. For the river-god's indifference to Troy's fate cf. 373-6. The possibility that the Trojans may desert the city is envisaged at 22.381-4. Ti uoi ... $d\rho\omega\gamma\eta\varsigma$; means 'What (share) do I have in combat and aid?'

36x φη occurs only here in Homer for 'he spoke', instead of η. ἀνἀ δ' ξφλυε ('bubbled up') is a vivid expression which anticipates the simile. The compound occurs only here and in a papyrus fragment of prose, the simple verb first in Aeschylus.

362-5 Another simile from daily life, and again one of Homer's more unusual comparisons. It describes lard being melted in a cooking pot. Cf. Od. 12.237-8 (Kharubdis compared to a boiling cauldron); 20.25-30 (Odysseus tossing like a roasting paunch full of fat and blood). For the unusual language and sound-effects see on 363-4.

362 ώς δὲ λέβης ... πυρί πολλῷ: cf. Od. 12.237 λέβης ὡς ἐν πυρί πολλῷ. ζεῖ could originally have been ζέει; cf. 11.554 τρεῖ.

363 μ λ δ ϵ ν does not occur again until Hellenistic poetry, and $d\pi\alpha\lambda\sigma\tau\rho\epsilon\phi\eta$ s only in a second-century A.D. verse inscription. μ $\lambda\delta\epsilon\nu$ (cf. 'melt'; $d\mu\alpha\lambda\delta$ $\dot{\nu}\nu\omega$?) was ousted in common Greek by $\tau\eta\kappa\epsilon\nu$. There was a protracted debate in antiquity about the reading of the first two words of this verse, and $\kappa\nu$ $\sigma\eta\nu$ $\mu\epsilon\lambda\delta\delta\mu\epsilon\nu\sigma$ s represents the view of Aristarchus (Arn/A) and others. $\mu\epsilon\lambda\delta\delta\mu\epsilon\nu\sigma$ s is then middle, agreeing with λ $\epsilon\beta\eta$ s. Among several alternatives $\kappa\nu$ $\sigma\eta$ $\mu\epsilon\lambda\delta\sigma\mu$ $\epsilon\nu\sigma$ (Crates and others) is possible. It was suggested in antiquity that the original reading might have been MEA Δ OMENO, i.e. $\mu\epsilon\lambda\delta\phi\mu\epsilon\nu\sigma$, For this theory cf. Chantraine, GH t 5ff. and R. Janko in vol. rv, Introduction, pp. 34-7.

This is an impressive four-word verse, with opening spondaic word followed by three polysyllabic words, in which the repeated nasals, liquids and sibilants may suggest the sizzling of fat in the cauldron. If so, Aristarchus' reading has a further advantage thereby. The stately character of the verse contrasts piquantly with its homely subject.

364 ἀμβολάδην ('bubbling up') again occurs only here and at HyHerm 426 in early epic. Once more, note the effect of the liquid and nasals, in contrast to the dry, crackling consonants of ὑπὸ δὲ ξύλα κάγκανα κεῖται. κάγκανος occurs only here in II.; cf. ξύλα κάγκανα Od. 18.308, κάγκανα κᾶλα HyHerm 112.

365 $\pi u \rho l \phi \lambda \epsilon \gamma \epsilon \tau o$, $\zeta \delta \epsilon \delta' \delta \delta \omega \rho$: an awkward, uneven rhythm for the verse-ending, describing the water's turmoil. $\zeta \delta \epsilon$ picks up $\zeta \epsilon \epsilon$ (362), as often in the similes, and the whole verse recapitulates 361, rounding off the passage.

366-7 005' Elest moople w means 'he had no mind to flow on' (Leaf). For τεϊρε ... πολύφρονος cf. 355. In 367 Leaf takes βίηφι as a genitive (cf. 295), but one could take α̈υτμή on its own, and 'Ηφαίστοιο βίηφι as 'through the might of Hephaistos'.

۰.

368-76 The river's appeal to Hephaistos has no effect, and he makes an even more urgent protest to Here.

368 Cf. Od. 22.311 etc. καί μιν λισσόμενος έπεα πτερόεντα προσηύδα.

369 Eudo poor Expose whom probably means thas attacked my stream, so as to vex it'. Cf. Od. 21.68-9 of tobe $\delta \bar{\omega} \mu \alpha$ | Exposet' Eobsteiner was minipute.

379 ξ άλλων: i.e. me above all other allies of Troy. For où ... αἴτιός εἰμι cf. 19.86 εγώ δ' οὐκ αἴτιός εἰμι ...

372 Eyώv άποπαύσομαι: pap. 12 (3rd cent. B.C.) reads Eyώ λήξω (or λ ήyω) μένος, thus avoiding repetition with 373, but such repetition with variation is a common device of emphasis.

373-6 Here, as elsewhere in the poem, Homer looks forward beyond the bounds of his work, to Troy's destruction. Skamandros' defeat has eliminated a major defender of the city (cf. Whitman, HHT 272). This kind of bargaining reminds us of the dreadful pact struck between Zeus and Here at 4.25-67, and the scene between Zeus and Poseidon at 7.443-64 (cf. 12.10-35).

374-6 These verses repeat 20.315-17 (see comment). There, however, the oath was sworn by the gods who were Troy's worst enemies. The majority of MSS have δαιομένη, δαίωσι at 20.317 (actually read by Leaf there, but unlikely to be right), whereas this occurs in a minority at 21.376. δάηται | καιομένη, καίωσι δ' is again emphatic repetition.

377-8a This echoes 328-42 at the beginning of the episode (330 = 378, $331 \sim 379$, $342 \sim 381$), thus rounding it off effectively. Here had anticipated this moment already (340-1).

377-8 At 377 pap. 12 gives as variants bed heukishevos "Hon and bowmis motivia "Hon, and at 378 it offers two alternative verses: autika meisixloiou moognuba paloimov ulov (cf. 6.214; 6.144, 21.97), and autik' dp'] "Hoaistov moosepisses on [epxometin mep.

379 τέκνον άγακλε ς: 'the epithet is appropriate to Hephaistos' victory' (bT). Cf. 17.716 άγακλείς ὥ Μενέλαε, and άγακλήος of heroes at 16.738, 23.529 (16.571 'Aγακλήος).

379-80 où yàp ŁOIKEV ... στυφελίζειν: cf. Skamandros' impatient question at 360. This view is repeated with greater eloquence by Apollo at 462-7, and the same theme has occurred at 1.573-6 and 8.427-31. Hephaistos' intervention was necessary, but it is nevertheless undignified for him 'to jostle (στυφελίζειν) an immortal god in this way for the sake of mortals'. άθάνστον θεόν ... βροτών are in contrast as often.

382 'And backward rolled the wave along the lovely streams': a quiet close to this violent scene. Karaoreveotal recurs only in late epic (Quintus of Smyrna 4.270, Nonnus, D. 5.353). Pap. 12 apparently read κατέσχετο, and this recurs in a few MSS; κατέσσυτο may have been found obscure. After 382 it adds the verse κάρ ρόον, ή το πάροιθεν lei καλλίρροον ύδωρ.

• 1

383-513 The other gods fight. Ares attacks Athene, who knocks him out with a stone. Aphrodite rescues him, but Athene, encouraged by Here, knocks her flat as well. Posei on invites Apollo to fight, reminding him of Laome on's treachery to them, b t Apollo declines. Artemis reproaches him, and Here abuses her and boxes her ears. Hermes refuses to fight Leto. Artemis goes to Zeus and complains about Here's treatment of her

This episode picks up and at the same time rounds off those passages at 20.33-40 and 67-74 where the gods are paired against each other, thereby providing a frame to the intervening scenes. Here Aphrodite, mentioned at 20.40, is introduced as an extra victim of Athene, together with Ares. That association reminds us of book 5, where Diomedes wounds both with Athene's help (311-430, 793-909). Artemis' complaint to Zeus also resembles 5.370-415, where Aphrodite goes to her mother Dione for consolation, and 5.868-87, where Ares complains to Zeus.

The opening section of the Theomachy (20.1-74) suggested a conflict on the cosmic scale, affecting all levels of the universe (especially 56-66): it won the praise of Longinus for its sublimity (9.6). The episode in book 21 has seemed to many a terrible anticlimax after this grandiose prologue, and all the more so after the battle with the River. 'The Theomachy is one of the very few passages in the lliad which can be pronounced poetically bad', declared Leaf categorically (Introduction to book 21).

From one point of view the episode is the culmination of the process earlier in the Book whereby the gods were drawn progressively further into the conflict. In a more significant way, however, it provides an essential respite, between the intense scenes preceding it and the real climax of Akhilleus' combat with Hektor (to which 520-611 are simply the prelude). One can, if one wishes, speak here of 'comic relief', as with the divine scenes in books 5 and 14, and certainly the contrast between the frivolity of the gods' squabbles here and the deadly earnest of the mortal conflicts could hardly be more acute. But more important functions of this episode can be defined: it emphasizes the vast gulf between mortal and immortal concerns, and throws into even greater relief the tragedy of events on earth (cf. Griffin, HLD, esp. 179-204; Reinhardt, IuD 446-50). It is surely also a significant point that this episode symbolizes the almost total collapse of the pro-Trojan forces in heaven, and so foreshadows Troy's fall (cf. 428-33, 516-17, 522-5, 583-9). Only Apollo remains free to act, in order to postpone the time of doom for the city.

The structure of the episode is worth attention:

- Herē checks Hephaistos. Zeus laughs at the sight of the other 383-90 gods fighting
- 391-415 Ares defeated by Athene 416-34 Aphrodite knocked out by Athene (comic)
- Apollo refuses to fight Poseidon (serious) 435-69
- 470-96 Artemis beaten by Here
- 497-504 Hermes refuses to fight Leto (comic)
- Artemis complains to Zeus about Here, and he laughs at the 505-15 sight of her.

The laughter of Zeus on Olumpos frames the whole episode. In 391-434 the Ares and Aphrodite scenes are clearly parallel. The Aphrodite scene is also echoed by the Artemis one, but this is contrasted with the important exchange between Apollo and Poseidon, which forms the central panel of the episode (see on 435-69), and this in turn makes a good contrast with the lighter scene in which Hermes declines to fight with Leto. Thus all the episodes in the conflict are linked in a series of interlocking pairs.

383-4 These transitional verses seem to add little to what has already been said.

385 Ερις... βεβριθνία: 'momentous conflict'. Cf. the metaphorical use of Bolotiv to mean 'be preponderant', 'be mighty', at 12.346 etc.

386 δlyα... άητο ('blew in different directions' like contrary winds): an appropriate expression for $\theta \nu \mu \phi_5$, if this originally refers to a 'breath-spirit'. This may well be an echo of 20.32, where the gods go to war, Sixa θυμόν EXOVTES.

387–8 A 'tricolon crescendo' to describe the cosmic sound effects. Note the staccato rhythm of the four opening dactyls in 387, and the heavy spondaic ending with final monosyllable. Verse 387 resembles 9, and here too in μεγάλω πατάγω βράχε δ' εύρεῖα χθών sound echoes sense. Cf. the grandiose sound effects in the prologue to the Theomachy, at 20.47-53 and 20.56-66. For maray most MSS have the commoner but less vivid word όμάδω, but two papyri support πατάγω.

388 άμφι δε σάλπιγξεν μέγας ούρανός: the scholia (A and schol. Ge) note the reference to a trumpet here, whose use the poet knows but does not attribute to heroic times (cf. 18.219n.). The verb does not recur before Xenophon. The 'trumpeting heaven' announces the start of battle (so bT). Cf. 17.424-5 σιδήρειος δ' δρυμαγδός | χάλκεον ούρανόν Ικε ... This is a variation on the typical theme of the sound effects which signal the opening of a major combat: cf. especially 11.45-6 (thunder by Here and Athene for Agamemnon), and 2.465-6, 2.781-5, etc. (Scheibner, Aufbau 70).

• 1

I

This verse was famous and often quoted in antiquity. Critics were divided between those who admired the metaphor and those who found it out of place. Cf. Demetrius, On Style 83 (disapproving: it produces uncompetitience); Pliny, Ep. 9.26.6 (we must consider carefully whether such expressions are incredibilia ... et inania, or magnifica caelestia); [Longinus] 9.6 (quoting 388 with 20.61-5); schol. bT (general approval of appropriateness, novelty and striking effect); Aristides Quintilianus 2.9 (84) pp. 52.3 J. (at first sight inappropriate, but made effective by the way it is used); Philostr. Her. 2.19 p. 162.32 K. (along with the rest of the Theomachy praised for its dramatic effect but criticized theologically); Hermog. Id. 2.4 (318) p. 334.25 R. (as an example of poetic licence, with Il. 5.749, 13.29); Eust. 1242.27 (mixed criticism and approval). Cf. W. Bühler, Beiträge zur Erklarung der Schrift vom Erhabenen (Göttingen 1964) 26ff., Russell on [Longinus] 9.6.

388-90 For the scansion die see on 10.532. die de Zevy... Euvioutas: these verses recall 20.22-3, where Zeus announces that he will remain seated on Olumpos, taking pleasure in the spectacle of the battle. Zeus's delight in the gods' quarrels shocked later critics. Aristotle (quoted by schol. Ge on 21.390) discussed the apparent contradiction between this and 5.890-1, where Zeus hates Ares because of his perpetual love of strife. Chamaeleon (fr. 18 Wehrli) found Zeus's apparent malevolence inexplicable. Other commentators compared Od. 8.78, where Agamemnon rejoices at the quarrel of Odysseus and Akhilleus, and Menander (fr. 784 K.), where someone says that conflict between members of his household helps to keep the family together! Cf. also Phild. Hom col. 10.13, p. 39 ed. Olivieri.

One defence offered was that Zeus was pleased because the gods were contending $\pi\epsilon\rho$ doerns and yet without risk (T 21.389, schol. Ge 21.390). But there is not much sign of doern in what follows (cf. Griffin, HLD 183). It is the lack of risk which is perhaps the point: 'Zeus appears to have a just appreciation of the whole combat as a parody of serious fighting. It is only here and in 508 that Homer's Zeus ever goes beyond a smile, like the Zeus of the hymn to Hermes (389), who "laughs aloud" at the tricks of his naughty son' (Leaf on 390).

391-2 The god of war begins the battle (cf. 20.38 where he leads the pro-Trojan gods), and attacks the leading warrior-goddess. Cf. 20.133-55, where Poseidon advises Here to keep out of the battle, unless Ares or Apollo intervenes (138), and the gods then 'stand off'.

392 pivotopos: 'hide-piercing', i.e. 'shield-piercing', an unusual epithet, only here in Homer. Cf. Hes. Th. 934 (of Ares) and Nonnus. Here Ares does strike Athene's aegis (400-1).

394-9 Ares reveals his coarse character by his rudeness, and his vindictiveness by referring to his earlier defeat, which he is not ashamed to mention (cf. bT 396). 394-5 Cf. Ares' complaint about Athene at 5.875-6, and for the wording cf. 7.24-5 (Apollo to Athene).

394 κυνάμυια: only here and at 421 in Homer; cf. Ath. 126A, 157A. The variant κυνόμυια is found in later Greek (LXX, AP etc.), but κυνάμυια is probably original, replacing *κυα-μυια: cf. Chantraine, Dict. s.v.

'Dog-fly' is splendidly abusive, suggesting both the proverbial shamelessness of the dog and the recklessness (θάρσος) of the fly. If it actually refers to a tick, then it also suggests a love of blood (αlμοπότις δ έστι κρότων, T). At 17.570-3 Athene inspires μυίης θάρσος in Menelaos.

395 $\dot{\alpha}\eta\tau\sigma\nu$: only here in Homer, but connected in antiquity with $\alpha\bar{n}\eta\tau\sigma\nu$ at 18.410 ($\pi\epsilon\lambda\omega\rho$). Aeschylus seems to have used the word to mean 'great' (fr. 3 N.), but numerous other explanations were offered. Modern philology has not progressed much further. Risch, in LfgrE s.v., supports a connection with $\dot{\alpha}\eta\mu$, which was one ancient view. See also on 18.410.

396 ň ού μέμνη ότε...: so also 15.18 (Zeus to Here), 20.188. The episode occurred at 5.855-8, and this reference marks the link between these two episodes, which seem to offset each other in the poem's structure (cf. Introduction, 'Structure').

395-6 άνηκεν ... άνηκας: this kind of repetition does not seem to have troubled the epic poets. Two papyri give separate variants in both verses: 395 άνώγει, 396 Τυδείδη Διομήδει άνωγας.

397 mavóutov žyxos: the epithet occurs only here and in Nonnus (D. 14.169). Apparently it means 'fully visible', in contrast to Athene who was invisible at 5.844-5. On max- compounds see 22.490n. Antimachus and pap. 12 read umovooopiov, which should mean 'surreptitious' (cf. voooploos), although the scholia were puzzled as to the sense (T 397, Eust. 1243.40). It is presumably a conjecture, to avoid the difficulty of Athene's invisibility: cf. West, Ptol maic Papyri 157.

398 Cf. 5.858 διά δέ χρόα καλόν έδαψεν, which this echoes.

399 õooa žopyas: this is the reading of a late papyrus and one MS, omitting μ' (which ignores the digamma). Cf. however 22.347 ola μ' žopyas, 3.351, Od. 22.318.

402 Pap. 12 omits this verse, which is similar to 5.844 and 15.745. It is dispensable, but probably genuine.

403-4 These verses closely resemble 7.264-5 (Hektor versus Aias) $d\lambda\lambda^*$ $d\nu\alpha\chi\alpha\sigma\sigma\Delta\mu\epsilon\nu\alpha\varsigma$... $\mu\epsilon\gamma\alpha\nu$ te. For the formular phrase $\chi\epsilon\rho$ maximum there was a variant $\Pi d\lambda\lambda\alpha\varsigma$ 'Abhvn, clearly because the epithet was felt to be unsuitable to the goddess, as the Geneva scholiast (on 424) indicates. Cf. similarly Od. 21.6 Xeipl moxely, applied to Penelope, where there was a variant xepol playouv.

406-II These six verses form an unusual succession whose first five feet are all dactyls, and the initial three trochaic word-breaks in 407 produce a markedly bumpy rhythm, as at 235, 23.116, 23.263, Od. 11.598, etc.: cf. Kirk, YCS 20 (1966) 95ff.

407-9 έπτὰ δ' ἐπέσχε πέλεθρα πεσών resembles Od. 11.577, where Tituos επ' ἐννέα κεῖτο πέλεθρα. Α π(έ)λεθρον was either 100 feet long or 10,000 square feet (cf. 23.164n.). At 5.859-61 the wounded Ares shouts as loud as nine or ten thousand warriors, a similar motif. The compound ἀμφαραβεῖν occurs only here; cf. Hes. Aspis 64 ἀμφαράβιζον. Verse 409 = 16.829 (ἐπευχόμενος).

410 $\nu\eta\pi\dot{\nu}\pi\dot{\nu}$: for this word, which occurs $8\times$ in books 20-1, see comment on 13.292, the only other instance in the poem. It does not occur in the Odyssey. The vocative is used again at 441, 474 and 585. $\pi\dot{\omega}$ mep occurs only here in Homer, and is replaced in pap. 12 by the commoner $\pi\dot{\omega}$ $\pi\sigma\tau$.

411 Ισοφαρίζεις: ἀντιφερίζεις, read by the papyrus and most MSS and mentioned as a variant by A, would be possible here. Cf. 487-8 δφρ' έθ είδῆς δσσον φερτέρη είμ', ὅτι μοι μένος ἀντιφερίζεις. See also on 357. Again the poet has shown an unusual fondness for one or both of these words in this Book (and cf. 482 μένος ἀντιφέρεσθαι).

412-14 Cf. 5.832-4 (with comment), where Athene says that Ares has broken his promise to her and Here that he would help the Greeks against the Trojans, another example of cross-reference. For $\tau\eta\varsigma$ µ $\eta\tau\rho\delta\varsigma$ έρινόας έξαποτίνοις cf. Od. 11.279-80, where Oidipous' µ $\eta\tau\rho\delta\varsigma$ έρινόας cause him many troubles after her death, and ll. 9.566-72, Od. 2.135 for a mother's invocation of an έρινός or έρινόες. For the article $\tau\eta\varsigma$ cf. Chantraine, GH II 164. The compound έξαποτίνειν occurs only here and in the Sibylline Oracles. 'You would pay back in full your mother's Erinyes' resembles Hes. Th. 472 τείσαιτο δ' έρινῶς πατρὸς ἑοῖο.

Pap. 12 offers kal $\mu\eta\eta\sigma\delta$... $d\psi$ denotivous, but also what looks like $\delta\eta$ s above kal. This may be a corruption of η s, which had already been conjectured by Brugmann and could possibly be original: cf. West, Ptolemaic Papyri 159-60, Chantraine, GH t 273-4.

415 πάλιν τρέπεν δσσε φαεινώ: probably a gesture of aversion (see comment on 3.427).

416 Cf. 5.353 where Iris leads the wounded Aphrodite away from the battle. The Separatists took this as evidence that the Iliad and the Odyssey were by different poets, because in Odyssey 8 Aphrodite is married to

• .

ţ

Hephaistos, whereas here they assumed that Aphrodite was openly living with Ares. The answer given to this was that the times referred to in each case were different (Arn/A). They are of course also brother and sister, and Ares lends Aphrodite his chariot after her wounding at 5.355-63. The variant reading $\phi_i\lambda_o\mu\mu\epsilon_i\delta\eta_5$ 'Appo $\delta_i\tau\eta$ is a formular doublet (see on 3.424). $\phi_i\lambda_o\mu\mu\epsilon_i\delta\eta_5$ would have been too cheerful in this context.

417 μογις δ' έσαγείρετο θυμόν: Aristarchus and some MSS prefer the imperfect here and at 15.240 (νεόν δ' έσαγείρετο θυμόν), whereas the vulgate reading is έσαγείρατο in both cases. At 15.240 the aorist is better (see comment), but here there is some advantage in the imperfect, with its conative force.

418-34 Behind this scene of enmity between Here, Athene and Aphrodite, as with 5.418-25, Reinhardt sees the story of the Judgement of Paris (Tradition und Geist, Göttingen 1960, 27-8). See on 24.23-30.

418-20 Verse 418 ~ 5.711, 419-20 = 5.713-14, again in the context of conflict with Ares, when Here is urging Athene to intervene.

420-2 Herê's speech is brief and impatient. Cf. especially the peremptory two final words of 422. kal $\delta \eta \alpha \delta \theta'$ means 'there she goes again ...' (as in book 5). This is rather like the common use of $\delta \eta \delta \tau \epsilon$ in archaic Greek lyric poetry (cf. B. Snell, The Discovery of the Mund, Berkeley 1953, 57-8). For η kuvápula cf. 394. The article is derogatory here (cf. Chantraine, GH II 163-4), and the echo of 394 suggests that Here is returning Ares' insult.

424-5 For Emisioauévy cf. 11.367, 20.454 Emisloouai, and on 21.335. The variant Emissioauévy (Demetrius Ixion) would be possible. The runover word fixase is heavily emphatic.

426 KEÏVTO ÊTI X00VI: the variant mort X00VI in some MSS would avoid the hiatus, but ÉTI is better. The variants KEÏTO ÈTI (some MSS) and θ EÏVE mort (pap. 12) indicate considerable uncertainty about the reading here. It is possible that the original form was KEIGT' ÈTI, as KEÏVTO is unusual in Homer (only Od. 6.19). Cf. Chantraine, GH 1 476; West, Ptolemaic Papyri 160. The idea of Ares and Aphrodite laid out together is highly comic.

427-33 Athene's speech resembles those of human warriors boasting over their enemies. For 427 cf. 121, whereas for the variant προσηύδα cf. 409 (with ol). The moralizing 428-9 resemble Od. 1.47 ώς ἀπόλοιτο καὶ άλλος ὅτις τοιαῦτά γε ῥέζοι (Athene speaking). For πάντες ὅσοι Τρώεσσιν ἀρωγοί cf. 371. The phrase 'Apyεloioi ... θωρηκτῆσιν occurs only here. Cf. 12.317, 15.689 etc. Λυκίων/Τρώων (πύκα) θωρηκτάων. Pap. 12 reads κυδα[λίμοισιν, a commoner expression and one which also eliminates the spondaic ending: cf. West, Ptolemaic Papyri 46-7, 160.

430-1 Verse 430 is similar to 589 &b that the formation of the similar to 589 &b that the similar term of te 433 This verse resembles 2.133, 4.33, etc.

434 = 1.595 (cf. 14.222). This is omitted by some MSS, and may be a later addition. The variant reading $\Delta s \ \xi \phi \alpha \theta$ ', $\eta \ \delta' \ \xi \gamma \ \epsilon \lambda \alpha \sigma \sigma \varepsilon$ occurs nowhere else.

435-69 Poseidon's invitation to Apollo to fight has been thought to contradict his attitude at 20.138-43, where he advises Here that they should not intervene unless Ares or Apollo also interferes (cf. Leaf). But 436-7 actually seem to echo this passage ($\alpha\beta\xi\alpha\nu\tau\omega\nu$ trip $\omega\nu \sim 20.138$ to α' 'Apns $\beta\chi\omega\sigma$ 1 $\mu\alpha\chi\eta_5$ if $\Omega\sigma\beta\rho_5$ 'A $\pi\delta\lambda\lambda\omega\nu$), and Ares has in fact been involved in the fighting. Poseidon's suggestion that Apollo should attack first (439 $\delta\rho\chi\epsilon\ldots$) also looks like an echo of his previous reluctance to start things off.

Although Poseidon's speech is provocative, this exchange with Apollo makes an effective contrast with the coarser scenes before and after. Poseidon treats the need to fight primarily as a matter of honour, in the manner of heroic duels. Apollo's reply deflates this notion: to fight in this way over mortals is beneath the dignity of gods. This is the central scene of the Theomachy, and it makes a deeply serious point (cf. Scheibner, Aufbau 102ff.).

437 duagnti: only here in Homer; cf. Hdt. 1.174, etc.

439-40 Cf. 13.355, 15.166 (Zeus older than Poseidon), and for similar expressions 14.112, 19.219, 23.587-8.

441-57 The service of Poseidon and Apollo to Laomedon was alluded to briefly at 7.452-3, where Poseidon says that they both built the Trojan wall (hardly a serious contradiction, although see on 7.443-64 for other doubts about that passage). The poet gives no reason for this period of service by the two gods: the scholia suggest either that it was a punishment for rebellion against Zeus (comparing 1.400, with Zenodotus' substitution of Apollo for Athene in that verse), or else that they wanted to test Laomedon (cf. Od. 17.485-7). The second reason was given by Hellanicus (FGH 4.26a; cf. also Apollodorus, Bibl. 2.5.9 and Frazer's note). The story, as told later, continued with the gods' revenge: Apollo sent a plague, and Poseidon the sea-monster referred to at 20.145-8 (cf. also 5.638-51). As usual, the poet alludes to such past events in piecemeal fashion, as and when it is convenient for him to do so.

Apollodorus pointed out the appropriateness of the two divine tasks, Poseidon being worshipped as dopdalos kal θ such δ such such δ such δ such δ such such δ suc

۰.

444-5 πἀρ Διὸς ἐλθόντες suggests that they were ordered by Zeus to do this service, for whatever reason. θητεύσαμεν occurs only here in ll; for the verb and related noun θής cf. Od. 4.644, 11.489, 18.357-8, and West on Hes. Erga 602. ῥητός is also found only here in Homer; cf. Hes. Erga 4 ('spoken of'), and in the sense 'specified' (as here) Hdt. 1.77 etc. For the phrase cf. HyDem 173 ἐπ' ἀπείρονι μισθῷ.

446-7 Aridices read ήτοι μέν γάρ έγώ πόλεως, and Aristophanes πόλει for πόλιν. For άρρηκτος cf. 14.56, 14.68 (of the wall round the Greek camp).

448 The formula eldinobox Edinos $\beta o v s$ was used at 9.466 (= 23.166), and occurs $3 \times Od$. For $\beta o v \kappa o \lambda \delta \delta c$ for 5.313 etc.

449 Cf. 2.821, 11.105 ^{} [δης έν κνημοϊσι, 22.171 ^{} [δης έν κορυφήσι πολυπτύχου; more often πολυπίδακος ^{} [δης $(5 \times 11.)$; cf. also 11.183 ^{} [δης έν κορυφήσι ... πιδηέσσης.

450-2 μισθοΐο τέλος means 'the due time of payment'. The epithet πολυγηθέες does not occur elsewhere in Homer (cf. Hesiod etc.). The phrase πολυγηθέες ώραι may have a general significance (cf. Leaf), but in this context it surely suggests relief at the end of the year's labour. νῶϊ βιήσατο μισθόν ἀπαντα means 'robbed us of all our wage', and the verb is used only here with a double accusative; cf. Hor. C. 3.3.21-2 destituit d os | mercede pacta Laomedon (as one of the reasons for the hostility of Juno and Minerva to Troy). For ἕκπαγλος cf. 589 ῶδ' ἕκπαγλος ἑών ..., and see on 1.145-6, 3.415. The structure and sound effects of this line suggest a strong, autocratic ruler: Λαομέδων | ἕκπαγλος | ἀπειλήσας δ' | ἀπέπεμπε.

453-5 Such threats are commoner in the Odyssey: 18.84-7, 18.115-16, 20.382-3, 21.307-9. Here 453-7 expand the theme of 450-2. In 453 the variant σol for $\sigma v can$ hardly be right, as there seems to be no reason why Apollo's punishment should be different from Poseidon's.

454 περάαν νήσων $k\pi l$ τηλεδαπάων: cf. 22.45 περνάς νήσων $k\pi l$ τηλεδαπάων. In both verses there was a variant θηλυτεράων in antiquity (in the 'city' texts at 454), taken by some scholars to mean 'fertile' (T 22.45; cf. Call. fr. 548).

455 ἀπολέψεμεν was Aristarchus' reading, and it is found in a few of our MSS, the rest having ἀποκόψεμεν, ἀποκόψειν οr ἀποκόπτειν. It means 'peel off' (cf. 1.236 περl γάρ ῥά ἑ χαλκὸς ἕλεψε), a vivid and crude metaphor. ἀπολέπειν occurs nowhere else in early epic, and is later used in comedy: cf. Epich. 158, Ar. Av. 673, E. Cyc. 237 (conjectured by Ruhnken). In Cyclops (if this is the right reading) the word also comes in a passage threatening various dire forms of punishment.

456 The phase κεκοτηότι θυμ $\tilde{\varphi}$ occurs only here in ll.; cf. Od. 9.501 δψορρου προσέφην κεκοτηότι θυμ $\tilde{\varphi}$, and 19.71, 22.477.

458-60 μεθ' ήμέων: μετά with genitive is rare in Homer and early poetry

• .

(cf. Chantraine, GH II 119-20: probably only $3 \times 11., 2 \times 0.0$). $\pi \epsilon_{10} \tilde{q}$ is also unusual (from * $\pi\epsilon_{10} \tilde{q} \epsilon_{201}$?), recurring at 24.390, 24.433; cf. Chantraine, GH I 57, and see on 14.198-9. For Trowers unephalon cf. 13.621. $\pi_{10} \tilde{q} vvv$ here and at 0d. 14.69 (with $\delta\lambda\epsilon_{10} \tilde{q} vv)$ must mean 'utterly'. Cf. also 11. 9.570 where it is used with $\kappa_{20} \tilde{q} \tilde{q} vvv$; there it is thought to have the original sense of 'on one's knees' (Chantraine, Dict. s.v. $\gamma \delta vv$). For $\sigma vv \pi \alpha \sigma \delta \kappa \alpha \sigma \sigma \delta vvv$, 11. 6.250 $\alpha \delta \delta \kappa \sigma \sigma vv$.

461 = 15.253. άναξ έκάεργος Άπόλλων (2× II., 1× Od.) is a slightly less common formula than the metrically equivalent άναξ Διός υλός Άπόλλων (4× II., 1× Od.), but was regarded by Parry as 'undoubtedly the older' (MHV 178). It gains in popularity in the Hymns (6× HyAp, HyHerm) over its rival (4× HyAp, HyHerm). Διός υλός is actually a variant reading both here and at 15.253; see on that verse.

462 σαόφρονα: only here in Il.; cf. Od. 4.158, and σαοφροσύνη, Od. 23.13, 23.30. Apollo par excellence displays this quality of σωφροσύνη. There are good remarks on this by W. F. Otto, The Homeric Gods (London 1954) 66, à propos of this scene.

464-6 Cf. 6.142 εl δέ τίς έσσι βροτῶν οι ἀρούρης καρπὸν έδουσιν ... and 146-9 οίη περ φύλλων γενεή, τοίη δε και άνδρῶν, etc. This coincidence shows that the two passages must be related, and they are quoted together by Plutarch (Mor. 104E-F). Leaf called the lines in book 21 'an obvious reminiscence of the famous simile' in book 6. He also thought the phrase άρούρης καρπόν έδοντες 'totally incongruous', and φύλλοισιν έοικότες ... ζαφλεγέες a 'ludicrous confusion of metaphor'; and concluded that 'it is hard to believe that any poet could have written such a medley except in deliberate parody'. This is a totally unfair verdict. $\zeta \alpha \phi \lambda \epsilon \gamma \epsilon \epsilon_s$ is a strong and effective word to describe men in the fullness of their prime, contrasting with powoov which suggests a 'waning' light, as well as any kind of decaying life. This set of images overlaps with the brief comparison to leaves in an unusual but not inappropriate way. άρούρης καρπόν έδοντες is also a singular phrase, only paralleled in Homer in the related passage at 6.142. Cf. $\tan \chi \theta$ or $\overline{\chi} \theta$ or ral character of men, as compared with the gods (où yap oitov foouo' ... 5.341).

The context here is also related to that in book 6. There Diomedes says that if Glaukos is a god he would not fight him, but if mortal he will, and Glaukos replies, comparing men's yeven to that of leaves. In book 21 one god refuses to fight another for the sake of mortals.

۰.

by Proclus: cf. M. L. West, CQ 20 (1970) 300-4), an oracle quoted by Eusebius (PE 3.15), and Nonnus (D. 2.26). In 466 axiption means 'spiritless', 'lifeless' (cf. 5.812, 7.100 etc.). In 467 autol is 'on their own'.

468-9 The reason given by the poet for Apollo's withdrawal ironically suggests that Apollo's speech was a discreet way of avoiding an unequal contest. In 469 the long word πατροκασιγνήτοιο, filling the first hemistich, suggests the dignity of Poseidon as Apollo's uncle. Cf. the very similar context of Od. 6.329-30 (Athene) αίδετο γάρ βα | πατροκασίγνητον, echoed at 13.341-2 άλλά τοι οὐκ ἐθέλησα Ποσειδάωνι μάχεσθαι | πατροκασιγνήτω, and HyDem 31 (with Richardson's comments). μιγήμεναι έν παλάμησι is a rather unusual phrase. Cf. 13.286 μιγήμεναι έν δαί λυγρῆ, and έν παλάμησι(ν) (10 × II.).

470-513 With Artemis' intervention we return to a more petty level.

470 πότνια θηρῶν: this title of Artemis, so often used by modern scholars, only occurs here in Homer. It may appear later at Supplementum Hellenisticum (edd. Lloyd-Jones and Parsons) 953.14. The scholia compare Anacreon, PMG 348.3 δίσποιν' Άρτεμι θηρῶν.

471 Aristarchus athetized this verse as unnecessary (Arn/A). There is nothing objectionable about it, but equally nothing to prove that it is not an addition. Elsewhere in Homer the epithet dyportepos is used as a synonym for dypios, of wild animals (e.g. 486). But it is quite a common title of Artemis in later literature and cult (cf. RE s.v. Agrotera).

473-4 μέλεον ... εύχος means 'an empty vaunt', i.e. one which cost him no effort. But the idea of futility is picked up by άνεμώλιον αύτως in 474. For άνεμώλιον cf. 5.216 άνεμώλια, of a bow and arrows.

475-7 These verses were athetized on the grounds that they conflict with Apollo's attitude at 468-9, and because Apollo is not a god of war (Arn/A). These reasons do not seem strong enough for rejecting the verses, which are probably an 'ad hoc invention' (cf. Willcock, HSCP 81 (1977) 49-50). For 475-6 cf. 1.396-7 πολλάκι γάρ σεο πατρός ένι μεγάροισιν άκουσα | εύχομένης ..., and 20.83-5, where Aineias boasts in his cups that he will fight (έναντίβιον πολεμίξειν) Akhilleus. Verse 477 is an effective four-word one.

480 Cf. 2.277 veikeleiv $\beta \alpha \sigma_i \lambda \tilde{\eta} \alpha \varsigma$ övei $\delta e loi \varsigma tr t$ $\sigma \sigma_i v$. This verse is omitted by two papyri and most MSS, and was not in Aristarchus' texts, since the scholia and Eustathius understand $\pi \rho \sigma \sigma t \phi \eta$ with 479. It may well be an addition. For the construction $\delta \pi \delta$ koivov cf. 11.56 etc. and Lehrs, De Aristarchi studiis 338-9.

481 κύον άδεές is used of Athene at 8.423; see on 1.225, 3.180, 22.345.

482-4 χαλεπή ... ἀντιφέρεσθαι presumably means 'I am dangerous to oppose in (respect of) might'; cf. 1.589, 21.411, 21.488, etc. τοξοφόρος occurs nowhere else in II. or Od.; cf. HyAp 13, 126, etc. tπel ... tθέλησθα explains $\tau \circ \xi \circ \phi \circ \phi \circ \phi \to \psi \circ \phi \circ \phi$, and $\gamma \circ \psi \circ \circ \xi \circ \xi$ is ironic, i.e. she only kills women, not men. For Artemis in this rôle cf. 6.205, 6.428, etc. It is particularly appropriate that the goddess who is herself $\pi \circ \tau \circ \circ \circ \phi \circ \phi$ and $\delta \gamma \circ \tau \circ \phi \circ \phi \circ \phi \circ \phi$ and $\delta \gamma \circ \phi \circ \phi \circ \phi \circ \phi \circ \phi$ and $\delta \gamma \circ \phi \circ \phi \circ \phi \circ \phi \circ \phi \circ \phi$. The point is picked up with heavy irony by 485-6.

• 1

485 ônpas évalpeux: the scholia point out that strictly speaking évalpeux means 'despoil' (cf. évapa).

487-8 The apodosis is left to be understood, as at 6.150-1. Here 489-92 explain clearly enough what is implied. For the genitive $\pi o\lambda k\mu o to$ with $\delta c m \mu k \nu o t$ of 16.211.

489-513 Herë treats Artemis like a naughty child, and she responds accordingly, as Demetrius observed (schol. Ge 491). The lack of seriousness is emphasized by 491 (μειδιόωσα) and 508 (ήδύ γελάσσας).

490-1 τόξα here presumably means 'bow and quiver' (cf. 502-3). In 491 αὐτοῖσιν is emphatic, 'with her own weapons'. μειδιόωσα stresses the comic character of the scene, but Here's smile is one of triumph, as at 434, 14.222-3.

492 έντροπαλιζομένην: 'turning (her head) away'. There are several variants: έντροπαλιζομένη (several MSS), έντροπαλιζομένης (Ptolemy of Ascalon), πολλά λισσομένης (Chian and Cypriote texts).

493-6 A brief but effective simile. Cf. the simile of the hawk and pigeon at 22.139-44: 21.493-4 ὑπαιθα... φύγεν ὡς τε πέλεια... ἡ ῥά θ' ὑπ' Τρηκος ... resemble 22.139-41 ἡῦτε κίρκος ... μετὰ τρήρωνα πέλειαν | ἡ δέ θ' ὑπαιθα φοβεῖται... In 493 the light, dactylic rhythm suits Artemis' birdlike flight. Neither the compound εἰσπέτομαι (Hdt. 9.100, etc.) nor χηραμός recurs in Homer. χηραμός is used of a cleft where a bird nests at Arist. HA 614b35 and in Heliodorus. Here Homer has already explained the word's meaning in κοίλην πέτρην. For the rest of 495 cf. 15.271-6n. (274).

496 This verse elegantly repeats the most important words of 493.

497-501 Hermes light-heartedly declines to fight with Leto, and with ironic courtesy offers her the privilege of claiming a moral victory. Hermes the trickster is also shown as witty and carefree in the story of Ares and Aphrodite (Od. 8.338-43).

497 διάκτορος Άργειφόντης: see comment on 2.103. The nominative formula occurs first here, 5 times in book 24 and 6× Od.

498–500 These verses implicitly allude to Here's treatment of Artemis. $\pi\lambda\eta\kappa\tau$ ('exchange blows') only occurs here in Homer (cf. Ar. Ec. 964 etc.). For $\pi\rho\delta\phi\rho\alpha\sigma\sigma\alpha$ in 500 cf. 10.290n. (3× Od.).

502-3 συναίνυτο is an absolute hapax legomenon. καμπύλα τόξα is a good instance of a formular phrase which does not precisely suit its context, as it must refer to bow and arrows together. The form πεπτεῶτα recurs at Od. 22.384; cf. Chantraine, GH 1 428, 430. For μετά στροφάλιγγι koving cf. 16.775 iv ... koving, of Kebriones' corpse, in a more serious passage.

• .

ţ

504 θ uyartépos \hbar s: if this goes with $\tau \delta \xi \alpha$ it is unusually distant from the noun on which it depends. The alternative is to take it as genitive with $\kappa l \epsilon$, 'went after her daughter', which seems more likely; cf. Chantraine, GH to 52-4. The verse resembles 18.138, where however $\pi \alpha \lambda \omega$ means 'back from'.

505 Διός ποτί χαλκοβατές δώ: see on 1.425-7.

505-10 Cf. 5.370-4, where Aphrodite falls on her mother's knees, and is embraced by her and comforted. Verses 509-10 = 5.373-4 (see comment). Verse 510 is omitted by most MSS and could be an addition to the original text.

In 506 Artemis behaves like a child. Cf. Call. Hy. 3.4-5; $\alpha p \chi \mu \epsilon v o_1 \omega_5 \delta \tau \epsilon$ $\pi \alpha \tau p \delta_5 \ \epsilon \phi \epsilon \xi o \mu \epsilon v \eta$ yov $\alpha \tau \epsilon \sigma \sigma \sigma 1$ | $\pi \alpha \tilde{\iota}_5 \ \epsilon \tau 1$ κουρίζουσα τάδε προσέειπε γονη̃α, where 28-31, with Zeus's laughter and his reference to Here's jealousy, seem to recall 508 and 512-13 here. Her trembling robe in 507 delicately suggests her distress, as does the third repetition of $\delta \alpha \kappa \rho v \delta \epsilon \sigma \sigma \alpha$ at 506 (cf. 493 and 496).

511 Ευστέφανος κελαδεινή: Ευστέφανος is used of Artemis only here in Homer, elsewhere of Aphrodite (Od. 8.267 etc.). For κελαδεινή see on 16.183.

512-13 This takes us back to what sparked off the whole episode, by a form of ring composition. But it sounds as if Artemis is blaming Here more generally for all the divine strife occasioned by the Trojan War. Cf. 4.1-74, where Here refuses to accept Zeus's proposal for an end to the War. The tone is again that of a spoilt child: 'It's all her fault!' For $\sigma\tau\nu\phi\ell\lambda\iota\xi\epsilon$ in 512 see on 380. In 513 Aristarchus seems to have read $\nu\epsilon\iota\kappa\epsilon' \epsilon \tau \dot{\nu}\chi\theta\eta$ (cf. AT), as at 11.670, Od. 21.303. The usual phrase is $\nu\epsilon\iota\kappao\varsigma$ $\delta\rho\omega\rho\epsilon$ (etc.), $\iotao\times II., 3\times Od. \nu\epsilon\iota\kappa\epsilon(\alpha)$ is read by one papyrus and two later MSS.

514-611 Apollo enters Troy to protect it from Akhilleus, whilst the other gods return to Olumpos. Priam urges the Trojans to keep the gates open until the army is safe inside. Apollo prompts Agenor to withstand Akhilleus, and after a soliloquy he does so. They fight briefly, but Agenor is rescued from death by Apollo, who takes his place. While Akhilleus is pursuing him, the Trojan army pours into the city

Apollo's concern for the Trojans brings us back to the human conflict, and as the other gods fade from view the focus narrows to the scene which was left suspended earlier in this Book, of Akhilleus' pursuit of the enemy. This episode forms a prelude to book 22: cf. Priam watching from the wall, and his concern for his people's safety (22.25-91), the rôle of Apollo, and above all Agenor's soliloquy, which foreshadows Hektor's (22.98-130). The deception of Akhilleus by Apollo also contrasts with the scene where Athene deceives Hektor after Apollo has left him (226-47), although the consequences of this are far more serious. Finally the combat between Akhilleus and Agenor resembles in one respect that of Akhilleus and Hektor (cf. 21.591-4n.). Cf. Fenik, TBS 213-14; M. Edwards in Bremer, HBOP 50-2, and vol. v, Introduction, p. 19.

• 1

515 Ooipos: schol. pap. XII (Erbse) on 229-32 reads olos, which is possible but may be a conjecture.

516-17 The danger that Troy will fall before its due time is averted by divine intervention, as elsewhere in the poem. Cf. 544-6, 16.698-711, 20.20-30; Fenik, TBS 154, 175-6, Reinhardt, IuD 107ff., Scheibner, Aufbau 49ff. For interpropor cf. 20.30 deldes up kal reixos interpropor $\xi \approx \lambda \cos \theta$, 21.55 interpropor with comment, etc.

520 $\pi\alpha\rho\dot{\alpha}$ $\pi\alpha\tau\rho l$ is the reading of most MSS, in preference to the variant $\pi\dot{\alpha}\rho$ Z₁vl, which would give an unattractively spondaic hemistich.

522-5 The simile resembles the more developed one at 18.207-14, where the fire which blazes from Akhilleus' head is like the smoke and flames rising from beacons in a besieged city. Here however it is the city itself which is on fire, and the point of comparison is between the sufferings of its people and those of the beleaguered Trojans. Although brief, impressionistic, and somewhat repetitive in its language (523-5), it emphasizes powerfully the sense of impending doom hanging over Troy as the result of Akhilleus' onslaught. The brief simile at 22.408-11, comparing the lamentation of the Trojans after Hektor's death to the emotional effect of Troy's actual fall, is the culmination of this sequence of comparisons (see also on 17.736-41). The allusion to divine wrath at 523 is relevant too, since Troy will fall as a result of divine anger. Cf. the storm sent by Zeus as a punishment for injustice in the simile at 16.384-93 (with comment), and in general see Moulton, Similes 35-7, 106-7, 110-11.

522-3 Cf. 18.207 $\dot{\omega}_5$ δ' δτε καπνός l $\dot{\omega}_V$ έξ άστεος αlθέρ' Ικηται. Here Ικηται is a variant in A for the vulgate lκάνει, which should perhaps be kept, as Ικηται could be from 18.207. Presumably the city is burning as a result of enemy assault, although the poet does not say so. θεών δέ è μῆνις ἀνῆκε is best taken as a parenthesis. For the expression cf. 5.178 χαλεπή δè θεοῦ Ἐπι μηνις, 22.358 and Od. 11.73 θεών μήνιμα, Od. 2.66 θεών δ' ὑποδείσατε μῆνιν.

523-5 άνῆκε, | πἄσι δ' έθηκε πόνου ... κήδε' έφῆκεν, ... πόνου και κήδε' έθηκεν: the repetition is unusual, and may be intended to emphasize the comparison. There are several variants here: 524 έφῆπται (cf. 2.15 etc.), 525φόνου ... έφῆκεν/ἐνῆκεν/ἔτευξεν/πολύστονα κήδεα θῆκεν (cf. 1.445); cf. also 22.488 πόνος και κήδε' δπίσσω.

526-36 The high frequency of periodic and integral enjambment here suggests the urgency of the crisis.

526-9 Priam watches from the wall as at 3.146-244, where again

۰,

l

Agamemnon is described by him as $\pi\epsilon\lambda\omega\rho_{100}$ (166). Here too the epithet suggests Priam's view of Akhilleus, as at 22.92 (see comment). In 526 the wall is divine because it was built by Poseidon; cf. 8.519 $\theta\epsilon\sigma\delta\mu\eta\tau\omega\nu$ $\epsilon\pi\lambda$ $\pi\nu\rho\gamma\omega\nu$. For $\pi\epsilon\phi\nu\zeta\sigma\tau\epsilon$ see on 6.

530 δτρύνων is preferred by Aristarchus (Did/A) to the future δτρυνέων, rightly as it introduces Priam's speech. πυλαωρός occurs first here, again at 24.681, and perhaps 22.69.

531-6 For Priam's instructions to hold the gates open until all are inside cf. 12.120-3 ούδε πύλησιν | εῦρ' ἐπικεκλιμένας σανίδας καὶ μακρὸν ὀχὴα | ἀλλ' ἀναπεπταμένας ἔχον ἀνέρες (etc.).

533 The variant κλονέει for κλονέων would be possible, but the participle is a less obvious construction and preferable: 'here he is, driving them on'. For νῦν ... ξσεσθαι cf. 23.310 τῶ τ' οἴω λοίγι' ξσεσθαι.

534 &AtvTES: this verb is regularly used of the Trojans taking refuge in the city (16.714, 18.286, 21.607, 22.12, 22.47).

535 Emavôtµevai was Aristarchus' reading (Did/A). The compound does not recur until the fifth century. Some of the city texts read $\frac{1}{2}\pi'$ $\frac{1}{2}\psi$ $\frac{1}{2}\psi$ $\frac{1}{2}\psi$ and this has prevailed in our MSS. Aristarchus may have disliked the sound of this: he also wanted to read $\frac{1}{2}\psi$ $\frac{1}{2}\pi$ $\frac{1}{2}\psi$ for $\frac{1}{2}\pi$ $\frac{1}{2}\psi$ lévai at 18.14. If $\frac{1}{2}\pi$ $\frac{1}{2}\pi$ $\frac{1}{2}\pi$ $\frac{1}{2}\psi$ $\frac{1}{2}\pi$ $\frac{1}{2}\pi$

536 άληται: aorist subjunctive from άλλομαι. Herodian read άληται: cf. 534 (ές τείχος ... άλέντες), and 16.714 ές τείχος ... άλήναι. But cf. 12.438, 16.558 έσήλατο τείχος (and see on 12.438).

537 For city gates and their bars see on 11.120-1, 455-6.

538-9 Zenodotus athetized these two verses. It is hard to believe the reason given by Arn/A, that he understood $$\phi$05 as 'light' rather than 'salvation', and thought it absurd for the open gates to be needed to bring this. Probably Zenodotus objected that the verses had been added merely to explain how Apollo comes to be outside the city in the following scene. But they prepare us for the god's subsequent intervention.

The variant ἀμύναι for ἀλάλκοι in 539 could be defended on the ground that this verb more often takes a genitive than ἀλαλκεῖν. But for the genitive with ἀλαλκεῖν cf. 22.348, Od. 10.288, and for λοιγὸν ἀλαλκεῖν 21.138, 21.250.

540-3 The scene is closed by two sentences with heavy integral enjambment. The suspension of the verb until the beginning of 542 gives prominence to 541, a chiastic verse vividly describing the wretched state of the fleeing Trojans. Kapyaléoi ('parched') occurs only here in early epic, and then in Hellenistic poetry and later epic. The variant Kapéaléoi ('drv') would be possible, but is surely due to the replacement of a difficult word by an easier one.

• .

In 542 δ δè is Akhilleus. For σφεδανον έφεπ' in 542 cf. έπετο σφεδανόν 11.165, 16.372. Aristarchus and several MSS read σφεδανῶν, the participle of σφεδανάω, which does not occur elsewhere but would be possible.

544-6 Cf. 16.698-700: ἕνθα κεν ὑψίπυλον Τροίην ἕλον υἶες Άχαιῶν ... εἰ μὴ ᾿Απόλλων Φοΐβος ... For this type of scene see on 516-17. Agenor has already played a part in the action several times, and especially in books 11-16 (see on 4.467-9, 11.59-60). For φῶτ' ᾿Αντήνορος υἰδυ ἀμύμονα cf. 4.194 φῶτ' ᾿Ασκληπιοῦ υἰδν ἀμύμονος, Od. 21.26, 4.247-8 φῶθ' Ἡρακληα, φωτί ... δέκτη, and similarly II. 11.92 ἄνδρα Βιήνορα etc.

549 φηγῷ κεκλιμένος: this topographical detail may hint at the motif of divine detachment and ease. Cf. 7.22 where Apollo and Athene meet παρὰ φηγῷ, and then at 58–61 they sit down as spectators of the battle φηγῷ ἐφ' ὑψηλῆ πατρὸς Διὸς αἰγιόχοιο. At 6.237 and 9.354 a φηγός is closely associated with the Scaean gate. For κεκάλυπτο δ' ἄρ' ἡέρι πολλῆ cf. 16.790 (Apollo) ἡέρι γὰρ πολλῆ κεκαλυμμένος ἀντεβόλησε, and similar expressions at 3.381, 11.751, 20.444, 21.597.

550-70 Agenor debates whether to fight Akhilleus or not. For this type of monologue cf. 11.403-10, 17.90-105, 22.98-130. In all four cases the hero is the subject of a simile just after or before the monologue. The closest parallel is with Hektor's monologue at 22.98-130, where again direct flight is considered and rejected (il $\mu \ell v \kappa \epsilon(v) \dots$); an alternative scheme is dismissed (el $\delta' dv \dots 21.556$, el $\delta \ell \kappa ev \dots 22.111$), the objection to this having been stated (21.562 = 22.122, μ f ... 21.563 ~ 22.123); and finally the decision is made to fight (21.566-70 ~ 22.129-30). Agenor's soliloquy follows directly after the reference to Apollo inspiring him with courage (547). As elsewhere in Homer, divine influence does not prevent a hero from having to make his own decision, and here we have a clear insight into the process by which he does so. For these monologues see on 11.403, 17.90-105, and Schadewaldt, VHWW 300-3, Fenik, TBS 96-100, 163-4, Fenik, Tradition 68-90, G. Petersmann, Grazer Beiträge 2 (1974) 147-69. This type of speech is handled by the poet with considerable variation to suit context and character. Odysseus rejects the idea of flight as dishonourable

۰,

t

(11.408-10), Menelaos decides on retreat as the wisest course (17.98-105), whereas Agenor realizes that flight would be disastrous. Hektor's reasoning is more complex: see on 22.98-130.

550 'AXIAAna πτολ(πορθον: this epithet is used of Akhilleus at 8.372, 15.77 and 24.108, of Odysseus at 2.278, 10.363, and also of Oileus (2.728), Enuo (5.333), Ares (20.152) and Otrunteus (20.384). In the Odyssey it is always used of Odysseus (6x; cf. πτολιπόρθιος 2x). See on 2.278-9.

Aristarchus apparently discussed the epithet in his reply to the Separatists, but it is not clear what line was taken by either side on this question. He athetized 8.371-2 and 15.56-77, and Arn/A on 15.56 says that according to Aristarchus the epithet was never used of Akhilleus (so also Cic. Ad. fam. 10.13.2). At 21.550 however Arn/A says that it occurs only here, and at 24.108 there is no comment in the scholia. Evidently Aristarchus' view has become garbled in the later tradition (cf. Erbse on 21.550). Did he reject 24.108-9, and possibly also 21.550-1? He can hardly have accepted the wretched variant 'Axi $\lambda\lambda$ ta In λ tia In λ tiava at 21.550 (Tives AT). He probably thought the epithet inappropriate because Akhilleus died before the sack of Troy, but it is fully justified by his claim to have sacked many other cities (9.328-9 etc.). At the same time, however, it may suggest Akhilleus' rôle as the potential destroyer of Troy itself (cf. 544 etc.), and hint at the way Agenor views him as he approaches (cf. 22.92n.).

551 Cf. Od. 4.427, 4.572, 10.309 fiα, πολλά δέ μοι κραδίη πόρφυρε κιόντι. The only other occurrence of πορφύρειν in the lliad neatly illustrates the relationship between metaphor and simile (14.16-20); ώς δ' δτε πορφύρη πέλαγος μέγα κύματι κωφ $\tilde{\phi}$...] ώς δ γέρων ώρμαινε δαϊζόμενος κατά θυμόν ...

552 = 11.403 etc. $(7 \times 11., 4 \times 0d.)$. The verse recurs in all four of the monologues mentioned above (550-70n.).

553-5 ώμοι έγών, είμέν κεν... also opens the other monologues. For 554 cf. 6.41 πρός πόλιν, ήπερ οι άλλοι άτυζόμενοι φοβέοντο, and 21.4 πρός πόλιν, ήπερ Άχαιοι άτυζόμενοι φοβέοντο. φοβέονται, the reading of most MSS here, is presumably due to the influence of these parallel verses. For δειροτομήσει see on 89. The same brutality of expression here emphasizes the indignity of this cowardly end.

556-61 el 5' àv lyà ... means 'suppose I leave', with no apodosis. Cf. 567, 22.111, and comment on 1.581. Chantraine, GH 11 362-4, has a good discussion of the periodic structure of 556-65 and 22.111-25. The compound twoklovéeova occurs only here in Homer, later in Quintus of Smyrna (14.572). 'llifiov recurs nowhere else, and was explained as 'of Ilios' (Did/A) or 'of Ilos' (T), the hero whose tomb is mentioned at 10.415 etc. Crates read 'lbhïov, as an alternative form of 'lbaïov, but it seems awkward to describe the plain as belonging to the mountain. For 'lbng τε κνημούς (559) cf. ⁻¹δης έν κνημοΐσι (3× Il.), and 23.117 κνημούς ... πολυπίδακος ⁻¹δης. The 'thickets' ($\dot{\rho}\omega\pi\eta\bar{\iota}\alpha$) of Mt Ida recur at 23.122.

• 1

360–1 tontplos comes only here in II., $7 \times Od$. in this sense. The detail of washing away the sweat in the river is a vivid touch, suggesting relief at escape from death. For $16p\bar{\omega}$ anoy $\chi0\epsilon$ (s cf. 11.621, 22.2 $16p\bar{\omega}$ anoy $\chi0\nu$), and 10.572–6.

562 = 11.407, 17.97, 22.122 (monologues), and also 22.385.

563-4 μή ... νοήση expresses a fear that this may happen (cf. 22.123 etc.). ἀπατιρόμενον (only here in Homer) means 'as I take myself off': a metaphor from setting sail according to T and Porphyry (Quaest. hom. 1 256.4, ed. Sodano); cf. ἀπαίρειν, 'sail away', in Attic. The alliteration of π (πόλιος, πεδίονδε) and μ (με μεταίξας μάρψη) may be accidental. Cf. 22.455-6 δείδω μή ... μοῦνον ἀποτμήξας πόλιος πεδίονδε δίηται, in the context of Andromakhe's fear that Hektor may be cut off by Akhilleus.

567 Most MSS have πόλιος, and this should be read here as at 2.811. κοτεναντίον occurs only here in Homer; cf. Hes. Aspis 73 etc.

568-70 There is never any allusion in Homer to the later legend of Akhilleus' invulnerability. τρωτός ('vulnerable') is another Homeric hapax; cf. Euripides (Hel. 810), etc. For $\frac{1}{2}\sqrt{5}$ fa cf. 9.319 $\frac{1}{2}\sqrt{5}$ fif ..., with unu ual hiatus. The sense is 'he only has one life'.

570 Cf. 8.141 νῦν μὲν γὰρ τούτῷ Κρονίδης Ζεὑς κῦδος ὁπάζει. Aristarchus athetized this verse (Arn/A), regarding it as a common type of addition made to supply a verb which can be understood with θνητὸν ... ἀνθρωποι, and pointing out that it weakens the impression of Agenor's resolution to fight. Hektor's monologue ends with a reference to Zeus's decisive power (22.130), but that is not a very close parallel, and Aristarchus could be right.

572 dAel5: cf. 22.308 of Hektor's attack on Akhilleus. It means 'gathering himself together' or perhaps 'crouching'.

573–84 Agenor is compared to a leopard which attacks a hunter and is not deterred either by hounds baying or by being wounded. Cf. 11.414–20, where Odysseus after his soliloquy is compared to a wild boar attacked by dogs and hunters, and 11.415 ô ôé r' elos βαθείης & ξυλόχοιο ... is like 573. For the animal's fearlessness (574–5) cf. 12.45–6, in a comparison of Hektor to a boar or lion confronting dogs and hunters: τοῦ δ' οῦ ποτε κυδάλιμου κῆρ | ταρβεῖ οῦδὲ φοβεῖται ...

575 πάρδαλις: on the variant πόρδαλις see 13.103n. bT say that the leopard is the most aggressive of all the wild beasts, quoting Aristotle's view that the female of this species is more deadly than the male (HA 9.1, $608a_{33}-5$). Leopards occur in the similes at 13.103, 17.20.

575 VACY405 occurs only here in early epic, and later in Xenophon (Cyn. 4.5), etc. Zenodotus and others read xvvvAcY407, and Stesichorus (PMG 255) was quoted in support of this, but this word occurs nowhere else.

576 μ iv ft: Leaf observes that ft is rarely shortened (10.451, 16.515, 21.113, 23.724), and that μ iv is not in its normal place (i.e. after the opening, ϵ [$\pi\epsilon\rho$ yd ρ). He thinks that μ iv should be omitted, and that the variant π is (in the city texts) suggests that both may be mere stop-gaps. But the object seems desirable here and these arguments inconclusive against it.

577-8 The phrase mepl boupl memopulum occurs only here. Support for the realism of these verses came from the scholar Heracleon, who said that he had seen this happen at Rome (bT 577).

580 This verse picks up 574-5 oùbé $\tau_1 \dots \phi_0\beta_0 \tilde{\tau}_0 \tau_0$ (i.e. 'flees') and 578 $\pi \rho i_{\gamma} \gamma' \dots$ The conjunction $\pi \rho i_{\gamma}$ alone with optative only occurs here in Homer, elsewhere with infinitive or occasionally subjunctive. Cf. Chantraine, $GH \equiv 264-5$.

582-9 Agenor makes the usual provocative speech before a single combat. His words resemble Hektor's mocking speech of triumph over the fallen Patroklos (cf. 16.830-6).

584-5 Verse 584 is similar to 16.708. For $v\eta\pi\dot{v}\tau_1$ ' see on 410. For retrividence there is a variant retrividence (most MSS), but this would have to be middle, whereas elsewhere this tense is passive (12.345 etc.). $t\pi'$ during means 'on her account' (cf. LSJ s.v. $t\pi i \pi i 1$).

386 For πολέες τε και άλκιμοι cf. 11.483 Τρῶες ἔπον πολλοί τε και άλκιμοι. The variant άνδρες ἔνειμεν was considered possible by Did/A, but after έν this is unnecessary.

587 of kal was Aristarchus' reading (Did/A), whereas all but one of our MSS have of ke. In spite of Leaf's objection to the latter, ke ... elpuóusoba (future) would be exactly like 1.175, 9.155, 9.297, Od. 5.36 (cf. Chantraine GH II 226). However, Aristarchus clearly regarded kai as having the support of the better MSS. It has the advantage of adding emphasis to Agenor's confident assertion, and therefore seems preferable. For Tokkov see on 15.660 and cf. Chantraine, GH II 224 on this form.

588 πότμον έφέψεις is paralleled by Od. 24.471 πότμον έφέψειν, and the more common πότμον έπισπεῖν etc. (6× $II., 7 \times Od.$). For έκπαγλος see on 452, and for θαρσαλέος πολεμιστής cf. 430 ῶδέ τε θαρσαλέοι ..., and 5.602 (etc.) θαρσαλέον πολεμιστήν (3× II.).

590-8 The fight is briefly described, since it is really only a delaying tactic on Apollo's part, and it soon ends in Agenor's rescue by the god. This may explain its unusual features. Verse 590 is an untypical one, and elsewhere greaves are never actually hit in battle as in 591. Akhilleus' divine greaves are in any case special, but the fact that otherwise greaves belong only to the formular structure of arming-scenes has been thought to support the view that Eukothuides 'Axonol derives from reminiscence of Late Bronze Age warfare, when the Greeks were distinguished from other peoples by their special greaves. As yet no examples of metal greaves have been found between c. 1100 and 700 B.C. in the Greek world (for a possible LHIIIC example cf. P. A. Mountjoy, Opuscula Atheniensia 15 (1984) 135-7). But non-metallic greaves, which would not normally survive to be discovered by the archaeologist, probably continued to be used during this period. See also on 3.330-1.

590 For $\delta \xi \dot{\nu} \dot{\alpha} \kappa ov \tau \alpha$ cf. 10.335 (end of verse), Od. 14.531, 21.340 (in same position as here). For $\beta \alpha \rho \epsilon \eta \gamma \chi \epsilon \rho \delta \gamma \dot{\alpha} \dot{\eta} \kappa \epsilon$ cf. 13.410; $\beta \alpha \rho \epsilon \dot{\alpha} \eta \gamma \kappa \epsilon$ and $\beta \kappa \epsilon c$. 13.410; $\beta \alpha \rho \epsilon \dot{\alpha} \eta \gamma \kappa \epsilon c$ and $\beta \kappa \epsilon c$. 13.410; $\beta \alpha \rho \epsilon \dot{\alpha} \eta \gamma \kappa \epsilon c$ and $\beta \kappa \epsilon c$. 13.410; $\beta \alpha \rho \epsilon \dot{\alpha} \eta \gamma \kappa \epsilon c$ and $\beta \kappa \epsilon c$. 13.410; $\beta \alpha \rho \epsilon \dot{\alpha} \eta \gamma \kappa \epsilon c$ and $\beta \kappa \epsilon c$. 13.410; $\beta \alpha \kappa c \dot{\alpha} \eta \gamma \kappa \epsilon c$. 13.410; $\beta \alpha \kappa c \dot{\alpha} \eta \gamma \kappa \epsilon c$. 13.410; $\beta \alpha \kappa c \dot{\alpha} \eta \gamma \kappa \epsilon c$. 13.410; $\beta \alpha \kappa c \dot{\alpha} \eta \gamma \kappa \epsilon c$. 13.410; $\beta \alpha \kappa c \dot{\alpha} \eta \gamma \kappa \epsilon c$. 13.410; $\beta \alpha \kappa c \dot{\alpha} \eta \gamma \kappa \epsilon c$. 13.410; $\beta \alpha \kappa c \dot{\alpha} \eta \gamma \kappa \epsilon c$. 13.410; $\beta \alpha \kappa c \dot{\alpha} \eta \gamma \kappa \epsilon c$. 13.410; $\beta \alpha \kappa c \dot{\alpha} \eta \gamma \kappa \epsilon c$. 13.410; $\beta \alpha \kappa c \dot{\alpha} \eta \gamma \kappa \epsilon c$. 13.410; $\beta \alpha \kappa c \dot{\alpha} \eta \gamma \kappa \epsilon c$. 13.410; $\beta \alpha \kappa c \dot{\alpha} \eta \gamma \kappa \epsilon c$. 13.410; $\beta \alpha \kappa c \dot{\alpha} \eta \gamma \kappa \epsilon c$. 13.410; $\beta \alpha \kappa c \dot{\alpha} \eta \gamma \kappa \epsilon c$. 14.510; $\delta \alpha \kappa c \dot{\alpha} \eta \gamma \kappa \epsilon c$. 14.510; $\delta \alpha \kappa c \dot{\alpha} \eta \gamma \kappa c$. 15.510; $\delta \alpha \kappa c \dot{\alpha} \eta \gamma \kappa c$. 15.510; $\delta \alpha \kappa c \dot{\alpha} \eta \gamma \kappa c$. 15.510; $\delta \alpha \kappa c \dot{\alpha} \eta \gamma \kappa c$. 16.510; $\delta \alpha \kappa c \dot{\alpha} \eta \gamma \kappa c$. 17.510; $\delta \alpha \kappa c \dot{\alpha} \eta \gamma \kappa c$. 19.510; $\delta \alpha \kappa c \dot{\alpha} \eta \gamma \kappa c$. 19.510; $\delta \alpha \kappa c \dot{\alpha} \eta \gamma \kappa c$. 19.510; $\delta \alpha \kappa c \dot{\alpha} \eta \gamma \kappa c$. 19.510; $\delta \alpha \kappa c \dot{\alpha} \eta \gamma \kappa c$. 19.510; $\delta \alpha \kappa c \dot{\alpha} \eta \gamma \kappa c$. 19.510; $\delta \alpha \kappa c \dot{\alpha} \eta \gamma \kappa c$. 19.510; $\delta \alpha \kappa c \dot{\alpha} \eta \gamma \kappa c$. 19.510; $\delta \alpha \kappa c \dot{\alpha} \eta \gamma \kappa c$. 19.510; $\delta \alpha \kappa c \dot{\alpha} \eta \gamma \kappa c$. 19.510; $\delta \alpha \kappa c \dot{\alpha} \eta \gamma \kappa c$. 19.510; $\delta \alpha \kappa c \dot{\alpha} \eta \gamma \kappa c$. 19.510; $\delta \alpha \kappa c \dot{\alpha} \eta \gamma \kappa c$. 19.510; $\delta \alpha \kappa c \dot{\alpha} \eta \gamma \kappa c$. 19.510; $\delta \alpha \kappa c \dot{\alpha} \eta \gamma \kappa c$. 19.510; $\delta \alpha \kappa c \dot{\alpha} \eta \gamma \kappa c$. 19.510; $\delta \alpha \kappa c$. 19.510; $\delta \alpha \kappa c \dot{\alpha} \eta \gamma \kappa c$. 19.5100; $\delta \alpha \kappa c \dot{\alpha} \eta \kappa c$. 19.5100; $\delta \alpha \kappa c \dot{\alpha} \eta \kappa c$. 19.5100; $\delta \alpha \kappa c$. 19.51000; $\delta \alpha \kappa$

591-4 A blow on the shin occurs elsewhere only at 4.518-19, with no mention of a greave. This episode anticipates 22.289-91, where Hektor's spear hits Akhilleus' shield and rebounds. Cf. also 13.586-92, where an arrow rebounds off a breastplate.

592 Leaf and Allen follow La Roche in reading the variant of for the vulgate μιν. But άμφὶ δέ of should mean 'around (or upon) him', and άμφὶ δέ μιν 'around it' (κνήμην) seems possible here (cf. 16.414 etc.).

For kvnµls veoteúktov kassitépoio cf. 613 kvnµíšas tavoŭ kassitépoio. veôtevktos recurs only in one verse epigram; cf. 5.194 veotevxths. Pure tin would be useless as a protective metal. It looks as if there was already debate in antiquity over this point, for Aristotle (Poel. 1461a27-30) cites kvnµls veoteúktov kassitépoio as an example of an extension of meaning similar to calling a mixture of wine and water 'wine' or iron-workers 'bronzesmiths', etc. This suggests that 'tin' was interpreted as meaning an alloy of tin and another metal (cf. the commentaries of Bywater, Lucas ad loc.). As D. Gray said (JHS 74 (1954) 9), 'the poet apologizes for the impossibility in Φ 594, $\theta \in o \tilde{v} \delta'$ the poet apologizes for the impossibility invulnerable.

593 For σμερδάλεον κονάβησε see on 2.334.

595-6 Πηλεΐδης ... | δεύτερος is again a slightly unusual way of describing a counter-attack.

596-8 For this type of divine rescue cf. Fenik, TBS 12. Verse 597 resembles 3.380-1 τον δ' έξήρπαξ' Άφροδίτη ... έκάλυψε δ' άρ' ή ρι πολλή, 20.442-3 τον δ' έξήρπαξεν Άπόλλων ... έκάλυψε δ' άρ' ή έρι πολλή; also 11.751-2, where Poseidon rescues the Aktorione, καλύψας ή έρι πολλή. ήσύχιος occurs only here in Homer; cf. ήσυχίη Od. 18.22, ήσυχίως HyHerm 438, ήσυχος Hesiod etc. For έκπεμπε νέεσθαι cf. 18.240 πέμψεν ... νέεσθαι, Od. 4.8, 13.206 (ξ) πεμπε νέεσθαι (etc.).

599-601 Apollo's substitution of himself for Agenor is a variant of the ۰.

r

trick which he plays at 5.449-53, where he replaces Aineias with an elowhow over which the Greeks and Trojans fight. But it is also related to the common motif of a god assuming a human disguise on the battlefield.

άποεργάθειν comes only here in ll.; cf. Od. 21.221. There may be wordplay with ἐκάεργος in 600, as this was connected in antiquity with ἐκάς and εἰργειν (cf. Chantraine, Dict. s.v.). Verse 600 resembles 5.450 αὐτῷ τ' Alvelą Ικελον (of the εἰδωλον). In 601 the repetition ποδῶν ... ποσσί cannot be significant. For πρόσθε ποδῶν cf. 16.742, Od. 22.4.

602-11 This episode closes with an effective contrast between the pointless pursuit by Akhilleus of the false Agenor on the empty battlefield, and the crowded scene of panic as the Trojans pour into the city, without stopping to rescue their own comrades. The Book ends as it began with a Trojan rout. Cf. the description of the Greek retreat at the end of book 12, when Hektor breaks through the gates of the Achaean wall.

602-7 η os is answered by τόφρα (606), with δόλω... old in parenthesis. On the form η os for lws in the MSS see Chantraine, GH 1 11. For πάρ ποταμόν βαθυδινήεντα Σκάμανδρον see on 1-2, and for τυτθόν ύπεκπροθέοντα cf. 9.502 | πολλόν ύπεκπροθέει; 21.44 | Ένθεν ύπεκπροφυγών. For Εθελγεν Άπόλλων see on 276.

606-7 These verses seem to echo the warning of Pouludamas (18.270-1, especially 270 ἀσπασίως). Cf. also 19.71-3 (72 ἀσπασίως). In 607 Antimachus and Rhianus read πύλαι δ' ξμπληντο, which would suggest an even more congested scene (also avoiding repetition of πόλις in 607-8); but cf. 22.12, 22.47 εlς ἄστυ ἅλεν, ἀλέντων.

610–11 toouptvos, which A and some other MSS read, seems better than the vulgate domastics, after domastic in 607. sawsai, 3rd person sing. assist optative, is read by Aristarchus, for our vulgate sdwsav (Did/A). The singular verb would go with youva, and the optative would resemble msprivys in 609. As so often, Aristarchus prefers a less obvious reading.

• .

BOOK TWENTY-TWO

The event towards which the action of the poem has been tending, the final conflict of Akhilleus and Hektor, forms the theme of this Book. Its unity is remarkable and its structure relatively simple. After the brief opening scene in which we see Hektor alone before the walls of Troy and Apollo revealing himself to Akhilleus, there follow three speeches. In the first two Priam and Hekabe appeal to Hektor not to face Akhilleus (25-89), and in the third Hektor debates whether to do so or not (90-130). This opening triad of speeches is balanced at the end of the Book by the laments of Priam and Hekabe (405-36) and the longer scene which concludes with the lament of Andromakhe (437-515).

These speeches frame the action, which is in two main parts, the pursuit of Hektor and the duel itself. The narrative of the pursuit is 'frozen' at 166, when the gods debate the outcome (167-87), leading to Athene's intervention, and at 208-15, with extraordinary rapidity, the decisive moment is described when Zeus weighs the fates of the two heroes, Apollo leaves Hektor and Athene arrives at Akhilleus' side. The pursuit ends with brief exchanges between Athene and the two opponents, encouraging Akhilleus and deceiving Hektor into facing his enemy (216-47).

The duel itself is also framed by two exchanges between the contestants, which centre on the fate of the loser's body (248-72, 330-66). The fight is remarkably brief, and the chief impression is of the continuing divine deceit of Hektor followed by his realization of the truth (296-305), and his helplessness in the face of the combined forces of Akhilleus and Athene. Its brevity contrasts with the slowness of the build-up, in which the poet explores in depth the psychological and moral reactions of those concerned on both human and divine levels.

The theme of the mutilation of Hektor's body now dominates, as the Greek army insult the corpse and Akhilleus drags it behind his chariot. Again speeches portray the triumph of the victors, contrasted with extreme manifestations of grief at Troy, distilled above all in the laments of Hektor's family.

The narrative is intensely dramatic almost throughout the Book, rising to high emotional levels especially at the beginning and end. There are fleeting glimpses of a different world, the orderly one of normal life, as in Hektor's vision of the conversation of a pair of lovers (126-8), the reference to the women of Troy washing their clothes outside the walls in peacetime

۰.

t

(153-6), and (most poignant of all) the quiet domestic scene in Hektor's home of Andromakhe weaving and ordering the maids to heat the bath water for his return (440-6), and the memories of their wedding-day evoked by her veil (470-2). All of these intensify the contrast with the grimness of what is now taking place. Poignant too is the juxtaposition of the life-and-death struggle of Hektor's pursuit with the studied formality of the debate in heaven over his fate, so easily and quickly resolved by Zeus's yielding to Athene's protest (157-85).

1-24 The Trojans who have taken refuge in the city recover from their flight, but Hektor remains outside the walls. Apollo discloses his identity to Akhilleus, who is angry with him for having deceived him. Akhilleus approaches the walls ε πεφυζότες ήθτε νεβροl: for πεφυζότες see on 21.6. Cf. 4.243, 21.29 τεθηπότες -ας ήθτε νεβροl -ούς. This simile anticipates the longer one comparing Akhilleus and Hektor to a dog pursuing a fawn at 188 93. Cf. Moulton, Similes 78-80, and on the similes in this Book in general ibid. 76-87.

With the abrupt reference to Hektor's doom at 5-6 we are suddenly back in the mainstream of the narrative, aware that the final conflict is soon to happen.

2 άπεψύχοντο: Aristarchus seems to have preferred ἀνεψύχοντο (Did/ AbT). Elsewhere we have Ιδρῷ ἀπεψύχοντο 11.620, Ιδρῶ ἀποψυχθείς 2:.561, but ἕλκος ἀναψύχοντα 5.795, ἀνέψυχθεν φίλον ἤτορ (after washing) 10.575, ἀνέψυχον φίλον ἤτορ 13.84. These parallels suggest that ἀπε- is right here. For the metaphorical use of ἀκεῖοθαι cf. 13.115, Od. 10.69, 14.383.

3 κεκλιμένοι καλήσιν έπάλξεσιν: this surely means leaning against the battlements rather than spaced along them (which Willcock favours). The Trojans are exhausted.

4 other $\delta\mu$ oion indivations: see on 11.593. There and at 13.488 this occurs in the context of defence rather than attack, and has been taken as referring to a large (body?) shield planted on the ground, against which one could lean (e.g. Leaf ad loc., Lorimer, HM 188). This is implausible, and here it is not possible as the Greeks are on the move. It might indicate a shield held out almost horizontally, with the top end resting on the shoulder, to guard against missiles from the walls. This seems to be the view of T (on 11.593), and cf. Heyne: arcte iunctis ordinibus, ita ut clipeos ante se ferendo humero admotos haberent. For a similar manoeuvre cf. 12.137-8 (with comment), Arch. Hom. E 49 (Borchhardt).

5-6 We last saw Hektor at 20.443-4, when he was rescued from Akhilleus by Apollo. Here the poet reintroduces him with dramatic suddenness, briefly accounting for his remaining outside Troy and at the same time announcing that his doom is impending. $\delta\lambda oin \mu oir \rho \alpha$ only occurs here, instead of $\mu oir \rho' \delta\lambda on (2 \times Il., 5 \times Od.)$. For $\mu oir \rho' tratent of <math>\mu oir \rho' \delta\lambda on (2 \times Il., 5 \times Od.)$. For $\mu oir \rho' tratent of <math>4.517(n.)$, Od. 11.292, Il. 19.91-4 (ATN), and later expressions denoting the 'binding' power of $\delta\nu d\gamma\kappa\eta$ (see Richardson on HyDem 216-17). 'lator may stand for 'lator (see on 21.104).

• 1

t

- • .

For the Scaean gate see on 3.145, 9.354. It was here that Hektor had met Andromakhe (6.392ff.), and here Akhilleus must eventually be killed (22.360). Cf. Schadewaldt, VHWW 294, Elliger, Darstellung der Landschaft 59-62.

7-13 Apollo's speech of self-revelation is lightly mocking (cf. 9 oùôé vù $\pi \omega \mu \epsilon$, 11 Å vù $\tau o \epsilon$... etc.). He does not say which god he is, but Akhilleus realizes (15).

9-10 αύτὸς θνητὸς ἐών θεὸν ἄμβροτον are contrasted as often (cf. 21.380n.). For σừ δ' ἀσπερχές μενεαίνεις cf. 4.32. Here 4.33 has been added by one papyrus, presumably to supply an infinitive with μενεαίνεις.

11-12 Τρώων πόνος ('labour concerning the Trojans') is an objective genitive (cf. 2.356n.). έφόβησας means 'you have put to flight'. For εlς άστυ άλεν cf. 47 εlς άστυ άλέντων, and see on 21.534, 21.607. λιάσθης here means 'you have turned aside' (cf. Leumann, HW 208-9, Chantraine, Dict. s.v. λιάζομαι).

13 µév is 'however' (cf. 283, and Denniston, Particles 362), and µóponµos 'fated to die'. This personal sense recurs at Od. 16.392 = 21.162.

14 πόδας ώκύς Άχιλλεύς: it is here that this fixed characteristic of Akhilleus is most clearly embodied in action; cf. 24 etc., and W. Whallon, Formula, Character and Context (Center for Hellenic Studies, Washington, D.C. 1969) 14-17.

15-20 Akhilleus' angry and defiant reply was censured by Plato, who in the Republic (391A) quotes verses 15 and 20 among the passages which he regards as morally reprehensible. bT (20) reply that Akhilleus shows not arrogance but μ eya λ o ϕ poor $\dot{\nu}$ v\eta (cf. 21 μ eya ϕ pov $\dot{\omega}$ ν). It is typical of this hero that even when confronting Apollo he should be so concerned with honour (18) and revenge (20). His readiness to defy Apollo contrasts with the helplessness of both Diomedes and Patroklos in the face of this god (5.443-4, 16(710-11).

15 ξβλαψάς μ': 'you have fooled me'. In Homer βλάπτειν in the sense of harming one's wits is usually applied to divine powers: cf. 9.507, 9.512, 15.724, 19.94, Od. 14.178, 21.294 (olvos), 23.14. Cf. the later prose word θεοβλάβεια, which is the equivalent of άτη.

θεών όλοώτατε πάντων: for similar complaints about the gods cf. 3.365 with comment, Od. 20.201.

16-20 $\tilde{\eta}$... $\tilde{\eta}$: the repeated assertions stress Akhilleus' frustration.

• .

ţ

17 γαΐαν όδὰξ είλον: cf. 2.418 όδὰξ λαζοίατο γαΐαν, and similar expressions at 11.749, 19.61, Od. 22.269.

18-19 Verse 18 echoes 21.596. For 19 cf. 3.381 peïa udd' de te bede, 16.688-90 (with comment) etc.; 1.515 kmel où toi kmi bede. dufordo means 'in future' (6.450, 24.111). On this divine ease and irresponsibility see Griffin, HLD 188-9.

so Cf. Od. 2.62 ή τ' αν αμυνοίμην, εί μοι δύναμίς γε παρείη.

a2-4 A brief simile, comparing Akhilleus to a prize-winning racehorse. As with the comparison in verse 1 this is picked up later at 162-6 by the simile comparing Hektor and Akhilleus to racehorses. Cf. also 6.506-11, where Paris is compared to a horse running over the plain, and the repetition of this at 15.263-8 where it is applied to Hektor; 15.269 is similar to 22.24.

22-3 For Ιππος άεθλοφόρος cf. 162 άεθλοφόροι ... Ιπποι. Elsewhere άθλοφόρος is used ($3 \times II$). For σύν δχεσφιν ... τιταινόμενος πεδίοιο cf. 23.518 πεδίοιο τιταινόμενος σύν δχεσφι, 6.507 θείη πεδίοιο, 2.390, 12.58 άρμα τιταίνων. Verse 23 means 'who effortlessly races at full stretch over the plain'.

24 Cf. 15.269 ώς Έκτωρ λαιψηρά πόδας και γούνατ' ενώμα, with comment.

25–89 Priam sees Akhilleus approaching the city and entreats Hektor not to face him, describing the evils in store for the Trojans if the city is taken, but his appeal fails. Hekabe also vainly begs him not to stand against Akhilleus

We have already seen Priam watching anxiously from the wall at 21.526-36. We recall also book 3, where he and the other Trojan elders watched with Helen, and Priam took part in the preparations for the single combat between his son Paris and Menelaos. There, however, he went back to Troy because he could not bear to watch the fight (305-7), whereas here he is present throughout the whole conflict. This is one aspect of the structural balance and contrast between these two Books (cf. Introduction, 'Structure'). See also J. T. Kakridis, Homer Revisited (Lund 1971) 68ff., on the connexions of these appeals with Andromakhe's plea to Hektor in book 6; on the links between the speeches in 6 and 22 in general see Beck, Stellung 71-92.

25–32 Priam sees Akhilleus shining in his armour like the Dog-Star, whose destructive character is described. The simile suggests the way in which Priam himself reacts to the sight of Akhilleus (cf. de Jong, Narrators 126). At 5.4–7 a briefer version of this simile is applied to Diomedes, and at 11.61–6 Hektor in his shining armour, darting to and fro in the ranks, is compared to an outlos dormo now shining and then hidden in the clouds. At 13.242–5 Idomeneus' armour is like Zeus's lightning. The present comparison is echoed at 317-20, where the glint of Akhilleus' spear-point is like the evening star at dusk. See Moulton, Similes 26-7, 80-1, and Hermes 102 (1974) 392-4.

• .

t

26-7 παμφαίνονθ' ώς τ' ἀστέρ'... ὄς ῥά τ' ὁπώρης εἶσιν: cf. 5.5-6 ἀστέρ' ὁπωρινῷ ἐναλίγκιον, ὅς τε μάλιστα | λαμπρὸν παμφαίνησι ..., with comment. The star is Sirius, the brightest of the fixed stars, and the chief star of the constellation Canis Maior. The words 'which goes forth at harvest-time' refer to its heliacal rising at dawn in mid-July. The following period, until mid-September, is one of intense heat in Greece and Asia Minor, and it was thought that Sirius was responsible for fevers at this time (cf. West on Hes. Erga 417).

27-8 For $dpl \zeta \eta \lambda oi \delta d c d v v c f.$ the simile at 13.244, where 245 = 22.32. The obscure and impressive phrase vortos $duo\lambda \gamma \tilde{\omega}$ recurs in 317 of the evening star, and cf. 11.173, 15.324, Od. 4.841. All four examples in the lliad are in similes. Because of 317, and also the reference to Sirius' rising at dawn (27), it has been taken as referring to the twilight of evening or dawn in these two passages (Eust. 1255.5, bT 317). But Sirius would not be so bright at such a time, and this does not seem to suit the other Homeric passages where it occurs, in which the sense 'at dead of night' seems more appropriate (see on 11.173, and West on Od. 4.841).

29 KÚV' ' Ω płwos: originally KÚV' ' Ω αρlωvos; cf. Chantraine, GH I 16. Akhilleus is later compared to a dog hunting a fawn (188-93). ἐπίκλησιν καλέουσιν recurs at 506 and 18.487 = Od. 5.273. ἐπίκλησις sometimes means 'second name' or 'nickname', and perhaps this is the sense here (with Sirius as the first name); see on 6.402-3.

30-2 The two hemistichs of 30 are contrasted. For kakov $\delta t = \sigma \eta \mu \alpha$ returtal cf. 13.244 deliku's $\sigma \eta \mu \alpha \beta \rho \sigma \sigma \sigma \sigma \eta \mu \alpha \kappa \alpha \kappa \delta v$, Od. 23.188 $\sigma \eta \mu \alpha$ returtal. The word $\pi v \rho t \sigma \delta$ occurs only here in Homer. Later it meant 'fever', and Arn/A held that this, rather than 'heat', was the meaning here too. Verse 32 = 13.245.

33-4 κεφαλήν ... χερσίν | ύψόσ' ἀνασχόμενος: striking the head with one's hands and raising one's hands above one's head were both traditional expressions of strong grief, found also in Greek mourning ritual: cf. Reiner, Die rituelle Totenklage 42-3; Neumann, Gesten und Gebärden 86; Alexiou, Ritual Lament 6. This is echoed at the end of Priam's speech, when he tears his hair in grief. With ἀνασχόμενος one should understand χεῖρας: cf. 3.362, 23.660, 23.686, Od. 18.95. ὥμωξεν ... μέγα δ' οἰμώξας is an unusual repetition. Priam's appeal is desperate.

35-6 δ δὲ προπάροιθε πυλάων | ἐστήκει: cf. the two Lapiths at 12.131-2 τώ μὲν ἅρα προπάροιθε πυλάων ὑψηλάων | ἔστασαν ...

36 At this stage we know nothing of the inner turmoil which Hektor is about to go through (98-130). For άμοτον μεμαώς ... μάχεσθαι cf. 13.80 άμοτον μεμαῶτι μάχεσθαι [.

37 For xeipors opervus, a gesture of entreaty, cf. 1.351 with comment.

۰,

38-76 Priam begins his speech by begging Hektor not to risk virtually certain death by facing Akhilleus. He goes on to speak of the other sons he has lost, expresses his fears that Lukaon and Poludoros may also have been killed (cf. 20.407-18, 21.34-135), and says that Hektor is the one hope for Troy's salvation. The second half of the speech (59-76) is an appeal to Hektor to pity his father, followed by a vivid description of the horrors that await the Trojans if the city is taken, and a terrible vision of how his own dogs will eat his body after he is killed.

38-9 The oblique reference of ανέρα τοῦτον could be occasioned by the lack of a traditional formula for Akhilleus in the accusative, with initial vowel, and in this part of the verse. But it is effective in this context. Cf. in Hekabe's speech 84 άμυνε δὲ δήῖον ἀνδρα; 379, 418 (ἀνέρα τοῦτον); and similar indirect expressions at 8.96, 13.746, 14.250, 18.257, 21.314, 24.204, 24.207, 24.212. For olos ἀνενθ' ἁλλων see on 416.

4x-3 The asyndeton in these verses indicates urgency. Cf. 295, 16.126-9, 24.354-5, with comments. This kind of effect is discussed by [Longinus] (19-20) and prose examples are collected in J. D. Denniston, Greek Prose Style (Oxford 1952) 99ff.

 $\mathfrak{g}\mathfrak{l}$ $\sigma\chi\ell\tau\lambda\iotaos$: since the previous and following clauses have Akhilleus as their subject this presumably refers to him, rather than being addressed to Hektor. At 86 however it may well refer to Hektor (see comment).

41-2 albi ... Euclis an example of an unusual figure of speech, ϕ (λ os here implying its opposite by a kind of grim irony (cf. Arn/A). For Kúves Kal yữnes Ebour cf. 18.271 Kúves Kal yữnes Ebouran, and 4.237, 16.836 yữnes Ebouran. This is a persistent theme throughout book 22, leading up to the issue of Hektor's burial. Cf. 66-76, 89, 335-6, 339, 348, 354, 508 10, and Segal, Mutilation of the Corpse 33-47. Ebour is Aristarchus' reading here (Did/A), whereas all our manuscripts read Ebouran, probably owing to the influence of the parallel passages. The future with KEV is possible, but the optative is better in the context of 41-3.

43 άπὸ πραπίδων ἄχος έλθοι: cf. 24.514 άπὸ πραπίδων ήλθ' ίμερος.

44-5 EVVIS occurs only here and at Od. 9.524 in Homer, later in Empedocles (57.2) and Aeschylus (Pers. 289 etc.). The loss of so many of Priam's sons is an important theme, especially in the later books of the poem: cf. 423-6, 24.255-60, 24.493-501, Griffin, HLD 123ff. For 45 see on 21.454.

46-55 As elsewhere, the poet here binds his narrative together by linking the deaths of Poludoros and Lukaon in books 20-1 with the possibility of Hektor's death. For Laothoe and Altes see on 21.84-7.

46-8 δύο παίδε... οὐ δύναμαι Ιδέειν... τούς μοι Λαοθόη τέκετο ...: cf. 3.236-8 (Helen to Priam on the walls of Troy): δοιώ δ' οὐ δύναμαι Ιδέειν κοσμήτορε λαῶν ... αὐτοκασιγνήτω, τώ μοι μία γείνατο μήτηρ. The context is similar in both cases: Helen searches vainly for her brothers who are dead, as Priam here fails to find his sons.

48 κρείουσα γυναικῶν: κρείουσα (the feminine of κρείων) only occurs here in Homer. Cf. the proper name Kreousa, and Hes. fr. 26.7-8 $\tau[\alpha]_{5}$ ποτε [Λ]α0[θό]η κρείουσ' Ύπερηζε ά[μύ]μων | [γεί]νατο ...; 26.31a Άντιόχη κρείουσα; Theocr. Id. 17.132 οῦς τέκετο κρείουσα 'Ρέα. It looks as if it belonged primarily to genealogical poetry.

49 'Their father's ignorance is very pitiable' (bT). Helen's ignorance of her brothers' deaths in book 3 evokes a similar pathos.

49-50 $\tilde{\eta}$ $\tau' \tilde{\alpha}v \dots \tilde{\alpha}mo\lambda \dot{\upsilon}\sigma \sigma \mu \theta'$: $\tilde{\alpha}v$ can be used with the 'modal' future indicative, but $\dot{\alpha}mo\lambda \upsilon \sigma \sigma \mu \theta \theta'$ is probably a orist subjunctive here; cf. Chantraine, GH II 225-6. The variant $\dot{\alpha}mo\lambda \dot{\upsilon}\sigma \sigma \mu ev$ (A) is inappropriate here, as the middle is used of the person who offers a ransom. This allusion foreshadows Priam's ransoming of Hektor in book 24.

49-51 There are similar passages referring to ransoming at 6.46-50, 10.378-81 (especially 378-9 fort1 ydp kvov | $\chi\alpha\lambda\kappa\delta\beta$ te $\chi\rho\nu\sigma\delta\beta$ te), 11.131-5 and 22.340-1. Gifts provided by the bride's father or family on her marriage are mentioned or implied several times elsewhere in Homer: cf. 6.191-5, 9.147-56, Od. 4.735-6, 7.311-14, 20.341-2, 23.227-8, and perhaps Od. 1.277-8, 2.132-3. It seems most probable (despite A. M. Snodgrass, JHS 94 (1974) 116-17) that the conventions of marriage reflected in the poems involved an exchange of gifts between both sides, rather than simply 'purchase' of the bride. Cf. M. I. Finley, Revue Internationale des Droits de l'Antiquité (3^e ser.) 2 (1955) 167-94 = Economy and Society in Ancient Greece, edd. B. D. Shaw and R. P. Salter (London 1983) 233-45; W. K. Lacey, JHS 86 (1966) 55-68; I. Morris, Classical Antiquity 5 (1986) 81-138; I. N. Perysinakis, CQ 41 (1991) 297-302. See also on 88.

δνομάκλυτος (51) is found only here in Homer, although cf. δνομα κλυτόν at Od. 9.364, 19.183; for the compound epithet cf. HyHerm 59, etc.

52-3 One should surely punctuate with a comma at the end of 52, rather than after $\tau\epsilon\theta\nu\alpha\sigma\iota$ (both are discussed by Nicanor). The former is supported by the parallel verses at Od. 4.834 etc. \dagger $\dagger\delta\eta$ $\tau\epsilon\theta\nu\eta\kappa\epsilon$ (- $\alpha\sigma\iota$) $\kappa\alpha$ $\epsilon\nu$ 'Albao $\delta\delta\mu\iota\iota\sigma\iota$.

54-8 This brings Priam's argument back to his main point, the appeal to Hektor not to risk his life too, since Troy depends on him. In 55 fly μή και σύ θάνης means 'as long as you are not killed as well'.

56-8 Priam here puts forward several arguments together, appealing to Hektor (a) to save the Trojans, (b) to avoid giving glory to Akhilleus, and (c) to save his own life. Finally (59-76) he launches into his passionate plea to save Priam himself from a terrible fate.

59 φρονέοντ': 'while I still have my senses', or perhaps rather 'while I still live': so bT, and LSJ s.v. φρονέω iv.

۰.

ţ

60 δύσμορος occurs only here and at 481 in ll., $6 \times Od$. It is confined to speeches, always at the beginning of the verse (cf. Griffin, JHS 106 (1986) 41-2, for such emotional language in speeches). $t\pi l \gamma \eta \rho \alpha \sigma_5$ out $\delta \phi$ recurs at 24.487 and $3 \times Od$. Since Priam is already an old man $\gamma \eta \rho \alpha \sigma_5$ is most probably a defining genitive, 'the threshold consisting of old age', implying that old age is itself seen as a transitional stage between life and death. Cf. J. T. Kakridis, Gymnasium 78 (1971) 512-13.

6z-5 'He anticipates the fall of Troy' (A). bT comment on the grim economy of this catalogue of a sacked city's troubles, observing how the poet refrains from equipping any of the nouns with the usual epithets, and comparing 9.591-4 for a similar description; see also on 12.457-66. The repeated participial phrases produce a relentless, monotonous effect. For the mention of the $\theta \alpha \lambda \alpha \mu \omega_1$ of Priam's extended family cf. 6.242-50. In a sack the most private family rooms are descripted.

62-4 EARNOELOOS TE OUYOTPOS ... KOL VÍMIA TÉRVA | BAAAÓMEVA MPOTLYALJ: T thinks of the fate of Kassandra, raped by Locrian Aias, and of Astuanax, who was thrown from the wall of Troy in later versions of the sack (lliupersis, OCT vol. v, p. 108.2-3 = Davies, EGF p. 62.23-4, llias Parva fr. 19 Allen = Davies, EGF fr. 20; see on 24.734-9). EARENV is used of rape at Od. 11.580; cf. 11. 6.465 EARNOMOIO. As Schadewaldt observed (Hellas und Hesperien, Zürich 1960, 37), in such allusions to the sack of Troy the poet 'makes what in the tradition is simple fact into a medium for the expression of psychological themes'.

65 This verse has been suspected as repetitious after 62. Certainly without it we should have an effective climax at 63-4, but given the style of this passage the repetition could be original. Most MSS of Plutarch (Mor. 114A) omit the verse, but they also omit 69-73.

66-76 The common motif of a body being eaten by dogs is here developed in a unique way, since these dogs are Priam's own. Leaf calls this 'an exaggeration of horror unlike the true Epic style'. Moreover, 71-6 correspond closely with Tyrtaeus fr. 10.21-30 West:

αίσχρου γάρ δή τοῦτο, μετά προμάχοισι πεσόντα κεῖσθαι πρόσθε νέων ἄνδρα παλαιότερον, ήδη λευκου ἔχοντα κάρη πολιόν τε γένειον, θυμον ἀποπνείοντ' ἀλκιμον ἐν κονίῃ, αἰματόεντ' αίδοῖα φίλαις ἐν χερσίν ἔχοντα – αίσχρὰ τά γ' ὀφθαλμοῖς καὶ νεμεσητὸν ἰδεῖν, καὶ χρόα γυμνωθέντα: νέοισι δὲ πάντ' ἐπέοικεν, ὄφρ' ἐρατῆς ἦβης ἀγλαὸν ἄνθος ἔχῃ, ἀνδράσι μὲν θηητὸς ἰδεῖν, ἐρατὸς δὲ γυναιξὶ ζωὸς ἑών, καλὸς δ' ἐν προμάχοισι πεσών.

۰.

Tyrtaeus is exhorting the young men not to neglect the defence of their elders in battle, and many modern scholars have argued that these verses suit the context there much better than the corresponding ones in the Iliad, where Priam is urging his son not to face Akhilleus, and so 71-3 are out of place. Cf. already bT 71-3: 'this appears to be an exhortation to die, rather than a discouragement' (etc.).

This has led to rejection of 69-76 as a later addition: cf. Leaf on 69, Schadewaldt, VHWW 300 n. 1, Von der Mühll, Hypomnema 332-3 (with other references), Lohmann, Reden 168. It is more probable, however, that both Homer and Tyrtaeus are making use of a protreptic passage belonging to the epic tradition, and that Homer has adapted it to a different context. Priam's point is that death and subsequent mutilation of one's body are disgraceful for an old man, and that therefore Hektor should think of the safety of his father and his people, rather than any personal honour gained by not running away. Verses 71-3 belong strictly within this context here.

As for Priam's dogs, cf. Segal, Mutilation of the Corpse 33: 'The threatened mutilation of Priam by his own dogs in his own house (cf. 22.69) also illustrates one of the broader implications of the corpse theme: that is, the destruction of civilized values, of civilization itself, by the savagery which war and its passions release.' It is a gruesome vision, but no more horrific than, for example, Akhilleus' wish that he might eat Hektor's raw flesh (346-7), or Hekabe's that she might eat Akhilleus' liver (24.212-13); cf. also 4.34-6. For general discussion of such passages see Segal, Mutilation of the Corpse 38-41, Griffin, HLD 20-1, 117.

In the llias Parva Priam is killed by Neoptolemus 'at the doors of his house' (fr. 16 Allen = Davies, EGF fr. 17): cf. here 66 πρώτησι θύρησι. In the lliupersis, however, he dies at the altar of Zeus Epksios (OCT vol. v, p. 107.30-1 = Davies, EGF p. 62.19-20), and this is the usual version later. In art his death is often associated with that of Astuanax, and sometimes also with the rape of Kassandra. Cf. Austin on Virgil, Aen. 2.506-58, and see on 62-4, 24.734-9.

66-7 αὐτὸν δ' ἀν ... | ὡμησταὶ ἐρύουσιν: for ἀν with the future see on 49-50. The phrase ὡμησταὶ ἐρύουσι is applied to birds devouring a corpse at 11.454.

68 For peter, meaning 'limbs' here, see on 16.855-8.

69-71 Leaf punctuates with a colon after 68, making ous refer forward, and of in 70 demonstrative. That is possible, but it seems preferable with the OCT to take ous as picking up κύνες in 66, with $\frac{1}{2}\pi \epsilon \epsilon \tau \tau s \dots \frac{1}{2}\lambda\eta \tau \alpha t$ as a parenthesis. For τραπεζήας cf. 23.173, Od. 17.309 τραπεζήες κύνες. θυραωρούς was Aristarchus' reading (Did/A) and that of a papyrus and a few MSS, πυλαωρούς being the vulgate text. θυραωρός occurs nowhere else in Homer (cf. later θυρωρός), πυλαωρός at 21.530, 24.681. The objection to $\pi \nu \lambda \alpha \omega \rho \delta \varsigma$ was that $\pi \nu \lambda \eta$ refers to the gate of a city, not a house, although $\pi \nu \lambda \eta$ or $\pi \nu \lambda \alpha$ are sometimes used of a house-door in Attic tragedy (cf. LSJ). It is possible that $\pi \nu \lambda \alpha \omega \rho \rho \nu \varsigma$ is original, and $\theta \nu \rho \alpha \omega \rho \rho \nu \varsigma$ an ancient conjecture: so van der Valk, Researches II 140.

70-1 άλύσσοντες means 'restless', 'maddened'. This form of the verb occurs only here in epic, and nowhere else later in the present tense, but cf. 5.352 etc. άλύειν. In περί θυμῷ, περί is probably adverbial, as in περί κῆρι etc. ἐν προθύροισι echoes the end of 66, rounding off this passage. For the second hemistich of 71 cf. Tyrt. fr. 10.27 νέοισι δὲ πάντ' ἐπέοικεν.

72 άρηϊκταμένω: only here, but cf. άρηξφατος, δαικτάμενος. If one were to write this as two words (Άρηϊ κταμένω) the parallelism and chiasmus with the following hemistich would be more clearly brought out. The series of dative endings, repetition of the same idea, and heavy spondaic opening all combine to give this line a dirge-like effect. δεδαϊγμένος -ον δξέι χαλκώ occurs $4 \times$ and δεδαϊγμένος -οι $2 \times$ in books 18-19, especially of Patroklos.

73 KETOPOL is added somewhat awkwardly (contrast Tyrt. fr. 10.22), and the rest of the verse repeats the idea of 71-2 in a rather weak way. orn powing was taken as meaning 'whatever befalls him' by Leaf, but the sense 'whatever is visible' (i.e. of his body) is surely better (cf. Willcock).

74-6 These verses appear to have been omitted by the Hellenistic papyrus (pap. 12): cf. West, Ptolemaic Papyri 161.

74 πολιόν τε κάρη πολιόν τε γένειον: cf. 24.516 for this emphatic repetition (Akhilleus pities Priam). Tyrtaeus has λευκόν ... κάρη πολιόν τε γένειον (fr. 10.23).

75 alõõ suggests alõoĩa. Tyrtaeus (fr. 10.25) is brutally explicit, whereas the abstract noun here implies that this form of disfigurement is a particular affront to someone's alõós in general. Homeric decorum generally avoids references to alõoĩa: see on 2.262 (the only other Homeric use of alõós in this sense), and in general Wackernagel, Sprachliche Untersuchungen 224-9. As with 71, NÚVES picks up the beginning of this section of the speech at the end (cf. 66).

76 τοῦτο δή οἶκτιστον: cf. Od. 12.258 οἶκτιστον δή κείνο ἐμοῖς ίδον όφθαλμοῖσι. οἶκτιστος occurs only here in Il., but $6 \times Od$., always in speeches except once (22.472 οἶκτιστα).

77-8 Tearing one's hair is again a common feature of mourning ritual, which recurs at 405-6, 18.27, 24.710-11 and Od. 10.567; see also on 33-4.

79-81 Hekabe is more emotional. She weeps and laments, exposing her breast. There are parallels to this gesture of exposure by women in a conflict in Tacitus' account of the Germans and also in Irish literature: cf. Tac. Germania 8.1, and Griffin, HLD 25 n. 66. $\kappa o \lambda \pi \delta v \delta v \omega \omega v \eta$ means 'drawing open the fold of her dress'.

Ba-g Hekabe's speech is much shorter than Priam's, but it is a more personal appeal for pity. It is a traditional feature of entreaties that she should remind Hektor of what she has given him in the past ($\varepsilon | \pi \sigma \tau \varepsilon ... \tau \tilde{\omega} \psi \psi \eta \sigma \alpha ...$). She goes on to envisage Hektor's unburied body as a prey for the dogs, deprived of burial rites. Her thoughts turn to the funeral lament which it would be the duty of his mother and wife to make if he dies: cf. 352-4, 426-8, 508-14, and for the laments themselves 24.719-59. Notice also the rush of imperatives in 82-5, and the repeated vocatives of endearment: $\tau \pm v \omega \psi \psi \omega \dots \psi \lambda \varepsilon \tau \pm v \omega \dots \psi \lambda \omega$, The speech is echoed in Stesichorus' Geryoneis by Geruon's mother, Supplementum Lyricis Gra cis ed. Page, S 13.2-5.

82 albeo kal μ ' $i\lambda i\eta \sigma \sigma v$: so also at 21.74. albás and $i\lambda e \sigma s$ are crucial concepts in these closing books of the poem, recurring at 123-4, 419, 24.44, 24.207-8 and 24.503.

83-4 εἶ ποτέ τοι ... τῶν μνῆσαι: cf. 1.39 εἶ ποτέ τοι etc. (in a prayer), 394-407 εἶ ποτε ... τῶν νῦν μιν μνήσασα ... (Thetis' entreaty to Zeus), etc. λαθικηδέα is an effective epithet, only here in epic; cf. Alc. 346.3 L-P οἶνον ... λαθικάδεον, etc. For δήῖον ἄνδρα see on 38.

85 έών is the reading of Aristarchus (Did/A) and some of our MSS for the vulgate lών. Leaf also prefers έών, but either seems possible. There are similar variants at 4.277.

86-9 Cf. especially 352-4 ούδ' ώς σέ γε πότνια μήτηρ | ενθεμένη λεχέεσσι γοήσεται, δν τέκεν αὐτή, | άλλὰ κύνες τε καὶ οἰωνοὶ κατὰ πάντα δάσονται.

86 $\sigma\chi$ ($\tau\lambda$ 105 is repeated from 41. Here however it may well refer to Hektor, and this is how the OCT takes it. It means 'persistent', 'obstinate': cf. $\sigma\chi$ (θ), and the etymology of Hektor's own name implied at 24.730. It is used by Diomedes to Nestor when he is woken up by him at 10.164, by Akhilleus of Patroklos at 18.13, and to Odysseus by Athene at Od. 13.293 and 20.45: so it does not need to be hostile.

87 φίλον θάλος: the metaphorical θάλος is more effective as a term of endearment than the variant τέκος. θάλος occurs in II. only here, but it is used (metaphorically) at Od. 6.157, HyDem 66 and 187.

88 άλοχος πολύδωρος: as at 6.394 (Andromakhe meeting Hektor), Od. 24.294 (Penelope). πολύδωρος was interpreted as meaning that she had received many marriage gifts from her parents (A 6.394, Arn/A on 22.88; cf. Arn/A on 2nd hemistich of 9.147); see on 49-51. Hektor's own gifts are mentioned at 472.

άνευθε... μέγα νῶϊν means 'very far away from us'. This use of μέγα with an adverb seems to be unique, but for μέγα of distance cf. 14.363 μέγα προθορών. The interlaced word-order is unusual, and these simple words have great intensity.

۰,

ı

91–130 Hektor ignores his parents' entreatues, and waits for Akhilleus' attack. But he then begins to debate whether or not to remain after all. Eventually he resolves to stand firm

90-2 With these transitional verses the focus moves to Hektor himself. The repetition of the phrase ovor "Ektopi $\theta \cup \mu \partial \nu \in \pi \in 100$ (78, 91) stresses his obduracy, preparing for the simile which follows. Hektor's refusal to listen reminds us of his earlier obduracy towards Pouludamas and others, which he himself will soon recall (99-103).

92 'Αχιλήα πελώριον: as at 21.537. In both cases the epithet emphasizes Akhilleus' menacing and awe-inspiring approach, as seen through the eyes of Priam or Hektor. Cf. de Jong, Narrators 129-30 (also on the following simile).

93-7 Hektor is compared to an angry and venomous snake waiting at the entrance to its hole to attack a man. At 3.33-7 Paris retreats before Menelaos like a man confronted by a snake; and at 12.200-7 an eagle is counter-attacked by the snake which it is carrying. These passages imply the same view of snakes as vicious and courageous creatures (cf. Fränkel, Gleichnisse 69). The snake in its lair also suggests the idea of Hektor just outside the gate of Troy.

Notice the reversal of the simile in book 3, implying the contrast between Paris and Hektor: there the snake is Menelaos and Paris retreats, whereas here the snake is Hektor who stands and waits. But in book 3 Paris eventually does stand and fight a duel, although only after Hektor's reproaches, whereas here Hektor's resolution breaks down and he flees. It is ironic that the hero who had always urged on the other Trojans should here lose his own nerve at the supreme moment of crisis. Cf. Introduction, 'Structure', and Schadewaldt, VHWW 304-5; see also Fenik, Tradition 83-4, on the relationship of this simile to Hektor's monologue.

93 $\tan \chi \epsilon \eta$: this word for the snake's hole is repeated at 95, and occurs only here in epic. Cf. Pindar, I. 8.77 etc. For δρέστερος άνδρα μένησι some city texts read δρέστερον άνδρα δοκεύη. δρέστερος also occurs only here in II.; cf. Od. 10.212.

94 βεβρωκώς κακά φάρμακ': imitated by Virgil in a simile at Aen. 2.471: coluber mala gramina pastus. Evidently snakes were believed to get their poison from the food which they ate; this is stated by Aelsan (NA 6.4), but it is clear that he is basing himself on Homer, whom he cites. Pliny (HN 8.139) says that snakes have no venom when hibernating, which seems to imply the same belief. For έδυ δέ τέ μιν χόλος αίνος cf. 9.553, 19.16 έδυ χόλος.

95 The phrase σμερδαλέον δε δέδορκεν only occurs here in Homer, but cf. 3.342 δεινόν δερκόμενοι, etc. The word δράκων itself is related to δέρκομαι, so there is probably deliberate etymological word-play here, as the D-scholiast suggests. $\epsilon\lambda$ iogóμενος περί χείη belongs to a group of formular phrases: 1.317 $\epsilon\lambda$ iogoμένη περί καπνώ, 18.372 -ον περί φύσος, 21.11 -οι περί δίνας.

97 The verse presents a vivid detail. The shield resting on a projecting tower, and likewise Akhilleus leaning on his spear at 225, remind T appropriately of sculpture. There are similar details at 112 and 21.17-18, 21.549(n.).

98-130 Hektor's soliloguy is the longest and most complex of its type: see on Agenor's speech (21.550-70), which it most closely resembles. After the poet's insistence on Hektor's determination this speech is at first sight a surprise. But we must judge it in its context. In the eyes of those who look on, Hektor initially displays a stubborn determination to stand firm. But the poet reveals to us that internally he is in a turmoil of uncertainty (cf. the reference to Agenor's courage at 21.547, followed by his soliloquy). Hektor's reasoning culminates in the conclusion that the only practical course is to fight, but as soon as Akhilleus is really close fear gets the upper hand, and he flees (131-7). Then, deceived into thinking he has support from Deiphobos, he again makes a stand and shows defiance (226ff.), until he realizes the truth; then he despairs, but nevertheless displays a final, desperate courage (296ff.). This oscillation, extended here over a series of episodes, might be seen as the forerunner of those more concentrated scenes in tragedy (especially in Euripides) where internal debate and conflict are shown. On these cf. W. Schadewaldt, Monolog und Selbstgespräch (Berlin 1926), especially 189ff.; and on Hektor's monologue the works referred to at 21.550-70n.

98–9 Verse 98 = 21.552 (see note), etc., and for ώ μοι έγών, εί μέν κε ... see on 21.553. After 99 pap. 12 has an extra verse: λωβητός κεν πασι μετά $T[\rho$ ώεσσι (e.g. γενοίμην).

100-10 The debate in which Pouludamas urged retreat into Troy and Hektor rejected this advice took place at 18.243-313. Hektor actually boasted then that he would not run away from Akhilleus (306-8), and the poet commented that Athene robbed the Trojans of their wits when they agreed with him (311-13); so here (104) Hektor refers to his disastrous error. Because of this he is now afraid of the shame and disgrace of failure, and feels that it is better to face his enemy. At least he may die honourably (105-10).

We see how preoccupied Hektor still is with honour and shame, rather than with the sort of consideration for his people's future safety which had dictated Pouludamas' advice, and which Priam has also been urging. There is a significant parallel with his refusal to listen to Andromakhe's advice in book 6 (405-65). There too Hektor was concerned above all with honour and shame (6.442 = 22.105; note also the reference to Andromakhe at 22.88, picking up 6.394). Cf. J. M. Redfield, Nature and Culture in the Iliad: the Tragedy of Hector (Chicago 1975) 157-8: 'the same inner force that sent him into battle—his aidös before the men and women of Troy—prevents him from returning home'. bT's comment is also worth quoting: 'the poet shows how disastrous is the love of honour ($\phi_i\lambda \sigma_{1i}\mu|\alpha$): for because he does not wish to be called a coward (kokós) by a baser man (kokottépou) ... he perishes. His reasoning displays a noble spirit, but also folly: for he wanted to cure one evil by another.'

۰.

100 For ελεγχείην άναθήσει cf. 23.408 ελεγχείην καταχεύη |. This compound verb occurs only here in Homer; cf. Hes. Erga 658, etc.

102 νύχθ' ὑπὸ τήνδ' ὁλοήν: 'in the course of this (last) cursed night'. Pap. 12 replaces this by the colourless νύκτα ποτ δνοφερήν, probably because this use of ὑπό in a temporal sense is so rare (cf. 16.202n.). For ὁλοή applied to νύξ see on 16.567-8.

103 = 5.201. Here and at 108 there was a variant κάλλιον (cf. 15.195-9n.).

104-5 For 104 cf. 4.409 keivoi de opertéphois araobalinois oborro (of the Seven against Thebes), with comment. araobalos and related words occur $5 \times II$, but $26 \times Od$. Verse 105 = 6.442. See on 100-10 above.

106 For μ η nort ris elimpsi cf. 23.575. Kakárepos allos emeio implies that it is more dishonourable to be criticized by a 'baser' man. Hektor is constantly concerned about what people will say: see on 6.459-62, 7.87-91 and 7.300-2, also 6.479-81, 16.838-42, and Martin, Language of Heroes 136-8.

108–10 TÓTE means 'in that case', i.e. 'because I fear disgrace'. In 109-10 KOTOKTEÍVOVTO ... OVT $\overline{\psi}$... is the vulgate text, but Aristarchus (Did/A) knew KOTOKTEÍVOVTI as an alternative, and our MSS have the variants KOTOKTEÍVOVTI and OVTÓV. Leaf comments judiciously that KOTOKTEÍVOVTO 'has yielded as usual to the influence of the infin. with which it is closely connected (to slay and return), and is undoubtedly more Homeric', whereas 'the dative OVT $\overline{\psi}$ seems necessary to keep up the connexion with EµoI: the acc. would be ambiguous, as it might refer to Achilles'.

HO KEV 'seems to serve here as a reinforcement of the δv above' (Leaf). Pap. 12 reads $f_1[\alpha v] \tau \tilde{\varphi} \pi [\rho \delta \pi \delta \lambda] \eta \sigma_5 t v \kappa \lambda \epsilon_1 \tilde{\omega}_5 \delta \pi [\rho \lambda t \sigma \theta \alpha_1]$, which would be a perfectly reasonable verse, and one which avoids the correption and awkward trochaic rhythm of $\alpha v \tau \tilde{\varphi}$ and $\delta \lambda t \sigma \theta \alpha_1$; but it may have arisen owing to objection to KEV, such as is expressed by Arn/A. Cf. van der Valk, Researches II 566-7, Chantraine, GH II 311. $\pi \rho \delta \pi \delta \lambda \eta \sigma_5$ means 'in defence of the city'.

121-30 Hektor now considers offering Akhilleus the return of Helen and the property which Paris stole, together with the further offer to divide all the wealth of Troy between Greeks and Trojans: this measure was mentioned as an alternative to the sack of a city at 18.509-12. He breaks off, however, reflecting that Akhilleus would not respect him but simply kill him, unarmed as he is. Finally he resolves to fight.

III El Sé NEV ...: see on 21.556. Here the suspension of the conditional clause is sustained over eleven whole verses, producing an effect of climax as Hektor's offer grows progressively more extraordinary in value, until it reaches the point where he himself realizes that this is all just day-dreaming. At this point (122) he breaks off, without reaching an apodosis.

112-13 For δόρυ δε πρός τειχος έρείσας see on 97. αὐτός means 'on my own', or perhaps 'unarmed', and ἀντίος perhaps 'as a suppliant' (so T).

114-18 In book 3 the duel was fought άμφ' Έλένη και κτήμασι πάσι (70), and Agamemnon added the idea of further compensation (286-7). At 7.345-64 Paris refused to give up Helen, but was willing to return the property and to add more from his own house. Cf. 114 and 117 with 7.350-1 Έλένην και κτήμαθ' άμ' αὐτη | δώομεν Άτρειδησιν άγειν.

115-16 Cf. 7.389-90 κτήματα μέν δσ' Άλέξανδρος κοίλης ένὶ νηυσίν [ήγάγετο Τροίηνδ'... For ή τ' ἕπλετο νείκεος ἀρχή cf. 11.604 (with comment) κακοῦ δ' ἀρα ol πέλεν ἀρχή; Od. 8.81 (of the Trojan War) πήματος ἀρχή. ή refers to the whole of what precedes, i.e. the rape of Helen, and is attracted to the case of ἀρχή.

117-18 άμφίς means apart from what has already been mentioned. άποδάσστσθαι (future) is Aristarchus' reading (Did/A) for our vulgate άποδάσσασθαι.

119 Τρωσίν... γερούσιον δρκον: i.e. an oath taken by the elders in the name of the people of Troy. See on 4.259 γερούσιον αίθοπα οίνον.

120-1 Cf. 18.511-12 ανδιχα πάντα δάσασθαι | κτῆσιν δσην πτολίεθρον ἐπήρατον έντὸς ἔεργεν. Here the future δάσεσθαι seems to have been read in antiquity (cf. T), and is preferable, as in 118. Verse 121 is omitted by a papyrus and several MSS, including A. It is not really needed after 118, and is probably an addition.

122 For this 'break-off formula' see on 21.562.

123-5 We have seen what Hektor envisages actually happen in the case of Lukaon (21.34-135). For the construction $\mu\eta$... Ikwaai ... $\delta \,\delta \epsilon \,\mu'$ ove $\epsilon \lambda \epsilon \eta \sigma \epsilon \ldots$ cf. the train of thought in Agenor's soliloquy at 21.563-5 $\mu\eta \,\mu'$... vonon ... over $\epsilon \pi \epsilon \epsilon \tau'$ to $\pi \epsilon \iota \ldots$ Here Ikwaai means 'approach as a suppliant (Ik $\epsilon \tau \eta s$)', as is shown by the use of the verb aldestatic (so Arn/A, bT). yupvov must mean 'unarmed', as at 21.50 (Lukaon) etc. above ('just as I am') is often used with an implication of helplessness, e.g. 6.400 vhmov adrws.

126-8 Whatever the poet may have intended by the phrase άπὸ δρυὸς οὐδ' ἀπὸ πέτρης (which occurs only here in Il.), the general point is presumably that any attempt at exchanging words of friendship with Akhilleus is a waste of time. Ancient and modern interpretations are listed and discussed by West on Hes. Th. 35, who concludes that 'the truth is lost in antiquity'. Cf. also Od. 19.163 où yàp ànò δρυός έσσι παλαιφάτου οὐδ' ἀπὸ πέτρης. It may be relevant that the Hesiodic context has some resemblance to ours. Hesiod has just told of his meeting with the Muses, and breaks off with the question ἀλλὰ τίη μοι ταῦτα περί δρῦν ἢ περί πέτρην; He then urges himself to get on with the job of praising the Muses (36). The first half of Th. 35 is the same as that of 122, where again Hektor breaks off his speculations and brings himself down to earth. In both cases something which is either irrelevant or unrealistic is dismissed. In Hektor's case his earlier thoughts of a treaty with his enemy now suggest to his mind the conversation of two lovers 'from oak or from rock': this too may be irrelevant, trivial, fanciful, or perhaps simply long and rambling.

۰,

١

Whatever the original sense, to a modern reader the phrase conjures up a pastoral scene of a lover's meeting in the countryside, which (despite Leaf's odd view that this is 'neither Epic nor Greek') does form a suitable context. Hektor has just referred to being killed 'like a woman', and this is perhaps what gives rise to the idea of the two lovers conversing (cf. 13.290-1n.). The effect is extraordinarily moving: 'Hektor's mind reverts to peacetime' (Willcock), and there could be no greater contrast with the grimness of the real situation. The effect of the reference to peacetime at 153-6 is similar. The idea of $\phi i\lambda l\alpha$ between Akhilleus and Hektor is echoed at 261-7 in the elaborate simile by which Akhilleus expresses the impossibility of any such agreement.

After 126 an extra verse is added by pap. 12, whose point is unclear. It ends πολέμοιο μεμαότα δακρυόεντος.

127 bapilituron: cf. 6.516 881 Å bapils yuvanil (Hektor and Andromakhe). bapiort's is used again at 14.216 of love; and at 13.291, 17.228 of war, probably ironically as here (see on 13.290-1). The root noun bap (in the sense 'wife') occurs at 5.486, 9.327; cf. bapiort's of Minos as the close friend of Zeus at Od. 19.179. The fact that the verb is used only here and in the scene where Hektor converses with his own wife is surely significant, and the echo of the earlier scene helps to remind us of what Hektor himself stands to lose.

ά τε παρθένος ήθεός τε: cf. 18.567 παρθενικαί δὲ καὶ ήθεοι άταλὰ φρονέοντες, 593 ήθεοι καὶ παρθένοι άλφεσίβοιαι. Both these verses occur in the Shield of Akhilleus, again in peaceful scenes set into the context of war.

127-8 Epanalepsis of this type, where the second hemistich is repeated at the beginning of the next verse, occurs only at 20.37t-2 (Hektor speaking about Akhilleus) and 23.641-2; cf. CQ 30 (1980) 282. Here the verb, also, is repeated in 128. bT consider that the repetition reflects the talkativeness of the two lovers. Modern scholars describe the effect as 'pathetic' or 'wistful' (Willcock, Segal, Mutilation of the Corpse 35, Owen, Story of the Iliad 222). One might compare it to a momentary 'still' in the middle of a film: our minds rest, with Hektor's, on this scene of the lovers. Verse 128 is a stately one, composed of four main words, with a spondaic ending. 'We may also note how Homer, as is his custom, fills the lines [127-8] with vowels and avoids all ugly consonantal clashes, to express the implicit pleasure of the scene' (W. B. Stanford, The Sound of Greek, Berkeley 1967, 88). Notice also the general chiastic effect: dopi2/euvoi ... $\pi\alpha\rho\theta$ /vos (etc.) ... $\pi\alpha\rho\theta$ /vos ... dopi2/etov, with $d\lambda\lambda\eta\lambda$ ouv at the end to draw the two parties together and round off the sentence.

• .

129-30 The two closing verses of this speech, in contrast, are rapid and matter-of-fact, with a quick run of dactyls in both. ξυνελαυνέμεν is intransitive only here. For ὅττι τάχιστα the variant ὅφρα τάχιστα (A and one papyrus) would go with the following verse; cf. 13.326-7 ὅφρα τάχιστα] εἴδομεν ήἑ τῷ εὖχος ὅρἑξομεν, ἤἑ τις ἡμῖν. But it is more effective to take the two verses separately with asyndeton. In 130 pap. 12 reads ὅπποτἑρῷ Κρονίδης Ζεὐς κῦδος ὁρἑξη. Cf. for this alternative 5.33, 8.141, 21.570 (at the end of Agenor's soliloquy). Here, however, the vulgate reading with κεν is better.

131-87 When Akhilleus finally bears down upon Hektor h flees. Akhilleus pursues him around the walls of Troy three times, whilst the gods look on. Zeus asks whether they should rescue him from death, but Athene protests that his doom has been fixed long ago. Zeus gives way, and Athene leaves Olumpos

In this and the following episode (188-213) the poet maintains and increases the suspense by a series of different techniques, in a way which resembles other climactic parts of the earlier battle-scenes: for this see especially on 15.592-746, and Fenik, TBS 178.

131-5 This description of Akhilleus picks up 25-32. It is as if hardly any time had really elapsed, and bT comment that Akhilleus' approach, Priam's and Hekabe's supplications, and Hektor's soliloquy are all really simultaneous. As Owen says of this Book, 'everything is rushing to a climax, and yet it all stands still—as when we watched Achilles coming swiftly across the plain, the time seemed endless' (Story of the Iliad 227).

132 This is another four-word verse, comparing Akhilleus to Ares. Elsewhere only Meriones is compared to Enualios, in a formular verse (2.651 etc.), but cf. ($\theta o \tilde{\omega}$) $\delta \tau d \lambda a v \tau o \varsigma$ (etc.) "Apni" (11× 11.) and $\beta \rho o \tau o \lambda o i \gamma \tilde{\omega}$ loos (etc.) "Apni" (4× 11.), and see on 13.298-303. Kopu $\theta d \tilde{\kappa} i$ means 'with quivering helmet'. The word occurs only here and perhaps in Hes. fr. 185.15 M-W Kopu $\theta d \tilde{\kappa} i \kappa o \tau o \lambda \epsilon \mu i \sigma \tau \epsilon \omega$; cf. Kopu $\theta a [0, \lambda o \varsigma]$ (2.816 etc.).

x33-4 As at 26-32 and 92 Akhilleus' approach inspires terror, here especially because of the deadly spear which he brandishes. The runover word beiviv is powerful; for a similar use cf. especially 16.788-89, where Apollo encounters Patroklos and causes his death, and see Higbie, Measure and Music 207-8.

• ;

ſ

134-5 In addition to the simile at 26-32 cf. 11.595 (etc.) $\delta t \mu \alpha_5 \pi u \rho \delta_5$ altout void |, 18.609 the part of a sequence of vowel sounds in 135 were noticed by T, who described the verse as 'rather liquid' ($v \rho \delta \tau \epsilon \rho \sigma_5$); see also on 152. Such effects are discussed by Demetrius (On Style 68-74), who says that $\eta \epsilon \lambda \iota \sigma_5$ is more euphonious than $\eta \lambda \iota \sigma_5$. For other examples in the scholia cf. CQ 30 (1980) 286. Here one might think that the concurrence of long vowels added to the impression of 'grandeur' (as suggested by Demetrius 72-3). This shows how difficult it is to describe such effects, although that need not debar one from trying.

136-8 Two verses containing four short, sharp sentences, which describe Hektor's terror and flight, contrast with the fluid five verses about Akhilleus' pursuit which follow at 138-42. Note the elegant variation of the colometry in 136-7, with oùde ... péveux, a more flowing clause in enjambment, enclosed within the more staccato ones:

"Εκτορα δ', ώς ένόησεν, έλε τρόμος ούδ' άρ' έτ' έτλη αύθι μένειν, όπίσω δὲ πύλας λίπε, βη δὲ φοβηθείς

For the second hemistich of 136 cf. 19.14 Ele trous, ovor the second hemistich of 136 cf. 19.14 Ele trous, ovor the triangle and 20.421 ovor the triangle and for 138 cf. 6.505 most reast reast the transfer of transfer of E39-44 Akhilleus pursuing Hektor is compared to a hawk in close pursuit of a dove. Kipkos only occurs in one other simile in the lliad (17.755–9), but ipn ξ is commoner (6×), and ipn ξ and πέλεια appear together in the simile at 21.493-6: see comments.

139 Cf. Od. 13.86-7 oùbé kev lp $\eta\xi$ | klpkos duapthoesev, elaphotatos metenväv, and the similar expressions at II. 15.237-8 and 21.253.

140 οίμησε: the verb recurs at 308 (= Od. 24.538) and 311, again in a simile. Cf. the use of the noun οίμα in comparisons at 16.352, 21.252. On τρήρωνα πέλειαν see 5.778n.

E4E-2 υπαιθα φοβείται in this context resembles 21.493 υπαιθα θεὰ φύγεν ώς τε πέλεια. The phrase όξυ λεληκώς occurs only here. At Hes. Erga 207 the hawk asks the nightingale τί λέληκας; The verb is used of the black eagle at Arist. HA 618b31. ταρφέ έπαΐσσει means 'makes frequent swoops'.

143 πέτετο, τρέσε δ' Έκτωρ: the lengthened vowel before τρέσε and break in the middle of the fifth foot make an abrupt closing rhythm. τρέσε is 'fled in terror' (Arn/A, T); cf. 5.256 etc.

ε44 λαιψηρά δε γούνατ' ενώμα recurs at 10.358, and is related to 15.269 = 22.24 λαιψηρά πόδας καὶ γούνατ' ενώμα.

• .

145-57 The poet gives us precise topographical details, which add to the credibility and vividness of the narrative. He may also be following his custom elsewhere of filling a space in the story, as for example where a journey is taking place. This is suggested by bT (147-56): for other examples in the scholia see CQ_{30} (1980) 266-7. There is a much clearer example of this technique at 166-87 below, the debate in heaven before the climax of the chase.

145 παρά σκοπιήν και έρινεὸν ήνεμδεντα: this look-out place can hardly be the one where Polites is posted at 2.793. A fig-tree is mentioned as a landmark at 6.433, 11.167: in the first case it seems to be near the wall of Troy, which fits this passage, and it may be significant that in that passage as well as in book 22 it is mentioned in close association with the fate of Hektor (cf. Elliger, Darstellung der Landschaft 58).

146 They follow a waggon-track which skirts the town, a short distance outside the wall. $d\mu\alpha\xi_{170}$ occurs in Homer only here; cf. HyDem 177, etc.

147-56 'In spite of the loving detail with which the lliad ... describes the double fountain under the walls of Troy, it is no longer possible to use it as evidence: no such combination of hot and cold springs now exists in the plain' (Leaf, Troy 48). But 'what he gives us is in fact very characteristic of the Troad at large, though not of the immediate surroundings of Troy. The hot springs of the Troad are as marked a feature as the cold which break out all over many-fountained Ida' (ibid. 49-50). Already in antiquity, by the time of Demetrius of Scepsis (Strabo 13.1.43, 602), there were no hot springs by the walls of Troy, whereas such were known to exist on Mt Ida (so T on 140). Two large springs, in particular, form one of the sources of the Skamandros on Mt Ida, and some nineteenth-century travellers asserted that one was hotter than the other (Leaf, ibid. 50-2). The suggestion was made by R. L. K. Virchow (Beiträge zur Landeskunde der Troas, Berlin 1880, 33-43) that the poet transferred these in his imagination to Troy, where some springs do still exist near the walls (Leaf, ibid. 165-6). But Cook (Troad 293) has doubts about this.

Whatever the truth may be, presumably the poet had heard of two springs which were regarded as a local wonder by the people of the Troad. Why does he introduce them at this crucial point in his narrative? Partly for the reasons mentioned already in the comment on 145-57, but also because it is precisely at this point, when Akhilleus and Hektor reach these springs for the fourth time, that Hektor's doom is sealed (208-13). This is a variation of the technique which the poet uses elsewhere in order to draw our attention to the importance of what is about to occur, whether he does so by describing a particular object or scene in unusual detail, or by other means such as a build-up of similes, or an invocation of the Muses. Here, however, there is in addition a dramatic contrast between the life-and-death struggle which is taking place and the recollection of a peaceful scene of women washing safely in the countryside near the city walls. Cf. S. E. Bassett TAPA 61 (1930) 138-9, Schadewaldt, VHWW 308, Elliger, Darstellung der Landschaft 58-9, Griffin, HLD 21-2, 112.

۰.

147-8 Ancient scholars solved the problem of identification here by suggesting that the springs were either fed by Skamandros underground, or else were simply near the river (Arn/A 148, Porph. 1.256.24, Demetrius of Scepsis in Strabo loc. cit.). For Σκαμάνδρου δινήεντος see on 21.1-2.

149–52 The poet dwells on the contrast between the two springs, from one of which hot steam rises, whereas the other even in summer is as cold as hail, snow or ice. The two couplets are balanced, but in the second there is a climax in χαλάζη | ἢ χιόνι ψυχρῆ, ἢ ἐξ ὕδατος κρυστάλλω. ὕδατι λιαρῷ recurs at 11.830 and 846. For 151-2 cf. 10.6-7 ἡὲ χάλαζαν | ἢ νιφετόν, ὅτε πέρ τε χιών ἐπάλυνεν ἀρούρας; 15.170-1 νιφἀς ἡὲ χάλαζα | ψυχρἡ ...; and Od. 14.476-7 πηγυλίς' αὐτὰρ ῦπερθε χιών γένετ' ἡῦτε πάχνη, | ψυχρή, καὶ σακέεσσι περιτρέφετο κρύσταλλος (the only other use of κρύσταλλος in Homer).

T says of 152 'he has made the verse fluid by the use of the juxtaposed vowels', and this verse is quoted by Aulus Gellius (AA 6.20.4) as a model example of the deliberate effect of suavitas, produced by the elegant use of hiatus. See on 135, which this verse resembles in structure, and with which it is contrasted in subject (fire and the sun, snow and ice). The spondaic ending adds to the beauty of the verse, which must surely be the coldest in Greek poetry.

153–6 In Odyssey 6 Nausikaa and her maids wash είματα σιγαλόεντα (26) at the πλύνοι (40, 86) by the river's mouth: the phrase είματα σιγαλόεντα and the word πλύνοι only occur in these passages in Homer. σιγαλόεντα, however, is used of Andromakhe's head-dress at 468; cf. ήνια σιγαλόεντα 5.226 etc., βήγεα σιγαλόεντα Od. 6.38 etc. The form λαΐνεοι occurs only here in Homer (cf. λάΐνος $3 \times 11., 5 \times 0d.$), and the verb πλύνω only here in $11., 5 \times 0d., 2 \times$ in book 6 (31, 59).

156 = 9.403, where Akhilleus is speaking of Troy's wealth in the past. Here, however, it carries much greater significance.

157-8 φεύγων, ο δ' όπισθε διώκων means '(one) flecing, the other pursuing'. For this idiom cf. 7.420, 24.527. Verse 158 elaborates 157, with an elegant chiasmus.

159-66 The idea of pursuit naturally suggests a foot-race, and this in turn generates the simile of the horse-race. But the prize here is no ordinary one: it is Hektor's own life (159-61).

159 lephiov is a sacrificial animal $(4 \times Od.)$. Oxen are used as prizes in the funeral games at 23.260, $\beta o \epsilon i \eta v$ is either an ox-hide or possibly a shield (cf. 7.238 $\beta \tilde{\omega} v$, etc.). bT say that hides were given as prizes in the four-yearly festival of Herakles celebrated by the people of Oita. Shields were also sometimes given as prizes in games in the classical period, as in the Heraia at Argos (schol. Pindar, O. 7.152c). Here, however, with lephiov an ox-hide is more likely.

• .

160 άρνύσθην means 'they were trying to win'. For & τε ποσσίν άέθλια γίγνεται άνδρών cf. 9.124 etc. άέθλια ποσσίν άροντο].

161 περί ψυχής: cf. Od. 9.423 περί ψυχης, Od. 22.245 περί τε ψυχέων έμάχοντο.

162-6 This simile expands the brief one at 22-4. It has several points of contact with the narrative: the importance of the prize (161 ~ 163), the speed of the horses (163 ~ 159, 166), and by implication the repeated 'laps' of the racecourse (162 π 159 π 165). It also suggests the idea of spectators: hence the gods as onlookers (166). So it not only arises out of the preceding context, but also acts as a transitional passage to the following scene in heaven.

For 162 cf. 22 ώς θ' Ιππος άεθλοφόρος; 23.309 περί τέρματα. τρωχῶν is used of mules at Od. 6.318 and later in Apollonius (3.874 τρώχων εὐρεῖαν κατ' άμαξιτόν).

164 ή τρίπος ήξ γυνή: at 23.262-5 the first prize in the chariot-race is a woman and a tripod together. ἀνδρός κατατιθνηῶτος means that it is in honour of a man who has died. For the ancient tradition that the athletic festivals all originated as funeral games see on 23.262-897.

164-5 Here two successive verses have spondaic endings. In 165 7pls i a signal that when the fourth time comes the outcome will be decided (208-13). The same motif occurs at 5.436-9 (see comment), 16.702-6, 16.784-7, 20.445-8 and 21.176-9. Here, however, the action is suspended at this momentous point: the picture is frozen, while the gods calmly discuss Hektor's fate. The most famous example of this technique is the account of how Odysseus got his scar, at the climax of the recognition scene with Eurukleia (Od. 19.392-468).

πόλιν πέρι δινηθήτην: bT comment that it is 'as if they were turning on a (compass-drawn) circle, suggesting both speed and running along a single line'.

166 θ tol 5' is máxres óp $\tilde{\omega}$ vro: 5' is better here, for the gods looking on, than the more commonplace variant δi re.

166-87 The gods are like the spectators at a sporting event. They discuss the outcome, and they are also involved in what is going on, as in the quarrel between the spectators of the horse-race at 23.448-98. See Griffin, HLD 179-204 and CQ 28 (1978) 1-22.

This debate resembles that over Sarpedon's fate (16.431-61: see comment for these and other scenes of this type). Zeus pities both, Sarpedon more than Hektor because he is his own son, but Hektor also because of his piety. He asks whether both should be rescued or not. Here protests that Sarpedon's doom has long been fixed, and Athene uses the same words of Hektor (16.441- = 22.179-81). At this point the scenes diverge. Here has more to say about Sarpedon's fate, not all of it negative, whereas in Hektor's case Zeus simply yields to Athene, and allows her to bring about his death.

۰,

t

It is clear that Zeus is not bound by the fact that a person's doom has long ago been fixed: but the fear of disapproval from the other gods is enough to deter him from altering this.

168 φίλον ἄνδρα: 'a man I love'. It is curious that this very simple phrase occurs only here in Homer. In its very plainness it carries a great deal of emotional weight in this context.

169-70 For Ιμόν δ' όλοφύρεται ήτορ | Έκτορος cf. 16.450 τεόν δ' όλοφύρεται ήτορ, from Here's speech to Zeus in the debate about Sarpedon's fate.

170-2 Zeus's words imply that punctiliousness in sacrificing to the gods creates an obligation on their part to respond favourably. Apollo makes this point more vehemently on behalf of Hektor after his death (24.33-8), and Zeus agrees (66-70). So also Zeus loves Troy more than any other city on account of the Trojans' piety (4.44-9), and cf. 20.297-9 (Poseidon and Aineias). The same motif recurs in Athene's plea for Odysseus at Od. 1.60-2, and in prayers at Il. 1.39-41, 8.238-42, Od. 4.762-6, 17.240-3.

For 170 cf. 8.240 βοῶν δημὸν καὶ μηρί' ἑκηα |, 24.33-4 οῦ νύ ποθ' ὑμῖν | Ἐκτωρ μηρί' ἑκηε βοῶν αἰγῶν τε τελείων; For | "lôŋs ἐν κορυφῆσι cf. 11.183, 14.332, and 21.449 "lôŋs ... πολυπτύχου. Zeus has a precinct and altar on Gargaros, one of the peaks of Mt Ida, at 8.47-8 (cf. Cook, Troad 257-8). For sacrifices on the citadel cf. 6.257 (prayer to Zeus).

172-3 These verses pick up 168, and 173 is also echoed at 230.

174-81 This passage is closely parallel to 16.435-43 in the related scene discussed above. In 176 έσθλον έόντα means 'noble though he is'.

178 $\ddot{\omega}$ πάτερ άργικέραυνε, κελαινεφές: cf. 19.121 Ζεῦ πάτερ άργικέραυνε; for κελαινεφές (vocative, of Zeus) cf. 2.412 (see note), 15.46.

180 ξαναλύειν is used only here and at 16.442, and very rarely in later literature.

185-7 έρξον δπη δή τοι νόος έπλετο is similar to the way in which Zeus

۰.

The formular character of several parts of this scene in heaven gives it a rather detached and stilted quality, in contrast to the intensity of the surrounding narrative. The gods preserve an elaborate courtesy towards each other, as if excessive involvement with the struggle on earth would be undignified.

188–213 Akhilleus continues to pursue Hektor, preventing him from reaching the shelter of the walls. Hektor is given a last burst of strength by Apollo: but when they reach the springs for the fourth time Zeus weighs the fates of the two men, Hektor's doom sinks down, and Apollo leaves him

168 Έκτορα ... ώκύς Άχιλλεύς: the two opposing names frame the verse. The formula ώκύς Άχιλλεύς ($36 \times II$.) has point here. For κλονέων έφεπ' cf. 11.496 έφεπε κλονέων.

189-201 As a fawn, started from its lair by a hound, is pursued through mountain glens, and if it hides in a thicket the dog tracks it down, so Hektor could not escape Akhilleus. Every time he tried to reach the sheltering walls, Akhilleus would cut him off, and drive him towards the plain. It was just like a dream, where neither pursuer can catch pursued, nor pursued escape.

One simile follows closely after the other, the first concentrating on Akhilleus' relentless pursuit, the second on the frustration of both parties. There are comparisons with frightened fawns at 4.243-6, 21.29, 22.1. Cf. also the simile at 10.360-4, where Diomedes and Odysseus pursue Dolon and cut him off, like two dogs chasing a young deer or a hare through a wood, and 17.673-8, where Menelaos is like an eagle which spies a hare hiding in a thicket. At 18.318-22 Akhilleus is like a lion hunting for a man who has taken its cubs, suggesting his future hunt for Hektor as the killer of Patroklos, now reaching its climax.

The dream simile is far more unusual. 'Comparisons which refer to psychological states are rare in the Iliad' (Moulton, Similes 84). At 15.80-3 Here's journey is as quick as a man's thought, and the Phaeacian ships are 'as fast as wing or thought' at Od. 7.36. Similes describing a state of unresolved or balanced conflict occur at 12.417-24 (417 obte ... Auxioi ... toure of the conflict occur at 12.417-24 (417 obte ... Auxioi ... toure of the conflict occur at 12.417-24 (417 obte ... Auxioi ... toure of the conflict occur at 12.417-24 (417 obte ... Auxioi ... toure of the conflict occur at 12.417-24 (417 obte ... Auxioi ... toure of the conflict occur at 12.417-24 (417 obte ... Auxioi ... toure of the conflict occur at 12.417-24 (417 obte ... Auxioi ... toure of the conflict occur at 12.417-24 (417 obte ... Auxioi ... toure of the conflict occur at 12.417-24 (417 obte ... Auxioi ... toure of the conflict occur at 12.417-24 (417 obte ... Auxioi ... toure of the conflict occur at 12.417-24 (417 obte ... Auxioi ... toure of the conflict occur at 12.417-24 (417 obte ... Auxio ... toure of the conflict occur at 12.417-24 (417 obte ... Auxio ... toure of the conflict occur at 12.417-24 (417 obte ... Auxio ... toure of the conflict occur at 12.417-24 (417 obte ... Auxio ... toure of the conflict occur at 12.417-24 (417 obte ... Auxio ... toure of the conflict occur at 12.417-24 (417 obte ... Auxio ... toure of the conflict occur at 12.417-24 (417 obte ... Auxio ... toure of the conflict occur at 12.417-24 (417 obte ... Auxio ... toure of the conflict occur at 12.417-24 (417 obte ... Auxio ... toure of the conflict occur at 12.417-24 (417 obte ... Auxio ... toure of the conflict occur at 12.417-24 (417 obte ... Auxio ... toure of the conflict occur at 12.417-24 (417 obte ... Auxio ... toure of the conflict occur at 12.417-24 (417 obte ... Auxio ... toure of the conflict occur at 12.417-24 (417 obte ... Auxio ... toure of the conflict occur at 12.417-24 (417 obte ...

۰.

T

189 The word-order is complex. For the expression cf. 8.248 νεβρόν ... τέκος έλάφοιο ταχείης], and 22.139 | fiυτε κίρκος δρεσφιν.

191 Cf. 17.676-7 ούκ ξλαθε πτώξ | θάμνω ύπ' άμφικόμω κατακείμενος. For καταπτήξας cf. 8.136 καταπτήτην, Od. 8.190 κατά δ' ξπτηξαν. The noun πτώξ is directly related to πτήσσω (Chantraine, Dict. s.v.).

192 άνιχνεύων: this is the only example of lχνεύειν and its compounds in Homer; for άνιχνεύειν cf. Arist. HA 624228 etc.; lχνεύειν Sophocles etc.

θέει ξμπεδον, ὄφρα κεν εὖρη: cf. 13.141 θέει ξμπεδον ἦος ໂκηται, 12.281 χέει ξμπεδον, ὄφρα καλύψη, both in similes.

193 où $\lambda \eta \theta \epsilon$ picks up $\epsilon I \pi \epsilon p$ te $\lambda d \theta \eta \sigma i$ in 191. $\pi \sigma \delta \omega \kappa \epsilon \alpha \Pi \eta \lambda \epsilon I \omega v \alpha$ (10× Il.) is here relevant to the context: see on 14 and 188.

194-8 These verses form a long and complex sentence describing Akhilleus' manoeuvres, as he constantly cuts off Hektor's line of retreat. He must be keeping on the inside of Hektor, which strictly speaking is hard to reconcile with their both being on the waggon-track (146): but we should not stop to reflect on such details here.

For δσσάκι δ' δρμήσειε... άξασθαι... τοσσάκι μιν ... άποστρέψασκε cf. 21.265-9 δσσάκι δ' δρμήσειε... | στῆναι ... | τοσσάκι μιν μέγα κῦμα ... | πλάζε...

For $\pi\nu\lambda\omega\nu$ $\Delta\alpha\rho\delta\alpha\nu\omega$ see on 3.145. In 195 Leaf favours the future $\Delta t\xi\epsilon\sigma\theta\alpha$, but after $\delta\rho\mu\alpha\nu$ the aorist infinitive would be normal. In 196 of is dative, with $\Delta\lambda\lambda\kappa\omega\nu\nu$. $\pi\rho\sigma\pi\Delta\rho\omega\theta\nu\nu$ in 197 could have either a local or a temporal sense, but the latter seems better (so $\Lambda rn/\Lambda$, bT). For $\Delta\pi\sigma\sigma\tau\rho\psi\alpha\sigma\kappa\epsilon$ T records the variant $\pi\alpha\rho\sigma\tau\rho\psi\alpha\sigma\kappa\epsilon$, and some MSS read $\Delta\pi\sigma\tau\rho\psi\alpha\sigma\kappa\epsilon$. $\pi\sigma\tau$ $\pi\tau\delta\lambda\omega\sigma$ is 'on the city side'.

199-201 Aristarchus (Arn/A) athetized these verses, as 'worthless ($\epsilon v \tau \epsilon \lambda \epsilon \tilde{s}$) in style and thought', and he objected that they contradict the simile at 162-6. This shows his limitations. Leaf defends them in his note, but reluctantly rejects them along with 202-4 in an appendix.

The repetitions are surely deliberate, suggesting constant, frustrated effort. For où δύναται (etc.) cf. the parallels quoted on 189-201, and also 15.416-18 οὐδὲ δύναντο | οῦθ' ὁ τὸν ἐξελάσαι... | οῦθ' ὁ τὸν ἂψ ώσασθαι...

199 $\dot{\omega}_5 \delta' \dot{\epsilon} v \dot{\delta} v \dot{\epsilon} l \rho \omega \dot{\omega} \dots$: as so often in similes the phrasing is untypical. $\dot{\delta} v \dot{\epsilon} l \rho \phi_5$ (etc.) elsewhere occurs at the end of the verse ($4 \times 11.$, $10 \times 0d.$), or before the third-foot caesura ($2 \times 11.$, $5 \times 0d.$); and the hiatus after the second foot is rare (cf. 4.412, 5.215). In $\phi \dot{\epsilon} \dot{\nu} \gamma \rho v \tau \alpha \delta i \dot{\omega} \kappa \epsilon w$ the absence of any specified subject suits the generalizing tone and increases the compression of the sentence.

202-4 Leaf and others have made heavy weather of these verses, whose obvious sense is 'how could Hektor have escaped impending death, had not Apollo given him extra strength for the last time?' It is true that they do not add much to the story at this point, and could have been inserted as a way of explaining how Hektor was not overtaken by Akhilleus, a problem discussed by the scholia (bT 165, D 201). But the poet may have chosen to raise and answer this question himself, and the mention of Apollo has point, reminding us again of his involvement just before the moment when he will desert Hektor (213). There may be a parallel in the rhetorical question at Od. 22.12-14. At the moment when Odysseus hits Antinoos in the throat the poet breaks off to ask who could have expected such an event. Both questions draw attention to the impossibility of the situation, at a structurally similar point in the narrative.

202 $\dot{\upsilon}\pi\epsilon\xi\dot{\epsilon}\phi\upsilon\gamma\epsilon\upsilon$: there was a variant $\dot{\upsilon}\pi\epsilon\xi\dot{\epsilon}\phi\epsilon\rho\epsilon\upsilon$, which Aristarchus (Did/A) seems to have favoured, and which was perhaps taken as meaning 'kept ahead of', 'outran' (cf. Hdt. 4.125). But cf. 5.22, 16.687 $\dot{\upsilon}\pi\dot{\epsilon}\kappa\phi\upsilon\gamma\epsilon\kappa\eta\sigma\alpha$, etc.

203 πύματόν τε και ύστατον: this emphatic expression does not recur in II, and occurs once in Od. (20.116). It carries considerable weight here.

ήντετ' Άπόλλων: at 16.788 (ήντετο γάρ τοι Φοϊβος) Apollo 'meets' Patroklos, but in a hostile sense.

205-7 Aristotle alludes to this passage in the Poetics (1460a11-17, 60b22-6), when he says that such a scene would be impossible on the stage, but is dramatically effective in epic. He may be responding to Megacleides, who criticized the whole episode of the pursuit and duel as implausible (b 22.36, bT 205-7).

πικρά βέλεμνα only occurs here: cf. πικρός -όν διστός -όν 10×11 , $1 \times 0d$, and βέλεμνα | 3×11 . For 207 cf. 10.367-8 lva μή τις ... | φθαίη έπευξάμενος βαλέειν, δ δε δεύτερος έλθοι.

208-13 At 8.68-74 Zeus weighs the fates of the Achaeans and Trojans, again at a decisive point in the action, the beginning of the long process of reversal for the Greeks in fulfilment of Zeus's pledge to Thetis (8.69-70 = 209-210, $72 \sim 212$), and the scales of Zeus are mentioned at 16.658 and 19.223-4. Here Hektor's fate is already decided in advance, and this is a visual or symbolic representation of the crucial moment at which the decision becomes irrevocable.

Arn/A tells us that this scene inspired Aeschylus' play Psychostasia, in which it was not the fates but the souls of Akhilleus and Memnon which were weighed by Zeus: cf. TGF pp. 88-9 N.² = pp. 374-7 Radt. But the scene in the lliad may possibly echo an earlier epic version of the fight between Akhilleus and Memnon: cf. vol. v, Introduction, p. 18, and see on 16.658.

The structure of these verses is highly dramatic: 208-10 are three wholeverse clauses (208-9 being balanced. $\alpha\lambda\lambda'$ ore $\delta\eta$... kal tore $\delta\eta$...), followed by the balancing parts of 211, naming the two opposing fates. After this leisurely build-up comes the decisive moment: 212-13 contain four sentences of extraordinary brevity, which describe Zeus lifting the scales, Hektor's fate sinking, the descent to Hades, and desertion by Apollo. The four verbs in these verses all stand first in their clauses, emphatic and parallel. Cf. Griffin, HLD 154-5.

208 άλλ' ότε δή τό τέταρτον: as at 5.438 etc.; see also on 165.

210 ravyleyes bardrow: this epithet occurs only in this verse (= 8.70) in Il., $6 \times Od$. (2× with $\kappa\eta\rho$), and is rare in later poetry. The sense is uncertain (see on 8.70), but it creates a leisurely and impressive phrase. For the nature of the $\kappa\eta\rho\epsilon$ see on 9.411, 12.326-7.

212 μεσσά: Chrysippus wanted to read põµa, which was supposed to refer to the centre of the scales.

215 Φχετο δ' εls Άδαο: probably the subject is still αίσιμον ήμαρ. But as his fate sinks, so Hektor in effect begins his journey to the afterlife.

 $\lambda i \pi \epsilon v \delta t \Delta 0 \tilde{i} \beta 0 \tilde{j} \Delta \pi \delta \lambda \omega v$: Apollo's departure is instantaneous after the weighing. His desertion of Hektor both contributes to Hektor's death and is the result of its imminence, since the gods avoid contact with death where possible, as Artemis leaves Hippolutos (E. Hipp. 1437-41). Cf. Parker, Miasma 33, 67. The awful brevity of this hemistich i rather like that of 1.47 $\delta \delta'$ fix vort lox ω_s , of Apollo coming down as the god of the plague. Notice too the vivid juxtaposition with Athene's arrival at Akhilleus' side in 214.

214-47 Athene comes to Akhilleus and tells him to stand and draw breath. She then goes to Hektor, disguised as Deiphobos, and encourages him to face Akhilleus.

Here begins the first stage in the process of Hektor's fatal deception by Athene. Cf. her deceit of Pandaros (4.86-104), and her rôle in the second half of the Odyssey (especially 13.296-9 and 20.345-72). The deception of Hektor has always disturbed Homer's readers; bT comment that 'it is inappropriate ($\alpha \tau \sigma \pi \sigma \nu$) that a goddess should deceive Hektor'. But the Homeric gods regularly use deception to bring doom, as in cases of $\alpha \tau \eta$.

314-23 Athene appears to Akhilleus in her own person, and he evidently recognizes her at once, as at 1.197-200.

216 Δi $\phi i \lambda \epsilon \phi \alpha i \delta \mu$ ' 'Axi $\lambda \epsilon \tilde{\nu}$: cf. 1.74 | $\tilde{\omega}$ 'Axi $\lambda \epsilon \tilde{\nu}$... Δi $\phi i \lambda \epsilon$; $\phi \alpha i \delta \mu$ ' 'Axi $\lambda \lambda \epsilon \tilde{\nu}$ | $4 \times II.$, $1 \times Od.$ $\theta \epsilon o \tilde{i}_5 \epsilon \pi i \epsilon i \kappa \epsilon \lambda$ ' 'Axi $\lambda \epsilon \tilde{\nu}$ | $(5 \times II.$, $1 \times Od.$) is metrically equivalent. But Δi $\tilde{i} \phi i \lambda \epsilon$ has point here, since Akhilleus' success must depend ultimately on Zeus's favour, and perhaps the poet also felt $\theta \epsilon o \tilde{i}_5 \epsilon \pi i \epsilon i \kappa \epsilon \lambda \epsilon$ to be inappropriate in Athene's mouth.

217 'Axonologi: either 'for the Achaeans' (which the parallel of 391-4 might support), or 'in the Achaeans' eyes', as at 4.95, 9.303.

218 dorrov: 'insatiate'. See West on Hes. Th. 714 for this form, and comment on 5.388.

• ;

230–1 This is remarkably contemptuous towards Apollo, especially προπροκυλινδόμενος. Akhilleus' hostility at 15–20 is similar. προπροκυλινδόμενος means 'grovelling in front of', as a suppliant, like Priam when supplicating the Trojans, κυλινδόμενος κατά κόπρον, at 414; cf. Gould, JHS 93 (1973) 94–5. This vivid compound recurs at Od. 17.525, and nowhere else in later literature.

222 άμπνυε is from the aorist (άμπνυον) of άναπνέω.

235 χαλκογλώχινος ('bronze-barbed') occurs only here; cf. τανν-/τρi-γλωχis 5.393 etc., γλωχis 24.274.

227 Deiphobos, Hektor's brother, first appeared at 12.94 (see comment), and then frequently in book 13, where he was wounded by Meriones (527ff.). Book 13 is probably in the poet's mind during the following episode. For the expression cf. 13.45 εΙσάμενος Κάλχαντι δέμας και άτειρέα φωνήν and 17.555 (Athene) εΙσαμένη Φοίνικι δέμας και άτειρέα φωνήν.

a28-46 The courtesy and affection of this exchange make Hektor's deception all the more poignant. Note the parallelism of the openings of the three speeches (229, 233, 239), all stressing the speakers' earnestness and sincerity.

229-31 For $\mathfrak{H}\mathfrak{del}^*$, $\mathfrak{H}\mathfrak{del}\mathfrak$

834 γνωτών means 'relatives', but is used especially of brothers; cf. 17.35, A.R. 1.53 (so bT, Eust.).

239-41 This theme of supplication by one's family and companions echoes 37-91, and recurs at 9.464-5, 9.581-94.

242 ετείρετο πένθει λυγρώ; cf. 5.153 τείρετο γήραι λυγρώ.

844 φειδωλή: only here in epic and rare later (Solon, Phanias). Cf. 7.409 ού γάρ τις φειδώ νεκύων, and for another abstract expression of this kind 8.181 μνημοσύνη τις έπειτα πυρός δηίοιο γενέσθω.

244-6 Cf. 8.532-4 eloopai el $\kappa \neq \mu'$... dinúcerai, $\tilde{\eta} \approx \nu \neq \gamma \tilde{\omega}$ rov | $\chi \alpha \lambda \kappa \tilde{\varphi}$ Byúcas evapa portóevra $\phi \neq \rho \omega \mu \alpha$. Similar expressions occur at the end of a speech at 130, 13.326-7, etc., especially in exhortations to a comrade (see 13.326-7n.).

245-6 φέρηται...δαμήη: δαμέη, the reading of most MSS, is supported by the same variation of mood in such contexts elsewhere, e.g. 16.648-51, 18.308 etc. (but not 13.486); see on 18.308. bT observe the tactful way in which Athene 'makes the danger common to them both (vῶi), but gives the victory to Hektor alone (σῷ δουρί)'.

247 καρδοσύνη occurs only here in Il.; cf. Od. 4.251, 14.31 (of Odysseus), and 13.296-7 (Odysseus and Athene excel in $\kappa \ell \rho \delta \epsilon \alpha$). The abstract noun is very rare later. There is an unusually strong assonance of ℓta in this verse, and the $\kappa \alpha t$ is rather hard to explain.

۰,

ſ

248-366 Hektor tells Akhilleus that he is ready to fight, and asks him to agree that the winner should return the corpse of the loser. Akhilleus refuses to accept this proposal. He throws and misses, but Athene returns the spear. Hektor hits Akhilleus' shi ld but the spear rebounds. He calls to Deiphobos for a second spear, but Deiphobos has vanished. He realizes his doom is seal d, and attacks with his sword. Akhill us closes, drives his spear through his neck, and exults over him. Hektor entreats him to return his body, but he again refuses. Hektor warns Akhilleus of his own impending death, and dies. Akhilleus contemptuously dismisses the warning

Although many motifs of the duel are typical (cf. the detailed comments which follow), what strikes one at once as unusual is, first of all, the extent to which the combat is punctuated throughout by speeches right up to the moment of Hektor's death, and second, the rôle of Athene, whose support of Akhilleus and deception of Hektor is decisive. Neither speeches nor divine intervention and deception are without parallels, but together they raise the whole scene to a different plane from that of the other duels. Throughout it we are constantly aware of the reactions and emotions of the two contestants, of the issues behind the action, in terms of the future fate of Hektor's body and the fate of Troy itself, and also of the divine hand at work directing the course of events to their inevitable outcome. On these aspects see also Schadewaldt, VHW W_{311-23} .

248-72 The exchange of speeches before a duel is in itself a typical motif: e.g. 5.630-54, 6.120-236, 20.176-258.

248-9 Verse 248 = 3.15 etc. (12× 11.). For the protetors proverine cf. 5.276 etc. (10× 11.).

251 Cf. 165. Slov must mean 'I fled' here (cf. 250 $\phi \circ \beta \uparrow \sigma \circ \mu \sigma$), although elsewhere $\delta i\epsilon$ means 'he was afraid' (5.566 etc.). It is usually thought that the verb has been affected by the influence of $\delta i\epsilon \sigma \theta \sigma$ meaning 'pursue'. The variant reading $\delta i\epsilon_5$ (in 'the better texts' according to Did/A, and possibly pap. 12) would mean 'you pursued me' (cf. 18.584 $tv\delta i\epsilon \sigma \sigma v$), and may well be right; cf. Chantraine, GH 1 293, 388, and Schulze, Quaestiones Epicae 355. $\delta i\epsilon \sigma \theta \sigma i$ ('pursue') is probably related to $\delta i \omega \kappa \epsilon v$, $\delta i\epsilon$ ('he was afraid') to $\delta \epsilon i \delta \omega$: cf. Chantraine, Dict. s.v. $\delta i\epsilon \rho \sigma v$.

251-2 Cf. 1.534-5 ούδέ τις έτλη | μείναι έπερχόμενον.

252–3 For any κ pap. 12 reads avor κ (cf. 21.396). For orther a antia orio cf. 17.166–7 our étalassas | orther a antia arta; 21.266 orther evant flow. Eloud κ or κ evaluation are potential optatives ('I may slay or be slain', i.e. whether one or the other).

254 θεούς έπιδώμεθα: aorist subjunctive of έπιδίδοσθαι, 'let us give each other our gods', i.e. offer them as witnesses of an oath (254-5). This phrase only occurs here; cf. perhaps 23.485 περιδώμεθον ('let us wager').

• 1

t

- • 、

255 This verse is probably omitted by one papyrus (pap. 271 in Mazon's Budé). For µdorupoi cf. 2.302(n.). On the gods as overseers of human affairs, especially oaths, cf. Griffin, HLD 181-2. Emloxomos is used of an overseer or guardian at 24.729 (of Hektor) and Od. 8.163; otherwise of a spy at Il. 10.38, 10.342. dopovloi in the sense of 'agreements' occurs only here in Homer; cf. Od. 5.248, 5.361, where it means 'joints'. It is interesting to find it in a moral sense already in the Iliad.

256 Extraylov: see on 1.145-6, 3.415.

257 Sún καμμονίην: this phrase recurs at 23.661. καμμονίη ('endurance') occurs nowhere else in early Greek literature, and very rarely in later poetry. According to Plutarch (Mor. 22C) the word is Aeolic.

259 After this verse pap. 12 reads 342-3.

a60-72 Akhilleus' reply is brutal. He absolutely rejects the possibility of any compact between them. The normal conventions of human society no longer apply, as far as he and Hektor are concerned. He is confident of success, and above all consumed by desire for vengeance.

a60 = 1.148, 22.344, 24.559. See on 1.148.

261 άλαστε: elsewhere άλαστος is an epithet of άχος or πένθος (24.105, $3 \times Od.$; cf. Od. 14.174 άλαστον όδύρομαι). Here, however, it seems to mean 'accursed', as at S. OC 1482, 1672 (and sometimes also άλάστωρ has this sense). The etymology is disputed: Chantraine, Dict. (s.v. άλάστωρ) favours a connexion with the verb λαθεΐν. See also 12.163n. (άλαστήσας), LfgrE s.v. άλαστος, Fraenkel on A. Ag. 1501.

συνημοσύνας: only here in early epic, picking up άρμονιάων, although the verb is found at 13.381 (συνώμεθα). συνημοσύναι recurs at A.R. 1.300, 3.1105.

252-7 'Achilles utters more similes than any character in the poem' (Moulton, Similes 100; cf. 16.7-10n.). This is of course not a usual type of simile, for it expresses a proverbial truth about relationships in the world of animals and men, and then transfers this in an unusual way to the present situation. Cf. Hes. Erga 276-80, where the lack of $\delta i \kappa \eta$ in the animal kingdom is contrasted with men's possession of it as a gift of Zeus.

The verses have an elaborately balanced structure, with a three-verse simile answered by a three-verse sentence referring to Hektor and Akhilleus:

ώς ούκ έστι λέουσι και άνδράσιν δρκια πιστά, ούδέ λύκοι τε καί άρνες όμόφρονα θυμόν έχουσιν, άλλὰ κακὰ φρονέουσι διαμπερές άλλήλοισιν, ώς ούκ έστ' έμὲ και σὲ φιλήμεναι, ούδέ τι νῶϊν δρκια έσσονται, πρίν γ' ή ἕτερόν γε πεσόντα αίματος άσαι Άρηα, ταλαύρινον πολεμιστήν.

۰.

T

The order of 262-4 and 265-7 is chiastic, the clauses about oaths framing those about friendship. For wolves and lambs in similes see on 16.352-5.

α63 δμόφρονα θυμόν έχουσιν: cf. HyDem 434, HyHerm 391 δμόφρονα θυμόν έχουσαι -οντας. δμοφρονέειν and δμοφροσύνη occur in the Odyssey (2× each), δμόφρων only here in Homer.

265-7 For 265 see on 126-8. $\pi \rho \nu \gamma' \dots \pi \rho \lambda \mu \sigma \tau \eta \nu$ are repeated from 5.288-9 (see comment); 267 also occurs at 20.78.

268-9 For mavroins aperns cf. 15.642 mavroias aperas. It means 'all the valour that you can display' here. Verse 269 = 5.602. moleur this repeated very soon after 267.

270 ὑπάλυξις occurs nowhere else in Il.; cf. Od. 23.287, and A.R. 4.1261.

271-2 For vũv 5' ởθρόα πάντ' ἀποτείσεις cf. Od. 1.43 vũv 5' ἀθρόα πάντ' ἀπέτισε. He does not name Patroklos, but makes the reference in 272 general. For ξγχεϊ θύων cf. 11.180, 16.699 ξγχεϊ θῦεν.

273-360 For the pattern of the duel cf. 11.232-40, 13.604-18, Fenik, TBS 87-8, 145-6. In each case A misses B, B hits A but fails to wound, and A kills B.

 $273 = 3.355 \text{ etc.} (7 \times Il.).$

74-6 Cf. 13.184 etc. άλλ' ό μέν ... χάλκεον έγχος (6× 11.); and especially 13.404-8 (404 = 22.274; 405-8 Idomeneus crouches under his shield; 408 τό δ' ὑπέρπτατο χάλκεον έγχος ~ 22.275); 13.503-5 (503 = 22.274; 504-5 the spear sticks in the ground). Similar passages are 16.610-13 and 17.526-9. In 275 έζετο means 'he crouched down'. For χάλκεον there was a variant μείλινον (Did/A, pap. 107 Allen). For έν γαίη δ' ἐπάγη cf. also 10.374, where a spear passes over Dolon's shoulder and έν γαίη ἑπάγη.

276-7 Hektor's escape from being hit has momentarily raised the tension, as if this were really an open fight and he had a chance (so bT 274). But immediately Athene intervenes to return Akhilleus' spear, unseen by Hektor (for this motif cf. 20.324-5, 20.438-41, and see also 16.130-54n.). This has seemed to many modern readers very unfair, robbing Hektor of his only chance of survival. It is 'the most extreme case of divine assistance to a warrior in the lliad', as Willcock says. The nearest parallel comes not in battle but in the games, when Athene returns Diomedes' whip in the chariot race, in retaliation for Apollo's interference (23.382-90).

Here Athene's intervention has the effect of underscoring still more strongly the fact that Hektor is doomed, whatever he may do. But he is still ignorant of the truth, and this makes his confident speech (278-88) all the more ironic.

279-88 In Hektor's speech it is the short, staccato phrases at the beginning and end of the verses which convey his contempt and hostility most strongly: 279 fjuβροτες ..., 280 fj τοι έφης γε ..., 286 εί τοι έδωκε θεός ...,

•

t

288 σύ γάρ σφισι πήμα μέγιστον. These are contrasted effectively with the longer whole-verse clauses, especially in 281-4.

280-2 η τοι έφης γε means 'yet you thought you did'. Given Akhilleus' hatred of deceitful speech (9.309-13), the taunt in 281-2 is particularly wounding. άρτιεπής occurs only here in Homer and twice later, at Pindar, O. 6.61, I. 5.46; cf. Homeric άρτίφρων, άρτίπος, άρτια βάζειν, etc.; άρτιέπειαι of the Muses, Hes. Th. 29. It is odd to find it here in a bad sense, meaning 'glib'. έπίκλοπος is also only here in II.; cf. Od. 21.397 έπίκλοπος έπλεο τόξων, and for έπίκλοπος alone Od. 11.364, 13.291. μένεος άλκῆς τε λάθωμαι occurred at 6.265.

abg-4 For 283 cf. 8.95 μ h tis toi φεύγοντι μεταφρένω έν δόρυ πήξη, etc., and for 284 cf. τὸν δ' ἰθύς μεμαῶτα 2× II., διὰ δὲ στήθεσφιν ἕλασσε(ν) 4× II.

286 $\dot{\omega}_5 \dots$ κομίσαιο: 'would that you might catch it fully in your flesh'. Cf. 14.456 ἀλλά τις 'Apyelων κόμισε χροΐ, and 14.463. The sense of κομίζειν is not easy to assess exactly here, but it may be faintly colloquial. See however on 14.456 for another translation. For σ $\ddot{\omega}$ iv χροΐ the variant iv is metrically preferable.

289-91 Verse 289 = 273 etc. For 290 cf. 13.160 καl βάλεν, ούδ' άφάμαρτε, κατ' άσπίδα πάντοσ' έίσην etc.; μέσον σάκος 5×11 . For 290-1 cf. the similar incident at 21.591-4(n.), and also 13.586-92, where Helenos' arrow rebounds from Menelaos' breastplate, especially 592 πολλόν άποπλαγχθείς έκας Έπτατο πικρός διστός.

291-2 χώσατο ... χειρός is repeated from 14.406-7. χώσατο means 'he was distressed', 'he was frustrated': see on 23.385.

293 κατηφήσας: 'downcast'. Cf. Od. 16.342 κατήφησαν; κατηφείη 3× II.; 24.253 κατηφόνες. The etymology is unknown.

οὐδ' ἄλλ' ... Εγχος: cf. 21.50 (Lukaon) οὐδ' Εχεν Εγχος. As bT observe, Hektor normally carries two spears, e.g. 5.495, 6.104, 11.212, 12.464-5. So why not here? 'Perhaps he threw one down when running, κατά τὸ σιωπώμενον [i.e. the poet takes this for granted]', bT suggest. But in the formal duels in books 3 and 7 the contestants only have a single spear each (cf. 3.338, 3.340ff., 7.244ff.), and Akhilleus above all has a single spear (cf. also Kirk, Songs 190-2, and comments on 3.330-8). Surely, however, this is not a question which should arise. The whole dramatic effect depends on both sides having only one spear.

394 λ evider mis occurs only here in Homer. It is a very interesting case of a unique epithet applied to a hero. Deiphobos is θ could by (12.94), and in the genitive impryophorros (13.258). If one looks at Parry's list of Homeric epithets used of two or more heroes (MHV 89–91), one can see that the only existing ones to fit here are μ eyal from (1 × Il., 3 × Od.) and θ could a (1 × Od.; otherwise θ could a with synizes is at end of line, 3 × Il.). Consequently it is possible that lack of choice was a contributing factor here. It may also be relevant that Deiphobos' shield is prominent in book 13, where he advances under cover of it, and Meriones breaks his spear on it and then goes to get another spear (156-68, 246-58). There are similarities with the passage in book 22, and later Deiphobos himself also retreats in search of a supporter (13.455-9). For other points of contact with book 13 see on 274-6, 288-91. But in any case Deiphobos' white shield leaves a significant mark on our minds. It is as if Hektor were looking all around the battlefield for this conspicuous sign of his brother's presence (cf. $\mu\alpha\kappa\rho\delta\nu\,\delta0\alpha\alpha\varsigma$, i.e. as if he were far away), only to find emptiness and silence. For other uses of white as a marker see 23.329, 453-5. Later this epithet is applied especially to the army of the Seven against Thebes (A. Th. 89, S. Ant. 106, E. Phoen. 1099). Cf. also W. K. Pritchett, The Greek State at War, pt III (Berkeley 1979) 261-2 n. 90.

ag5 fj $\tau\epsilon\epsilon$ µiv δόρυ µακρόν: 'the poet effectively uses asyndeton here, and the repetition also evokes great pity' (T). Technically the asyndeton is due to the fact that fj $\tau\epsilon\epsilon$ (etc.) explains κάλει. But it must surely be the most dramatic use of this device in the poem.

295-305 As in Greek tragedy, delusion and error are followed by the moment of discovery or recognition. Hektor knows automatically which god is responsible (299), as for example Akhilleus knows that Apollo has rescued Hektor at 20.450. He knows too that the protection afforded him by Zeus and Apollo has gone for ever. But he resolves to die heroically. Notice the prominence of divine agents in Hektor's view of events (the gods, Athene, Zeus and Apollo, $\mu o \tilde{p} \alpha$). At the same time, the fame which he will win by his death depends on his own human efforts (304-5).

The speech opens slowly and with great solemnity, with three endstopped verses, and there are only two cases of integral enjambment in what follows (301-3). This suits the gravity of Hektor's tone. Contrast, for example, the style of 250-9 and 261-72, where enjambment is much more frequent.

296 Cf. 1.333 αύταρ δ έγνω ήσιν ένι φρεσί φώνησέν τε.

297 $\ddot{\omega}$ πόποι, ή μάλα δή: for this exclamation cf. 373, 16.745 etc. For the whole verse cf. 16.693 Πατρόκλεις, δτε δή σε θεοί θάνατόνδε κάλεσσαν.

300-1 For 300 cf. 16.853 (Patroklos to Hektor) = 24.132 (Thetis to Akhilleus) άγχι παρέστηκεν θάνατος και μοῖρα κραταιή. άλέη ('escape') occurs only here in Homer. Cf. Hes. Erga 545, and Hippocrates, Aer. 19; άλεωρή $3 \times 1l$.

301-2 ή γάρ $\beta \alpha \dots$ έκηβόλ φ : i.e. 'so, after all, that was what they really wanted'.

302-3 of $\mu \in \ldots \epsilon lpú \alpha \tau o$: Zeus supported Hektor during Akhilleus' withdrawal, and Apollo did so until the last possible moment. Cf. Apollo's rescue of him at 20.443-4. For $\mu o \bar{i} \rho \alpha \times i \chi \dot{\alpha} v \epsilon_1$ cf. 17.478 etc. (4× 11.).

• ;

305-a1 The last phase of the duel begins with the two heroes coming to close combat, Hektor with his sword, Akhilleus with his spear: the inequality of the contest is clear. Each is given a simile: Hektor is like an eagle swooping down to catch a lamb or hare, Akhilleus' spear-point shines like the evening star. But the description of Akhilleus is elaborated, by reference to the rest of his divine armour, shield, helmet and golden helmet-crest (313-16), as if again to emphasize his superiority.

305-7 For 306 cf. 1.190 φάσγανον όξυ έρυσσάμενος; 22.311 τινάσσων φάσγανον όξυ. Verse 307 is an untypical description for a sword, and λαπάρη occurs elsewhere only in the context of wounds (5×11 .). Cf. 3.372 of a chin-strap, δ5 ol υπ' άνθερεῶνος όχευς τέτατο τρυφαλείης. μέγα τε στιβαρόν τε is elsewhere used of a shield (σάκος), 5×11 . For the scansion | τό ol see on 16.228-30.

308-11 For eagle similes see on 17.674-8, 21.252-3, and Moulton, Similes 81-2. Verse 308 (= Od. 24.538) is a powerful one: 'gathering himself together he swooped like a high-soaring eagle'. The form $\dot{\psi}i\pi\epsilon\tau\dot{\eta}\epsilon_i$; recurs only in a Homeric parody by Matro (Conv. 78), but cf. | alero's $\dot{\psi}i\pi\epsilon\tau\dot{\eta}\epsilon_i$; 3× $II., 1\times Od.$ For 51 $\dot{\psi}i\pi\epsilon\tau\dot{\eta}\epsilon_i$ ($\dot{\xi}i\epsilon_i$), $\dot{\xi}i\epsilon_i$), $\dot{\xi}i\epsilon_i$, $\dot{\xi}i\epsilon_i$, $\dot{\xi}i\epsilon_i$), $\dot{\xi}i\epsilon_i$, $\dot{\xi}i\epsilon_i$, $\dot{\xi}i\epsilon_i$), $\dot{\xi}i\epsilon_i$, $\dot{\xi}i$

310 For άρπάξων the majority of our MSS read άρπάζων, but the future is preferable. ἀμαλός ('soft', 'tender') occurs only here in II.; cf. Od. 20.14 (σκυλάκεσσι). It is rare in later literature, but survived in Thessalian, and is related to ἀμαλδύνω etc.: cf. Chantraine, Dict. s.v.

η πτῶκα λαγωόν: πτώξ was originally an epithet ('cowering'), which became the name of an animal, like τρήρων, etc. Cf. 17.676–7 (in an eagle simile) πτώξ | θάμνω ὑπ' ἀμφικόμω κατακείμενος.

313 dyplou may originally have been dyploo; cf. 21.104n., etc.

313-20 These verses recall 19.379-83, when Akhilleus puts on his armour, and 315-16 περισσείοντο ... θαμειάς repeat 19.382-3 (see on 19.380-3). Cf. also 20.162-3 (Aineias) νευστάζων κόρυθι βριαρή άταρ

۰.

l

άσπίδα θουρῖν | πρόσθεν ξχε στέρνοιο, τίνασσε δὲ χάλκεον ξ γ χος, and Hektor's nodding plume at 6.469-70.

315 τετραφάλω: this recurs at 12.384, and probably means 'with four bosses'; see on 3.362. For καλαl the majority of MSS read δειναl (Did/A, T). Both are possible, but the emphasis on beauty would suit what follows, especially 318 κάλλιστος.

316 A few MSS omit this verse, which repeats 19.383. Pap. 12 adds 133-5 after 316.

317-21 For this simile see on 25-32, and Moulton, Similes 85-6, together with Hermes 102 (1974) 393-4, where he says: 'Perhaps the net effect ... is the extraordinary distancing from the action ... At the climax of the poem, our attention is directed to the majestic movement of the beautiful evening star through the heavens.'

The ostensible point of comparison is the brilliance of Akhilleus' spearpoint and that of the evening star. But the peculiar beauty of this star and its quiet appearance in the sky contrast with the deadliness of the attack. At the same time the evening star evokes the idea of closing day and night drawing on, which fits the theme of Hektor's coming death.

This passage is the climax of the series in which Akhilleus or his armour are depicted in terms of fire or light: 18.205-14, 19.16-17, 19.365-6, 19.373-83, 19.398, 20.371-2, 20.490-4, 21.12-16, 21.522-5, 22.25-32, 22.134-5. Cf. already Eust. 1255.31-40, and Schadewaldt, VHWW 320 (with n. 3), Whitman, HHT 132-45.

317-18 For olos 8' dottip eloi cf. 11.62 olos 8' ek veqeuv dvaqalvetai oùnos dottip, and for pet' dottpáoi vuktos dpony $\overline{\psi}$ see on 28. Eonepos is used only here in Homer of the evening star. At Od. 1.423 etc. it means 'evening'. For 85 kantotos cf. 2.673, and for comparable expressions of supremacy in similes 17.674-5, 21.253, 22.30, 22.139 etc.

319 ἀπέλαμπ' ('it shone') is an uncommon impersonal use; cf. perhaps 324 φαίνετο. ενήκης recurs only in Hellenistic poetry (A.R. 2.101, etc.).

321 δπη είξειε μάλιστα means 'where it might best yield (an opening)'.

322-3 tódov µév is 'to a certain extent', 'so far', as at 18.378, 23.454. Verse 323 = 17.187, where Hektor actually puts on the armour of Akhilleus, taken from Patroklos' body (and see on 18.84 for $\tau \epsilon \sqrt{\chi} \epsilon \alpha \dots | \kappa \alpha \lambda \dot{\alpha}$). It is significant that the poet echoes 17.187 just when Akhilleus is about to strike the fatal blow. Cf. Virgil, Aen. 12.940-52, where Aineias is driven to kill Turnus by the sight of the belt which he had taken from the body of Pallas.

324-6 Cf. 8.325-7 παρ' ώμον, δθι κληίς άποξργει | αύχένα τε στήθός τε, μάλιστα δὲ καίριόν έστι, | τῆ β' ἐπὶ οΙ μεμαῶτα βάλεν λίθω δκριόεντι.

φαίνετο means 'it showed', i.e. either with χρώς understood, or impersonal. Aristarchus knew of a variant φαΐνεν or φαΐνον (Did/A, T). For λαυκανίην ('gullet') cf. 24.642. The word occurs nowhere else in early epic, and otherwise only in later epic and elegiac verse (A.R. 2.192, etc.), usually in the form $\lambda \epsilon v \kappa \alpha v i \eta$. The accusative is probably due to attraction to the case of $\alpha v \chi \epsilon v \alpha$, as one might have expected the nominative here after $\phi \alpha v \kappa \tau \alpha$. Most of our MSS read $\lambda \alpha v \kappa \alpha v i \eta s$, which would be a partitive genitive, and might well be the right reading Cf. Chantraine, GH II 51, Wackernagel, Kleue Schriften II 1120-1.

527 = 17.49. There is strong assonance of initial alphas here.

328-9 ἀσφάραγος meaning 'wind-pipe' recurs only in the medical writers, and in Hellenistic and later verse (Nicander, Nonnus, Quintus of Smyrna). For χαλκοβάρεια cf. 11.96 στεφάνη ... χαλκοβάρεια |, 15.465 los χαλκοβαρής. Aristarchus (Arn/A) athetized 329 as ridiculous. In defence it was said that the poet treats accidental events as if they were designed (Arn/A, bT). T quotes Od. 9.154-5 ὥρσαν δὲ Νύμφαι ... αἶγας ὀρεσκώους, Ινα δειπνήσειαν ἐταῖροι, and 12.427-8 ἦλθε δ' ἐπὶ Νότος ὥκα ... ôφρ' ἔτι τὴν ὁλοὴν ἀναμετρήσαιμι Χάρυβδιν. The death-arias of operatic heroes may be as unrealistic, but are equally essential in dramatic terms.

330-67 This death-scene, with its exchange of speeches, is closely parallel to that of Patroklos at 16.827-63 (see on 830-63, and cf. Fenik, TBS 217-18, Schadewaldt, VHWW 262, 323):

16.829-42

16.829 επευχόμενος

830 Πάτροκλ', ή που ξφησθα... 833 νήπιε' τάων δὲ πρόσθ'... (i.e. you did not reckon with me!) 836 σὲ δἑ τ' ἐνθάδε γῦπες ἔδονται

16.843

16.844–54: Patroklos' final speech

The gods gave you victory. It was Apollo and Euphorbos, not you, who caused my death. But your own death is imminent, at Akhilleus' hands.

16.885-7: Patroklos dies 16.858

- 22.330-6: boasting speech by victor
- ~ 22.330 επεύξατο
- ~ 22.331 Έκτορ', άτάρ που έφης...
- 22.333 νήπιε τοιο δ' άνευθεν
 αοσσητήρ ...
- 22.335-6 στ μεν κύντς ηδ' οίωνοι |
 ελκήσουσ' άικῶς
- 22.337: the dying man replies
 22.338-54: Hektor asks for burial and Akhilleus refuses (expanding 335-6, which is echoed by 354)
- ~ 22.335-60: Hektor's final speech

I knew I could not persuade you.

But beware of divine anger, when you die at the hands of Paris and Apollo.

= 22.361-3: Hektor dies.

 22.364: the victor addresses him after his death

۰,

1

| 16.859-61 Why prophesy my | | 22.365-6: I will accept my fate, |
|---------------------------|---|---|
| death? Perhaps I may kill | | when the gods fulfil it. |
| Akhilleus. | | |
| 16.862-3 | ~ | 22.367: the victor withdraws his spear from the body. |

The exchange between Hektor and Akhilleus about burial (338-54) is a crucial addition to the scheme in book 16, foreshadowing book 24.

In the two prophetic speeches (16.844-54, 22.355-60) reference to Apollo's agency in causing Patroklos' death is echoed in Hektor's prophecy that Apollo will cause Akhilleus' death. In both cases divine and human agency are mentioned together.

The final replies of Hektor and Akhilleus are significantly different: Hektor does not accept that Patroklos' prophecy will necessarily come true, whereas Akhilleus knows that he must die soon and is willing to accept his fate, although he wastes few words in saying so. Hektor's prophecy is the climax of a series of references to Akhilleus' impending death (see on 21.113, etc.).

330 For fipiπe δ' $\frac{1}{20}$ κουίης cf. 5.75, 11.743 fipiπe δ' $\frac{1}{20}$ κουίη -ησιν, and for δ δ' $\frac{1}{20}$ διος Άχιλλεύς 20.388.

332 δπίζεο: cf. 18.216 ώπίζετο, and 2× Od.

333 For $v\eta\pi u$ in emphatic initial position see on 21.99, and for doorn the see on 13.254-7. Cultively surely means 'better than Patroklos', in spite of bT's view that it refers to Hektor, because 'he would not have compared himself with Patroklos'.

335-6 Cf. 11.453-5 in a boasting speech: άλλ' οίωνοι | ώμησται έρύουσι ... | αὐτὰρ ἕμ', εἶ κε θάνω, κτεριοῦσί γε δῖοι 'Αχαιοί; 11.452-5 also resemble 22.352-4.

335 κύνες ήδ' οlωνοl: cf. 1.4-5 έλώρια τεῦχε κύνεσσιν | olωνοῖσι τε πᾶσι ('Hector's death is the most tragic of those rendings by dogs and birds foretold in the proem', Segal, Mutilation of the Corpse 37); 22.354 κύνες τε καl olωνοὶ κατὰ πάντα δάσονται; 24.411 οὕπω τόν γε κύνες φάγον, οὐδ' olωνol; see on 42.

336 Èλκήσουσ' ἀικῶς: cf. 17.558 κύνες Èλκήσουσιν (of Patroklos' body). ἀικῶς occurs only here in epic, but cf. ἀεικής, and Attic αἰκής, αἰκῶς. Antimachus wanted to substitute the easier reading Èλκήσουσι κακῶς (Did/A, T). We should perhaps read αἰκῶς here (Wackernagel, Kleine Schriften 1 222). Shipp (Studies 24) argues that αἰκῶς is Attic, whereas Chantraine (GH 1 38) prefers to read Ἐεικῶς with synizesis, which seems unlikely.

337 = 15.246; cf. 16.843 του δ' όλιγοδρανέων προσέφης, Πατρόκλεες Ιππεῦ. For the rare word όλιγοδράνειν see on 15.245-6.

•

t

338 With the utmost urgency Hektor supplicates Akhilleus, by his life, his knees, and his parents: to us a curious triad. Cf. Gould, JHS 93 (1973) 75ff., for examples of supplication by the knees. Here Hektor cannot touch Akhilleus' knees, and so this comes under Gould's class of 'rejected "figurative" supplications' (op. cit. 80-1, 81 n. 42). For supplication by parents cf. 15.659-66 (parents, children, wives), 24.466-7 (parents and son), 485-92 (father), Od. 11.66-8 (wife, father and son); similar lists occur in S. Ph. 468-70, OC 250-1. This speech is the final one in a series of pleas by Trojans for their lives, all vain (see on 20.463-72).

339 κύνας καταδάψαι: a striking alliterative phrase. καταδάπτειν occurs only here in II. Cf. 23.182-3 "Εκτορα δ' οῦ τι | δώσω Πριαμίδην πυρί δαπτέμεν, άλλὰ κύνεσοιν; Od. 3.259 κύνες... κατέδαψαν.

340-1 Here the theme of Hektor's ransoming is first introduced. Elsewhere in the poem the defeated plead for their lives, offering ransom (cf. 49-51n.), but only in this case do we hear of ransom for a dead body, for Akhilleus has already refused Hektor's plea that he should return his body for burial (258-72).

342-3 = 7.79-80, spoken also by Hektor, before his duel with Aias. There bT comment that Hektor's concern for burial is an effective anticipation of his future fate.

344-54 Akhilleus' speech is even more brutal and passionate than his earlier refusal of Hektor's request for burial. But his violent words at 346-7 must be read in their context: the wish 'is meant, while conveying hatred enough, to express that which is inconceivable' (Leaf). For this idiom, 'by which a certainty is expressed, by contrasting it with an impossibility in the form of a wish', see on 18.464-6. The desire to eat Akhilleus' liver is expressed in equally violent language by Hekabe at 24.212-14, and Zeus ascribes to Here a similar desire that she might 'eat the Trojans raw' at 4.34-6.

The structure and style of the speech are typical of Akhilleus' more passionate outbursts. He begins with a single-verse sentence, which immediately rejects Hektor's request. The remaining nine verses should probably be treated as two sentences, with a stop at the end of 348 (so Leaf). After the impossible wish and assertion of 346-8 Akhilleus repeats his rejection even more vehemently, with two ovor et key ... clauses (349-50, 351-2), and the apodosis ovor $x_5 \dots (352-3)$, rounded off by the repetition in 354 of the theme of 335-6. Cf. 9.379-87 ovor et µot dekoning the repetition in 354 of the theme of 335-6. Cf. 9.379-87 ovor et µot dekoning the repetition in 354 of the theme of $x_5 \dots x_5 \dots x_5$ for $x_5 \dots x_5 \dots x_5$ et µot dekoning the repetition of $x_5 \dots x_5 \dots$ earlier refusal to save the Greeks, Akhilleus will in the end give way. The passages in both books 9 and 22 are echoed at the climax of the Odyssey, in Odysseus' refusal of Eurumakhos' offer of recompense (22.61-4).

۰,

345 kvov: Hektor is called a dog by Akhilleus at 20.449 (= 11.362, addressed to him again by Diomedes), and is referred to by Teukros as such at 8.299. When used by heroes of each other in the lliad this term of abuse is almost always put into the mouth of a Greek speaker (e.g. Akhilleus to Agamemnon at 1.159, 225n., 9.373). Here it comes in a speech which is concerned with the rôle of real dogs as eaters of corpses. Cf. M. Faust, 'Die künstlerische Verwendung von kvov, "Hund", in den homerischen Epen', Glotta 48 (1970) 8-31, especially 29-30.

γούνων γουνάζεο: emphatic repetition. γουνάζομαι or γουνούμαι is used of figurative supplication also at 9.583, 11.130, Od. 6.149.

347 'The placing of the long participle between adjective and noun, both short words, gives a striking effect' (Segal, Mutilation of the Corpse 40).

348 άπαλάλκοι: this compound recurs at Od. 4.766.

349-50 εἰκοσινήριτος occurs only here, and is probably from εἰκοσινήριτα (cf. ἀριθμός), 'twentyfold'. Cf. Hes. Th. 240 μεγήριτα, with West's comment, and Leumann, HW 246-7. στήσωσ' means 'weigh out', as at 19.247, 24.232. For ὑπόσχωνται δὲ καὶ ἄλλα cf. 114-18 ὑπόσχωμαι... ἁμα δ'... ἄλλ' ἀποδάσσεσθαι. This echo of Hektor's earlier speculations here brings home to us how pointless they were.

351-2 οὐδ'... Πρίαμος: 'not even if Priam, Dardanos' offspring, were to bid me weigh your own body against gold', i.e. to pay your weight in gold. This hyperbole was said to have inspired Aeschylus to a literal portrayal of the scene in his Φρύγες ή Έκτορος λύτρα (p. 84 N.² = p. 365 Radt). For αὐτός of the body cf. 1.4(n.), 9.547, 23.65. For χρυσῷ ἐρύσασθαι cf. Theognis 77-8 πιστός ἀνήρ χρυσοῦ τε καὶ ἀργύρου ἀντερύσασθαι | ἁξιος. The verb seems to mean 'weigh' here, from ἑρύειν = 'draw'. Leaf compares Eλκειν = 'weigh' (212 etc.), but that refers to holding up the scales.

352-4 Cf. 21.123-4 oùbé σε μήτηρ | ένθεμένη λεχέεσσι γοήσεται, and 22.86-9 où σ' έτ' έγωγε | κλαύσομαι έν λεχέεσσι ... δν τέκον αὐτή, $\}$... κύνες ταχέες κατέδονται. 'This statement not only negates the appeal to the sanctity of parents which runs throughout the scene (338, 341, 345); it also confirms Hecuba's near-hysterical forebodings' (Segal, Mutilation of the Corpse 40).

354 Cf. also 335-6 etc., and for κατά πάντα δάσονται cf. Od. 18.87 (~ 22.476) μήδεα τ' ... δώη κυσίν ώμα δάσασθαι. bT note the aptness of the treesis κατά ... δάσονται in the context of tearing the body apart. For other examples cf. CQ 30 (1980) 286, and AbT 15.1 with Erbse's commentary.

The effect of this verse (gutturals and dentals, tmesis) is increased by the way in which olwool bridges the central caesura, after a weak caesura in the second foot:

1 2 34 5 6

άλλά κύνες τε | καί οίωνοι | κατά πάντα δάσονται

On the tendency towards avoidance of a break after the trochee in the second foot see vol. 1, p. 19. What we have seems to be an unusual type of 'rising threefolder', in which the first two cola might appear to be equal in weight: -00-0 and 0---; but the second actually sounds heavier owing to the three long syllables.

355-60 Hektor prophesies Akhilleus' death, as Patroklos foresaw Hektor's.

355 καταθνήσκων: cf. 337 όλιγοδρανέων. 'The poet marks the different times very effectively' (bT).

356-7 Elsewhere προτιόσσομαι means 'look at' (Od. 7.31, 23.365) or 'forebode' (Od. 5.389, 14.219); cf. δσσομαι, 'imagine', 'forebode'. The second sense is better here: 'truly knowing you well I forebode (my fate)'. For η γάρ... θυμός cf. 24.205, 521 σιδήρειόν νύ τοι ητορ (of Priam).

358 μ % rol ri θ converte a second right a seco

359-60 See on 21.113, and cf. especially 19.416-17 $d\lambda\lambda d$ ool $dv\tau \tilde{\omega}$ | µópo1µóv tori $\theta t \tilde{\omega}$ TE Kal $dvt\rho i$ [4] $\delta \alpha \mu \eta \nu \alpha i$. For $t \nu i \Sigma \kappa \alpha \eta \sigma i$ $\pi \nu \lambda \eta \sigma i$ see on 3.145 and 22.6, and cf. 23.80-1 (Akhilleus will die 'below the walls of Troy'). In the Aithiopis (OCT vol. v, ed. Allen, p. 106.7-9 = Davies, EGF p. 47.20-1) 'Akhilleus having routed the Trojans and broken into the city is killed by Paris and Apollo'. The Scaean gates are depicted in this context on the Tabulae Iliacae of the early Imperial period: LIMC 1.1 p. 183 no. 854 (and on other portrayals in art and literature see ibid. 181-5).

361-3 = 16.855-7; 364 echoes 16.858. See on these verses.

364 καl τεθνηῶτα: 'to address him even when dead shows the extremity of his anger' (bT).

g65-6 For τέθναθι cf. 15.496 | τεθνάτω, 15.497 etc. | τεθνάμεν. The imperative, standing alone at the beginning of the verse, is brutally abrupt and dismissive; see on 21.128 φθείρεσθ'. κῆρα ... $\alpha\lambda\lambda$ oi = 18.115-16, when

• .

ţ

Akhilleus is replying to Thetis, after she has announced that he will die 'immediately after Hektor' (96). See on those verses.

367-404 Akhilleus strips off Hektor's armour, and the oth Greeks stab his corpse. Akhilleus suggests that they attack Troy, but then remembers that Patroklos is unburied. He tells them to return to the ships with Hektor's body, singing a victory-song. He then fastens the body to his chariot by thongs passed through the ankles, and sets off, dragging it b hind him

On this scene see especially Segal, Mutilation of the Corpse 41-2, Griffin, HLD 47, 84-5, 138.

367 Cf. 21.200 (Ex KPNµvoĩo). The motif of withdrawing the spear occurred after the killing of Sarpedon by Patroklos (16.503-4), and Patroklos by Hektor (16.862-3). Cf. also 5.620-1, 6.64-5.

368-9 For δ δ' άπ' ώμων τεύχε' ἐσύλα cf. 15.524, etc. περιτρέχειν occurs only here in early epic, but is common later (cf. Herodotus etc.).

370–1 Wonder at Hektor's beauty is combined with callous indifference, or perhaps hatred, as the Achaeans stab his body. For the wonder of the troops Leaf compares Hdt. 9.25.1, after Masistios has been killed at Plataia: δ δὲ νεκρὸς ἦν θἑης ἄξιος μεγάθεος είνεκα καὶ κάλλεος¹ τῶν δὲ είνεκα καὶ ταῦτα ἐποίευν² ἐκλιπόντες τὸς τάξις ἐφοίτων θεησόμενοι Μασίστιον.

The stabbing of the corpse may derive ultimately from the wish to ensure that the dead man is really and truly dead and that his ghost cannot harm his enemies after death. 'But Homer will not bring such horrors to the surface, and the scene as we have it draws a great part of its pathos and effectiveness from the heroic contrast of the impassive corpse of Hector and the small malevolence of those who ran from him in life and can face him only when he is safely dead. "The emotion (of triumph) is that of a low mob, and it magnifies the greatness of the dead man", is the correct comment of the scholiast' (Griffin, HLD 47). Wilamowitz made a similar point (luH 103): 'Der Dichter hebt die Grösse Hektors durch die Niedrigkeit der feindlichen Menge.'

Much of the effect comes from the contrast between beauty and defilement, and this recurs still more explicitly at the end of this scene (401-4).

For pupe kal eldos dyntóv cf. Od. 6.16 pupe kal eldos (sc); eldos dyntol -os $| 3 \times II$. dvoutntí ('without wounding him') occurs only here and in Quintus of Smyrna (3.445); cf. dvoútatos (4.540), doutos (18.536), 'unwounded'. This stabbing is mentioned again at 24.421.

372-4 Leaf compares this grimly mocking speech with a passage in Burnt Njal: 'All men said that it was better to be near Skarphedinn dead than they weened, for no man was afraid of him' (cf. Njal's Saga, translated by M. Magnusson and H. Palsson, Penguin 1960, p. 276). Verse 372 = 2.271 (n.)

• .

etc. For 373 cf. 16.745 & $\pi \delta \pi \sigma \sigma_i$, $\eta \mu \Delta \lambda' \ell \lambda \alpha \phi \rho \delta \delta \delta \sigma \rho' \delta \delta \delta \sigma \kappa \sigma \beta \sigma \sigma \eta$, in a mocking speech of triumph over a fallen enemy. The verb $\delta \mu \phi \alpha \phi \Delta \omega$ occurs only here in II., but $\delta \times Od$. The predominance of m, l and p sounds in this line is very noticeable, and emphasized by the two long final words, and the echo $\mu \Delta \lambda \alpha \cdots \mu \alpha \lambda \alpha \kappa \omega \tau \epsilon \rho \sigma s$. In 374 the variant $\ell \nu \ell \pi \rho \eta \delta \epsilon \nu$ (imperfect) is preferred by Leaf, who calls it 'obviously superior' to $\ell \nu \ell \pi \rho \eta \sigma \epsilon \nu$.

375 That is, 'as they spoke they stabbed him' (Arn/A, bT).

376-94 Akhilleus' first suggestion, which appears to be that they should attack the city immediately, could reflect the sequence of events after the killing of Memnon, when he does attack Troy and is killed (cf. the Aithiopis, OCT vol. v, ed. Allen, p. 106.5-9 = Davies, EGF p. 47.18-21). But the risk of such an attack is constantly present in the later books (cf. 16.91-4, 16.698-9, 18.265, 20.26-30, and Poseidon's advice to Akhilleus at 21.296-7), and Hektor's death points forward to Troy's actual fall (410-11). The poet is once again leading us to expect a sequence of events which is then postponed.

376 = 2.79 etc. (8× Il.). The verse is used several times in an address to the Greeks in general. Zenodotus' alternative line 'Ατρείδη τε και άλλοι άριστῆες Παναχαιῶν (-7.327, 23.236) is out of place here, as Agamemnon is in his hut. There is another variant $\mathring{\omega}$ φίλοι ήρωες Δαναοί θεράποντες 'Άρηος (=2.110 etc.) in a few medieval MSS.

379 the bit of 23.2 for this scansion of the $(and 4 \times Od.)$; Chantraine, GH_1 103. Tovo' avona is another oblique reference, as at 38 etc. Akhilleus does not name him yet. In 0 to 1... toward he duly acknowledges the gods' rôle in his victory.

gio dy kakà $\pi o \lambda \lambda^2$ ippefer: cf. 9.540 dy kakà $\pi o \lambda \lambda^2$ ipberner, where Ammonius read in the set of the subset of the set of the set

38z-3 Akhilleus does not speak in terms of a full-scale attack, but presumably what he has in mind is the capture of Troy. For expressions like ε δ' άγετε in an apodosis cf. 24.407, Od. 4.832. For σύν τεύχεσι πειρηθέωμεν cf. 11.386 σύν τεύχεσι πειρηθείης]; Od. 8.100 πειρηθέωμεν]. On this form see Chantraine, GH I 459.

383 The first alternative, desertion of the city (or strictly speaking the citadel), is very extreme: but Akhilleus is in the first flush of his victory over Hektor. Cf. however 24.383-5, where the same idea is envisaged.

385 This verse – 21.562 (see comment). This is the only case where the verse does not occur in a soliloquy, but it does not seem out of place here: in all the instances a particular train of thought is interrupted by the realization of a factor which invalidates it.

386 čakhavros čoanros recur together at Od. 11.54 and 11.72, and neither is used elsewhere in the lliad; cf. S. Ant. 876 čakhavros čopikos čavultonos.

۰,

١

For other examples of such co-ordinated epithets with negative prefix see Richardson on HyDem 200.

387–8 δφρα... δρώρη: cf. 23.47 δφρα ζωοῖσι μετείω, and 9.610 = 10.90καί μοι φίλα γούνατ' δρώρη. The variant verse ζωδς έν Άργείοισι φιλοπτολέμοισι μετείω is quite well attested (A, Eust. and several of our MSS).

389-90 The best sense here is 'and if in Hades men forget the dead, yet even there I shall remember my dear comrade', i.e. after I too am dead. This gives a good contrast to 387-8. T mentions Od. 11.467-8, where Akhilleus and Patroklos appear together in the Underworld, as they do also at Od. 24.15-16. The compound $\kappa \alpha \tau \alpha \lambda \eta \partial \omega \partial \alpha$ occurs nowhere else in surviving literature.

1-4 These verses echo 217-18, in Athene's promise to Akhilleus. For 391 cf. 1.473 KONOV delovtes mainova koupoi 'Axaiw, and comments there. There the paean was sung in Apollo's honour, after the prayer and sacrifice to propitiate him for the insult to Khruses. Essentially a paean was regarded in antiquity as a song of thanksgiving for relief from trouble, or sometimes a song for the aversion of trouble (cf. AbT 1.473, T 22.391c): hence it could be sung, as here, after a victory in war. There is no compelling reason to suppose that it was addressed to Apollo here: in view of his enmity to Akhilleus and the Greeks this seems unlikely (although von Blumenthal, RE XVIII s.v. Paian 2341-2, thinks that it was so). For the paean as a warsong later cf. von Blumenthal, op. cit. 2346-8, W. K. Pritchett, Ancient Greek Military Practices pt 1 (Berkeley 1971) 105-8.

392 Before 393 pap. 12 adds [καί τ]εθνηότα περ. τόσα γάρ κακ' έμήσατ' Άχαιούς.

393-4 Aristarchus (Arn/A) athetized these verses, ότι παρά την άξιον 'Axillews of loyor, and he referred to 16.242-4, where Akhilleus implied that Patroklos on his own was a match for Hektor. Aristarchus' point seems to have been that 393-4 overrate Hektor by comparison with this earlier view (cf. also Eust. 1275.21ff.). bT defend the verses, saying that 'Akhilleus makes the victory a collective one, and encouraging his supporters he says that the Trojans' hopes are ended after Hektor's death'. This seems nearer the mark, and the further suggestion, that the verses represent the actual song which the Greeks are to sing, or perhaps rather the refrain, is attractive (Eust. 1275.17ff.). The asyndeton after 392 is in favour of this idea, as is the asyndetic simplicity, brevity and balance of the two separate hemistichs of 393, each composed of a 1st person plural aorist indicative verb plus a noun-epithet object. Verse 394 is more expansive, giving the reason why the glory is so great in a single-verse clause. Verse 393 is entirely dactylic (Eust. 1275.18), a suitably cheerful rhythm. For θεῷ ὡς εὐχετόωντο in 394 cf. Od. 8.467 = 15.181 $\theta \in \phi$ is every open with the same idea recurs at 434-5.

395-404 This ten-verse passage describing the dragging of Hektor's body is all the more shocking after the exalted tone of the previous verses. Cf. Griffin, HLD 84-5 on verse 395: 'The immediate juxtaposition of "god-like Hector" and "acts of humiliation" enables the poet to bring out, without sentimentality, the pathos of the greatest possible fall for a man, from god-like stature to humiliation and helplessness.'

Verses 395-400 are in the poet's most matter-of-fact style, with painfully precise description of how Akhilleus makes holes in the dead man's ankles, threads them with thongs, and fastens these to the chariot. Verses 399-400, apart from the reference to the armour, could have come in any typical scene of a departure. Verses 401-4 are also objective and detached, and yet at the same time the verses could not express more clearly the terrible contrast between Hektor's beauty and greatness and his present degradation (cf. Schadewaldt, VHWW 325-6, Griffin, HLD 138). For an anticipation of this passage in the fight over Patroklos' corpse see on 17.288-303.

395 This verse is repeated at 23.24. In dente underto loya does dente imply moral condemnation by the poet, or simply shame for Hektor's body? The two alternatives are already suggested by the scholia (b 395). That we cannot necessarily infer moral condemnation is indicated above all by Akhilleus' own words at 335-6, of µev ... Exchoouo' dixes: he cannot be condemning himself there (cf. S. E. Bassett, TAPA 64 (1933) 44-6). Moreover 395 is echoed at the end of this passage by 403-4, where Zeus himself is said to allow the disfigurement (deux(oocobos) of Hektor's head. At 24.33-54, however, Apollo protests, accusing the gods of being δηλήμονες because they allow this mutilation to continue (54 denkizer). Apollo says that this is neither κάλλιον nor δμεινον (52) for Akhilleus, and may incur divine anger (53 veneromotioner). Despite the opposition of Here, Zeus accepts Apollo's plea (64-76). So in the end the gods uphold the principle that Hektor's body should not have been so treated. As we have seen, this may also be the implication of Hektor's warning to Akhilleus at 958-60. But this will not become clear until book 24 (although it is foreshadowed at 23.184-91), and at 22.395 there has not as yet been any explicit condemnation of Akhilleus' acts, however much they are portrayed as brutal and degrading. See also de Jong, Narrators 138.

396-7 TETPOLIVELV occurs only here in II.; cf. Od. 5.247, 23.198. The term 'Achilles' tendon' derives from the use of the word TEVOVTE in this passage (cf. Leaf ad loc.). πT point is only here in early epic, but common later. For potous ... luávtas cf. 23.324 pototouv luãouv.

399-400 For $t_5 \delta t_{0} \delta$

401-4 These verses significantly echo the description of the defilement of Patroklos' helmet, itself linked there with Hektor's impending doom (16.793-800). Cf. 16.795-800:

μιάνθησαν δὲ Εθειραι αἰματι καὶ κονίησι· πάρος γε μὲν οὐ θέμις ἦεν Ιππόκομον πήληκα μιαίνεσθαι κονίησιν, άλλ' ἀνδρὸς θείοιο κάρη χαρίεν τε μέτωπον ῥύετ' Άχιλλῆος· τότε δὲ Ζεύς Ἐκτορι δῶκεν ἦ κεφαλῆ φορέειν, σχεδόθεν δέ οἱ ἦεν ὅλεθρος.

Cf. also the defilement of Sarpedon's body by blood and dust (16.638-40), and similar descriptions at 15.537-8, 17.51-2, 439-40; see on 16.794-800, and Fenik, TBS 163, Segal, Mutilation of the Corpse 41-2, Griffin, HLD 134-8. Segal comments: 'Homer has reserved the more moving and solemn effect for Hector. He has thinned out the details ..., used three parallel clauses with effective enjambements, and heightened this rhythmic movement by a strong alliteration of k and p sounds. The language describing the mutilation here is distinctive and nontraditional.'

In later antiquity the dragging of Hektor was defended in two ways: (a) on the grounds that Hektor himself wanted to mutilate Patroklos' corpse, by cutting off his head and fixing it on stakes (18.176-7), and that in fact Patroklos' body was dragged to and fro by Hektor and the Trojans in the fight for its possession (17.125-6, 17.288-302, 17.389-95; cf. also 18.175-6); cf. Schol. AB 22.397, Porph. 1.267.1; one could add that Hektor wanted to throw the body to the dogs (17.127); (b) Aristotle (fr. $166 R.^3$) simply observed that Akhilleus was following an existing custom, and he supported this with evidence that the practice continued in Thessaly (cf. Call. fr. 588). It was said that Alexander the Great imitated Akhilleus' action, by inflicting the same fate on Batis, governor of Gaza (Hegesias, FGH 142 F 5, Quintus Curtius 4.6.29).

dot dupl de xaïrai | recurs at 6.509 = 15.266, in the simile about the stall-fed horse, which in the second passage refers to Hektor's success after he has been encouraged by Apollo.

402 Kuáveat: Poseidon is Kuavoxaltus (13.563 etc.), and the brows of Zeus and Here are of this colour (1.528, 15.102 etc.; see on 1.528), but it is very unusual for the epithet to be used of a hero's hair. At Od. 16.176 the hair of Odysseus' beard is called Kuávea, when he is transformed by Athene, and there Telemakhos actually thinks that he is a god (183). By such means, with characteristic economy, the poet draws our attention to the contrast between Hektor's 'god-like' appearance and his defilement.

πίτναντο is the reading of a minority of MSS and T, but it is clearly preferable to the vulgate πίλναντο, or the other alternative reading $\pi I(\mu)\pi\lambda\alpha v\tau \sigma$.

403-4 TOTE $\delta \hat{\mathbf{t}} \dots \gamma \alpha \hat{\mathbf{t}}_{3}$: after the three shorter enjambed clauses of 401-3 this longer sentence closes the description with a characteristic allusion to the divine will. Cf. 16.799-800, quoted in comment on 401-4.

404 tỹ tv πατρίδι γαίη: a similar phrase is used elsewhere in the context of dying in one's own land: cf. $3.244 \phi l\lambda y$ tv πατρίδι γαίη (Dioskouroi); $8.359 \phi 8 \mu v \sigma v \pi \alpha \tau \rho l \delta v \gamma \alpha \eta$ (Hektor). 'The motif of "beauty brought low" is combined with that of "suffering in one's own country". The bitterness of the ill-treatment of Hector's head, "which before was comely", is increased by his enemy having power to inflict it in his own fatherland, before the eyes of his own people' (Griffin, HLD 138; cf. 112). This melancholy phrase closes the narrative of Hektor's death and prepares the way for the scenes which are about to follow. The whole of the remainder of this Book describes the immediate reactions in Troy to Hektor's death: the extreme grief and violent, unrestrained emotion of all the Trojans, and above all of his own parents and his wife.

405-36 Hektor's parents and the people of Troy lament his death. Priam begs them to let him go and entreat Akhilleus for the return of Hektor's body, and Hekabe leads the women of Troy in lam ntation

This section balances the speeches by Priam and Hekabe at the beginning of the Book (25-89): see Introduction to book 22. The reference to the deaths of Priam's other sons and his grief for them, but above all for Hektor (422-6), echoes 44-55. Hekabe tears her hair (405-6) as Priam did then (77-8), and in both cases her shorter speech complements Priam's.

Priam's speech also anticipates his actual supplication of Akhilleus in book 24: there too he reminds him of his father Peleus ($420-1 \sim 24.486-92$), and again speaks of his lost sons ($423-8 \sim 24.493-502$). There is a reversal here, as what was prevented in book 22 becomes real in book 24 (cf. Macleod, lliad XXIV 21-2, and Reinhardt, luD 468-9). Moreover, Priam's self-abasement (414) is again referred to at 24.163-5 and 24.640. A further structural parallel can be seen between the triad of speeches by Priam, Hekabe and Andromakhe at the end of book 22 and the laments of Andromakhe, Hekabe and Helen near the close of book 24 (723-76). On these links see also Beck, Stellung 71-92.

405-6 ώς ... ἄπαν: this echoes 402 κάρη ... κονίησι, as a transition to the following scene. For τίλλε κόμην see on 77-8.

406-7 άπὸ δὲ ... τηλόσε: so too Andromakhe's head-dress is thrown from her head, in the more elaborate passage at 468-72. Demeter tears her head-dress in grief at HyDem 40-1, in a passage perhaps influenced by these scenes (see Richardson on HyDem 38ff. and 41). For λιπαρήν... καλύπτρην cf. 18.382 λιπαροκρήδεμνος and Od. 1.334 etc. λιπαρά κρήδεμνα. Woven materials actually have oil dripping from them at 18.595-6, Od. 7.107. For the KOAÚTTON (perhaps really a head-scarf rather than a veil) see on 14.184, and Lorimer, HM 386. The word itself occurs only here in II., $2 \times Od$.

۰.

. .

I

407-9 κωκυσεν ... φμωξεν ... κωκυτῷ ... οἰμωγη̃: κωκύειν is always used of women in epic and tragedy (so bT 408 and LSJ). The repetition of the nouns in 409, after the verbs in 407-8, and the spondaic first hemistich, add to the mournful effect. κωκυτός recurs at 447, otherwise in Homer only as the name of the river in the Underworld at Od. 10.514.

410-11 These solemn and terrible verses are made all the more memorable by the untypical language of 411. $\delta\phi\rho\nu\delta\sigma\sigma\sigma\sigma$ ('beetling') occurs only here in Homer, although cf. 20.151 fm' $\delta\phi\rho\nu\sigma\sigma\sigma\sigma$ ('beetling') occurs only here in Homer, although cf. 20.151 fm' $\delta\phi\rho\nu\sigma\sigma\sigma\sigma$ ('beetling') occurs only here in Homer, although cf. 20.151 fm' $\delta\phi\rho\nu\sigma\sigma\sigma\sigma$ ('beetling') occurs only co4.48 M-W, and an oracle at Hdt. 5.92 β both have $\delta\phi\rho\nu\sigma\sigma\sigma\sigma\sigma$ (Kop $\nu\sigma\sigma\sigma$; cf. Call. fr. 186.20 $\delta\phi\rho\nu\sigma\sigma\sigma\sigma\sigma$ ('labor') the comments that the epithet 'not only conveys a vivid impression of Troy on its ridge overlooking the plain but helps by contrast to strengthen the note of menace in its coming doom. It is a general comment on the forbidding aspect which the city presented, especially to any possible attackers.'

σμύχοιτο ('were smouldering') is paralleled in Homer only at 9.653, where it refers to the burning of the Achaean ships by Hektor, and recurs in Hellenistic poetry and late prose. It is a particularly ugly and gloomy word.

For the Trojans Hektor's death means the end of Troy, and as in Priam's earlier speech (60-76), so here we have a vision of what is to come.

412-13 So too at 18.33-4 Antilokhos holds Akhilleus' hands, to restrain him in case he tries to kill himself in his grief at the news of Patroklos' death.

414 KUAIVÕÕMEVOS KOTA KÕMPOV: this is repeated at 24.640 of Priam, and the same action described more fully at 24.163-5. Akhilleus' self-abasement at 18.23-7 is similar (and compare Laertes at Od. 24.315-17). As in book t8 we have here the first extreme reaction of grief. That such reactions persisted in later antiquity is suggested by the criticism of Lucian, De luctu 12: 'dust is sprinkled on the head, and the living are more pitiful than the dead man; for they often roll on the ground and beat their heads against the earth'. Such rituals of mourning were sometimes described by the term 'self-pollution', (KOTO) μ COVECOCI (Parker, Miasma 40-1). In general cf. also K. Meuli, Gesammelte Schriften, Basel 1975, 1 333ff.

415 εξ όνομακλήδην όνομάζων: cf. Od. 4.278 εκ δ' όνομακλήδην ... όνόμαζες. At Od. 12.250 εξονομακλήδην must be a single word, and so perhaps here also. The insistence on Priam's naming of each person individually stresses the desperation of his appeal.

416-28 Priam's speech contains a high frequency of single runover words or short phrases at the opening of a verse (420, 421, 422, 425, 426, 428), another way of emphasizing the urgency of his entreaty. Cf. vol. v, pp. 42-4.

416 olov: so too Hektor faced Akhilleus alone, although his parents begged him not to do so (cf. 38-9). In book 24 Priam will ignore the pleas of Hekabe, and go virtually alone to face Akhilleus (148, 177, 203, 519).

κηδόμενοι περ was preferred by Aristarchus (Did/A) to the variant κηδόμενόν περ. It presumably means 'concerned though you are for me'.

418 λίσσωμ' ('let me supplicate') is virtually a final clause; cf. Chantraine, GH 11 207. For άνέρα τοῦτον see on 38. άτάσθαλον δβριμοεργόν means 'reckless', 'violent'; cf. Hes. Th. 996 άτάσθαλος δβριμοεργός], of Pelias, δβριμοεργός alone of Herakles at II. 5.403. 'He abuses the man whom he wishes to supplicate' (bT).

419-26 Not only is the train of thought similar to that of Priam's actual speech of supplication of Akhilleus (24.486-506: see on 405-36), with the mention of Peleus leading on to Priam's own grief for his sons, and thus to Hektor, but there are verbal parallels too. Cf. 419 with 24.503 aldeio ... autov τ' Extopox; 420 ~ 24.486-7; and the climactic positioning of 'Extopox (426) with 24.501 'Extopox.

419 fiv: pap. 12 reads ϵ l, which was conjectured by Heyne and may be right; cf. Chantraine, GH 11 281-2. Leaf wanted to take fixing as 'his (i.e. Akhilleus') contemporaries' (cf. 16.808). But it must surely mean 'my age'.

421-2 Cf. 6.282-3 μέγα γάρ μιν (Paris) 'Ολύμπιος ἔτρεφε πῆμα | Τρωσί τε καί Πριάμω...

423-4 Pap. 12 reads tolous for toorous, perhaps to avoid repetition with toorow in 424, and two molder in 424. Theorem ('flourishin') is usually of plants; see on 87 ϕ ldov θ ddos. For this theme of Priam's loss of so many sons see on 44.

425 Leaf compares Jacob's 'then shall ye bring down my gray hairs with sorrow to the grave' (Genesis 42.38). For άχος δξύ cf. 19.125, Od. 11.208. καταφέρειν (κατοίσεται) is only here in Homer, but common later.

426-8 Cf. 86-8 etc., and see on 82-9. Here Priam wishes that his son had died in his own arms. For 427 cf. Od. 20.59 Khaloura Kopérrato, etc., and for 428 cf. 485, 24.727 or theorem of τ ' by the duration of the second secon

429 The Trojans take up the lament, as the women do after Andromakhe's speech at 515. The same type of refrain occurs after all the laments in book 24 (746, 760, 776), but the verse is varied at 437 to introduce the scene of Andromakhe at home. On such refrains cf. Alexiou, Ritual Lament 12-13, 131ff. Did/A and T quote a variant ytpovres for $\pi o\lambda \tilde{i} \tau o i$, making the verse a repetition of 19.338. This is supported by T, on the grounds that Priam's speech is 'suitable to fathers'.

430-6 Hekabe's lament is more simple than Priam's, and also more resigned (430-1). It is mainly concerned with Hektor's past greatness, in contrast to his present state, a familiar feature of funerary laments in general (cf. Thetis at 18.55-7, and Alexiou, Ritual Lament 165-71). Her initial words 'why should I live?' are also a typical way of opening a lament with a question or a series of questions: cf. Alexiou, op. cit. 161-77. The speech has an alternation of progressive and integral enjambment throughout, which gives it a fluid quality.

۰,

l

430 This verse is very similar to 24.747. For this formal introduction to a lament see on 18.316-17.

431 τέκνον, έγώ δειλή: cf. the opening of Andromakhe's lament (477). βείομαι is probably a short-vowel subjunctive, 'why should I live?'; cf. 15.194 βέομαι etc. For αίνα παθοῦσα Aristarchus (Did/A) read αίνα τεκοῦσα, as at 1.414 (Thetis to Akhilleus). Cf. also 18.54 (Thetis) & μοι έγὼ δειλή, ώ μοι δυσαριστοτόκεια.

433 εύχωλή probably means 'something to boast about', as at 2.160, 4.173. δνειαρ is applied to Hektor again at 486. In the singular the word seems elsewhere in early epic to be used often to describe gods or their gifts: cf. Od. 4.444 (Eidothee's aid to Odysseus), Hes. Th. 871 (winds), Erga 822 (days), HyDem 269 (Demeter), with Richardson's comment.

434–5 of σε θεόν ώς | δειδέχατ': 'who used to welcome you as a god'. The original form may have been δηδέχατ' (see on 4.4). Cf. 394 etc., and Od. 7.71–2: και λαών, οι μίν βα θεόν ώς είσορόωντες | δειδέχαται μύθοισιν, δτε στείχησ' άνὰ ἄστυ.

437-515 Meanwhile, Andromakhe sits weaving at home knowing nothing of Hektor's death. She has just told her maids to prepare the water for his bath, when she hears the laments of Hekabe and the Trojans. Fearful for Hektor she rushes to the wall, and when she sees him she faints. Recovering, she laments his death, her own loss, and the helpless plight of their son Astuanax

• .

t

Hektor foresaw the fall of Troy, and wished that he might die rather than see Andromakhe a captive (6.447-65): his wish has now come true, and Troy's fall is near.

The picture of the timid child clinging to his nurse, afraid of his father's nodding helmet-plume, and the touching naturalness of this family scene (6.466-84) seem to find an echo too in the realistic way in which Andromakhe contrasts his gentle nursing with the rudeness that he will encounter as an orphan, causing him to run in tears to his widowed mother (22.490-504).

The scene in book 6 closed with Hektor telling his wife to go back to her loom and domestic tasks, and to bid her maids go about their work, while he returned to the war. She obeyed, and we last saw her among her maids, who were lamenting Hektor as if he were already killed (6.490-502). Now we find her again at her loom (22.440-1), giving orders to her maids for their domestic tasks (442-4). This Book too closes with her lament, echoed by the women. Her last words describe the clothes which they have woven for Hektor, which will now be useless to him, and which she will burn (510-14). Thus the scene in book 22 itself is framed by these references to the clothes made by the women (cf. 440-1).

The two episodes of books 6 and 22 also form the same pattern in reverse order. Andromakhe on the wall, her return home, and the premature laments for Hektor in book 6, are reversed with the scenes in book 22 of her at home, waiting for his return when he is already dead, then rushing to the wall, and lamenting him.

Book 6 showed us the city which Hektor was defending, the members of his own family for whom he was fighting, and above all the quiet, orderly happiness of family life which he stood to lose. Here, after the intense dramatic action of the battlefield, and the wild grief of the Trojans, we are again transported to the orderly peace of Hektor's house: the person who is dearest to him is the last to know the truth, although when she hears the laments we see that her heart was full of foreboding, and she at once guesses what has happened. The shock of seeing him dead causes her to faint; but she recovers, and her speech is remarkably controlled, in contrast to that of Priam. There is a practical side to her character, which appeared already in book 6, when she actually gave Hektor a piece of tactical advice about where to face the Greeks (433-9). It was also she who was responsible for the care of Hektor's war-horses (8.185-90), and who would receive his armour when he came home from fighting (17.207-8). Here her thoughts turn almost at once to their son, her chief surviving responsibility: it is his fate, not her own, that concerns her above all. He is also, in one sense, the image of his father, as his name suggests and as Hektor prayed that he would be (6.476-81).

۰.

T

Andromakhe's lament is echoed in her final speech in book 24 (725-45). This is shorter, but again she speaks mainly of what awaits their son $(22.482-5 \sim 24.725-7)$. The two speeches complement each other, for in the first she imagined what would happen if he escaped death or captivity, whereas in the second she is more realistic and faces the truth, which is that Troy will fall and he will be enslaved or killed. This foresight parallels that of Hektor himself in book 6, when he predicted Andromakhe's enslavement (454-65).

The admiration of ancient readers for this episode is clearly shown in the detailed comments of the scholia (cf. 442-5, 448, 452, 464-5, 468-72, 474, 487, 500, 512-13). The effect of contrast between Hektor's death and the scene at his home was imitated by Juvenal in the pathetic description of a street accident in Rome, where the dead man's slaves are preparing their master's bath and dinner, while he is already waiting to cross the Styx (S. 3.257-67). In a later age Thackeray too may have echoed the scene, in Vanity Fair (chapter 32), when he describes Amelia praving for her husband to return from the battlefield of Waterloo, while he 'was lying on his face, dead, with a bullet through his heart' (cf. Griffin, HLD 110).

The scholia regard the motif of Andromakhe's ignorance of the truth as characteristic of the poet's skill in evoking sympathy. In a comment on 17.401-2, bT compare this with Akhilleus' ignorance of Patroklos' death and hopes of his safe return from battle, and also Dolon's expectation that those who are approaching him (at 10.349-56) are his own companions, coming to tell him to return to Troy.

For a detailed discussion of 437-76 cf. C. Segal, 'Andromache's anagnorisis: formulaic artistry in Iliad 22.437-76', HSCP 75 (1971) 33-57. On the relationship with book 6 cf. Wilamowitz, IuH 321; U. Hölscher, Gnomon 27 (1955) 388-9; W. Schadewaldt, Hellas und H sperien (Zürich 1960) 36-8; Beck, Stellung 71-92; Lohmann, Reden 99-100, and especially his Andromache-Szenen 63-9.

438 Έκτορος is best taken with άλοχος. Leaf notes Od. 8.12 δφρα ξείνοιο πύθησθε, but here (as he says) one would expect a participle (θανόντος) if the noun were taken with πέπυστο. For οὐ γάρ οἱ τις ἐτήτυμος ἄγγελος ἑλθών cf. HyDem 46 οῦτ' οἰωνῶν τις τῆ ἐτήτυμος ἄγγελος ἦλθεν.

440-1 Cf. Helen at 3.125-8 f de usyar loror üdaire, | $\delta l\pi \lambda \alpha \kappa \alpha$ πορφυρέην, πολέας δ' ένέπασσεν άθθλους (etc.), and see comments on 3.125-7, 3.128. There are other parallels between these two scenes: both women leave their weaving in order to go to the wall, accompanied by two maids, and wearing their veils (3.141-5, 22.460-3, 22.468-72). See Introduction, 'Structure', and cf. Arend, Scenen 52-3, and Lohmann, Androma he-Scenen 59-62.

441 by de opdva moikily' Emagge refers to weaving, not embroidery (cf.

•

3.125-7n.). $\theta p \delta v \alpha$ is revived in literature by the Hellenistic poets, and survived in Cypriote, Thessalian and Actolian. From this evidence it seems to mean either 'flowers' or 'figured patterns' in general (schol. Theor. 2.59-62b). $\pi \delta \sigma \sigma \epsilon v$ also survived in Cypriote, where it is said to have the same sense as $\pi \sigma \kappa (\lambda \lambda \epsilon v (AT 441))$.

Helen was weaving scenes from the Trojan War itself, suffered for her sake, but Andromakhe is cut off from events outside, and the contrast of her peaceful weaving of decorative motifs with what has actually happened is all the more poignant. 'For Andromache ... the battle scenes are not reducible to art. They are too much part of a terrible present ... Her embroidery ... contains the symbols of the life and hope which the gods deny' (Segal, HSCP 1971, 41).

442-6 bT comment that 'he increases the pathos. For so far is she from being aware of what has occurred that she even prepares bath water, as though virtually seeing Hektor: and so the poet has added in sympathy the exclamation $v\eta\pi\eta$, oùb' ivongev, as if pitying her ignorance.'

442-4 Cf. 18.343-5, 23.39-41, especially 18.344 (~ 23.40) άμφι πυρι στήσαι τρίποδα μέγαν, δφρα τάχιστα. This passage in book 18 concerns the washing of Patroklos' corpse, making this an ominous echo. Moreover, the phrase μάχης & νοστήσαντι - ϵ (444) is always used of warriors who are fated not to survive. Cf. 17.207, where Zeus says that Hektor will not return from battle to Andromakhe; 24.705 (Hektor again after death), and 5.157 (two warriors who will not return home). For θερμά λόετρα see on 14.3-7.

445 For $v\eta\pi\eta$, out 'two out cf. 20.264 | $v\eta\pi\eta\sigma$, out 'two out is a new and touching variation on the common motif of dying far from home and all its domestic comforts (cf. Griffin, HLD 109-10). Hektor is also, ironically, deprived of the washing which was part of the ritual of preparation of a body for burial.

447-9 Verse 447 echoes 409. In 448 $k\lambda \epsilon \lambda (\chi \theta \eta)$ is a violent word, indicating a very strong reaction, emphasized by $\chi \alpha \mu \alpha \lambda$ of $k \pi \epsilon \sigma \epsilon$ reacts, reactly (shuttle) occurs only here in Il., once in Od. (5.52); see on 23.759-63. In 449 Andromakhe reacts at once, despite her agitation.

450 The structure of the verse (the opening command, followed by two clauses of increasing length, with asyndeton) expresses her urgency. For otiv the reading oti (two papyri and some MSS) might be right (cf. Leaf).

452 Exoph recurs at 24.770; cf. Exopos 3.172, 24.770 (all in Helen's speeches).

451-3 These verses are an unusually vivid physical description of her state, with heavy enjambment. Cf. 461, and 10.93-4 κραδίη δέ μοι έξω | στηθέων έκθρώσκει, τρομέει δ' ὑπὸ φαίδιμα γυῖα; also 15.280. On 452-3 bT compare Call. Hy. 5.83-4 ἐκόλλασαν γάρ ἀνίαι | γώνατα.

۰,

ſ

453 typis ... Theorem is the begins with the general plural, as if a fraid to name Hektor.

454 αι γάρ ... έπος: εί. 18.272 αι γάρ δή μοι άπ' ούατος ώδε γένοιτο.

455-6 θρασύν Έκτορα occurs $5 \times II$, always in this position. Here the epithet is relevant, as also at 12.60, 12.210, and 13.725. The point is made explicitly at 457-9, and bT compare 6.407 (Andromakhe to Hektor): δαιμόνιε, φθίσει σε τὸ σὸν μένος. For 456 cf. 21.563 μή μ' ἀπαειρόμενον πόλιος πεδίονδε νοήση, and 21.3 ένθα διατμήξας τοὺς μὲν πεδίονδε δίωκε.

457-9 Cf. also 12.46, where Hektor is like a boar or lion who is fearless in face of his attackers, άγηνορίη δέ μιν ἕκτα; 16.753 ἐή τέ μιν ὥλεσεν ἀλκή (in a simile of Patroklos). For 458-9 cf. Od. 11.514-15 οῦ ποτ' ἐνὶ πληθυῖ μένεν ἀνδρῶν οὐδ' ἐν ὀμίλφ, | ἀλλὰ πολὺ προθέεσκε, τὸ ὄν μένος οὐδενὶ εἴκων. Even at this moment of her supreme anxiety for Hektor's life Andromakhe's admiration for his courage comes out. But notice also how she speaks of him already in the past tense (so Willcock).

460 μ Eyápoio διέσσυτο μαινάδι Ιση: cf. 6.389-90, where Andromakhe has gone to the wall to look for Hektor μαινομένη εϊκυΐα, and Hektor άπέσσυτο δώματος to look for her. μαινάδι Ιση is similar to the formular δαίμονι Ισος (6× 11.). Homer knows about maenads (6.132-3), so that could be what he means here. Perhaps, however, we are wrong to attempt to draw a distinction between 'mad woman' and 'maenad'. The word μαινάς itself occurs only here in Homer; cf. HyDem 386, etc.

461 Cf. 452, and HyDem 293 δείματι παλλόμεναι.

462 Pap. 12 reads [αὐτὰρ ἐπεὶ Σκαιάς] τε πύλ[ας καὶ] πὑργον ໂκανεν (cf. 6.237, where πυργόν is the reading of most MSS).

63 form manification' full relixed: 'it is well observed that she does not ask the truth of others: it is the mark of an agitated spirit to want to be an eyewitness' (bT).

464-5 Ελκόμενον ... Ελκον: the repetition emphasizes the horror of the sight. For Ελκον άκηδέστως cf. 24.417 Ελκει άκηδέστως, again of Akhilleus dragging Hektor; 21.123 άκηδέες with comment. Here too as with Lukaon the body is suffering from the denial of funeral rites.

466 = 5.659, 13.580 (rov δk ...), where it refers to death in battle.

467 άπὸ δὲ ψυχήν ἐκάπυσσε: 'she breathed out her soul', i.e. fainted. The verb, which recurs only in Quintus of Smyrna (6.523), is probably related to καπνός. Cf. 5.698 (with comment on 696), Od. 5.468 (κακῶς) κεκαφηότα θυμόν, of fainting.

468-72 As she faints, she throws off her head-dress: perhaps the result of the violence of her fall, rather than a deliberate act, whereas Hekabe threw off her veil deliberately when she tore her hair (405-7). Here the description is far more detailed, for this is a more emotional moment and Andromakhe is a more significant figure. Not only is her head-dress extremely elaborate, but the description culminates in the history of her Kphoepvov: it was a gift of Aphrodite on the occasion of her wedding with Hektor. Cf. bT 468-70: 'he reminds us of her former happiness, so that by stressing her change of fortune he may increase the effect of pity'. There could be no more vivid symbol of her tragedy.

•

- • 、

468 $\beta \Delta \epsilon$ was Aristarchus' reading (Did/A) for the vulgate $\chi \epsilon \epsilon$. The latter would be better suited to an involuntary movement, but does not go well with $\tau \eta \lambda \epsilon$; see on 468-72. For $\delta \epsilon \sigma \mu \alpha \tau \alpha \sigma \eta \alpha \lambda \delta \epsilon \nu \tau \alpha$ cf. 154 $\epsilon \iota \mu \alpha \tau \alpha \sigma \eta \alpha \lambda \delta \epsilon \nu \tau \alpha$. 'In both cases Homer calls up these tangible reminders of a past happiness in a context which assures its destruction' (Segal, HSCP 1971, 49).

469-70 άμπυκα ... κρήδεμνόν θ': most probably the άμπυξ is a headband, the κεκρύφαλος a cap (or sometimes later a net) to keep the hair in order, and the πλεκτή άναδέσμη some kind of woven or plaited binding for the hair. Over all of these was her shawl or head-scarf, κρήδεμνον (see on 14.184). Cf. Lorimer, HM 386-9 and Arch. Hom. B 21-2 (Marinatos). The three items in 469 are found only here in Homer, although χρυσάμπυκας Ιππους (4× 11.) implies the noun άμπυξ. Unless the conjecture άναδεσμᾶν is correct at E. Med. 978, άναδεσμή reappears only in very late literature (Nonnus, Agathias, Damascius, Photius).

470 8 på ol 8 $\tilde{\omega}$ ks ... 'Appo8($\tau\eta$: Aphrodite's gifts can be figurative (e.g. 3.64-5), just as Pandaros' bow may be a gift of Apollo, although Pandaros made it himself (2.827, 4.105-11). It may, however, be wrong here to make a distinction between 'literal' and 'figurative' gifts.

The $\kappa\rho\eta\delta\epsilon\mu\nu\sigma\nu$ is in itself a symbol of marriage, since the Greek bride would wear this for the wedding ceremony. The poet has characteristically taken this motif from a typical scene (a woman normally covers her head when going out of the house: cf. Helen at 3.141 etc.), and used it here for a very special effect.

472-2 The event was described at 6.394-8, and the expression is similar to 16.190 ήγάγετο πρός δώματ' έπει πόρε μύρια έδνα.

473 γαλόφ τε καl elvartépes: her husband's sisters and his brother's wives. Once again we have an echo of book 6 (378, 383). The nouns recur together at 24.769. γάλως survived in Attic, and ενάτηρ occurs in late inscriptions from Asia Minor. These kinship terms tend to cluster around Helen and Andromakhe (see on 3.180 and 24.762-75).

474 $\dot{\alpha}$ $\pi \nu \zeta \rho \mu \ell \nu \eta \nu \dot{\alpha} \pi \rho \lambda \ell \sigma \theta \alpha$ means 'distraught to the point of death'. At 412-13 and here we have two parallel tableaux, of the people gathered about Priam to prevent him from rushing out of the city, and the women clustering around Andromakhe to give her support (so bT 474).

475 Cf. Od. 5.458 άλλ' ότε δή β' ξμπνυτο και ές φρένα θυμός άγέρθη and 24.349 αύτάρ έπει β' ξμπνυτο και ές φρένα θυμός άγέρθη. ξμπνυτο is

۰,

T

Aristarchus' reading (Did/A) for the vulgate $d\mu\pi\nu\nu\tau\sigma$; see on 5.697, where Kirk prefers $d\mu\pi\nu\nu\nu\eta$. For kal... $d\gamma\ell\rho\eta$ cf. also 4.152 $d\mu\rho\rho\delta\nu$ of $\theta\mu\delta\varsigma$ $\ell\nu$ ortheorow $d\gamma\ell\rho\theta\eta$, and see on 15.252-3, 16.481.

476 ἀμβλήδην occurs only here in Homer, and is rare later (ἀναβλήδην Arat. 1070, Maximus 287). 'With deep sobs' seems a better sense than 'lifting up her voice'. Cf. 21.364 ἀμβολάδην, and perhaps 19.314 ἀδινῶς ἀνενείκατο ('heaved deep sighs').

477-514 Andromakhe begins by lamenting the joint fate of Hektor and herself, in a series of balanced clauses (477-84), and she returns to Hektor and to her own inability to give him due burial rites at the end (508-14; cf. $482-3 v\bar{v}v \delta t \sigma v \mu t \dots \sigma v \tau d p t \mu t \dots with 508-12 v\bar{v}v \delta t \sigma t \mu t \dots \sigma \tau d \tau \sigma \tau ot$ the cluart ... karaphity dt t p to the speech concerns Astuanax(484-507). Consideration of his fate leads to a generalizing section aboutan orphan's life (490-8), with a transition at 499-500 back to Astuanaxhimself, leading her to reflect on the contrast with his past comfort andhappiness (500-4). Verse 507 is also a transitional one, leading her back toHektor.

There is a certain freedom in the way her thoughts develop, which seems psychologically natural. So too is the way in which she dwells on the homely details of a child's daily life, both of the orphan and the prince, and her preoccupation with something that might seem almost trivial, and which yet means so much to her, the lovely clothing made for Hektor which he will never use, even in death.

This wonderful speech has (alas!) not escaped the probing scalpel of sharp-eyed critics, from Aristarchus onwards. The Alexandrian scholar, accustomed to the manners of a Hellenistic court, could not understand why Andromakhe should speak of an orphan's lot in terms which he saw as quite inappropriate for the princeling of Priam's lineage. Such general reflections were out of place here, and 487-99 were therefore doomed to alhetesis. Modern critics have been divided over the issue, some going still further and condemning 500-5 or 500-7. Certainly, 500-4 have no point apart from what precedes. Yet among the analysts Wilamowitz defended the lines condemned by Aristarchus (IuH 105-7), and so did Von der Mühll (Hypomnema 346-7).

An additional objection was made by Leaf (on 487), that 'the passage contains $\frac{1}{2}\pi\alpha\xi$ $\lambda\epsilon\gamma\delta\mu\epsilon\nu\alpha$ of a sort quite unfamiliar in Epic poetry; $\frac{1}{2}\pi\alpha\nu\rho\eta\sigma\nu\sigma\nu\sigma\nu$, $\pi\alpha\nu\alpha\phi\eta\lambda\kappa\alpha$, $\frac{1}{2}\pi\epsilon\mu\nu\eta\mu\nu\kappa\epsilon$, $\frac{1}{2}\pi\epsilon\rho\phi\eta\nu$, $\frac{1}{2}\mu\phi\eta\alpha\lambda\eta\varsigma'$. This draws attention to the significant point that, as in the similes, Homer can use a quite distinctive vocabulary when he is speaking of more everyday matters. Leaf's view of epic propriety, like that of Aristarchus, was too narrow. For a defence of the passage see also Richardson in Bremer, HBOP 180-3.

477-84 Andromakhe sees her fate as linked to Hektor's. She has lost her home, as he foresaw the end of his city, and for each the other was allimportant (6.411-30, 6.447-65). There is careful and elaborate rhetorical parallelism and contrast here (cf. Lohmann, Reden 99):

• .

- 478 σύ μεν εν Τροίη Πριάμου κατά δώμα, αντάρ εγώ Θήβησιν... εν δόμω 'Ηετίωνος...
- 482 νῶν δὲ σừ μὲν Ἀίδαο δόμους ừπὸ κεύθεσι γαίης ἔρχεαι, αὐτὰρ ἐμὲ στυγέρω ἐνὶ πένθει λείπεις χήρην ἐν μεγάροισι ...

By this means Andromakhe suggests that their fates run parallel now, as they did in the past. Cf. Hor. C. 2.17, especially 20-30, where Horace links his destiny with that of Maecenas. On the linking of Thebe's fate with Troy's see O. Taplin in Chias 18-19.

477 For Έκτορ, ἐγώ δύστηνος cf. 431 τέκνον, ἐγώ δειλή at the opening of Hekabe's lament. γιγνόμεθ' is the reading of Monro and Allen, but we should probably follow the MS reading γείνομεθ', as elsewhere, with Leaf, and Allen's editio maior (1931).

479-80 Cf. 6.396-7 'Ηετίων, δς έναιεν ὑπὸ Πλάκω ὑληέσση, | Θήβη 'Υποπλακίη ... For δ μ'... έοῦσαν cf. 8.283 δ σ' έτρεφε τυτθὸν ἑόντα.

481 In Súguopos alvóuopov the variation and repetition are pathetic. Súguopos is used of himself by Priam at 60 (cf. 59 kuł róv Súgrnvov), alvóuopos only here in II., and $2 \times Od$. For $\omega_5 \mu \eta \dots \pi k$ and cf. 17.686, 18.19 $\eta \mu \eta$ $\omega \phi \in \lambda \lambda \epsilon$ yever the such a wish in a lament cf. Helen at 24.764, and Alexiou, Ritual Lament 178 (with n. 46).

482 Άτδαο δόμους ὑπὸ κεύθεσι γαίης: cf. Od. 24.204 είν Άτδαο δόμοις, ὑπὸ κεύθεσι γαίης.

484-6 Cf. 24.725-8 κάδ δέ με χήρην | λείπεις έν μεγάροισι· πάϊς δ' Έτι νήπιος αύτως, | δν τέκομεν σύ τ' έγώ τε δυσάμμοροι, οὐδέ μιν οἴω | ήβην Ιξεσθαι... For the complaint of descrition by the dead man cf. (for example) Alexiou, Ritual Lament 176, 182-4.

484 $\chi\eta\rho\eta$ recurs at 6.408, 6.432, 22.499, 24.725. In the singular this word is used by no one else but Andromakhe in Homer, and on four occasions in association with the mention of their son. The only other occurrence is at 2.289 ($\chi\eta\rho\alpha$). $\eta\eta\alpha$ os $\alpha\eta\tau\omega$ s means 'a mere baby'; see on 125.

485-6 oute où toút ω ... oute ou oùtos: this transposition of pronouns (T 485-6 dutierabold) is emphasized by the parallelism of position at the end of the verses. 'He has mingled the pathos wonderfully, arousing pity in the case of each of them, the child who is deprived of his father's valour and the father who cannot enjoy his son' (bT).

•

t

- • .

487-99 For Aristarchus' rejection of these verses (Arn/A) see on 477-514. In reality Andromakhe's vision becomes general here, because she and her son are archetypes of all widows and orphans.

487 πόλεμου ... πολύδοκρυν Άχαιῶν: cf. 3.165 (Priam to Helen) πόλεμου πολύδοκρυν Άχαιῶν | (another echo of book 3).

489 It is not really so surprising that Andromakhe should fear the loss of her son's royal property after Hektor's death. There were other members of the family who might step in after Priam was no longer there to defend him, for example those brothers of Hektor whom Priam regards as idle and useless (24.248-64). There is also the hostility between Priam's family and that of Aineias (13.459-61, 20.178-83), and the prophecy that Aineias and his descendants will rule the Trojans in the future (20.302-8).

άπουρίσσουσιν: this verb occurs only here in surviving literature. In antiquity it was connected with ούρος ('boundary'), like the later άφορίζεσθαι ('to appropriate for oneself'): so Arn/A, Eust. 1282.16. An alternative modern view (Leaf, Chantraine, GH1446, LfgrE s.v.) connects it, or the variant άπουρήσουσιν, with άπηύρα, άπούρας, translating 'will take away'. The fact that the active rather than middle is used is not a valid objection to the first view, which seems preferable. Notice the strong assonance of initial alphas in this verse.

490-9 In this passage the verses are virtually all end-stopped, and several have a proverbial ring to them (e.g. 490, 499).

490 παναφήλικα: 'entirely cut off from his contemporaries', a good example of the expressive quality of Greek compounds; cf. 24.255, 24.493 πανάποτμος, 24.540 παναώριον. παναφήλιξ occurs nowhere else in Greek literature. M. Pope (CQ 35 (1985) 5) notices that out of fifteen παν-compound in the lliad six occur only in the last four books, 'and this is most easily understood as the result of a temporary inclination of the poet's mind – especially as it is precisely in these examples that the force of the παν- is intensive (e.g. πανάποτμος "all-unhappy") instead of quantitative (e.g. πανήμέριος "all-day")'. Cf. also 24.5 πανδαμάτωρ, 21.397 πανόψιον, 23.532 and 547 πανύστατος.

491 πάντα δ' ὑπεμνήμυκ : another unique expression. Aristarchus (A) took the verb as meaning 'he bows his head, is downcast' (κατανένευκεν), πάντα meaning 'in everything'. This would be the perfect of ὑπημύω, ὑπεμήμῦκἔ, with the nu added metri gratia: so EM 777.46, and Schulze, Quaestiones Epicae 266-7. Cf. A.R. 2.862-3 κατήμυσαν δ' ἀχέεσσιν | θυμόν, Coluthus 338 ὑπημύουσι παρειαί (ὑπημύουσιν ὁπωπαί Tournier). For δεδάκρυνται cf. 16.7 (with comment).

This is a fine verse, with a chiastic structure, $\pi \Delta v \tau \alpha$ and $\pi \alpha \rho \epsilon \alpha l$ framing the two slow, melancholy verbs. It gives a very vivid picture of the humiliated and tear-stained child.

492 The verse is echoed at 499. aveior presumably means 'approaches' here.

493 Again notice the realistic visual detail: the child is trying desperately to attract the attention of these indifferent grown-ups, perhaps also asking for a suppliant's rights.

494-6 The tenses change here to a series of gnomic aorists.

494 κοτύλη elsewhere in the lliad is used of the hip-joint (5.306, 307). Cf. however 23.34 κοτυλήρυτον; and Od. 15.317, 17.12 where κοτύλη is used of a beggar's cup. Various views about the word are given in Athenaeus 478D-9C, but it must be some kind of small cup. Cf. also G. Bruns, Arch. Hom. Q 44. τυτθόν is adverbial, 'for a little'.

495 The repeated verb gives a pathetic close to this gnomic verse.. $\dot{\upsilon}\pi\epsilon\rho\dot{\omega}\eta$ ('palate') occurs only here in poetry; cf. Hippocrates, Mochl. 39, etc. This scene resembles Luke 16.21, where the beggar Lazarus is described as 'desiring to be fed with the crumbs which fell from the rich man's table'.

496-8 So too Hektor feared the shame of Andromakhe, when some Greek would point her out in her slavery as 'Hektor's wife' (6.459-63). For the vital importance of the feast as a vehicle for honour see on 12.311.

496 dupitations '(a boy) with both parents alive' again occurs only here in early epic or archaic poetry; in this sense cf. Pl. Lg. 927D (in a discussion about the protection of orphans against injury), Call. fr. 75.3; see also L. Robert, HSCP Supp. vol. 1 (1940) 509-19, Fraenkel on A. Ag. 1144-5 (where it is used metaphorically, as at A. Ch. 394). The form $\delta \alpha i \tau v_5$ for $\delta \alpha i_5$ is only found here. For $\delta \sigma i \tau v \phi \delta \lambda i_5 \epsilon$ ('shoves him away') see on 21.380.

497 δνειδείοισιν: only here on its own, meaning 'reproaches'; cf. 1.519 (etc.) δνειδείοις έπέεσσιν.

498 \tilde{t} ρρ' ούτως has a coarse, colloquial ring to it (80 T). Cf. 21.184 | κεῖσ' ούτως. μεταδαίνυσθαι recurs at 23.207, Od. 18.48.

500-1 With the name Astuanax we return to the particular case which we left at 490. Cf. 6.474 where Hektor takes him in his arms. Still closer in tone is Phoinix' description of how he used to take the child Akhilleus on his knees and give him titbits of meat and wine to drink (9.485-91). For Homer's close observation of children's behaviour see also on 16.7-10, 16.259-65. μ /where 32.482, $2 \times Od$.

302-4 VIITICXEVEW occurs only once in later literature, in a verse epitaph (RAM (1879) 195); cf. VIITICXOS 3×11 . For $\frac{1}{2} \sqrt{3} \sqrt{1000}$ cf. 18.555 of boys harvesting; AbT take this as a diminutive form, suitable to the littleness of the children. We met the nurse at 6.399ff., 6.467ff. $\frac{1}{2} \sqrt{100}$ $\frac{1}{2} \sqrt{1000}$ $\frac{1$

is enhanced by the triple repetition of the prepositional phrases, $\frac{1}{2}$... $\frac{1}{2}$

505 For φίλου ... ἀμαρτών cf. 6.411 σεῦ ἀφαμαρτούση (Andromakhe to Hektor).

506-7 On the etymology of the name Astuanax cf. 6.402-3, which this recalls: τον β' Έκτωρ καλέεσκε Σκαμάνδριον, αὐτὰρ ol ἄλλοι ¦ 'Αστυάνακτ' olos γὰρ ἐρύετο 'lλιον 'Εκτωρ. This is echoed again by Priam at 24.499. The repetition of the name after 500 is rightly treated by the ancient commentators as a pathetic touch (bT 500): it has not pleased some modern critics. For ἐπίκλησιν see on 29, and for πύλας καὶ τείχεα μακρά | cf. 4.34. With the apostrophe in 507 we return to Hektor, the subject of Andromakhe's opening address (477-86).

508 νόσφι τοκήων: cf. 24.208, 24.211, and on this motif of dying (etc.) far from one's parents see again Griffin, HLD 106-12.

509 The sound patterns of this verse are remarkable. αἰόλαι εὐλαί ('wriggling worms'), entirely composed of vowels and liquids, is horribly appropriate, and the verse ends with a series of harsh kappas. The whole sentence culminates in the emphatic runover word γυμνόν.

510-14 Cf. bT 512-13: 'this is full of pathos and realistic: for together with the dead, people also destroy their finest possessions, as a precaution against their being used by others'. That is one possible reason for doing this. The usual explanation is that the possessions are intended for the dead man's use, as in the story of Periander's wife, whose ghost complained to him that she was cold and naked because the clothes he had given her had not been burnt (Hdt. 5.927). On the practice among many peoples of burying or burning a dead person's property, and the explanations given for this, see E. Samter, Volkskunde im altsprachlichen Unterricht 1 Teil, Homer (Berlin 1923) 148-58; E. Rohde, Psyche (English version, London 1925) 17-18, 23; Kurtz and Boardman, Burial Customs 201-17.

Here, however, the point is not that Homer ignores the belief that a dead man could profit from such things. In addition to what is burnt by Akhilleus on Patroklos' pyre (23.166-77), he also promises him a share in the ransom for Hektor's body (24.592-5). The clothes are of no use because they cannot serve their purpose of wrapping his body for burial (cf. 16.680, 18.352-3, 24.580-1, 24.588, Od. 2.96-102 etc.). Instead, however, her act of burning them will be a kind of 'substitute' funeral rite in his honour. It is all that she can do, and it appropriately symbolizes both her devotion as a wife and her despair at his loss.

It is appropriate that her speech should close with the thought of Hektor's glory ($\kappa\lambda tos$), for this was the mainspring of all his actions during his lifetime, and this is what will now survive for those who are left behind.

510-11 For the thematic present form keovia cf. Od. 11.341, 16.232, and Chantraine, GH 1 476. $\lambda \epsilon \pi \tau \alpha$ TE Kal $\chi \alpha \rho l \epsilon \nu \tau \alpha$ recurs at Od. 10.223, where the phrase is used of weaving again.

• .

512-14 καταφλέγειν only occurs here in Homer; cf. Hes. Aspis 18 etc. ούδεν σοl γ' δφελος is in apposition to the preceding verse. Εγκεΐσθαι again occurs only here in Homer, but is common later. For άλλά ... Τρωϊάδων cf. 24.215 άλλά πρό Τρώων και Τρωϊάδων βαθυκόλπων.

515 = 24.746; see on 429. The repetition in 23.1 of the theme of 515 shows that there is a strong break at this point (see on 6.311-12).

۰,

- •

I

BOOK TWENTY- I'HREE

In the life of Schiller by Frau K. von Wolzogen it is recorded that 'Schiller once said in a melancholy mood: "If one had only lived in order to read the twenty-third book of the Iliad, then one could not complain about one's existence" (Schillers Leben, Stuttgart and Tübingen 1845, 335). The gloomy splendour of Patroklos' funeral will have appealed especially to a Romantic of the Sturm und Drang period, but he must surely have also admired the funeral games whose tone is so different, and whose manifold variety won the praise of Goethe (cf. Lehrs, De Aristarchi studiis 428). In the first part of the Book all is $\pi \dot{\alpha} \theta_{05}$, but in the second the interest is above all on $\dot{\eta} \theta_{05}$. Together they make a beautifully balanced whole, and also an excellent transition to the final scenes of the poem.

The Book is marked off not only by its unity of theme, but also by the way in which the opening themes of grief for Patroklos and the fate of Hektor's body (1-26) are resumed at the beginning of book 24. In this part of the poem the contrast between the treatment of the bodies of Patroklos and Hektor is all-important, and it is recalled again at 23.179-91 where, after setting light to the pyre, Akhilleus invokes Patroklos' spirit, saying that he will give Hektor's body to the dogs. The poet adds that Aphrodite and Apollo in fact protected it from harm. Against the dishonouring of Hektor the unique honours paid to Patroklos at his funeral, the main theme of book 23, stand out in powerful contrast.

The funeral ends in mid-verse at 257, with a typically rapid Homeric transition to the games. These occupy the remaining 640 verses, but more than half (262-652) are taken up by the chariot-race, which forms the central panel of the Book's structure. Seven other contests follow, of which the first three (boxing, wrestling and running) are clearly important and occupy 145 verses in all, whereas the last four (armed duel, weight-throwing, archery and javelin) are dealt with more briefly, in only 100 verses. There is thus a marked sense of diminuendo: first the great sequence of scenes of the funeral itself, followed by the chariot-race with all its excitement and the complexity of its subordinate episodes, and then a series of ever-shorter scenes, with a progressive relaxation of tension. This effect must be deliberate, and those scholars who have argued that most of the final hundred verses are a later addition seem to have missed this point. A function of the funeral games themselves, both as heroic institution and epic narrative, must be to defuse the intensity of passion accumulated in the struggles which have preceded, leaving us at the end with a strong sense of restoration of the normal, in terms of both emotion and conduct, in preparation for the resolution of book 24.

Α.,

In the poem's overall architecture book 23 clearly balances book 2 (cf. Introduction, 'Structure'). Both fall into two main sections, in 2 the Achaean assembly and the Catalogues, in 23 the Funeral and Games, themselves also in catalogue-form. Book 2 paints a picture of a potentially demoralized and disorderly army, whose morale is restored with difficulty by the leaders, an ominous prelude to disasters to come, whereas in book 23 these disasters are mostly over, and order is restored and maintained in the games by the firm hand of Akhilleus. Both show the whole army gathered together, for war and for the contests which are 'the image of war without its guilt'. In 2 we hear the slow, majestic roll-call of the Achaean leaders and their followers, whereas in 23 we bid farewell to most of the major Greek heroes of the poem, who will not appear in its closing scenes. There are also many echoes of episodes in the intervening narrative, and several threads which can be traced forward beyond the story of the Iliad itself, which add to the Book's richness of texture.

In the funeral itself the aspect of excess in so much of the ritual is very striking, by comparison with other epic funeral scenes. The poet is depicting something on an exceptional scale, in keeping with the grandeur of the poem as a whole, but above all as a reflection of the immensity of Akhilleus' grief. The funeral procession, in which the whole army, charioteers in front, a vast throng of infantry behind, escort Patroklos' body and lay their offerings of hair upon the corpse, must remind us of the funeral scenes on the great kraters of the Homeric period. The catalogue of offerings placed on the pyre is unparalleled in scale elsewhere, and even the size of the pyre itself ('a hundred foot square') seems unusual, although it may be matched in reality by the great burial mound at Lefkandi in Euboea (see on 164). Unique too is the episode in which Iris summons the Winds to make the pyre burn: Akhilleus is the only mortal who could evoke such a divine response (see on 192-225).

After the intensity of the funeral, the games come as a welcome relief and the tone is remarkably different. Akhilleus is perfectly in control, the model dyavo8trn5. There is great excitement and even laughter at times. In the chariot-race quarrels break out among spectators and contestants alike, and we are aware of the tensions still stored beneath the surface: but here, in contrast to the opening of the Iliad, they are resolved, and Akhilleus himself ensures that this is so. The Book closes with Akhilleus awarding Agamemnon the prize for the javelin, without allowing him to compete, because he is 'supreme in power' (891). This courteous gesture sets the final seal on their reconciliation, and Akhilleus' moderation and sense of propriety prepare us for his change of heart when he receives Priam's supplication.

۰.

The individual contests are full of vivid incident, but what stands out most is the way the poet uses them to bring out, once again, some of his heroes' strengths and weaknesses of character. It is in this sense that one can describe them as ethical, as the Odyssey was seen to be in antiquity. Both stand closer in some ways to later comedy than to tragedy (cf. F. Robert, Mélanges Desrousseaux, Paris 1937, 405-16). This is nowhere more evident than in the chariot-race. Running through its narrative can be discerned the contrast between passionate ambition, with its disastrous results, and reason, and also that between genuine good sense and skill misused. Nestor's lecture to Antilokhos before the race with its sermon on units (306-48) sets the tone, and the final guarrel between Menelaos and Antilokhos is very much concerned with these themes (566-613). After their reconciliation (a morally 'happy ending') Menelaos hands over the prize mare to Antilokhos' companion Normon (612-13) (surely a significant name), and Akhilleus then awards the spare prize to wise old Nestor, whose speech of gratitude rounds off the episode (626-50). His speech is called an alvos (652), and it may contain a moral relevant to the chariot-race as a whole (see on 499-652).

If the whole poem until now has been largely concerned with the disastrous effects of strife, the games offer us a counterpart of a positive kind (like Hesiod's 'good strife'), marking a peaceful close to the internal dissensions of the Greeks.

1-34 When the Achaeans reach the ships, Akhilleus tells the Myrmidons to lament Patroklos, and they drive their chariots thrice round the corpse, while he leads their lament. He then gives them a funeral feast

This lament is more official or ritualized than those in books 18 (314-42)and 19 (282-302, 314-39), as is shown by the reference to it as a $\gamma \ell p o g$ bovóvrow (9), and also by the motif of processing three times round the corpse. This is echoed by Akhilleus when he drags Hektor's body three times round Patroklos' tomb (24.14-16), and the same motif occurs at the funeral of Akhilleus himself (Od. 24.68-70). This is primarily a way of paying tribute to the dead man, and perhaps also (as in other ceremonies where something is encircled in this way) of symbolizing one's attachment to him. This encirclement of the dead was also part of the mourning ritual of Germanic peoples and others in the past: cf. Jordanes, Getica ch. 49, Beowulf 3169-72, and M. Andronikos. Arch. Hom. w (Totenkult) 14-15.

The funeral feast of the Myrmidons here precedes the burial, an order which seems unusual. A feast follows the burial of Hektor (24.664-6, 24.801-4), and is mentioned also after the deaths of Klutaimestre and Aigisthos (Od. 3.309-10). In the classical period and later the mapl&invov took place after the funeral, but in the past sacrifices preceded it according to [Plato], Minos 315c. Its placing here may be influenced by compositional considerations, since the poet goes on directly from the burial to the funeral games (contrast 257-8 with 24.801-2), and the feast would have interrupted this sequence. Cf. also Od. 24.72-92 (burial followed by games), and Andronikos, op. cit. 15-18. For parallels between the funeral of Patroklos and the Thracian rites in Herodotus 5.8 see A. Petropoulou, AJP 109 (1988) 492-3.

• 1

-

1-12 The lamentation for Hektor at Troy merges with the laments for Patroklos in the Achaean camp.

2-5 For 2 cf. 15.233, 18.150 $\phi \epsilon \dot{\gamma} \rho v \tau \epsilon s$ und Elliptic te see on 22.379. Verse 3 = 19.277. For 5 cf. 129 autika Mupuloávessi ϕ ilonttolépoisi kéleuse.

6 Μυρμίδονες ταχύπωλοι: Cf. Δαναῶν -οι ταχυπώλων -οι | 10× 11.

7 ὑπ' ὅχεσφι: elsewhere ὅχεσφι functions as a dative, here as an ablatival form. Cf. ὑπό ζυγόφιν (24.576), Chantraine, GH 1 234-41.

9 δ γάρ γέρας έστι θανόντων: the relative is used for metrical reasons instead of τό here, as at 12.344 = 357 δ γάρ κ' δχ' άριστον άπάντων, and Od. 24.190 δ γάρ γέρας έστι θανόντων. Cf. τό γάρ γέρας έστι θανόντων 2× $ll_{.,1} \times Od.$

το Cf. 98 όλοοῖο τεταρπώμεσθα γόοιο |, 24.513 | αὐτάρ ἐπεί ῥα γόοιο τετάρπετο, Od. 11.212 κρυεροῖο τεταρπώμεσθα γόοιο |. bT quote Aeschylus (fr. 385 N.²): οΙ τοι στεναγμοί τῶν πόνων ἰάματα.

xx δορπήσομεν ένθάδε πάντες: at 19.206-14 and 303-8 Akhilleus refuses to eat until sunset. It looks as if he now intends to break his fast and share in the funeral feast, and perhaps he shares also in the meal with Agamemnon which follows (cf. 48).

23-16 At 19.211-13 Patroklos' body was in Akhilleus' hut, whereas here it is on the shore; it has obviously been moved in the meantime, but the poet does not need to account for such details.

13 Ευτριχας ... Ιππους: cf. 301, 351 Ευτριχας ώπλισαθ' Ιππους |. The phrase occurs only in book 23; cf. καλλίτριχας -es Ιππους -oi II × Il., 3× Od.

14 μετά δέ σφι Θέτις γόου Ιμερου ώρσε: Thetis and the Nereids joined Akhilleus in lament at 18.35ff., and at Akhilleus' own funeral they all appear to mourn for him, and the Muses also lament (Od. 24.47–62). Here, however, Thetis is not actually said to appear in person to the Myrmidons. The mention of Thetis may be influenced by the epic tradition about Akhilleus' death: cf Kakridis, Researches 84; vol. v, p. 18.

15-16 The repetition of δεύοντο adds pathos, as do the runover word δάκρυσι and the wistful tone of τοῖον γὰρ πόθεον ... Virgil imitates these verses directly at Aen. 11.191 spargitur et tellus lacrimis, sparguntur et arma, in a passage influenced by this episode (Aen. 11.188-90 ~ 23.13-14, 11.197-9 ~ 23.30-3 and 166-7, 11.201-2 ~ 23.154-5). For μήστωρα φόβοιο see on 4.328.

17-18 These verses exactly repeat the description of Akhilleus' mourning for Patroklos in book 18 (316-17); see comment.

19-23 Akhilleus' speech recalls his promises at 18.333-7 and 22.354 (and cf. 21.27-32 where he took the twelve Trojan prisoners). It is echoed at 179-83.

19 καl εlv 'Atδαο δόμοισι: 'even in Hades'. Cf. the similar use of καl by Akhilleus in this context at 22.389-90 (εlv 'Atδαο ... καl κείθι) and 23.103-4 (καl εlv 'Atδαο δόμοισι).

ao $\tau \epsilon \lambda \epsilon \omega$ is probably present, 'I am already accomplishing'; see on 179-83.

21 ώμὰ δάσασθαι: cf. Od. 18.87 μήδεά τ' έξερύσας δώη κυσίν ώμὰ δάσασθαι (and similarly Od. 22.476). Here one can understand κρέα with ώμά (cf. 22.347).

g2-3 These verses repeat 18.336-7 (άποδειροτομήσω; see comment).

 $a_4 = 22.395$ (see comment). Here it seems to refer primarily to the immediate action of leaving Hektor stretched out face downward in the dust (25-6), but presumably also to Akhilleus' continued maltreatment of the body later (24.14-18).

25-6 Cf. 24.17-18 tov be t' ECOREV | EV ROVI ERTOVICOS $\pi \rho o \pi \rho \eta v$ is in itself an insult, as a body would normally be laid out on its back for burial. $d\phi o \pi \lambda i \xi e \sigma 0$ only occurs here in Homer, and rarely in later Greek.

27 χάλκεα μαρμαίροντα occurs $3 \times II$. For λύον δ' ὑψηχέας Ιππους see comment on 5.770-2 (ad fin.) ὑψηχέες Ιπποι. This epithet occurs only on these two occasions in Homer, and later once in Philostratus. Here there was a variant λύοντο δέ μώνυχας Ιππους (?Did/A), and a few MSS read ὑψαυχένας which is a variant at 5.772 (in [Longinus] 9.5).

29 μύριοι recurs as an emphatic runover word of the whole Greek army at 134 and 2.468. For τάφον ... δαίνυ ('gave a funeral feast') cf. Od. 3.309 δαίνυ τάφον, and δαινύναι γάμον 19.299, Od. 4.3. τάφος always means 'funeral rites' in Homer, never 'tomb'.

30-4 An elaborate sentence with four parallel clauses describes the feast. Verses 30-3 consist of three clauses with emphatic repetition of initial $\pi o \lambda \lambda o l$, runover in the first clause and an extended two-verse third clause: these refer to the slaughter of oxen, sheep and goats, and pigs (suggesting comparison with the later succetaurilia, or sacrifice of pig, sheep and bull). Verse 34 rounds the sentence off with a vivid description of the blood flowing 'everywhere around the corpse'. The verses are similar to 9.464– 9: ή μέν πολλά ... λισσόμενοι κατερήτυον ... | πολλά δὲ Ιφια μήλα και είλιποδας έλικας βοῦς | ἔσφαζον, πολλοί δὲ σύες θαλέθοντες άλοιφή | εὐόμενοι τανύοντο διά φλογός 'Ηφαίστοιο, | πολλόν δ' ἐκ κεράμων μέθυ πίνετο τοῖο γέροντος. Cf. Thracian funeral rites (Hdt. 5.8): παντοῖα σφάξαντες Ιρήια εὐωχέονται, προκλαύσαντες πρῶτον.

• ;

30-1 These verses were athetized by some critics (T), on the ground that 'iron did not exist at that time'.

30 Bóts ápyoi: only here of oxen; cf. kúves -as ($\pi \delta \delta \alpha s$) ápyoi -oús $3 \times II$., $3 \times Od$., where it is thought to mean 'swift', and ápythu $\chi \eta \nu \alpha$ (Od. 15.161), where it has its basic sense of 'shining'. bT objected that only black victims were sacrificed to the dead, but suggested as one answer that they are intended here as a feast for the living. Presumably this is correct, but the sense here may be 'sleek', 'glistening', rather than 'white'. Cf. Chantraine. Dict. s.v.

όρέχθεον: this occurs only here in Homer, once in Aristophanes (Nub. 1368), and frequently in Hellenistic and later verse. It was explained here as either 'bellowed' (cf. $\dot{\rho}$ οχθεῖν), or 'stretched themselves out', 'struggled' (cf. $\dot{\rho}$ είχεσθαι), or 'were cut open' (cf. $\dot{\epsilon}$ ρέχθειν = 'rend', 'break'). Modern philology has favoured the second view (Chantraine, Dict. s.v.). In Hellenistic poetry it seems to mean either 'throb', 'swell' or 'roar' (cf. Gow on Theorr. Id. 11.43). The ancient interpretation 'bellow' was based on the assumption that it was onomatopoeic (κατά μίμησιν ήχου τραχέος πεποίηται το $\dot{\rho}$ ήμα: bT etc.), and this deserves to be taken seriously, as in the case of $\dot{\rho}$ οχθεῖν (cf. schol. Od. 5.402).

32-3 Cf. 9.467-8 (quoted on 30-4). apyióbovtes des belongs to a formular group: cf. | apyióbovtos dos $1 \times IL$, $3 \times Od$., substanting of apyióbovtes | $2 \times Od$., substanting apyióbovta | 9.535, due tex apyiobóvtue | Od. 14.416.

34 κοτυλήρυτον... αίμα: literally this means 'blood drawn off in cupfuls' (cf. ἀρύω). The epithet occurs only here and in Nicander (Th. 539), but the phrase is imitated by Callimachus (?) fr. 773 Pf. κυλικήρυτον αίμα. Its uniqueness draws our attention to the scene. Aristarchus took it as meaning here 'abundantly enough to be taken up in cups' (Arn/A), which could well be right in this context. Leaf argued that the blood was actually caught in cups and then poured out as a gift for the dead man, and Mazon (REA 42 (1940) 255-6) independently takes the same view. Leaf compared the blood for the ghosts in the Odyssey (10.535ff. etc.), and (more appropriately) E. Hec. 534-8, where Akhilleus' ghost is offered Poluxena's blood. But one might expect the ritual to be more explicitly described, in this case. Cf. also Andronikos, Arch. Hom. w 16-17.

***** :

. .

I

35–61 The leaders escort Akhilleus to Agamemnon and invite him to wash, but he refuses to do so until Patroklos is buried. He tells t em to eat and to prepare for the funeral, and they take their supper and go to bed. Akhilleus then lies down to sleep at the edge of the sea 37 σπουδη means 'with difficulty', as at 2.99 etc.

38-41 For 38 cf. 11.617 ol δ' δτε δή κλισίην Νηληϊάδεω άφίκοντο, etc. Verse 39 = 2.442 (with κέλευσε). For 40-1 cf. 18.344-5 (with comment) άμφι πυρί στήσαι τρίποδα μέγαν, δφρα τάχιστα | Πάτροκλον λούσειαν απο βρότον αίματόεντα. άμφι ... μέγαν also recurs at 22.443.

42 Cf. 19.304-8, where Akhilleus refuses food because of his grief, and HyDem 47-50 where Demeter in her grief at the loss of Persephone abstains from both food and washing (Richardson, Hymn to Dem ter 165-8).

43 As Monro and Leaf pointed out, the use of $\delta_5 \tau i_5 \tau t$ here after the antecedent Zijva is unusual, since this combination of relative plus generalizing τt normally refers to an indefinite antecedent. This looks like an echo of the familiar religious formula exemplified by A. Ag. 160 Zeús $\delta \sigma \tau i_5 \pi \sigma \tau' t \sigma \tau i v$ (cf. Fraenkel ad loc., and E. Norden, Agnostos Theos, 4th edn. Darmstadt 1956, 144-7), whereby one makes allowance for uncertainty over the proper way to address a god. Leaf suggests 'Zeus, or by whatever name the highest of the gods is to be called'. $\theta e \bar{\omega} v \, \omega \pi \sigma \tau \sigma_5 \, \omega a$ used at 19.258 (= Od. 19.303), in an invocation of Zeus as witness to an oath. Here the whole verse adds a weighty religious sanction to Akhilleus' refusal.

44 où ôtuis: this phrase too probably implies a specifically divine sanction, as at 14.386 etc.: see Richardson on HyDem 207, where où ôtuitov is similarly used by Demeter in the context of her abstention from wine, and Parker, Miasma 68.

46 κείρασθαί τε κόμην recurs at Od. 4.198, and cf. Od. 24.46 κείραντό τε χαίτας. See on 127-53, where this is done for Patroklos.

47 Cf. dxos κραδίην και θυμόν Ικάνει (4× 11.) etc., and 22.387-8 δφρ' åν έγωγε | ζωοΐσιν μετέω. The form μετείω for μετέω is due to metrical lengthening.

48 This resembles 8.502-3 = 9.65-6 (cf. Od. 12.291-2): άλλ' ήτοι νῦν μέν πειθώμεθα νυκτὶ μελαίνῃ | δόρπα τ' ἐφοπλισόμεσθα. Akhilleus implies that the whole idea of eating is still abhorrent and simply a matter of necessity: hence πειθώμεθα. Cf. Od. 7.216-21, where Odysseus describes his stomach as στυγερή, and explains how it compels him to eat despite his sorrow, and Od. 17.286-9, 18.53-4. The variant τερπώμεθα, mentioned by AT and found in one papyrus, is out of place, and presumably due to the idea that πειθώμεθα δαιτί is an odd expression.

49 OTPUVE was Bentley's reading for the MSS' OTPUVOV (aorist imperative), to preserve the digamma of avag. This is an unnecessary change, and Allen reads or puvov in his edition of 1931.

۰.

50 δοσ' έπιεικές: nearly all MSS read ώς, as in 19.147 παρασχέμεν ώς έπιεικές (etc.). This would require the omission of 51, which could in theory be an added verse. But it seems best to read δσσα and keep 51.

51 νέεσθαι ύπο ζόφον ήερόεντα: cf. 21.48, where νέεσθαι is used of going down to Hades.

52-3 ὄφρ' ήτοι... ὄφθαλμῶν: a rather compressed way of saying 'so that the fire may burn him and he may be taken from our sight more quickly'.

54-8 For 55-6 cf. Od. 14.347 έσσυμένως παρά θίνα θαλάσσης δόρπον Eλοντο. Here the adverb picks up Akhilleus' note of urgency, and the poet describes the meal in a summary form (cf. bT). Verses 56-7 = 1.468-9 etc. For 58 cf. 1.606 (and $3 \times Od$.) of μέν καιαείοντες έβαν οἶκόνδε έκαστος.

59-61 As elsewhere (1.348-50, 24.3-13) Akhilleus seeks relief from his sorrow on the edge of the sea: 'that Akhilleus lies down by the shore in the open is a manifestation of grief' (Eust. 1287.33); 'the overtones of $\theta i v \alpha \dots$ $\theta \alpha \lambda \alpha \sigma \sigma \eta s$ and so on are often of tension or sadness' (Kirk on 1.34: see also on 1.350). Here, however, he is still surrounded by his companions, whereas in books 1 and 24 he seeks solitude, as Odysseus does too on Kalupso's island' (Od. 5.81-4, 5.151-8).

61 EV KOBORO ÖB1: cf. 8.491 = 10.199. EV KOBORO means 'in a clear space'. The sound patterns of this verse, especially the insistent triple alliteration of kappa and the slow, spondaic ending, focus attention on this scene of Akhilleus lying in his misery on the seashore beside the resounding breakers.

62–108 Akhilleus sleeps, and Patroklos' ghost visits him in a dream and delivers instructions for his funeral. Akhilleus tries vainly to embrace him, but his spirit slips away and leaves him. He awakes and tells his companions of the vision

62 = 0d. 20.56. Cf. Od. 23.342-3 ότε οl γλυκύς ύπνος | λυσιμελής έπόρουσε, λύων μελεδήματα θυμοῦ. For ύπνος ξμαρπτε cf. 24.679. μελέδημα only occurs here in Il., $4 \times 0d$.

64 Έκτορ' ἐπαΐσσων: it seems best to take Έκτορ' as accusative rather than dative here, 'harrying Hektor as far as Ilios': cf. 7.240, 12.308 μόθον/ τεῖχος ἐπαΐξαι.

65 $\bar{\eta}\lambda\theta\epsilon$ $\delta' \ \epsilon\pi i$ $\psi\nu\chi\eta$: evidently a formula in such contexts, as at Od. 11.84, 11.90, 11.387, 11.467, of the successive appearances of new ghosts to Odysseus. Here and at Od. 11.387 the $\delta\epsilon$ is apodotic. This is the only occasion in the Iliad where a vision of a ghost is described, and the only other dream described at length occurs at 2.5-41 (see Introduction, 'Structure'). For Πατροκλήος δειλοΐο cf. 17.670, 23.105, 23.221. δειλοΐο is used in the Iliad only in this phrase describing Patroklos (17.670-73n.). On dreams in Homer see also West on Od. 4.795ff., and E. Lévy, 'Le rève homérique', Klèma 7 (1982) 23-41.

۰,

66-7 'The detailed description of the appearance of the dream-vision is very effective: for Akhilleus still has his friend's voice ringing in his ears' (Γ). Verse 66 resembles the formular είδός τε μέγεθός τε φυήν τ' ἄγχιστα έφκει (etc.) (2.58 etc.), and Od. 1.208 αίνῶς μὲν κεφαλήν τε καὶ ὅμματα καλὰ ἑοικας. It is appropriate to single out Patroklos' 'lovely eyes' here. περί χροῖ είματα ἔστο occurs only here in $Il., 4 \times Od$.

68 = 24.682 and $4 \times Od.$; cf. 2.20, 2.59. The context is similar in all cases: an image of a god or a human appears to someone who is asleep or (Od. 20.32) unable to sleep. Cf. also 10.496-7, and see on 2.20-1. In later Greek literature a dream-figure is often said to 'stand over' ($t\pi 107\pi 7001$) the dreamer: cf. E. R. Dodds, The Greeks and the Irrational (Berkeley 1951) 105-6.

69–92 This is the longest speech by a dream-figure in Homer. Patroklos begins by rebuking Akhilleus for sleeping and forgetting him. This is typical of such scenes: cf. 2.23–4 εύδεις ... | οὐ χρή παννύχιον εὐδειν ..., 24.683 ὡ γέρον, οῦ νὐ τι σοί γε μέλει κακόν, οἶον εθ' εῦδεις ..., Od. 6.25 Ναυσικάα, τί νὑ σ' ὦδε μεθήμονα γείνατο μήτηρ; also the reproach to a sleeper at 10.159, the opening εῦδεις at Od. 4.804, and Pindar, O. 13.67 εῦδεις, Aloλίδα βασιλεῦ; A. Eum. 94 εὐδοιτ' ἄν, ὡή, καl καθευδουσῶν τί δεῖ; See also E. Lévy, Kièma 7 (1982) 36–7.

He then instructs Akhilleus to bury him quickly, explaining why, and begs him to give him his hand for the last time, recalling their companionship in life. Reference to his own death leads him to foretell Akhilleus' impending doom, and this in turn to a further instruction that their bones should be buried together in a single coffin: once again this leads back to recollection of their closeness in life, as they grew up together in Peleus' house, when Patroklos was received there in exile for homicide. Verses 83-91 form a ring, 83-4 being answered by 89-91. Verse 92 is probably a later addition (see comment).

The structure of the speech deserves attention. It begins with a series of solemn, end-stopped sentences (69-74), containing the main message the ghost has to convey. Then the emotional level rises, as he refers to their companionship, and it is significant that we begin to get more complex sentences with some enjambment (75-81). The second instruction is expressed in three verses (82-4), followed by the more leisurely narrative development of 85-90, with the closing verse 91. It is typical of Homeric psychology that Patroklos' ghost gives an extra impulsion to what is already Akhilleus' own wish (cf. 52-3 and 71), as often with supernatural motivation.

69 λελασμένος έπλευ: cf. 13.269 λελασμένον έμμεναι.

70 ακήδεις: imperfect of ακηδέω; cf. 14.427 ακήδεσεν.

71-4 Patroklos states for the first time in Homer the common ancient view that it was cremation or burial which enabled the soul to enter Hades properly; hence the corollary that thereafter it would not revisit the world above (75-6). Arn/A on 73 notes that the (athetized) second Nekuia (Od. 24.1-204) contradicts this, as there the souls of the unburied suitors meet the other ghosts in Hades.

71 milas 'Aldao mephow: cf. 5.646 milas 'Aldao mephoein |. mephow is probably subjunctive here ('let me pass' or 'that I may pass'): see on 22.418.

72 Tỹ λ έ με εἶργουσι: elsewhere we find (F)έργω, ἐέργω, and here the reading perhaps represents an original μ' ἐέργουσι οr με ἕργουσι (Chantraine, GH 1 181). For ψυχαὶ εἶδωλα καμόντων cf. Od. 24.14, εἶδωλα καμόντων | Od. 11.476. καμόντας alone meaning 'the dead' occurs at 3.278.

73 Unip ποτομοίο: presumably this means the Styx (cf. 8.369). The oblique reference suggests that everyone would know what is meant.

74 dv' evputulits Aibos ba: cf. Od. 11.571 kart' evputulits Aibos ba. The epithet occurs nowhere else, and like many descriptions of Hades suggests the multitude of the dead (see on HyDem 9, 379). There is an apparent contradiction between this statement and 71, but the topography of the Underworld is always vague.

75 Kal µoi dos the $\chi \epsilon \tilde{\rho}$: this gesture is here presumably intended as an expression of both affection and farewell, as often in Greek art (cf. Neumann, Gesten und Gebarden 49-58), rather than simply as a confirmation of Akhilleus' pledge to bury Patroklos, as Mazon suggests (REA 42 (1940) 257). Cf. Odysseus' parting from Penelope before he went to Troy (Od. 18.257-8), where he clasps her right hand when giving her instructions about what to do after he has gone. Patroklos' own ignorance of how useless his request is adds to the pathos of the scene.

δλοφύρομαι: 'I beg you'. Leaf compares 2.290 δδύρονται οΙκόνδε νέεσθαι, but there the infinitive expression gives the content of δδύρονται.

76 Although elsewhere νίσομαι has a present sense, it seems to be used as a future here. It is related to νέομαι, νόστος. For έπήν με πυρός λελάχητε cf. 7.79-80, 22.342-3 ὄφρα πυρός με $| \ldots$ λελάχωσι θανόντα, and see on 15.350.

77-91 These verses are quoted by Aeschines, Contra Timarchum 149, with a text which varies considerably from our vulgate, especially from 81 onwards.

77 ού μέν γάρ: Aeschines and some of the city texts (Did/A) read οὐ γὰρ ἔτι.

• 1

. .

78-9 άλλ' έμε μεν κήρ | ἀμφέχανε στυγερή: 'a hateful doom has gaped around me', a vivid expression. ἀμφιχάσκω occurs only here in early epic, and then in Attic tragedy and later poetry.

ή περ λάχε γεινόμενόν περ: one's day of death or doom is fixed at birth. Cf. 20.127-8 άσσα of Alσα | γιγνομένω ἐπένησε λίνω, ὅτε μιν τέκε μήτηρ, 24.209-10, etc.

80-1 In the context of Akhilleus' death the formula $\theta = 0$ is pathetic.

81 EUNDERVÉOU was the reading of Rhianus and Aristophanes (Did/A) for the vulgate EUNYEVÉOU. EUNYEVÉS occurs at 11.427, HyAphr 229, rarely in later poetry, and as a proper name at Eretria in the fifth century B.C. EUNDERVÉS or EURDERVÉS occur as proper names several times (O. Masson, Rev. Phil. 39 (1965) 236-7; see also 239-40), and EUNDERVÉOUTR in epic verse at P. Oxy. 1794.13. But EUNYEVÉS is an abnormal formation for EUNEVÉS or HUYEVÉS, whereas EUNDERVÉS (cf. EU- + ÉDERVOS) is normal. Consequently modern scholars favour the latter, although it is not easy to see why this should have been replaced by an abnormal form, or why this should have proved so dominant in the tradition, whereas EUNDERVÉS looks as if it might be a conjecture by Rhianus and Aristophanes. It is also not easy to see why the Trojans should be categorized as 'wealthy' here, in what is clearly not a formular expression, whereas 'noble' is the kind of general term one might expect. It seems better therefore to accept that the anomalous EUNYEVÉS may have already existed in the epic tradition at the time of the Iliad.

After this the Aeschines quotation adds an extra verse $\mu\alpha\rho\nu\dot{\alpha}\mu\epsilon\nu\sigma\nu$ $\delta\eta$ los "Elévns évez' hűzópolo, which is composed of formular elements: cf. | $\mu\dot{\alpha}\rho\nu$ - $\alpha\sigma\theta\alpha$ $\delta\eta$ los(1) $4 \times II$.; "Elévns évez' hűzópolo 9.339, "Elévns mósis hűzópolo $6 \times II$.

82 This verse occurs only here instead of the formular $\tilde{\alpha}\lambda\lambda \sigma \delta \tilde{\epsilon}$ to $\tilde{\epsilon}\rho \tilde{\epsilon}\omega$, $\sigma \tilde{\nu} \delta' \tilde{\epsilon}\nu \tilde{\epsilon}\phi \tilde{\epsilon}\sigma \tilde{\sigma}\sigma \tilde{\nu} \delta' \tilde{\epsilon}\nu \tilde{\epsilon}\sigma \tilde{\sigma}\sigma \tilde{\nu} (4 \times 11., 7 \times 0d.)$, which Aeschines' text reads. Cf. 21.293 autop to mukives unophotomed', at ke mightai, and similarly Od. 1.279. This phrasing is obviously better suited to the pleading tone of Patroklos' ghost.

83 τιθήμεναι: this form of τιθέμεναι, lengthened metri gratia, recurs at 247; cf. 10.34 τιθήμενος.

83-4 After 83 Aeschines' text adds two verses:

άλλ' Ινα πέρ σε και αὐτὸν ὅμοίη γαῖα κεκεύθη (cf. 18.329) χρυσέω ἐν ἀμφιφορεῖ τόν τοι πόρε πότνια μήτηρ ὡς ὅμοῦ ἐτράφομέν περ ...

The second verse replaces 92, which this version omits.

84 ώς τράφομέν περ: this (cf. Aeschines' έτράφομέν περ) was suggested by

•

t

Buttmann and La Roche, for the vulgate $\dot{\omega}_5 \, \epsilon \tau p \dot{\alpha} \phi \eta v \pi \epsilon p$ (also in Lucian, Paras. 47), and the variant (in two papyri, several MSS, and mentioned by A) $\epsilon \tau p \dot{\alpha} \phi \eta \mu \epsilon v$. The short vowel before τp ($\epsilon \tau p \dot{\alpha} \phi \eta v$) is rare in Homer, but it occurs where the word would not otherwise scan without distortion ('Auφιτρύων, τετράκυκλον), which is the case here, and even where it could ($\phi \alpha \rho \dot{\epsilon} \tau \rho \eta \varsigma$, $\dot{\alpha} \lambda \dot{\alpha} \tau \rho \iota \varsigma$, 'Oτρυντεύς): cf. Chantraine, GH 1 108. So it is not impossible, and there is more to be said for the singular $\epsilon \tau \rho \dot{\alpha} \phi \eta v$, since it is picked up by 85-90 (especially 89 90 $\epsilon v \theta \alpha \mu \epsilon \dots \epsilon \tau \rho \alpha \phi \epsilon \dots$); cf. van der Valk, Researches II 330-1.

85-90 Exile for homicide is a common motif in Homer: cf. 16.570-6, the story of another of Akhilleus' companions, Epeigeus, who was received by Peleus and Thetis after he had killed his cousin. Other examples are Tlepolemos (2.661-7), Medon (13.694-7), Lukophron (15.430-2 and 437-9), and in the Odyssey Odysseus in disguise (13.258-73), an Aetolian (14.379-81), and Theoklumenos (15.224ff., 272-6). Cf. the simile at 24.480-3, which suggests how common this may still have been in the poet's own times. For this motif see on 13.694-7, and Strasburger, Kleinen Kämpfer 29-31.

Peleus seems to be particularly associated with this theme of giving a new home to exiles: besides Patroklos and Epeigeus there was also Phoinix, who left home after a quarrel with his father over a concubine, and who in one version of the text had considered killing his father (9.447-84).

Another way of avoiding a blood-feud was by payment of a fine to the dead man's kinsmen (9.632-6, 18.497-508). In general see R. J. Bonner and G. Smith, The Administration of Justice from Homer to Aristotle 1 (Chicago 1930) 15-21.

In the case of Patroklos, because he was only a boy his father took him to Peleus. Later, when Patroklos was about to join Agamemon's expedition, Menoitios is again said to have been present in Phthie (11.765-90), and Akhilleus speaks of having promised Menoitios that he would bring his son back safe to Opoeis (18.324-7).

87 παΐδα... Άμφιδάμαντος: the name also occurs at 10.268-9, where it belongs to a man from Kuthera, and as that of the historical king at whose funeral games Hesiod won a prize, at Hes. Erga 654-6. But there seems no reason to suppose (as West does ad loc.) that Homer's choice of the name is influenced by Hesiod here.

66 νήπιος, ούκ έθέλων: νήπιος suggests both folly and also childish irresponsibility here. ούκ έθέλων makes it clear that the act was involuntary or accidental, an interesting point in view of the later historical importance attached to the distinction between different forms of homicide.

άμφ' ἀστραγάλοισι χολωθείς: the word ἀστράγαλος occurs as the name of a vertebra at 14.466, Od. 10.560, 11.65, but only here in Homer for the game of knuckle-bones, which were used as a form of dice in antiquity. Cf. Hdt. 1.94.3, where this is claimed by the Lydians as their invention, and Laser, Arch. Hom. τ 117-22. According to Did/AT the majority of early scholarly editions (al $\pi\lambda\epsilon$ lous τ and $\kappa\alpha\tau$ ' avdra) here read dup' dot payddygow tplooas, using an Ionic feminine form of the noun which was found in Anacreon (PMG fr. 53).

۰.

90 For $\xi \tau \rho \alpha \phi \epsilon$ many MSS in fact read $\xi \tau \rho \epsilon \phi \epsilon$, and elsewhere $\xi \tau \rho \alpha \phi \sigma \sigma$ is intransitive (2.661 etc.), so we should probably prefer $\xi \tau \rho \epsilon \phi \epsilon$ here. $\xi \sigma \delta \sigma \sigma \sigma$ recurs only $3 \times II$, all in book 24, but $16 \times Od$. 'With good will' would perhaps give the general sense. It is used particularly in contexts of caring for or feeding someone, and often the translation 'steadfastly' seems suitable, but the basic sense is not certain. Cf. Chantraine, Dict. s.v., Leumann, HW_{311-12} .

gr $\sigma \rho \phi_5$: only here in early epic. Later it means a coffin, but it may have originally meant simply any container (Chantraine, Dict. s.v.). Patroklos' bones are actually put in a $\phi i \Delta \lambda \eta$ after the cremation, and this is placed in Akhilleus' hut to wait until he too has died (243-4, 252-4). Hektor's bones are put in a $\lambda \dot{\alpha} \rho v \alpha \xi$ (24.795), and the scholia assume that this is what is meant here, but it could be an urn. In actual practice, whereas inhumation burials in the late Bronze and early Iron Ages are sometimes laid in coffins, for cremation burials, especially in the early Iron Age and Geometric period, clay or metal urns are much more common: cf. Kurtz and Boardman, Burial Customs 21-67; Andronikos, Arch. Hom. w 71-6, 102-4; and especially the very fine bronze vessel containing the bones of the warrior of Lefkandi (M. Popham, E. Touloupa and L. H. Sackett, Antiquity 56 (1982) 169-74).

Stesichorus later embroidered the story of this vessel, making it a reward to Thetis from Dionusos for her reception of him after his pursuit by Lukourgos (PMG fr. 57 ap. schol. ABD ll. 23.92; cf. 6.135-7). It may, then, be the vessel which Dionusos carries on the François Vase, as Rumpf suggested (Gnomon 25 (1953) 470). It is possible that the description of the amphora in Odyssey 24 was originally suggested by the mention at Il. 23.243 and 253 of the pickn in which Patroklos' bones are to be kept until Akhilleus' death. See also M. W. Haslam, TAPA 121 (1991) 35-45.

g3 After this verse pap. 12 adds $h\delta \dot{v}$ μάλα κνώσσων l ν όνειρείησι πύλησιν, which is borrowed from Od. 4.809, where 810 re embles Il. 23.94.

94 Cf. Od. 4.810 τίπτε, κασιγνήτη, δεῦρ' ήλυθες; and Od. 5.87 τίπτε μοι, 'Ερμεία χρυσόρραπι, εἰλήλουθας; For ήθείη κεφάλη see on 22.229. According to Arn/A it is an address used by a younger towards an older man, and Patroklos was in fact older than Akhilleus (11.787). Chamaeleon (fr. 19 Wehrli) read ὥ θείη κεφάλη here, which would be 'ridiculous when addressed to a ghost' (Did, Arn/A). After 94 pap. 12 may have had another extra verse, and possibly two more again after 96: see West, Ptolemaic Pap ri 172.

97-IOI In the same way in Od. 11.204-22 Odysseus tries to embrace his mother's ghost, but she slips through his hands, and when he asks her why she explains that the soul is like a dream-image. Verses 97-8 resemble Od. 11.211-12 δφρα καί είν Άίδαο φίλας περί χεῖρε βαλόντε | ἀμφοτέρω κρυεροῖο τεταρπώμεσθα γόοιο. Here ἀμφιβαλόντε probably governs ἀλλήλους, as τεταρπώμεσθα is usually intransitive (see on 23.10). The variant κρυεροῖο (A) in 98 may be derived from Od. 11.212. In 97, as often, μίνυνθα is pathetic; and 98 is a powerfully constructed four-word verse, with balance and assonance at the end of each hemistich.

99 ώρέξατο χερσί φίλησιν: cf. HyDem 15 ώρέξατο χερσίν άμ' άμφω.

100-1 ψυχή ... τετριγυΐα: cf. Od. 24.5-9, where the souls of the suitors are like squeaking bats (24.9 τετριγυΐαι), and the fledgeling birds eaten by the snake at ll. 2.314, έλεεινά ... τετριγῶτας. The comparison to smoke is wonderfully effective. At Od. 11.207-8 the soul flies away σκίη εἶκελου ή καl όνεἰρω; cf. also ll. 18.110, where χόλος rises in men's breast ήθτε καπνός.

101 ταφών δ' άνόρουσεν Άχιλλεύς recurs at 9.193, 11.777.

sea συμπλατάγησεν: a vivid onomatopoeic word, which occurs only here in early Greek literature, and rarely later, although πλαταγεῖν is commoner in Hellenistic and later poetry. Most of our MSS read συμπατάγησεν, presumably under the influence of the Homeric πάταγος.

έπος δ' όλοφυδνόν έειπε: as at 5.683 (see comment), Od. 19.362. όλοφυδνός ('lamenting') is a Homeric gloss which recurs later in an epigram of Anyte (AP 7.486). According to Chantraine, Dict. s.v. όλοφυρομαι, it is a secondary formation, like γοεδνός in relation to γοερός.

103-7 Akhilleus draws the natural conclusion from his dream that after all there is some kind of existence after death: the $\psi v \chi \eta$ and an image ($\epsilon 16\omega \lambda o \nu$) of the person does survive. This suggests debate on this subject already in Homer's time; cf. the similar hesitancy of 24.592-3.

۰,

ı

103-4 For TIS some of our MSS read TI, i.e. 'the soul and image are something even in Hades' halls', or perhaps 'there is something ..., a soul and image'. This may have been what Propertius read, as his sunt aliquid manes echoes it (4.7.1), and it seems preferable to TIS, which goes rather awkwardly with $\psi v \chi \eta$ kal elbahov. Cf. perhaps Pl. Phaedo 6305 events elui elval TI TOIS TETEREVTIKOT ('there is some existence for the dead').

The scholia (Did?, Arn/A) have a long discussion of 104, which is not easy to disentangle (cf. van der Valk, Researches 1 540-2). The problem is that if one takes ppeves as meaning 'wits' it is odd to say of Patroklos' ghost, which has 'made a reasonable and intelligent speech', that it has no optives, They first suggest that 'the verse has been intruded (Evolotional) from the Odyssey', i.e., presumably it reflects the view expressed at Od. 10.492-5, where Teiresias' ghost is said to differ from the others since his optives are ξμπεδοι and he alone has intelligence. An alternative view is then offered (which seems to be that of Aristophanes), that opeves has its physical sense here, referring to part of the body (i.e. the midriff), and so it means that the worth has no physical existence. The scholia then quote what appears to be Aristarchus' opinion, that 'Homer assumes that the souls of the unburied dead still preserve their intelligence'; i.e. after burial they have no sense, but Patroklos' unburied ghost still retains this faculty. Aristarchus probably quoted Od. 11.51-83, where Elpenor's unburied spirit converses with Odysseus without having drunk blood, whereas the other souls are unable to do this (cf. schol. Od. 11.51).

In addition, bT offer the explanation that Patroklos' ghost shows his lack of sense because he wrongly accuses Akhilleus of neglecting him (cf. also Leaf, Iliad 11 621). bT have one other suggestion, that $\dot{\alpha}\tau\dot{\alpha}\rho$... $\pi\dot{\alpha}\mu\pi\alpha\nu$ means that the ghosts have some intelligence, but it is not complete; i.e. où $\pi\dot{\alpha}\mu\pi\alpha\nu$ means 'not altogether' rather than 'not at all'; and T quotes a variant $\pi\ddot{\alpha}\sigma\alpha$ which would make this sense clearer.

As far as intelligence goes, 24.592-5 indicate that Akhilleus allows that even in Hades Patroklos may have some idea of what goes on in the world above, and may derive satisfaction from receiving a share in the ransom for Hektor's body. Perhaps the simplest answer is that of Aristophanes. Patroklos' ghost apparently displayed normal emotions, it could give Akhilleus instructions, and it looked just like him (105-7), but when Akhilleus tried to grasp it he realized that it had no physical substance.

105 $\pi \alpha v v v \chi i \eta$: Akhilleus has the impression that his dream lasted 'all night'; dreams often do seem to last a considerable time, even when they are quite brief.

205 Cf. 6.373 πύργω έφεστήκει γοόωσά τε μυρομένη τε. For έφεστήκει see on 68.

107 θέσκελου: 'marvellously'; see on 3.130.

• 1

108 = Od. 4.183; cf. also II. 23.153 τοῖσι δὲ πᾶσιν ὑφ' Ιμερον ῶρσε γόοιο etc.

109-26 Dawn comes, and Agamemnon orders the Achaeans to fetch wood for the pyre of Patroklos. Meriones takes charge of this. They take mules to Mt Ida, cut down oak trees, and bring them back to the sea-shore, where they lay them ready for the pyre

After the intensely emotional scenes which have preceded we have an interlude of equally intense physical activity. The urgency and bustle is expressed in a passage where enjambment is noticeably frequent, and in 117-26 'periodic' or 'integral' enjambment occurs in seven out of ten verses. The extraordinary rhythm and sound-effects of 116 add to the impression of great numbers of men and animals moving ceaselessly in all directions over the hills

109 Plutarch (Mor. 114ε) quotes as Homeric μυρομένοισι δέ τοΐσι μέλας $t\pi i$ to $\pi i \rho \sigma_{1}$ this is composed of the first hemistich of 109 and the second of Od. 1.423 = 18.306. It could well be due to faulty memory, or even deliberate adaptation, rather than being a genuine variant which would be quite out of place here. For pupopevoioi 52 rotoi cf. 19.940 | μυρομένους δ' άρα τούς γε. - φάνη βοδοδάκτυλος 'Ηώς resembles the formular verse ήμος δ' ήριγένεια φάνη ροδοδάκτυλος 'Ηώς (2× 11., 20× Od.): see on 1.477. Macleod, Iliad XXIV 47-8, points out that in this poem the appearance of Dawn is several times linked with the theme of human sorrow or trouble: cf. 11.1-4 (Zeus sends Strife to the Greek ships); 19.1-6 (Thetis finds Akhilleus and the Myrmidons lamenting Patroklos' death); 23.226-8 (the flames of Patroklos' pyre die at dawn: see comment); 24.694-7 (Hermes leaves for Olumpos as Dawn comes and Priam brings Hektor's corpse into Troy with lamentation and groaning); 788-803 (the conclusion of Hektor's funeral at dawn). There is something similar at 7.421-9 (at sunrise the Greeks and Trojans prepare the dead for burial, with tears and grief), and 433-41 (just before dawn, in the early twilight, the Greeks gather round the pyre to build the mound and wall): the second of these suggests a particularly eerie and melancholy scene.

ELE oùpňás are 'mules'; cf. 1.50 | oùpňas. Many ancient copies omitted TE (Did/AT), which is an odd mistake. T compares the simile at 17.742-6, where Menelaos and Meriones carrying Patroklos' body out of the battle are like mules bringing down a tree-trunk from the mountain along a rocky path. It is interesting that in both these scenes Meriones is involved in the care for Patroklos' corpse: cf. also 16.632-7 (simile of woodcutters, after a reference to Meriones).

EXE έπι δ' άνήρ έσθλὸς ὁρώρει: cf. Od. 3.471, 14.104 έπι δ' άνέρες έσθλοι ὅροντο -ται. The poet must be using έπιορώρει here as a pluperfect of ۰.

Eπιόρομαι meaning 'watch over' (cf. Eπίουρος 13.450). On these forms see Chantraine, GH [31], 426.

EEG In earlier books Meriones' whole-verse formula is Mnpióvns ἀτάλαντος Ένυαλίω ἀνδρειφόντη (4× 11.), which would presumably have too martial a flavour here. Having referred to him in this way here the poet repeats this alternative formula at 124 (see comment), and we have αὐτἀρ/ ἀν δ' ἀρα Μηριόνης θεράπων ἐῦς 'ἰδομενῆος at 23.528, 23.860 and 888. There is no very obvious reason why the poet should select Meriones as commander here, except perhaps that he is a minor but efficient hero, and as a θεράπων he is suitable for a practical but not very heroic operation. It is worth noticing the thematic link with 17.742-6 (see on 111). For Meriones and his formulae see also on 13.246-8 and 249-50.

άγαπήνορος 'Ιδομενῆος: the epithet is less common than one might expect. Cf. 15.392 άγαπήνορος Εὐρυπύλοιο |, 13.756, Od. 7.170 άγαπήνορα Πουλυδάμαντα/Λαοδάμαντα |, and the proper name Agapenor; see on 13.756.

114 ύλοτόμους πελέκεας: ύλοτόμος occurs only here and at 123 in Homer, in the second case as a noun; cf. Hes. Erga 807 etc. πελέκεας recurs in the same position in the verse at 851, 856 and 882, where ten axes are the first prize in the archery contest: by coincidence they are won by Meriones (882).

885 εὐπλέκτους: this epithet only recurs in Homer at 335 ἐϋπλέκτω ἐνὶ δίφρω, although we find ἐϋπλεκέες (2.449) and ἐϋπλεκέας (23.436).

126 'Many times uphill and downhill, alonghill and crossways they travelled.' dvavta and katavta occur only here in Homer, rarely later and usually together; mapavta seems to occur nowhere else; cf. Homeric Eoavta, Evavta. Sóxutos occurs nowhere else in Homer, but cf. 12.148 Soxuá. The verse is a particularly striking example of the poet's own skill in linguistic innovation. The use of a consistently dactylic rhythm and sequence of trochaic words is paralleled by for example Od. 11.598 avtis Emeira mésovée $\kappa u\lambda lv\delta e \tauo \lambda a consistent of a.2, 21.406-11 and 23.263$). The acoustic jingle adds to the effect, although in a rather obvious way. This verse has the highest number of a-sounds in the poem. See also Edwards, IIPI 118.

117 For the phrase $\kappa v \eta \mu o \dot{v} \ldots \pi o \lambda v \pi i \delta \sigma \kappa o s$ "long see on 8.47-8, 21.449, 21.559, and for $\pi o \lambda v \pi i \delta \sigma \xi$ cf. 14.157n. Timber-felling is still one of the main occupations of those who live around Mt Ida, and oak trees are abundant there (cf. 14.287-8n.).

118 δρῶς ὑψικόμους: cf. 14.398, Od. 9.186 δρυσιν ὑψικόμοισιν |, δρυδς ὑψικόμοιο $3 \times Od$. ταναηκέι χαλκῷ is formular, $3 \times Il.$, $1 \times Od$. This verse is a rising threefolder.

119 ETELYÓMEVOL: pap. 12 reads $\dot{\alpha}$ MELBÓMEVOL, but this has been corrected above the verse to ETELYÓMEVOL. At Od. 19.252 ETELYOMEVUL is a false variant for duespontry, and the papyrus variant has been preferred here by some scholars (cf. van der Valk, Researches 11 562 n. 102). But there is no weight of authority in favour of it, and the MS reading is surely correct.

•

t

- • 、

119-20 Tai $\delta i \dots \pi i \pi \tau \sigma v$: the spondaic runover word is effective, describing the slow fall of these great trees.

120 διαπλήσσοντες ('splitting'), Aristarchus' reading (Did/A) and that of nearly all our MSS, must surely be right. At Od. 8.507 he read διαπλήξαι instead of διατμήξαι. The compound recurs nowhere else.

191 ταὶ δὲ χθόνα ποσσὶ δατεῦντο: 'they divided the ground with their feet'. This appears to mean that their hooves cut furrows in the ground, in their eagerness to reach the plain. It is a unique phrase. At 20.394 δατέοντο is used of horses cutting up the body of a fallen man with the wheels of their chariots. There is a nice contrast with the smooth journey of Nausikaa's mules (Od. 6.318) αl δ' εῦ μὲν τρώχων, εῦ δὲ πλίσσοντο πόδεσσιν.

122 $\ell\lambda\delta\delta\mu\epsilon\nu\alpha\eta$ medicio: 'eager for the plain'; for $\ell\lambda\delta\epsilon\sigma\theta\alpha\eta$ with the genitive cf. Od. 5.210, 14.42. Pap. 12 seems to have read lépevon medicovde (West, Ptolemaic Papyri 173).

διά φωπήϊα πυκνά: cf. 13.199, Od. 14.473 (with άνά and κατά respectively); also 21.559. The description suggests a picture of the mules eagerly forging a path through the thickets on the mountain.

123 UNOTOPOI: pap. 12 reads Groups, which was preferred by Wilamowitz as more vivid (IuH 111 n. 1). UNOTOPOI could possibly be a gloss on máxres, and one might object to the variation in use of the word from adjective to noun in 114 and 123. But these arguments do not seem strong enough to make one alter the traditional reading.

124 See on 113. Pap. 12 may have read orphpos beportow (cf. Od. 4.23, 217), and it is possible that the name has been inserted to clarify the text, as happens elsewhere (West, Ptolemaic Papyri 174). Either way, this verse repeats 113 in ring composition, rounding off the account of the expedition.

125-6 For $i\pi i\sigma\chi\epsilon\rho\omega$ ('in a row', 'in order') cf. 11.668 etc. $\hbar\rho i\sigma\nu$ ('barrow', 'mound') only occurs here in Homer, instead of $\tau\nu\mu\rho\sigma$, and in later prose and poetry from the sixth century onwards. It probably had an initial digamma. Cf. Chantraine, Dict. s.v.

127-53 Akhilleus tells the Myrmidons to arm and prepare their chariots. They do so and then escort the body of Patroklos in the funeral procession, after covering it with their hair. When they reach the pyre Akhilleus cuts off a lock of his own hair, and offers it to Patroklos

The first part of this passage describes the ekphora or funeral procession (cf. 24.786 ifiqipov opaciv "Ektopa). Here Patroklos' body is carried by his companions, probably on the bier (piptpov) mentioned at 18.236 (cf.

۰,

T

18.233 in Lexieori and 23.171 mpbs lixed), with an escort consisting not only of the Myrmidons in their chariots but also of a vast number of soldiers on foot (133-4): so presumably the whole army joined this great procession. This scene inevitably invites comparison with the magnificent vases of the Geometric period which depict funerary scenes (cf. Andronikos, Arch. Hom, w 43-51): most of these are of the prothesis or lying-in-state, but a few do show the ekphora. Here the dead man is lying on a horse-drawn cart, with a procession led by men in armour and women following behind: cf. for example Kurtz and Boardman, Burial Customs pl. 5. This particular krater from the National Museum in Athens also shows a chariot procession in the register below the ekphora scene: cf. Andronikos, op. cit. 46, fig. 2. Similar chariot processions occur in association with some of the prothesis scenes. For an illustration of the bier being actually carried on the shoulders of a group of men we must look at the more simple scene on a later black-figure vase (Beazley, ABV 346 no. 7; cf. Ath. Mitt. 53 (1928) Beilage xv.2, Kurtz and Boardman pl. 35). There is a more detailed discussion of the Geometric examples, with ample illustration, by G. Ahlberg, Prothesis and Ekphora in Greek Geometric Art (Göteborg 1971). Whether or not they are directly related to or inspired by epic or Homeric accounts of funerals is an open auestion.

In the case of Patroklos the procession is associated with the offering of their hair by his companions, and it is followed by a separate scene in which Akhilleus offers a lock of his own hair, placing it in Patroklos' hands. In the account of Akhilleus' own funeral in Odyssey 24 the Greeks likewise cut off their hair (45-6), and this is mentioned as a regular mourning-ritual at Od. 4.197-8. In Aeschylus' Choiphoroe (6-7) Orestes offers a lock of hair at his father's grave, having first offered one to the river Inakhos in gratitude for his nurture. Aeschylus may have had this passage of the Iliad specifically in mind in associating these two offerings. In Iliad 23 the poet has (typically) taken a conventional ritual and given it new and deeper significance in the second scene of Akhilleus' offering: cf. vol. v, pp. 22-3.

Cutting one's hair in mourning was a common custom in ancient Greece at all times, as in many other societies. In the classical period it was most often, but not always, women who cut their hair, whereas men (whose hair was now usually shorter, in contrast to the fashion of the heroic age) would let their hair grow long in mourning. As Plutarch observed, mourning ritual involves the reversal of everyday customs (Mor. 267A-B). The actual offering of hair to the dead, or on a tomb, is less commonly attested in ancient Greece: it seems to occur particularly, if not exclusively, in mythical contexts and in the cults of heroes and heroines (Nilsson, GgrR 180). Offering one's hair to the local river, usually in thanksgiving for one's nurture, is again more commonly attested in mythology than by historical examples.

• .

But like many other ancient customs it survived in Arcadia, where the boys of Phigaleia dedicated their hair to the river Neda (Pausanias 8.41.3). It is not clear whether the statue which Pausanias describes near the Kephisos in Attica of 'the son of Mnesimakhe cutting his hair for the Kephisos' (1.37.3) is of a mythical or historical figure: quite probably the latter, but it is significant that Pausanias calls this an 'ancient Greek custom' and invokes this passage of lliad 23 to support this view. Hair-offerings to the nymphs, Artemis, Apollo, and other deities, on the other hand, are a regular practice in the historical period (Nilsson, GgrR 136-8).

On all of these rituals see Andronikos, Arch. Hom. w 18-20, and for hairofferings W. H. D. Rouse, Greek Volive Offerings (Cambridge 1902) 240-5. For possible Minoan examples cf. E. N. Davis, AJA 90 (1986) 399-406, R. B. Koehl, JHS 106 (1986) 99-110, and C. Doumas in ElAAIIINH (Festschrift for N. Platon, Herakleion 1987) 151-9. E. Samter, Familienfeste der Griechen und Römer (Berlin 1901) 71-8 and Geburt, Hochzeit und Tod (Leipzig 1911) 179-83, and S. Eitrem, Opferritus und Voropfer der Griechen und Römer (Kristiania 1914) 344-72, are worth consulting for further details.

127 παρακάββαλον: this compound verb, the only Homeric instance of one with παρακατα-, occurs again at 683, and nowhere else in Homer. It presumably means that they put the wood down alongside the place for the pyre. The word is a good instance of a coinage which, once the poet has introduced it, recurs quite soon by a process of association. It is found later as a legal term, meaning 'deposit', 'make a deposition' in the Attic orators and inscriptions.

άσπετον ύλην | recurs at 24.784 of the wood for Hektor's pyre, and 2.455 (see comment).

129-32 Pap. 12 diverges considerably here from our vulgate, but the text is very fragmentary. There was apparently at least one extra verse here. See West, Ptolemaic Papyri 147, 175-6.

129 For Μυρμιδόνεσσι φιλοπτολέμοισι in this position cf. 16.65.

τgo χαλκόν ζώννυσθαι: only here as an expression for arming, but cf. 11.15–16 ζώννυσθαι άνωγεν ... εν δ' αὐτὸς εδύσετο νώροπα χαλκόν. The verb recurs at Od. 24.89 in the context of Akhilleus' funeral and the games which accompany it.

I3I-2 έν τεύχεσσιν έδυνον, | αν δ' έβαν έν δίφροισι: cf. 10.254 δπλοισιν ένι δεινοϊσιν έδύτην, but Od. 22.201, 24.498 ές τεύχεα δύντε/έδυνον; ll. 23.352 αν δ' έβαν ές δίφρους (which is read here by schol. pap. XII (Erbse), but is metrically impossible). Cf. Chantraine, GH II 101-2 for other examples of έν with verbs of movement.

132 παραιβάται: this denotes the warrior riding alongside his charioteer. It occurs only here in Homer, later in Attic prose and poetry. At 11.104 Άντιφος αῦ παρέβασκε also refers to the fighting man in the chariot (there explicitly distinguished from the $\hbar v \log \sigma$, whereas at 11.522 Extop $\pi \alpha \rho$ - $\beta \epsilon \beta \alpha \omega_5$ is used of the charioteer standing beside Hektor.

۰.

133 μετά δὲ νεφος είπετο πεζῶν: see on 4.274 ἄμα δὲ νέφος είπετο πεζῶν. There the metaphor is developed in the following simile, but here this would be out of place.

134 µúpioi: see on 29. There it referred to the Myrmidons, and it may do so again here. But at 156-62 it seems that the whole army must have joined the procession.

135-9 Leaf observes that we have a sequence of five dactylic lines here and at 166-70, but in both cases it looks as if this has occurred purely by chance.

135-7 As Mazon pointed out (REA 42 (1940) 257-8), we should envisage the Myrmidons as covering Patroklos' body with their hair as the procession advances. The series of imperfects indicates this, and the resulting scene is more impressive and solemn than if the cutting of hair had taken place all at once before the procession was under way. The two emphatic runover participles Keipóµevoi ... ἀχνύµενος express the leading themes of this scene.

135 καταείνυσαν: 'clothed', a vivid metaphor. The form (κατα)εινύω occurs only here in Homer (and later at Oppian, H. 2.673), although (κατα)ειμένος is closely related. Most of our MSS read καταείνυον, and καταείνυσαν is due to Aristarchus (Arn/AT): similar variants occur elsewhere (Chantraine, GH 1473).

136 $\delta \pi i \theta \epsilon v \delta \epsilon \kappa \alpha \rho \eta \epsilon \chi \epsilon \delta \delta \delta \gamma (A \chi i \lambda) \epsilon v \varsigma$: Eustathius says that Akhilleus does this because the body is not being carried on a bier (1292.30), but it looks rather as if this is a customary expression of closeness to the dead man. At 24.710-12 Andromakhe and Hekabe touch Hektor's head as they express their grief, and at 724 Andromakhe holds his head in her hands while she sings her lament. Cf. 18.71, where Thetis holds Akhilleus' head as she comforts him, and Andronikos, Arch. Hom w 11-12.

In prothesis scenes on works of art the position at the head of the body is evidently one of some importance, and is usually occupied by a woman, on one occasion identified as the mother; cf. Zschietzsmann, Ath. Mitt. 53 (1928) 25-6, Boardman, BSA 50 (1955) 56-7. Occasionally the dead man's head is held in the hands of one of the mourners: a good example is on a vase by the Kleophrades painter (R. E. Arias and M. Hirmer, A History of Greek Vase Painting, London 1962, pl. 128). Cf. Arias and Hirmer pl. 129, Kurtz and Boardman, Burial Customs pl. 11, and other examples listed by Neumann, Gesten und Gebärden 89 n. 369. T says (oddly) that holding the head of the dead man was a Lindian custom.

After 136 pap. 12 has an extra verse, of which only the ending (δαίζων) is preserved, but cf. 18.27 κείτο, φίλησι δέ χερσί κόμην ήσχυνε δαίζων.

• .

137 ξταρον γάρ... Άϊδόσδε: the closing sentence of this passage is powerfully moving in its simplicity.

139 peroenkla: from its basic sense of 'satisfactory' this comes to mean here 'plentiful'.

140 ένθ' αῦτ' ἄλλ' ἐνόησε: only here and at 193 in II, but $5 \times Od$. (with θεὰ γλαυκῶπις 'Αθήνη), and ἄλλ' ἐνόησε occurs $5 \times$ in other phrases in that poem.

141-53 For Akhilleus' offering of his hair see on 127-53.

142 Sperkheios is the main river of Akhilleus' homeland (see vol. 1, pp. 186, 228-9), and at 16.173-8 the river-god is also said to be the father of Menesthios by Peleus' daughter Poludore.

143-51 Akhilleus makes his speech facing westward towards his homeland. What he says almost amounts to a rebuke of the river-god for failing to answer Peleus' prayer.

144 άλλως: 'otherwise than has turned out to be the case', and so 'in vain', a sense which is common in Attic literature (cf. A); cf. Od. 14.124.

146-8 For sacrifices to a river or spring see on 21.131.

147 Evopxa: 'uncastrated', only here in Homer. This form of the epithet recurs in Hippocrates (Vict. 2.49); Evopxns is the usual form. bT explain its use here as connected with the idea of water as a generative element.

148 is $\pi\eta\gamma\delta$: Leaf takes $\pi\eta\gamma\delta$ s as meaning 'waters' here, because the sources of the river lie outside Phthie. But the springs seem the most suitable place for an altar and precinct. The sacrifice could have involved lowering the sheep into the water (cf. 21.132), or alternatively letting the blood flow into it: cf. for example Hor. C. 3.13.6–8.

δθι τοι τέμενος βωμός τε θυήεις: cf. 8.48 and on 8.47-8 ad fin., Od. 8.363 Ένθα δέ ol τέμενος βωμός τε θυήεις.

150 = 18.101. This use of $v\bar{v}v \delta t$, to contrast reality with what might have been, is typical of Akhilleus: see on 18.88.

151 $\delta \pi \Delta \sigma \alpha \mu u$: 'I should like to give', an example of the optative expressing a wish.

152-3 Akhilleus places his lock of hair in the hands of Patroklos, a particularly touching gesture.

153-4 These verses resemble 108-9: lamentation is connected with the idea of dawn or sunset in each case.

154-91 Akhilleus tells Agamemnon to send the rest of the army away to eat, while the close associates of Patroklos prepare the pyre. The preparations are described: they include the slaughtering of sheep and cattle, the offering of honey and oil, and the sacrifice of four horses, two dogs, and twelve Trojan captives. Akhilleus lights the pyre, and bids Patroklos farewell, saying that h will give Hektor's body to be eaten by dogs. But the body of Hektor is preserved by Aphrodite and Apollo

۰,

r

154-5 Verse 154 = Od. 16.220, 21.226. This verse occurs only here in the lliad, but for the sense of 154-5 cf. 24.713-15.

155-60 Pap. 12 differs considerably here from the standard text: for details see West, Ptolemaic Papyri 148, 176-9.

155 'Αγαμέμνονι είπε παραστάς: Aristarchus (Arn/A) seems to have read 'Αγαμέμνονα, and pap. 12 appears to read 'Αγαμέμ/νονα ώς προσέε[ιπεν.

156-60 Cf. the advice of Odysseus to Akhilleus that the Greeks should eat before fighting at 19.155-72, especially 171-2 άλλ' άγε λαόν μέν σκέδασον καl δείπνον άνωχθι | δπλεσθαι, echoed here at 158-9.

157-8 γοοῖο μέν ἔστι καὶ ἄσαι, | νῦν δ' ...: the construction with μέν and δέ suggests the meaning 'one can certainly (καl) have one's fill of mourning, if one likes: but 'for the moment ...'

160 κήδεος: apparently an adjective meaning 'to be cared for', or in this context 'to be mourned'; cf. κήδος, κήδιστος, κηδέμων. This form occurs nowhere else, but κήδειος is used at 19.294 (see comment). There seems to have been an alternative ancient view that the word was the genitive of κήδος, meaning 'an object of care': cf. schol. A 160a¹, and Erbse on 160d.

ol τ' dyol is the reading of most of our manuscripts and of Dionysius Thrax, but some read ol $\tau \alpha \gamma ol$ with Aristarchus (Hrd/A). $\tau \alpha \gamma \delta s$ ('leader') occurs nowhere else in Homer, but it is used by the tragedians (always $\tau \alpha \gamma \delta s$, except A. Eu. 296 $\tau \alpha \gamma o \sigma \chi \sigma s$), and survived in several dialects. C. M. Bowra (JHS 54 (1934) 56-7) and Ruijgh ($\tau \epsilon \ \ell piqu$ §348) both argued that $\tau \alpha \gamma ol$ is the correct reading here. The short alpha is morphologically correct, and it is understandable that the rare word should have been changed to the commoner epic one $\alpha \gamma \delta s$, so they may well be right.

162 Pap. 12 adds the unnecessary verse κάπνισσάν τε κατά κλισίας και δείπνον έλοντο (=2.399), a typical 'concordance interpolation', as also after 165.

163 Kŋδέμονες: 'kinsmen', and more specifically here those who have the kñδos of attending to the funeral. It occurs only here and at 674 in Homer. In later Greek it refers to anyone who takes care of someone or something, hence a protector or guardian.

164 ExcriptionEdov: only here in early epic; cf. Pindar (1. 6.22), etc. The pyre measured a hundred foot square, a vast size, equivalent to a $\pi \epsilon \lambda \epsilon \theta \rho \rho \nu$ (cf. 21.407 with comment). But the building at Lefkandi in Euboea, of the tenth century B.C., which the excavators believe to be a heroon for the warrior buried at its centre, measures 45 by 10 metres, and the mound which covered it was even larger: cf. M. Popham, E. Touloupa and L. H. Sackett, Antiquity 56 (1982) 169-74; see also on 245-8.

165 Pap. 12 adds another extra verse after this one: μύρ[1 δνείατα χερσιν άμησά[μενοι κατέθηκαν (with supplement by Blass).

166-76 The various objects added to the pyre are to some extent paralleled in the description of Akhilleus' own funeral at Od. 24.65-8. For the slaughter of many sheep and oxen (166-7) cf. Od. 24.65-6 πολλά δέ σ' άμφὶ | μῆλα κατεκτάνομεν μάλα πίονα καὶ Ἐλικας βοῦς. For the amphorae of honey and oil (170-1) cf. ibid. 67-8 καίεο δ' Ἐν τ' ἐσθῆτι θεῶν καὶ ἀλείφατι πολλῷ | καὶ μέλιτι γλυκερῷ.

When Odysseus summons up the ghosts he slaughters sheep so that they may drink the blood, and he also vows to sacrifice an ox and a sheep to Teiresias on his return home (Od. 11.29-37). In the funeral scenes it is not made clear whether the animals are intended as offerings for the dead man, or in order to help the body to burn, or both. The fact that Patroklos' corpse is covered in the fat suggests that the second motive is relevant here, although this does not rule out the first (cf. AbT 168, bT 169). Sheep and oxen are quite often found in Greek burials of the Bronze and early Iron Ages (Andronikos, Arch. Hom. w 87-91).

Likewise the honey and oil could be partly intended to help the fire (cf. T 170-1), but these liquids are also used as offerings to the dead (cf. Burkert, Religion 71-2, Stengel, Opferbräuche 183-6). In addition Akhilleus pours out wine continually as he calls on the soul of Patroklos, while the pyre burns (218-21). Similarly Odysseus pours a drink-offering to the ghosts, consisting of honey and milk ($\mu\epsilon\lambda i\kappa\rho\eta\tau\sigma\nu$), wine and water (Od. 11.26-8). Such $\chio\alpha l$ were sometimes called $\mu\epsilon i\lambda i\kappa\tau\eta\rho\alpha$ or $\mu\epsilon i\lambda ly\mu\alpha\tau\alpha$, i.e. propitiatory offerings. Again, they were often made at funerals in the Bronze and early Iron Ages, although the evidence is less easy to assess (Andronikos, Arch. Hom. w 91-7).

Akhilleus also sets on the pyre four horses and two dogs, and he adds the bodies of twelve Trojan captives, whom he first kills (171-6). The other funeral scenes in Homer offer no parallel for any of these. The horses and dogs are prize possessions and close companions of the Homeric hero, and they may be intended to accompany Patroklos' soul to Hades (for this idea cf. for example Lucian, De luctu 14). The captives have already been mentioned several times: after Patroklos' death Akhilleus vowed to kill twelve Trojans because of his anger (18.336-7; cf. 23.22-3), and when he took them prisoner it was so that they should be a πowh for Patroklos' death, i.e. as a blood-payment (21.26-8). This makes it quite clear that his primary motive here is one of premeditated revenge.

The killing of horses and dogs, and probably also sometimes humans, did take place in the Bronze and early Iron Ages in Greece. The evidence for horses is now quite extensive, ranging from the early second millennium to the seventh century B.C. (cf. Andronikos, Arch. Hom. w 85-7). The most spectacular horse burials are those in the grandiose tombs of Salamis in Cyprus, of the eighth and seventh centuries, many of which contain one or more pairs of horses (or sometimes asses), usually together with a chariot or cart (cf. V. Karageorghis, Excavations in the Necropolis of Salamis, Nicosia 1967, 1, and Salamis in Cyprus, London 1969, 23-150). The burials in the great tenth-century tumulus at Lefkandi also include four horses (Antiquity 56 (1982) 171), and another burial in this cemetery contains two horses (Archaeological Reports for 1986-7, p. 13). An interesting survival of this practice in the sixth century B.C. is mentioned by Herodotus (6.103): Cimon son of Stesagoras was buried together with the horses with which he had won three Olympic victories.

Dogs are occasionally found in burials of these periods, along with other animals (Andronikos, Arch. Hom. w 87-91). For an example of horses and dogs buried together in a cemetery, although separate from human tombs, at Prinias in Crete, cf. G. Rizza, in Acts of the International Archaeological Symposium, 'The Relations between Cyprus and Crete' (Nicosia 1978) 294 7.

The evidence for the actual killing of humans is more debatable, but many archaeologists believe that some cases cannot be explained away (cf. Andronikos, Arch. Hom. w 82 4). Again one can now add to Andronikos' discussion the possible case of the woman whose body was found in the Lefkandi tumulus, near to the urn containing the ashes of a warrior. Such double burials are found elsewhere in Cyprus, Crete and mainland Greece in this period (cf. also H. Catling, 'Heroes returned', in Festschrift for Emily Vermeule, forthcoming). It is significant that this warrior burial at Lefkandi shows a number of Homeric features together: cremation and the remains of a pyre, the horses, and the fact that as well as the warrior's bones the urn contained a decorated linen cloth (Antiquity 56 (1982) 172 3). Likewise at Salamis the dead are cremated, the bones are sometimes wrapped in a cloth and placed in a cauldron, and large amphorae are found which were thought to have held oil or honey: one of them had an inscription identifying its contents as olive oil (Karageorghis, Salamis in Cyprus 26 -7, 71). In the dromos of another tomb were found human skeletons, which the excavators believed were probably killed at the time of the funeral (ibid. 30-1). Some scholars have thought that such Homeric features at Salamis and elsewhere in the eighth and seventh centuries could be explained as due to the influence of epic poetry (e.g. Coldstream, Geometric Greece 349-52). However, because of its earlier date the evidence of Lefkandi throws doubt on this theory. It seems more likely that the poet of the Iliad was aware that such practices existed in life, whether in the heroic past or (more probably) in recent times. See also D. D. Hughes, Human Sacrifice in Ancient Greece, London 1991.

Human sacrifice was a remarkably common theme of Greek mythology at all times (cf. A. Henrichs, Entretiens Hardt xxvII (Vandœuvres-Genève 1981) 195-235). But the most striking aspect of the funeral of Patroklos is that all these elements, the slaughter of horses, dogs and human captives, are unique in the Homeric poems. The poet, it seems, is trying to portrav a funeral of a special kind, and the excesses of destruction in which Akhilleus indulges are above all a demonstration of his intense grief at Patroklos' loss.

166 = 9.466. See on 23.30-4.

167-9 Verse 167 resembles 24.622 σφάξ' έταροι δ' έδερόν τε καὶ ἄμφεπον, in the description of the preparations for a meal. Here the covering of Patroklos' corpse with fat also resembles the way in which the bones are wrapped in fat in a sacrifice to the gods. After the cremation this is what will happen to Patroklos' bones (243-4, 252-3). μ εγάθυμος 'Αχιλλεύς in 168 is unusual for πόδος ώκύς 'A., to avoid repetition with ές πόδος (16 297-300n.).

169 For | is πόδας in Kipaling cf. 18.353, and 16.640n. δρατός for δαρτός (cf. Choerilus 4.5, etc.), meaning 'skinned', occurs only here. There was an ancient variant δρετά (Did, Arn/A).

170-1 Leaf observes that $\pi p \delta_5 \lambda k \chi \epsilon \alpha \kappa \lambda k v \omega \nu$ suggests the type of pointed amphora which could be propped against something or stuck in the ground, and that the practice survived in the Attic funeral $\lambda \eta \kappa \nu \theta \delta_0$ which were placed round the bier of the dead. Pointed amphorae, however, belong to a later period than the eighth century B.C. (cf. Kurtz and Boardman, Bunal Customs 102-5).

π7π πίσυρας δ' έρισύχευας Ιππους: the horse burials of the late Bronze and early Iron Ages are often pairs, or multiples of pairs, suitable for a chariot or cart. For actual four-horse chariots see 11.699 and perhaps 8.185.

173 $\tau \bar{\varphi} \gamma \epsilon$ évort could in theory refer to either Patroklos or Akhilleus. Eustathius (1294.18) thought Akhilleus was the owner, as he is the subject throughout this passage, but it seems more appropriate that they should have belonged to Patroklos. For $\tau \rho \alpha \pi \epsilon \zeta \eta \epsilon \varsigma$ wives see on 22.69.

176 For χαλκῷ δηϊόων cf. 17.566, and for κακά δέ φρεσι μήδετο έργα 21.19. There too it refers to great slaughter, although it is odd that here the phrase follows rather than precedes the act of destruction. Clearly attention is being drawn to the exceptional savagery of this action, even if we cannot necessarily take this as implying direct moral condemnation by the poet: cf. 7.478 where Zeus himself κακά μήδετο, and see on 22.395.

277 έν δὲ πυρὸς μένος ῆκε σιδήρεον: the epithet σιδήρεος suggests destructiveness and relentless force (cf. the metaphorical uses of this and σιδήρειος at 17.424, 22.357, 24.205, 24.521). Notice the juxtaposition of comparisons at 20.372 εl πυρί χείρας έοικε, μένος δ' αίθωνι σιδήρω. Eustathius (1294.29) observes that there is an exchange of images (ἀνταπόδοσις) at 177, since the metaphor of fire is often applied to fighting.

δφρα νέμοιτο: 'so that it might spread', but with the associated idea of feeding as in 182. See on 2.780 ώς εί τε πυρί χθών πάσα νέμοιτο, and cf. Hdt. 5.101 τὸ πῦρ ἐπενέμετο τὸ ἀστυ πᾶν.

• ;

179-83 See on 19-23, which Akhilleus echoes here (179 = 19). At 180 most MSS read τελέω τὰ πάροιθεν as at 20, but pap. 12 and a minority of medieval texts have τετελεσμένα ώσπερ, and this is mentioned as a variant by A. Some modern scholars prefer this reading (cf. Wilamowitz, IuH 73 n. 1, Leaf ad loc.). But part of Akhilleus' purpose is still unfulfilled (cf. 182-3 with 21), and there is no reason why one should not keep τελέω and treat it as either a future tense, or more probably a present. Cf. Mazon, REA 13 (1940) 258-9.

182-3 Pap. 12 reads:

τούς ἄμα σοι πάντας πῦρ ἀμφέπει, "Εκτορα δ' οὐχί τόνδε γὰρ οὐ δώσω πυρὶ καεμεν, ἀλλὰ κύνεσσιν ὡμησταῖς φαγέειν· τοσὰ γὰρ κάκ' ἐμήσατ' Ἀχαιούς.

This removes the powerful metaphor of $\pi \tilde{\nu} \rho$ looks, and 183 was probably also altered to remove the effective zeugma in the use of $\delta \sigma \pi \tau \ell \mu \nu$. The extra verse has a typically weak ending (cf. 22.392a).

Neither $\ell o \theta l \epsilon v$ nor $\delta \alpha \pi \tau \epsilon v$ is used elsewhere in Homer in this metaphorical sense. Cf. Virgil, A n. 2.758 ignis edax, 4.66 est mollus flamma medullas, with O. Lyne, Words and the Poet (Oxford 1989) 51-6.

184-91 Aphrodite keeps the dogs from harming Hektor's body, and anoints it with oil to protect it from mutilation, and Apollo covers it with a dark cloud so that the sun will not shrivel the flesh. The two main protecting deities of Troy intervene here, Aphrodite being given the task of anointing the body as one more suited to a female deity (cf. T 186). The passage is echoed at 24.18-21, where Apollo alone protects the corpse with the aegis (187 \sim 24.21), and at 24.418-23. Cf. also 16.666-83 (Apollo's care for Sarpedon's body), 19.23-39 where Thetis protects Patroklos' corpse from flies and decay, pouring ambrosia and nectar into the nostrils, and 18.351 where the wounds are filled with ointment by Akhilleus' companions. These passages have been taken as evidence for Greek knowledge of the practice of embalming: see also on 7.85, 19.29-39.

This is the first clear sign that the gods are concerned about the fate of Hektor's body, and it foreshadows the events of book 24, with the allusion to the dragging of the corpse and the use of $\pi \rho i v$ in 190, which implies that ultimately the body will be buried. The poet is reminding us that, as so often, Akhilleus' intentions will not be fulfilled, and he also keeps before us the contrast between the fates of Patroklos' and Hektor's bodies.

184 αμφεπένοντο: 'tended'; see on 21.203.

186 harra kal viktas: a slightly unusual expression, as elsewhere (except at Od. 10.142 bio τ^{*} harra kal bio viktas) night comes first (5× 11., 8× Od.). The order is presumably dictated here by metre, i.e. the position of the phrase at the beginning of the verse.

• •

 $po\delta \delta \epsilon v \tau i \dots \epsilon \lambda \alpha i \omega$: 'oil of roses', later called $po\delta i v \delta v$ (cf. Arn/AT 186). The epithet occurs only here in early epic (cf. Bacchylides 15.34, etc.), and $p\delta \delta \delta v$ first in HyDem 6, but compare the Homeric $po\delta \delta \delta \delta \kappa \tau v \lambda o s$. Pausanias (9.41.7) says that oil of roses was used as a medicine and also for preserving wooden statues.

187 άποδρύφοι: 'lacerate', apparently an aorist form of ἀποδρύπτω. The compound verb occurs only here and in the parallel verse 24.21 in ll, but $3 \times Od$. Ελκυστάζειν occurs nowhere else except in these two verses.

188 κυάνεον νέφος: cf. 16.66 κυάνεον Τρώων νέφος as a metaphor.

188-91 The dark cloud with which Apollo covers the immediate area of the body is a rather unusual idea, perhaps similar to the cloud or mist which gods use to hide or rescue their favourites (cf. 3.380f. etc.).

191 'Should wither the flesh all around on the sinews and limbs.' $\sigma\kappa\eta\lambda\epsilon$ i' is a orist optative of $\sigma\kappa\epsilon\lambda\lambda\omega$, a vivid verb which occurs only here in early epic; cf. A. Pr. 481 κατεσκέλλοντο (of men wasting away through lack of medicines), etc. It is related to $\sigma\kappa\epsilon\lambda\epsilon\tau\delta\varsigma$, $\sigma\kappa\lambda\eta\rho\delta\varsigma$, etc.; cf. Chantraine, Dict. s.v. $\sigma\kappa\epsilon\lambda\lambda\omega\omega$. The hiatus before lves recurs at Od. 11.219, and it probably had an initial digamma; cf. Chantraine, Dict. s.v. Is 2.

192–225 When the pyre fails to burn Akhilleus prays to Boreas and Zephuros, and Iris goes to summon them. She finds the Winds feasting in the home of Zephuros and gives them Akhilleus' message. They cross the sea to Troy and fall upon the pyre, setting it ablaze. All night it burns, and Akhilleus continually pours usine on the ground, calling on the spirit of Patroklos with constant lamentation

This episode in which the Winds are summoned is a curious one. We have just heard of the care of Aphrodite and Apollo for the body of Hektor, which prevents Akhilleus' intention from being fulfilled. The failure of the pyre to burn is another check, and this in turn leads to further divine action. But the intervention of Iris of her own accord is unusual (cf. 3.121 where she comes unbidden to Helen), and it seems to be designed, like the episode as a whole, to give added importance to the whole narrative of the funeral. At the same time, Iris' visit to the Winds develops a momentum of its own, and forms an interlude in the action on earth, which is a relief after the intensity of what has preceded and a contrast with the picture of Akhilleus as he moves restlessly to and fro throughout the following night (cf. Wilamowitz, luH 114). There seems to be no need here to invoke the theory of Kakridis (Researches 75-83), that the scene is modelled on one in a poem about Akhilleus' own funeral, where the Winds might be unwilling to come because of their grief at the death of Memnon their brother, and so they must be summoned.

The form of Iris' visit to the Winds (198-212) is also untypical, when compared with other scenes describing a messenger's journey or a visit. Normally she brings a message from a god to other gods or to mortals, whereas here she brings a request from a mortal to gods (cf. Arend, Scenen 58). This surely underlines the importance of Akhilleus: he is the only mortal who could evoke such a response. Iris' visit is most closely comparable with that of Patroklos to Nestor at t t.644ff. There too Patroklos refuses Nestor's offer of a seat (648 ov χ δo_{5} $\delta \sigma t$ ~ 23.205), because of the urgency of the situation; cf. also 6.360, where Hektor refuses Helen's offer of a seat.

۰.

t

Many readers have seen a touch of comedy in the portrayal of the Winds' party, and the eagerness of all of them to have Iris sitting beside them (202-3; cf. already T 203), although Kakridis protested that they are only showing proper epic courtesy (Researches 76-7, and cf. Homer Revisited (Lund 1971) 15). Iris' excuse, that she is going to join the other gods in the land of the Aithiopes, sounds very like a 'white lie' invented on the spur of the moment: this was already the view of some ancient scholars (bT 206a). L. Coventry, JHS 107 (1987) 178-80, suggests that it also contributes to the sense of the gods' detachment from the world of men (cf. bT 206b, Eust. 1296.25ff.).

Whatever the poet may have had in mind, the scene has an almost baroque quality to it. One thinks of Hellenistic poetry, Callimachus' Lock of Berenice for example, in which Zephuros also plays a part.

193 ένθ' αὐτ' ἄλλ' ἐνόησε: see on 140.

294 Cf. 1.35 πολλά δ' ξπειτ' άπάνευθε κιών ήρᾶθ' δ γεραιός, Od. 2.260-1 Τηλέμαχος δ' άπάνευθε κιών ... εύχετ' 'Αθήνη, etc. See on 1.35-6.

195 For Bopéŋ καl Ζεφύρω cf. 9.5 (with comment) Bopéŋs καl Ζέφυρος, τώ τε Θρήκηθεν άητον. Here too these Winds seem to have their home in Thrace (229-30). The imperfect ὑπίσχετο goes better here with the imperfects in 194 and 196 than the variant ὑπέσχετο, which is read by pap. 12 and some medieval MSS.

After 195 and 209 pap. 12 adds the verse apvair mparoyovar péfeir kheithr katophyn, which occurs at 4.102, 4.120, and 23.864, 23.873, always in the context of prayers to Apollo by archers.

196 Pap. 12 reads πολλά δ' ἀποσπένδων ἡράσατο δῖος Ἀχιλλεύς, a very weak variant, with unnecessary repetition of the formula for Akhilleus after 193. Akhilleus' golden cup is paralleled at 219 by his golden krater. Cf. the very special libation vessel which he uses at 16.220-32.

197 $\phi\lambda\epsilon\gamma\epsilon\Theta$ olarto vexpol: most MSS read vexpóv, which would make the verb middle instead of passive, and van der Valk supports this, since attention is focused on Patroklos rather than the dead Trojans (Researches 11 581). It looks as if there was another ancient variant vexpós, as Euphorion apparently used $\phi\lambda\epsilon\gamma\epsilon\Theta$ olarto as a singular (T 197b with Erbse's comments).

198 UAN TE OEVOITO was Aristarchus' reading (Did/A), against the variant

 $\ddot{\nu}\lambda\eta\nu$ τε σεύαιντο (sc. ανεμοι), which probably went with the reading νεκρόν in 197. ὦκα δὲ Ίρις was conjectured by Bentley for the vulgate reading ὠκέα δ' Ίρις, and it is in fact read by pap. 12. The vulgate text probably arose from the common formula ὠκέα Ἱρις at the end of the line (18× 11.), and the papyrus reading, which respects the digamma of Ἱρις and gives the adverb ὦκα, is clearly better (pace Leaf).

199 Pap. 12 reads evcults instead of draw. For metally shows see on 15.143-5.

200–1 For the feasting of the Winds cf. Aiolos' family and their perpetual banqueting (Od. 10.8-11, 10.60-1).

200 Zeqúpolo δυσαέος ... $\bar{e}v\delta ov$: i.e. in the house of Zephuros; cf. 20.13 Διός $\bar{e}v\delta ov$. Zephuros is normally a stormy wind in Homer: cf. Od. 5.295 Ζέφυρός τε δυσαής, 12.289 Ζεφύροιο δυσαέος. For δυσαής cf. also II. 5.865.

201-2 ἐπέστη | βηλῷ ἐπὶ λιθέω: crossing or stepping on a threshold is often a way of expressing entry to a house in epic scenes of this type (e.g. Od. 1.680 etc.; see Richardson on HyDem 188); but usually the word for threshold is οὐδός rather than βηλός. The latter also occurs at 1.591 and 15.23, in both cases of the threshold of heaven from which gods were thrown by Zeus, and nowhere else in early epic. Later allegorists misinterpreted it as a word for heaven or part of the heavens (cf. AbT 1.591c, with Erbse's comments). Quintus of Smyrna has βηλὸν ἐς ἀστερόεντα (13.483) in a passage about winds stirring up the sea (NB: 482 δυσαέος).

202-3 The welcome of the Winds again follows a typical form for divine visits: cf. 1.533-4 (n.) θεοὶ δ' ἀμα πάντες ἀνέσταν | ἐξ ἐδέων σφοῦ πατρὸς ἐναντίον (of Zeus), 15.85-6 οἱ δὲ ἰδόντες | πάντας ἀνήῦξαν καὶ δεικανόωντο δέπασσιν (of Here), HyAp 3-4 καὶ ῥά τ' ἀναῖσσουσιν ἐπὶ σχεδὸν ἐρχομένοιο | πάντες ἀφ' ἐδράων. Here however κάλεόν τέ μιν εἰς ἑ ἑκαστος is a specific touch. Alcaeus made Zephuros the lover of Iris, and Eros their child (fr. 327 L-P): cf. Erbse on T 203. Later tradition saw Iris as ἐρωτική (bT 5.353, Eust. 555.30). T adds that the Winds are perhaps rather drunk (cf. T 15.86), which suits their boisterous behaviour!

204-5 Cf. 11.647-8 Πάτροκλος δ' ετέρωθεν άναίνετο, είπέ τε μῦθον Ι ούχ εδος έστί, γεραιε διοτρεφές, οὐδέ με πείσεις.

205-7 If this is supposed to be a subterfuge, as seems most likely, it is similar to the false pretexts offered by Here to Aphrodite and Zeus, when she says that she is going to visit Okeanos and Tethus (14.200-10, 301-11). For the visit to the Aithiopes cf. 1.423-4 and Od. 1.22-6 (with West's comments, Od. p. 75).

205–6 For $i\pi$ ' Ω keavoid péedra cf. 3.5 $i\pi$ ' ' Ω keavoid poaw, which a few MSS read here. Elsewhere we find $a\pi$ '/ $\pi \alpha \rho$ ' ' Ω keavoid poaw, 19.1, Od. 22.197. For is yaian the city texts read is different (Did/AT).

208-10 These verses recall the wording of 194-8. For Ζέφυρον κελαδεινόν

193

('resounding') cf. Od. 2.421 ἀκραῆ Ζέφυρον, κελάδοντ' ξπl οίνοπα πόντον, and their effect here at 212-18.

212-16 The Winds respond at once to Iris' request, and there is a vivid description of their turbulent journey and dramatic arrival. The poet does not give them the kind of brief speech of acceptance which would be usual after divine requests of this kind: their reaction is immediate.

212–13 Cf. 12.251–2, 13. 833–4 ds ara fundas flytoato tol d' du' épone |flyt des tol 1 ...

213 viộta khoviov te πάροιθεν: the winds 'drive' the clouds before them; cf. 11.305 ώς όπότε Ζέφυρος viộta στυφελίξη, 12.157 ας τ' άνεμος ζαής, việta σκιδεντα δονήσας, and 20.492 πάντη τε κλονέων άνεμος φλόγα είλυφάζει. Eustathius comments that the image is a military one here and at 217 φλόγ' Εβαλλον (1296.32ff.).

arg πόντον iκανον ἀήμεναι: 'they reached the sea so as to blow on it'. Presumably the infinitive here is a development from phrases such as $\beta\tilde{\eta}$ δ' léven etc., where the beginning of an action is described: cf. Od. 3.176 ῶρτο δ' ἐπὶ λιγὺς οὖρος ἀήμεναι.

215-16 For 215 cf. 13.590 $\pi voit$ \tilde{y} vot, 18.67 Tpol ηv $tpl<math>\beta \omega \lambda ov$ lkovto. $\theta to \pi v \delta ds \pi v \rho$ occurs $\gamma \times II.$, $v \times Od$. Here the fire is caused by a separate divine agency, but fire was in any case divine. There is an interesting parallel to this god-sent wind in the description of the tenth-century A.D. cremation of a Scandinavian chieftain on the Volga (C. Waddy and H. L. Lorimer, Antiquity 8 (1934) 62): when the pyre was lit, 'an awe-inspiring gale got up, so that the flames of the fire grew stronger and its blaze fiercer'. Then one of the spectators said 'out of love for him, his Lord has sent the wind to take him away this very hour'.

217-25 The repetition of $\pi\alpha\nu\nu\nu\chi_{101}$... $\pi\dot{\alpha}\nu\nu\chi_{05}$ gives added intensity to this scene: against the background of this howling tempest, and before the crackling flames of the pyre, we see Akhilleus slowly moving to and for throughout the whole night, constantly pouring wine upon the ground and calling on Patroklos' soul, his inconsolable grief being compared to that of a father who has lost his newly married son.

BI7 Δμυδις φλόγ' έβαλλον: 'beat upon the flame together' ('as though the blasts were missiles', comments Monro).

ax8 $\lambda_1\gamma_2 \omega_3$ always occurs in this place in the verse, except at 3.214 (2× Il., 4× Od.). It usually qualifies the verb $\kappa\lambda\alpha_1 \omega_3$, but cf. $\lambda_1\gamma_2 \omega_3$ $\Delta_2 \omega_3$ (3× Il., 1× Od.) etc. $\omega_3 \omega_3$ 'Ax $\lambda_1\lambda_2 \omega_3$ is a good instance of a purely formular use of the epithet.

a19-20 For | χρυσέου έκ κρητήρος cf. HyAphr 206. έλών δέπας άμφικύπελλον | occurs at 9.656; cf. Od. 8.89 | και δέπας άμφικύπελλον έλών. Here, however, most MSS and pap. 12 read έχων (also Did/A as a variant), which is clearly preferable, since Akhilleus' action is continuous. For the same reason the present dougoduevos in 220 is better than the variant dougoduevos. Cf. 3.295-6 olvov 5' kk kpnthpos dougoduevoi dendergoiv | exter, where again dougoduevoi is a variant (as at 10.579). For the rest of 220 cf. 7.480 olvov 5' kk dendergoi xauddis xéov, and deve be yaïav | 13.655 = 21.119, Od. 9.290.

• 1

391 For ψυχήν ... Πατροκλήος δειλοΐο cf. 65, 105-6. Pap. 12 reads κικλήσκων ψυχήν Πατρόκλου τεθνηῶτος, but the verse opens much more effectively with the single spondaic word ψυχήν, and the reading of the end of the verse in pap. 12 probably derives from 192. Arn/AT observe that 221 is wholly spondaic. It is a very solemn four-word verse, appropriate to the invocation which accompanies a libation (σπονδή). On such spondaic verses and their associations cf. Edwards, HPI 118-19, West, Greek Metre 55-6, L. P. Wilkinson, Golden Latin Artistry (Cambridge 1966) 60-1. Leaf objects that 'the original forms were certainly Πατροκλέρεος and possibly δρεελοΐο', and so it is wrong to see any special effect here: but we have no grounds for assuming that the words were still pronounced in this way at the time of composition of the Iliad. Other examples of wholly spondaic verses are 2.544, 11.130, Od. 15.334, 21.15, 22.175, 22.192. In general see D. W. Pye, G&TR 11 (1964) 2-6. On the libation of wine to the dead cf. Stengel, Opferbräuche 183-6 and see on 166-76.

222-5. This is the last of a whole series of similes scattered throughout the poem in which the theme of parents and children is applied to Akhilleus or Patroklos, or as here to both together: cf. especially 16.7-11 (with comment) where they are like a mother and daughter, and 18.918-23 where Akhilleus' grief for Patroklos is like that of a lion which has lost its cubs, and see the analysis by Moulton, Similes 99-106. Moulton (106) comments that 'it is of course part of Achilles' sorrow that he has failed in his promise to Menoitios, and that he cannot restore the son to the father (cf. 18.324-7)'; and of the simile 'the vehicle fits no one more than the Priam of book 24, in whose grief for a married son there will be, paradoxically, a ground for a new understanding and humane respect on the part of the sorrowing hero'. This potential link with the theme of Priam's loss of so many sons, and the funeral of Hektor at the end of the Iliad, is surely significant. Cf. Griffin, HLD 123: 'the bereaved father is a dominant figure in the plot from Chryses to Priam, who appeals to Achilles in the name of another tragic father, Peleus; it seems natural to compare Achilles' grief for Patroclus (23.222) with that of a father mourning for his son'. See also on 22.44.

Here the pathos is increased by the fact that the son was vúµ$105, i.e. recently married but without a son of his own, as the father is thus deprived of two hopes at once (cf. bT 222-3, Eust, 1296.52).

The four verses are composed of two balanced couplets, in which 224 parallels 222 unusually closely: ώς δὲ πατὴρ οὖ παιδὸς ὀδύρεται ὀστέα καίων]... ὡς Ἀχιλεὺς ἐτάροιο ὀδύρετο ὀστέα καίων.

222 ώς δὲ πατήρ οὖ παιδός: cf. 9.481 ὡς εἴ τε πατήρ ὃν παῖδα φιλήση. But such a comparison is much commoner in the Odyssey: cf. 1.307-8, 2.47 (etc.), 16.17, 17.111, 17.397, and Moulton, Similes 141-5.

223 $\nu\nu\mu\phi$ iou: only here in Il.; cf. Od. 7.64–6, where it refers to someone who had died without leaving a son, although he has produced a daughter (cf. AbT 223). After this verse pap. 12 adds $\chi\eta\rho\omega\sigma\epsilon\nu$ dè $\gamma\nu\nu\alpha$ ika $\mu\nu\chi\tilde{\omega}$ $\theta\alpha\lambda\dot{\alpha}\mu$ 010 $\nu\dot{\epsilon}010$ | $\dot{\alpha}\rho\eta\tau\dot{o}\nu$ dè $\tau 0\kappa\epsilon$ $\tilde{\nu}01$ $\chi\dot{o}0\nu$ kai $\pi\dot{\epsilon}\nu\theta_{05}$ $\dot{\epsilon}\theta\eta\kappa\epsilon\nu$, which are adapted from 17.36–7. Plutarch (Mor. 117D) follows 223 with the second of these verses, and then adds $\mu 0 \tilde{\nu} \nu_{05} \tau\eta\lambda\dot{\nu}\gamma\epsilon\tau_{05} \tau_{05}\lambda_{0}\tilde{\epsilon}\sigma_{11}$ kteáteori, which is derived from 9.482 (where $481 \sim 23.222$). It is natural that this simile should have suffered such expansion for emotional effect.

223-4 όδύρετο ... στεναχίζων: cf. Od. 13.219-21 ό δ' όδύρετο πατρίδα γαΐαν |'έρπύζων παρὰ θΐνα ... | πόλλ' όλοφυρόμενος. 'έρπύζων evidently expresses the weary movement of a broken-hearted man' (Leaf; cf. bT 225). It is only used here in II, and once elsewhere in Od., of the aged Laertes (1.193); it recurs in Hellenistic and later verse. The present participles which frame the verse emphasize Akhilleus' continual sorrow and its physical expression.

226–61 At dawn the fire dies down, the Winds return home, and Akhilleus falls asleep exhausted. He is woken by the gathering of the leaders, and tells them to quench the pyre, collect Patroklos' bones, and build a mound: this will be enlarged after his own death, to cover both of them. They do as he orders, and he then makes the army sit down and brings out prizes for the contests

This scene, marking the end of the funeral and transition to the games, is paralleled by the conclusion of Hektor's funeral (24.788-803), where the people gather at dawn to quench the pyre with wine (791-2 ~ 23.250-1), and collect the bones, which are placed in a gold $\lambda \dot{\alpha} \rho \nu \alpha \xi$, wrapped in purple robes, and put into a grave, which is then covered by a layer of great stones and a mound (801 ~ 23.257). But it is striking how much variety there is in the language and ritual details of the two passages, and here our attention is focused especially on the rôle of Akhilleus. Cf. also 7.433-6 where the Achaeans gather at dawn to build a mound over their dead. At Od. 24.71-92 Akhilleus' own funeral concludes at dawn: his bones are collected, placed in wine and oil, and laid in a gold amphora together with those of Patroklos, and over them and Antilokhos' remains a great mound is built. Thetis then institutes funeral games in his honour.

226-8 The description of Dawn's arrival is unusually elaborate, with the mention of the morning-star as its harbinger (cf. Od. 13.93-4): see on 109 and 2.48-9, and cf. Wilamowitz, luH 114: 'Dawn comes in its eternal beauty, unconcerned for the tears of the mortals, who have not been refreshed by the night.'

236 $\frac{1}{2}$ $\frac{1}{2}$

227 Saffron-robed Dawn spreading over the sea (cf. 24.12-13) does not mean that the sun seems to rise from the sea, and cannot imply a poet who lives on an east coast as some have argued. As Leaf says, 'the dawn spreads over the sea to any observer on the shore, whether he looks N., E., S., or W.'; cf. Wilamowitz, IuH 508-9.

228 Cf. 9.212 αὐτὰρ ἐπεί κατὰ πῦρ ἑκάη καὶ φλόξ ἑμαράνθη (in a description of cooking).

229-30 For the home of these Winds see on 195, and for olduori ouw see on 21.234. Verse 229 is a rising threefolder.

231-5 Cf. 62-4 where Akhilleus falls asleep, exhausted after the pursuit of Hektor. To fall asleep at dawn is a reversal of normality, and Akhilleus' unquiet sleep is soon broken.

231-2 Verse 231 is again a rising threefolder. For $t\pi i$ δt yroking invog $\delta pourse of$. Od. 23.342-3 (and see on $\delta 2$).

233 ol δ' άμφ' Άτρείωνα: i.e. 'Agamemnon and his companions'; see on 3.146-8.

234-5 Cf. 9.573 Tŵv ốề táx' ảµột πύλας ὅµαδος καὶ δοῦπος ὁpŵpei, and Od. 10.556-7 κινυμένων δ' ἐτάρων ὅµαδον καὶ δοῦπον ἀκούσας | ἑξαπίνης ἀνόρουσε (of Elpenor's sudden awakening). For | ἑζετο δ' ὀρθωθείς cf. 2.42, with comment.

236 = 7.327, 7.385. Pap. 12 reads άλλοι έϋκνήμιδες Άχαιοί, as at 272 = 658.

237-8 It has been thought that quenching the pyre with wine may be archaeologically attested at Salamis in Cyprus and also on Ischia in the Geometric period: cf. Coldstream, Geometric Greece 349-50, P. Dikaios, Archä logischer Anzeiger (1963) 154-5, G. Buchner, Expedition 8 (1966) 5-6. The unburnt vessels found at such burials may, however, have been used to pour a libation to the dead man after the body had been burnt.

Virgil imitates this passage at Aen. 6.226-7, perhaps describing a similar Roman ritual. Wine was certainly poured on the pyre or over the bones (cf. Cic. Leg. 2.24.60, Pliny, HN 14.88, Petr. 65 etc.).

• 1

239 Akhilleus tells the others to quench the pyre, but will himself help to collect the bones (so T).

240 εῦ διαγιγνώσκοντες: cf. 470 | εῦ διαγιγνώσκω, and in the burial of the Greeks and Trojans at 7.424 ἔνθα διαγνῶναι χαλεπῶς ῆν ἄνδρα ἐκαστον, where the bodies are hard to recognize because covered in blood and wounds.

άριφραδέα: elsewhere in Il. only at 326 ($5 \times Od$.). Notice how the language of this verse is echoed in the following episodes, as though it is in the poet's mind. Pap. 12 reads άριφραδέως γάρ έκειτο.

241-2 $\tan ||\xi| \pi \pi o | \pi \kappa d d v \delta pes; cf. 21.16, with comment. Pap. 12 reads avial <math>\pi \pi o | (cf. 13.684, 17.644).$

243-4 Cf. Patroklos' instructions to Akhilleus (80-91). Here the $\phi_1 d\lambda \eta$ is most probably a broad, shallow bowl (as in classical Greek), which is covered by fine linen (253) and kept in Akhilleus' hut until his death. Then their bones will be buried together in the oopo's mentioned at 91 (see comment). Cf. Andronikos, Arch. Hom. w 30, and see on 270. $\phi_1 d\lambda \eta$ only occurs in Homer in this book (4×), but is common later.

243 δίπλοκι δημῷ: a double layer of fat to protect the bones. Cf. δίπλαξ of a garment at 3.126 etc. At Od. 24.72-3 Akhilleus' bones are placed in 'unmixed wine and oil' before being buried in a golden amphora.

244 ἐγών Άίδι κεύθωμαι: the variant lών for ἐγών is mentioned by A, and Arn/AT say that Aristarchus read κλεύθωμαι, whilst pap. 12 reads the aorist κλεύσωμαι. κλεύθωμαι, explained as a syncopated form of κελεύθωμαι meaning 'journey', 'travel', recurs only in the lexicographers. These variants may have been designed to avoid the use of Άίδι in a local sense, unusual in Homer. The passive of κεύθω is also only found here in Homer, but the verb is used of burial at Od. 3.16 and later. Sophocles read κεύθωμαι, since he echoes the verse: Aj. 635 κρείσσων γὰρ Άιδα κεύθων ὁ νοσῶν μάταν, and Ant. 911 μητρός δ' ἐν Άιδου καὶ πατρός κεκευθότοιν (cf. also OT g68, A. Pr. 570 etc.). So we should keep the vulgate reading as in the OCT. For the idea cf. 22.482 Άιδαο δόμους ὑπὸ κεύθεσι γαίης.

245-8 The tumulus will cover the pyre (255-6), which itself is a hundred feet square (164). It is to be a small one to begin with, and at first a cenotaph (cf. Od. 1.289-92, 4.584), but later when both heroes' remains are buried in it the Achaeans will make it broader and higher. Cf. Od. 24.80-4, where the final construction is described. There it is a great mound on a promontory looking over the Hellespont, and a landmark visible from far out at sea (cf. similarly 7.84-90). The tumulus built over the Achaean dead at 7.435-6 would have been a large one, and compare for example 2.811-14 where a high hill is called by the gods the 'tomb of Murine': see on 2.813-14, 7.86 for actual tumuli in the area, and for the ancient identification of barrows near the Sigeion headland as the tombs of Akhilleus, Patroklos and Antilokhos.

• .

Andronikos (Arch. Hom. w 32-4) discusses these Homeric burial mounds, and (107-14) actual evidence for tumuli. Some of the most interesting examples from the Homeric point of view are found in northern Greece, at Halos and Vergina (Arch. Hom. w 112 and Lorimer, HM 108-10). At Halos a tumulus was erected in the eighth century B.C. over the site of sixteen pyres on which cremated human remains were found. 'Presumably they represent a family group over which the tumulus was raised when the direct line became extinct: no doubt each pyre was provisionally protected by a small mound' (Lorimer, ibid., comparing 23.245-8). At Vergina we find many tumuli dating from the tenth to seventh or sixth centuries B.C. which have a circular enclosure of unworked stones as a base: some are as large as twenty metres in diameter (Andronikos, Arch. Hom. w 112). Near Larisa two very large tumuli of the archaic period contained multiple graves, with warrior cremation burials, some in bronze vessels (AR 1980-1, p. 25). Such tumuli continued in use in northern Greece into the Hellenistic period. Similar ones of the classical period in Thrace (cf. Hdt. 5.8) are discussed by A. Petropoulou $(A7P \ 109 \ (1988) \ 493-5)$.

246 $\underline{k}\pi$ 16 $\underline{k}\pi$ 16 $\underline{k}\pi$ 16 $\underline{k}\pi$ 17 $\underline{k}\pi$ 17

247-8 $\dot{\epsilon}\mu\epsilon\bar{\iota}o$) $\delta\epsilon\dot{\iota}\tau\epsilon\rhooi$: 'after me'. This use of $\delta\epsilon\dot{\iota}\tau\epsilon\rhoos$ with a genitive occurs only here in epic; cf. Hdt. 1.23 etc. Akhilleus' reference to his own death is very objective (cf. bT 248: 'in a noble way he does not lament his death').

251 βαθεία δε κάππεσε τέφρη: 'where the ash had fallen deep'.

252 ἐτάροιο ἐνηέος: almost exclusively of Patroklos in Il.; cf. 17.204, 21.96 ἑταῖρον ... ἐνηέα, 17.670 ἐνηείης Πατροκλῆος, and once of Nestor at 23.648, just after a reference to Patroklos (see comment).

252–3 δστέα λευκά | άλλεγον: cf. 24.793 δστέα λευκά λέγοντο, and 21.321 άλλεξαι (of collecting bones).

254 For έν κλισίησι δὲ θέντες cf. 19.280 έν κλισίησι θέσαν, etc. Leaf prefers the variant reading of some MSS έν κλισίη δ' ένθέντες, but the generalizing plural κλισίαι is quite common (2.226-7 etc.). For έανῷ λιτὶ κάλυψαν | cf. 18.352 έν λεχέεσσι δὲ θέντες ἑανῷ λιτὶ κάλυψαν, where Patroklos' body is covered in fine linen, and 24.796 πορφυρέοις πέπλοισι καλύψαντες μαλακοῖσιν of Hektor's bones. On ἑανός ('supple' or 'fine') see 5.734n. At Salamis in Cyprus cremated bones have been found together with or actually wrapped in fine cloth, and at Lefkandi the warrior burial has its funerary amphora wrapped in cloth: see on 166-76. For other examples of this practice cf. Coldstream, Geometric Greece 196-7, 350 (the burials at the West Gate of Eretria, c. 700 B.C.), and Kurtz and Boardman, Burial Customs 53, 98-9, describing Geometric and later burials in Attica in which the urns or cremated remains (or both) are wrapped in cloth. In the one illustrated there (pl. 23) the ashes 'were gathered from the pyre into a purple cloth, placed in a bronze cauldron, which was itself wrapped in cloth. The urn lay in a wooden chest inside a stone box, which was buried beneath a built tomb.' A celebrated example is that of the magnificent purple and gold cloth found in the antechamber of the late fourth-century B.C. 'Royal Tomb' in the great tumulus at Vergina: this was wrapped around the cremated bones, in a gold larnax, and the similar cremation in the gold larnax inside the main chamber was also probably wrapped in cloth. Cf. M. Andronikos, Vergina: the Royal Tombs and th Ancient City (Athens 1984) 73, 170, 191-2, pls. 156-7.

199

A. Petropoulou, AJP 109 (1988) 482-95, discusses further examples from Thrace, Macedonia and Rhodes of cinerary urns of the classical period of gold or silver, some of which are covered by cloth, and argues that the $\kappa\lambda i\sigma lca$ referred to here is not Akhilleus' hut (as is usually supposed) but the actual tomb itself (as suggested by Düntzer and Thielscher). $\kappa\lambda i\sigma lca$ does not have this sense elsewhere in Homer, but she quotes some examples from Hellenistic and later epitaphs. The strongest point in her favour is 24.16, where Hektor's corpse is dragged round Patroklos' tomb ($\sigma \eta \mu \alpha$), which is odd if his bones are not there. But the lack of Homeric parallels makes it hard to take the word in this sense.

255-6 Finally they drew the circle ($\tau o \rho v \dot{\omega} \sigma \alpha v \tau o$) of the mound, and set up around the circumference of the pyre a base of stones, which they then covered with earth. The verb $\tau o \rho v o \ddot{\upsilon} \sigma \theta \alpha$ occurs only here in II., at Od. 5.249, and occasionally in late epic, but $\tau \dot{o} \rho v \sigma \varsigma$ is the common Greek word for a type of compass for marking a circle. For $\theta \epsilon \mu \epsilon i \lambda \alpha$ cf. 12.28, HyAp 254. On the tomb's construction see Andronikos, Arch. Hom. w 32, 107ff.

256 χυτήν έπ' γαΐαν έχευαν: the word χυτός is used in Homer only to refer to a burial mound (cf. Arn/A): cf. Od. 3.258 χυτήν έπ' γαΐαν έχευαν], Il. 6.464, 14.114 χυτή κατά γαΐα καλύπτοι/κάλυψε].

257 This verse is similar to 24.801 χεύαντες δέ τὸ σῆμα πάλιν κίον αὐτὰρ ἔπειτα (followed by the funeral feast). It has been objected that klov is an aorist form, and so there is an awkward transition here, as in fact the Greeks do not go away (cf. Leaf, Willcock). The poet may be using a regular phrase to describe the end of a burial.

place of the contest, and then the contest itself (cf. perhaps already Od. 8.259).

259–61 The general catalogue of prizes serves as the briefest introduction to the games, but by its richness of detail it marks the transition from the solemnity of the funeral rites to the more cheerful atmosphere of the following scenes.

Both Aristophanes and Aristarchus athetized these verses (Did/T). The scholia do not say why, although bT defend the use of $\nu\eta\omega\nu$ here to mean 'the place where the ships were', since the prizes were not kept in the ships themselves (cf. 564 οloεμέναι κλισίηθεν). Leaf suggests that they may have objected pedantically to the fact that horses, mules and oxen are mentioned, when only one of each is subsequently given as a prize, and to the application of ἕκφερε to such animals. We surely need an introductory passage at this point. Of the prizes actually mentioned later, some belong to Akhilleus (807–8, 826–9), others to Patroklos. Several have significant associations as spoils of the War. For their values see on 269, and in general cf. Laser, Arch. Hom. T 79–81.

259 For tripods as prizes cf. 11.700 (in Elis: cf. Olympia?), 22.164, Hes. Erga 657, with West's comment. The great series of tripods at Olympia and other sanctuaries, beginning in the ninth century, may have been dedications rather than prizes, although this is disputed: cf. M. Maass, Die geometrischen Dreifüsse von Olympia (Berlin 1978) 4, Fittschen, Sagendarstellungen 31. Fittschen lists depictions of contests for tripods in eighth- and seventhcentury art (Sagendarstellungen 28-30). In addition to tripods we find shields and horses, possibly as prizes, in some Geometric scenes of contests (Andronikos, Arch. Hom. w 124).

260–1 The phrase $i\pi\pi005$ (θ') ήμιόνους τε recurs 3× in book 24, but βοῶν ἴφθιμα κάρηνα is used only here in Homer: cf. HyHerm (4×); Il. 9.407 $i\pi\pi\omegav$ ξανθὰ κάρηνα J. Verse 261 = 9.366 (see comment).

262 897 The games

The games in honour of Patroklos consist of eight contests. By far the longest episode is the first, the chariot-race (262-652). It is followed by boxing (652-99), wrestling (700-39), running (740-97), armed combat (798-825), weight-throwing (826-49), archery (850-83), and spear-throwing (884-97).

In Nestor's reminiscences a shorter list of five contests is mentioned, boxing, wrestling, running, spear-throwing, and the chariot-race (634-42), and Akhilleus mentions the first four of these in his speech to Nestor (621-3). In the Phaeacian games for Odysseus the five events are running, wrestling, jumping, discus-throwing, and boxing (Od. 8.120-30), but Odysseus boasts to the Phaeacians of his skill in archery and spear-throwing (8.214-29). Thus all the contests in the games for Patroklos recur elsewhere in Homer except the armed duel, although some modern scholars actually believe this to be the event from which funeral games developed (cf. L. Malten, MDAI(R) 38 (1923) 300-40, K. Meuli, Die Antike 17 (1941) 189-208, and Der griechische Agon, Cologne 1968, 15-67).

201

Nestor's games were at the funeral of Amarunkeus (630-1). In book 11 he mentions a four-horse chariot which his father had entered for a race in Elis, but does not specify whether this was at a funeral or not (698-702). Several other games in Homer are funerary: 23.678-80 (Oidipous), 22.162-4 (a simile), and Od. 24.85-92 (Akhilleus). It was believed later that all athletic festivals had originated as funeral games (cf. Pfeiffer on Call. fr. 384.30, Erbse on bT 22.164b), and this view is supported by Meuli. But not all games in Homer are of this type (cf. 4.385-90, Od. 8.100-3).

The motive for holding contests at a funeral is never explained in Homer, although 646 implies that they are designed to bonour the dead man. In addition, when Akhilleus offers Nestor a prize he says that he should keep it as a memorial of Patroklos' funeral (618-19). The games are seen as a great commemorative occasion. The poet does not give us any hint of Patroklos' own spirit as taking pleasure in this, but the idea may well have been present in people's minds on such occasions. During the funeral itself Akhilleus continually called upon the ghost of his friend (218-21), but after the burning his spirit is in Hades (cf. 75-6). Whether he hears we are not told, but Akhilleus does address him again later, and promises him a share in Priam's gifts (24.591-5).

Structurally the games mark a transition to the last Book, preparing the way for Akhilleus' reception of Priam. They also show us the Greek heroes, for the last time, with many of their strengths and weaknesses of character displayed in speech and action. This Book forms a counterpart to book 2, which gave us our first picture of the Greek army as a whole: the marshalling of the Achaeans for war corresponds with their gathering for the games, war's peaceful counterpart. But the quarrels which break out among the leaders also recall book 1. There Akhilleus was the protagonist in the dispute, whereas here by contrast he is the mediator and restorer of concord (490-8, 555-62, 618-23). Honour is satisfied in the games and the risk of further conflict is avoided (see on 448-98).

Some of the episodes foreshadow events beyond the poem's scope, for example the wrestling match between Telamonian Aias and Odysseus, which brings to mind their later contest for Akhilleus' arms. The prominence of Antilokhos, and his close friendship with Akhilleus, suggests the rôle he is to play in the events described in the Aithiopis, where his death at Memnon's hands is avenged by Akhilleus: after Patroklos' death Antilokhos begins to replace him as Akhilleus' closest friend alive. We see heroes who play no part in the main events of the poem but may have been prominent elsewhere, such as Eumelos of Pherai (cf. 2.712-15, 2.763-7), and Epeios who later will make the Wooden Horse (cf. Od. 8.492-3, 11.523).

• 1

On the early history of funeral games cf. Andronikos, Arch. Hom. w 34-7, 121-6, and Laser, Arch. Hom. T. For some literary aspects cf. M. M. Willcock, 'The funeral games of Patroclus', BICS 20 (1973) 1-11, and on the relationship of the games to book 1 see Macleod, Iliad XXIV 29-32, and M. W. Dickie, 'Fair and foul play in the Funeral Games in the Iliad', Journal of Sport History 11. 2 (1984) 8-17.

262-652 The chariot race

This falls into four main sections:

- (a) Preparations for the race (262-36t)
- (b) The race itself (362-447)
- (c) The argument between the spectators Idomeneus and the lesser Aias (448-98)
- (d) The end of the race and the awarding of the prizes (499-652).

(a) 262-361 The preparations. Akhilleus offers prizes for the chariot race. The contestants are Eumelos, Diomedes, Menelaos, Antilokhos, and Meriones. Nestor advises Antilokhos on tactics. They draw lots for positions, and Akhilleus sets Phoinix as an umpire at the turning-point aba-70 The list of prizes is varied: the postponement of $\tau \tilde{\psi} \pi \rho \omega \tau \psi$ gives a neatly chiastic order to 265, and the placing and form of the verb is elegantly varied: $| \theta \tilde{\eta} \kappa \epsilon \dots \xi \theta \eta \kappa \epsilon | \dots \kappa \alpha \tau \xi \theta \eta \kappa \epsilon \dots \theta \tilde{\eta} \kappa \epsilon \dots \xi \theta \eta \kappa \epsilon |$. The expression $\delta \epsilon \theta \lambda \alpha \theta \tilde{\eta} \kappa \epsilon$ (etc.) is used for the first four contests of the Games (cf. 653, 700, 740), but for the later, more minor ones $\delta \epsilon \theta \lambda \alpha$ is omitted and the prizes are listed as objects of the verb.

262 Ιππεῦσιν ... ποδώκεσιν: cf. 376 ποδώκεες ... Ιπποι, 17.614 ποδώκεας ... Ιππους. The adaptation of this expression has led to the transfer of the epithet from horses to riders. T mentions a variant Ιπποισιν, clearly designed to avoid the oddity of expression, and impossible with what follows.

263 Cf. 16.233 θῆκ' ἐπὶ νηὸς ἀγεσθαι, and 9.128 δώσω δ' ἐπτα γυναϊκας ἀμύμονα ἔργα Ιδυίας. The hiatus after γυναϊκα is inelegant, and may be due to the combination of the two types of phrase just quoted (cf. Chantraine, *GH*191). The succession of trochaic word breaks produces an uneven verse (cf. 116n.), although examples of this are not so uncommon: cf. Kirk, TCS 20 (1966) 95ff.

۰.,

264 και τρίποδ' ώτώεντα: this phrase recurs at 513. The epithet ('with ears or handles') does not recur in Homer: cf. Hes. Erga 657 τρίποδ' ώτώεντα, of the prize won by Hesiod in the funeral games for Amphidamas. The form οὐατόεις is most often used elsewhere (see West's comment). Tripod handles (οῦατα) are mentioned at 18.378-9.

δυωκαιεικοσίμετρον: 'holding twenty-two measures'; cf. the similar compound δυωκαιεικοσίπηχυ (15.678), with comment. These are the only cases in Homer of a single word filling the second half of the verse (Edwards, HPI 123), and both occur nowhere else. As this is five and a half times the quantity held by the cauldron in 267-8 it must have been a very large tripod bowl, but we do not know what the μέτρον here represents.

266 Cf. 655 έξέττε' ἀδμήτην, ή τ' ἀλγίστη δαμάσασθαι. άδμητος ought to mean 'untamed' (cf. 10.293). Delebecque (Cheval 160) considered it odd to use this of a six-year-old mare, and suggested that it should mean 'hard to master', but she could have been left wild up to then. βρέφος ήμίονον κυέουσαν means 'pregnant with a baby mule'.

267–8 For άπυρον ('not yet exposed to fire') cf. 9.122 ξπτ' άπύρους τρίποδας, and 23.270 άπύρωτον, 885 λέβητ' άπυρον. Here λευκόν ξτ' αύτως (268) elaborates the point of άπυρον. For κεχανδότα ('containing') cf. Od. 4.96 and see on 24.192.

269 δύω χρύσοιο τάλαντα: cf. 614, 18.507. It is significant that two talents of gold are assigned only as the fourth prize. Ancient discussion concluded that the Homeric talent must have had a smaller value than in the classical period, and Aristotle (fr. 164 R.3) argued that its value cannot have been precisely fixed (cf. AbT 269 with Erbse's commentary, and F. Hultsch, Griechische und römische Metrologie, Berlin 1862, 128-9). The only weight terms used in Homer are the talent and half-talent, and these are only applied to gold, whereas other commodities are measured in different ways, especially in terms of oxen. Some scholars believe that the Homeric talent was equated in value with an ox. It has been argued that there was no attempt at standardization of weights before the introduction of coinage, but this is a debatable point: cf. C. H. Grayson, 'Weighing in ancient Greece' (Oxford D.Phil. thesis 1974) 285-6, 323, 326-30. In the Mycenaean period there appears to have been a more developed system of weights and measures: cf. Ventris and Chadwick, Documents 57-8 and Grayson, op. cit. 674-8. The Eretria gold hoard of c. 700 B.C. contains a number of what may be talents, as well as half pieces and fragments: P. G. Themelis, Praktika 1980, 89-91. For discussion of relative values of the prizes and other Homeric objects see A. L. Macrakis, Studies Presented to Stirling Dow, ed. K. J. Rigsby (Durham, North Carolina 1984) 211-15.

270 ἀμφίθετον φιάλην: according to Aristarchus (Arn/A) the Homeric φιάλη is a shallow bowl-shaped cauldron, and ἀμφίθετος means that it can stand either upright or upside down on its rim, but this seems unlikely. The sense of the epithet was uncertain, and Athenaeus (500F-501D) records many interpretations. The most likely seems to be 'with handles on both sides'. The word recurs at 616, and nowhere later. The $\phi_1 \alpha \lambda \eta$ existed in Mycenaean Greek: cf. pi-je-ra₃, pi-a₂-ra in the Linear B tablets, which is depicted in the ideograms as 'a large shallow vessel, designed to expose a large area to the fire, and provided with high-swung handles for suspension' (Ventris and Chadwick, Documents 324-5). See also on 243-4, and F. Brommer, Hermes 77 (1942) 361, 368-9.

۰.

ı

271 This verse is repeated before Akhilleus' introductory speeches to all the contests except the last two, at 456, 657 (272 = 658), 706, 752, 801, 830, and occurs nowhere else in Homer, a remarkable example of a formula confined to a single context (cf. Edwards, HSCP 74 (1970) 15, 27). Cf. in this Book 781 övθov άποπτύων, μετὰ δ' Άργεlοισιν ἔειπεν, 786 μειδιόων, καὶ μῦθον ἐν Άργεlοισιν ἔειπεν, and 471 ΑΙτωλός γενέην, μετὰ δ' Άργεlοισιν ἀνάσσει. It looks as if the verse may have been invented by the poet for this episode. Alternatively, it could belong to the stock of epic accounts of games. Elsewhere we find 19.269 ἀνστὰς Άργείοισι φιλοπτολέμοισι μετηύδα, and 2. tog, 9.16 ἕπε' Άργείοισι μετηύδα].

272-86 Akhilleus' speech appropriately introduces the first and most important contest, by referring to the supremacy of his own horses (cf. 2.770), and to the loss of Patroklos, their driver. This reference is developed pathetically with the reminiscence of his gentle care for them and of their grief for him, a motif which recalls 17.426-56 and 19.400-24.

272 = 658 (with 657 = 271) at the beginning of the next episode. The same verse (with ATPETSON) occurred at 1.17. Here some MSS read apporting Havaxanav | as at 236.

273 'These prizes are set down in the assembly, awaiting the horsemen': $\delta\epsilon\delta\epsilon\gamma\mu\epsilon\nu\alpha$ (from $\delta\epsilon\chi\mu\alpha$) is applied here unusually to inanimate objects. Arn/A mention a variant $1\pi\pi\epsilon\tilde{\nu}\sigma_1$, and T says that some took $\delta\epsilon\delta\epsilon\gamma\mu\epsilon\nu\alpha$ as from $\delta\epsilon\epsilon\kappa\nu\mu\mu$, meaning 'displayed for'.

274 $\xi \pi i \delta \lambda \lambda \omega$: the hiatus at the end of the second foot is rare, especially inside a phrase where the words cohere so closely.

276 περιβάλλετον: 'are outstanding'; only here and at Od. 15.17 in this sense.

277-8 At 16.866-7 and 17.443-4 we learnt that the gods gave Peleus immortal horses, presumably at his wedding to Thetis (cf. 18.84-5 and see on 16.140-4). Their parentage was described at 16.148-51; they were the offspring of Zephuros and the Harpy Podarge. Here we learn that they were a gift of Poseidon, presumably as the god of horses (so T). Leaf says that 'this is the only passage in Homer where Poseidon is brought into any special relation with the horse', but 584-5 is surely another instance, and perhaps 8.440-1, where Poseidon takes charge of the chariot and horses of Zeus.

277 αύτούς: Leaf reads αύτός, with the support of one or two MSS, but the anaphoric use of αύτός appears occasionally in Homer: cf. Chantraine, GH II 157.

278 After this verse pap. 12 adds two more, ως τώ γ' άθάνατοι κ[...] θυητούς άθανάτοισι [..., whose sense probably was 'They are immortal, and mortals should (or do) not vie with immortals'; cf. Od. 5.212-13.

280 τοίου γάρ κλέος έσθλόν: pap. 12 and some MSS read τοΐου ... σθένος. τοΐον must be a mistake, due to false assimilation with σθένος. κλέος έσθλόν occurs $3 \times$ elsewhere in Il. and $5 \times Od.$, σθένος έσθλόν nowhere else. Either would be possible, but κλέος is more emotive and seems preferable (pace van der Valk, Researches II 110). The oblique reference to Patroklos without naming him is pathetic, as at 16 τοΐον γάρ πόθεον μήστωρα φόβοιο.

81-2 Cf. Hektor's reference to Andromakhe's care of his horses (8.185-90). For the stress on Patroklos' gentleness see on 252. For $\delta_5 \sigma \phi \omega \bar{\nu} \nu$ pap. 12 and some MSS read $\delta \sigma \phi \omega \bar{\nu}$, and this was Aristarchus' reading, with a comparison of 1.73 (AT). This is more euphonious. $\delta \gamma \rho \delta \nu E \lambda \sigma \bar{\nu} \rho$ ('liquid oil') occurs only here in II., but $3 \times Od$.

284 Ephpébarrai: 'rest on the ground'; cf. 7.145 etc. obdei Epelo $\theta\eta$. The form Ephpébarrai recurs at 329; cf. Od. 7.95 Ephpébarro.

287 Aristarchus took τσχέες as predicative, meaning 'quickly' (Arn/AbT), comparing 880 and 19.276, and this is probably correct (although cf. 262). He also preferred to read ἕγερθεν (Did/A), which is read by some of our MSS ('roused themselves'), in preference to ἄγερθεν ('gathered'). But έγείρεσθαι elsewhere in Homer always seems to be used of waking up.

288ff. For the form of this list cf. 7.162ff. $\ddot{\omega}$ pto $\pi o \lambda \dot{\upsilon} \pi p \tilde{\omega} \tau o s$ $\mu \dot{\upsilon} \dot{\omega} v \alpha \dot{\varsigma}$ $\dot{\omega} v \delta p \tilde{\omega} v$ 'Ayaué $\mu v \omega v$, | $\tau \tilde{\omega} \delta' \epsilon \pi i$ Tudeídas dipto koatedos Aioundans [=23.290], | $\tau o \tilde{\sigma} i \delta' \epsilon \pi' A \tilde{\omega} v \tau \epsilon s$ (etc.), with Meriones in sixth place (cf. 23.351); also 23.708, 811-12, 836, 859. This listing seems to reflect the contestant's natural order of ability.

288-9 On Eumelos, his horses, and their connexion with Apollo, see 2.712-15, 2.763-7 with comments. His father Admetos was one of the contestants at the funeral games in honour of Pelias, a major event in early Greek poetry and art: cf. Paus. 5.17.9, $LIMC_1$. t pp. 219-20 (B 7 and 10), L. Malten, MDAI(R) 38 (1923) 307-8.

290-2 The introduction here of the horses from the stock of Tros neatly links this episode with earlier parts of the poem, especially book 5: cf. their description at 5.222-3 and 260-73, their capture at 319-27, and Aineias' rescue by Apollo at 344-6 and 445-7; they are mentioned again at 8.105-8. In the ensuing race there are further important echoes of book 5, for here too Apollo attempts to thwart Diomedes' success, and Athene helps him, at the same time as she robs Eumelos' horses, which Apollo had looked after, of victory (382-400).

The ancient critics (T 291) were puzzled by Diomedes' ability to take part in the games (cf. 812-25 where he fights Aias in the duel), after he had been wounded in battle (11.376-8), a fact which had been recalled as recently as at 19.47-9. Given the frequency of cross-references in the games to earlier parts of the poem this may seem odd, but presumably the poet forgets Diomedes' wound for the purpose of these episodes. The same problem will apply to Odysseus' participation at 709ff., 755ff.

293-300 Menelaos competes with one of his own horses and one of his brother's, a neat way of bringing Agamemnon into the contest, since the poet could not easily have let him compete and lose, and a way of suggesting the unity of the two Atreidai (cf. bT 293, 295). The names of the horses, Fiery and Fleetfoot, are suitable (see on 8.185). They are dignified with a biographical sketch: Ekhepolos, a very rich inhabitant of Sikuon, avoided military service at Troy by giving Agamemnon the horse Aithe. Cf. the references to payment of a fine for this purpose by a Corinthian (13.669), and to conscription by lot (24.399-400). Both Corinth and Sikuon were in Agamemnon's own territory: see on 2.569-80.

Ekhepolos, son of Ankhises, has an appropriate name. Later mythographers (Acusilaus, Pherecydes) made him a descendant of Pelops (T 296), and it is interesting to find the name Ankhises in a Greek context. Plutarch (Mor. 32F) records the dry comment of Aristotle (fr. 165 R.³), that Agamemnon rightly preferred a warlike horse to an unwarlike man!

299 Ev EUPUXÓPQ ZIKUÕVI: the epithet must originally have meant 'with broad dancing places', but it seems to have come to be used as if it were the same as EUPUXWPOS and meant 'spacious'. Hence it is applied, for example, to Hellas (9.478) and Elis (Od. 4.635: see West's comment), etc. Sikuon's position, by the rich plain on the north coast of the Peloponnese, would be suitable for a wealthy owner of horses.

....

300 δ γ': the variant τόθ' (a few MSS, and mentioned as a variant by A) was read by Leaf, but τήν τόθ' is less attractive from the point of view of sound.

iσχανόωσαν: this verb normally means 'hold back' (5.89 etc.), but could theoretically mean 'cling to'. It is hard to see how it could mean 'desire' (vel sim.), and we should perhaps read the variant Ιχανόωσαν, which may be related to ¹χαρ ('desire', A. Supp. 850), and recurs as a variant at Od. 8.288. The verb survived in later Ionic (Herodas, Babrius), and 1χαίνειν occurs in Callimachus fr. 178.22; cf. Wackernagel, Kleine Schriften 1 778, and see also on 17.570-3.

301-50 The list of contestants is interrupted at this point by Nestor's speech to Antilokhos, and will be concluded at 351. This gives us advance warning that Antilokhos will play a prominent part in the race. In earlier episodes he has appeared several times in association with Menelaos, who will be his rival in the race: at 5.561 ff. he joined him in order to protect him from attack by Aineias, and at 15.568 ff. he was encouraged by him to attack the Trojans (cf. bT 15.568 for the suggestion that their friendship stemmed from their being neighbours at home). At 17.651 ff. Telamonian Aias asked Menelaos to find Antilokhos, so that he could bring Akhilleus the news of Patroklos' death. Thus the way is prepared for the touching conclusion to the ensuing quarrel of Menelaos and Antilokhos (566-613).

Nestor himself is $i\pi\pi \dot{\sigma}\tau \alpha$ by tradition (2.336 etc.) and he is descended from Poseidon, god of horses (T 301). Among his other speeches of tactical advice (see on 2.360-8) is one about the use of chariots in battle (4.297– 309; see comments), and among his reminiscences are accounts of fighting with chariots (11.711–61) and of chariot-races (11.698–702, 23.638–42).

Here his two speeches before and after (cf. 626-50) frame the race, setting it in a context of traditional expertise. The first one has a typical ring-structure (cf. Lohmann, Reden 15-18):

306 8: introduction

- (a) 309-12: you are a good charioteer, but your horses are slower than the rest
- (b) 313-18: you must make use of ingenuity (μητις)
- (c) 319-25: contrasting descriptions of the bad and good driver
- (d) 326 33: description of the turning-post
- (c) 334-43: positive and negative advice on how to round it
- (b) 343: use your intelligence and take care!
- (a) 344-8: if you turn the post well even the best horse in the world will not catch you

The structure of the speech neatly mirrors that of the race, 309-25 portraying the physical and psychological situation before the turn, 334-48 that after it, with the speech pivoting around 326-33, the central description of the turn. As such it forms a complement to the race, allowing the poet in the following narrative to dispense for example with any further description of the turning-post. As a general discourse on horsemanship it is a miniature forerunner of later works on the subject such as Xenophon's. It is also a sermon on the uses of $\mu\eta\tau\eta\varsigma$ (practical intelligence): cf. M. Detienne and J.-P. Vernant, Cunning Intelligence in Greek Culture and Society (English translation, Harvester Press 1979) 11-26. On Nestor's speeches in general see Martin, Language of Heroes 101-13.

Copyrighted Material

301 This formulation is repeated with Meriones at 351.

303-4 Πυλοιγενέες ... ὤκύποδες: see on 2.54 Πυλοιγενέος (of Nestor). The variant παλαιγενέες is due to 445, where they are said to be no longer young (bT). ὠκύποδες is a good example of a formular epithet, given the relative slowness of these horses (so Arn/A).

305 Nicanor judged it best to take els àyaôà with $\mu u \partial \epsilon \tilde{\tau} \sigma$ (cf. 9.102 el $\pi \epsilon \tilde{\iota} v$ els àyaôòv), and $\phi \rho ov \ell \omega v$ volov $\tau t \alpha \tilde{\iota} \alpha \tilde{\upsilon} \tau \tilde{\omega}$ together, making an antithesis, but perhaps $\mu \upsilon \partial \epsilon \tilde{\tau} \tau$ els àyaôà $\phi \rho ov \ell \omega v$ all go together. The phrase is characteristic of Nestor: 9.102 is spoken by him, as is $\tau \tau.789$ ô de $\pi \epsilon \ell \sigma \epsilon \tau \alpha \tau$ els àyaôóv $\pi \epsilon \rho$. Antilokhos' intelligence is often mentioned in what follows (440, 570, 586, 603-4), and Menelaos' distress is partly because it is out of character for him to be so reckless.

306-8 Aristarchus (Arn/A) and some MSS read toloafev in 307, referring only to Poseidon as god of horses, whereas Zenodotus preferred toloafav, which is surely right. Zeus may be included as author of divine gifts in general, but the emphasis can still be on Poseidon, who is especially suitable as the great-grandfather of Antilokhos. Cf. 13.554-5, where Poseidon protects him from the Trojan attack.

Nestor's introductory remarks are complimentary, and use the standard rhetorical device of saying that someone does not really need advice: cf. especially 787 είδόσιν ὕμμ' ἐρέω πᾶσιν, φίλοι ..., 1.577 μητρὶ δ' ἐγὼ παράφημι, και αὐτῆ περ νοεούση, Hes. Erga 202 νῦν δ' αἶνον βασιλεῦσ' ἑρέω, φρονέουσι και αὐτοῖς (which resemble 305); and other examples in Macleod, Iliad XXIV 47.

309 mepl répuco?: in Il. always applied to the turning-post (22.162 and $6\times$ in book 23). At 332 etc. this is called viora.

310 βάρδιστοι: this superlative form of βραδύς occurs only here and at 530 in Homer; cf. Theocr. Id. 15.104. τῶ τ' οἶω λοίγι' ἔσεσθαι means 'therefore I think things will be troublesome for you'; cf. 21.533 νῦν οίω λοίγι' ἔσεσθαι. Nestor's horses are said at 8.104 to be slow.

331 ἀφάρτεροι: 'swifter', a comparative from the adverb ἄφαρ, itself treated as an adjective at Theognis 716, τῶν ἅφαρ εlσl πόδες. It recurs only in a fragment of Dionysius' Bassarika (frag. 5b2 Heitsch), and is noted as a hapax by Arn/A.

312-18 μητίσασθαι ... μῆτιν ... | μήτι ... | μήτι ... | μήτι: the rhetorical repetition develops into a threefold enumeration of instances of $\mu\eta\tau_i$, described by ancient commentators as an example of inductive reasoning ($t\pi\alpha\gamma\omega\gamma\eta$); it could be regarded as a form of priamel (cf. Willcock), and suits the gnomic style of this part of the speech. See also vol. v, p. 44.

314 παρεκπροφύγησιν ('slip away past your grasp'): this splendidly elaborate compound, with its triple prefix, occurs only here.

315 δρυτόμος recurs in Homer only at 11.86; cf. ύλοτόμος (114, 123).

317 ἐρεχθομένην ἀνέμοισι: the exact sense and etymology of ἐρεχθεῖν are uncertain. It occurs only here in II.; cf. Od. 5.83 = 157 δάκρυσι καὶ στοναχῆσι καὶ ἄλγεσι θυμὸν ἐρέχθων, HyAp 358 ὁδυνῆσιν ἐρεχθομένη χαλεπῆσι, and perhaps Procl. H. 7.38 ἑρίχθομαι ... πρήξεσιν οὐχ ὀσίαις. It is usually taken as meaning something like 'trouble', 'distress'. AbT mention a variant ἐεργομένην, substituting a more common word, and there was a variant spelling ἑριχθομένην.

319-35 The ancient and medieval traditions are both divided over whether to read $\delta\lambda\lambda'$ $\delta\varsigma$ or $\delta\lambda\lambda\varsigma\varsigma$ in 319, but $\delta\lambda\lambda\varsigma\varsigma\mu$ is surely right here (cf. e.g. 11.636-7). If we read $\delta\varsigma\mu$ is a relative, either there is no apodosis or the apodosis is in 321, which is unsatisfactory as this is an expansion of 320. The variant $\pi\epsilon\pi\sigma\theta\epsilon$ in 319 is very weakly attested and probably a conjecture. Ptolemy of Ascalon took $\delta\varsigma\mu\epsilon\nu$ as demonstrative, meaning 'one man', as in later examples of $\delta\varsigma\mu\epsilon\nu\ldots\delta$ $\delta\epsilon$, etc. (Hrd/A 319), which is un-Homeric. Moreover the use of $\delta\lambda\lambda\delta$ has no real point here (cf. Leaf).

320 'Thoughtlessly wheels wide to this side and that.' For $d\phi\rho\alpha\delta i\omega\varsigma$ cf. 426. At 309 and 466 $i\lambda$ ioreiv refers to taking the turn, and presumably the point is that one should not lose time by covering unnecessary ground at the turn (cf. 323).

321 πλανόωνται: only here in Homer, but common later.

322 κέρδεα: cf. 515 where Antilokhos is said to have defeated Menelaos κέρδεσιν, οῦ τι τάχει γε.

323-5 'Always keeping his eye on the turning-post wheels close to it, and he does not forget how from the start to keep (his horses) taut with the ox-hide reins, but he holds them steadily in hand, and fixes his gaze on the competitor in the lead.' Here, as elsewhere in this episode, one might suspect the use of the technical language of racing, for example in $\tau \alpha \nu' \sigma \eta$: cf. 16.375 $\tau \alpha \nu' \omega \nu \tau \sigma \delta^2 \mu \omega \nu \nu \chi \epsilon s 1\pi \pi \sigma$, 475 $\epsilon \nu \rho \nu \tau \eta \rho \sigma \tau \alpha \nu \sigma \sigma \epsilon \nu$, 23.403 $\tau \tau \alpha \nu \sigma \sigma \epsilon$ (etc.).

326-33 The turning-post is described in great detail, suggesting that it will play an important part in the actual race. Here however the poet surprises us, since in the event all the attention will focus on the return lap (373ff.). In the context of Nestor's speech, however, the circumstantial details add credibility and focus attention on this crucial mark (326 $\sigma\eta\mu\alpha$). Leaf fails to see the point: 'The whole passage is hopelessly obscure ... 328.

An irrelevant line and totally unlike Homer ... 331 ... no evidence whatever in antiquity for wooden posts having been used for sepulchral monuments ...' To object as he does that it is odd for Nestor to know about the race-course before Akhilleus has fixed it (358) is absurdly pedantic.

326 = Od. 11.126 (cf. Od. 23.273). Here the $\sigma \eta \mu \alpha$ is (a) the turning-post, marked out (358 $\sigma \eta \mu \eta \nu \epsilon$) by Akhilleus, (b) a mark for Antilokhos to watch out for, and (c) coincidentally, it may also be a funerary $\sigma \eta \mu \alpha$ (331).

327 δσον τ' δργυι': the phrase δσον τ' δργυιαν recurs at Od. 9.325, 10.167, and δργυια is used only here in the lliad.

328 τὸ μὲν οὐ καταπύθεται ὅμβρω: bT quote Theophrastus (HP 5.4.3) for the view that in some circumstances certain types of wood do not rot, in response to a difficulty raised by early critics as to why the post was not rotten, of which there are echoes in Aristotle (Soph. El. 166b1ff., Poet. 1461a21ff.). The most probable interpretation of what Aristotle says is that an earlier Homeric scholar, Hippias of Thasos (86 B 20 D K), proposed the reading où instead of où in this line, giving the meaning 'part of this is rotted by rain' (cf. Wackernagel, Kleine Schriften 1077ff.). Leaf rightly describes this as marking 'the low water of Homeric criticism'. καταπύθειν occurs only here and at HyAp 371; cf. πύθειν ll. 4.174 etc.

329 The whiteness of the stones makes them a conspicuous mark: cf. 453-5 and on 22.294 λευκάσπιδα. έρηρέδαται means 'are fixed into the ground' (so Etymologicum Magnum s.v.), or alternatively 'are propped against it'; cf. 284.

330 & Euroxijou oboū: 'at the place where the track narrows' or 'at the point where the two laps of the race meet' (cf. AT, Eust. 1304.17). In either case, it must refer to the turning-point. Euroxi occurs only here in Homer (cf. Aristotle, A.R., etc.).

λεῖος δ' Ιππόδρομος ἀμφίς: 'and there is smooth running for horses on either side (of the turning)'. Ιππόδρομος also occurs only here in early literature, and later means specifically a race-course for chariots (Pl. Criticas 117C etc.). The point presumably is that this makes it easier to risk going really close to the turn.

331 Cf. 7.89 άνδρός μέν τόδε σῆμα πάλαι κατατεθνηῶτος. The uncertainty as to whether it is a grave-marker or not is significant, suggesting that the landscape may have had many anonymous minor monuments of this kind (cf. 11.371-2 with comment). The objection by Heyne and Leaf that wooden posts were not used in this way is aptly answered by Eustathius' comparison (1304.20) with Od. 11.77 πῆξαί τ' ἐπὶ τύμβῳ ἐρετμόν.

332-3 Instead of both these verses Aristarchus apparently read he σκιρος Εην, νῦν αὐ θέτο τέρματ' Άχιλλεύς, and according to T he took σκιρος as meaning 'a root'. Why he preferred this text is quite unclear.

332 visco is used only in this book of the Iliad $(4 \times)$ and once in Od.

(8.121); it is rare later (Theorr. Id. 24.119, etc.). It is probably connected with $\nu\nu\sigma\sigma\omega$ and means 'the thing which one touches' in turning, and so is a more concrete expression than $\tau\epsilon\rho\mu\alpha$. For $\epsilon\pi$ προτέρων ανθρώπων cf. 5.637.

334-41 Nestor advises Antilokhos to steer as close as possible to the turn, leaning a little to the left and urging on the right-hand horse: the left-hand horse should just clear the turn, almost touching it with the nave of the wheel, but avoiding a crash. Cf. the chariot-race in Sophocles' Electra 720-2:

κείνος δ' ὑπ' αὐτὴν ἐσχάτην στήλην ἔχων ἔχριμπτ' ἀεl σύριγγα, δεξιὸν δ' ἀνεἰς σειραΐον Ιππον εἶργε τὸν προσκείμενον and Orestes' crash (743ff.).

335 EUTALENTO EVI SIGPOU: cf. 436 SIGPOUS ... EUTAREEDS, and similar expressions at Hes. Aspis 63, 306, 370. The epithet refers to the plaited leather thongs which were used for the breastwork of the chariot: see on 5.727-8, and Lorimer, HM 326, V. Karageorghis, Sol mis V (Nicosia 1973) text p. 73, Crouwel, Chariots 59ff. Plato (Ion 537A) quotes KAIVOÄVOI SE KOI OUTES EÜETTO EVI SIGPO, and Xenophon (Symp. 4.6) has EUETOU EVI SIGPOU.

336 $i\pi$ apiotepa toliv: 'to the left of the horses'.

337 κένσαι: only here in Homer; cf. Pindar, P. 1.28, etc., also 387, 430 κέντρον, and related words. The Suda quotes the proverb κεντεΐν τόν πῶλον περί τὴν νύσσαν, of impetuous haste.

339-40 For πλήμνη ('hub') cf. 5.726 with comment, and for δοάσσεται see on 13.445-8. άκρον must refer to the edge or surface of the turning-post. The separation of κύκλου ποιητοΐο from πλήμνη is unusual.

342-3 This is a typically gnomic conclusion to the detailed advice in the previous verses. Verse 343 recalls the point of 313-14, and the alliteration of π and ϕ may be designed for emphasis. There were ancient variants descent in 342 (Apollonius), and Ecoecci in 343 (T).

344 παρεξελάσησθα: cf. 24.342 παρέ ξ ... έλασσαν, $3 \times Od$.

345 $\pi\alpha\rho\epsilon\lambda\theta\eta$: most MSS read $\pi\alpha\rho\epsilon\lambda\theta\sigma$, which is unusual after the subjunctive $\epsilon\lambda\eta\sigma$, but surely not impossible (cf. Chantraine, GH II 248). The optative perhaps anticipates the mood of 346: 'there is no one who may catch you ... nor who could pass you, not even if he were driving ...'

346-7 Arion, Adrestos' divine horse, is a creature belonging primarily to the cycle of Theban legends. He was certainly referred to in the Thebais (fr. 4 Allen = Davies, EGF fr. 6A = Pausanias 8.25.8), although from what Pausanias says it looks as if his parentage was not specified there. According to the D-scholium on 346 he was the offspring of Poseidon (in the form of a horse) and Erinus, and this is said to derive from the Cyclic poets. As

•

t

- • 、

Wilamowitz saw (Der Glaube der Hellenen, Berlin 1931, 1 399), Homer quite possibly knew of a genealogy of this kind for Arion, but is characteristically vague in referring to such fantastic stories, which are common in the Cyclic poems. Cf. R. Janko, CQ36 (1986) 51-5.

348 Laomedon inherited these horses, which were also divine, from Tros: see on 291, and especially 5.265-70. For of $\ell \nu \theta \Delta \delta \epsilon \gamma' \ell \tau \rho \alpha \phi \epsilon \nu \ell \sigma \theta \lambda ol cf.$ 21.279 os $\ell \nu \theta \Delta \delta \epsilon \gamma' \ell \tau \rho \alpha \phi' \Delta \rho_{10} \tau \sigma_{5}$ (with comment). Here too we might possibly read $\ell \tau \rho \alpha \phi ov$ (intransitive), with a few MSS.

350 Exáctor melpart': 'the ways of achieving each thing'; cf. Od. 3.433 where a smith's tools are called melpart texuns, and Pindar, P. 4.220 melpart' deblow belower, etc., and see on 6.143.

351 Meriones rounds off the list of competitors. He will come last in the race itself, apart from Eumelos who crashes. bT suggest that the poet includes him because he has in mind the ensuing quarrel of his commander Idomeneus and Locrian Aias (450-98): see on 450-1, where Idomeneus is watching the race from a vantage-point.

358 = 757. μ eraoto χ i occurs nowhere else.

358-61 As the turning-post is far away Phoinix is set to keep an eye on the race at this crucial point. Cf. the judge who sits by the turningpost in a foot-race, on a vase in Würzburg: Harris, Athletes pl. 4b and p. 161.

360 Phoinix is not given this description elsewhere, but this is the only time he is named in the accusative. He was last mentioned at 19.311.

36π μεμνέωτο: an unusual form, presumably by metathesis of quantity from μεμνήριτο (Chantraine, GH I 71, 465). At 24.745 the MSS have μεμνήμην, and later Attic has both μεμνώτο and μεμνήτο.

δρόμους was Aristarchus' reading (Did/AT), and it is that of a few of our MSS, against the vulgate δρόμου. The former would be better suited to a race with several laps and it is not clear why Aristarchus preferred it: δρόμου seems more appropriate here. άληθείην occurs only here and at 24.407 in II., but $7 \times Od$.

(b) 362-447 The race. The start is described, and the race itself in general terms. On the return lap Eumelos takes the lead and Diomedes is just behind, until Apollo and Athene intervene. Athene makes Eumelos crash, and Diomedes takes the lead, with Menelaos behind. Antilokhos overtakes Menelaos where the track is narrow, and he has to give u ay to avoid a collision. Menelaos com lains that Antilokhos is driving recklessly and begins to close the gap behind him

As with the battle scenes, the detailed narrative of individual conflicts is preceded by a general description which very vividly gives a picture of the chariots bounding over the plain, and portrays the emotions of the competitors. This is followed by two 'duels', the contests between Eumelos and Diomedes and between Menelaos and Antilokhos (cf. A. Köhnken, Hermes 109 (1981) 144). In the first of these the gods intervene, just as in the battle scenes, Athene aiding Diomedes as previously and Eumelos being helped by Apollo, who had been the guardian of his horses at home in Pherai (cf. bT 383). In the second it is human guile that gives Antilokhos the advantage. For artistic representations (especially the François Vase) see Johansen, Iliad in Early Greek Art 86–92, LIMC 1. 1, pp. 121–2.

362-72 The high frequency of periodic and integral enjambment adds to the dramatic effect. The opening motifs of the charioteers urging on their horses, and of the horses racing over the plain and raising clouds of dust (362-6) are repeated more briefly at the end (371-2), rounding off the passage. See also on 499-506.

362 $\delta\mu\alpha$, i.e. all at the same moment, is much more effective than the variant $\delta\rho\alpha$. Cf. S. El. 711-13 ol 5' $\delta\mu\alpha$ | Inmois $\delta\mu\alpha\lambda\eta\sigma\alpha$ (where the whole passage imitates this part of the Homeric race). Virgil has this passage in mind at G. 3.103-12.

363 $\pi \epsilon \pi \lambda \eta \gamma \delta \nu \theta'$ lacow: this probably means that they shook the reins on the horses' necks, as understood by Sophocles, although Delebecque argues that lacoves can mean 'whips' (Cheval 185), and LSJ gives this sense here; the word is used of a whip in some late Greek passages.

364-6 έσσυμένως ... ώκα ... ταχέως: the recurrent adverbs stress the eagerness and speed. Verse 364 is similar to 2.785 = 3.14 έρχομένων· μάλα δ' ώκα διέπρησσον πεδίοιο (and 3.13 refers to the dust storm raised by the two armies). For 365-6 cf. also 2.150-1 ποδῶν δ' ὑπένερθε κονίη [Ιστατ' άειρομένη, etc. νόσφι νεῶν (365) shows that the race began near the ships.

367 Cf. 1.529 χαϊται επερρώσαντο, Od. 2.148 μετά πνοιής άνέμοιο.

368-9 These verses suggest the dangerous bumpiness of the course, as the light vehicles hurtle and bound over it.

. 370 πάτασσε δε θυμός εκάστου: cf. 7.216 θυμός ενί στήθεσσι πάτασσεν, 13.282.

372 This verse is echoed in 449. Cf. 13.820 Kovlovtes πεδίοιο.

373-6 The turn is not described (see on 326-33). This must refer to the return lap, when the horses go flat out (375). $\partial \psi \, i \phi' \, \partial \lambda \delta_5 \, \pi o \lambda i \eta_5$ must mean that they are going back from the plain towards the sea. This is Aristarchus' reading and that of most of our MSS, as against the ancient variant $\partial \phi' \, \partial \lambda \delta_5$. He apparently thought the race took place between the sea and the Achaean wall, so he presumably put the finish near the sea (cf. bT, Eust. on 365).

375-6 ǎ $\phi\alpha\rho$ õ' ĩ $\pi\pi\alpha\alpha\sigma$ ι τάθη δρόμος means 'at once (after the turn) the horses ran full stretch' (see on 323-5). αl Φηρητιάδαο are the mares of Eumelos, grandson of Pheres (2.763). Notice the distinction between Eumelos' mares and Diomedes' stallions. Cf. 407-9, where Antilokhos tells his stallions that it would be disgraceful to be beaten by Menelaos' mare Aithe.

375-81 These verses are echoed in the foot-race (758-66): 758-9 resemble 375-6; for ἐκφέρειν ('race ahead') cf. also Xen. Eq. 3.4 ('run away'). The vivid description of the closeness of the contestants (378-81) is echoed by 760-6; cf. especially 765 with 380-1. ἐπιβησομένοισιν (379) means 'being on the point of mounting', as at 5.46; cf. Od. 11.608 αlel βαλέοντι ἐοικώς. In 380-1 θέρμετο agrees with μετάφρενον as if the intervening phrase were a parenthesis (cf. Chantraine, GH II 19). For the formular phrase μετάφρενον εὐρέε τ' ὤμω cf. 16.791-2n. The rest of 381 means 'with their heads lying right on top of him they sped on'. Cf. 13.385 τώ δὲ πνείοντε κατ' ὥμων, 17.502 ἑμπνείοντε μεταφρένω (both of horses); S. El. 718-19 ὁμοῦ γὰρ ἀμφὶ νῶτα καὶ τροχῶν βάσεις | ἦφριζον, εἰσἑβαλλον ἰππικαὶ πνοαί; Virgil, G. 3.111 (the charioteers) umescunt spumis flatuque sequentum. Demetrius (On Style 210) praises the vividness of 379-81.

382-4 As in the battle scenes an event which was about to happen is dramatically averted by divine intervention (cf. Reinhardt, IuD 107ff.). Here one could rationalize 384 by saying that Diomedes dropped his whip, and this is attributed to the god's action. But at 388-90 the return of the whip by Athene must be a supernatural event, similar to her return of Akhilleus' spear at 22.276-7.

382 Cf. 527 τῶ κέν μιν παρέλασσ' οὐδ' ἀμφήριστον ἔθηκεν. ἀμφήριστος occurs only here in Homer, and then in Hellenistic and later literature. In later Greek a drawn contest is described as lɛpά, because the prize was consecrated to the god.

385 X00µévoio: this verb often indicates frustrated distress more than anger; e.g. 22.291 etc.; cf. Arn/A, bT and A. W. H. Adkins, JHS 89 (1969) 13-14 and 17.

387 ol dé ol was Aristarchus' reading, whereas Ptolemy of Ascalon preferred ol dè ol (=sui, 'his own'): cf. Hrd/A and Erbse, Beiträge zur Überlieferung der Iliasscholien (Munich 1960) 317 n. 1. The latter seems preferable for 'his own'. $i\beta\lambda\alpha\phi\theta\eta\sigma\alpha\nu$ ('were thwarted') is used, as often, with reference to a god; see on 22.15.

388–9 The interlaced word-order is unusual, and presumably designed to juxtapose the two gods' names in the same verse. ἐλεφηράμενος seems to mean something like βλάπτειν here, e.g. 'thwarting', or 'frustrating'. This rare epic word occurs only here in Il.; cf. Od. 19.565 where dreams which come through the gate of ivory (ἐλέφαντος) ἐλεφαίρονται, ἕπε' ἀκράαντα φέροντες (Privitera translates 'dannegiano', i.e. 'are harmful'); and Hes. Th. 330 where the Nemean lion ἐλεφαίρετο φῦλ' ἀνθρώπων, where it must mean 'damage'. Hesychius has ἑλεφῆραι· ἀπατῆσαι, and the verb is not otherwise attested.

391-2 κοτέουσα echoes 383. $\hbar\xi\epsilon$ ('broke') is a rist from αγνυμι, contracted from ἕαξε. Cf. Od. 19.539 κατ' αὐχένας $\hbar\xi\epsilon$, and Chantraine, GH 1 34. bT observe that this verse (and perhaps the following ones; cf. bT 396) imitates with its roughness the sound of the breaking chariot.

392-4 Cf. 6.38 43, where Adrestos' horses break the end of their yokepole ($\dot{\rho}\nu\mu\dot{\sigma}s$) and run free, while he crashes (42 = 23.394); also 16.370-1, where many horses do this at the Achaean trench.

393 àµ ϕ is off the track' (so bTD), and $i\lambda v \sigma \theta \eta$ 'rolled' or 'slipped' to the ground (cf. Mazon, REA 42 (1940) 260-1).

394-6 Verse 394 = 6.42. All three verbs occur only in these verses in Homer, and $\theta p u \lambda i \sigma \sigma \epsilon u$ only once later in Lycophron. $\pi \epsilon p \iota \delta p u \delta \eta$ and $\theta p u \lambda i \chi \theta \eta$ are again harsh-sounding words (bT 396). The whole passage very vividly describes Eumelos' crash.

396-7 τώ δέ οἱ ὄσσε ... φωνή = 17.695 -6.

398–400 Diomedes skilfully avoids a collision and takes the lead, aided by Athene's inspiration of his horses.

401-57 We now come to the second contest, between Menelaos and Antilokhos, the most exciting incident in the games.

402 Cf. 19.399 σμερδαλέον δ' Ιπποισιν εκέκλετο πατρός εοίο.

403-17 Antilokhos' speech of encouragement to his horses is similar to those addressed to a human audience, with its appeal to their sense of shame, its threat of reprisals if they fail, and its practical promise of support at the end.

403 'Get a move on, you two as well, go flat out!' $\ell\mu\beta\alpha/\nu\epsilon\nu$ is really an athletic term from other sports, like $\kappa\alpha\tau\alpha\beta\alpha/\nu\epsilon\nu$, meaning to enter the contest (cf. 'get in there and win!'): cf. E. El. 113, Ar. Ran. 377, Ec. 478, and Eustathius' comments here (1308.11ff.). For $\tau\iota\tau\alpha/\nu\epsilon\tau\nu$ see on 323-5.

405-6 Aristarchus (Arn/A) athetized these two verses, objecting that Antilokhos cannot know about Athene's aid, and also that it is not necessary to say they are Diomedes' horses as this is clear in any case. The first objection seems unreasonable, since it would be quite natural to infer divine aid for Diomedes from Athene here from previous occasions. The second point fits in with Aristarchus' general view of the way in which verses are added to fill out the sense. They could have been added for this reason, but in themselves there is nothing wrong with them. olow 'Abhvn ... $\delta \theta \eta \kappa v$ resembles 399-400.

408 έλεγχείην: cf. 342, and 22.100. In military speeches of exhortation the Achaeans are called ἐλέγχεα, ἐλεγχέες (4.242 etc.).

409 For Aĩθη θῆλυς ἐοῦσα cf. 19.97 "Hpη θῆλυς ἑοῦσα (in the context of Zeus, the highest god, being deceived by 'Herē, a female'). τίη λείπεσθε, φέριστοι; is an urgent and cajoling appeal.

410 = Od. 16.440, and cf. Il. 1.212 etc. ώδε γάρ έξερέω, τὸ δὲ καὶ τετελεσμένον ἔσται. A verse of this kind is often used to introduce a threat.

411–14 Cf. 8.186–91 (with comment), where Hektor appeals to his horses to repay the provisions which Andromakhe gave them: $v\bar{v}v \mu oi \tau \eta v$ κομιδην άποτίνετον ... 191 άλλ' έφομαρτεῖτον καὶ σπεύδετον ... Schol. A mentions a variant βιοτή for κομιδή in 411, but the parallel with book 8 makes the case for κομιδή, and βιοτή only occurs in Homer at Od. 4.565 (cf. Wackernagel, Kleine Schriften II 1136).

412 This verse was condemned by Agar (CR 14 (1900) 4) as absurd, and as added to fill the sense of 411. He also disliked the contraction of $-\kappa \tau \epsilon \nu \epsilon \epsilon \iota$ to $-\kappa \tau \epsilon \nu \epsilon \epsilon$ (but cf. 15.65, 15.68, 19.104). The first objection is literal-minded.

413 'If through your losing heart we win a worse prize.' The dual άποκηδήσαντε with φερώμεθα is odd. It is easy to say that the poet is no longer aware of the proper force of the dual, but it may mean 'you and I together', or else be influenced by the other duals in this passage: cf. Arn/A, Chantraine, GH II 27-8. ἀποκηδεῖν occurs only here in Homer, and once later in Sophron (78).

414 ἐφομαρτεῖτον: Did/AT mention a variant ἐφαμαρτεῖτον, which Aristarchus probably preferred. At 12.412 he read ἐφαμαρτεῖτε, and generally he wished to read ἁμαρτή, ἁμαρτεῖν etc., probably rightly, as the forms with omicron are likely to be due to Attic influence: cf. Wackernagel, Sprachliche Untersuchungen 70–1.

415–16 Antilokhos' skill and watchfulness echo Nestor's advice (cf. 312– 18, 323, 326), although he uses a different ruse. For $\sigma \tau \epsilon i v \omega \pi \tilde{\omega}$ ev $\delta \delta \tilde{\omega}$ cf. 7.143, and 419–21, 427 below. $\pi \alpha \rho \alpha \delta \check{\omega} \epsilon v \sigma \alpha$ ('to slip past') is a orist of $\pi \alpha \rho \alpha \delta \check{\omega} \epsilon \sigma \theta \alpha$, which occurs only here in Homer, but is common in classical Greek.

417–18 ώς ἕφαθ' ... ἐπιδραμέτην: this is repeated at 446–7, after Menelaos' briefer speech of encouragement to his horses. Cf. Sarpedon's exhortation to his men at 12.408 -12, followed at 413–14 by ώς ἕφαθ', οἱ δὲ ᾶνακτος ὑποδείσαντες ὁμοκλὴν | μᾶλλον ἐπέβρισαν ...

418–24 'And soon after warlike Antilokhos saw a narrowing of the hollow way. There was a gully in the ground, where pent-up torrent water had broken away part of the track, and hollowed out all the ground: along this Menelaos drove, to avoid the wheels running side by side. But Antilokhos turned aside his horses and drove them outside the track, and diverting them a little he kept pressing on."

The exact details of how Antilokhos succeeds in overtaking Menelaos are not immediately clear. It looks as if he is beginning to draw level at the point where they are reaching the narrow part of the track. Here Menelaos drives along what is left of the road, and Antilokhos begins to drive outside the track. At some stage he has to rejoin it: when he does so, it is too narrow for both of them and Menelaos gives way to avoid a collision (429-37). In any case, it is clear from the sequel that Antilokhos is engaging in dangerous and unfair tactics, even if he never quite admits that he was guilty (cf. 570-95).

The attempt by M. Gagarin (CP 78 (1983) 35-9) to prove that Antilokhos overtakes at the turn, and so is following Nestor's advice, fails to explain satisfactorily the point of 373-5, which explicitly states that they were on the return lap.

420 ρωχμός: only here in Homer, and then in Hellenistic poetry and later prose. Herodian read ρωγμός.

421-2 Aristophanes read ἕνερθεν instead of ἁπαντα (Did/T), and for τῆ Aristarchus read ῆ. For ἕχειν meaning 'drive' see on 13.326-7. ἀματροχία occurs only here in Homer, and then in Hellenistic poetry; cf. Od. 15.451 ἁματροχόων (or ἅμα τροχόων). It most probably refers to the two chariots running side by side, rather than to an actual collision of wheels. Porphyry (quoted by Erbse on 422) criticizes Callimachus (fr. 383.10) for using the word as if it meant the same as ἁρματροχία, which occurs at line 505.

424 παρακλίνας presumably means that he followed a diversion, picking up the sense of 423. Schol. A mentions a variant παρακλινθείς, and a few MSS read παρεκκλίνας, which was probably Eustathius' reading (1309.12) and would be possible.

425-47 Menelaos' three speeches (426-8, 439-41, 443-5) are all only three verses long, reflecting both the urgency of the situation and also his own laconic character (cf. 3.213-15). In 426-8 the succession of abrupt, brief clauses is dramatically effective, and in 439-43 there is an unusual run of five verses without any enjambment. Cf. (for example) the staccato urgency of 16.126-30, and Higbie, Measure and Music 69-72.

426 $1\pi\pi \dot{\alpha} \zeta_{\epsilon\sigma} \theta \alpha_i$ occurs only here in Homer, but is common in classical Greek.

427 εὐρυτέρη παρελάσσαι ('there will be more room to pass') seems to be the reading of T and one papyrus. εὐρυτέρῃ παρελάσσαις (optative), read by most MSS, is possible but less attractive.

428 ἅρματι κύρσας: either 'striking my chariot' or 'hitting me with your chariot'.

430 ώς ούκ άτοντι ἐοικώς: 'as though like one who does not hear'. The double use of ώς ... ἐοικώς stresses that Antilokhos is pretending not to hear.

Copyrighted Material

431–3 δσσα δέ... τόσσον έπιδραμέτην: for such comparisons cf. 15.358–9 δσον τ' έπὶ δουρὸς ἐρωὴ | γίγνεται, ὅππότ' ἀνὴρ σθένεος πειρώμενος ἦσι (with comment); 16.589–92 ὄσση δ' αἰγανέης ῥιπὴ ταναοῖο τέτυκται | ἦν ῥά τ' ἀνὴρ ἀφέῃ πειρώμενος ἢ ἐν ἀέθλω ... | τόσσον ἐχώρησαν Τρῶες ...; and similarly 10.351–4 ἀλλ' ὅτε δή ῥ' ἀπέην ὅσσον τ' ἐπὶ οὖρα πέλονται | ἡμιόνων ... | τώ μὲν ἐπεδραμέτην ...

431 δίσκου ούρα κατωμαδίοιο: 'the limits of a discus swung from the shoulder'; cf. also 523 to δίσκουρα. κατωμάδιος occurs only here in Homer, and then in Hellenistic poetry; cf. κατωμαδόν 15.352, 23.500.

433 With al 5' contrast 446 ol 5^{\pm} of these horses; T reads tol 5^{\pm} here. One is female, one male (295). Apúngav $\delta\pi$ log ω means that they slowed down and fell behind.

435-7 An elaborate tricolon to describe the potential crash and its results. Notice the parallel structure of the first hemistichs of 435 and 436, with their heavy spondaic scansion and two quadrisyllabic verbs, echoed more lightly by the verb in the same position in 437. The third, longer, clause forms the crescendo of the series, and effectively juxtaposes the contestants' eagerness for victory and their humiliating fall.

435 συγκυρείν (cf. 428 κύρσας) occurs nowhere else in Homer, but is common later. For δίφρους ... ευπλεκέας cf. 335, with comment. αναστρέφειν occurs only here in II; cf. Od. 13.326 αναστρέφομαι.

439-41 Menelaos' first speech was more restrained. Now that he realizes Antilokhos' ploy is deliberate, he vents his feelings in an angry outburst.

439 Cf. 3.365 = Od. 20.201 Ζεῦ πάτερ, οῦ τις σεῖο θεῶν δλοώτερος άλλος; also II. 15.569 (Menelaos) 'Αντίλοχ', οῦ τις σεῖο νεώτερος άλλος 'Αχαιῶν.

440 Epp', $\epsilon \pi \epsilon i$ où $\sigma \epsilon \ldots$: cf. 8.164 Eppe ... $\epsilon \pi \epsilon i$ où $\kappa \ldots$, 22.498 Epp' où two; où $\sigma \delta s$ $\gamma \epsilon \ldots$, Od. 10.75 Epp', $\epsilon \pi \epsilon i \ldots$, etc. Eppe is a coarse expression, expressing strong emotion. For the rest of the verse see on 305. $\phi \epsilon \mu \epsilon \nu$ is imperfect here.

441 Cf. 581-5, where Menelaos challenges Antilokhos to swear an oath that he has not deliberately used a trick to defeat him.

442-5 Verse 442 = 8.184. For έστατον άχνυμένω κῆρ (443) cf. 284. [φθήσονται τούτοισι ...] ή ὑμῖν are emphatic at the beginning of 444 and 445: 'their feet and knees will tire first before yours do'. For this construction (φθάνειν ... ή ...) cf. Od. 11.58, Hdt. 6.108.

446-7 See on 417-18.

(c) 448–98 The quarrel between Idomeneus and the lesser Aias. Among the spectators Idomeneus says that Diomedes seems to be in the lead, but Aias abusively contradicts him, saying that Eumelos is. Akhilleus intervenes to prevent the quarr I from deteriorating

This entertaining episode belongs to the type where the scene shifts from action to debate at a dramatic point, leaving the outcome in suspense.

....

- +

r

The closest parallel is with 22.166-87, where after the simile comparing Akhilleus and Hektor to racehorses at funeral games the scene changes to the gods as spectators debating what is to happen (see comment). The poet shows us how violent are the emotions just below the surface: the quarrel flares up over nothing, in the most realistic way.

The quarrels arising from the chariot-race echo the main themes of the poem, Akhilleus' quarrel with Agamemnon and his fatal wrath. Now that this passion has finally spent itself, it is Akhilleus himself who controls the emotions of his companions, a remarkable reversal.

The scene also contrasts the characters of Idomeneus and Aias, the former polite, cautious and unassertive in his opening speech (cf. 4.266-71, with comment), the latter abusive and unreasonable, accusing Idomeneus of the very fault from which he himself suffers most (474 with AbT, 478-9 and 483-4). It is no coincidence that this foul-mouthed character will end the foot-race ignominiously by slipping in cow-dung and getting a mouthful of it, to the derision of the spectators (774-84 with AbT 777; cf. Thersites in book 2). The lesser Aias' inability to control his tongue will ultimately cause his destruction by the gods (cf. Od. 4.499-511, and sec on 2.527).

448-9 The spectators of this race are well portrayed on the early-sixthcentury Attic va e painting by Sophilos, which shows them on a stepped platform, some seated and others standing. Some of them are gesticulating excitedly as they look towards the four horses who approach, drawing a chariot. The nearest of the leading horses is white, outlined in purple (a reminiscence of $453-5^{2}$), two others have black faces and purple necks, and the fourth is black; cf. P. E. Arias, M. Hirmer and B. Shefton, A History of Greek Vase Painting (London 1962) pl. 39; and the description by Johansen, Iliad in Early Greek Art 9t-2. In the scene of the funeral games of Pelias on the Chest of Cypselus the spectators were also portrayed (Pausanias 5.17.9). Cf. also Laser, Arch. Hom. T 83-5. Verse 449 resembles 372.

450-1 bT comment that Idomeneus was clearly anxious about his companion Meriones, and so went up to a vantage point to watch: not an unreasonable guess as to why the poet should choose to introduce him at this point. Cf. 681-2, where Diomedes supports his cousin Eurualos, and 24.697-702, where Kassandre is first to see Priam's return. For $tv \pi \epsilon pi \omega \pi \eta$ (451) cf. 14.8, Od. 10.146 $ts \pi \epsilon p i \omega \pi \eta v$.

452-3 τοῖο ... ἔγνω: literally 'and hearing him while still afar urging on his horses he recognized him'. For ὁμοκλητῆρος ἀκούσας | cf. 12.273. The chiastic structure of 452-3 is neat, the two similar verbs being juxtaposed at the beginning of 453.

454 todow is 'so far', i.e. but for the mark on his brow; cf. 18.378-9, 22.322-5. $\phi \overline{v} \overline{v} \xi$ ('chestnut') is used only here in Homer as an adjective.

455 περίτροχον ήθτε μήνη: 'circular, like the (full) moon'. περίτροχος is found only here in Homer, later in Hellenistic poetry, etc. μήνη recurs in Homer only at 19.374, σελήνη at 18.484.

456 = 271 etc. (see comment).

457-72 Idomeneus' speech has a ring-structure (cf. Lohmann, Reden 29-30):

- (a) $\begin{cases} 457-8 & \text{Do I alone see the horses, or do you too?} \end{cases}$
- ^(a) [459-60 The leading horses and driver seem different from before.
- (b) 460-1 The others must have had an accident on the plain.
- (c) 462-4 They were first round the turn, but I cannot see them now.
- (b) 465-8 Perhaps the accident happened at the turn itself.
- (a) {469-70 You look as well, for I cannot see clearly.
- (a) {470-2 I think the leader is Diomedes.

Throughout the speech the suspense is built up, and at the end the postponement of the name Diomedes, and the increasing precision of his description in 470-2, are surely designed by the poet for deliberate effect. The frequency of integral enjambment ($5 \times$ in 16 verses) reflects the excitement of the speaker.

457 = 2.79 etc.

458 αύγάζομαι: 'discern', perhaps with the idea of seeing clearly (e.g. cf. A.R. 1.155 of Lunkeus); cf. West on Hes. Erga 478, 'I suppose the essential idea is "fix the gaze on" a particular object.' It occurs only here in Homer. The polite question at 457-8 resembles Nestor's in a similar situation at 10.533-4.

459-60 This is directly contradicted by Aias at 480-1, echoing Idomeneus' words. mapoirepot ('in front') recurs at 459 and 480, and not again until Apollonius Rhodius (4.982); cf. Chantraine, GH I 258. For $lv\delta d\lambda rac$ ('appears') cf. 17.214 and 2× Od.

460-1 al $\delta \epsilon$ refers to Eumelos' mares, explained by al ... Hoav. atroù is 'out there', with $\epsilon v \pi \epsilon \delta l \omega$. $\kappa \epsilon l \sigma \epsilon$ means 'up to that point'; Zenodotus and Aristophanes read $\kappa \epsilon l \vartheta l$.

462-8 What Idomeneus presumably means is that he saw Eumelos' horses in front as they reached the turn, but could not see clearly what happened after that as they actually went round it, and he assumes that the accident happened there (so bT 462-3, although T adds that this actually was the place where Eumelos crashed). Several modern scholars have wished to delete 462-4, because they thought 462 was inconsistent with 465-6 (e.g. cf. Ameis-Hentze, Leaf). Von der Mühll suggested reading mport instead of mepl in 462, to remove the problem (Ausgewählte Kleine Schriften, Basel 1976, 10-11).

Another objection is that if Idomeneus could see the turn he should be able to see clearly who is in the lead on the home stretch. But Idomeneus 462 τάς is 'those ones' (demonstrative). For περί τέρμα βαλούσας ('racing round the turn') cf. 639 πλήθει πρόσθε βαλόντες, and 11.722 εlς άλα βάλλων. The intransitive use of βάλλειν is very rare (cf. Fraenkel on A. Ag. 1172, pp. 534-5), and Leaf may well be right to see its use here and at 639 as another instance of 'racing slang' (cf. also 572).

× * ,

- +

1

463 of $\pi\eta$: there was an ancient variant of $\pi\omega$, which some of our MSS read.

464 παπταίνετον: Aristarchus (Did/AT) read παπταίνεται.

465-6 This is presumably an alternative suggestion to 460-1. For ovor buváoon cf. Od. 5.319; the usual Homeric form is buvhoarto. Verse 466 means 'to keep good control at the post, and he failed to hold the turn'. For ev oxeo en cf. 325 etc.

467 σύν θ': A records a variant κατά θ', which some MSS have.

468 Εξηρώησαν: 'swerved off the course'; the compound verb occurs only here in Homer, later only at Theocr. Id. 25.189 Εξηρώησε κελεύθου.

469 avaorabov recurs at 9.671, and apparently nowhere else.

470-2 δοκέει ... Διομήδης: For the effect of climax see on 457-72. Aristarchus (Arn/A) athetized 471, as out of place in the mouth of Idomeneus, but ἀνήρ seems to require qualification, and the line adds to the climactic effect (cf. von der Mühll, Ausgewahlte Kleine Schriften 9). Neither 471 nor 472 occurs elsewhere to describe Diomedes. For the phrasing cf. 19.122 fiδη ἀνήρ γέγον' ἐσθλός, δς Άργείοισιν ἀνάξει (etc.), and 7.163 (etc.) Τυδείδης... κρατερός Διομήδης |. Diomedes' father Tudeus was from Aetolia, but he himself was king in Argos (14.113-25).

473-81 Aias' reply is grossly insulting, for no apparent reason. bT (on 476) say that 'his abuse is boorish: but the poet is portraying the characteristic behaviour of spectators'. The most striking feature of the speech is the repetition of $\lambda\alpha\beta\rho\epsilon\dot{\nu}\epsilon\alpha$... $\lambda\alpha\beta\rho\epsilon\dot{\nu}\epsilon\alpha$... $\lambda\alpha\beta\rho\alpha\gamma\phi\eta\nu$. $\lambda\alpha\beta\rho\alpha\gamma\phi\eta\eta$, seems to recur only once, in Adamantius Judaeus (fourth century A.D.), $\lambda\alpha\beta\rho\epsilon\dot{\nu}\phi\mu\alpha$ nowhere else. $\lambda\alpha\beta\rho\phi$ s in Homer is always applied to the violent natural forces of wind and water, but later it is used metaphorically of rash or loud-mouthed people (Theognis 634, Simon. 177 Bergk, Pindar, O. 2.86, P. 2.87, S. Aj. 1147). These words aptly characterize Aias himself here (see on 448-98).

• 1

474 τί πάρος λαβρεύεαι; 'why have vou always had such a big mouth?' For πάρος in this sense cf. 4.264, Od. 8.36, etc.

475 | iππoi ἀερσίποδες: 3.327 is the only other Homeric instance of this phrase; cf. HyAphr 211 | iππous ἀρσίποδας. The phrase πολέος πεδίοιο δίενται implies that they still have plenty of ground to cover.

476 Cf. 13.361-2, where Idomeneus is said to be μ eo α im δ hos ('grizzled').

477 For the dual oooe with singular verb see on 12.466.

479 Aristarchus (Arn/AT) unjustly athetized this verse, because he thought that it was added to fill up the sense of 478, and because he misunderstood the point of $\pi \alpha \rho \dot{\alpha} \dots \dot{\alpha} \lambda \lambda \sigma_i$, which implies that Idomeneus should not show off in the presence of his betters.

480 αὐταί: 'the same ones'; cf. 12.225 etc. This is much better than the variant αὐτε.

481 εὔληρα ('reins') is a rare word, only here in Homer, and later only twice in Quintus of Smyrna (4.508, 9.156), but cf. Epich. 178 αὔληρα. Evidently Neoptolemus of Parium knew of other instances (cf. bT 481). It may be related to Latin lora (cf. Chantraine, Dict. s.v.).

483-4 Cf. 3.39 = 13.769 Δύσπαρι, είδος άριστε, γυναιμανές, 17.142 Έκτορ, είδος άριστε, μάχης άρα πολλὸν ἐδεύεο, and see on 24.261. Aristarchus (Did/AT) read νεϊκος, as do some MSS, against the vulgate νείκει. κακοφραδής occurs only here in Homer, later in Apollonius (3.936) and Euphorion (98.2). For ὅτι τοι νόος ἐστὶν ἀπηνής cf. 16.35, where it is used of Akhilleus.

485 The enclitic vvv occurs in Homer only here and at 10.105. $\pi\epsilon\rho$ 1860 means 'let us make a bet'. This form of the first person of the dual in -000 occurs elsewhere only at S. El. 950 and Ph. 1079, and twice in Athenaeus 98A (as examples of false archaism). The variant $\pi\epsilon\rho$ 1860 may be right, and $\pi\epsilon\rho$ 1860 due to Attic influence: cf. J. Wackernagel, Vorlesungen über Syntax I (Basel 1920) 81-2. $\pi\epsilon\rho$ 186000 at recurs at Od. 23.78, and several times later in comedy, suggesting a colloquial flavour. It is amusing to find betting associated with horse-racing already in Homer.

486 ίστορα: 'arbiter'; cf. 18.501.

487 Instead of the subjunctive $\gamma v \omega_{\eta 5}$ nearly all MSS read the optative $\gamma v o(\eta 5)$, which may well be correct: cf. Chantraine, GH II 271. Idomeneus now shows just how sure he is that he is right.

488–98 This is a dangerous moment, as Aias springs to his feet in anger, but the quarrel is skilfully defused by Akhilleus. Verses 490-1 recall other moments of crisis, where disaster is averted by divine rather than human intervention. One also thinks of Nestor's unsuccessful attempt at mediation between Akhilleus and Agamemnon in the quarrel in book 1 (254–84), and that of Hephaistos in the divine scene at the end of that Book (573–83). Verse 488 = 754.

Copyrighted Material

490 'And then the quarrel between both would have gone still further.'

491 'Akhilleus as director of the games ($d\gamma\omega\nu\sigma\theta\epsilon\tau\eta\varsigma$) is also in charge of ensuring good discipline' (bT). This was an important function of the officials who presided over Greek games in the classical period: cf. Harris, Athletes 157-8, on measures to keep crowds of excited spectators under control. At Olympia an early inscription calls the judges διαιτατήρες. For καl φάτο μῦθον A records the variant καl κατέρυκε, as in 734.

492-3 Verse 492 echoes 489. Verse 493 is a weak one, and koxois seems intolerable after $\chi\alpha\lambda$ emoiouv: T suggests &vox, which is clearly a conjecture, and koxois (in two MSS) is little better. The scansion of Alov as if it were a spondee ($\sigma\tau$ l χ os $\lambda\alpha\gamma\alpha\rho$ os) is also very unusual: cf. Chantraine, GH 1 103-4. The verse was rejected by Heyne, and could well be an addition.

494 Cf. Od. 6.286 καὶ δ' ἄλλῃ νεμεσῶ, ἢ τις τοιαῦτά γε ῥέζοι, and 1.47 ὡς ἀπόλοιτο καὶ ἄλλος ὅ τις τοιαῦτά γε ῥέζοι. For the optative cf. Chantraine, GH II 248. In view of Akhilleus' earlier conduct it is ironic that he should say this now.

495-8 Again the ancient commentators find this realistic in terms of their own experience. Cf. T (on 497): 'this is just how some older and steadier spectators behave nowadays at games, telling people not to anticipate the outcome before it occurs'.

(d) 499-652 The end of the race and the awarding of the prizes. Diomedes takes the first prize, followed by Antilokhos, Menelaos and Meriones, with Eumelos last. Akhilleus wishes to give Eumelos second prize, but is dissuaded by Antilokhos, and gives him an extra one instead. Menelaos accuses Antilokhos of ch ating, but is appeased by Antilokhos' offer to give up his prize. The last prize is given to Nestor, who recalls his own athletic exploits in youth

This remarkable scene is the dénouement of the chariot-race, in which the consequences of the earlier events are worked out and a resolution achieved. Akhilleus considers that the prizes should be awarded according to the true merits of the contestants, irrespective of the outcome. But this, as Antilokhos objects, disregards the divine patronage which tipped the scales in favour of Diomedes. The quarrel over the second prize also develops in a way which echoes the main theme of the poem: like both Agamemnon and Akhilleus in book 1, Antilokhos feels that he is being unjustly deprived of his due and refuses to accept this. Akhilleus' resolution of this issue sparks off the following protest of Menelaos: once again injured honour is at stake and he demands justice. But this quarrel takes a very different course from the quarrel of Akhilleus and Agamemnon, for first Antilokhos yields to the older man, and then Menelaos gives way to him in turn, recognizing the value of Antilokhos' past support and friendship. The touching quality of this reconciliation is beautifully expressed by the simile at 597-600.

• ;

Finally Akhilleus, who had ignored Nestor's mediating advice in book 1, now pays a special tribute to his venerable seniority. Nestor's speech, as well as complementing his earlier one to Antilokhos, may have a paradeigmatic function like his other reminiscences, for his defeat by the sons of Aktor echoes Antilokhos' defeat of Menelaos, in the suggestion that they had an unfair advantage which they used because of their jealous eagerness for victory ($6_{38}-4_{2}$; cf. 6_{39} with 5_{72}). This final exchange between Akhilleus and Nestor also sets the games in a wider context: Nestor will keep the prize as a KEUMANOV in memory of Patroklos, whom they will see no more, and for Nestor himself the days of heroic exploits are long over ($6_{18}-2_{3}$). Characteristically the poet looks both to past and future here, and the whole episode closes quietly, on a nostalgic note not unlike what we find in parts of the Odyssey.

499-506 Diomedes' rapid arrival is described in a vivid passage which resembles the start of the race at 362-72. In both, the main motifs are the same: the charioteers whipping on their horses (362-4, 500), their speed (364-5, 500-1), the clouds of dust (365-6, 502), and the chariots skimming lightly over the plain (368-9, 503-6), and both are rounded off by a final reprise of the theme of the flying horses (372, 506).

500 Cf. 15.352 μάστιγι κατωμαδόν ήλασεν Ιππους (with comment). μάστι is an Ionic dative of μάστις, which recurs at Od. 15.182; cf. the verb μαστίω. Most of our MSS substitute the more familiar form μάστιγι, which would not scan here.

501 Cf. Od. 13.83 ύψοσ' άειρόμενοι βίμφα πρήσσουσι κέλευθον. The idea is the same as at 475, Ιπποι άερσίποδες.

502 $\beta \alpha \theta \dot{\alpha} \mu \gamma \gamma \epsilon \xi \beta \alpha \lambda \lambda ov |: cf. 11.536 = 20.501$. There it is used of drops or sprinklings of blood (cf. probably $\dot{\beta} \alpha \nu \omega$).

503-4 Cf. 2.777 άρματα δ' εὐ πεπικασμένα (with comment on 777-8). There πεπικασμένα refers to chariots being 'closely covered' or wrapped up when stored away, whereas here it must be used to describe a facing of metal plates which covers the chariot-body: cf. 4.226 (etc.) άρματα ποίκιλα χαλκῷ, 10.438 ἀρμα δέ ol χρυσῷ τε καὶ ἀργύρῳ εὖ ἦσκηται (of Rhesos' chariot), and 8.320 = 23.509 δίφροιο ... παμφανόωντος. Chariots plated with precious metals are attested in Egypt in the mid-second millennium B.C., and it is assumed that they were used also by the Greeks in the late Bronze Age: cf. Lorimer, HM 327, J. Wiesner, Arch. Hom. F 14 and 47. The Linear B tablets certainly attest the use of silver and bronze in connexion with the wheels of chariots: cf. Ventris and Chadwick, Documents 369-75, and Crouwel, Chariots 88-90. For tin as a precious metal cf. 11.25, 18.474, etc.

The poet draws attention to the chariots' ornamentation because the whole passage is graphic in character. T comment on 503-4: 'by emphasizing its costliness he makes us marvel at the scene. He has also given life to the chariot, as if it were speeding on of its own accord.' Plutarch (Mor. 747E) quotes 503-4 (appara ... interpexov) as an example of mimetic language, where the collocation and rhythm of the words imitate the sense. His other examples (E. fr. 985 N. and Pindar, O. 1.20-1) suggest that he has in mind the predominantly dactylic rhythm and the lightness of sound of appara ... neruxaaptva kaasitépa re, and of akuntóbessi interpexov. The verb means that the chariot ran closely behind the horses, as if about to overtake them.

504-6 οὐδέ τι πολλή ... κονίη: T rightly comments that the hyperbole is moderated and made credible by the use of πολλή. Contrast 20.226-9, of semi-divine horses, and the imitation of 23.504-6 by Quintus of Smyrna (4.516-17) οὐδ' ἀρματροχίας Ιδέειν σθένον οὐδὲ ποδοῖιν | ἐν χθονὶ σήματα, τόσσον ὑπεξέφερον δρόμον Ιπποι. See also on 764. ἀρματροχίη (505) occurs only here in Homer, and then in Hellenistic and later literature.

507-13 After the flurry and excitement of Diomedes' arrival $\sigma \tau \eta \delta \epsilon \mu \epsilon \sigma \omega$ $\epsilon \nu \delta \gamma \tilde{\omega} \nu \epsilon \nu \delta \gamma \tilde{\omega} \nu \epsilon \sigma \eta$ sweat pours from them. All is over in no time: Diomedes has dismounted and laid down his whip, and Sthenelos has already (without delay: $\sigma \nu \delta \epsilon \mu \delta \tau \eta \sigma \epsilon \nu$) claimed the woman and tripod as prizes, and handed them over to his companions, and is beginning to unyoke the horses, before Antilokhos and Menelaos arrive. In this way the poet not only gives us a sense of the brisk and lively scene at the winning-post, but also suggests that the others are some distance behind.

507-9 πολύς δ' άνεκήκιεν Ιδρώς: cf. 13.705 πολύς άνακηκίει Ιδρώς, and 8.543 \rightleftharpoons Od. 4.39 Ιππους ... Ιδρώοντας. Delebecque (Cheval 54) notes the accuracy of this description: a horse sweats especially from its neck and chest (cf. also 11.282). Verse 509 = 8.320 (see comment).

510-13 Sthenelos, Diomedes' close companion, is a lively and energetic character: cf. especially 4.403-10 (with comments), and perhaps also his name and epithet here, $1601405 \Sigma 060505$ suggesting strength. For 0051 $\mu drn 000 | cf. 16.474$, and for the prize 23.262-4. Here Aristarchus observed that dy_{EV} and fepeiv are used in their proper and distinct senses (cf. Arn/AT 512-13, and Lehrs, De Aristarchi studiis 137). In 513 we should keep the imperfect ENEV, as it implies that Sthenelos was just unyoking the horses when Antilokhos appeared. Leaf and others objected to the \bar{v} , but cf. Od. 7.74 $\lambda \bar{v}_{EV}$, and Chantraine, GH 1 372-3.

514 N $\eta\lambda\eta$ ios: as grandson of Neleus (cf. Alaxl $\delta\eta$ s of Akhilleus, etc.). Elsewhere this is applied to Nestor.

516-27 Menelaos has caught up, as he said he would (444-5), but just fails to overtake in time. The comparison in 517-21 is unusual in being taken from the activity described, like expressions such as 'leading by a head'. In Bronze Age and Geometric representations the horses are usually shown as very close to the chariot, and sometimes their tails appear to touch the wheels: Cf. Wiesner, Arch. Hom. F 44 (Abb. 8), 47 (Abb. 10), Crouwel, Chariots pl. 77, P. A. L. Greenhalgh, Early Greek Warfare (Cambridge 1973) figs. 11, 14, etc. Within 517-27 there are five examples of progressive enjambment.

• 1

For 518 cf. 22.23 (with comment). Verses 19-21 are a typical expansion of the point of comparison. ovdé $\tau_1 \pi \alpha \lambda \lambda \eta$ is repeated from 504, and $\pi \alpha \lambda \epsilon \sigma_5$ $\pi \epsilon \delta(\alpha 0)$ the form $\delta(\alpha 0)$ of $\delta(\alpha 0)$ and $\delta(\alpha 0)$ of $\delta(\alpha 0)$ of 523 is discoupa: 'as much as a discus-throw' (cf. 431 with comment). δ is solute hapax.

525 Cf. 295 Αΐθην την Άγαμεμνονέην. Here this mare is dignified with a whole-verse description.

526 el $\delta \epsilon \kappa^2 \dots \gamma \epsilon \nu \epsilon \tau c$: cf. 490. This is the only instance in Homer of $\epsilon \epsilon \kappa \epsilon$ with the indicative (cf. an oracle in Hdt. 1.174), but $\kappa \epsilon$ with indicative is commoner in the apodosis of conditionals: cf. Chantraine, GH II 283.

527 See on 382. Zenodotus (Arn/A) read η $\dot{\alpha}\mu\phi\eta\rho\sigma\tau\sigma\nu$ $\dot{\epsilon}\theta\eta\kappa\epsilon\nu$ here too, but the point is surely that Menelaos would have actually defeated Antilokhos.

528-9 Μηριόνης ... 'Ιδομενῆος is repeated at 860 = 888, and cf. also 113 = 124. For δουρός έρωήν cf. 15.358, 21.251 δσον τ' έπι δουρός έρωή |.

530–1 For βάρδιστοι see on 310. ῆκιστος ('weakest') occurs only here in Homer; cf. ῆκα, and Attic ῆκιστα. The epic forms have the normal Ionic psilosis (cf. Arn/AbT). These words are thought to be related to Latin segnis (cf. Chantraine. Dict. s.v. ῆκα); σιγά ('quietly') in modern Greek has also come to mean 'slowly'. Meriones' skills lie elsewhere, in archery and javelinthrowing (850–91).

532-3 Eumelos is indeed a pitiful figure, as he appears dragging his chariot behind him, and driving his horses in front, and he evokes Akhilleus' pity. As Eustathius says, the spectacle is also slightly comic (1314.61).

532 πανύστατος: only here and at 547 (of Eumelos again) in the lliad; cf. Od. 9.452, where it refers to the ram of Poluphemos in the speech which its master makes to it. In all these cases there is an element of pathos, as often with these $\pi\alpha\nu$ - compounds (see on 22.490).

533 For ἕλκων ἄρματα καλά cf. 10.505, where a chariot is light enough to be carried. Aristarchus (Arn/AbT) seems to have taken ἑλαύνων προσσόθεν ἶππους to mean that he was walking in front of the horses, leading them by the reins and whipping them on. More probably it means that he was driving them in front of him (cf. Eust. 1315.1). προσσόθεν occurs only here, and is related to πρόσω, πρόσθεν, πρόσωθεν; the scholiasts compare ἕξοθεν in Stesichorus and Ibycus (Erbse on 533). Zenodotus read ὠκέας instead, and a few MSS read µώνυχας.

227

534–5 Verse 534 = 16.5 (cf. also 11.814). For ποδάρκης ... ἀγόρευε cf. 22.376–7 ... ποδάρκης δῖος Ἀχιλλεύς, | στὰς ἐν Ἀχαιοῖσιν ἔπεα πτερόεντ' ἀγόρευεν.

536-8 Akhilleus tactfully avoids depriving Diomedes of the first prize: T (538) detects signs of previous rivalry between them (cf. Arn/AT on 16.74, referring to Diomedes' contemptuous remarks about Akhilleus at 9.697-709), and suggests (T 536-7) that Eumelos' Thessalian origin makes Akhilleus favour him. But the point is surely more general: Eumelos is simply the best, and Akhilleus holds that he deserves recognition, on the principle that $\alpha \rho \epsilon \tau \eta$ should not suffer because of $\tau v \chi \eta$ (bT 536-7), a principle we might well expect Akhilleus to believe in.

536 λοΐσθος: only here in Homer; cf. Hes. Th. 921 etc. (but λοίσθιος is commoner in classical poetry), and 23.751 λοισθήϊα, 785 λοισθήΐον ... ἄεθλον.

537–8 ἄεθλον ... δεύτερ': the plural δεύτερα in apposition to ἄεθλον is slightly odd but not impossible; cf. also λοισθήϊα meaning 'as last prize' in 751. After 537 some ancient texts added two verses: τὰ τρίτα δ' Ἀντίλοχος, τέτρατα ξανθὸς Μενέλαος, | πεμπτὰ δὲ Μηριόνης θεράπων ἐῦς 'Ιδομενῆος. These were justly condemned by Aristarchus (Arn/AT) as un-Homeric.

539–40 The emphasis on the approval of the Achaeans is a relevant point, since what Akhilleus proposes is not according to strict justice, as Antilokhos protests. For 539 cf. 7.344 = 9.710 &s éqa θ ' ol δ ' apa mántes émýnyan baginfies.

541–2 For Άντίλοχος μεγαθύμου Νέστορος υίός | cf. 5.565, 13.400. In 542 'with a formal appeal' may be the sense of δίκη, although later it means simply 'justly'.

543-54 Antilokhos' protest is direct and frank, as suits his youth and friendship with Akhilleus (cf. bT 543). But he has an argument in favour of his plea, which is that Eumelos failed to invoke divine aid. Verses 549-50 are effective with their rhetorical anaphora, suggesting how easy it would be for Akhilleus to solve the problem. Finally 553-4 close the speech with a very emphatic refusal to give up the prize, and a threat to anyone who dares to try to make him do so. Here the echoes of book 1 are particularly strong: cf. 1.29 την δ' έγώ οὐ λύσω (Agamemnon refuses to give up Khruseis), and 298-303, where Akhilleus says that he will not fight over Briseis (298 χερσί μέν οὕ τοι ἔγωγε μαχήσομαι ~ 23.554 χείρεσσι μάχεσθαι), but if anyone tries to take away any of his other possessions there will be bloodshed (302 εί δ' άγε μήν πείρησαι ... ~ 23.553 περì δ' αὐτῆς πειρηθήτω ...). These parallels were already noted by Eustathius (1315.29ff., 53-4, 65ff.). He regards 553 as a parody of 1.29, and he says that 'Akhilleus knows by experience what it means to be robbed of one's prize', and that he recognizes in Antilokhos' echo of his own words at 1.298ff. a sign that they both share the same nobility of character: hence he smiles at his speech. Cf. also Martin, Language of Heroes 188-9.

544 ἀφαιρήσεσθαι ἄεθλον: cf. 1.161 (Akhilleus to Agamemnon) καὶ δή μοι γέρας αὐτὸς ἀφαιρήσεσθαι ἀπειλεῖς, and 182 (Agamemnon's reply) ὡς ἔμ' ἀφαιρεῖται Χρυσηΐδα Φοῖβος Ἀπόλλων.

545-6 ὅτι οἰ βλάβεν ἅρματα ... | αὐτός τ' ἐσθλὸς ἐών: βλάπτειν is applied to horses at 6.39, 23.387 and 571; cf. 22.15 ἕβλαψάς μ', ἐκάεργε, with comment. αὐτός τ' ... ἑών is an afterthought, 'and himself for all his skill'.

546-7 The principle stated here is illustrated later in the foot-race and archery contest (768-72, 863, 5, 872-81).

547 τῶκ' ('in that case') is Bentley's emendation. Most MSS read τό κεν, which would mean 'therefore', and some have τῶ κεν which is unmetrical. For πανύστατος see on 532.

548 Cf. 16.450 άλλ' εἴ τοι φίλος ἐστί, τεὸν δ' ὀλοφύρεται ἤτορ, and 14.337 άλλ' εἰ δή ῥ' ἐθέλεις καί τοι φίλον ἕπλετο θυμῷ. Here and at 16.450 (see comment) Aristarchus and some of our MSS read φίλος, against the vulgate's φίλον, but this may well be a learned 'improvement' in both cases.

549-51 Cf. 6.47-9 πολλά δ'... κειμήλια κεῖται, | χαλκός τε χρυσός τε...| τῶν κέν τοι χαρίσαιτο... (of ransom), and similarly 10.378-80, 11.132-4. It may be more relevant that Thersites' protest at 2.226-34 is similar. The casual order of the catalogue, together with the anaphora, are suited to Antilokhos' tone of protest (Eust. 1315.59ff.).

551–2 ἕπειτα... ἡἐ καὶ αὐτίκα νῦν: 'later... or even straight away now'; cf. Od. 20.63 αὐτίκα νῦν, ἢ ἕπειτα. For ἵνα... 'Αχαιοί cf. 539–40.

553–4 See on 543–54. For πειρηθήτω cf. also 21.225–6 Έκτορι πειρηθήναι | άντιβίην.

555–6 Akhilleus smiles, for the first and only time in the whole poem, and is delighted by his friend's frankness. For the phrasing cf. 1.595 etc. $\ddot{\omega}_{5}$ φάτο, μείδησεν δέ, 1.121 etc. ποδάρκης δῖος Ἀχιλλεύς, 5.695 δς ol φίλος ἦεν ἐταῖρος.

558-62 Akhilleus' speech resembles that of the Phaeacian Eurualos at Od. 8.401-5, where in response to Alkinoos' suggestion of recompense for his insult he offers a valuable sword to the stranger (Odysseus): δώσω ol τόδ' ἄορ παγχάλκεον, ῷ ἔπι κώπη | ἀργυρέη, κολεόν δὲ νεοπρίστου ἐλέφαντος | ἀμφιδεδίνηται· πολέος δέ ol ἄξιον ἔσται. Cf. D. M. Jones, Glotta 37 (1958) 115-17, who argues that the Odyssey passage is influenced by this one.

558–9 Cf. 592–4 εἰ καί νύ κεν οἴκοθεν ἄλλο $| \dots$ ἐπαιτήσειας (etc.), and 7.364 = 391 πάντ' ἑθέλω δόμεναι καὶ ἔτ' οἴκοθεν ἅλλ' ἐπιθεῖναι. οἴκοθεν means 'from my store'.

560-2 This effectively recalls 21.182-3, where Akhilleus despoils Asteropaios. Cf. the use of Asteropaios' sword as a prize at 807-8, and the description of the mixing-bowl at 740-7, which recalls the story of Lukaon (21.34ff.). These were Akhilleus' last major victims before he killed Hektor, and the mention of these precious objects is a poignant reminder of his recent career of destruction.

229

The cuirass is of bronze, to which tin has been added as a decorative material. Either this means that the whole surface has been plated with tin (as D. H. F. Gray thought, in JHS 74 (1954) 2), or that the bronze is surrounded by a circle of tin overlay or inlay. The second (a surrounding circle) seems more probable. In any case, one can compare Agamemnon's cuirass with its bands of different precious metals (11.24-5).

561 χεῦμα: only here in Homer, later in Pindar (N. 9.39), tragedy, etc. περιχεύειν is used of silver or gold ornamentation (10.294 etc.). These words probably refer to a technique of overlay, rather than to actual pouring of metal: see Gray, op. cit. 4, for details of how this was done. For φαεινοῦ κασσιτέροιο | cf. 18.612 ἐανοῦ κασσιτέροιο |, 21.592 νεοτεύκτου κασσιτέροιο |.

562 ἀμφιδεδίνηται: this verb occurs only here in ll., once in Od. at 8.405 (see on 558-62); cf. Bacchylides 17.105-7 ἀμφὶ χαίταις δὲ χρυσεόπλοκοι δίνηντο ταινίαι. It ought to mean 'is set round in a circle', but in Od. it is applied to an ivory scabbard enclosing a sword. δινωτός is used of objects decorated with precious materials, and again the precise sense is hard to determine: see on 3.391, and cf. the article by Jones mentioned on 558-62. The long compound word, occupying the first hemistich, is in itself an ornamental feature, adding dignity to the object described. The variant άξιον ('an object of value') is probably derived from Od. 8.405.

563 Automedon is a θεράπων of Akhilleus, and next in command after Patroklos: see on 9.209.

565 This verse is omitted by several MSS and a first-century B.C. papyrus. It is a slight variation of the formular verse 624 etc. (see on 1.446). Although not essential it does round off this episode more effectively than 564 would do without it.

566-85 We come now to the second round of the quarrel. Menelaos' protest is a far more solemn affair than that of Antilokhos. He is clearly furious (567), but controls his anger. He takes the sceptre, a sign that he is making a public speech, and appeals first to all the Achaean leaders for impartial justice, and then to Antilokhos' own conscience. One senses that their former friendship and Menelaos' admiration for Antilokhos' qualities (cf. 570 πρόσθεν πεπνυμένε, 581 διοτρεφές) make the situation even more distressing for him. As far as he is concerned Antilokhos has defeated him by deceit and treachery. The parallel with the resentment of Akhilleus at Agamemnon's conduct did not escape the notice of the ancient commentators: AT (565) quote 9.375 & γάρ δή μ' άπάτησε καl ήλιτεν (cf. also Eust. 1317.14).

Menelaos' speech throws light on the development of Greek justice (cf. R. J. Bonner and G. Smith, The Administration of Justice from Homer to Aristotle, Chicago 1930, 27-8). Two ways of settling the dispute are proposed, first by the arbitration of his fellow leaders, and second by an oath. The first has the disadvantage that the arbitrators may not be impartial, and so the judgement may be questioned later (cf. 574-8). The second is common to many societies at an early stage in the development of a legal system, and continued to be used in some circumstances in Greece in the classical period. It effectively makes the gods the witnesses, and so could be considered more secure, although Odysseus' grandfather Autolukos knew how to circumvent divine anger, since he surpassed all men in stealing and swearing on oath (Od. 19.395-6). Antilokhos subsequently offers Menelaos not only restitution but damages in addition, for fear of offending him and incurring divine displeasure (591-5).

567-9 iv 5' apa kñpu ξ ... 'Apyelou5: cf. 2.278-81, where Odysseus holds the sceptre and Athene as herald orders silence, and Od. 2.37-8, where the herald Peisenor gives Telemakhos the sceptre before he speaks. The participation of the herald adds to the solemnity. For the association of the sceptre with oaths and judgements see on 1.234-9, 2.109, and cf. especially the trial scene at 18.505-6. Here, as at 1.234ff., it is held by someone who protests at an injustice he has suffered. In 568 xeipl is preferable to the variant xepol, as at Od. 2.37, 18.103. For $\mu \epsilon \tau \eta v \delta \alpha$ in this position in 569 cf. 24.32 (5 × Od.).

570-85 The speech has a simple ring-structure (cf. Lohmann, Reden 23):

A 570-2 Address to Antilokhos ('Avtílox ϵ)

B 573-4 Appeal to Greeks for arbitration (άλλ' άγετ')

C 575-8 Imaginary speech against Menelaos

B 579-80 Alternative proposal of an oath (είδ' άγε)

A 581-5 Final address to Antilokhos ('Avríλοχε).

570 πρόσθεν πεπνυμένε: see on 305.

571-2 hoxvas pèr èphr àpern's means 'you have cast shame upon my valour'. It would be wrong to restrict the sense of apern' here too closely, to mean for example 'skill' (so Leaf). For $\beta\lambda$ áyas see on 387, and for $\pi\rho\delta\sigma\theta$ $\beta\alpha\lambda\omega\nu$ cf. 639 $\pi\rho\delta\sigma\theta\epsilon$ $\beta\alpha\lambda\delta\nu\tau\epsilon$, and see on 462.

574 is μ impartially' (Arn/ ATD), probably correctly. $\mu\eta\delta'$ in $\dot{\alpha}\rho\omega\gamma\eta$ means 'without favour to either side'; cf. 18.502 where the spectators at a trial are $\dot{\alpha}\mu\phi$ is $\dot{\alpha}\rho\omega\gamma$ ol.

575-8 As often in Homer fear of what men say is a potent factor. For $\mu\eta$ noté tis simpoir cf. 22.106. Verse 576 is a powerful four-word one, framed by the contrasting names. In 577-8 the two clauses introduced by $\delta\tau t$ are in parataxis, although the first is really subordinate in sense: ' ven if his horses were worse he had the advantage in rank and power'. Verse 577 echoes the second half of 572, stressing the contrast. For avtdy $\delta \xi \dots \beta \eta$ te cf. 9.498 two tep kal meldow apeth time te $\beta \eta$ te.

579-80 The suggestion of an oath arises naturally, as if it had just occurred to Menelaos as a better way of settling the issue, which is what $\delta_{11}\kappa\dot{\alpha}\sigma_{12}$ presumably means here. μ' probably represents the dative $\mu\sigma_{1}$ with $\epsilon\pi_{11}\pi\lambda\dot{\eta}\xi\epsilon_{11}$, as at 12.211. For the idea of a 'straight judgement' cf. 18.508 $\delta_{11}\kappa_{11}$ is $\delta_{11}\kappa_{11}$, 16.387 $\sigma_{11}\kappa_{11}$, $\kappa_{11}\kappa_{11}$, κ_{12} , and see Richardson on HyDem 152.

581 'Avtiλox', εl δ' άγε δεῦρο, διοτρεφές echoes Menelaos' appeal to Akhilleus at 17.685, but here the repetition of εl δ' άγε after 579 suggests Menelaos' impatience. Aristarchus athetized this verse because he thought the honorific epithet διοτρεφές unsuitable (Arn/A). T compares the use of διον 'Αλέξονδρον at 3.352, where Menelaos is praying for vengeance against Paris, and other cases of this kind (6.377, 21.331), but Aristarchus athetized 3.352 and objected to 21.331. Although διοτρεφές is a formular epithet it can still be relevant here: it is as if Menelaos is appealing to Antilokhos' own sense of honour, and suggesting that it is not in his true character to act as he did.

For the formular \hbar of μ is formular in the second 2.73-5, 23.44. It indicates that the following procedure is laid down by convention or 'ritualized'.

582-5 The solemnity of the oath is indicated by the lengthy and complex prescription, with its various parenthetic and subordinate clau es. There is a similar lengthy build-up before Agamemnon's oath at 19.252-6. Antilokhos must take hold of his whip and of the horses themselves as he swears: cf. the oath by the sceptre which Akhilleus holds at 1.234 (and similarly 10.321), and 14.271-6 where Here is asked to take hold of earth and sea with each hand when swearing. The invocation of Poseidon may be due to his rôle as god of horses, in addition to his being Antilokhos' ancestor (see on 307).

583 For Exe a few MSS read Exwv, and Eustathius quotes this, although his comments evidently assume the reading Exe. The whole of autap ... Examples is in parenthesis, giving variety to the construction. badinos occurs only here in Homer; cf. Hes. Th. 195, HyDem 183, etc. Its precise sense is not easy to pin down, but 'slender' or 'supple' seem possible.

584-5 For yaihoxov twooiyaiov cf. yaihoxos twooiyaios 13.43 etc., $-\varphi$ 9.183 etc. The terms of the oath lay stress on the element of deliberate deceit, since Antilokhos could well have claimed that he did not actually intend to impede Menelaos. $\pi\epsilon\delta\eta\sigma\alpha$ is a strong word, as Eustathius observes (1317.7). It is used by Pindar in Pelops' prayer to Poseidon for victory in the chariot-race at 0. 1.76 $\pi\epsilon\delta\alpha\sigma\sigma\nu$ tyxos Olvoudou (etc.); cf. D. Gerber (Pindar's Olympian One, Toronto 1982, p. 120) on words denoting binding and impeding in magical defixiones concerned with chariot-races. Could the use of this verb here be another echo of the racing jargon? Cf. also Pind. P. 6.32 Ιππος άρμ' ἐπέδα (when Nestor is rescued by Antilokhos), and for δόλω πεδήσαι cf. N. 5.26.

۰.

586 For the expression $\tau \partial v/\tau \eta v \delta' \alpha v/\alpha v \tau' \dots \pi \epsilon \pi v v \mu \epsilon v v \rho v \delta \alpha$ (6× 11., 43× Od., but only of Telemakhos) cf. 3.203 etc. But here the epithet clearly echoes and answers 570: 'we are being told that Antilokhos is showing himself a sensible man after all' (Parry, Language 308). Cf. for example the use of this epithet of Pouludamas when he gives his vital warning to the Trojans at 18.249(n.)., and of Antenor at 7.347, when he advises the return of Helen.

587-95 Antilokhos' reply is a masterpiece of honourable conciliation, putting all the emphasis on the rashness of youth, paying respect to Menelaos' age, reminding him of their past friendship (594-5), and of his own accord offering extra recompense. He cleverly avoids having to take the oath, but at the same time does not actually admit that he cheated! Eustathius has a long and over-ingenious analysis of his speech, designed to show that its covert intention is to praise himself (1317.43ff.), but both he and bT (591-2) observe that Antilokhos still refers to the horse as his own prize, which is a good point.

587-91 Cf. the progression of thought at 19.216-20, where Odysseus says that Akhilleus is more powerful than him, but he is older and wiser, and goes on (220) τῶ τοι ἐπιτλήτω κραδίη μυθοῖσιν ἐμοῖσιν.

587-8 Unusually Antilokhos does not begin with a vocative formula, the name being postponed to 588, because the situation demands that he should immediately calm Menelaos' anger. άνσχεο νῦν sounds colloquial: 'Hold on, now!' For Antilokhos' youth cf. 15.568-71, where Menelaos appealed to him for help as the most agile of the younger Achaeans. These echoes of their previous closeness in battle (cf. above on 581 διοτρεφές) are by no means irrelevant here. For σύ δὲ πρότερος καὶ ἀρείων cf. 2.707 ὁπλότερος γενεῆ' ὁ δ' ἄρα πρότερος καὶ ἀρείων.

589-90 Antilokhos seems to be echoing 3.106-8, where again it is Menelaos who fears that Priam's sons may not respect the oaths (107 ὑπερβασίῃ), and adds alɛl δ' ὑπλοτέρων ἀνδρῶν φρένες ἡερέθονται. Menelaos 'is unusually conscious of himself as a middle-aged man' (Parry, Language 321). For similar gnomic statements about youthful folly cf. Od. 7.294, Theognis 629-30, and for the phrasing of 590 cf. 10.226 ἀλλά τε of βράσσων τε νόος, λεπτή δέ τε μῆτις. λεπτή in these cases means 'slight', 'slender'. There is irony in the use of μῆτις here, given Nestor's remarks on the subject (313-18).

592-5 την άρόμην means 'which I won' (aorist of άρνυμαι). From εl καί νύ κεν onwards the sentence structure becomes more complex, and we have three consecutive verses with integral enjambment, as Antilokhos makes his final, more emotional point. For 592-5 (el kal ... β ou λ olu η v) see on 558-9, and for β ou λ olu η v η cf. 1.117. In 594 δ 107pepéés is a nice echo of Menelaos' use of this vocative at 581, undoubtedly being designed to soften him (cf. bT 594). σ ol $\gamma \epsilon$... in θ u μ o \tilde{v} means 'to fall out of favour with you' (cf. 1.562-3), and δ aluo σ 1v elval $\alpha\lambda$ 17 ρ 0s' 'to be culpable in the eyes of the gods' (cf. 8.361 for $\alpha\lambda$ 17 ρ 0s). The last phrase presumably hints at the fact that in order to contradict Menelaos Antilokhos would have to commit perjury.

596-7 Antilokhos seals his reconciliation by actually handing over the horse himself (cf. T 596).

597-600 roio bè θυμός | Ιάνθη ... θυμός Ιάνθη: 'and his spirit | was warmed, just like the dew upon the ears of corn | of a ripening crop, when the ploughlands are bristling: | even so, Menelaos, was the spirit in your heart warmed'.

'No poet ever wrote lines more adequate to the beauty of reconciliation than these' (F. M. Stawell, Homer and the Iliad, London 1909, 87). The simile has a ring-structure, being framed by the repetition of $\theta u \mu \delta \varsigma$ lov $\theta \eta$, although in 597-8 the strong enjambment and prominence of lov $\theta \eta$ at the beginning of the verse make these words stand out as introduction.

From antiquity onwards too much ink has been spilt over the exact sense. taiw probably means 'warm', and from this it comes to mean 'soften', 'melt' (Chantraine, Dict. s.v.); it is used in a similar context at 24.119 (Oupov lyvy) and Od. 22.59. We should read lepon in 598 rather than lepon (as some modern editors have done). The early-morning dew on the ripening corn is warmed and evaporated by the increasing force of the sun. Apollonius Rhodius surely saw the point in his imitation, when he said of Medea, as she falls in love: Ιαίνετο δὲ φρένας είσω | τηκομένη οἶόν τε περί ροδέησιν έέρση | τήκεται ήώοισιν Ιαινομένη φαέεσσιν (3.1019-21). The echo of the Homeric simile by Aeschylus (Ag. 1391-2) suggests the general tone but is less close in detail: χαίρουσαν ούδεν ήττον ή διοσδότω | γάνει σπορητός κάλυκος έν λοχεύμασιν. There is also a reminiscence of 598-9 by Virgil at G. 3.314-15: spicea iam campis cum messis inhorruit, et cum | frumenta in viridi stipula lactentia turgent. ortegus is only here in Homer, later in Hes. Erga 473 etc. άλδήσκειν (599) occurs only here in early Greek literature; cf. Theocr. Id. 17.78 λήϊον άλδησκουσιν.

600 For this use of apostrophe, or direct address by the poet to one of his characters, as an 'emphatic and pathetic device', see on 13.602-3, 17.674-5. Cf. also bT 4.127 ('the poet is sympathetic towards Menelaos'), and the sensitive discussion by Parry in Language 310-26. T (on 600) notes Menelaos' characteristic gentleness; cf. bT 6.51, 62 etc., CQ 30 (1980) 272. For the second half of 600 cf. 24.321 = Od. 15.165 Yh0hoav, kai mãou ivi $\phi peoi 0$ unds láv0h.

• 1

602-11 This moving speech is the last by Menelaos in the poem. He accepts Antilokhos' apology, although still with a sharp note of warning against making the same mistake again. Recalling all that Antilokhos, Nestor and Thrasumedes have suffered for his sake in the past he actually offers to give Antilokhos back the horse, as if moved by a deep impulse of sympathetic generosity. We may well be reminded here of Phoinix' sermon to Akhilleus on the virtues of yielding to entreaty when one is angry at injustice (9.496-605), and of Iris' warning to Poseidon not to go on cherishing resentment against his elder brother Zeus (15.200-4; at 202 Iris calls his speech $\dot{\alpha}\pi\eta\nu\dot{\epsilon}\alpha$, a word used by Menelaos at 611; and cf. 211 vewcornoeis $\dot{\nu}\pi o \epsilon (\xi\omega)$ with 602-3).

603 οῦ τι παρήορος οὐδ' ἀεσίφρων: 'in no way deranged or foolish'. παρήορος is applied to a trace-horse which runs beside the regular pair of horses at 16.471, 16.474 (cf. παρηορίαι meaning 'side-traces' at 8.18, 16.152). Here, however, it was taken in antiquity as meaning 'deranged', and this seems to be how Archilochus understood it: cf. fr. 130.5 West, νόου παρήορος, and 172.2 τίς σὰς παρήειρε φρένας; At 7.156 it is applied to a fallen warrior and the sense is again uncertain, perhaps 'sprawling' or something similar; see on 7.155-6 for further discussion. For οὐδ' ἀεσίφρων see comment on 20.183. The original form was probably ἀασίφρων; cf. Chantraine, Dict. s.v. ἀἀω.

604 vũv cũte vớov viknot veoln: the heavy alliteration is surely deliberate here, suggesting a proverbial expression. veoln is an absolute hapax, apparently meaning 'youth' or 'youthful folly', possibly formed from véos, veótns under the influence of ávoln (which some scholars have wanted to read here: Leumann, HW 228 n. 23). Hesychius glosses véotat as ápporúvat; cf. Wackernagel, Sprachliche Untersuchungen 242-3. Antimachus apparently read vónua (AT 604, fr. 138 W.), i.e. 'your plan (or ingenuity) got the better of your good sense'.

605–6 These two forbidding verses show that Menelaos' tolerance and gentleness have their limits. $\pi\alpha\rho\epsilon\pi\epsilon\iota\sigma\epsilon\nu$ is used of Menelaos being dissuaded from action at 7.120 (and cf. 6.61 v.l.): 'Menelaus is always being persuaded' (Parry, Language 320).

607-8 For 607 cf. 9.492, where it is Phoinix who is speaking. Apart from the general exploits in battle of Nestor and his sons one thinks especially of 5.561-72, where Antilokhos comes to Menelaos' aid against Aineias, of 15.568-91, where they fight together, and of 17.651-99, where Menelaos asks him to bring Akhilleus the news of Patroklos' death.

6xo-11 Like Antilokhos, Menelaos continues to regard the horse as his prize. Generosity does not overrule the concern for honour in the older any more than in the younger man (cf. bT). Menelaos is concerned about what people will think of his character (cf. 575-8). Unterplaces contended for the second seco applied to Zeus by Here at 15.94, but a more relevant parallel might be 16.35 ($\delta\tau$ 1 $\tau\sigma$ 1 $\nu\delta\sigma$ 5 $\epsilon\sigma\tau$ 1 ν $\delta\pi\eta\nu\eta$ 5), where Patroklos accuses Akhilleus of relentless inhumanity because he has refused to show pity for the Greeks.

612 Nonµovi: after the emphasis on Antilokhos' µη̃τiç and intelligence throughout the course of the preceding scenes, one can hardly avoid thinking that his companion's name has a point (as T notices). Cf. Od. 2.386-7, 4.630-7, where an Ithacan named Noemon, son of Phronios, sensibly lends his ship to Telemakhos (and is later said to own horses in Elis). Noemon recurs in a list of Lycian names at ll. 5.678.

612-23 For the prizes cf. 265-70. The last prize is left over because Eumelos has received an extra one, and with great courtesy Akhilleus gives it to Nestor, the old charioteer par excellence, whose exploits on Menelaos' behalf have just been recalled. We have travelled a long way since the moment in book 1 when Nestor's conciliatory advice to Akhilleus and Agamemnon was ignored, and in Akhilleus' respect for Nestor's great age there is a foreshadowing of his attitude to old Priam in book 24.

616-17 Like Antilokhos (596-7) Akhilleus honours the older man by personally handing him the gift.

6x8-23 Akhilleus' speech is dignified and sad. Patroklos is in his mind as at 280-4, but there is a noble restraint in the simplicity of 619-20: 'you will not see him again among the Greeks'. The speech is quite heavily enjambed, but develops in a natural way (cf. Higbie, Measure and Music 120).

The list of contests (621-3) is echoed by Nestor at 634-7, and with the chariot-race makes up a kind of early pentathlon. The same order is maintained in the contests which follow the chariot-race, at 653-797 and 884-97. Plutarch (Mor. 639A-40A) discusses whether or not this reflects the original order of these sports.

618-19 For τη νῦν ('here now') cf. 14.219 etc., and for κειμήλιον ... μνημ' ξιμεναι see on 499-652. κειμήλιον ξστω | recurs at Od. 4.600, and Xenophanes includes among honours for successful athletes δώρον δ ol κειμήλιον είη (fr. 2.9 West).

621 The crucial word αύτως ('just like that', i.e. without a contest) is emphatically placed, and then explained. For où yàp ... παλαίσεις cf. Od. 8.103 πύξ τε παλαισμοσύνη τε, 246 où yàp πυγμάχοι είμεν ἀμύμονες οὐδὲ παλαισταί. The fact that these sports are mentioned first here, at 634-5 and Od. 8.206, was taken by Aristarchus as evidence in favour of the same author for both poems (Arn/A 621, 634-5).

622 ἀκοντιστύς occurs nowhere else; cf. ἀκοντιστής etc. ἐσδύσεαι means 'will enter for'; Aristarchus (Did/A) and most of our MSS read this, against the variant ἐνδύσεαι (Plut. Mor. 639c and some MSS). ἐσδύνω occurs only here in Homer (cf. Hdt. 1.193, etc.), and van der Valk argues for ἐνδύσεαι (Researches 11 203), but ἐνδύνω with the accusative is normally used in Homer of putting on clothes, except at 19.366-7.

623 χαλεπόν κατά γῆρας ἐπείγει: cf. HyAphr 233 χαλεπόν κατά γῆρας ἔπειγεν. Most MSS have ἔπεισιν (as in 1.29), and this is mentioned by A as an ancient variant, together with lkávει (cf. Od. 11.196 etc.) and ἀπάζει (cf. II. 8.108, addressed to Nestor). ἐπείγει is more graphic.

624 = 797, 1.446 (see comment).

626-50 Nestor's speech resembles in style some of his earlier reminiscences: cf. 629 30 with 7.132-3, 157, 11.670-1, 643 with 11.762, etc. It has thematic links with these in the allusions to the Epeans and Bouprasion, and to the sons of Aktor (cf. 11.671 ff., 11.756, 11.750-2); for Nestor's other legendary and monstrous opponents cf. the Centaurs at 1.267-8, and Ereuthalion at 7.136-56. Structurally it begins with the theme of his old age (626-8), which picks up the end of Akhilleus' speech. This leads to the account of his youthful successes and failure in the games (629-42). He then returns to his age and the contrast with the young men of today (643-5). The last verses answer the first part of Akhilleus' speech, with their reference to Patroklos' funeral and Nestor's gratitude for the gift (646-50). The central section contains a paradeigma which may be obliquely relevant to the contest which has just occurred (see on 499-652). See also on 11.670-762.

626 = Od. 18.170; cf. also II. 1.286 etc. (with γέρον, φίλος instead of τέκος). It looks as if Aristarchus' text did not include this verse, since he comments on 627 as if it were the beginning of the speech (Arn/A: ὅτι ἀπὸ τοῦ γὰρ ἦρκται...). It is omitted by a papyrus and one MS, but bT discuss the verse.

627-8 Cf. 772 (etc.) γυĩα δ' ἔθηκεν ἐλαφρά, πόδας καὶ χεῖρας ὑπερθεν, 13.512 γυĩα ποδῶν, and Hes. Th. 150 τῶν ἐκατὸν μὲν χεῖρες ἀπ' ὥμων ἀΐσσονται. The construction of 627 would be smoother without 628, which Nicanor may not have read, as he takes πόδες ... χεῖρες as epexegetic to γυĩα. But bT seem to have read both verses, and 628 is very suitable to describe the action of a boxer or javelin-thrower: 'my arms do not dart out on each side from my shoulders nimbly'. The variant ἀπαῖσσονται is equally possible.

629-30 Ell' üs hain β is the set of the

630-1 Amarunkeus is the father of Diores, one of the Epean leaders (2.622), who is killed at 4.517-26. Pausanias makes him an immigrant from Thessaly (5.1.8). For Bouprasion and the Epeans see on 2.615-24. παίδες δὲ θέσαν βασιλῆος ἄεθλα means 'and his sons instituted games in honour of the king'. Cf. 22.163-4 ἄεθλον ... ἀνδρὸς κατατεθνηῶτος, and Hes. Erga 654-6 ἄεθλα ... 'Αμφιδάμαντος | ... τὰ δὲ ... ἀθλ' ἔθεσαν παίδες μεγαλήτορος (with West's comments). The usual later expression was ἀθλα ἑπί τινι.

632-7 The inclusion of the Aetolians as well as the Pylians suggests an important event, which drew people to Elis from the neighbouring areas. Cf. 11.698-702, where Neleus sends a four-horse chariot to compete there. In 634-7 Nestor gives us the first athletic victory catalogue, as in later epinician poetry and inscriptions. The events are the same as at 621-3, with the addition of the chariot-race, which is postponed to the end because it is an exception to his successes. The name Klutomedes occurs only here in Homer, but Enops is more common (14.445, 16.401). The coincidence of Ankaios of Pleuron and Iphiklos must be related to their appearance in later versions of the legend of the Calydonian boar: in Bacchylides 5 (117-20, 127-9) they are respectively the brother and uncle of Meleager. Ankaios is the name of an Arcadian, father of Agapenor, at 2.609 (see comment), and the Ankaios of the Calydonian boar-hunt later has an Arcadian origin (Apollodorus 1.8.2, Pausanias 8.4.10, 8.45.2 and 7). Iphiklos too has a namesake, the Thessalian father of Podarkes (cf. 2.704-5, 13.698 with comment), who was later famous as a runner (Hes. fr. 62 M-W, Call. fr. 75.46), and who is mentioned in connexion with Neleus and Melampous at Od. 11.287-97. But to disentangle these various legendary coincidences here would take too long. Probably the name Ankaios has been chosen as suitable for a wrestler: cf. ἀγκάς (711), ἀγκάλη, etc. (bT 635). The association of the Thessalian Iphiklos with running may have influenced the poet's choice of this name. Phuleus is a son of Augeias, and according to 2.625-9 he had migrated to Doulikhion after a quarrel with his father: his son Meges commands the contingent from there at Troy (see on 2.627-30). Poludoros is otherwise unknown: the name is that of one of Priam's sons at 20.407 etc.

634 "Hvomos: some MSS read Oivomos, as does Plutarch (Mor. 639c), and another ancient quotation has $\Phi\alpha$ ivomos.

635 πάλη occurs only here in Il. Aristarchus preferred πάλην; Od. 8.206 has πάλη, but in later Greek the internal accusative πάλην is quite common (E. Alc. 1031 etc.). ὄς μοι ἀνέστη is 'who stood up as my opponent'. The verb is used thus of boxers and wrestlers etc. at 677, 709, Od. 18.334, S. Tr. 441.

637-42 The twin Aktorione were mentioned by Nestor as his opponents in battle at 11.709-10, 750-2 (see 750n.). There they are called Moλiove, and are said to be sons of Poseidon, who rescued them from defeat by Nestor. At 2.620 t the Epean leaders Amphimakhos and Thalpios are called vies δ μέν Κτεάτου, δ δ' ἄρ' Εὐρύτου, Ἀκτορίωνε (see comment). So the Aktorione mentioned here are presumably called K teatos and Eurutos, the fathers of Amphimakhos and Thalpios respectively. Their own supposed mortal father will have been called Aktor. In the Hesiodic Catalogue (frr. 17-18 M-W) and later authors (Ibycus fr. 285 PMG etc.) they are Siamese twins, and Aristarchus argued that this was already the case in the Homeric version of their legends (Arn/A 638-42, Eust. 1321.20ff.). This would explain how they were allowed to compete as a pair against Nestor on his own, and it is possible that the poet has avoided a direct reference to their abnormal form, whilst hinting at it in the language of 639-42 (see comments, and cf. U. von Wilamowitz, Pindaros, Berlin 1922, 514, van der Valk, Researches 11 255). The popularity of portrayals of apparent Siamese twins taking part in both battle and funeral scenes in Greek art of the eighth century B.C. shows that the poet could have known such a legend, even if these artistic representations are not of the Aktorione themselves. On the artistic evidence and the debate about these figures see R. Hampe in LIMC 1.1 472-6, and 1.2 364-5 for illustrations; cf. also J. Carter, BSA 67 (1972) 52-4, Coldstream, Geometric Greece 352-4.

639 πλήθει πρόσθε βαλόντες: 'forging ahead through their superior number'. This seems the simplest explanation of the phrase (cf. Eust. 1321.23ff.). Cf. 17.329-30 πεποιθότας ήνορέη τε | πλήθει τε σφετέρω, i.e. 'trusting in superiority of number' (etc.), the only other instance in Homer of the word πλήθος (πληθύς being commoner). For πρόσθε βαλόντες cf. 572 τοὺς σοὺς πρόσθε βαλών, and see on 462. In antiquity other interpretations were offered (cf. Arn/A 638-42, Eust. 1321.20ff.). One was that the twins entered several chariots and so hindered their rivals, another that those in charge gave them an unfair advantage at the start. It looks as if Aristarchus took πλήθει as meaning 'through the support of the crowd', and explained that the spectators allowed them to compete as a pair (Arn/A; Eustathius' account of his views seems to be confused). But this would be an extremely compressed way of expressing this.

άγασσάμενοι περί νίκης: 'as they were jealously eager for victory', or 'as they begrudged (me) the victory'. There was an ancient variant άγασσαμένω (A). Cf. the quarrel of Menelaos and Antilokhos, who gets an unfair advantage because he begrudges victory to his rival.

640 'Because the greatest prizes were reserved for this contest.' This follows Aristarchus and our MSS in reading παρ' αὐτόφι, as an equivalent of παρ' αὐτοῖς (AbT), referring back to ἶπποισι in 638. Cf. παρ' αὐτόφι in 12.302, 20.140 (αὐτόφι is the vulgate reading there), and Chantraine, GH 1 239-30. This is surely preferable to the variant παρ' αὐτόθι ('on this spot'). Cf. Hdt. 5.8 (Thracian funeral games) ἐν τῷ τὰ μέγιστα ἀεθλα τίθεται κατὰ λόγον μουνομαχίης.

641 δίδυμοι: only here in Il.; cf. Od. 19.227 αὐλοῖσιν διδύμοισιν. Aristarchus held that the word meant that they were joined together, whereas διδυμάονε (Il. 5.548 etc.) meant simply 'twins': cf. Erbse on schol. 641.

641-2 ό μέν ... ἕμπεδον ἡνιόχευ': the third and last example of such anaphora of a hemistich in the lliad; cf. 20.371-2, 22.127-8, with

۰.

l

comments. Both ancient (bT) and modern commentators view the device as intended for emphasis. It suggests that there is something quite extraordinary about this pair's way of racing (cf. Eust. 1321.46ff.: 'a spontaneous way of expressing amazement'), as if the poet is hinting at their being Siamese twins. The homoeoteleuton of $\hbar v_1 \delta \chi_{EUEV} \dots \kappa k \lambda_{EUEV}$ and the echo of this at the end of the first hemistich of 642 may also be a way of suggesting the close co-operation of the twins. For $\mu \delta \sigma \tau_1 \gamma_1 \kappa k \lambda_{EUEV}$ cf. 24.326.

643 $\omega_5 \pi \sigma \tau'$ tov: cf. 11.752 ω_5 tov, that $\pi \sigma \tau'$ tov yt, at the end of Nestor's earlier reminiscence of war with the Epeans. Here 643-5 round off the narrative section, returning to the theme of 626-8.

646 Leaf argued that Koi here means 'also', i.e. as in the case of the men of old, because $\Delta\lambda\lambda'$ ibi is usually followed by another imperative without a connexion, but as he says 24.336 and Od. 18.171 may be exceptions to this. $\Delta\theta\lambda$ oioi ktepéike means 'give him funerary honours with contests (or prizes)'; cf. ktepea, ktepikw. Verse 647, referring to Nestor's prize, might point to the second sense for $\Delta\theta\lambda$ oioi here.

648-9 'Because you are always mindful of me as a friend, and do not forget the honour with which it is proper that I should be esteemed among the Achaeans.' There are several oddities about these verses. αti is rare, but cf. 12.211, Od. 15.379. μέμνησαι instead of μέμνησι occurs only here in Homer. ένηέος presumably goes with μευ, meaning 'as being well-disposed to you', rather than with τιμῆς (as Nicanor suggested hesitantly, A 648-9). ένηής is elsewhere in II. applied to Patroklos, in the formular phrases ἐταῖρον ένηέα, ἐτάροιο ἐνηέος (17.204 etc.; cf. 17.670 ἐνηείης Πατροκλῆος), and the reference to him in 646 may have suggested the word. τιμῆς may be a genitive dependent on λήθω, but ῆς is probably a genitive of value with τετιμῆσθαι (Chantraine, GH II 56 and 57-8).

650 The prayer for divine recompense is traditional in such contexts although not expressed in exactly these words elsewhere. Cf. 1.18-19, Od. 6.180-2, etc.

651-2 Akhilleus waits courteously until Nestor has finished, as Patroklos did at 11.655-803 (cf. T 652a). α ivos (only here and 795 in ll.) means 'a tale', and usually one with a message for the hearer (cf. Od. 14.508), and hence is used later of fables, proverbs or riddles (Hes. Erga 202 etc.). From being a tale it acquires the sense of an account in praise of someone (cf. Od. 21.110). Here bT take the word as meaning 'a story with a hidden message', whereas Eustathius (1322.3ff.) refers it to Nestor's praise of Akhilleus. It could also presumably refer to Nestor's own praise of himself. Cf. Martin, Language of Heroes 106 on Nestor as 'a speaker whose rhetoric rests on eulogy'. At 795 the word is used again with a similar potential ambiguity: there 'eulogy' seems to fit well, but Antilokhos' speech is designed to illustrate the moral that the gods honour older men (an interesting link with the exchange between Nestor and Akhilleus). Here it is tempting to side with bT and see a reference to the paradeigmatic quality of the narrative (cf. Schadewaldt, lliasstudien 83 and n. 2). In translation, however, one should probably leave it open and say 'the whole tale'.

653-99 Akhilleus offers prizes for boxing. Epeios issues a challenge, to which Eurualos alone responds. They fight, and Eurualos is knocked out

After the length and complexity of the chariot race the boxing match and the following events are narrated on a much smaller scale. Boxing was regarded as a major sport in ancient Greece, but some features of this scene do suggest a contrast with what has preceded. The prizes of a mule for the winner and a cup for the loser seem to be on a lower level; and although Eurualos is one of the Argive leaders (2.565-6), his opponent Epeios is not a heroic figure: as he says himself, he is not so good at fighting in battle (670), and he turns out later to be the carpenter who made the Wooden Horse (Od. 8.492-3, 11.523). In the weight-putting event he appears to have made a fool of himself with a bad throw (839-40). His challenge speech (667-75) is extremely boastful and grimly humorous, in a way typical of heavyweight boxers at all times, and some have seen him as a brutish and ridiculous figure in this scene. But he is described as a skilful boxer (665), and despite his dire threats he does behave generously towards his defeated opponent, setting him on his feet again, and he is aptly characterized at 695-6 as µEY600µ05 (cf. R. L. Howland, PCPS 183 (1954-5) 15-16). Unlike later literary accounts of boxing matches, such as those of Theocritus (Id. 22.27-134), Apollonius Rhodius (2.1-97) and Virgil (Aen. 5.362-484), this one plays down the brutality, and the fight itself is briefly described. The interest is primarily in the characters as in the preceding episodes. Cf. the somewhat comic match between the beggars Odysseus and Iros at Od. 18.1-107, where again the fight is over quite quickly, and attention focuses on the preliminaries. There are good accounts of the Homeric scenes, and of ancient boxing in general, in Gardiner, Sports 17-18, 402-34, and Harris, Athletes 97-101. See also Laser, Arch. Hom. T 43-9, and for Bronze Age boxers cf. E. Vermeule and V. Karageorghis, Mycenaean Pictorial Vase Painting (Harvard 1982) 43-4, 93.

653 πυγμαχίης άλεγεινής: cf. 701 παλαισμοσύνης άλεγεινής. Both sports were painful and dangerous and the epithet is well chosen.

654-6 ήμlovov ταλαεργόν άγων is repeated at 662. The noun-epithet formula recurs in the genitive at 666, $2 \times Od$. and once in HyHerm. For 655 see on 266, and for δέπας άμφικύπελλον see on 1.584.

657-8 = 271-2. Verse 659 = 802.

660 avaryoutvo seems to be a technical word meaning 'putting up one's fists' in preparation for the fight. Cf. 686, and Od. 18.89 $\chi \epsilon \tilde{\rho} \alpha s \delta v \delta \sigma \chi o v$, 95 $\delta v \alpha \sigma \chi o \mu \delta v \omega$.

660-1 The mythographical scholia (AD) say that Apollo was patrongod of boxing because he defeated the brigand Phorbas by this means, according to 'the cyclic poets'. Another legend made him defeat Ares in boxing at Olympia (Paus. 5.7.10), and the Delphians sacrificed to Apollo as $\pi \nu \kappa \tau \eta s$ (Plut. Mor. 724c). The only athletic contest mentioned as pleasing Apollo on Delos at HyAp 149-50 is boxing. But he could be seen as a god of athletic achievement in general, as $\kappa \nu \nu \rho \sigma \tau \rho \delta \phi o s$ and patron of young men. Cf. Plut. Mor. 723B-c: 'this god is fond of athletics and of victory ... and is protector of contestants'.

661 δώη καμμονίην: see on 22.257. This is an endurance test. 'There were no rounds in Greek boxing. The opponents fought to a finish ... Usually the fight went on until one of the two was incapable of fighting any more, or acknowledged himself defeated ...' (Gardiner, Sports 415). Here γνώωσι ... 'Axαιof indicates that the victory needed to be confirmed by the spectators, whose part in deciding contests is suggested by their intervention at 822-3.

662 vétobu: ancient and medieval texts are divided between this and the variant $\phi \epsilon \rho \epsilon \sigma \theta \omega$. Aristarchus may have objected to this because he did not consider $\phi \epsilon \rho \epsilon \nu s$ suitable to use with an animate object (see on 259-61).

664 ῶς ἔφατ', ὅρνυτο δ' αὐτίκ': cf. 488 = 754. ἀνήρ ἡῦς τε μέγας τε is applied to Agamemnon and the greater Aias at 3.167 (see comment) and 226, and both are said there to be exceptionally tall.

665 For Epeios see on 653-99. His father Panopeus is the eponym of the town in Phokis mentioned at 2.520 and 17.307. Stesichorus portrayed him as being made to carry water for the Achaean leaders, because of which Athene had pity on him (fr. 200 PMG), and later he became proverbial for cowardice, and a butt of comedy. He may be intended as a slightly ludicrous figure here already.

666-75 Epeios claims automatic possession of the first prize by taking hold of it, and he invites anyone who will to take the second, as he claims to be 'the greatest'. There is a touch of resentment in the rather pathetic reference to his being a poor fighter, and to boost his self-confidence still more he threatens to 'smash' his opponent. Verses 674-5 are grimly ironic: 'Let him have his family mourners ready to carry him off!' bT comment that the speech is 'full of character and very aggressive'.

667 Epeios ironically echoes Akhilleus' last words (663).

670–1 'To admit one's weaknesses adds credibility to one's claim for superiority' (AbT); cf. Plut. Mor. 543F, who adds that Epeios' confession seems rather ridiculous. For $\tilde{\eta}$ ούχ άλις όττι cf. 5.349, 17.450, Od. 2.312, in speeches of protest. For μάχης ἐπιδεύομαι cf. 17.142 μάχης ... ἐδεύεο, 24.385 μάχης ἐπεδεύετ' Άχαιῶν, etc.

οὐδ' ἄρα πως ῆν ... δαήμονα φῶτα γενέσθαι: for οὐδ' ἄρα πως ῆν see 16.60-1n.; and for this gnomic reflection cf. 4.320, 13.729-34, and Od. 8.167-77, where Odysseus in the Phaeacian games replies to Eurualos' taunts, saying that one cannot be good at everything. The Phaeacian Eurualos, who occurs only in this episode of the Odyssey, has the same name as Epeios' opponent, and the phrase δαήμονα φῶτα has its only Homeric parallel at Od. 8.159 in Eurualos' speech to Odysseus. It is hard to avoid the suspicion that there is some reminiscence of the scene in the Iliad.

672 = 1.212 etc. For the variant καl μήν cf. 23.410.

673 àvTIRPÚ: perhaps 'with a straight blow' here, rather than 'absolutely'. The threat is typical of prize-fighters in all ages. Cf. the threats of Odysseus and Iros before their fight (Od. 18.20-4, 18.26-33), and Amukos' challenge at A.R. 2.57-9.

674–5 For κηδεμόνες see on 163. There is an echo of 159–60, where those who have responsibility for Patroklos' burial are asked to remain (μενόντων), and έξοίσουσιν continues the word-play, as the verb suggests the έκφορά or funeral procession.

676 = 3.95 etc. Epeios' speech makes the desired impact on his audience.

677-82 Eurualos is mentioned in the Catalogue of Ships as the third Argive leader, after Diomedes and Sthenelos (2.563-6). Diomedes is his cousin both by blood and marriage, being the grandson through Deïpule of Adrastos, Mekisteus' brother, and husband of his aunt Aigialeia, Adrastos' daughter (5.410-15 and T 23.681-2). So he is indeed one of the κηδεμόνες mentioned by Epeios. His concern for Eurualos suggests anxiety about the outcome, and the way in which he prepares him for the fight reminds one of later trainers (cf. T 681-2 οίδε καὶ τὰς παραινέσεις τῶν παιδοτριβῶν ὁ ποιητής).

677-8 Cf. 2.565 Eùpúalos ... ioódeos qúes and 678 = 2.566 (see comment). The correct reading in 678, however, may be Mykiotéos or Mykiotéos: see on 15.339, 16.21.

679-80 This must refer to Mekisteus, rather than Eurualos or his grandfather Talaos. His exploit, in defeating all the Cadmeans at the funeral games of Oidipous, is similar to that of Diomedes' father Tudeus at 4.385-90, where he challenged them to contests and beat them all, during an embassy. It is clear that Oidipous died at Thebes in this version, and this agrees with Od. 11.275-80, where he remains at Thebes as king after his wife's suicide, and with the Hesiodic Catalogue (fr. 192 M-W). The story that he died at Athens seems to be an Athenian innovation, and the location at Colonus may be Sophocles' own invention. $\delta\epsilon\deltaou\pi\delta\tauos$ might suggest that Oidipous fell in battle: cf. 13.426 where $\deltaou\pi\eta\sigma\alpha$ is used on its own in this sense. This was Aristarchus' view (Arn/A). Alternatively it may be used simply to mean that he had died: that is how it was taken by some Hellenistic poets (A.R. 1.1304, 4.557, Lyc. 492).

243

683 ζῶμα δέ οἰ πρῶτον παρακάββαλεν: the ζῶμα is the girdle or loincloth, later called διάζωμα or περίζωμα, which early Greek athletes wore; cf. Od. 18.30, 18.67–9, 18.76. Its abandonment in favour of nudity was probably a gradual process, adopted first for running races and only later for other contests. Cf. J. Jüthner, Die athletischen Leibesübungen der Griechen II.1 (Vienna 1968) 48-50, and bT 683 with Erbse's references. For παρακάββαλεν see on 127; it should mean that Diomedes puts the girdle down on the ground, rather than actually putting it on Eurualos, as he does this himself (685): cf. Mazon, REA 42 (1940) 262. It does not seem necessary to read περικάββαλε (suggested by Heyne).

684 ἰμάντας ἐῦτμήτους βοὸς ἀγραύλοιο: cf. 10.567, 21.30 ἐῦτμήτοισιν ἰμᾶσι. The boxers bind leather thongs round their hands for protection, a practice which continued into the classical period, when a harder type of glove called σφαῖραι began to supersede them. The thongs, being softer, were later known as μείλιχαι or ἰμάντες μαλακώτεροι (cf. Gardiner, Sports 402ff., Laser, Arch. Hom. r 41ff.). By contrast in the fight between Odysseus and Iros bare fists seem to have been used (Od. 18.66-107).

685 This is repeated at 710, with slight variation.

686–7 Cf. 7.255–6 τώ δ' ἐκσπασσαμένω δολίχ' ἔγχεα χερσίν ἄμ' ἄμφω | σύν β' ἔπεσον ... For ἀνασχομένω see on 660. ἄμφω is nominative here, as at 7.255. σύν δέ σφι βαρεῖαι χεῖρες ἔμιχθεν is a vivid way of describing the way in which the boxers 'mingle' their heavy blows.

688 χρόμαδος: an absolute hapax, evidently onomatopoeic, to describe the grinding of their jaws or the crack of blows on their cheeks (AbT and Erbse ad loc.). Hesychius mentions the related forms χρόμη and χρόμος, with similar meanings. Cf. A.R. 2.82-4 ω_5 τοῖσι παρήιά τ' ἀμφοτέρωθεν | καὶ γένυες κτύπεον⁻ βρυχή δ' ὑπετέλλετ' ὀδόντων | ἄσπετος ... and Virgil, Aen. 5.436 duro crepitant sub volnere malae.

689-94 Epeios knocks his opponent out with an upper cut on the jaw, at the moment when Eurualos is looking for an opening and evidently off guard. The blow lifts him off the ground, and his back arches as he falls like a leaping fish.

691 αὐτοῦ ... γυῖα: 'for his bright limbs failed him on the spot'. ὑπερείπω occurs only here in Homer, later in Plutarch, Pomp. 74.

692–4 The simile is brief but very effective in its details: the fish leaps out of the shallow water near the shore, as it is stirred by the north wind, and then disappears again into the dark ripples. Cf. 7.63–4 οἶη δὲ Ζεφύροιο ἑχεύατο πόντον ἔπι φρὶξ | ὀρνυμένοιο νέον, μελάνει δέ τε πόντος ὑπ' αὐτῆς, and see on 7.63–6 and 21.126. Here ἀναπάλλεται is used to mean 'leaps up', although it is from πάλλομαι, whereas ἀνέπαλτο in 694 is perhaps originally from ἀν-επ-ἀλλομαι (cf. Leumann, HW 60–4).

692 ὑπὸ φρικός: there was an ancient variant ὑπαὶ ῥιπῆς (T), substituting a slightly easier expression, as $\phi \rho \xi$ should really refer strictly speaking to the water rather than the effect of the wind.

693 θίν' ἐν φυκιόεντι: the epithet ('full of seaweed', 'weed-strown') occurs only here in Homer; cf. Theocr. Id. 11.14, 21.10, and II. 9.7 φῦκος. – μέλαν δέ ἐ κῦμα κάλυψεν recurs at Od. 5.353.

694 Cf. 8.85 άλγήσας δ' άνέπαλτο; 11.732, 11.744 άτὰρ μεγάθυμοι 'Επειοί. Here too the variant άνέπαλτο: άτὰρ ... should perhaps be preferred, since there seem to be no certain examples of αὐτάρ where the first syllable falls in the second half of the foot: see on 4.542, and cf. C. J. Ruijgh, L'Elément achten dans la langue épique (Assen 1957) 45-6.

695-7 The aftermath is described with comic pathos. Cf. the end of Odysseus' fight with Iros, where Odysseus drags him by the foot outside the palace and leaves him propped against the courtyard wall (Od. 18.100-7); also Virgil, Aen. 5.468-71 ast illum fidi aequales genua aegra trahentem | iactantemque utroque caput crassumque cruorem | ore eiectantem mixtosque in sanguine dentes | ducunt ad navis.

695 φίλοι δ' άμφέσταν έταϊροι is repeated from 18.233.

697 αίμα παχύ πτύοντα: neither the phrase αίμα παχύ nor the simple verb πτύω occur elsewhere in Homer; cf. 781 δυθον άποπτύων.

698 άλλοφρονέοντα: only here in ll.; cf. Od. 10.374 άλλ' ήμην άλλοφρονέων, where it means 'with other things in mind', whereas here it must mean 'dizzy' or 'groggy'; cf. Theocr. Id. 22.129 κεῖτ' άλλοφρονέων (of Amukos, knocked out by Poludeukes). It may be connected with ήλεός ('distraught', 'crazy'); cf. Chantraine, Dict. s.v.

699 δέπας άμφικύπελλον: cf. 656, 663, 667.

700-39 Akhilleus offers prizes for wrestling. Telamonian Aias and Odysseus fight. Eventually Akhilleus stops the contest, declaring it a draw

After the decisive outcome of the boxing, involving two minor heroes, comes the wrestling match between two leading figures, Odysseus and Telamonian Aias, which is inconclusive. Wrestling was one of the most popular sports in antiquity, and clearly a technique has been developed by the time of the Iliad. The fight, however, is briefly described, and some aspects are not explicit. Evidently it belongs to the type later known as 'upright wrestling', whose object was to throw the opponent to the ground, as opposed to 'ground wrestling' where the struggle continued on the ground until one contestant admitted defeat: this formed part of the pankration rather than wrestling proper. Later contests were decided only when an opponent had been thrown three times (cf. Soph. fr. 941.13 with Pearson's commentary). In the Homeric fight, however, it is not obvious how many throws were needed for victory. The fight has two main stages. In the first the two opponents stand locked together, each unable to throw the other. Then to break the deadlock they agree to lift each other off the ground. Aias lifts Odysseus, who uses one leg to kick Aias behind the knee, so that Aias falls backwards and Odysseus lands on top of him. Then Odysseus lifts Aias just a little off the ground, and at the same time uses his knee against him, probably applying pressure to one of Aias' legs to make him fall on his side; but again this results in their both falling together side by side. At this point Akhilleus stops the fight, telling them to divide the prizes equally: how they are to do this is left unexplained.

The main question is whether Odysseus has gained a technical advantage by causing Aias to fall twice, or whether the fact that he himself also falls means that these do not count as throws. It does look as though, morally speaking, Odysseus' greater skill (cf. 725) is prevailing over Aias' strength, or may do so in the long run. The fact that Akhilleus stops the fight is significant. His sympathy for Aias as a straightforward character, and his suspicion of Odysseus' indirectness, come out strongly in book 9 (cf. especially 308 13, 622-55). The implication may be that Akhilleus does not want to see Odysseus the victor by guile.

This contest has been seen by some modern scholars as related to the famous one for the armour of Akhilleus at his own funeral games, which led to Aias' suicide, an episode referred to by Odysseus himself in his meeting with Aias' ghost at Od. 11.543-64, and related in the Aithiopis and Ilias Parva (OCT vol. v, p. 106 lines 16-17, 20-3 = Davies, EGF p. 47. 29-30, 52.3-5, Aithiopis fr. 2 = fr. 1 Davies, Ilias Parva frr. 2-3 = frr. 2-3 Davies): cf. Kullmann, Quellen 81-2, 335. If this is right, Akhilleus' decision maintains a balance between the two opponents broken by the later contest. On the other hand Aias is said to be the best warrior after Akhilleus at 2.768-9, and Odysseus himself echoes this view at Od. 11.550-1, calling him second to Akhilleus in appearance and achievements (ElSo5 and Epyc). The wrestling match is a more specialized activity in which skill plays a large part, and one cannot use it as a test of dperf in general.

For wrestling in early Greek art and literature cf. Laser, Arch. Hom. T 49ff.

701 παλαισμοσύνης άλεγεινῆς: cf. 653 πυγμαχίης άλεγεινῆς. παλαισμοσύνη occurs only here in Il.; cf. Od. 8.103, 126. According to Eustathius (1387.40) Aristarchus read παλαιμοσύνη, as in a first-century B.C. papyrus and a few MSS; cf. Tyrt. 12.2 (West) παλαιμοσύνης (v.l. παλαισμοσυνης), Pindar, P. 2.61 παλαιμονεῖ. See Wackernagel, Kleine Schriften 1824.

702 εμπυριβήτην: this absolute hapax, meaning 'able to stand on the fire' (cf. 267 άπυρον, etc.), belongs to a rare type of compound epithet, the first part of which is composed of a prepositional phrase; cf. Hdt. 5.108 εγχειρίθετος. The type of vessel is discussed by Athenaeus (37Eff.). 703 'And this the Achaeans valued among themselves at twelve oxen.' At 6.235-6 Diomedes' bronze armour is worth nine oxen, Glaukos' golden armour a hundred, and at 23.885 a cauldron is valued at a single ox. The form triov with long iota is used interchangeably with the form triov as at 705, according to metrical convenience.

704-5 The second prize is a skilled woman worth only four oxen. Contrast Od. 1.431, where Eurukleia was bought for twenty, evidently an unusually high price. Cf. also II. 7.289-91, where a special gift of honour is either a tripod or two horses or a concubine. TEGGGPABOIOS is an absolute hapax.

706 = 271 etc. For 707 cf. 753 = 831.

708-9 The two contestants are at once contrasted by their epithets, the huge Aias and the crafty Odysseus. Odysseus, like Diomedes, had been wounded in the fighting at 11.434-8, and was still affected by his wound at 19.48-9, but we should not stop to worry about this (as T 709 does). Odysseus' skill as a wrestler is mentioned again at Od. 4.341-5 = 17.132-6, where he defeats Philomeleides on Lesbos.

709 The repetition of the preposition ($\delta v \dots \delta v \delta \sigma \tau \sigma \tau \sigma$) is unusual (cf. Od. 5.260), and due to the influence of the usual formula without the verb, as at 3.268, 23.755 $\delta v \delta'$ 'Oduce's πολύμητις, where doputto has occurred already. For κέρδεα είδώς cf. 322 ds dé κε κέρδεα είδη, etc.

710-13 For 710 cf. 685. In 711-13 the two wrestlers take their stance, gripping each other with their heads down, so that they resemble the gable rafters of a house: cf. Gardiner, Sports 382-3 with figs. 3 (top left), 111, 113.

711 dykds normally means 'in one's arms' or 'with one's arms', and is used before a vowel (5.371 etc.). Consequently it has been taken as a dative form of dykov (dykdoi), whose origin has here been forgotten since it is found before a consonant (Chantraine, Dict. s.v.). Here it perhaps means that 'they grasped each other by the arms with their stout hands'. Cf. bT and Eust., who comment that this form of grip is 'ancient and unsophisticated' ($\pi\alpha\lambda\alpha$ ids kal dypoikádns), and that they take hold under their opponents' ribs with the right hand and grip the right elbow with the left hand.

712-13 This is the only explicit reference to a gabled roof in the Homeric poems, although it seems reasonable to assume that Akhilleus' hut had a pitched roof, as it is said to be thatched at 24.448-51. Cf. Lorimer, HM 418-19, Drerup, Arch. Hom. 0 116-20. The passage is well illustrated by depictions of wrestlers in Geometric and later Greek art: cf. Laser, Arch. Hom. T 52-7, especially fig. 15.

712 $d\mu \in \beta \circ \nu \tau \epsilon \epsilon$: "interchangers", i.e. rafters that meet and cross each other' (LSJ). The word occurs only here in classical Greek literature, and rarely in late authors. The later technical word was $\sigma \nu \sigma \tau \dot{\sigma} \tau \alpha \iota$ (bT), which was used of athletes in close combat. At 12.456 $\epsilon \pi \eta \mu \circ \beta \circ 1$ is similarly used as an epithet of bars holding the double-door of the Greek wall.

713 - 16.213, where the verse again occurs in an architectural simile.

714-17 A detailed passage describes the effect of their effort on the wrestlers, as in the boxing match (688-9). Verses 714-15 mean 'and their backs creaked with the force of their strong arms as they were gripped firmly'. τρίζω is used of birds crying or bats squeaking in Homer (2.314, Od. 24.7), later of bones cracking, teeth grinding, etc. The formular phrase θρασειάων ἀπὸ χειρῶν (11.553 etc.) is slightly strained here.

715 κατά δε νότιος βέεν ίδρώς is repeated from 11.811.

716-17 Cf. 2.267 σμῶδιξ δ' αlματόεσσα μεταφρένου έξυπανέστη (of Thersites).

718 vikns itoonv: cf. 767, and also 371 etc.

719 σφήλα: the simple verb occurs only here in Il.; cf. Od. 17.464.

721 The variant ξύκνήμιδες Άχαιοl is possible, as the verb is used both transitively and intransitively in Homer, but Aristarchus preferred our text (Arn/A). Cf. Od. 4.460 άλλ' ότε δή β' άνιάζ' ό γέρων.

724 bT explain that this is called $\lambda\alpha\beta\eta$, where each contestant in turn gives the other an opportunity of lifting him. Aias' speech is typically brief, and he leaves the issue to Zeus to decide. Cf. 17.575 th dé kev Ail πάντα μελήσει.

725 δόλου δ' οὐ λήθετ' 'Οδυσσεύς: 'Odysseus forgot not his (habitual) cunning'.

726 κόψ' ὅπιθεν κώληπα τυχών: 'he caught and struck the back of his knee'. κώληψ (cf. κωλῆ etc.) seems to recur only at Nic. Th. 424. ὑπέλυσε δὲ γυῖα | recurs at 15.581.

727 Epox²: Leaf prefers the variant $E \pi \epsilon \sigma$ ², weakly attested but read by A, on the grounds that the repetition of 'Odvo $\sigma \epsilon \psi_{S}$ in 727 implies a previous change of subject. This seems very reasonable.

728 = 881. The fact that the crowd are astonished suggests perhaps that they expected Aias to win!

729-31 Odysseus clearly has difficulty in lifting Aias at all, but he manages to hook his knee round Aias' leg, so that they fall sideways (cf. bT, Eust., and Gardiner, Sports 397). bT and Eust. give various technical names for this manoeuvre. έγγνάμπτω occurs only here.

732 μιάνθησαν δέ κονίη: cf. 16.797.

733-6 This sequence resembles the way in which the duel between Hektor and Aias is cut short at 7.273-81: καί νύ κε δή ξιφέεσσ' αὐτοσχεδόν οὐτάζοντο, | εἰ μή κήρυκες ... | ἦλθον ... | μέσσω δ' ἀμφοτέρων σκῆπτρα σχέθον, εἶπέ τε μῦθον | κῆρυξ 'Ιδαῖος ... | "μηκέτι, παῖδε φίλω, πολεμίζετε μηδὲ μάχεσθον' | ἀμφοτέρω γὰρ σφῶι φιλεῖ νεφεληγερέτα Ζεύς, | ἀμφω δ' αἰχμητά ... " See on 7.273-81, and Kirk in Fenik, Tradition 38.

735 'Do not go on struggling, nor wear yourselves out with your efforts.' Cf. 12.457 etc. eperoduevos. The variant epiceoov is less vivid.

۰.

736 dethic lo' dvelovres: cf. 823. Eustathius and the scholia are at a loss as to how the prizes could be equally divided. The poet presumably wishes to press on to the next contest, before his audience loses interest.

73⁶ = 7.379 etc.

740-97 The foot race. Akhilleus offers a silver mixing-bowl as first prize, and others for second and third. The contestants are the lesser Atas, Odysseus and Antilokhos. Aias takes the lead, with Odysseus just behind, until Odysseus prays to Athene, who causes Aias to slip. Odysseus wins and Aias comes second. Antilokhos is last, and makes a diplomatic speech which leads Akhilleus to double the value of his prize

After the two close-combat sports the foot race comes as a relief. It is a very entertaining episode, which in several ways echoes the chariot race and forms a kind of coda to it (cf. A. Köhnken, Hermes 109 (1981) 129-48). After the combat between Odysseus and the greater Aias in the wrestling match we have the contrasting pair of Odysseus and the lesser Aias, who is (as his formular epithet indicates) one of the fastest runners among the Greeks (see on 14.521-2). Aias only just takes the lead over Odysseus, as in the chariot race Eumelos is only just ahead of Diomedes (375-81 \sim 758-66). Towards the end of the race (768 \sim 373) Athene's intervention in response to Odysseus' prayer resembles the intervention of Apollo and Athene in the chariot race, leading to Eumelos' crash and Diomedes' victory. Aias' ignominious defeat, which leaves him with a mouthful of dung, is appropriate for the man who had displayed such foulness of language in his dispute with Idomeneus (473-98). Odysseus' µŋ̃rış triumphs because he prays to Athene at the crucial moment, and she responds to her favourite as usual (cf. 782-3). Athene's treatment of Aias foreshadows his later fate, after he had aroused her anger by his rape of Kassandre during the sack of Troy: cf. Od. 4.499-511, OCT vol. v, p. 108.2-6 (Iliupersis), 108.26-8 (Nostoi) = Davies, EGF pp. 62.23-7, 67.18-19 etc.

Antilokhos' rôle echoes his part in the chariot race. The emphasis there on his youthful folly in the race (587-90, 604) is picked up in his speech about how the gods favour older men (787-92), as if he is drawing the moral of the previous episode. There is also an echo of the exchange between Akhilleus and Nestor there (615-52). Moreover, there Antilokhos had offered to give up his prize to Menelaos, who had in turn allowed him to keep it. Here again his diplomacy gains him a dividend, for his tactful praise of Akhilleus leads to the doubling of his prize.

Thus as in the chariot race what gives the episode its life is the strong focus on the heroes' characters and the interplay of this with divine intervention.

740-9 The first prize is described at greater length than any other in the games. It is very precious, both in the beauty of its workmanship and by association: it belonged to Patroklos, and its use to buy Lukaon reminds us of one of Akhilleus' most unfortunate victims. The breastplate of Asteropaios has already been given as a prize (560-2), and in the next contest Akhilleus will offer the armour of Sarpedon, which Patroklos stripped from him, and the sword of Asteropaios (797-808). Thus we are constantly reminded of the main threads of the narrative, and the purpose of the contests themselves. The poet does not describe these objects in detail but indicates their value by telling their histories, a point made in Lessing's Laocoon (translated by W. Ross, London 1836, 150ff.).

• .

ţ

The Sidonians have been mentioned once before in the poem, as makers of the embroidered robes which Paris brought from Sidon on his journey to Troy with Helen: the finest of these was offered by Hekabe to Athene's statue (6.289-92). In the Odyssey Menelaos offers Telemakhos a silver mixing-bowl with gilded rim, given to him by king Phaidimos of Sidon when he stayed there on his travels; he says that this is the most beautiful and valuable of his treasures (4.613-19 = 15.113-19). Sidon is also referred to as molúxalkos at Od. 15.425.

In 743-4 the Sidonians are craftsmen, whereas Polvikes avopes are the merchants who bring the bowl to Lemnos. This is the only reference in the poem to the Polvikis, whereas they appear several times in Odyssey 13-15 (13.272 etc.), and the land Powikn is mentioned twice (4.83, 14.291). At Od. 4.83-4 the Sidonians at first sight look as if they are a separate people, but Eumaios' Phoenician nurse is from Sidon (15.417, 15.425), and the Phoenician sailors go (home) to Stoovin at 13.272, 13.285. As a rule in Homer it seems that the name Sidonians is applied to the Phoenicians when at home, whereas abroad they are called Phoenicians. In some Old Testament texts referring to the Early Iron Age the term 'Sidonians' is applied to the Phoenicians at home, including the people of Tyre: for example I Kings 16.31, where Ethbaal, king of Tyre (c. 887-856 B.C.), is called 'king of the Sidonians'. This title 'king of the Sidonians' for the ruler of Tyre remained in use for over 170 years from Ethbaal's time onward, i.e. during the ninth and eighth centuries. The basic reason was that after its destruction by the Sea Peoples Tyre had been refounded as a Sidonian town, and it then came to dominate the area. Occasionally 'Sidon' is used in records of the period from c. 1100 B.C. onwards to denote this area, including Tyre: cf. W. F. Albright, Cambridge Ancient History, 3rd edn, 11.2 (Cambridge 1975) 519-20, H. J. Katzenstein, The History of Tyre (Jerusalem 1973) 129ff. It is possible that references to Sidon rather than Tyre (never mentioned by Homer) could be due to the tradition that this was the more important city in the Late Bronze Age. But it is more likely that Sidon actually was the centre of production for works of art.

Decorated silver and bronze bowls, thought to be of Phoenician origin, have been found in various parts of the Near East and Mediterranean world, dating between the ninth and seventh centuries B.C.: cf. G. Markoe, Phoenician Bronze and Silver Bowls from Cyprus and t Mediterran an (Berkeley 1985), and AR 1984-85, p. 15 (two bronze bowls at Lefkandi, c. 900 B.C.). Significantly, however, silver (as opposed to bronze) bowls do not seem to appear in a Greek context before the eighth century.

It is unclear exactly how early the Phoenicians themselves began to trade in the Aegean area. Recent finds suggest that this may have been from at least 900 B.C. (cf. J. N. Coldstream, 'Greeks and Phoenicians in the Aegean', in Phonizier im West n, ed. H. G. Niemeyer, Mainz 1982, 261–75). This has, however, been questioned (J. D. Muhly, 'Phoenicia and the Phoenicians', in Biblical Archaeology Today, Israel Exploration Society, Jerusalem 1985, 177-91), and some of the finds might only prove that the Greeks themselves were bringing these objects back from their travels, as Menelaos did (Od. 4.615-19). The objects from Lefkandi described by M. R. Popham, E. Touloupa and L. H. Sackett in BSA 77 (1982) 213-48, especially 242-5, 247-8, show trading connexions with the Near East already well established by c. 900 B.C., and at Kommos in Crete there seems to have been an actual Phoenician settlement from at least 800 B.C. or earlier (cf. J. W. Shaw, AJA 93 (1989) 165-83).

Greek tradition held that the Phoenicians settled in some Aegean islands (T. Braun, CAH, and edn, 111.3, Cambridge 1982, 6-7). Some historians view these traditions with scepticism, but they should not be dismissed. The case for Phoenicians in Thasos seems quite strong (A. J. Graham, BSA 73 (1978) 88-92), and they certainly settled in Rhodes at Ialysos, and perhaps also in Cos (Coldstream, op. cit. 268-9). Lemnos would fit into this pattern of Phoenician activity. The Lemnians themselves according to Homer traded with the coast of Asia Minor: at 7.467-75 Euneos' ships bring wine into the Greek camp at Troy and are paid in bronze, iron, hides, cattle and slaves. This agrees with 21.40-1 and 23.746-7, where Euneos buys Lukaon (as a slave) with this Phoenician bowl (see also on 14.230). In the Odyssey the Phoenicians trade in slaves (14.287-98, 15.415-84). One can easily imagine that, had Lukaon not been ransomed by Eetion of Imbros, he might have ended up in some distant slave-market, carried there by a Phoenician ship.

741 άργύρεον κρητῆρα τετυγμένον: cf. Od. 4.615-16 (=15.115-16) δώσω τοι κρητῆρα τετυγμένον: ἀργύρεος δὲ | ἔστιν ἁπας (see on 740-9). For τετυγμένον meaning 'of fine workmanship' cf. 14.9 etc.

742 κάλλει ένίκα: cf. 9.130, 9.272 αι (τότε) κάλλει ένίκων φύλα γυναικών; for ένίκα meaning 'was first' cf. 18.252, Od. 3.121.

743 Σιδόνες πολυδαίδαλοι: one might have expected Σίδόνες, since the ۰.

Semitic name was Saida, and the iota is long in related forms, e.g. Od. 15.425 $\Sigma \bar{l} \delta \tilde{\omega} v o s$ etc. The epithet $\pi o \lambda v \delta \alpha (\delta \alpha \lambda o s)$ is only applied to craftsmen here in Homer, elsewhere always to works of art (3.358 etc.).

744 ἐπ' ἡεροειδέα πόντον: only here in Il.; cf. Od. 2.263 etc. (4×), and έν ἡεροειδέϊ πόντω Od. 3.294 etc. (6×). But ἡεροειδές alone is used at 5.770 in the context of someone looking out over the sea. The metrically equivalent ἐπ' εὐρέα νῶτα θαλάσσης is used $3 \times Il., 7 \times Od.$

745 στῆσαν δ' ἐν λιμένεσσι: cf. Od. 19.188–9 στῆσε δ' ἐν Ἀμνισῷ ... | ἐν λιμέσιν χαλεποῖσι ..., Od. 12.305 στήσαμεν ἐν λιμένι γλαφυρῷ εὐεργέα νῆα. As in these cases the verb probably means 'they landed' (cf. bT), rather than 'they set it up' or 'weighed it'.

Θόαντι δὲ δῶρον ἕδωκαν: Thoas was king of Lemnos (14.230) and father of Hupsipule, who married Iason and produced Euneos (7.468-9). The gift could have been in return for the right to moor in the harbour (Eust. 1327.57), or to trade in Lemnos, but the poet does not explain.

746-7 Cf. 21.40-1 on Lukaon's purchase. At 21.79 Lukaon says that he was sold for a hundred oxen. This was the value of the golden armour of Glaukos (6.234-6); see also on 23.703. Was the cup alone worth this much?

748-9 These verses return to the point of 740 with greater elaboration. With os ris we must understand the antecedent 'for that man'.

751 λοισθήϊα: 'as last prize'; cf. 785 λοισθήϊον ... ἄεθλον. These appear to be the only instances of λοισθήϊος in surviving literature; cf. 23.536 λοΐσθος, and later λοίσθιος. For the plural form cf. 275 τὰ πρῶτα, 538 δεύτερα. The variant λοισθῆϊ (as if dative of λοισθεύς) is rejected by T.

752-3 = 830-1 (cf. 271 etc., 706-7). The false variant $\pi \epsilon_1 \rho \eta \sigma \epsilon_2 \sigma \theta \sigma$ here (Zenodotus and a few texts) is derived from 707.

754 = 488, perhaps a reminder of Aias' quarrel with Idomeneus. At 14.520-2 Aias is said to be the fastest of the Achaeans in pursuit of the enemy.

755 & δ ' Oduoteùs πολύμητις: cf. 709, 3.268. Here too as at 709ff. Odysseus' intelligence will be shown in what ensues, and the epithet is functional.

756 At 15.569–71 Menelaos had said that Antilokhos was the fastest runner of the younger generation (cf. also Od. 3.112, 4.202). For ποσὶ πάντας ἐνίκα cf. 20.410 πόδεσσι δὲ πάντας ἐνίκα.

757-67 This section resembles the opening part of the chariot race.

757 = 358. Aristarchus thought this verse an addition, because of his theory that μ ercoroixí meant 'in file', which is probably wrong (see on 352-8).

The chariot race itself started with a general description (362-72), of which there is only one verbal echo $(370-2 \sim 766-7)$, with significant variation. This was followed by a description of the return stretch, where the horses went at full gallop, with Eumelos in the lead and Diomedes only just behind (373-81). This is echoed by 758-66, although there is a displacement of the order, in that 373 ($\dot{\alpha}\lambda\lambda'$ ore of $\pi\dot{\nu}\mu\alpha\tau\sigma\nu\tau\dot{\epsilon}\lambda\epsilon\sigma\nu$ of $\dot{\epsilon}\rho\dot{\mu}\sigma\nu$) is postponed to 768, where it introduces the last and decisive stage of the foot race.

252

758-9 These verses resemble 375-6: ... άφαρ δ' Ιπποισι τάθη δρόμος: ῶκα δ' Ἐπειτα |... Ἐκφερον Ιπποι ~ τοῖσι δ' ἀπὸ νύσσης τέτατο δρόμος: ῶκα δ' Ἐπειτα | Ἐκφερ' 'Οϊλιάδης... The description of Diomedes' horses, so close to Eumelos that they warmed his back with their breath (377-81) is echoed at 759-66, where the motif of Odysseus' breath on Aias' head is preceded by an elaborate simile stressing how close he was, and the further point that his feet landed in Aias' tracks before the dust had settled. The emphasis on the nearness of the contestants suggests that it would take very little to reverse the order, and whereas at 370-2 it is the contestants who urge on their horses in their zeal for victory, here it is the spectators who urge on Odysseus as he strives to win (766-7), as if they think that he deserves to come first, and that Aias ought to lose.

758 = Od. 8.121. At 332 and 338 viora referred to the turning-post, whereas here it seems to be the start, and the phrase means 'right from the start they ran at full stretch'. bT reasonably assume that the race was a single lap, but Köhnken takes it as a $\delta lav \lambda o_5$ as in the chariot race (Hermes 109 (1981) 133-4), and the phrase could mean that it was after the turningpost that they began to go flat out (cf. R. D. Williams on Virgil, Aen. 5.317-18).

759 ἐκφερ' 'Οιλιάδης: cf. 376-7 (with comment). Zenodotus read ἐκθορ' δ 'Ιλιάδης (Did/A), as in other cases where Aias' patronymic occurs (see on 13.203).

759-64 This simile emphasizes the closeness of the two runners: cf. 760 $d\gamma\chi_1 \mu d\lambda \alpha$, 762 $d\gamma\chi d\theta_1 \dots \sigma \tau \eta \theta \epsilon \sigma_5$, 763 $b\gamma\gamma \psi \theta \epsilon \nu$. The weaver stands right up to the vertical loom, and draws the horizontal shed rod (or one of two such rods) towards her breast, in order to separate the alternate threads of the warp (μ ($\tau \sigma_5$). Through the opening thus created between the two sets of threads the spool ($\pi \eta \nu i \sigma \nu$) which carries the weft thread is passed, and this is probably attached to the shuttle ($\kappa \epsilon \rho \kappa i_5$: cf. 22.448). Cf. H. B. Blumner, Technologie und Terminologie der Gewerbe und Kunste bei Griechen und Römern, 2nd edn, 1 (Leipzig 1912) 148-54, and G. M. Crowfoot, BSA 37 (1936-7) 36-47.

κανών occurs only here in Homer in this sense (later in Aristophanes etc.), but cf. 8.193, 13.407 where it refers to the rods supporting the framework of a shield. πηνίου and μίτος occur nowhere else in Homer: πηνίου recurs in Theophrastus (HP 6.4) and rarely later, μίτος in classical and later Greek. As so often the language of the simile is precise and technical.

• .

Fränkel (Gleichnisse 78–9) suggests that the choice of simile was due to the resemblance between the movement to and fro of the $\kappa\alpha\nu\omega\nu$ on the loom and that of the runners' feet, so close to each other and yet never meeting. This has the advantage of drawing 763–4 within the field of the comparison.

760 γυναικός ξύζώνοιο: word-break after the fourth trochee is rare in Homer ('Hermann's Bridge'): cf. West, Greek Metre 37-8. It is found a number of times before a five-syllable word, as here: cf. 10.317, Od. 1.241, 4.684, 18.140. For other comparisons drawn from women's work cf. 4.141-5 (ivory-staining), and 12.433-5 (spinning).

760-3 In $\omega_5 \delta \tau \epsilon \dots \kappa \alpha \nu \omega \nu$ we must understand $\delta \gamma \chi_1$ again with $\sigma \tau \eta \theta \epsilon o \varsigma$. For $\pi \alpha \rho \epsilon \kappa \mu (\tau o \nu \ ('out past the warp') cf. 24.349 etc. The repetition of <math>\sigma \tau \eta \theta \epsilon o \varsigma$ at the beginning of 761 and 763 draws attention to the main point of the simile.

764 The vividness of this verse is praised by Macrobius (Sat. 5.13.4-5): the dust settles so soon that we sense the extraordinary closeness of the runners' feet. Virgil's calcemque terit iam calce Diores (Aen. 5.324), although it has the virtue of compression, fails to match the Homeric expression, as Macrobius admits. The poet often refers to the dust in these episodes (cf. 315-16, 372, 437, 449, 502, 504-6, 732, 739), as in the battle-scenes.

765 This verse is a variation on 380-1. Odysseus is taller than Aias, and so breathes down on his head (bT). $d\bar{u}\pi\mu\bar{\eta}\nu$ occurs only here in Il. and at Od. 3.289 for the usual $d\bar{u}\pi\mu\bar{\eta}$. Here it avoids the heavy spondaic fourth foot followed by word-break, which is relatively uncommon (cf. West, Greek Metre 37).

767 Cf. 371–2 νίκης ἰεμένων, κέκλοντο δὲ οἶσιν ἔκαστος | ἶπποις ... Some papyri and MSS read ἰέμενοι, and Eustathius seems to have known a variant ἰεμένων (as at 371). For μάλα δὲ σπεύδοντι κέλευον Eustathius compares the proverbial σπεύδοντα ἐποτρύνεις (1328.40f.).

768-79 The last and decisive stage of the race is described in two sections of five verses each, both introduced by $\dot{\alpha}\lambda\lambda'$ ore $\delta\eta$... (768-72, 773-7), followed by the result in two concluding verses (778-9). In the first Odysseus prays silently to Athene, who responds by giving him an extra burst of speed, the spurt of the runner at the end of a race. In the second Athene causes Aias to slip in the cow-dung at the very last moment. Odysseus then takes up the bowl, which evidently stood right at the finish so that the winner was the first to seize it, and Aias takes hold of the ox as second prize.

Aristarchus (Arn/A) wanted to reject 772, in which Athene gives Odysseus a spurt: 771-2 are repeated from 5.121-2, and Aristarchus argued that as the runners were so close Odysseus should have won anyway as a result of this help, and there was no need for Aias' slip as well. However, Köhnken has argued in reply (Hermes 109 (1981) 135ff.) that 772 is the answer to Odysseus' prayer to help his own running, and that 772 and 774-7 are really simultaneous events, which the poet describes consecutively in his usual manner. The double character of Athene's intervention is similar to 388ff., where Athene assists Diomedes positively by returning his whip and causes Eumelos to crash.

Whether or not the two events are really simultaneous in the foot race perhaps does not matter, as the other points made by Köhnken seem convincing, and it is appropriate that Athene's response should be both positive and negative. Köhnken points out that Odysseus' victory is not simply the result of divine intervention, since it is his prayer at the crucial moment which prompts this. As usual human and divine motivation work together but Odysseus initiates the process, true to his character as $\pi o \lambda \dot{\mu} \eta \tau is$ (755), the attribute which makes him Athene's favourite (cf. 782-3). From a spectator's viewpoint Athene represents Odysseus' $\mu \eta \tau is$, which enables him to know when to put on the spurt, and this action distracts Aias, who slips and falls (cf. Köhnken, op. cit. 141). But the poet sees things differently, and he is at pains to point the moral for us twice (782-3 and 787-92).

768 άλλ' ότε ... δρόμον echoes 373, but here it refers to the last part of the race, there to the second lap. Cf. Virgil, Aen. 5.327-8 i mque fere spatio extremo fessiqu sub ipsam | finem adventabant ... (when Nisus slips).

769 EUXETO ... OV KOTÀ OUDOV: cf. Od. 5.444 EUEOTO OV KOTÀ OUDOV, of Odysseus praying to the river-god when he reaches Phaeacia. The scholia there suggest that a silent prayer is appropriate for the exhausted swimmer, and this could apply here too (so Eust. 1329.19-20), but equally Odysseus may not wish his rivals to hear. Silent prayer was unusual: cf. 7.194-6 (with comment on 195), where Telamonian Aias asks the Greeks to pray for his success in the duel with Hektor 'silently, lest the Trojans hear, or even openly, since after all we are afraid of no man'. Later one prayed silently especially when wishing someone harm, or when one did not want to disclose one's wishes for other reasons; cf. H. S. Versnel, in Faith, Hope and Worship (ed. Versnel, Leiden 1981) 25ff.

770 For $\frac{1}{2}\pi$ f

771-2 See on 768-79. Verse 772 = 5.122, 13.61. T comments: 'they say that the hands of fast runners are like wings'. Early Greek vases show sprinters using their outstretched arms and hands: cf. Laser, Arch. Hom. T 34-6.

773 Eucohov Emailsaobai actors: 'they were likely to dart upon the prize' seems less satisfactory than the variant Emailscool, which would give the sense 'they were on the point of ...' (cf. Leaf).

774 For bliobávw cf. 20.470 (nowhere else in Homer). The uév is answered by αύτε at 778. βλάπτειν here means 'disable': cf. 782, 7.271 etc., and for its use of a divine action see on 22.15.

۰.

775-81 The cow-dung from the sacrifice at Patroklos' funeral (166-9) is another reminder, ludicrous though it may be, of the occasion of the games. Virgil is reluctant to be so explicit in naming the dung in his imitation at Aen. 5.328-33 (cf. 328 levi ... sanguine ..., and 332-3 m ipso |... immundo fimo sacroque cruore), and he omits the picture of the loser with his mouth full of dung, spitting it out. It is hardly surprising that the word $\delta v \theta o_5$ occurs only here in II. or Od.: a comic episode introduces cruder language, as at 2.212ff., and the poet repeats $\delta v \theta o_5$ three times, to emphasize the effect. The usual word for dung was $\kappa \delta \pi \rho o_5$ (Od. 9.329 etc.). $\delta v \theta o_5$ recurs (for example) in Aeschylus' Psychagogoi fr. 275.2 N.² and Radt, a burlesque version of Teiresias' prophecy about Odysseus' death.

777 'He who called the older man $\lambda\alpha\beta\rho\alpha\gamma\delta\rho\alpha\nu$ (479) receives his punishment in the mouth' (AbT).

779-81 It cannot be coincidental that Aias receives an ox as prize, and the picture of him holding the ox by the horn as he spits out the ox-dung is ludicrous. In 779 Aias is called $\phi\alpha(\delta\mu\sigma\varsigma)$, an epithet elsewhere reserved for his more illustrious namesake (cf. 11.496n.): this sounds ironic here.

781 αποπτύων: elsewhere in Homer only at 4.426; see on 697 (πτύοντα), in another comic scene.

γ82-3 Aias recognizes that Athene is the cause. In II, she assists or protects Odysseus at 2.169ff., 5.676ff., 11.434ff., and especially in book 10, where cf. 245 φιλεῖ δέ ἑ Πάλλας 'Αθήνη, and Odysseus' prayer to her at 278-82: κλῦθί μευ, αlyιόχοιο Διὸς τέκος, ἢ τέ μοι αlεὶ | ἐν πάντεσσι πόνοισι παρίστασαι, οὐδέ σε λήθω | κινύμενος ... Athene's 'special relationship' with Odysseus in the Odyssey is anticipated here; cf. Stanford, Ulysses Theme 25-42.

782 η μ' εβλαψε θεὰ πόδας: probably μ' represents με, with double accusative as at Od. 14.178, although cf. also 571 βλάψας δέ μοι Ιππους.

783 µhmp &s: cf. the more extended simile at 4.127-33, where Athene deflects the arrow of Pandaros to save Menelaos, like a mother keeping a fly away from a sleeping child.

784 = Od. 20.358, 21.376. Cf. 2.270 (when Thersites has been punished by Odysseus) ol δk and $\delta \chi \nu \dot{\nu} \mu \epsilon \nu i \pi' \alpha \dot{\nu} \tau \tilde{\omega} \eta \delta \dot{\nu} \gamma \dot{\epsilon} \lambda \alpha \sigma \sigma \alpha \nu$, and see comment there. That episode also involved Athene's assistance to Odysseus (2.169ff.) and Odysseus' triumph over an opponent who is a braggart, to the amusement of the spectators. Odysseus' comic defeat of the braggart Iros (Od. 18.1-117) suggests a narrative pattern here, and may foreshadow Odysseus' later rôle in comedy (on which see E. D. Phillips, 'The comic Odysseus', G&R 6 (1959) 58-67).

785-97 Antilokhos was mentioned at the beginning as the third runner

(756), but his part in the race was not described, as with Meriones in the chariot race (351, 528-31). The main point is the speech which he makes and its consequences. In tune with the laughter over Aias he smiles as he takes the last prize, and his speech is light-hearted but pointed. He echoes Aias' inference that the gods are behind the outcome, but draws a moral which picks up the theme of respect for age from the chariot race. His characterization of Odysseus as belonging to a past generation may be a humorous exaggeration, and whatever the exact sense of $\omega \mu oy \epsilon \rho v \tau \sigma$, this word seems to have a colloquial and slightly mocking ring to it (although Eustathius says that it is not abusive, 1330.12). A further irony is that Antilokhos must know that Odysseus' victory was due more to his wit than his speed: it exemplifies the kind of $\mu \eta \tau \eta$ which Antilokhos tried to display in the chariot race, and Antilokhos himself shows ingenuity in turning his present defeat to advantage and winning the approval of Akhilleus.

785 λοισθήϊον: see on 751.

787 είδόσιν ⁰μμ' έρέω πᾶσιν, φίλοι: for this tactful form of opening see on 306-8.

787-8 is Ett Kal viv ...: i.e. perhaps the traditional view on this subject still holds good. Leaf says 'as they honoured them when they were young, so they continue to honour them when they are old', but this surely misses the point. For the view expressed here cf. 15.204 etc.

790-1 It is unnecessary to speculate how old Odysseus ought to be (cf. Stanford, Ulysses Theme 256, additional note). In the Odyssey Telemakhos is a baby when Odysseus leaves for Troy (11.447-9), but such cross-references run into difficulties. It may be fair to say that 'Antilochus was a very young man and to such even the moderately middle-aged often seem old' (Stanford, loc. cit.).

791 ὑμογέροντα: only here in Homer; cf. Call. fr. 24.5, etc. Aristophanes of Byzantium explained it (probably rightly) as meaning 'advanced in years', i.e. on the verge of old age, ὑμός meaning 'not yet ripe', 'early': cf. W. J. Slater, Aristophanis Byzantii Fragmenta (Berlin 1986) 34-5. This may be the sense in Callimachus, and probably in Arrian, Ind. 9.7; cf. also AP 7.363.9, Galen 6.379. The alternative explanation ('prematurely aged') came perhaps from interpretation of Od. 15.357 bv ὑμῷ γήραι θῆκεν. Virgil's iam senior, sed cruda deo viridisque senectus (Aen. 6.304) glosses the Homeric word in the former sense; cf. Tac. Agric. 29.4 quibus cruda et viridis seneclus.

791-2 $d\rho\gamma\alpha\lambda$ for δk ... 'AXIAAEI: 'and it is hard for any of the Achaeans to compete in running (with him), apart from Akhilleus'. Antilokhos cleverly ends his speech with a compliment to Akhilleus, which wins his immediate favour.

792 έριδήσασθαι appears to be aorist infinitive based on έριδαίνω. The long iota is puzzling, since $\xi p_1 \delta \eta_2 \delta \sigma \theta \alpha i$ could fit into the verse, and one would expect $\xi p_1 \delta \eta_2 \alpha \sigma \theta \alpha i$. The ancient variant $\xi p_1 \zeta \eta_2 \alpha \sigma \theta \alpha i$ (T) would be an odd formation from $\xi p_1 \zeta \omega$, for which $\xi p_1 \sigma \sigma \sigma \sigma \theta \alpha i$ would be normal (cf. 3.223 $\xi p_1 \sigma \alpha i$, 0d. 4.80 $\xi p_1 \sigma \sigma \sigma \sigma \alpha i$). 'Ax1Aki with contracted -i in the dative may be unique in Homer, since $\Pi op_0 \delta i$ at 14.115 could be scanned $\Pi op_0 \delta i$ (cf. also 24.61 $\Pi \eta \lambda \delta i$). But we do find other contracted forms of nouns in - ϵv_5 , e.g. 4.384 $\Pi v \delta \eta$, 15.339 $\Pi \eta_1 v \sigma \tau \eta$, 0d. 24.398 'O \delta v \sigma \epsilon v_5 (cf. Chantraine; GH 1 224). It looks as if T may have wanted to read either $\epsilon l \mu \eta' A \chi_1 \lambda \lambda \eta i$ (so Heyne) or $\epsilon l \mu \eta' A \chi_1 \lambda \eta i$ with synizesis (cf. A. Ludwich, Aristarchs homerische Textkritik 1, Leipzig 1884, 492.30ff.). But as Ludwich observes (op. cit. 11 258 n. 218), 'hundreds of contracted forms of all kinds are unshakeably embedded in the Homeric poems: therefore it is absurd to explain a select number of contractions as "impossible", merely because they can be removed more or less easily'.

• .

r

~ • ,

793 ποδώκεα Πηλείωνα: after 791-2 this is an excellent example of a name-formula directly relevant to its context.

794 The formular τον δ' άπαμειβόμενος προσέφη πόδας ώκύς Άχιλλεύς is avoided here, after 793. For the alternative expression see on 3.437.

795 'Antilokhos, your eulogy shall not be spoken in vain'; for the meaning of alvos see on 651-2.

796 ημιτάλαντον: only here in Homer, later in Hdt. 1.50, 51, etc.; see on 269. Akhilleus' gesture is a typically spontaneous response revealing again his fondness for Antilokhos (cf. 555-6).

797 = 624, 1.446; see on 1.446. The formular verse is used effectively to close the episode.

798-897 The last four contests

The last hundred lines of this Book describe the armed combat (798-825), weight-throwing (826-49), archery (850-83), and javelin (884-97). Javelin-throwing is mentioned in Akhilleus' speech to Nestor (621-3), in Nestor's reminiscences (637), and in Odysseus' boast to the Phaeacians (Od. 8.229). Most modern scholars have accepted this contest as part of the original narrative, whereas many have suspected the intervening episodes (798-883) as a later addition: cf. Lehrs, De Aristarchi studiis 429-30; K. F. Ameis and C. Hentze, Anhang zu Homers Ilias viii (Leipzig 1886) 57-61; Leaf, Introduction to book 23, p. 469 ('a long addition absolutely devoid of poetical merit, and standing in the harshest contrast with its surroundings ...'); more recently Kirk, Songs 223 ('a lamentable decline'); Chantraine and Goube, pp. 15-17 (who are hesitant); and Willcock on 798-883 ('we may well suspect that these three were added to the Games by a rhapsode (or perhaps by Homer himself) after the time of the first composition'). On the other hand, P. Mazon (Introduction à l'Iliade (Paris 1942) 225) detects links with the earlier contests in the way in which Meriones, so unsucces ful in the chariot race, wins the archery, and Epeios, victor in the boxing, is laughed at for his failure in the weight-throwing (840). Moreover, discusthrowing and archery are mentioned as contests in the Phaeacian games (Od. 8.129, 215-28), and discus, javelin and archery are the pastimes of the Myrmidons at 2.773-5. The only sport not referred to elsewhere in Homer is the armed duel. Yet this is probably a very archaic element in Greek games, and one which survived into the historical period in Greece (cf. the works by Malten and Meuli in the comment on 262-897 and Laser, Arch. Hom. T 186). Hence for all its strangeness it may have been something which the poet felt ought to be included.

•

t

- • .

798-825 Akhilleus offers as prizes for the armed duel the armour of Sarpedon and the sword of Asteropaios. Telamonian Aias and Diomedes fight, and when Diomedes apparently gains the advantage the Achaeans stop the contest

There are uncertainties about the course of this event. In Akhilleus' speech proposing the contest (802-10) 805 refers to the first person who succeeds in 'reaching fair skin', i.e. presumably touching or striking his opponent's body, but 806 adds 'and who touches his innards (or interior) through armour and black blood'. This peculiar verse was athetized by Aristarchus. Without it we should not have to assume that one opponent actually had to wound the other, which would be extraordinary. If the verse is genuine it must be part of an older formular introduction to such duels. In the fight itself Aias fails to touch Diomedes' body, whereas Diomedes 'always kept on threatening to strike (Kupe) his neck with the bright spear's point' (821). At this point the spectators call a halt, fearing for Aias' life, and order the contestants to share the prizes equally. In 824-5, however, Akhilleus awards Asteropaios' sword to Diomedes, thereby proclaiming him as victor. Again these verses were athetized by both Aristophanes and Aristarchus, among other reasons because they seem to conflict with the indecisive character of the fight. They could have been added by someone who thought that the sword should be mentioned separately, since it was the first prize and could not be divided between both fighters (cf. 736n.), or else because it looked as if Diomedes really ought to have won. If the verses are genuine then Akhilleus really does consider Diomedes morally the victor, and since there is a clear contrast between 818-19 and 820-1 this seems likely to be the right answer.

798-800 The armour of Sarpedon, won by Patroklos (16.663-5), again reminds us of the hero in whose honour the games are being held, and of recent battles, just as Asteropaios' sword (807-8) recalls Akhilleus' exploits

۰,

l

(see on 560-2, 740-9). The prizes are appropriate to the contest, as in the case of the weight-throwing (bT 826), archery (AT 850-1), and javelin-throwing (894).

798 = 884; first half of 799 = 886. $d\sigma\pi i\delta\alpha$ και τρυφάλειαν | recurs at 18.458.

801-4 Verse 801 = 271 etc., 802 = 659, where it is followed by an infinitive in 660. Here, however, one first-century B.C. papyrus and several MSS omit 804, where the corresponding infinitive occurs, and Nicanor's comments on 802-7 strongly suggest that he did not read this verse either. It looks as if Aristarchus must have omitted it, whether because he followed an earlier text which did not have it, or because he deliberately cut it out, as van der Valk supposes (Researches 11 495-6). It is not easy, however, to see why he should have wished to remove it. Nicanor argues that KEREVEW can be used absolutely, comparing 24.90 time he keivos avwye heyas beos; and Od. cannot really do without the infinitive, especially as περl τῶνδε cannot easily stand on its own. Verse 804 is a suitably solemn four-word verse with spondaic ending. Verse 803 is nicely balanced. For ταμεσίχροα χαλκόν cf. 4.511 χαλκόν... ταμεσίχροα, 13.339-40 έγχείησι |... άς είχον ταμεσίχροας (see on 13.339-44). The epithet is appropriate, suggesting the danger of the duel (cf. xp6x in 805, 819).

805-6 At 16.314 and 322 Equil opegauevos with an object is used to denote that someone actually succeeds in wounding his opponent by a spear-thrust. Here too it presumably means at least that the body is touched or struck (as in fencing): so AbT and Eust. The word Evolva occurs nowhere else in literature, and there was debate as to whether it meant 'innards' (so Aristarchus) or 'that which is within the armour', i.e. any part of the body. The former seems more likely: cf. the similar formation intestinus (Chantraine, Dict. s.v. Evoov). The second hemistich of 806 recurs at 10.298 and 10.469, where it fits the context better. Aristophanes read for 805-6 onnotepos ke πρόσθεν Επιγράψας χρόα καλον | φθήη Επευξάμενος διά τ' Έντεα και φόνον άνδρῶν. This must be a conjecture to avoid the danger implied, as Eustathius says (1331.6). Aristarchus' rejection of 806 is attractive, but it is possible that the verse is a formula inherited from contests where blood was actually spilt.

B07-8 $\phi d\sigma \gamma \sigma \nu \sigma \nu \phi \gamma \nu \rho \delta \eta \lambda \sigma \nu$ (cf. 14.405 in the genitive) is a variant formula for the more usual $\xi i \phi \sigma \sigma \delta \rho \nu \rho \delta \eta \lambda \sigma \nu$ (see on 2.45). A great Thracian sword is mentioned at 13.576-7 (see comment). The Thracians were not far from Asteropaios' home by the river Axios (cf. 2.844-50 with comments). Verse 808 resembles 560.

Bog ξυνήϊα occurs only here and at 1.124, and nowhere else later; cf. ξυνός, also ξυνήων (Hesiod etc.). Although equal division of a set of armour might seem difficult, this is what Hektor proposed in the case of Patroklos' spoils (17.229-32).

۰.

t

BIO Aristarchus athetized this verse because it seemed odd for Akhilleus to offer a feast only to this pair of contestants. But there is a precedent at 7.313-22, where Aias was offered a banquet after his duel with Hektor, and it is reasonable that a feast should be given to those sharing such risks (as T suggests). A subtler explanation is offered in Plutarch's Moralia (736D), that 'Akhilleus wished that through sharing a banquet and table together the contestants should lay aside and relinquish any anger or ill-feeling which might have arisen during their duel.' Banquets in honour of victorious athletes were common later, as well as the privilege of regular meals at public expense (oirnois to mourovelice): cf. Xenophanes fr. 2.8-9 West, and C. M. Bowra, Problems in Greek Poetry (Oxford 1953) 31-4.

παραθήσομεν: the (vulgate) reading παραθήσομαι seems preferable, as it should be Akhilleus who offers the feast; cf. Od. 15.506 δδοιπόριον παραθείμην (of a meal), and van der Valk, Researches II 625.

811-25 The fight itself and its conclusion are largely made up of recurrent elements. Verse 811 = 708, 812 = 290. Verses 813-15 resemble the opening of the duel between Menelaos and Paris: $813 = 3.340, 814 - 15 \sim$ 3.341-2; and 814 is almost identical with 6.120 and 20.159. Verse 816 =3.15, 6.121, 20.176 etc. The end of 817 resembles 13.559 oxebov opunonival. For 818 cf. 3.347 etc. In 819 $vi\xi(\varepsilon v)$ is common in this position (13× II.), and with 818-19 cf. 7.260 (Aias and Hektor), 12.404 Alos 8' domisa vútev έπάλμενος, ή δε διαπρό / ούδε διαπρό, and 11.352 ούδ' ίκετο χρόα καλόν, 15.529 munivos de ol horese dúphe. Verses 820-1 are less formular, which suggests that the description is designed for this scene (821 \sim 11.253 ϕ ozivo \ddot{v} δουρός άκωκή, etc.). Verse 822 \sim 11,508 τ $\ddot{\psi}$ βα περίδεισαν ... Άχαιοί, 823 ~ 15.176 παυσάμενόν σ' έκέλευσε μάχης ... (etc.), 29.736 άξθλια δ' Ισ' άνελόντες. The gift of the sword at 824-5 is similar to that by Hektor to Aias after their duel, at 7.303-4 ως άρα φωνήσας δώκε ξίφος άργυρόηλον, | σύν κολεῷ τε φέρων και έϋτμήτω τελαμῶνι. The relationship of the formal duels in books 3 and 7 to this passage is discussed by Kirk in Fenik, Tradition 18-40 (especially 35ff.).

BII-X2 It is natural that the contestants should be Telamonian Aias, the great master of the standing fight (cf 7.206ff.) and Diomedes, who takes Akhilleus' place in books 5–6 especially. Cf. 7.179–80, where the Achaeans pray that Aias, Diomedes or Agamemnon may be allotted the task of facing Hektor in the duel. One might have expected Aias to gain the advantage, but it looks as if Diomedes is more skilled (820–1), as Odysseus appeared to be in the wrestling match.

814 The variant $d\mu\phi\sigma\tau i\rho\omega\nu$ derives from 6.120 = 20.159, where it refers to the two armies.

۰.

815 This may be simply an echo of 3.342(n.), or a traditional feature of other duels of this type. $8\alpha\mu\beta\sigma\sigma$ is a strong word, and the powerful reaction is appropriate before such an event. The variant eloopowvros derives from 3.342.

B17 Leaf considers this 'devoid of sense', since it is impossible to tell what is the difference between the meaning of the two phrases. Willcock more reasonably says that 'this describes two formal movements, the advance into action and the attack at close quarters', comparing the formalism of karate or bayonet drill. Presumably each contestant advances and closes with his opponent three times, and either during or after these manoeuvres Aias hits Diomedes' shield and pierces it, while Diomedes constantly threatens Aias' neck. For $\tau pls \ldots \tau pls$ see on 16.702-6.

818-21 The ancient commentators (bT and Eust.) observe that Aias' technique is more straightforward, whereas that of Diomedes is more cunning and effective. Kúpew is normally used of touching or hitting something, but the imperfect probably means that he was trying to do so (cf. H. Ebeling, Lexicon Homericum, Leipzig 1885-7, s.v.). The variant &kokhv produces a construction with kúpew for which there is no evidence elsewhere.

824-5 For the athetesis of these verses see on 798-825. The second verse = 7.304, in the exchange of gifts after the duel between Hektor and Aias.

826–49 Akhilleus next offers a very valuable lump of tron as a prize for the man who can throw it furthest. Polupoites, Leonteus, Telamonian Aias and Epeios compete, and Polupoites wins, with Aias second

There is only one prize for this contest (unlike all the others), the weight itself which is to be thrown (bT 826). This is a massive lump of iron, which Akhilleus says will be big enough to keep a farmer supplied for five years (832-5). Elsewhere we hear of discus-throwing (2.774 etc.), and in the Phaeacian games this is the contest in which Odysseus shows his strength (Od. 8.186-93), with a stone discus (190). Weight-lifting and throwing are occasionally referred to later, but as an exceptional feat rather than a regular event, especially in the sixth century B.C. Cf. 5.302-8, 12.445-62, Od. 9.481, 9.537, 10.121, where heroes and giants lift or throw massive rocks. Two sixth-century inscriptions record the lifting or throwing of rocks weighing 143 and 480 kilos. Cf. E. N. Gardiner, JHS 27 (1907) 1ff., and on weight and discus throwing see also Gardiner, Sports 22-4, 313-37, J. Jüthner, Die athle ischen Leibesübungen der Griechen II.1 (Vienna 1968) 225-303, Laser, Arch. Hom. T 58-63.

The interest lies first in the history of the prize, which Akhilleus had taken from Andromakhe's father Eetion; second in the information about its value, which throws light on the relationship of country and town in the Homeric period; and finally in the contestants (see on 836-8). There is an interesting blend here of motifs suited to the 'heroic age' and the realism of the poet's own (or recent) times (see on 826, 832-5).

• 1

826 σόλον αὐτοχόωνον: σόλος occurs only here and in 839, 844 in Homer; cf. Eumelos fr. 9 K. (=A.R. 3.1372), and Hellenistic and later epic poetry. The meaning is uncertain, but clearly it refers to a lump of metal of some kind. The word σολοίτυπος is explained by Hesychius as meaning μυδροκτύπος (μύδρος is a mass of molten metal), or 'a type of bronze in Cyprus'. σόλος is probably a loan word, whose derivation is uncertain (Chantraine, Dict. s.v.). The place-name Soloi in Cilicia and Cyprus may well be connected with it.

αὐτοχόωνος means 'self-moulded' or 'self-cast' (cf. χόανος 18.470, with comment on 468-73), and recurs only in Nonnus (D. 37.667). The form is presumably due to metrical lengthening of αὐτο-χῶνος, and may represent an original αὐτο-χόᾶνος with artificially lengthened α (cf. Chantraine, GH 182, 104), or simply be an example of 'false diektasis' (Leaf ad loc., W. F. Wyatt, Jr, Metrical Lengthening in Homer, Rome 1969, 225-6).

There was debate in antiquity over the sense of both words: cf. AbT 826, Erbse ad loc., and J. Jüthner, Antike Turngeräthe (Vienna 1896) 18ff. Modern scholarship has been divided between explaining the phrase as referring to a meteorite, or a mass of iron as it comes from the smelting furnace. However, a meteorite cannot easily be forged, and the second explanation must surely be right: cf. R. J. Forbes, Arch. Hom. κ 31, and D. H. F. Gray, JHS 74 (1954) 13. A parallel would be the mass of iron ($\mu\nu\delta\rho\sigma\sigma$ $\sigma_1\delta\eta\rho\omega\sigma$) which the Phocaeans threw into the sea before leaving home in Hdt. 1.165.

This valuable commodity was the property of Eetion of Thebe in the Troad: this might suggest that iron was more readily available here than in Greece itself. On the other hand what Akhilleus says about its use by a farmer to make his own implements indicates that knowledge of its working was already common in Greece, and this reflects the conditions of the early Iron Age: cf. Gray, op. cit. 1-15 (esp. 13ff.).

827-9 Eetion, Andromakhe's father, himself used to employ the σόλος for the same purpose as in the games: with all his wealth he could afford to treat it so lightly. Again we have an echo of Akhilleus' past exploits; on Akhilleus' killing of Eetion see especially 6.414-28. From the spoils of Thebe Akhilleus had won his lyre (9.186-8) and the horse Pedasos (16.152-4), and Agamemnon had received Khruseis (1.366-9), the ἀρχή κακῶν of the poem's story. In 829 σὺν ἄλλοισι κτεάτεσσι echoes 6.426(n.), in the account of Andromakhe's family.

827 flataoke: for this form see on 15.23-5.

830 = 271 etc. Verse $8_{31} = 753$ (cf. 707).

832-5 'Even if the victor's fertile fields are very remote indeed, he will have it to supply his needs for five full years; for it will certainly not be through want of iron that any shepherd or ploughman of his will have to go to the town, but it will supply them.' This shows that a period is envisaged in which the $\pi \delta \lambda_{15}$ is a centre for trade in such precious commodities as iron, but a local landowner could forge it into tools on his own estates, whether by using a skilled member of his own work-force or by employing an itinerant smith. On these two alternatives cf. M. I. Finley, The World of Odysseus (2nd edn, London 1977) 55-6, and see also H. Strasburger, Gymnasium 60 (1953) 99, who compares Hes. Erga 432 where the farmer makes his own ploughs at home.

836-8 Polupoites and Leonteus are the giant leaders of the Lapiths (2.738-47n.), whom we last saw defending the gates of the Achaean wall (12.127-94), their only scene together in the fighting. $\mu\epsilon\nu\epsilon\pi\tau\delta\lambda\epsilon\mu\sigma_5$ Πολυποίτης | is used of this hero at 844, 2.740 and 6.29; cf. 848 Πολυποίταο κρατεροΐο, with 12.129, 12.182 κρατερόν -ός Πολυποίτην -ης. For Leonteus' description cf. 16.189 Έχεκλῆος κρατερόν $\mu\epsilon\nu$ 'Ακτορίδαο, and for Λεοντεύς, όζος Άρηος (841) cf. 2.745, 12.188.

The greater Aias is a natural contestant here, as in the wrestling and duel. Epeios was the heavyweight winner of the boxing match, but does less well here. For Τελαμωνιάδης cf. 9.622-3n.

840 Epeios 'whirled the weight round and let it fly'. Cf. Od. 8.189 róv þa περιστρέψας ῆκε στιβαρῆς άπὸ χειρός (Odysseus' discus-throw), and II. 13.204 (of a severed head) ῆκε δέ μιν σφαιρηδὸν ἐλιξάμενος δι' ὁμίλου (see comment). At 431 a discus is described as 'thrown from the shoulder' (κατωμαδίοιο). The normal method of throwing a discus in antiquity was by a circular or semi-circular movement of the body, pivoting on the right foot: cf. Gardiner, Sports 318-37, Harris, Athletes 86-92. It has been suggested, however, that the σόλος would have been much too heavy to whirl in this way, and consequently that the Achaeans laughed at Epeios' throw because he had no idea how to 'put the weight', i.e. he had the strength but not the skill (R. L. Howland, PCPS 183 (1954-5) 16).

athetized this verse because $\pi \dot{\alpha} v \tau \omega v$ is used with reference to two throws (Arn/A).

645-7 For this type of measure of distance cf. 431-3 δσσα δέ δloκου ούρα ... | δν τ' αlζηδς ἀφῆκεν ἀνὴρ ... | τοσσὸν ἐπιδραμέτην, and the parallels quoted there (also 517-23). The word καλαύροψ occurs only here in early literature; cf. Antimachus fr. 91 W. πάντες δ' ἐν χείρεσσι καλαύροπος οὐατοέσσας, and A. R. 2.33, etc. It refers to a throwing-stick, which according to the commentators was equipped with a string for holding it, and a weight at the other end: Antimachus' epithet οὐατοέσσας must refer to the string which formed a 'handle' (bT 845 and references in Erbse ad loc.). It has been compared to the bolas, 'a weapon consisting of a string with one or more stones attached to it, which is used in Spanish America for throwing. at and catching cattle' (J. L. Myres in E. N. Gardiner, JHS 27 (1907) 5). Schol. b say that the καλαύροψ was used for separating cattle from a herd (cf. Eust. 1332.47). Cf. the λαγώβολον, discussed by Gow on Theocr. Id. 4.49. Whatever the weight of the σόλος, clearly this is meant to be an exceptional throw.

847 mayros dywyos: either the whole area in which the spectators were (cf. Od. 8.190-2), or more probably the whole of the area marked out for the contest.

850-83 For the archery contest Akhilleus offers two prizes, for the man who hits a dove tied to a mast and the one who hits the string. Meriones and Teukros c mpete. Teukros fails to make a vow to Apollo, misses the bird, but hits the string and cuts it. The bird flies up into the clouds, but Meriones quickly seizes the bow, makes a vow to Apollo, and shoots. He hits the bird, which falls on to the mast-head, and then on to the ground. Meriones and Teukros take first and second prize respectively

The last contest which actually takes place involves dramatic elements of divinely inspired luck similar to those of the chariot race and foot race. It is a rapid and exciting piece of narrative. Nevertheless, it has always aroused critical objections. The most serious of these is the point already made by Aristarchus (Arn/AT 857), that the poet should not have made Akhilleus foresee what was about to happen by accident, the cutting of the string which tied the bird to the mast. It is hardly surprising that Virgil avoids this apparent oddity in his imitation (Aen. 5.485-518). Other minor objections (cf. Leaf) are that the sudden change from narrative to direct speech at 855, without a formal speech-introduction, is unusual, and that this transition occurs only here in mid-verse; that 871 is oddly expressed; and that the description of the bird being shot and dying (875-81) is very confused, as the mast is far away (853) and yet the arrow falls in front of Meriones' foot, whilst the bird lands on the mast before falling to the ground.

۰,

A possible answer may be that the poet is deliberately introducing a more fantastic episode as part of his 'coda'. As so often Virgil is Homer's best commentator, for he catches this tone of 'the marvellous' and the divinely inspired outcome in the close of his own archery contest, when Acestes' arrow spontaneously bursts into flames and shoots through the sky like a comet, as a portent of things to come (Aen. 5.519-40). Here too the spectators react with wonder (529 attonitis haesere animis), and this shows that Virgil is developing the Homeric ending to this scene (881). Even Akhilleus' foresight could be assigned to divine inspiration, since (as has often been said) nothing in Homer occurs purely by chance (cf. 22.329n.). If this argument is dismissed as special pleading, one might ask whether a version in which this scene did not exist at all is likely or preferable: for most of the problems are integral to the passage and rejection of individual verses cannot solve them.

850 τοξευτησι: only here in early literature; cf. Call. fr. 70.2 Pf., etc. The normal classical word is τοξότης (11.385, etc.). For archery as a sport cf. 2.774, etc., Od. 8.229.

lóεντα σιδηρόν: the epithet occurs only here in Homer; cf. the (early epic) Phoronis fr. 2.6 K. = Davies, EGF fr. 2.6, where it refers to iron in general, and Nicander (Alex. 171), Quintus of Smyrna (6.48). Aristarchus (Arn/A) took it as meaning 'suitable for arrows', pointing out that this made the prize an appropriate one. The alternative explanation was 'dark', as in loειδέα πόντον (11.298 etc.), where it should mean 'dark blue', 'violet'. Elsewhere iron is called αίθων (4.485 etc.) or πόλιος (9.366 etc.). Despite this variation in colour-terminology, the second explanation for lóεις seems more likely, and fits its use in the Phoronis passage.

851 The prizes are 'ten (double) axes and ten single ones'. ήμιπέλεκκον recurs nowhere outside this passage (cf. 858, 883). Aristarchus (Arn/A) saw a connexion with the archery contest in the Odyssey, where the contestants must shoot through twelve axes (19.572-81, 21.73-6, 21.120-430); cf. also Laser, Arch. Hom. T 24 n. 109. These axes were themselves prizes won by Odysseus (21.61-2, and cf. 117), and there too the axe-heads are of iron. Some authorities record that πέλεκυς and ήμιπέλεκκου were used as measures of weight, for example in Boeotia and at Paphos in Cyprus (TD and Eust., Hesychius, quoted in Erbse). C. H. Grayson ('Weighing in ancient Greece', Oxford D. Phil. Thesis 1974, 1 286) compares the Bronze Age double-axe bronze ingots which may have been used as units of value or weight. It is unclear whether in fact these prizes were axe-shaped ingots of iron which could be used for arrows or other tools (like the $\sigma \delta \lambda \sigma \varsigma$), or whether they were actual axes or axe-heads. For their use in battle, however, cf. 13.611-13, 15.709 with comments, and see also H. W. Catling, in Lefkandi 1 256. The one-bladed adze-axe occurs in some warrior burials of the Early Iron Age and could be what is meant by $\eta\mu\eta\pi\epsilon\lambda\epsilon\kappa\kappa\sigma\nu$. For a hoard of 21 bronze axes with a bronze tripod in an undated burial at Mycenae cf. AR 1985-6, p. 27.

852 Cf. 878, Od. 14.311 Ιστόν ... νηδς κυανοπρώροιο, and νεός κυανοπρώροιο 15.693, 8× Od.

853 τρήρωνα πέλειαν: cf. 855, 874, 22.140 (and 5.778n.).

854 μήρινθος occurs only in this passage in Homer (858 etc.); cf. Ar. Th. 928, etc. The scholia record the variants πόδα for ποδός and ως γάρ άνώγει. bT (855) point out that the dove would be harder to hit if tied by the foot, as it could flutter about.

855-6 The direct speech is introduced simply by $dv\omega\gamma\varepsilon_1$, as at 4.301-9 (see comment). This is unusual (and noted by AbT), but there is a wide range of different examples of 'anomalous speech introductions' in Homer: see M. W. Edwards, HSCP 74 (1970) 1-36, especially 20ff. What is unparalleled is the transition to speech within a verse, which leads Edwards to call this 'the oddest speech introduction in Homer' (27). All the other contests so far have been introduced by the same formal introduction $\sigma\tau\eta\delta'$ opody kal $\mu \tilde{\nu} \theta \sigma \ell \nu' A \rho \gamma \varepsilon local v (271 etc.)$. But the abbreviated style continues a stage further at 884-6, since there is no introductory speech by Akhilleus there. For parallels to the shift from indirect to direct speech see on 15.346-7.

855 τοξεύειν: only here in Homer for τοξάζεσθαι (Od. 8.220 etc.), but the normal verb in classical prose and poetry.

856 olkovoe: the variant khiolyvoe is equally possible.

857-8 For the oddity of this see on 850-83. ήσσων γαρ δή κείνος is a parenthesis and the δέ in 858 is apodotic. The point may be that if one hits the string one has failed to hit the target itself, but the shot is still remarkable and deserves a prize.

859-60 Teukros, Telamonian Aias' half-brother, regularly uses a bow in the battle-scenes (8.266-334 etc.), and is called the best Greek archer at 13.313-14. Meriones usually fights with a spear (and enters for the javelin contest at 888), but he uses a bow at 13.650-2 (see comment), and this suits his Cretan origins. These are the only two Greek heroes who actually fight with a bow in the lliad itself, though Odysseus boasts later that he was surpassed as an archer at Troy only by Philoktetes (Od. 8.219-22). Meriones' success may reflect his energetic, practical character (cf. 113n.), whereas Teukros tends to have bad luck: cf. 8.324-9 where he is hit by a stone which breaks his bow-string, and drops his bow, and 15.461-70 where his new bow-string again breaks thanks to divine influence. For β in Teurpoio &vortos cf. 13.770 (etc.) β in δ' 'Elevoio &vortos (etc.). Verse 860 = 888.

861-2 The contestants draw lots as at 352-8. The first to shoot might have an advantage as he could hit the bird and win outright. Verse 861 = 3.316 (cf. Od. 10.206). For $\kappa\lambda\eta\rho\omega\lambda\delta\chi\epsilon\nu$ cf. 24.400.

863-4 The underlying sense of $\dot{\alpha}\pi\epsilon i\lambda\epsilon i\nu$ seems to be 'to make a declaration', and from this come the senses 'to boast', 'to threaten', 'to promise' or as here 'to make a vow' (cf. Chantraine, Dict. s.v., A. W. H. Adkins, JHS 89 (1969) 10-12, 18-20). A first-century B.C. papyrus and a few MSS (including T) omit 864 (=873, 4.102, 4.120). This could have been added to supply the infinitive phrase with $\eta\pi\epsilon i\lambda\eta\sigma\epsilon\nu$; Aristarchus (Arn/AT) glosses the verb as $\eta\bar{\nu}\xi\alpha\tau\sigma$, which could be used without an infinitive, and no comment by him on 864 is recorded. $\pi\rho\omega\tau\dot{\sigma}\gamma\sigma\sigma\sigma$ occurs only here in Homer; cf. Hes. Erga 543, etc. The sacrifice is the same as that vowed by Pandaros before his successful bow-shot (4.102ff.). As Leaf observes, a hecatomb of first-born lambs 'seems to be regarded as Apollo's fixed price for a successful shot'. It would certainly have been a major offering.

865 'This is an incentive to piety' (bT). For μ sympe referring to a god 'begrudging' someone success cf. 15.473 ouver the deds $\Delta \alpha \alpha a a a \alpha \sigma$, which refers to the breaking of Teukros' bow-string by Zeus's power, and Od. 3.55-6 kaught Morelbaov yaihoxe, $\mu \eta \delta t$ $\mu \epsilon \gamma h \rho \eta s$ | $h \mu \tilde{\nu} \epsilon \tau \chi a \mu t \delta \epsilon$ to the breaking of Teukros' bow-string by Zeus's power, and Od. 3.55-6 kaught Morelbaov yaihoxe, $\mu \eta \delta t$ $\mu \epsilon \gamma h \rho \eta s$ | $h \mu \tilde{\nu} \epsilon \tau \chi a \mu t \delta \epsilon$ to the breaking of Teukros' bow-string by Zeus's power, and Od. 3.55-6 kaught Morelbaov yaihoxe, $\mu \eta \delta t$ $\mu \epsilon \gamma h \rho \eta s$ | $h \mu \tilde{\nu} \epsilon \tau \chi a \mu t \delta \epsilon$

868 $\pi\alpha\rho\epsilon\theta\eta$: 'fell down', aorist passive of $\pi\alpha\rho\eta\mu$, only here in Homer; cf. Chantraine, GH 1 402, 406, where the spread of aorists in $-\theta\eta\nu$ is described as a relatively late development in Homeric grammar.

869 The spectators applaud (cf. 847), clearly regarding this as an achievement.

Byo-1 'And then in haste Meriones snatched from his hand the bow; but the arrow he had long been holding, while Teukros was making his shot' (cf. bT). As with the weight-throwing and javelin the same weapon is used by both competitors (so Aristarchus, Did/A). Leaf objects that 'the idea seems absurd, the change of subject in 1000000 is very harsh, and ω_5 does not mean while'. The first point seems unfair, but the second and third carry some weight. The conjecture of Voss (on HyDem 273) ω_5 1000000 ('so that he might shoot') would remove these objections, but has no authority. If ω_5 can mean 'when' in Homer its use here does not seem impossible, and the change of subject, if abrupt, is intelligible. The passage was found difficult in antiquity, and seems to have given rise to several conjectures. Antimachus of Colophon's reading is recorded in two different ways by A and T (cf. fr. 139 Wyss):

(Α) σπερχόμενος δ' άρα Μηριόνης έξείλετο τόξον | χερσίν,

(Τ) σπερχόμενὸς δ' ἄρα Μηριόνης ἐξείρυσε Τεύκρου | τόξον· χερσὶ δ' δἴστὸν ἔχεν πάλαι, ὡς ἴθυνεν.

It seems likely that T's version records what Antimachus actually read: cf. Wyss on Antim. fr. 139, van der Valk, Researches 1 428-9. The Massaliote text read σπερχόμενος δ' άρα Μηριόνης Επεθήκατ' διστόν | τόξω· έν γάρ χερσίν Έχεν πάλαι, ώς ίθυνεν (AT). This removes part of Leaf's objections, since it gives Meriones his own bow, but the reading looks like a conjecture.

• 1

878-3 Cf. 863-4, with comment.

874 ύψι δ' ὑπὸ νεφέων: cf. 16.374-5 ὕψι δ' ... | ... ὑπὸ νεφέων. In both cases most MSS rightly read ὑπαί as at 15.625 (see on 16.372-6).

875-9 'ὑπὸ πτέρυγος seems to imply a side shot, in which case it can only have been by a miracle that the arrow fell at Meriones' feet; if the bird was directly overhead it is equally miraculous that she should have been able to fly to the mast "far away" (853, 880) after letting the arrow through' (Leaf). These objections have some force.

875 τῆ: '(up) there'; the variant τήν is equally possible, but is less likely to have been changed to τῆ than vice versa.

877 A opvis: the article here perhaps marks the opposition with what preceded, i.e. 'but she, the bird' (cf. Chantraine, $GH \equiv 161$). But there are several uses of it in books 23 and 24 in a relatively weak sense: cf. 75, 257, 465, 24.388, 24.801, Chantraine and Goube 23, Chantraine, $GH \equiv 164$.

878-9 The bird resting on the mast, with its neck hanging down and drooping feathers, is a vivid and pathetic picture. Verse 878 (cf. 852) is a four-word one. In 879 Aristarchus seems to have read λ lavoev, from the active λ id $\zeta \omega$, which occurs once in Lycophron, meaning 'loosen'. λ lavoev (or the variant λ id σ ϑ η) means 'dropped' or 'drooped'; cf. 15.543 etc. of a fallen warrior.

880 ῶκύς is emphatic here, meaning 'swiftly' (cf. Arn/AT). Elsewhere in the lliad the nominative singular only occurs in the formula ῶκύς Άχιλλεύς, except 11.478 ῶκὺς ὅιστός. Cf. 13.671-2 = 16.606-7 ῶκα δὲ θυμὸς | ῷχετ' ἀπὸ μελέων.

β80–1 τῆλε δ' ἀπ' αὐτοῦ | κάππεσε: probably 'and it (the bird) fell far from the mast' (Mazon, Willcock), rather than 'far from him' (Leaf). Cf. 16.117 τῆλε δ' ἀπ' αὐτοῦ |, 18.395 τῆλε πεσόντα. Verse 881 = 728.

884–97 Finally Akhilleus offers as prizes for spear-throwing the spear itself and a cauldron. Agamemnon and Meriones rise to compete, but Akhilleus says that Agamemnon is the best and gives him the cauldron and Meriones the spear, without a contest

The final scene is the briefest, bringing the marked diminuendo to a close. Javelin-throwing was mentioned in the lists of contests at 621-3 and 634-8, and cf. 2.774 etc., Od. 8.229, and Laser, Arch Hom. $\pm 53-6$. It becomes clear that the spear will be the second prize, the valuable cauldron the first. Akhilleus diplomatically does not allow Agamemnon to compete, but when he says (890-1) 'we know how far you surpass all others, and how much you were always the best in power and in casting the spear', one cannot fail to catch the relevance of these words to the quarrel between the two leaders in the earlier part of the Iliad. Contrast especially 1.161-8, 225-30, where Akhilleus accused Agamemnon of taking the best of the prizes of war without having the courage to fight for them. This brief speech seals the reconciliation achieved in book 19.

۰.

ſ

884-6 Verse 884 = 798, first half of 886 = 799. For λέβητ' ἄπυρον cf. 267 ἄπυρον κατέθηκε λέβητα (with comment). For ἀνθεμόεντα cf. Od. 3.440 έν ἀνθεμόεντα λέβητι, 24.375 κρητῆρα πανάργυρον ἀνθεμόεντα. The scholia (AbT) explain it as meaning either 'dedicatory' (ἀναθεματιαῖον) or 'decorated with (embossed) flowers, which are called ἄνθεμα', and they compare Pind. O. 2.72 ἄνθεμα δὲ χρυσοῦ, which are used to make necklaces and garlands. The second explanation (or something like it) must be correct. Cf. also HyHom 6.9, where ἄνθεμα of orichalc and gold are used as ear-rings, IG 1² 286.60 ὄρμος ἀνθέμων, 1X 2.164 B 25 ἄνθεμα κοτταβείων (i.e. rosettes decorating basins), and Leumann, HW 249. Such decorative flowers or rosettes on vases occur occasionally in the Mycenaean period, the best example being from the Shaft Graves at Mycenae (cf. Helbig, Homerische Epos 386). F. Canciani (Arch. Hom. N 39-40 and fig. 10) suggests an alternative connexion with a late Geometric or early Orientalizing-period type of cauldron with lotos flowers on the handles, but this seems less likely.

886 $\eta\mu\sigma\nu\epsilon_5$: 'javelin-throwers', an absolute hapax, as is $\eta\mu\alpha$ (891) meaning 'a throw'; cf. $\eta\mu$ 1 etc. (Od. 8.198 $\nu\pi\epsilon\rho\eta\sigma\epsilon_1$ of a javelin-throw). Both words could well be technical terms belonging to this sport. The ancient variant $\rho\eta\mu\sigma\epsilon_5$ (Arn/A, bT, Plut. Mor. 675A), meaning 'orators' and implying a reading $\rho\eta\mu\alpha\sigma\nu$ in 891, would introduce a contest in speaking which would be quite out of place here. Eustathius (1334.49ff.) notices the absence of an introductory speech by Akhilleus and discusses reasons for this. Abbreviation of narrative is presumably one factor (cf. 855-6n.), together with the point that his speech to Agamemnon follows so soon.

887-8 For 887 cf. 1.102 etc. Verse 888 = 860.

889 This combination of formulae (cf. 2.336 etc., 1.121 etc.) occurs only here.

890 Cf. 6.125 πολύ προβέβηκας ἀπάντων]; 16.54 ὅ τε κράτεϊ προβεβήκη. In the second case Akhilleus was referring to Agamemnon's claim to superiority in connexion with his removal of Briseis.

891 δυνάμει τε καὶ ἡμασιν: an odd combination of nouns, δύναμις being chosen by the poet perhaps because it could refer not merely to individual physical strength but to Agamemnon's 'power' in general, although this sense does not seem to occur elsewhere in Homer. For ἡμα see on 886.

892 άλλά: the implication is presumably 'but do not feel the need to display your supremacy'.

894 έθέλοις: the optative makes the suggestion slightly more hypothetical

Copyrighted Material

than the variant $\ell\theta\ell\lambda\epsilon_{15}$ (which would be more usual after $\pi\delta\rho\omega\mu\epsilon\nu$), and fits Akhilleus' courteous tone better. Cf. 17.488-9 ϵ l $\sigma\nu$ $\gamma\epsilon$ $\theta\nu\mu\phi$ | $\sigma\phi$ $\ell\theta\ell\lambda\epsilon_{15}$ (v.l. $\ell\theta\ell\lambda_{015}$). In $\kappa\ell\lambda_{0101}$ $\gamma\delta\rho$ $\ell\gamma\omega\gamma\epsilon$ (cf. 18.254) the point may be 'for it is I who am urging you to do this'.

895-7 Verse 895 = 2.441. Agamemnon himself gives the spear to Meriones, and then hands the first prize to his herald Talthubios, whom we first saw when he was ordered by the king to go and take Akhilleus' prize, Briseis (1.318-25). Here, by contrast, Akhilleus gives a prize to the king of his own free will, in friendship. On this quiet and dignified note the games for Patroklos are concluded.

....

-- •

t

BOOK TWENTY-FOUR

The last book of the lliad is remarkable for its clearly-defined theme and structure. In this respect it resembles its counterpart, the opening Book, whose theme was Akhilleus' anger and its consequences (see Introduction, 'Structure and themes'). Book 24 is wholly concerned with the fate of Hektor's body, and its keynote is pity, on both the divine and human planes. As the poem began with Akhilleus (1.1), so it ends with Hektor (24.804): these two are the pillars which buttress the whole work.

It is not the most obvious ending, given the tone of the rest of the poem. This could have come after Hektor's death, or (more quietly) after Patroklos' funeral. Alternatively, given the continuity of epic tradition, the story could have progressed further, for example as far as the death of Akhilleus himself. An ancient variant of the final verse in fact exists, linking the poem to the Aithiopis (see on 804). What we have is quite different. At the beginning of the Book we seem to revert to the tone of book 22, with Akhilleus' repeated mutilation of Hektor's body. But then the gods are moved to pity, and with Apollo's speech the train of events is begun which leads to the ransoming and funeral.

As Macleod says, the plot 'may be divided into three parts: (a) the gods show pity, (b) a man accepts supplication, (c) a lament and burial are achieved' (Iliad XXIV 14). If we look more closely, we can see that the major action, Priam's visit to Akhilleus, together with his journey to and from the Greek camp (322-718), is preceded by two main movements, the complex sequence of divine preparations (1-187) and those on the human level (188-321). Both involve debates, between Apollo, Here and Zeus, and between Priam and Hekabe. This elaborate and leisurely build-up creates great suspense, and the tension is increased throughout Priam's journey, up to the momentous point of his appearance in Akhilleus' hut (see on 469-84). Relief comes with Akhilleus' response to Priam's plea, in the scene where both men share their grief (507-12), followed by Akhilleus' great speech of consolation (518-51), although even then there is an ever-present sense of Priam's danger (cf. 559-72, 582-6, 591-5, 649-55, 671-2, 683-9). Finally the lamentations of Andromakhe, Hekabe and Helen and the brief, restrained account of the burial close the poem on a note of quiet dignity, not unlike the ending of some Greek tragedies.

The rôle of Apollo, as initiator of the poem's action, and as the agent of its resolution, has been discussed in the Introduction ('Structure'). In book 24 he is above all a god concerned with the ethical themes of pity and respect, whose opening speech of protest against Akhilleus (33-54) sets the moral tone of the Book, which, like much else, brings it closer to the Odyssey than the rest of the lliad (see Introduction, 'The end of the lliad in relation to the Odyssey'). This is underlined by the emphasis on Priam's piety and extraordinary faith in the gods. In this context the lengthy scene of the meeting between Hermes and Priam is important (see on 349-442). Equally remarkable are Akhilleus' prompt response to Zeus's command (139-40), his self-restraint, and his sympathy and admiration for Priam.

۰,

In the end, then, the gods do show their concern for men and their sufferings. Although Akhilleus describes them as 'free of care' ($dxn\delta dxs$) in his speech to Priam (526), this is by contrast with mortals, for whom some degree of trouble and sorrow is unavoidable. From the human viewpoint the sufferings which the gods send may seem inexplicable, and they themselves may appear indifferent to men's pleas for justice. But the poet shows that this is not the whole story, through the action of book 24 itself. Of course, as with all endings of great narrative and dramatic works, the resolution which this brings, satisfying and moving though it is, leaves much that is unresolved: the implacable hostility of Here, Poseidon and Athene to Troy (cf. 25-30), the imminent death of Akhilleus, the city's fall and all the horrors which this will bring, and beyond this, yet more troubles in store for the returning Achaeans. In this respect again, the Iliad's structure resembles that of many later tragedies, especially those of Sophocles.

On book 24 see especially Beck, Stellung, Deichgräber, Letzte Gesang, and Macleod, Iliad XXIV, Introduction.

1-21 The Achaeans disperse, eat their supper, and go to bed. But Akhilleus is unable to sleep. At dawn he yokes his chariot, drags Hektor three times round Patroklos' tomb, and leaves him stretched out face downward in the dust. But Apollo protects his corpse from harm, covering it with his aegis

After the ending of the games, in which Akhilleus' normality and composure were emphasized, there is a clear break, marking off this Book from what precedes, since the opening passage reverts to the earlier motifs of Akhilleus' grief, the mistreatment of Hektor's body, and Apollo's protection of it; cf. especially 23.1-26, 23.178-91. The contrast between the dispersal of the army and Akhilleus' sorrow recalls both the opening of book 23 and 23.57-61, where the army sleeps but Akhilleus lies grieving on the shore until sleep overtakes him. The motif of a single individual's sleeplessness also occurred at the beginning of books 2 and 10, and is repeated at 677-81. On this theme and its use here cf. E. Minchin, Parola del Passato 40 (1985) 269-75. The long upsilon of λῦτο (= ἕλυτο) is due to epic lengthening. For άγών meaning 'gathering' see on 23.258, where the assembly for the games begins.

2-3 μ to μ

3-4 bT comment on how the poet uses the respite of the games to suggest the abatement of Akhilleus' sorrow, and then dramatically returns to this leading theme, when Akhilleus is again left on his own. Notice the contrast between the meal taken by the army and Akhilleus' implied abstention: this recurs at 122-5.

4-5 οὐδέ μιν ῦπνος ῆρει πανδαμάτωρ: the epithet occurs first here; cf. Od. 9.372-3 κὰδ δέ μιν ῦπνος ῆρει πανδαμάτωρ. It is paradoxical and virtually concessive, as if to suggest that Akhilleus' grief was so intense as to overcome even all-mastering sleep.

5-222 Akhilleus' restlessness is most vividly expressed by 5 + 10-11, and 6-9 form a parenthesis, expanding the point of $\phi l\lambda ou \, \delta \tau \Delta \rho ou \, \mu \mu \nu \eta \mu \delta \nu \rho$. These four verses were athetized by Aristophanes and Aristarchus for various reasons, the main one being that they weaken the dramatic effect. Aristarchus also objected to the use of $\delta \nu \delta \rho \sigma \tau \eta \tau \alpha$ here, apparently because he took the sense as 'courage', which he considered un-Homeric, and then went on to argue that the word was tautologous with $\mu \delta \nu \rho$. To these points Leaf adds that verse 8 is Odyssean (8.183, 13.91, 13.264), and so is the verb $\tau \sigma \lambda \nu \pi \delta \nu \omega$ (but cf. 11. 14.86), that the rare synizesis of $\delta \lambda \gamma \delta \rho$ suggests direct borrowing from Od. 13.263, and finally that 'the allusion to the hardships of the sea evidently belongs to the Od. rather than the 11.'

The resemblances to the Odyssey are not an argument against originality, in view of the frequency of Odyssean language and motifs in this Book (cf. Introduction), and the theme of endurance will be important later (see on 49 etc.). But it is true that without these verses the sense would run on smoothly from 5 to 10, and they are too general to add much to the portrayal of Akhilleus' grief.

6 άνδροτήτα: the word recurs in Homer only at 16.857 = 22.363, at the deaths of Patroklos and Hektor; see on 16.855-8 (also for the scansion). It must mean 'manhood', i.e. one's nature as a man, virtually one's living self and strength, rather than 'courage'. This was the view of Aristarchus (and bT on 16.857), although here he seems to have failed to realize that the sense 'manhood' is possible, and that the combination with $\mu \epsilon vos$ is similar to the phrase $\delta v \delta \rho o \tau \eta \tau \alpha$ if $\beta \rho \eta v$ in 16.857.

6-8 Akhilleus longs for Patroklos, and remembers with longing all that they had endured together, a slight but natural zeugma in the use of molecule. The addition of verse 8 creates a second zeugma, as molecule -ous tolumever is a common phrase, especially in the Odyssey (14.86, $4 \times Od$.), but πείρων governs both 'wars' and 'waves', although it goes better with the second noun. It looks as if there is some association here between the senses of πειράω ('try', 'experience') and πείρω ('pierce', 'cut through'). In 7 the scansion ὑπόσā is paralleled by Od. 12.396 ὑπταλέā τε καὶ ὡμά, and the synizesis ἁλγεα occurs only here. In the Odyssey verse 8 always occurs in the context of Odysseus' wanderings and sufferings, being preceded by the phrases μάλα πολλά πάθ' ἁλγεα and ἐγώ πάθον ἅλγεα θυμῷ at 13.90-1, 263-4.

• 1

10-21 Up to verse 11 the description seems to refer to a single night, but the frequentative verbs in 12-17 evidently describe Akhilleus' actions over several nights: cf. especially $\lambda \eta \theta \epsilon \sigma \kappa \epsilon \nu$ of Dawn (13), and the fact that the next stage (Apollo's protest to the gods) only occurs on the twelfth day (31).

12-13 This solitary and restless activity of Akhilleus, pacing up and down on the sea shore, is typical of his unquiet spirit: see on 23.59-61, and cf. the sequence at 23.218-28, where Akhilleus moves restlessly to and fro all night long beside Patroklos' pyre, until Dawn comes, spreading her light across the sea.

Plato's adaptation of verse 12 (Rep. 388A), $\pi\lambda\omega\lambda\omega\nu\tau'$ $d\lambda\omega\nu\tau'$ $d\lambda\omega\nu\tau'$ dn' $\theta\nu'$ $d\lambda\delta\gamma$ $d\tau\rho\nu\gamma$ $t\tau$ $t\sigma$ $t\sigma$, suggests an odd variation $\pi\lambda\omega\lambda$ $t\sigma$ $t\sigma$ $\lambda\omega$, but may be due to misquotation from memory.

14-18 The threefold dragging of Hektor's body round Patroklos' tomb repeats the initial treatment of the corpse at 22.395-404, and is a kind of tribute to Patroklos (although the tomb is empty; see on 23.243-4, 254), like the threefold procession of the Myrmidons around his body at 23.12-13. Aristotle observed the parallel with a later Thessalian custom of dragging a murderer round his victim's tomb (see on 22.401-4). The optative ζεύξειεν indicates a repeated action ('whenever he had yoked'), and δt in 15 is apodotic, marking the main clause. In 17 we should perhaps follow Herodian and most MSS in reading τόνδε δ' ξασκεν.

18 έν κόνι ... προπρηνέα: cf. 23.25-6 (with comment) πρηνέα ... τανύσσας | έν κονίης; προπρηνές 3.218.

18-21 At 23.184-91 Aphrodite and Apollo protect Hektor's corpse, one with immortal oil, the other with a dark cloud. The golden aegis is a variation of the latter, and 21 echoes 23.187. At 15.307ff. Apollo has an aegis, and is also clothed in cloud, and at 18.203-6 Athene puts the aegis round Akhilleus' shoulders and a golden cloud round his head. Aristarchus (Arn/A) athetized 20-1, and the scholia offer various objections: (a) the verses are unnecessary; (b) the divine aegis should not be polluted by death; (c) it belongs to Zeus, not Apollo; (d) the verses disagree with the account in book 23. These are poor arguments.

19 Δεικείη occurs only here in Il.; cf. Od. 20.308. Δπεχε χροί means 'kept away from his flesh'; cf. Od. 20.263 κερτομίας τοι άφέξω.

•

20-1 Aristarchus preferred alyíba ... $\chi \rho \upsilon \sigma \epsilon \eta \nu$, as in 18.343 τοϊόν τοι έγώ νέφος άμφικαλύψω (and similarly 21.321), and Leaf reasonably assumes that this requires the change to παντί (cf. also R. R. Dyer, Glotta 42 (1964) 356). For the aegis see on 2.446-51.

22-76 The gods pity Hektor and urge Hermes to steal his body, but Here, Poseidon nd Athen object. On the twelfth day Apollo protests at the gods' neglect of Hektor's corpse and support for Akhilleus. Here answers that Akhilleus deserves more honour, but Zeus supports Apollo. He orders Thetis to be summoned so that she can tell Akhilleus to acc pt Priam's ransom

The theme of the gods' pity for Hektor introduces a crucial new development, preparing the way for Apollo's protest, and the debate gives us a last vivid picture of the clash between pro-Greek and pro-Trojan deities, with Zeus as arbitrator. Apollo stands out as a god concerned with fundamental Greek ethical principles, whereas Here's objections are more personal and vindictive. Zeus's decision strikes a proper balance: the respect due to Hektor will not detract from Akhilleus' honour. On the overall structure of the three speeches see Lohmann, Reden 152-4. Cf. also Reinhardt, IuD 471-4, who points to the structural similarity between this scene with its sequel and the divine assembly at the beginning of the Odyssey, leading to Telemakhos' mission and Odysseus' rescue. In fact the parallels are even more striking than Reinhardt observes (see Introduction, 'The end of the Iliad in relation to the Odyssey').

a3-30 bT record that these eight verses were athetized (by whom they do not say). They then defend 23 but reject 24-30, and ascribe this athetesis to Aristarchus. But Aristonicus (A 25-30) records the athetesis of 25-30 only, and it looks as if this was really Aristarchus' opinion. He does not seem to have rejected 24, since he is not said to have objected to the parallel verse to9 (although he did regard 71-3 as an interpolation). bT argue against 24 that the idea of Hermes' stealing the body is unsuitable for the gods (θ eois où $\pi p \epsilon \pi o v$), and that it does not make sense to give this as the suggestion of all the gods and then to add Apollo's speech accusing them. The idea of Hermes' stealing the corpse is odd but not impossible, and the point about the contradiction with Apollo's speech could equally be applied to 23, which is presumably intended to prepare the ground for what follows (22-76n.).

The objections of Aristarchus to 25-30 are more serious: (a) it is absurd to speak of all the gods agreeing, and then exclude three of the most powerful deities; (b) the judgement of Paris is nowhere else mentioned by Homer, whereas it ought to have been referred to more often as an explanation of the goddesses' hostility; (c) velocore (29) is misused, since it cannot mean 'judged'; (d) $\mu \alpha \chi \lambda \sigma \sigma \nu \nu \eta$ (30) means $\gamma \nu \nu \alpha \kappa \sigma \mu \alpha \nu \sigma \eta$, whereas what Aphrodite gave to Paris was not this but Helen, the most beautiful woman of the time; and the word is in any case Hesiodic (cf. Hes. fr. 132 M-W).

To these points bT add: (e) that gods should not show the same kind of resentment as Akhilleus; (f) that Poseidon's support of the Greeks is not explained by the story of the judgement; (g) that according to Homer Paris was brought up and educated in the city (cf. 3.54-5), whereas 29 indicates that he was a rustic; (h) that $\mu\alpha\chi\lambda\sigma\sigma\nu\eta$ is not used elsewhere of men, but only of women; (i) that it is out of place for Athene and Here to engage in a beauty-contest with Aphrodite, the goddess of love, especially as Here elsewhere treats her as her child (14.190) and knows that she possesses all the arts of persuasion (14.198-9). Finally bT give a list of passages where they think that the judgement could or should have been mentioned, of which the most striking is 4.31-2, where Zeus asks Here why she hates Troy so much, and no explanation is offered. It should be noted that nearly all of these objections could be avoided by the omission simply of 29-30, leaving 25-8 unaltered.

Most analytical scholars accepted this condemnation of the passage as conclusive, but a spirited defence was made by F. G. Welcker in Der episch Cyclus (Bonn 1865) 113-20 (cf. also J. A. Scott, CJ 14 (1919) 326-30, and other references in Griffin, HLD 195 n. 49). Following Welcker's lead Reinhardt (in 1938) argued that the whole poem presupposes the story of the judgement, but the poet keeps it in the background because it does not suit him to attribute the gods' hostility explicitly to such a petty motivation ('Das Parisurteil', reprinted in Tradition and Geist, Göttingen 1960, 16-36).

Reinhardt's article has been proclaimed 'a landmark in Homeric studies' (Griffin, loc. cit.), but it has rightly been pointed out (M. Davies, JHS 101 (1981) 56-62) that he does not actually offer an explanation of why the poet should choose to mention the story at all at this point in the work, nor does he answer some of the ancient objections, especially concerning the awkward way in which Poseidon is sandwiched between the two goddesses, when his hostility should be due to other reasons, and the reference to Aphrodite's reward to Paris as $\mu \alpha \chi \lambda \alpha \sigma \omega \eta$. Davies suggests that the story's position near the end of the poem emphasizes that the anger of the gods hostile to Troy still persists even then, in contrast to Akhilleus' appeasement.

The lateness of the reference in the poem had already struck Eustathius (1337.29-30). In his words, 'the poet has held in reserve to the end the event which was most responsible for the Trojan war, thereby keeping the hearer in great suspense'. Likewise E. Drerup compared the way in which authors delay the solution to a puzzle until the end of a long work (Das Homerproblem in d r Gegenwart, Würzburg 1921, 360 n 1).

The most significant passages where Reinhardt detected the influence of the judgement story are 4.5ff., where Zeus contrasts Aphrodite's constant protection of Paris with the apparent indifference to the Greeks of Here and Athene, provoking their anger and Here's outburst against Troy, and 5.418-25 and 21.418-34, in which the two goddesses triumph over Aphrodite and mock her as the cause of Helen's abduction (see on 21.418-34). Moreover at 5.130ff. Athene deliberately and explicitly incites Diomedes to wound Aphrodite and no other deity (cf. Scott, C7 14 (1919) 328). Kullmann (Quellen 230-44) gives a list of other allusions in the poem to the enmity of Here and Athene against Troy. But the poet could presuppose the legend without mentioning it explicitly, and the introduction of it at the end still requires explanation. The passage as a whole prepares the way for Here's protest at 56-63, and it helps to explain the reference at 107-8 to a nine-day dispute in heaven, although this would still be the case even without verses 29-30. The allusion to the judgement, however, is in the abbreviated, elliptical style typical of such epic summaries, especially where the poet seems unwilling to be too explicit about the details. In conclusion it is probably fair to say that the passage as a whole should be regarded as part of the original poem, despite some doubts over 29-30.

The story was definitely told in the Cypria (Homer, OCT vol. v, p. 102.14-19, Davies, EGF p. 31.7-11), and it appears in art from the second half of the seventh century B.C. onwards. On the development of the myth see T. C. W. Stinton, Collected Papers on Greek Tragedy (Oxford 1990) 17-75, and I. Raab, Zu den Darssellungen des Parisurteils in er griechischen Kunst (Bern 1972).

24 This verse is echoed at 109. Hermes is the god of theft, as at Od. 19.394-8 and in HyHerm. The formula Evokomos 'ApyElopovtns (etc.) occurs only here and at 109 in II., $2 \times Od$., and $3 \times$ in the Homeric Hymns. Evokomos means something like 'keen-sighted', 'watchful'. For 'ApyElopovtns see on 2.103.

25 Efrodavev: this anomalous form, which recurs at Od. 3.143, probably represents $\ell(F)$ avdavev, the eta being due to the influence of the later form fivdavev; cf. Chantraine, GH 1 480.

25-6 oùbé $\pi o \theta$ "Hpŋ ... koùpŋ: cf. 1.399-400, where these three deities plot to bind Zeus. A personal reason for Poseidon's enmity is given at 21.441-60, when he recalls Laomedon's treachery to himself and Apollo. For the elision of Hoosibáwv(1) cf. Chantraine, GH 1 86. $\gamma\lambda\alpha\nu\kappa\omega\pi$ idi koúpŋ occurs only here in ll.; cf. Od. 2.433 (with $\Delta i \delta_5$), 24.518 (κούpŋ $\gamma\lambda\alpha\nu\kappa\omega\pi$ idi καl Δi ποτρί). It is unusual to find the phrase without a reference to Zeus as father; 8.373, where Zeus calls Athene $\phi i \lambda \eta \nu \gamma \lambda\alpha\nu\kappa\omega\pi i \delta \alpha$, is different.

27 άλλ' ἕχον ῶς: 'but they persisted (in their hostility), as ...'; cf. 12.433 άλλ' ἔχον ὥς τε ...

27-8 "l λ_{105} lp $\dot{\eta}$ | kal Πρίαμος kal λ_{a} d ζ_{s} : these words echo 4.45-6 and 4.164-5 = 6.448-9. In the first case Zeus proclaims his exceptional favour towards Troy because of its people's piety, in his dispute with Here over its fate. In the second passage Agamemnon prophesies its doom because of the Trojans' treachery, and these two verses are echoed by Hektor in book 6. Here, the expression λ_{a} d ζ_{s} \tilde{c} uµµ $\epsilon\lambda$ l ω Πριάµοιο (as in the other passages) is cut short to allow the powerfully contrasting hemistich 'A λ_{e} ξάνδρου ἕνεκ' ἄτης, which suggests the moral theme that a whole city suffers for one man's error.

28 Άλεξάνδρου ἔνεκ' ἄτης: some MSS read ἀρχῆς; for this variation see on 3.100, 6.356 where the same phrase occurs. Here ἄτης is certainly more appropriate. See also Stinton, Collected Papers 71, who quotes parallels from tragedy (S. Aj. 643, 909, E. El. 1307, HF 917) for ἄτη with a personal genitive. It is worth noticing that without 29–30 one would take this phrase as referring to Paris' rape of Helen, as at 6.356 and 3.100 (if ἅτης is right there).

29 ồs νείκεσσε θεάς: with a direct personal object the verb elsewhere means 'reproach' (1.521 etc.), but from this to 'find fault with' and hence to 'insult' is not a difficult transition. It is contrasted here with $\eta \nu \eta \sigma \epsilon$ (30). Cf. A. W. H. Adkins, JHS 89 (1969) 20: 'When Paris gave his judgment that Aphrodite had won, the other two goddesses naturally felt his words to be hostile, and indeed would feel $\epsilon \lambda \epsilon \gamma \chi \epsilon \eta$ at their defeat.' $\delta \tau \epsilon$ of $\mu \epsilon \sigma \sigma \sigma \nu \lambda \sigma \nu$ ikovto recurs at Od. 10.435. Paris is a herdsman, like other sons of Priam at 11.104 6, 15.545-8, or Aineias at 20.188-90; cf. Stinton, op. cit. 47-9, 58-60.

30 ἡ ol πόρε μαχλοσύνην ἀλεγεινήν: the noun (meaning 'madness for sex') occurs only here in Homer, as Aristarchus observed (Arn/A 25), citing Hes. fr. 132 M–W on the daughters of Proitos, είνεκα μαχλοσύνης στυγερῆς τέρεν ὥλεσεν ἄνθος. μάχλος is used again of women at Hes. Erga 586 etc., but once of men (Lucian, Alex. 11 μάχλος καὶ γυναικομανής), and it fits the description of Paris at 3.39-55 (39 γυναιμανές etc.). μαχλοσύνη or its equivalent is more usually something sent by Aphrodite as a punishment than as a reward (cf. Davies, JHS 1981, 57–8), but the point may be that what appeared to be a gift really turned out to be disastrous (cf. ἀλεγεινήν) for Paris and for Γroy. The easier variant ἡ ol κεχαρισμένα δῶρ' ὀνόμηνε, read by Aristophanes and some city texts (Did/A), may have been due either to the difficulty of the phrase or to prudishness.

3I = 1.493, where it refers to the time between Thetis' meeting with Akhilleus and her visit to Zeus. Here (as bT observe and as 413-14 confirm) it must mean the whole time since Hektor's death, including the three days of Patroklos' funeral and the nine days' quarrel of the gods (107-8). On the parallel with book 1 see Introduction, 'Structure'.

32 Cf. HyAp 130 αυτίκα δ' άθανάτησι μετηύδα Φοϊβος Άπόλλων, and see on 23.569.

33-54 Apollo's speech opens with a dramatic and passionate protest: $\sigma\chi\epsilon\tau\lambda\omega$, $\delta\eta\lambda\eta\omega\omega$ s are strong words. He goes on to contrast the gods' unfair treatment of Hektor's body and their support for Akhilleus, and then speaks at length of the extreme inhumanity of Akhilleus, his lack of normal pity and respect, returning at the end to Hektor's fate. There are similarities to Aias' protest at Akhilleus' rejection of their embassy, at 9.624-42: cf. especially 9.628-38 and 24.49. At the beginning of the poem too, Apollo showed his concern for $\alpha \delta\omega$ s and $\epsilon\lambda\omega$ s (1.8-52).

33 σχέτλιοί έστε, θεοί, δηλήμονες: cf. Od. 5.118 σχέτλιοί έστε, θεοί, ζηλήμονες έξοχον άλλων. There Kalupso is complaining to Hermes about the jealousy of the gods for mortals who are loved by goddesses. σχέτλιοι could be translated 'relentless' here. δηλήμων ('destroyer') occurs only here in Il., $3 \times Od$., always in the phrase "Εχετον βασιλήα βροτῶν δηλήμονα πάντων (18.85 etc.); it recurs in Herodotus and late prose. It is possible that ζηλήμων in Od. 5.118 is modelled on this word, and the Odyssey passage may echo this one; cf. Usener, Verhältnis der Odyssee zur Ilias 148-55.

33-4 Cf. Od. 1.60-1 (Athene to Zeus) où vù t' 'Obudoeùs | 'Apyelwu mapà vyuol xaplizeto lepà pézwy; This protest at the beginning of the Odyssey is parallel to Apollo's (see on 22-76). The point is echoed and stressed by Zeus at 66-70; see also on 20.297-9, 22.170-2. alywu te telelwu occurs only here and at 1.66.

35 ούκ έτλητε: 'you could not bring yourselves to'.

36-7 $\tilde{\eta}$ τ' άλόχ ω ... λαοῖσί τε: the enumeration of all those concerned with Hektor's loss is very emphatic.

38 кήαιεν ... κτερίσαιεν: the optative ending -αιεν occurs only here in Homer, apart from a possible variant reading τίσαιεν at 1.42, and κτερίσειαν is attested as a variant by Didymus and in some MSS. A firstcentury B.C. papyrus reads κτερέουσιν. Macleod suggests that κήαιεν may have been preferred for phonetic reasons, and κτερίσαιεν naturally attracted to this form. But optative aorist in -αιμι, -αις, -αι, etc. occurs a number of times elsewhere in Homer: cf. Chantraine, GH = 464-5. κτέρεα κτερίσαιεν is 'give funerary honours to him'; κτέρας means 'offering', 'gift' (10.216, 24.235), but in the plural it is used exclusively of honours paid to the dead at a funeral. In this sense it occurs only here in Il, but $7 \times Od$, in all but one case with κτερίζειν or κτερείζειν.

39 $\delta\lambda\omega\omega$ 'Axi $\lambda\eta$ ' occurs only here and expresses the strength of Apollo's feelings. The repeated vocative $\theta\epsilon\omega$ (cf. 33) stresses that all the gods share responsibility here.

40-1 Cf. Od. 18.220 οὐκέτι τοι φρένες εἰσιν ἐναίσιμοι οὐδὲ νόημα. The moral tone naturally leads to the use of Odyssean language. For νόημα γνάμπτον cf. Phoinix' appeal to Akhilleus not to be relentless: at 9.497 even the gods are στρεπτοί, at 514 honour paid to Prayers ἐπιγνάμπτει νόον έσθλῶν. The epithet is used metaphorically only here.

41-3 Akhilleus' inhuman savagery is compared to that of a marauding lion. Cf. Moulton, Similes 105-6, 112-14, for a discussion of Akhilleus' lion-similes; also 16.33-5 where his lack of pity leads Patroklos to say that his parents must be the sea and the rocks. In 42-3 the words $\delta_5 \tau' \, \epsilon \pi \epsilon l$ are both followed by a single verb, a type of anacoluthon similar to that found at 8.230, 17.658-64 (see comment). It is as if the $\epsilon \pi \epsilon l$ had lost its function of introducing a clause. AT (Nicanor) propose $\epsilon l \epsilon \eta \sigma'$ in 43 to avoid this, but this is unnecessary. Moulton (114) observes that 42-3 suggest 'that the lion may be conceived as having better instincts, which could sometimes restrain him'; cf. 15.586 $\theta \eta \rho l$ xex $\delta \nu \rho \epsilon \epsilon \sigma \kappa \omega \phi$, with comment on 586-8.

In 43 $\beta \rho \sigma \tau \tilde{\omega} \nu$ seems at first sight unnecessary, but it is a god who is speaking. Aristarchus is thought to have held that $\delta \alpha i_5$ was properly used in Homer only of a human meal (see on 1.5, and cf. Pfeiffer, History of Classical Scholarship 111-13), but there is no evidence that he wanted to athetize 24.42-3. Possibly he took $\beta \rho \sigma \tau \tilde{\omega} \nu \delta \alpha \tilde{\tau} \alpha$ together here, as Lehrs suggested (De Aristarchi studius 87).

44-5 Pity and respect (Eleos and $\alpha |\delta \omega_5\rangle$) are keynotes of the whole of this Book: cf. 207-8, 503, and see on 21.74, 22.82. On the varying senses of $\alpha |\delta \omega_5\rangle$ ('awe', 'respect', 'shame') see J. T. Hooker, GG^2R 24 (1987) 121-5. $\Delta \pi \omega \lambda_{EOEV}$ is a dramatic word, whether it means 'destroyed' or simply 'lost'. Verse 45 is evidently a proverbial one, which recurs at Hes. Erga 318 ($\alpha |\delta \omega_5\rangle$ $\bar{\eta} \tau'$ etc.), on which see West's comments. Aristarchus rejected it (Arn/AT), on the grounds that it was inappropriate to speak of $\alpha |\delta \omega_5\rangle$ as harmful here, and the verse had been added to supply a verb with the end of 44, a common type of interpolation (cf. 558, etc.). This could well be right, as the sense here must be 'respect', whereas in Hesiod it is rather 'shame'. It is true that in such 'polar' expressions one often finds that in a particular context only one of the two alternatives is relevant (cf. 10.249 µ η τ' δp µE µ $\delta \lambda'$ α īvæ µ η τε τι vékel, etc.), but here the extra verse rather weakens the rhetorical effect.

46 μέλλει μέν πού τις ... δλέσσαι: 'I presume that a man is likely to have lost even someone closer to him in the past'. The ironic though serious expression resembles 18.362 (in a protest by Here), καl μέν δή πού τις μέλλει βροτός άνδρι τελέσσαι.

47 δμογάστριον: i.e. of the same mother as well as the same father. The word occurs once elsewhere in Homer at 21.95 (see comment).

48 μεθέηκε: 'he relented', i .e. after a period of grief; cf. 23.434 μεθέηκεν έλαύνειν.

49 τλητός occurs only here in Homer (cf. άτλητος, etc.), and nowhere else in the active sense 'enduring', but such verbal adjectives can be either active or passive: cf. 1.415 άδάκρυτος, 'without tears' etc., and ۰.

J. Wackernagel, Vorlesungen über. Syntax 1 (Basel 1926) 288. Moipou also occurs in the plural only here in Homer, but at Od. 7.197-8 we meet the $K\lambda\omega\theta\epsilon\varsigma$, who spin the thread of a person's destiny (see Hainsworth on Od. 7.196-8). The Moirai as a group are firmly established in Hesiod's Theogony (217, 904-6). As Apollo is protesting at the gods' failure to intervene it would have been less appropriate for him to ascribe endurance to the gods' favour. This idea of the value of endurance $(\tau\lambda\eta\mu\sigma\sigma\nu\eta)$ is unusual in the Iliad, and much commoner as a motif in the Odyssey and later poetry (see Richardson on HyDem 147-8). But it is another essential leitmotif of this Book (see especially on 518-51).

The solemnity of this gnomic verse is increased by its spondaic rhythm, and the emphasis falls heavily on the opening $\tau\lambda\eta\tau\delta\nu$. It is echoed by Archilochus fr. 13.5-7:

... άλλά θεοί γάρ άνηκέστοισι κακοΐσιν & φίλ' έπὶ κρατερὴν τλημοσύνην ἔθεσαν φάρμακον.

50-4 Apollo returns at the end of his speech to the fate of Hektor with which he began. EAKEI is heavily emphatic at the beginning of 52, and followed by the strong expression of moral condemnation and a final warning of retribution.

52 oỷ ... ởµɛivov: the ominous understatement is typical of such solemn warnings: cf. 7.352-3 Tũ oỷ vý Ti képõiov ἡµĩv | ἔλποµαι ἐκτελέεσθαι, ἶνα µἡ ῥέξοµεν ὦδε, Od. 7.159, Hes. Erga 750 oỷ γὰρ ὄµεινον, 759, and similar positive assertions at 570 etc.; also Hdt. 1.187.2, etc. Apollo will in fact cause Akhilleus' death: cf. the warning of the dying Hektor at 22.358-60.

53 bT record that this verse was athetized on the grounds that Apollo could not describe Akhilleus as $d\gamma\alpha\theta\delta\varsigma$ after he had called him $\delta\lambda\delta\delta\varsigma$, and they then give the alternative explanation that the word means 'brave' here. There is no reference, however, to the athetesis by A, and Aristarchus is said to have read veµeoσηθέωµεν here instead of our manuscripts' veµeoσηθῶµεν. $d\gamma\alpha\theta\delta\varsigma$ is used in its sense of 'noble' or 'outstanding', as at 1.131, etc. (see on 1.275-6); cf. A. A. Long, JHS 90 (1970) 128. For parallels to veµeoσηθέωµεν or veµeoσηθῶµεν (from -θήοµεν) see Chantraine, GH 1 64, 459. The word-order, with ol postponed, is unusual, and the neglect of digamma in ol is also relatively rare in Homer (Chantraine, GH 1 147-8). This displacement is presumably due to the desire to put the emphasis on $d\gamma\alpha\theta\tilde{\varphi}$ περ έ $\delta\nu$ τι.

54 κωφήν ... γαῖαν means 'mute earth'. For this idea of the body's 'earthly clay' cf. 7.99 άλλ' ὑμεῖς μὲν πάντες ὕδωρ καὶ γαῖα γένοισθε, Soph. El. 244 ὁ μὲν θανών γᾶ τε καὶ οὐδὲν ῶν | κείσεται τάλας, etc. Verses 53-4 are echoed by Aeschylus in his Phrygians or Ransoming of Hektor, fr. 266 N.² and Radt.

55-63 Herë's reply is bitterly scornful, in a way typical of her speeches, and as bT remark she fails to answer the main point of Apollo's charge. The opening is sarcastic: 'Certainly even what you say, Apollo, could well be true, if all of you are really going to ascribe the same status to both Akhilleus and Hektor', an idea which, she goes on to point out, would be absurd, given the contrast in their origins and upbringing. The climax comes with her allusion to the wedding of Peleus and Thetis at which all the gods were present, including Apollo himself, whom she ends by accusing of treacherv because of his support for Hektor and the Trojans.

56 For this form of expression cf. Od. 15.435 εΐη κεν καὶ τοῦτ', εἶ μοι έθέλοιτέ γε, ναῦται (etc.).

57 The dramatic switch to an apostrophe to all the gods is similar to that at 2.235, Od. 4.681-9, etc.; cf. [Longinus] 27.3-4 for a discussion of this device in Homer and later literature.

58 yuvaĩka ... $\mu \alpha \zeta \dot{\alpha}$: a double accusative, as at 170 etc. This is the emphatic point, since it will be contrasted with Here's own upbringing of Thetis. The verb $\theta \tilde{\eta} \sigma \alpha$ occurs only here in II.; cf. Od. 4.89, HyAp 123, HyDem 236.

59-60 In the Cypria (OCT vol. v, fr. 2 Allen = Davies, EGF fr. 2) Thetis is said to have refused marriage with Zeus as a favour to Here, and the story of Here's upbringing of Thetis is mentioned in A.R. 4.790-8 and Apollod. 3.13.5. B. K. Braswell (CQ 21 (1971) 23-4) notes the contrast with Here's suspicion of Thetis in book 1, and suggests that this motif may have been invented by Homer for this occasion, to supply a reason why Here should show special favour to Thetis and her son. Verse 60 is an effective 'tricolon crescendo', although the first two verbs go closely together.

62-3 For the wedding of Peleus and Thetis and the gods' gifts see on 16.140-4 and 18.429-56. avriáw is used only here in Homer in the middle, later in Apollonius Rhodius. Herê ends by rounding on Apollo again. For $\xi\chi\omega\nu$ $\phi\phi\mu\gamma\gamma\alpha$ cf. 1.603 where Apollo's lyre accompanies the gods' feast. Kakãv $\xi\tau\alpha\rho\epsilon$ sounds colloquial (cf. Hes. Erga 716 kakãv $\xi\tau\alpha\rho\nu$), and the last two phrases are powerfully compact. Apollo's treachery in 'betraying' Akhilleus perhaps foreshadows the part he will play in causing his death (cf. 21.277-8, 22.359-60). These verses inspired the famous speech of Thetis in Aeschylus (fr. 350 N.² and Radt), where she recalls how Apollo sang of her future happiness at her wedding, and declares that he has now betrayed her by killing her son (7-9):

δ δ' αὐτὸς ὑμνῶν, αὐτὸς ἐν θοινῆ παρών, αὐτὸς τάδ' εἰπών, αὐτὸς ἐστιν ὁ κτανὼν τὸν παῖδα τὸν ἐμόν.

64-76 Zeus diplomatically resolves the quarrel, quietly but firmly reassuring Here and at the same time supporting Apollo's plea.

283

Copyrighted Material

64 There was an ancient variant την δε μέγ' όχθήσας (T), as again at 138.

65 ἀποσκύδμαινε: cf. 592 σκυδμαινέμεν. The verb occurs nowhere else, but is a variant form of σκύζομαι meaning 'be angry' (see on 113).

66-7 Zeus implies that Akhilleus will have special honour, perhaps referring to Priam's gifts (cf. 110), but he is unspecific about this. Verse 67 resembles and contrasts with 61.

68-70 Zeus amplifies Apollo's insistence on Hektor's piety (see on 33-4). We should read $\hat{\omega}_5$ ('so') at the beginning of 68 (as in Allen's editio maior, 1931). Verses 69-70 = 4.48-9, where Zeus speaks of his special love for Priam and his people.

71-3 These verses were athetized by Aristarchus, on the grounds that Thetis was not really present with her son all the time: but the exaggeration is quite natural. The verses refer back to 24 (see on 23-30). Edicopev is a short-vowel subjunctive, and $\kappa\lambda$ Equal is treated as if it were the object: 'but as for stealing, let us forget about it'. Antimachus read dungavov instead of Edicopev, evidently finding the phrase difficult. In 72 vEKUV 'EKTOPOS was an ancient variant (T), presumably because $\theta \rho \alpha \sigma' v$ was thought inappropriate when Hektor was dead: cf. however 786. For alel... $\pi \alpha \rho \mu E \mu \beta \lambda \omega \kappa \epsilon$ cf. 4.11 alel $\pi \alpha \rho \mu E \mu \beta \lambda \omega \kappa \epsilon$, again said by Zeus to Here, of Aphrodite protecting Paris (see comment). For $\delta \mu \omega \beta$ viktas the additional sectors of the part of the sector of the part of the sector of the part of the pa

74 άλλ' εί τις καλέσειε: for this form of wish or polite request cf. 10.111 άλλ' εί τις και τούσδε μετοιχόμενος καλέσειεν, etc. Tactfully Zeus leaves open which god should undertake this errand.

75-6 Zeus finally and briefly reveals the plan, which will dominate the rest of the poem.

77–119 Iris visits Thetis in the sea, and summons her to Olumpos. They arrive and Thetis is welcomed. Zeus then asks her to instruct her son to receive Priam and accept the ransom for Hektor

Iris' summoning of Thetis is the first stage of a double action, the second being her visit to Priam (143-87). Cf. 15.49-280, where Zeus sends Here to summon Iris and Apollo, and then despatches Iris to tell Poseidon to withdraw from the battle, and Apollo to rouse Hektor (see on 15.151-280). Similarly, on a larger scale, the action of the Odyssey opens with the sending of Athene to Ithaca and this is complemented in book 5 by Hermes' mission to Kalupso's island. On the typical form of such divine messenger scenes see Arend, Scenen 54-61. Iris' journey, however, is described in an individual way, and by means of a vivid and unusual simile.

77 = 8.409, 24.159. Iris responds at once.

78 Cf. 13.33 (Poseidon's cave) μ eognyús Tevédolo kal "l $\mu\beta\rho$ ou παιπαλοέσσης (see comment), and 24.75 ές Σάμον ές τ' "l $\mu\beta\rho$ ov. Samos is Samothrace in these passages (see on 13.10–12).

79 Iris plunges into the sea with a great impact. The artificially lengthened form $\mu\epsilon \lambda \alpha vi$ (metri gratia) occurs only here in Greek, but cf. Μειλανίων. έπεστενάχησε is the reading of the majority of MSS, with the variants έπεστονάχησε, έπεστενάχιζε, έπεστονάχιζε, έπεστενάχισ(σ)ε. This compound occurs only here in Homer; cf. Hes. Th. 843 έπεστονάχιζε (with variants). For $\lambda \mu v\eta$ meaning 'sea' cf. 13.21 etc., and for sea or earth 'groaning' see on 16.389-92.

80-2 She then plummets straight to the bottom like a lead weight attached to a piece of ox-horn on a fishing-line. Cf. Od. 12.251-3:

> ώς δ' ὅτ' ἐπὶ προβόλῳ ἀλιεὺς περιμήκει ῥάβδῳ ἰχθύσι τοῖς ὀλίγοισι δόλον κατὰ εἶδατα βάλλων ἐς πόντον προίησι βοὸς κέρας ἀγραύλοιο, and II. 16.406-8 for another fishing simile (see comment). A divine journey is often illustrated by a simile; cf. 4.74-8, 15.78-83, 15.168-72, 15.236-8, and especially Od. 5.51-4, where Hermes is compared to a sea-bird hunting for fish, etc. (cf. Introduction, pp. 22-3).

μολύβδαινα occurs only here in Homer (cf. Hippocrates, Mul. 2.188, etc.), and so does βυσσός (Hdt. 2.28, 96, etc.); cf. βυσσοδομεύειν in the Odyssey. The piece of horn was explained by Aristarchus (Arn/A; cf. Plutarch, Mor. 977A, where this is ascribed to Aristotle, perhaps wrongly) as being fastened to the line above the hook, to prevent the fish from biting through the line. An alternative modern theory is that the piece of horn was used as an artificial bait: cf. C. E. Haskins, Journal of Philology 19 (1891) 238-40. Other views are mentioned by AbT. On early Greek fishing in general see H.-G. Buchholz, Arch. Hom. J 169ff.

Plato (Ion 538D) has $\ell\mu\mu\epsilon\mu\alpha\nu\alpha$ in 81, and in 82 $\omega\mu\eta\sigma\tau\eta\sigma$ $\mu\epsilon\tau'$ ix $\theta\nu\sigma$ $\pi\eta\mu\alpha$, which correspond closely with variants mentioned by A ($\pi\eta\mu\alpha$ being the reading of some city texts). $\ell\mu\mu\epsilon\mu\alpha\nu\alpha$ would be possible, but $\pi\eta\mu\alpha$ is said by A to be due to misgivings about applying the word $\kappa\eta\alpha$ to fish. Cf. van der Valk, Researches II 323-4.

83-6 On arrival it is typical for a visitor to 'find' $(\epsilon \check{v} \rho \epsilon)$ someone engaged in a particular activity, and often surrounded by companions. Here Iris finds Thetis among her nymphs, lamenting her son's coming death, whereas immediately afterwards, when she and Thetis go to Olumpos, they find the gods drinking, and Thetis is welcomed with a cup. The parallel language of 83-4 and 98-9 points up the contrast. Likewise, when Thetis visits Akhilleus she finds him among his companions, lamenting (122-4), and again Iris comes upon Priam surrounded by his sons and with all his family, in deep mourning for Hektor (160-8). Cf. also L. Coventry, JHS 107 (1987) 179-80.

For the scene of Thetis lamenting among the nymphs cf. 18.35-64, Od. 24.47-59. Once again the poet looks forward beyond his work to Akhilleus' death, and bT comment that 'it is full of pathos to lament for one who is still living.' Cf. the laments for Hektor at 6.500-2 and Priam at 24.327-8, and CQ 30 (1980) 269. For death 'far from home' see on 16.458-61, 538-40, and Griffin, HLD 106ff.

83 ενί σπη̃ γλαφυρῷ: cf. 18.402 εν σπη̈ γλαφυρῷ (and $3 \times Od$.).

85-6 Aristarchus (Arn/A) athetized 86 (cf. 16.461), as added to supply the sense of δ_5 of $\xi\mu\epsilon\lambda\lambda\epsilon$, which he took as standing on its own, and meaning '(the doom) which was destined for him'. This seems virtually impossible. Rhianus read $\delta_5 \tau \delta \chi^* \xi\mu\epsilon\lambda\lambda\epsilon v$.

87 = 2.790 etc.

88 This one-verse speech is urgent in its brevity (see on 20.428-9). Zevs äponta under elows occurs only here in Homer; cf. Hes. Th. 545, 550, 561 (all in the context of Zeus's superiority over Prometheus), HyAphr 43, and HyDem 321 Anuntep, kalées of mathp Zevs äponta elows. This expression may be used here (instead of kalées or mathp dvopwv te or Kpovov máis dykulountew) to give more weight to Iris' request. At any rate Thetis, despite her reluctance, recognizes the urgency of the situation.

Bg Cf. 18.127, 19.28.

93-7 Cf. the journey of Thetis and the Nereids at 18.60-8:

ώς ἄρα φωνήσασα λίπε σπέος· αί δὲ σὺν αὐτῆ δακρυόεσσαι Ισαν, περί δέ σφισι κῦμα θαλάσσης ῥήγνυτο· ταὶ δ' ὅτε δή Τροίην ἐρίβωλον Ικοντο, ἀκτὴν είσανέβαινον ἐπισχερώ ...

For the sea dividing before the deities cf. also 13.29 (Poseidon's journey).

93-4 κάλυμμα occurs only here in Homer, for καλύπτρη (22.406 etc.). Cf. HyDem 42 κυάνεον δε κάλυμμα κατ' άμφοτέρων βάλετ' ώμων (with comment). This is also the only place in Homer where the use of black in mourning is mentioned: bT comment that 'black is suitable to a goddess of the sea, and one who is in mourning'. E0005 occurs only here in Homer, later in Aristophanes (Av. 943, lyric; Lys. 1096, Laconian); cf. E0015 in the Odyssey.

۰,

r

97 ἀκτήν δ' ἐξαναβᾶσαι: this is Aristarchus' reading, and is said to be that of 'most texts' by Did/A. Our MSS have εlσαναβᾶσαι as in the parallel passage at 18.68, and Leaf prefers this on the grounds that ἐξαναβαίνειν with accusative rather than genitive is unusual. But cf. ἀτραπὸν ἐξανάβα (Epigr. Gr. 782), and ἐξικέσθαι with accusative (8.439, 9.479).

98-102 For this scene of arrival and welcome in heaven cf. 15.84-8, where Here arrives and finds the gods in assembly; they rise and greet her with their cups, and she receives the cup offered by Themis. In 99 the formula µάκαρες θεοί αlέν έόντες is Odyssean (4×), and occurs only here in the lliad. It may be chosen to stress the contrast between Thetis' mourning and the blessed life of the immortals. Thetis' reception is portrayed as courtly and decorous: Athene, who sits in the place of honour at Zeus's side, gives up her seat to her. T quotes Pindar (fr. 146 Snell) of Athene: $\pi \tilde{\nu} p$ $\pi v \epsilon_0 \tau \sigma_0 \tilde{\kappa}$ is $\pi \kappa \epsilon_0 \sigma v \sigma_0 \tilde{\kappa}$ is $\pi \sigma_0 \sigma_0 \sigma_0 \tilde{\kappa}$. Thetis at 59-61. There could hardly be a more marked contrast with the balancing scene in book 1, where Thetis visits Zeus privately, he tells her to leave before Here sees her, and Here at once attacks him for receiving her (493-569).

102 ώρεξε πιοῦσα: 'handed it back when she had drunk'.

103-19 Zeus's speech is sympathetic (105), and he reassures Thetis that he will continue to maintain the honour due to Akhilleus and herself. At the same time he makes it plain that she must tell her son that he and the other gods are severely displeased over the treatment of Hektor's corpse, and announces his plan for Priam's visit to Akhilleus. Structurally the speech is quite simple, with little enjambment, except in the final part (113-19).

104 $\hbar\lambda u\theta \epsilon s$: for this form of greeting (usually friendly) to a visitor cf. 3.428 (scornful), Od. 16.23, 16.461, 17.41, and in later literature Alcaeus fr. 350.1 L-P, Theognis 511, Ar. Av. 680, Theocr. Id. 12.1-2, and other examples quoted by Gow ad loc.

105 For άλαστος see on 22.261. οίδα και αὐτός is a touching expression of sympathy, at the same time forestalling yet another of Thetis' outbursts of self-pity (cf. 911.). Cf. Od. 10.457 οίδα και αὐτή, where Kirke is expressing sympathy for Odysseus' sufferings, and Od. 5.215 οίδα και αὐτός (Odysseus consoling Kalupso), etc.

107-9 These verses echo 23-4 and 31. In 108 Ектороς vékui meaning 'the corpse of Hektor' may be paralleled by 17.240 vékuos Потроклою; such expressions occur later (e.g. Hdt. 1.140.1, 3.16); for disyllabic vékui cf.

16.521-6n. In 109 the vulgate reading is orpoveror as at 24, whereas the Massaliote and Chian texts read orpovour. Either seems possible; the former could derive from 24, but the latter could equally well be an unnecessarily fussy correction (van der Valk, Researches 11 167, and Macleod's comment).

110 κῦδος must refer at least primarily to the honour which Akhilleus will receive from Priam's ransom (cf. 119). The expression κῦδος προσάπτειν is found only here in Homer; cf. Pindar, N. 8.36-7 κλέος ... προσάψω, etc., and the Homeric ἐπὶ κῦδος ἔθηκεν (23.400). Zenodotus and Aristarchus (in his Against Comanus) and some of our MSS read προϊάπτω, with the sense of προϊάλλω, but this verb seems inappropriate here. On the present tense for immediate future see 16.849-50n.; it is especially appropriate to an announcement by Zeus.

111 'With the intention of preserving your respect and friendship in future': this could mean either Zeus's respect for her or vice versa, but more probably the former. Cf. 18.386, where Thetis is described by Hephaistos as α boin TE α in the similarly 14.210, 10.114.

115 Hektor himself had asked Akhilleus to ransom his body if he killed him (22.258-9).

116 all KEV TWOS is unexpectedly courteous after 112-15, in harmony with Zeus's tactful handling of Thetis. Cf. Athene to Akhilleus at 1.207, all KE $\pi i \theta \eta \alpha i$ (see comment). But there is still an ominous note of warning in $\ell \mu \ell$... $\delta \epsilon i \sigma \eta$.

117-19 This is the second prong of the double action: see 77-119n. Before $\lambda \dot{\nu} \sigma \sigma \sigma \theta \sigma i$ (etc.) we must understand 'to tell him to'. Verses 118-19 are repeated at 146-7, 195-6, and with variation at 175-6. This fourfold repetition is surely not just a formular device, but is designed to bring out the importance of this central theme.

119 Cf. the gifts of Agamemnon to Akhilleus at 19.172-4: τὰ δὲ δῶρα... οΙσέτω... ΐνα... σừ δὲ φρεσί σῆσιν Ιανθῆς. This serves to remind us that it is the second time in the poem that Akhilleus will receive gifts. Ιαίνειν seems to be used in the Iliad particularly of appeasement: cf. 15.103, 23.598, 23.600.

120-42 Thetis comes to Akhilleus and d livers her message. Akhilleus at once consents 120-7 Thetis' journey and arrival are described in largely formular terms, combining features of 'messenger' and 'arrival' scenes: cf. Arend, Scenen 28ff. (especially 29 n. 1). For 122-5 see on 83-6. Akhilleus' abstention from food is emphasized by Thetis in her address to him (129).

124 EVTUVOVT' apiotov: the reading EVTUVOVTO must be wrong, as the alpha of $\alpha p_1 \sigma \tau ov$ is long. This is due to the tendency to write words in full without elision in ancient texts. This word for the early-morning meal occurs only here in Il., once in Od. (16.2), as Arn/A and T note.

۰.

125 This brief description of a sacrifice is untypical. $\delta is \lambda \Delta \sigma ios$ is used only here ($\lambda \Delta \sigma ios 4 \times 1l$, $i \times Od$.), and the form lepeuro is odd: it is presumably pluperfect, but one would expect a form with long iota. The short vowel may be metri gratia (cf. Leaf, Chantraine, GH 1 422).

126-42 Thetis' dialogue with her son recalls some of the language and themes of her first visit in the balancing scene at 1.357-430. Verses 126-7 echo 1.360-1, and Thetis again begins by asking why Akhilleus is lamenting (128-30, 1.362-3), although here she is advising him not to go on doing so to no purpose. Her reference to his coming death (131-2) echoes 1.417-18, as well as her other predictions of his fate (18.95-6 etc.). Her instructions to him from Zeus (133-7) contrast with 1.393-412, where Akhilleus charges her with his request to Zeus for honour: here (although she does not say so) Zeus has promised him honour (110), but only if he accepts Priam's ransom. Moreover, in book 1 Akhilleus expressed his own anger and grievance at the dishonour done to him, whereas here it is the gods who are angry with him, on account of the dishonouring of Hektor's corpse. It is in this context that Thetis speaks of the need for Akhilleus not only to eat but also to sleep with a woman (130-1), and although the woman is not named, when Akhilleus finally sleeps it is with Briseis at his side (675-6). The poet must surely be looking back to the theme of book 1, the quarrel over Briseis and Agamemnon's removal of her, which Akhilleus described there in his speech to his mother (365-92).

128 μ exprision used only here in Homer, and μ exprision once at 13.143, instead of the commoner α expr(s), in order to avoid hiatus. For δ supplexos kale α expression of the common expression expression expression of the common expression exp

129 ohv žõeai koadínv: cf. 6.202 ov dupov katébav, dupov žõovtes (etc.) Od. 9.75 = 10.143, and 10.379 where (as here) this is combined with fasting because of unhappiness. See also on 617.

130-2 These verses were athetized by Aristarchus (Arn/A, T), as improper for a mother to say to her son and also as unsuitable advice before fighting. In 130 περ must be taken as emphasizing the whole phrase γυναικί ... μ σγεσθαι (cf. Denniston, Particles 482). For γυναικί περ (in this position) cf. Od. 11.441. For 131-2 cf. 16.852-3 (the dying Patroklos to Hektor), οῦ θην οὐδ' αὐτὸς δηρὸν βέη, etc. (see comment).

133 Cf. 2.26 = 63 ($v\bar{v}v \delta' t \mu t \theta t v$, etc.), said by the Dream to Agamemnon.

134-7 The first three verses repeat the message of 113-15, and 137 summarizes the point of 117-19, without however mentioning who it is who will bring the ransom. For $\xi = 134$, replacing $\xi = 113$, cf. 20.171; Chantraine, GH = 1264.

139-40 Akhilleus' reply is brief and to the point. He accepts at once without showing any sign of hesitation, but his tone might seem almost dismissive, as if he does not want to think further about the whole issue. The OCT punctuates τηδ' είη ôς ..., and so does Leaf. This means 'let it be so: may he who brings the ransom take away the corpse'. τηδε for ούτως or ώδε is, however, unusual in Homer, and in cases such as 14.107, 17.640 En os ... means 'let there be someone who would ...' If we take Tijoe in its usual sense of 'here' and delete the colon we could translate 'let the man be here who would bring the ransom and take the corpse'. This is still rather awkward, and a third alternative, given by bT, was to treat En as an anomalous form of elui (ibo), instead of los or lein (19.209). This occurs nowhere else (Chantraine, GH 1 285), but it is possible that the poet took it as such in this form of expression (see Macleod, comparing Od. 14.407-8 τάχιστά μοι ένδον έταῖροι | εΙεν). For πρόφρονι θυμῷ meaning 'wholeheartedly' cf. 8.23 $\pi \rho \phi \rho \omega v$ (of Zeus), and similarly 8.39-40 = 22.183-4. For Akhilleus' immediate assent to a divine request T aptly compares 1.216-18.

141-2 This variation on the formular ῶς ol μέν τοιαῦτα πρός ἀλλήλους ἀγόρευον suggests with delicate pathos that mother and son remain talking for a long time, aware of how little time Akhilleus has left to live. To leave them thus together is a most unusual way of closing the scene, as normally the divine visitor would return to heaven. Another remarkable case of unreported speech occurs in the scene between Priam and Akhilleus (632). ἐν νηῶν ἀγύρει is a variant of νεῶν (νηῶν) ἐν ἀγῶνι (15.428 etc.); cf. 16.661 ἑν νεκύων ἀγύρει.

143-87 Zeus instructs Iris to visit Priam, and to tell him to go to Akhilleus with gifts of ransom, promising that Hermes will be his escort. Iris comes to Priam, and finds him and his family in deepest grief. She delivers her message

144-58 This is the second stage of Zeus's plan (see on 77-119). This speech is again measured in tone, especially the last part (152-8), which contains hardly any enjambment.

144 βάσκ' 101, 'Ιρι ταχεία: cf. 8.399 etc.

145 This is a rather compressed way of saying 'Go to Troy and tell Priam ...'; cf. 143, and Od. 4.775 μή πού τις έπαγγείλησι και είσω.

146-7 = 118-19. Verse 148 is an important addition, with the emphatic olov and the following explanatory phrase to stress it. The ancient variant olos (also in 177) probably arose because of the shift to direct speech in this verse. The accusative follows on after lovt (α) in 146, and this goes closely with the infinitive $\lambda \dot{\alpha} \alpha \sigma \theta \alpha i$.

149-51 These verses are then a kind of qualification of 148: 'let no Trojan man go with him: but a herald should accompany him, an older man, to drive ...' The herald's office and age would help to ensure safe-conduct (cf. bT). This version differs significantly from the usual one in later art and literature. In artistic representations of Priam and Akhilleus from the sixth century onward, Priam was normally accompanied by a retinue of attendants (sometimes including women): cf. Johansen, lliad in Early Greek Art 127-38 (but cf. 49-51 for a sixth-century bronze relief on which Priam is accompanied only by Hermes). Likewise in Aeschylus' Phrygians or The Ransoming of Hektor the chorus was composed of Priam's attendants: Tragicorum Graecorum Fragmenta 111 (ed. Radt) p. 364. Cf. also LIMC vol. 1.1, pp. 147-61, 1.2, pp. 121-9. Priam's visit to Akhilleus was the most popular scene to be represented in Greek and Roman art of all the episodes in the *lliad (LIMC*1.1, p. 161).

250 ημιόνους καὶ άμαξαν έντροχον: cf. 189, 266, 711 άμαξαν έντροχον (ημιονείην), Od. 6.37 | ημιόνους καὶ άμαξαν.

152 Cf. 10.383 θάρσει, μηδέ τί τοι θάνατος καταθύμιος Ιστω. θάνατος and τάρβος are virtually a hendiadys for 'fear of death'. τάρβος occurs only here and in the repeated line 181 in Homer, but is common in Attic tragedy; cf. ταρβεΐν.

153-4 This kind of reassurance of divine aid is clearly traditional. Cf. 21.288(n.), and especially 15.254-7:

θάρσει νῦν· τοϊόν τοι ἀοσσητῆρα Κρονίων ξε "Ιδης προέηκε παρεστάμεναι καὶ ἀμύνειν, Φοϊβον Ἀπόλλωνα (etc.)

and Od. 4.825-8:

θάρσει, μηδέ τι πάγχυ μετά φρεσί δείδιθι λίην[.] τοίη γάρ οί πομπός ἄμ' ξρχεται ... Πάλλας Άθηναίη ...

Here, however, $\pi o \mu \pi \delta \varsigma$ is especially suitable for Hermes and is used again of him at 182, 437, 439, and 461.

154-5 ôs áfei ... áry ωv ... áryárynoiv: emphatic repetition. In ôs áfei the first syllable is treated as long, as in 22.236 (etc.), but it seems unnecessary to read (for example) ôs F' áfei (conjectured by Brandreth; cf. Leaf). to occurs only here (= 184) in ll., $4 \times Od$., instead of elow. In the later artistic representations (see on 149-51) Hermes i often portrayed as actually present in Akhilleus' hut. Cf. 460-9, where he leaves Priam at the entrance.

157-8 bT comment that the three epithets άφρων, άσκοπος and άλιτήμων refer concisely to the three sources of wrong-doing, folly, carelessness and deliberate malice, and that Zeus is defending Akhilleus against Apollo's charge at 40-5. For the emphatic triple negative prefixes ('privative tricolon'), common in moral and religious contexts, cf. 9.63 άφρήτωρ άθέμιστος ἀνέστιος, and later examples in Fraenkel, Aeschylus, Agamemnon 11 217. ἄσκοπος ('heedless') and ἀλιτήμων are found only here and at 186 in early epic; ἄσκοπος recurs in Parmenides (1.35) and tragedy, ἀλιτήμων in Hellenistic poetry. For ἐνδυκέως ('with kindness') see on 23.90. Akhilleus' respect for suppliants and the defeated was shown in the past, before the main action of the poem began: cf. 1.84-91 (Kalkhas), 6.414-19 (Eetion), etc.

۰,

l

159 = 77 etc. Here, however, the poet omits any description of Iris' journey, in contrast to 78-82.

160-70 For Iris' arrival and the scene of mourning which she finds see on 83-6, 120-7. But in this case the manifestations of grief are much more extreme; cf. their immediate reactions to Hektor's death at 22.405-28.

160 ένοπή is associated specifically with the Trojans at 3.2, 10.13, 16.782, 17.714; cf. E. Ba. 159 έν Φρυγίαισι βοαΐς ένοπαῖσί τε.

162 δάκρυσιν είματ' ξφυρον: cf. Od. 17.103 etc. αἰεὶ δάκρυσ' ξμοῖσι πεφυρμένη. The verb occurs only here in $Il., 5 \times Od$.

163 έντυπάς έν χλαίνη κεκαλυμμένος literally must mean 'covered in his cloak in such a way as to show the impression of his body' (so Arn/A, bT). έντυπάς occurs only here and then in Apollonius Rhodius (1.264, 2.861) and Quintus of Smyrna (5.530); cf. έντυπόω ('mould', 'impress') in Aristotle etc. It could well have been coined by the poet for this occasion, as a graphic and concise way of indicating Priam's despair. Cf. Odysseus' covering of his head so that the Phaeacians should not see his tears at Od. 8.84 -6. Aeschylus is said to have portrayed the grieving Akhilleus and Niobe seated in silence, with their faces similarly covered (Ar. Ran. 911-13 with Trag. Graec. Frag. III ed. Radt, pp. 239-40, 265ff., 365-6). Eustathius (1343.60ff.) links this scene in the Iliad with the Aeschylean ones. Cf. vasepaintings of the mourning Akhilleus (Johansen, Iliad in Early Greek Art 123-4, 156ff., etc.), and O. Taplin, HSCP 76 (1972) 58-76. In Euripides' Hercules Furens (1159-1234) the mourning Herakles covers his head, partly from shame and partly lest he pollute Theseus. In art the painter Semanthes of Sicyon was thought to have been inspired by Homer in his portrayal of Agamemnon with his head covered at the sacrifice of Iphigeneia (Eust. loc. cit.).

163–5 Priam's rolling in and covering himself with dung echoes 22.414 (see comment). καταμάειν (165) occurs only here in Homer; cf. Od. 9.247 άμησάμενος, Od. 5.482 ἐπαμήσατο.

166–8 Priam's daughters and daughters-in-law lament for all those warriors who have been killed, not only Hektor; cf. 6.242-50 for the 'extended family' structure of Priam's palace (with 22.59-65), Od. 3.451 θ uyatépes te vuol te. The spondaic ending $\Delta\delta$ úpovto of 166 is appropriate: cf. Theorr. Id. 1.71, 75.

170 Iris speaks quietly, possibly lest she be heard by Priam's family, but most probably to avoid alarming him (so bT); yet he is still terrified at the divine epiphany (see Richardson on HyDem 188-90, pp. 208 and 210-11). TUTOOV means 'softly', 'in a low voice'; cf. the later μ $y$\alpha$, μ $kpov λ $y$$$$ $kpov λ $y$$$$ $kpov λ $y$$$$$ $kpov λ $kp

171-4 Iris begins by reassuring Priam, a common response by gods to the fear of those who are visited by them: see on 153-4, and cf. HyAphr 193 θάρσει, μηδέ τι σῆσι μετά φρεσι δείδιθι λίην, Hy. 7.55-7, etc.

172 For κακον όσσομένη cf. 1.105 κάκ' όσσόμενος. τόδ' Ικάνω probably means 'I have come to this (place)'; see on 14.298-9.

173-4 Cf. 2.26-7 (174 = 27), with comment. $\delta v \in v \otimes v$ implies that despite the physical remoteness of Zeus he is still concerned with human affairs.

175-87 These verses are closely modelled on Zeus's instructions at 146-58. It is striking that Priam does not repeat Iris' promise of a divine escort when he relates her message to Hekabe (194-6), and even when he meets Hermes he does not realize who he is. Throughout all the following episodes Priam's journey is seen as a great and perilous enterprise. This is dramatically effective and psychologically realistic. Priam's experience of divine reassurance in no way detracts from his sense of risk and anxiety.

188–227 Priam orders his sons to prepare the waggon, and tells Hekabe of Iris' visit. She tries to dissuade him, but he insists on going

188 = 8.425 etc.

189–90 αμαξαν ... ήνώγει: cf. 150 etc., Od. 6.37 ήμιόνους και αμαξαν έφοπλίσαι. The order for the preparation of the waggon is left unfulfilled, until it is repeated at 263-4 with more urgency, thus framing the intervening scenes: cf. Edwards, HPI 306.

190 π tipus occurs only in this episode (cf. 267) in Il.; cf. Od. 15.131. It was explained in antiquity as a wicker-work basket tied on to the top of the vehicle to hold baggage (AbT etc.), and this fits the Odyssey passage, where it is attached to a chariot. Cf. J. Wiesner, Arch. Hom. F 5-6.

191-2 Cf. 6.288 αὐτὴ δ' ἐς θάλαμον κατεβήσετο κηώεντα (this contained a store of fine garments), and for similar basement store-chambers cf. Od. 2.337-47, 15.99-108 (15.99 = ll. 24.191). It is dignified by the epithets κέδρινον ὑψόροφον. The first occurs only here in Homer; cf. Od. 5.60 κέδρου, said to be the prickly cedar, Juniperus oxycedrus (cf. Hainsworth ad loc.). For ὑψόροφος cf. 3.423 ὑψόροφον θάλαμον, and 24.317. γλήνεα, from γλῆνος, is a Homeric hapax. According to bT it survived in Elean dialect as a word for 'possessions', and it recurs in Hellenistic poetry; cf. γλήνη (8.164 etc.), τρίγληνος (14.183 etc.). The best sense here would be 'treasures', 'precious things', and it may be linked etymologically with $\gamma\alpha\lambda\eta\nu\eta$, $\gamma\epsilon\lambda\omega_5$, etc., with the basic sense of 'shining' (Chantraine, Dict. s.v.). For $\kappa\epsilon\chi\alpha\nu\delta\epsilon\iota$ cf. 23.268, Od. 4.96. One papyrus reads $\kappa\epsilon\chi\omega\nu\delta\epsilon\iota$, and there was another variant $\kappa\epsilon\kappa\epsilon\omega\vartheta\epsilon\iota$ in the Massaliote text (cf. Did/A, T). Analogy with $\lambda\epsilon\lambda\omega\gamma\chi\alpha$ etc. suggests that $\kappa\epsilon\chi\omega\nu\delta\alpha$ may well be the original form (cf. Chantraine, GH 1 427, Wackernagel, Kleine Schriften 1 825).

193. This verse is an untypical speech-introduction (cf. 3.161 Πρίαμος δ' Έλένην ἐκαλέσσατο φωνη̃). Priam calls Hekabe to join him in the storechamber, and then addresses her. For the scansion -ōν Ἐκάβην cf. 16.716-20n.

194-9 Priam's account of his vision is extremely brief, repeating only the crucial message (195-6 = 118-19; see on 117-19, 175-87). He asks his wife for her opinion, but when she gives it he refuses to listen: a good piece of psychological observation. bT observe that he has already made up his mind, but behaves in a typically human way in asking for his wife's support. His speech contains what may be some reflections of colloquial style, such as $\delta \alpha_{14} ovi\eta$, a familiar form of address (like 'my dear') which sometimes suggests remonstrance but here probably just affection (cf. E. Brunius-Nilsson, $\Delta AIMONIE$, Uppsala 1955, 12ff., and see on 1.561). In 197 Ti Toi $\phi pe \sigma lv \in l\delta e \tau \alpha i$ from your point of view?', and in 198 $\alpha_{10} \omega_{5}$ (like English 'terribly') is probably drawn from everyday speech: it occurs $19 \times in Il.$, of which 15 are in speeches, and $13 \times Od.$, always in speeches (see also on 3.158). For the form $\Delta i \delta \theta e v$ (194, 561, 15.489) see on 15.489.

198-9 Priam's assertion that his desire to go to Akhilleus coincides with the divine command is an example of the familiar pattern of 'double motivation'; cf. 8.218-19, 9.702-3, 11.714-17, etc.

200-16 Hekabe reacts to Priam's proposal with horror and incredulity, as well she might, for it sounds a lunatic scheme. Her speech is in the strongest language, directly reflecting her deepest feelings: 'have you gone crazy?' (201-2), 'your heart is made of iron' (205), 'a ravenous, faithless man he is' (207), 'if only I could fasten my teeth into the middle of his liver and eat it' (212-13). Much of this could reflect colloquial idioms. There is frequent enjambment throughout, expressing her agitation, and in the long sentence from 209 to 216 the sense develops and changes direction with Hekabe's train of thought, reflecting her mixture of reasoning, pity and bitter hatred (cf. bT 209-16, Eust. 1345.23). The protest of Eurukleia at the news of Telemakhos' intended journey in Od. 2.361-70 may echo this speech (24.200 ~ Od. 2.361, 203 ~ 364-5, 208-9 ~ 369-70). Cf. Beck, Stellung 107-9.

200 For κώκυσεν see on 22.407-9. For the pattern of this verse cf. 424 ώς φάτο, γήθησεν δε γέρων, και αμείβετο μύθω (and 571 = 1.33). αμείβετο μύθω occurs only here in II., $3 \times Od$. (and ήμεlβετο μύθω $5 \times$); cf. 3.171 μύθοισιν άμεlβετο (with comments on 3.161, 437), and M. W. Edwards, HSCP 74 (1970) 9–10. Aristarchus read άνήρετο here (Did/A, T).

201-2 Cf. 5.472 Ektop, π i δ η to: μ ℓ vos olxeta: δ π plv ℓ xeokes; olxeoba: is similarly used at 13.219-20. ℓ k λ e' for ℓ k λ ℓ eo is unusual; cf. Chantraine, GH 1 73. This verb occurs only here in II., $3 \times Od$.

203-5 These verses are echoed by Akhilleus at 519-21 ($\pi\omega_5$ $\xi\tau\lambda\eta_5$ etc.). olos is emphatic. Hekabe has not been told this, but assumes it quite naturally. For $d\nu\delta\rho\delta_5 \xi_5 \delta\phi\theta d\lambda\mu\omega_5 cf. 462-3$, and for the oblique reference to Akhilleus see on 22.38. For $\sigma_1\delta\eta\rho_{01}\omega_{11}$... $\eta\tau\rho_5 cf. 22.357 \eta$ ydp σ_01 yf $\sigma_1\delta\eta\rho_{05} \xi_5 \phi\rho_{02}$, $\varepsilon_{0.372}$, etc.

After 205 there was an extra verse in some ancient texts:

άθάνατοι ποίησαν Όλύμπια δώματ' έχοντες (Arn/A) άθάνατοι ποίησαν οι οὐρανὸν εὐρὺν έχουσιν (T)

This was clearly added to supply a verb after 205.

206-8 Verse 206 is a natural form of hysteron proteron (cf. bT). $\omega_{\mu\eta\sigma\tau\eta\varsigma}$ in 207 is only used here of a person in Homer; it is justified by 22.346-7, and echoed by Hekabe's own wish at 212-13. $\omega_{\mu\eta\sigma\tau\eta\varsigma}$... $\delta_{\gamma\epsilon}$ are a parenthesis. For Akhilleus' lack of Eleos and $\alpha \delta \omega_{\varsigma}$ see on 44-5.

208-9 άνευθεν probably means 'away from Hektor', as in 211, emphasizing the contrast with normal rites of mourning and burial; see on 22.508 (νόσφι τοκήων). ήμενοι implies their helpless inactivity, as at 540-2 etc.

209-10 For this expression and the idea of Destiny as the spinner of one's fate at birth cf. 20.127-8 (with comment), Od. 7.197-8. If we take ∞_5 as 'thus' here (cf. Leaf) the sentence is complete, whereas if it means 'as' there must be an anacoluthon at 213. The first seems slightly preferable, but given Hekabe's state of mind the second is possible.

and applinous occurs only here in Homer, and once in Sophocles (Ajax 237); cf. KUVES ($\pi \delta \delta \alpha S$) appol (etc.) $3 \times Il.$, $3 \times Od$. The unusual epithet adds vividness to what is already a painfully realistic expression.

212–13 Hekabe's wish that she might fasten on and devour Akhilleus' liver is, in its precision of language, even more awful than the similar but vaguer allusions to eating someone raw at 4.34-6 and 22.346-7. $\pi\rho\sigma\sigma\phi\bar{\nu}\nu\alpha\iota$ (only here in II.) is used once in the Odyssey (12.433) of Odysseus clinging to a tree 'like a bat', to escape Skulla and Kharubdis. It perhaps suggests a leech here.

213 τότ' αν τιτά ξργα γένοιτο: ancient opinion was divided between αν τιτά and αντιτα, but in view of Od. 17.51 (= 60) αι κέ ποθι Ζεύς αντιτα ξργα τελέσση, we should probably read the latter here too. The word seems to be from αντί-τιτος by haplography (cf. LfgrE s.v.); cf. παλίντιτα ξργα 2× Od.

a14-16 Hekabe naturally remembers only Hektor's courage in facing Akhilleus, and not his flight. κακίζεσθαι ('play the coward') occurs only here in Homer; cf. E. Med. 1246, etc. For 215 cf. the end of Andromakhe's speech at 22.514 (hence probably the variant $\pi\rho\delta s$ here). In 216 $\phi\delta\beta\sigma\nu$ means 'flight', as often in Homer, and $\delta\lambda\epsilon\omega\rho\eta s$ 'shelter' (cf. 15.533n.).

217 This name-epithet formula for Priam is used only in book 24, always in speech-introductions $(7\times)$, except for 483 (accusative). In the context of Priam's journey and meeting with Akhilleus it emphasizes his piety and godlike character.

218–27 Priam's reply is unexpectedly resolute, putting Hekabe firmly in her place. Notice the emphatic placing of initial words in 222–6: ψεῦδος ... νῦν δ' ... εἶμι ... τεθνάμεναι ... βούλομαι.

218–19 μήδε ... πέλευ: κατερυκάνω for κατερύκω occurs only here. The 'evil omen' is Hekabe's own speech with its foreboding of death. Cf. 12.243 είς οἰωνὸς ἄριστος ἀμύνεσθαι περὶ πάτρης. A 'bird of omen' within one's own house would be paradoxical and even worse in its implications than something outside one's home. Cf. Hesiod's ominous crow perching on one's roof, Erga 747 (with West's comment). For the scansion ὄρνῖς see on 12.218. οὐδέ με πείσεις (6× Il., 1× Od.) is extremely decisive here: cf. 18.126, in a similar context.

220-4 Scepticism about or suspicion of prophecies and religious phenomena or characters runs through Greek literature: in the lliad cf. 1.106-8, 12.237-43. Here the language echoes Nestor's when he was expressing his opinion about Agamemnon's dream at 2.80-2 (and 222 = 2.81); see on 2.80-1. In 221 µávTIE5 ... θ vookóo1 should probably be taken together: θ vookóo5 means 'one who examines a sacrifice' (cf. haruspex), and recurs in the Odyssey (3×). Cf. the probable distinction at 1.62-3 between µávTIS, iepev5 and ôveipoπóλo5.

223 The insistence on the personal experience, by hearing and direct vision, of a divine epiphany, is characteristic of such assertions of faith: cf. (e.g.) Od. 3.420 ($\ell v \alpha \rho \gamma \eta s$), and in the New Testament, St John's First Epistle 1.1-3, etc.

224 εἶμι ... ἔσσεται: cf. 92 (Thetis).

226-7 βούλομαι is an emphatic runover word: 'I am ready'. Priam ends by expressing his willingness to die, if only he might first clasp his son in his arms and relieve his longing for lamentation. For this form of extreme wish ('may I die if only ...') cf. Od. 7.224-5 Ιδόντα με και λίποι αιών | κτῆσιν ἐμὴν (etc.), HyAphr 153-4 βουλοίμην κεν ἔπειτα ... | σῆς εὐνῆς ἐπιβἀς δῦναι δόμον Ἄιδος εἴσω. It is quite common later (cf. Garvie on A. Cho. 438, etc.). Priam really means it here (cf. 244-6).

228-80 Priam selects the precious possessions which he will take as ransom. He then drives the Trojans out of his palace with an angry speech, and bitterly reproaches his remaining sons, telling them once again to prepare and load the waggon. They obey, and these preparations are described

The precision with which the preparations for Priam's journey are described adds to its significance: 265-74 give an account of the equipment of a waggon unparalleled in Homer. At the same time the tension and misery of the old man can only find relief in the outbursts of anger with which he drives away the Trojans and expresses his contempt for his living sons. This is in marked contrast with the portrayal of him elsewhere as moderate and kind (T 248 compares 3.103, 24.770), and the poet observes with fine insight the state of mind of someone in this almost unbearable situation. Cf. Reinhardt, IuD 475: 'Nowhere else in the Iliad or in the Odyssey is the character of old age portrayed thus.' In later Greek literature one could think of parallels: above all old Oidipous in Sophocles' last play.

228 $\phi\omega\rho_1\alpha\mu_0$, meaning 'chests', recurs in Homer only at Od. 15.104, where again they contain fine $\pi \ell \pi \lambda \sigma_1$, and the scene is one of preparations for the departure of Telemakhos from Sparta (see on 281-321). Later it was used only by Apollonius Rhodius (3.802) and Nonnus, but there was a place-name $\Phi\omega\rho_1\alpha\mu_0$ in Elis (Stephanus Byzantius). The etymology is uncertain: perhaps connected with $\phi\ell\rho\omega$, $\phi\omega\rho$, etc. (Chantraine, Dict. s.v.).

έπίθημα is a Homeric hapax; cf. Hipponax 56, etc.

229-37 The list of gifts resembles that at Od. 24.274-9, where 276-7 ~ Il. 24.230-1, and seven talents of gold and a silver mixing-bowl are included. Verse 232, however, is repeated from 19.247 (with $\xi \phi \epsilon \rho \epsilon v$ for 'Oduoeú's), in the list of gifts of Agamemnon to Akhilleus. Here it may be an interpolation (see comment). The ransom would then consist of fine clothing, blankets or rugs, and precious vessels.

229 $\pi \epsilon \pi \lambda \sigma$ are usually women's garments, but at 796 are used to cover Hektor's corpse at his burial, and at 5.194 to cover chariots.

230 ἀπλοΐς is found only here and in the repeated verse at Od. 24.276, and later once in the Greek Anthology (Agathias, AP 5.293) as a noun meaning 'single garment' (like ἀπληγίς); cf. δίπλαξ (3.126 etc.), χλαΐνα διπλῆ (10.133-4), and the later διπλοΐς ('double cloak'). τάπητες are rugs or blankets used to cover furniture or beds (see on 9.200).

231 The vulgate reading is καλά as in Od. 24.277, but the variant λευκά is more likely to be right, in view of περικαλλέας at 229 and περικαλλές at 234. Whereas a $\chi\lambda\alpha$ ίνα was woollen, the φάρος was almost certainly made of linen, hence the colour; cf. 18.353 φάρει λευκῷ. On these garments see Lorimer, HM 370-5, S. Marinatos, Arch. Hom. A 6-11.

232 = 19.247. Here the verse breaks the run of the passage ($\xi \in \lambda \in ... \notin \lambda \in \lambda$), and $\xi \in \lambda \in ...$ is unsuitable as Priam is taking things from the chests. Also the idea of weighing has been thought unnecessary here, as no exact amount has been specified, but that is a minor objection. Leaf argued on these grounds for interpolation, and he could well be right (so also Macleod). The reference to gold at 22.351-2 and in the later tradition of the ransoming (see comment there) could have led to the insertion.

233 Cf. 9.122-3 (etc.) ἔπτ' ἀπύρους τρίποδας ... | αἴθωνας δὲ λέβητας ἐείκοσι...

234-7 The most valuable object is the cup given to Priam when he went on an embassy by the Thracians. Cf. 11.632 máp δέ δέπας περικαλλές, δ οἶκοθεν ῆγ' ὁ γεραιός (Nestor's cup). The Thracians were suitable donors, as heavy drinkers (T), as well as near neighbours of the Trojans. ἐξεσίη ('a mission') recurs at Od. 21.20 (ἐξεσίην ... ῆλθεν), and later in Callimachus (fr. 82.4 Pf.). For ἐξεσίην (acc. of respect, 'on a mission') cf. 4.384 etc. κτέρας means 'a present' here; see on 38. ὁ γέρων in 236 perhaps has a touch of pathos, as at (e.g.) 1.33, 8.87 (so bT on both these verses), and the whole of 235-7 (οὐδέ ... υἱόν) are added to stress the great worth of this possession, περί δ' ... being explanatory ('for he longed intensely ...'). The poet gives us an insight into the old man's mind.

239 $\ell\rho\rho\epsilon(\tau\epsilon)$ is always a violent word (cf. 8.164 etc. and see on 22.498), and $\lambda\omega\beta\eta\tau\eta\rho$ is abusive (2.275, 11.385). For $\ell\lambda\epsilon\gamma\chi\epsilon\epsilon$ see on 4.242, and cf. the abusive kok' $\ell\lambda\epsilon\gamma\chi\epsilon\alpha$ at 2.235 etc.

239-40 οῦ νυ καὶ ὑμῖν ... κηδήσοντες: 'Haven't you enough of your own to weep for at home, that you have come to tend my grief?' κηδήσοντες seems to be a word-play, for κήδειν means 'to cause distress', but κῆδος etc. is used of mourning (cf. κηδεύειν of attending to a corpse, i.e. burial-rites). So here by their grief the mourners only give Priam worse distress (cf. T).

241 $\bar{\eta}$ όνόσασθ': this was Aristarchus' reading (Did/A), from ὄνομαι, meaning 'have you made light of it, that ...?' It looks like a conjecture for the vulgate reading ούνεσθε, which can be explained as the second person plural indicative of ὄνομαι, with epic lengthening, or as a misspelling of the imperfect ώνεσθε. In both cases the sense will be virtually the same as that of Aristarchus' reading, and the closest parallel is Od. 17.378 (Antinoos abusing Eumaios) $\bar{\eta}$ ὄνοσαι ότι τοι βίοτον κατέδουσιν ἄνακτος (etc.). For Koovlôns Zεψς άλγε' έδωκε cf. 2.375; 18.431.

242 παΐδ' όλέσαι τὸν ἄριστον is 'to lose the best of sons', in apposition to άλγεα, and ἀτὰρ γνώσεσθε καὶ ὕμμες 'but you yourselves shall learn', i.e. by bitter experience, what this means; cf. 8.406 etc.

243–4 Cf. 18.258 βη^Tτεροι πολεμίζειν, etc. Here the comparative is reduplicated by μαλλον: cf. 334, LSJ s.v. μάλα Π 2.

244–6 cử từp $\sharp \gamma \omega \gamma \epsilon \dots \epsilon l \sigma \omega$: for this type of 'death-wish' cf. especially 6.464–5 (at the end of Hektor's speech to Andromakhe, envisaging her capture), and 4.182, 8.150. The reduplication of the long participles in 245 adds greater force.

247 ή, και σκηπανίω δίεπ' άνέρας: cf. 13.59 ή, και σκηπανίω, and 2.207

• .

åς δ γε κοιρανέων δίεπε στρατόν, where Odysseus is restoring order in the army, using the sceptre to do so. δίεπε means 'he controlled them', i.e. drove them out of the palace.

248-51 This list of Priam's sons contains some well-known names (Helenos, Paris, Polites, Deiphobos), and others which occur only here and may be invented by the poet for the occasion. The names Agathon, Pammon, Antiphonos and Dios do not recur in the poem, and in the case of Δ iov dyavóv there was debate as to which word was the proper name, Pherecydes being quoted in favour of Dios (Arn/A, T). Hippothoos recurs as a leader of the Pelasgians (2.840), killed at 17.298-303. The shadowy character of some of them emphasizes Priam's point that his favourite sons are dead.

253-64 Priam's bitter invective, now directed at his own sons, begins in a way structurally similar to the previous speech (239 ~ 253), and then returns to the cause of his grief, with its emphatic repetition of Hektor's name at the beginning of 254 and 258. The opening is picked up in the magnificently contemptuous description of the remaining sons at 261-2 as parasitic layabouts. It emerges at the end of the speech that they have failed to react to his earlier order to prepare the waggon (189-90), and with this renewed order the main thread of the narrative is resumed. For criticism of Priam's sons and sons-in-law as cowards cf. also 5.472-6.

253 κατηφόνες: 'downcasts', i.e. people who suffer from κατηφείη ('dejection'), who are κατηφέες (Od. 24.432): see on 22.293. The word recurs in Philo of Alexandria and the scholia to Hermogenes. Such nouns in -ων can often be derogatory, e.g. άλαζών, δηλήμων, κέντρων ('rogue'), τρίβων, etc.; cf. C. D. Buck and W. Petersen, A Reverse Index of Greek Nouns and Adjectives (Chicago 1945) 247. Aristarchus thought that the word had a feminine connotation here, whereas Crates read κατηφέες (Did/A).

255-6 These verses are echoed by Priam at 493-4, where he expands this theme in his plea to Akhilleus; see also on 22.44-5. The highly rhetorical compound maximom possible occurs nowhere else, and could well be a coinage of the poet (for amompos see 388): cf. M. Pope, CQ 35 (1985) 5, J. Griffin, JHS 106 (1986) 41.

256 Tooly iv evpein: the only Iliadic parallel (apart from 494) for this phrase is at 774, ivi Tooly evpein |. The first formula occurs $3 \times Od$, the second $2 \times .$

257 Oddly enough, neither Mestor nor Troilos is mentioned elsewhere in Homer. Apollodorus (Epit. 3.32) mentions Mestor in connexion with Akhilleus' raid on Aineias' cattle, and he crops up in some other late versions of the Trojan War (Dio Chrys. Or. 11.77, Dictys 6.9). The killing of Troilos by Akhilleus was related in the Cypria (OCT vol. v, p. 105.12 = Davies, EGF p. 32.81-2), and was clearly a popular story, as it is often shown in art from the early archaic period onwards: cf. Johansen, lliad in Early Greek Art 45, 53, 83, K. Schefold, Myth and Legend in Early Greek Art (London 1966) figs. 28, 34, 35, pls. 48a, 73a, F. Brommer, Vasenlisten (3rd edn, Marburg 1973) 357-66. The epithet $1\pi\pi 10\chi 40\mu\eta\nu$ (only here in ll., $1 \times Od$.) is given point by later versions of the story: on the François Vase Akhilleus on foot pursues Troilos on horseback (Schefold, op. cit. pl. 48a), and this was the version of ol vecorepot according to Arn/A, whilst T tells us that in Sophocles' Troilos he was exercising his horses when ambushed (cf. Trag. Graec. Frag. 1V, p. 453 ed. Radt). In Virgil he has a chariot, whose horses bolt (Aen. 1.474-8).

258-9 Hektor's godlike status is twice emphasized by Priam (cf. 22.394, 22.434-5, and Griffin, HLD 81ff.). As often the contrast between avopos and 82000 frames 259. The most godlike of Priam's sons is dead, and those who are left seem mere nobodies to him by contrast.

260-2 The invective style evokes highly individual language: $\psi \epsilon v \sigma \tau h \varsigma$ occurs only here in Homer (cf. Pindar, N. 5.29, etc.); $\delta p \chi \eta \sigma \tau h \varsigma$ recurs at 16.617 ($\delta p \chi \eta \sigma \tau \eta \rho$ 18.494); $\chi \rho \rho \sigma \tau v \pi \eta$ is only here in early literature (cf. $\chi \rho \rho \sigma \tau \tau v \pi \sigma s$ HyHerm 31, etc.); $\epsilon \pi \iota \delta \eta \mu \iota \sigma \varsigma$ at 9.64 and 2× Od.; $\delta \rho \pi \sigma \kappa \tau \eta \rho$ only here and in late literature (Oppian, Nonnus, Julian); finally the phrase $\delta \rho v \tilde{v} \eta \delta' \epsilon \rho l \phi \omega v$ is Odyssean (3×). The structure of the verses is also effective: 260 is a balanced contrast of $\mu \epsilon v$ and $\delta \epsilon$ clauses with dactylic rhythm, 261 a 'tricolon crescendo' with emphatic spondaic opening and the long abstract formation $\chi \rho \rho \sigma \tau \tau \eta \sigma \nu giving$ weight to the ending, and 262 again has a climactic effect, emphasized by its spondaic ending:

τους μεν απώλεσ' Άρης, || τα δ' ελέγχεα παντα λέλειπται, ψεῦσταί τ' | ὀρχησταί τε, || χοροιτυπίησιν ἄριστοι, ἀρνῶν | ήδ' ἐρίφῶν || ἑπιδήμιοι | ἀρπακτῆρες.

The accusations remind one particularly of the Odyssey: e.g. Alkinoos' description of liars (11.363-6), the young men of Phaeacia, unwarlike and brilliant at dancing, and the suitors of Penelope who devour Odysseus' animals. Such derogatory descriptions are neatly echoed by Hor. Ep. 1.2.27-31. But cf. also II. 3.39 = 13.769 Δύσπαρι, είδος άριστε, γυναιμανές, ήπεροπευτά, 1.231 δημοβόρος βασιλεύς, έπεὶ οὐτιδανοῖσιν ἀνάσσεις, and 3.106, where Priam's sons are described as ὑπερφίαλοι καὶ ἀπιστοι. ἁριστοι in 261 picks up and bitterly echoes υίας ἀρίστους in 255; for the word's sarcastic use cf. 17.142, 23.483, Hdt. 3.80.4, Thuc. 3.38.5. Dancing and fighting are contrasted at 3.393-4, 15.508 (see comment). In 262 each word has its point: lambs and kids would be particular delicacies, and ἑπιδήμιοι is paradoxical ('robbers in your own land'); bT compare Ar. Pax 1189-90 οίκοι μὲν λέοντες, ἐν μάχη δ' ἀλώπεκες. Robbing livestock outside one's community was no disgrace in heroic society, as Thucydides observed (1.5.1); cf. Caes. BG 6.23.6 latrocinia nullam habent infamiam quae extra fines cuiusque civitatis fiunt (among the Germans, and especially in training young warriors). For modern Greek parallels cf. J. Th. Kakridis, Gymnasium 78 (1971) 513-15.

263 Cf. Od. 6.57 (Nausikaa to Alkinoos) πάππα φίλ^{*}, οὐκ ἂν δή μοι έφοπλίσσειας ἀπήνην ... As Leaf observes, 'The very different tone expressed here by the same construction shews how rash it is to put down certain formulae as "polite" or "hesitating" requests; such a connotation belongs to the context rather than the words.' For this construction (οὐκ ἂν δή with optative), expressing a command or suggestion, gentle or contemptuous, cf. 3.52, 5.456. On the relation of this episode to the scene in Odyssey 6 cf. Reinhardt, IuD 474-7, Usener, Verhältnis der Odyssee zur Ilias 180-1.

3.476 ζεύξαθ' ὑφ' ἄρματ' ἄγοντες, Ινα πρήσσησιν όδοῖο 15.47 ζεῦξον ὑφ' ἄρματ' ἄγων, ὄφρα πρήσσωμεν όδοῖο 15.219 αὐτοί τ' ἀμβαίνωμεν, Ινα πρήσσωμεν όδοῖο.

265-74 After the dramatic scene of Priam's anger and impatience the technical account of how the waggon is prepared and harnessed makes a complete contrast: as often in Homer, an emotional scene is followed by one of practical action (cf. for example 23.109-26 with comment). The style is similar to that of other technical descriptions, such as the construction of Odysseus' raft (Od. 5.233-57) or Hesiod's instructions for making a waggon or plough (Erga 423-36), but it is not altogether matter-of-fact: as bT (266) say, 'the poet has dignified an everyday and commonplace action by the variety ($\pi o_{\kappa}\lambda l q$) of his poetic expressions'. The interpretation of some of the details remains uncertain, despite more than a century of modern discussion. Here is a provisional translation of 268-74: 'And they took down from the hook the yoke for the mules, made of box-wood, with a knob on it, well-fitted with rein-guides. Then they brought out the nine-cubitlong yoke-binding, along with the yoke. And the yoke they fitted properly on to the well-polished pole, at its front end, and put the ring over the peg, and tied it (the binding) three times on each side of the knob, and then bound it fast in a succession of turns and tucked it in under the hook."

Much of the language is individual: for $\pi\rho\omega\tau\sigma\pi\alpha\gamma\eta_5$, meaning 'joined together for the first time', see on 5.194; it recurs in Hellenistic and late Greek. The following are Homeric hapaxes: $\pi i \xi i vos$ (fifth-century and later literature); $oi\eta\xi$, which later always means 'a ship's tiller'; $\zeta v \gamma \delta \delta \epsilon \sigma \mu o v$ (Plutarch, etc.); $\pi \ell \zeta \alpha$ (Hippocrates, etc.; said to be used in Arcadian and Doric, but cf. $\tau \rho \dot{\alpha} \pi \epsilon \zeta \alpha$, and the epic compounds $\dot{\alpha} \rho v \rho \dot{o}$ - and $\kappa v \alpha v \dot{o}$ - $\pi \epsilon \zeta \alpha$); $\kappa \rho i \kappa o s$ (Hdt. etc.); $\dot{\epsilon} \sigma \tau \omega \rho$ (otherwise only in Aristobulus' account of the Gordian knot, FGH 139.7, quoted by Plutarch and Arrian); and $\gamma \lambda \omega \chi i v$ or $\gamma \lambda \omega \chi i s$ (cf. Sophocles etc., and the Homeric compounds $\tau \alpha v v$ - $\tau \rho i$ - $\chi \alpha \lambda \kappa o$ - $\gamma \lambda \dot{\omega} \chi i s$, 5.393 etc.).

This waggon is four-wheeled (324). $\delta\mu\alpha\xi\alpha$ may have its basic sense here, referring to the wheeled framework or chassis, melpivs being the superstructure and ἀπήνη denoting the whole vehicle (cf. N. J. Richardson and S. Piggott, JHS 102 (1982) 226 on Hesiod's waggon). It is usually thought that the oinkes were hooks or rings attached to the yoke through which the reins were passed. The length of the yoke-binding, nine cubits or about four metres, is puzzling, and it has been suggested that as well as being lashed around the yoke and pole this was used to form 'yoke braces', which ran forward from the pole diagonally to either yoke-arm and helped to keep the pole level. Such braces were certainly used in Near Eastern chariots of the Late Bronze Age, and they appear on later Assyrian reliefs: cf. M. A. Littauer and J. Crouwel, JHS 108 (1988) 194-6. However, given the precision of the Homeric verses, it is odd that there is nothing in the text referring to them. The kpikos was probably a ring attached to the yoke, which was passed over a peg ($i\sigma\tau\omega\rho$) fastened through the pole: it was by removing this peg, according to Aristobulus, that Alexander undid the Gordian knot. The ouppartos was a boss on the yoke itself, around which the binding was passed three times, before being bound fast in a succession of turns (έξείης κατέδησαν) around the pole. The end was then possibly tucked under a hook on the pole, if that is what $\gamma\lambda\omega\chi$ is means: $\delta\pi\delta$ $\gamma\lambda\omega\chi$ iva probably go together (rather than $\delta m \delta \dots \epsilon \kappa \alpha \mu \psi \alpha \nu$), because of the position of $\delta \dot{\epsilon}$, and $\gamma \lambda \omega \chi \dot{\varsigma}$ normally means 'a barb'. There are discussions and diagrams in Leaf's Commentary, vol. 11, pp. 623-7, J. Wiesner, Arch. Hom. F 6-9, 16-18, F. H. Stubbings in Wace and Stubbings, Companion 539-41; see also Willcock's comments on 268 - 74.

268–70 For κάδ δ' άπὸ πασσαλόφι cf. Od. 8.67, 105 | κάδ δ' ἐκ πασσαλόφι. For some reason Zenodotus omitted 269 (Did/AT). For the oĭŋκes ('terrets', 'rein-guides') see on 16.470 -5. ἐννεάπηχυς recurs at Od. 11.311, HyAp 104.

271-2 Cf. 6.40, 16.371 ἐν πρώτω ῥυμῷ, and 5.729-30 where the yoke is bound to the front end of the chariot-pole (see comment).

274 Most MSS read the unmetrical Eyvappav, a minority Exappav.

Copyrighted Material

275-6 The word $\dot{\alpha}\pi\dot{\eta}\nu\eta$ is first mentioned here in the poem and recurs several times in book 24. Verses 275-6 are echoed at 578-9.

277-8 For 277 cf. Od. 6.253 ζεῦξεν δ' ἡμιόνους κρατερώνυχας. This epithet is usually applied to horses. ἐντεσιεργός is an absolute hapax, meaning 'working in harness'; cf. Pind. O. 13.20, A. Pers. 194 for this sense of ἕντεα. The noble epic diction dignifies these homely beasts: cf. the story of Simonides' reluctance to write an ode for a mule-race victor until paid well, after which he wrote χαίρετ' ἀελλοπόδων θύγατρες Ιππων (Arist. Rhet. 1405b23-8), and Pindar's elaborate praise of Hagesias as victor in the mule-car race, O. 6.22-8. Verse 278 gives them a homeland and special association, as in the case of the Thracian cup at 234-5. T points out that the Mysians were neighbours of the Enetoi, δθεν ἡμιόνων γένος ἀγροτεράων (2.852; see comment), and quotes Anacreon (377 PMG): Ιπποθόρων δὲ Muσol | εὖρον μίξιν ὄνων. The mules are masculine here, feminine at 325.

279-80 Priam drives his own chariot (322), while Idaios drives the waggon. The variant Tpoovs in a few MSS for IIpiduo in 279 would avoid the repetition of IIpiduo in 278-9 and would make the horses belong to the famous breed of Tros (5.222-3 etc.), but it is very weakly attested and probably an echo of 23.291. For 280 cf. 5.271 rows user resonance of 23.291. For 280 cf. 5.271 rows user resonance of 271, 275), perhaps by a simple process of association.

281-321 While preparations are being made Hekabe brings a cup of wine, and tells Priam to make a libation, pray for a safe return, and ask for a good omen from Zeus. Priam does so and Zeus sends a great eagle in response

Libation and prayer before a journey were a normal Greek practice (cf. Burkert, Religion 71). In the Iliad the other chief occasion for this was at the departure for battle of Patroklos (16.220-52), where Akhilleus prayed to Zeus for his safe return (16.231-2 ~ 24.306-7), but there in vain. In the Odyssey the Phaeacians send Odysseus on his homeward voyage with a libation (13.36-62), but the departure of Telemakhos and Peisistratos from Sparta is closer to this scene (15.147-81). Verses 284-6 are echoed closely by Od. 15.148-50, and there is a similar favourable omen of an eagle, with similar reactions. In both the Odyssean scenes the departure is accompanied by guest-gifts, which makes a further indirect resemblance to the preparation of the ransom-gifts in book 24 (see on 228). See also Arend, Scenen 77-8.

281-2 The middle $\zeta \epsilon v \gamma v v \sigma \theta \eta v$ means that they supervised the yoking of the mules and horses (cf. AbT). Verse 282 = 674. For $\pi v \kappa v \alpha \ldots \epsilon \chi \sigma v \pi \epsilon_5$ cf. Od. 19.353 $\pi v \kappa v \alpha \phi \rho \epsilon \sigma$) $\mu \eta \delta \epsilon' \epsilon \chi \sigma v \sigma \alpha$. Priam and the herald have much to think about, both here and still more at 673-4.

283-6 For 283 cf. 4.529, 16.820 $d\gamma\chi\mu\rho\lambda\rho\nu$ dé (bd) ol habe, and $d\gamma\chi\mu\rho\lambda\rho\nu$ dé of habe $5 \times Od$. Verse 284 = Od. 15.148 ($\xi\chi\omega\nu$), 285 = 15.149 (with variant $\xi\nu$ démai $\chi\rho\nu\sigma\xi\omega$), $286 \sim 15.150$.

287-98 Hekabe naturally seeks for comfort and reassurance both in prayer and in an omen from Zeus. Only with divine confirmation will she acquiesce in Priam's plan.

287-9 For $\tau \eta$ cf. 14.219, 23.618. In 288-9 of $\gamma \epsilon$... there use τ strongly contrasted, use with the subordinate clause having a virtually concessive force. For other examples of a subordinate use cf. Denniston, Particles 378-9.

290-1 EUXEO is in synizesis: cf. 17.142 EDEUEO, etc. ETEITA may mean 'in addition' (i.e. to praying for safe return), rather than 'after all that has been said', as Leaf proposed. In 291 the specification of Zeus as god of Ida (cf. 16.603-7n.), and as watching over Troy, gives a reason why he should respond: in Akhilleus' prayer at 16.233-48 Zeus is god of Dodona and the Pelasgians, i.e. of northern Greece and Akhilleus' homeland. Here kata ... ôpātai implies protection, as in the case of thoopãv (etc.) later, of the gods (cf. Griffin, HLD 181). For Katopãv -ãotai of Zeus cf. 11.337 (from Ida), 13.4, and (of Artemis) Anacreon, PMG 348.6 (tokatopãs), etc.

292-8 This is the only time in the Iliad where an omen is actually prayed for: again an Odyssean motif. In 292 there was a variant to for $\tau \sigma \chi \dot{\nu} \nu$ (Did/AT and a papyrus), mentioned again as a variant at 310 by A: cf. 296 where to $\dot{\sigma} \gamma \gamma \epsilon \lambda \sigma \nu$ is the correct reading. In 292 and 310 it would be possible, to meaning 'his own' here and 'your own' in 310 (cf. Chantraine, GH 1 273-4). But it is less likely to be correct here, in view of $\delta_5 \tau \dot{\epsilon}$ of $\sigma \dot{\nu} \tau \ddot{\phi}$ etc. which follows, and $\tau \sigma \chi \dot{\nu} \nu$ should stand in both verses. In 293 koi ev kpártos tori utyror conforms to a formular pattern: $\tau \sigma \ddot{\nu} \gamma \dot{\sigma} \rho$ ($\delta \tau \epsilon / \delta \sigma \nu / \sigma \ddot{\nu}$ rs/ koi ev) kpártos tori utyror $\delta \times Il.$, $2 \times Od$. The eagle's power is greatest, just as in the case of Zeus, its lord. For the superlatives in such a context cf. 15.237-8 (n.), etc., and for $\delta_5 \tau \epsilon \dots$ koi ev, with change from relative clause to main clause 1.78-9 etc. Zenodotus' reading ov is unnecessary, but originally it may have been koi to koártos.

δεξιόν in 294 is emphatic, and means that the bird flies 'towards the right' from the point of view of the observer: cf. 12.239 tml δεξιά, 13.821 (etc.) δεξιός δρνις. In 295 there was a variant χαίρων $tvl θυμ \ddot{ω}$] (A), but this would hardly suit Priam's mood. The use of où after tl (296) is not uncommon in Homer: cf. Chantraine, GH II 333.

299-301 Priam's answer is very brief. For the speech-introduction 299 see on 217. His pious comment (301) is similar to that at 425-8, and helps to characterize him. al κ' then on $-\eta_5$ occurs $5 \times II$. (357 etc.), $1 \times Od$.

302-7 Before prayer and libation washing of hands and purification of the cup was normal: 6.266-8, 16.228-30, Od. 2.261, 12.336. For 302 cf. Od. 16.152 άμφίπολον ταμίην ότρυνέμεν όττι τάχιστα. άκήρατος ('pure') recurs at 15.498, Od. 17.532, meaning 'untouched'; it is used of pure water at Soph. OC 471, 690; cf. Od. 9.205 olvos άκηράσιος, and see on 15.498. Verse 304 resembles the Odyssean verse χέρνιβα δ' αμφίπολος προχόω έπέχενε ϕ to σ (6 ×), which always occurs in the formular passage describing preparations for a meal. x pvibov is found only here in early literature, in a fourth-century B.C. inscription, and in Gregory of Nyssa, but was used in Hellenistic Greek: this is attested by Arn/A, who reports Aristarchus' athetesis of the verse because he thought the word post-Homeric, in place of Atons. xtoring means 'water for washing the hands', and xtoribor (or χερνιβείον in classical Greek) the basin containing this. Aristarchus may have disliked the idea of two vessels being mentioned, and bT argue, in fact, that χέρνιβον means the water itself (cf. Pollux 2.149). πρόχοος occurs only here in II. ($\pi \rho \alpha \alpha \alpha \alpha \beta \alpha \beta \beta \alpha \beta \beta \alpha \beta \alpha \beta \alpha \beta \beta \alpha \beta \alpha \beta \beta \alpha \beta \alpha$ which is uncertain but seems to have ended rapin perd xepolv Exoura, thus cutting out the mpoxoos (cf. Erbse on schol. 304b). For 305 cf. 1.596 μειδήσασα δὲ παιδὸς ἑδέξατο χειρί κύπελλον. The two verbs seem to be in a hysteron-proteron relationship. Verses 306-7 = 16.231-2 (see comment).

• .

314-16 Verse 314 = 16.249 (at the end of Akhilleus' prayer before Patroklos' departure); 315 = 8.247 (see comment). Arn/A observes that τελειότατον does not mean 'physically perfect' but 'most capable of bringing fulfilment'; cf. Zeus Téleios (A. Supp. 525-6, A. Ag. 973, Fraenkel ad loc.). The epithet could well mean both, 'most perfect' symbolizing 'most capable of fulfilment'. In 316 µópovos and περκνόs occur only here in Homer. μόρφνος reappears at Hes. Aspis 134, apparently again as an epithet of an eagle, and in Aristotle (HA 9.32) the eagle mentioned here is said to be called $\pi\lambda \dot{\alpha}\gamma\gamma \sigma_{\beta}$ and 'duck-killer', as well as $\mu \sigma_{\beta}\phi\gamma \sigma_{\beta}$ (so accented), and to haunt valleys, glens and lakes. Lycophron (838) treats it as a noun, and so does the Suda. meproofs means 'dusky', 'dark-coloured', and recurs in Hellenistic and later literature; cf. Unonepk&Louow of ripening grapes at Od. 7.126. Aristarchus seems to have treated π epotos as the substantive here (Hrd/A). The original sense may have been 'dappled', 'with dark patches': cf. Chantraine, Dict. s.v. The eagle in question might be the same as the one described in the simile at 21.252-3 (see comment), although it looks as if they may be distinguished in Aristotle (loc. cit.). Given the size of its wingspan (317-19), the golden eagle would be a good candidate, as its span can reach seven feet and it is dusky in colour. Whatever type of bird it may be, the effect of the elaborate description is to make it more awe-inspiring, and this is increased by the simile which follows.

317-19 For this kind of measure of size compare the description of Poluphemos' club as like the mast of a twenty-oared ship (Od. 9.322-4). For the language cf. 3.423 $\psi\phi\phi\phi\phi\phi\nu$ $\theta\lambda\alpha\mu\phi\nu$ (Od. 2.337), Od. 4.121 $\theta\alpha\lambda\mu\phi\mu$... $\psi\phi\phi\phi\phi\phi$: II. 24.482 $\lambda\nu\phi\phi\phi$ is $\lambda\phi\nu\epsilon$. The singular $\theta\psi\phi\eta$ occurs only here and at 453 in II., $7 \times Od$.

In 318 Aristarchus read $t\ddot{v}\kappa\lambda\eta\ddot{v}s$ as one word, meaning 'well-closed' (the word would be an absolute hapax; cf. $t\ddot{v}\kappa\lambda\epsilon\iota\sigma\tau\sigma s$), and all MSS have this reading, whereas Tryphon preferred $t\ddot{v}\kappa\lambda\eta\ddot{v}\sigma'$. Aristarchus objected to the elision of the dative plural - $i\sigma s$, which seems possible given other elided datives in iota. Against the compound word is the fact that $d\rho\eta\rho\phi s$ (etc.) is usually joined to an adverb or a dative elsewhere, but cf. 4.134, 19.396, where it probably stands on its own. Elsewhere doors seem to have a single $\kappa\lambda\eta \tilde{s}$, whether lock or bolt (cf. 12.456, 14.168, 24.455), but this may not be a relevant objection to the plural. On the whole it seems better to treat $t\ddot{v}\kappa\lambda\eta \tilde{s}$ 'd $\rho\alpha\rho\nu\tilde{s}$ as a single phrase, rather than dividing it into two separate epithets.

319-21 'And it appeared to them darting towards the right through (or over) the city.' Most MSS have $\sqrt[4]{\pi}$ foreos, did being a variant in A and a few others. The initial digamma of dorto is usually observed, but $\sqrt[4]{\pi}$ seems better of an eagle. Verses 320-1 are echoed closely at Od. 15.164-5, of the portent at Telemakhos' departure from Sparta. Cf. also Od. 2.154 (two eagles) define fiftan did t' olkic kal πόλιν αυτών. For θυμος lándh cf. 23.597-8, 23.600.

322-48 Priam and the herald Idaios set off, escorted by Priam's family until they leave the city. Zeus then instructs Hermes to conduct Priam to Akhilleus unseen by the rest of the Greeks, and Hermes comes down to Troy disguised as a young man

At last the perilous journey begins. After the departure the whole focus in the next 140 verses or so is on the meeting of Hermes with Priam, which virtually replaces any description of the journey itself.

323 This verse belongs to the type-scene of departures by chariot from a palace (Arend, Scenen 88-9), and recurs $3 \times$ in Od. of Telemakhos (3.493, 15.146, 15.191). The allowa is the portico around the outer courtyard (cf.

9.472); see Lorimer, HM 415. It is tploouros (as a generic epithet) in the Odyssey even in cases where no noisy activity is being described (3.399 etc.), presumably because of its echoing capacity. T compares KATA SWUATA $h\chi hera (Od. 4.72)$. tploouros, however, occurs only here in the Iliad, and may well have its point, the thundering of the horses' hooves: cf. 11.152 tplyouros modes Innov, and Reinhardt, IuD 492-3. Usener, Verh linis der Odyssee zur Ilias 156-64, argues that the phrase is specifically designed for Iliad 24, and only becomes a formula through its use in the Odyssey.

324 For $\tau \epsilon \tau \rho \dot{\alpha} \kappa \lambda \lambda \sigma_{S}$ cf. Od. 9.241-2 ($\dot{\alpha} \mu \alpha \xi \sigma_{1}$). This would be in contrast to chariots, which were two-wheeled, although some early Greek $\dot{\alpha} \mu \alpha \xi \sigma_{1}$ do appear to have been two-wheelers (cf. Richardson and Piggott, JHS 102 (1982) 225-9). The scansion $\tau \epsilon \tau \rho \sigma \kappa \kappa \lambda \delta \nu$ is metri gratua: at Od. 9.242 $\tau \epsilon \tau \rho \dot{\alpha} \kappa \kappa \lambda \delta \nu$ involves another metrical expedient, the lengthened alpha.

325 Idaios the Trojan herald appeared at 3.248, 7.276 etc.

326 For mastry keleve cf. 23.642.

327-8 Despite the recent portent and Priam's vision, his family still lament at his departure as if he were going to his death (cf. Deichgräber, Letzte Gesang 58-9). Cf. the lament of the women when Hektor returns to battle at 6.500-2, and see on 24.83-6. Octoortoves is used elsewhere in the poem only of the summons to death by the gods of Patroklos and Hektor (16.693, 22.297).

329-32 For 329 cf. Od. 24.205 ol δ' έπει έκ πόλιος κατέβαν, τάχα δ' άγρον Ικοντο, and for 330 cf. II. 3.313 (τώ μέν ...). On εὐρύοπα Ζην cf. 8.206, 14.265 (with comment). Zeus's pity in 332 answers Priam's hopes (301) and echoes 174 (etc.).

333-48 Hermes has not been active in the poem up to now, and even in the Theomachy he declined to fight against Leto (21.497-501). Here he is employed by Zeus in his role as an escort (334-5) and helper of travellers (e.g. Od. 10.277-306), and more particularly because he has the power to lull men to sleep with his magic wand (343-5), and so is able to conduct Priam through the Greek camp unnoticed (337-8, 445-7). His power to act by stealth has already been shown at 24, where the gods urged him to steal Hektor's corpse (cf. 5.388-91, etc.). For Hermes $\pi o \mu \pi a \bar{a} \sigma c$ f. A. Eu. go-2, S. Ph. 133, [Theocr.] Id. 25.4-6 (etc.), and for his rôle as helper of mankind in general Od. 8.335 etc. (bῶτορ ἐάων), Ar. Pax 392-4 ὥ φιλανθρωπότατε καὶ μεγαλοδωρότατε δαιμόνων, etc.

Zeus's sending of Hermes is paralleled in the Odyssey, where Hermes is treated as a messenger when he is sent to Kalupso's island to release Odysseus, replacing Iris, who does not appear in this poem. For 333-5 cf. Od. 5.28-9:

> *Η φα, και Έρμειαν, υιόν φίλον, άντίον ηύδα "Έρμεια, σύ γάρ αῦτε τά τ' άλλα περ άγγελός ἐσσι ..."

• .

Verses 339-45 = Od. 5.43-9 (and $340-2 \sim Od. 1.96-8, 343-4 = Od. 24.3-4$); moreover 347-8 are similar to Od. 10.278-9, where Hermes appears to Odysseus to help him before he meets Kirke. In Odyssey 5, however, Hermes' wand has no function and is merely an attribute (as T observes; schol. Od. 5.47); and here Hermes' disguise as a young man leads to the delightful scene between him and the aged Priam, where the contrast of youth and age creates a moving relationship of sympathy, whereas the same disguise in Odyssey 10 has no particular significance (cf. Reinhardt, IuD 479-82). For other similarities with Od. 10.277-306 see on 360-3, 375-7. Usener, Verhältnis der Odyssee zur Ilias 165-79, argues that the whole episode of Hermes' meeting with Priam has influenced several parts of the Odyssey.

335 For ἐταιρίσσαι ('act as companion to') cf. 13.456 ἑταρίσσαιτο (with accusative), HyAphr 95-6 (Χάριτες) αἶ τε θεοῖσι | πᾶσιν ἐταιρίζουσι. καί τ' ἕκλυες ῷ κ' ἑθέλησθα is 'and you listen to whomever you like'; for the dative with κλύειν or ἀκούειν of a god hearing a mortal request cf. 5.115 (etc.) κλῦθί μοι, 16.575, etc.

336 Báox' 10:: elsewhere this always comes at the beginning of a speech by Zeus, with a vocative (2.8n., $5 \times Il$.). Here it is displaced by the explanatory clause in 334-5: Zeus treats Hermes with more elaborate courtesy than either the Dream or Iris, and in any case, a reason for the choice of Hermes is necessary here.

338 For this contrast between the other Greeks and Akhilleus cf. 2.674 = 17.280 τῶν ἀλλων Δαναῶν, μετ' ἀμύμονα Πηλείωνα. This is the only case in Homer where -δε is added to a personal name, as if it meant 'to the house of Akhilleus': cf. however 'Αϊδόσδε ('to the house of Hades'). This extension of the usage seems natural, and is imitated by Apollonius Rhodius ('Αλκινοόνδε, αὐτοκασιγνητήνδε). T compares 7.312 (etc.) εἰς Άγαμέμνονα.

339-45 See on 333-48 for the Odyssean parallels.

339 For Sicietopos see on 2.103. If it was thought to mean 'conductor' it would be especially appropriate here (cf. 378 etc.).

340-2 Hermes' divine sandals, which carry him over sea and land, were portrayed as winged in archaic and later art: T criticizes Aristotle (or perhaps Aristophanes, according to Rose) for regarding them as such here, but why should he not be right? Cf. J. Chittenden, Hesperia 16 (1947) 101; L. Deroy, Athenaeum 30 (1952) 59-84.

343-5 Hermes' wand has 'magical' powers: cf. Od. 10.302-6, where he gives Odysseus the magic plant $\mu\omega\lambda\nu$. The description of the wand sets the tone for the whole of what is to follow, with its atmosphere of the wonderful and supernatural. In Od. 24.1-10 he uses his wand to shepherd the ghosts of the suitors down to Hades, and in the Odyssey (3×) and Hymns (3×) Hermes is $\chi\rho\nu\sigma\delta\rho\rho\alpha\pi\nu$. The wand is described at HyHerm 528-32 where it is called $\tau\rho\nu\pi\epsilon\tau\eta\lambda\nu$, suggesting the more elaborate form of the $\kappa\eta\rho\nu\kappa\epsilon\nu$ or caduceus with which he is later portrayed (cf. Allen, Halliday and Sikes ad loc., and Càssola, Inni Omerici 162-3, 540-1). Hermes' popos seems to have combined the functions of a shepherd's staff, a herald's sceptre and a magic wand. Here not only does Hermes put the Greek guards to sleep (445-7), but he also wakes Priam secretly at 679-89. For $i0i\lambda ei$ (Aristarchus' reading) the variant $i0i\lambda g$ (Did/A) is possible in such a generic relative clause, and it is preferred by Hainsworth at Od. 5.48. In inivixiov ros the omega is presumably metri gratia, on the analogy of verbs such as i0pixio etc.: cf. Chantraine, GH 1 365-6.

347-8 The form alouwn the is found only here for alouwn the, which means an umpire in the Phaeacian games at Od. 8.258, and later was used of a ruler or magistrate in various Greek states. alouwn the aloun the reading here, with some of our MSS, the majority having aloun the meaning was variously explained (bT, Eust., and Erbse on 347). Presumably aloun the is a variant spelling of alouwn the name Aloun the is probably a loan-word (LfgrE, Chantraine, Dict. s.v.). Cf. the name Aloun the 'royal', 'princely'. At 397-9 Hermes says that he is a squire of Akhilleus and son of a wealthy Myrmidon. Cf. Od. 13.221-3 where Athene is disguised as a young man, 'soft-skinned, like the sons of kings'.

Verse 348 = Od. 10.279, again of Hermes in disguise as a young man. $\sqrt[1]{}$ $\sqrt[$

349-442 At dusk they stop to water the horses in the river. Hermes approaches and converses with Priam. He tells him that Hektor's body is intact. Priam offers him a cup, which he refuses, but he promises to escort him safely, and takes charge of his chariot

This episode is unusually extended, and the dialogue is more elaborate than on other occasions in the lliad where god and man meet. In its grace and irony it reminds one of similar scenes in the Odyssey and Homeric Hymns, especially the meeting between Odysseus and Athene disguised as a young prince, at Od. 13.321-440; cf. the rôle of Athene in Odyssey 3, and still closer, the escort and assistance of Athene in disguise to Odysseus at 7.14-81 before his supplication of Arete and Alkinoos; and see Richardson on HyDem 98ff., pp. 179-80. It is one of the most delightful scenes in the poem, and yet it is surely not here simply for its own sake. One of its functions is to prepare for the encounter of Priam and Akhilleus, for in the young Myrmidon prince Priam finds someone who treats him as a father (362, 371), and whose kindness and sympathy establish a bond of trust. Hermes' admiration for Hektor, and his account of how the gods have miraculously protected his body, confirm Priam's own trust in divine protection and justice, and (as at 301) his piety is shown by his comments at 374-7 and 425-8. The irony of these remarks, when Priam is speaking to a god, and of his attempt to give Hermes a gift at 429 in accompaniment to his prayer for protection, is typical of such scenes. The whole episode illustrates the Odyssean precept that the gods frequent the society of men in disguise, $\delta v \theta \rho \omega \pi \omega v \delta \rho i v \tau \epsilon$ $\kappa \alpha i \epsilon v \nu \rho i n v \delta \rho i v \tau \epsilon$ (17.487).

349 The tomb of Ilos (cf. 20.230-6) was mentioned as a landmark at 10.415, 11.166, 11.372.

350-1 $\sigma\tau\eta\sigma\alpha\nu\ldots$ in $\tau\sigma\tau\mu\phi$ probably go together: cf. Od. 14.258 $\sigma\tau\eta\sigma\alpha$ δ' in Alyúπτ ϕ ποταμ ϕ viας, and for the river as watering-place cf. Il. 18.521. They presumably stopped at the ford (cf. 692-3), and $\delta\eta$ yàp ... yaïav explains that this was a safe time to stop as it was already dark.

352-7 This is a dramatic moment, as Idaios suddenly catches sight of an unknown man through the gathering darkness. It is brought about by an unusual change from the poet's normal technique, for in other scenes of divine visitation the god's journey is usually followed by the description of his approach to the person concerned, whom he 'finds' engaged in some activity (as at 83, 98, 122-3 etc.). Here the focus has switched from Hermes to the travellers, and it is they whose reactions are described (cf. Edwards, HPI 307). In 353-4 the high frequency of π - and ϕ -words may be deliberate; φάτο φώνησέν τε recurs only at Od. 4.370. In 354-5 Idaios' anxiety is expressed by his rapid sentences with asyndeton; cf. (for example) 16.126-9, and [Longinus] 19 with Russell's comments. Verse 354 means 'Beware, offspring of Dardanus: there is need for a wary mind.' The repetition of φράζεο ... φραδέος is emphatic (cf. also 352 έφράσσατο), as well as being characteristic of such explanatory maxims: cf. 7.282, 11.793, 13.115, 15.203, Hes. Erga 352, 369. In several cases this leads to the use of an unusual epithet or noun, as here: 11.793 παραίφασις, 13.115 άκεσταί, 15.203 στρεπταί, Hes. Erga 369 φειδώ; hence φραδέος, an absolute hapax (although Hesychius has φραδώς), analogous to άρι-/ά-φραδής etc. For Epyov (EOTI) with genitive meaning 'it is a matter for', and hence 'there is a need for' cf. LSJ s.v. Epyov IV I, and the similar development of opus est in Latin.

355 τάχα... όίω: cf. Od. 1.251 τάχα δή με διαρραίσουσι και αυτόν, and Il. 17.727 διαρραΐσαι. bT take it as future passive, but the middle (with άνδρα) is possible.

356 Eq. 1870 means 'on the chariot', leaving the waggon to its fate (bT). ETELTCA means 'as the next best alternative': cf. perhaps 13.743, and Od. 20.63.

357 Cf. 21.65 γούνων άψασθαι, 10.455 άψάμενος λίσσεσθαι etc., and for αι κ' έλεήση see on 301.

360-3 Hermes takes Priam's hand to greet and reassure him, and asks what he is doing in such a dangerous situation. Cf. his similar meeting with the lonely Odysseus at Od. 10.280-2 (278-9 ~ 11. 24.347-8): $\text{Ev} \tau^*$ ápa µ01 ¢ũ xeĩpi Ēπos τ' Ἐφατ' Ἐκ τ' ὀνόµαζε: | "πỹ δὴ αὐτ', ὥ δύστηνε, δι' ἀκριας Ἐρχεαι οΙος, | χώρου ἄιδρις ἑών;" For the gesture of reassurance cf. also Poseidon in disguise at 14.137, Akhilleus at 24.671-2, etc. For ἑpιούνιος see on 20.34. It is usually an epithet but stands on its own also at 440.

362-71 Hermes addresses Priam as $\pi \Delta \tau \tau \rho$ at the beginning, and at the end of his speech (with ring composition) he says that he reminds him of his own father: this is why he will protect him. The emphasis is on the age of Priam and his herald, and the extraordinary risks he is running. Priam responds by calling Hermes $\phi(\lambda \circ \tau t \kappa \circ \varsigma)$ (373; cf. 425 $\Delta \tau t \kappa \circ \varsigma)$, and Hermes later compares his own aged father to Priam (398). In this exchange with the young squire of Akhilleus we have a preview of the relationship between Akhilleus and Priam, who is explicitly compared to Akhilleus' own father. Priam himself has lost all the best of his sons and above all Hektor, and in Hermes he finds the sympathy and reassurance which a son should have given him.

363 Cf. 10.83 = 386 νύκτα δι' όρφναίην, ότε θ' εύδουσι βροτοί άλλοι; νύκτα δι' άμβροσίην 10.41, 10.142 (the night expedition there prompts similar expressions).

365 åvåpoios occurs only here in $II., 5 \times Od.$; duomentes kai åvåpoioi Od. 14.85.

366-7 Verse 366 = 653; for $\theta \circ \eta v \dots \mu \epsilon \lambda \alpha v \alpha v$ cf. 10.394, 10.698. $\delta v \epsilon \alpha \pi \alpha$ in the plural elsewhere always refers to food $(3 \times 11., 13 \times 04.)$, but $\delta v \epsilon \alpha \alpha$ is used of anything beneficial. For $\tau i_5 \dots \epsilon i_\eta$ cf. Virgil, Aen. 4.408 quis tibi tum, Dido, cernenti talia sensus \dots ?

368-9 The variation in the two hemistichs of 368 is elegant. Cf. Od. 16.71-2 auto's use vios elui kal ou nu xepoi nénotba | audo' anau'uaobat, ote ris nootepos xalenting, and Od. 21.132-3; Il. 19.183 audo' anapéogaobat, ote ris nootepos xalenting. Here the infinitive is epexegetic with yépuv, i.e. 'he is too old for self-defence', as at 662-3, etc.

370-1 Failure to understand that oùtév means 'not at all' or 'in no way' has led to the variant oùté' dv $\sigma\epsilon$, and to kokóv in most MSS, with a few reading $\hbar \delta \epsilon$ or $\epsilon l \delta \epsilon$ after it. The compound $\hbar \pi \alpha \lambda \epsilon \epsilon$ occurs only here in ll.: cf. Od. 17.364.

372-7 Priam's reply is full of unconscious irony, since the young man is indeed a divine protector, and $\mu\alpha\kappa\alpha\beta\omega\nu$ has a double sense in 377 as it can be applied to the gods (see also on 397-8). Despite Iris' promise that Hermes will escort him (181-3) Priam apparently fails to realize directly who he is, and yet as often in such cases it is as if he is half-aware of his identity, and when Hermes reveals himself (at 460-1) he shows none of the usual reactions of surprise etc.

373 οὐτω πη τάδε γ' ἐστί... ὡς ἀγορεύεις sounds like a variation of more colloquial answers such as οὐτως, οὐτω γε πως, ἔστι ταῦτα (Pl. Theast. 160A, 165C, Soph. 244D); cf. LSJ s.v. οὐτως ι.

374 Did/A seems to have read $\epsilon I \tau_{15}$, with some of our MSS, but it is hard to see how this can be right. $\epsilon \tau_{1} \dots \kappa_{1} \epsilon_{\mu\epsilon i0}$ stresses Priam's surprise that the gods should indeed show concern for him, after all his sufferings. For $i \pi \epsilon_{\mu} \epsilon_{10} \epsilon_{10}$ of divine protection cf. 5.433 etc.

375-7 όδοιπόρος occurs only here in Homer, but cf. όδοιπόριον Od. 15.506; όδοιπορίη HyHerm 85. αίσιος is also a Homeric hapax (cf. Pindar, N. 9.18, etc., and Homeric έναίσιμος, έξαίσιος, παραίσιος). It surely refers to the fact that 'chance' meetings could be ominous or lucky, and Hermes himself is a god of lucky chances (έρμαῖα), as well as of ways and travellers. Cf. his meeting with Odysseus when he is travelling on his own on Kirke's island (Od. 10.277-306; note 277 ἀντεβόλησεν). In 376-7 bT ingeniously find the three 'goods' of the later philosophical schools: physique, intelligence and good birth. The last, praise of parents as 'blessed' (a form of 'makarismos'), is paralleled at Od. 6.154-5 (cf. T), E. Ion 308, etc. For the second hemistich of 377 cf. 387 etc.

378 = 389, 410, 432.

379-85 The opening verse is traditional but especially apt here, since Priam's words are more true than he realizes. Hermes then suggests two possible reasons for Priam's journey. The first, to take Troy's treasures abroad for safe-keeping, becomes the opening motif of Euripides' Hecuba, where Priam sends his son Poludoros with the gold of Troy to Polumestor of Thrace before the city's fall (Hec. 1-12; cf. bT). For the second, total desertion of Troy, cf. 22.382-3 where Akhilleus sees this as a possibility after Hektor's death. Here too this leads Hermes on to mention Hektor's fall, with a note of admiration and sympathy. With sensitive tact he thus introduces the most important theme of this dialogue.

379 = 1.286, 8.146, and cf. similar answer-formulae elsewhere.

360 = 10.384 etc. The verse occurs twice in book 10 and twice in book 24 (cf. 656), but $13 \times Od$; see on 10.384.

381-2 Cf. 9.330 κειμήλια πολλά και έσθλά |; άνδρας ές άλλοδαπούς, $2 \times Od$.; Od. 13.364 Ινα περ τάδε τοι σόα μίμνη.

383–5 Cf. 22.383 ή καταλείψουσιν πόλιν άκρην τοῦδ πεσόντος. For δειδιότες in runover position followed by an explanatory clause cf. 6.137, 15.628. 21.24. Verses 384–5 delicately introduce Hektor indirectly, 'such a man, the best, has fallen – your son', with σὸς πάις in emphatic position. Cf. 16.521 ἀνήρ δ' ὡριστος ὅλωλε |. οὐ ... 'Αχαιῶν probably means 'for he never failed in battle with the Achaeans'. For μάχης ἐπιδεύεσθαι cf. 13.310, 17.142, 23.670, and for the genitive 'Αχαιῶν with μάχη cf. 11.542. This seems better than 'he did not fall short of the Achaeans in battle' (cf. 23.483).

386-8 Priam's surprise and curiosity prevent him from answering Hermes' questions. For 387 cf. 6.123, 15.247 tis $\delta \hat{\epsilon}$ ov $\hat{\epsilon}$ or i, $\phi \hat{\epsilon}$ plotte, and 377 µakápav δ' E $\hat{\epsilon}$ for tokhav. In 388 the vulgate reading is δs , which would be explanatory here (as at 434 etc.), but the exclamatory $\tilde{\omega}s$ seems more effective. For $\hat{\alpha}\pi\hat{\delta}\tau\mu\omega\nu$ cf. 255 = 493 $\pi\alpha\nu\hat{\alpha}\pi\sigma\tau\mu\omega s$, again spoken by Priam. $\hat{\alpha}\pi\sigma\tau\mu\omega s$ - $\hat{\delta}\tau\alpha\tau\sigma s$ occur 2× Od.

389-404 Hermes' answer is again subtle and courteous. He says that he understands what is really uppermost in Priam's mind, the desire to know what has happened to Hektor's body. This leads him to speak of the Greeks' admiration for his prowess, and thence to answer Priam's actual question about his identity. Finally he explains what he is doing, by reference to the Greeks' preparations for battle: the motive is left a little vague, but the real point is presumably the reminder that the present inactivity is only a temporary lull in the conflict.

390 The first hemistich is repeated at 433. For $\pi\epsilon\iota\rho\bar{q}$ see on 14.198-9, 21.459. The assonance in this verse is notable: $\pi\epsilon\iota\rho\bar{q}$ kuelo, $\gamma\epsilon\rho\sigma\iota\bar{s}$, real electric ... For electric with accusative meaning 'you are asking about' cf. 6.239 etc.

391-3 For 391-2 cf. 6.124 où μ ev yáp not' onwna μ áxy evi kubiavelpy, where 123 resembles 387. The second part of 393 is a variant of the formular $\delta\epsilon\delta\alpha$ iy μ evos -ov offi xax μ .

394 ήμεῖς ... θαυμάζομεν is repeated from 2.320, έσταότες implying 'standing idle' here.

• .

ţ

396 vhus everyths occurs only here in II., $2 \times Od.$, $2 \times Hymns$; cf. everytos ... $\delta(\phi pou \ 2 \times II.$

397-8 Hermes gives his origin and his father's name, this being sufficient to identify one: see on 21.153, and for this formulation cf. Od. 15.267 $\xi\xi$ '186xn5 yévos elul, matho dé uol éotiv 'Odvoreús, where again Telemakhos does not name himself. The name Poluktor recurs in the Odyssey (17.207, 18.299, 22.243), and is suitable for a rich man, -ktup being probably related to ktépos etc.; cf. von Kamptz, Personennamen §21. As at 377 there may be irony, as Hermes himself is the 'giver of good things' (Od. 8.335 etc.). In 398 yépow ... $\delta\delta\epsilon$ stresses the bond of sympathy between this young man and Priam. $\delta\delta\epsilon$ probably picks up $\delta\varsigma$ of mep, 'even so, just as you are'.

399-400 For 'six ... the seventh' cf. 7.247-8. In 400 Aristarchus took row utra together. Leaf objected that utra meaning 'with' rarely takes the genitive in Homer, but it certainly sometimes does (see on 21.458). Hermes implies selective conscription by lot, one brother from each family (T), but this need not have been supposed to be general.

401-4 Presumably Hermes pretends to have come on a reconnoitring expedition (cf. bT), as in book 10, with which this scene has some points of contact. The impatience of the Achaean army in 403-4 is similar to that of the Myrmidons earlier in the poem (16.156-66, 16.200-9), and Hermes seems to suggest that the leaders would like to prolong the spell of quiet but cannot do so. In 403 Leaf follows a handful of MSS in reading of $\gamma \epsilon$, on the grounds that olde 'is merely anaphoric and can have no deictic force', an objection which seems pedantic and hard to understand. For $\frac{1}{2}\sigma\sigma\nu\mu\epsilon\nuous$ molépou cf. 13.315 $\frac{1}{2}\sigma\sigma'\mu\epsilon\nuov$ molépoid, etc.

405-9 Priam now comes to the crucial point, asking Hermes to tell him the whole truth' about his son's body, however awful it may be. In 407 the runover word els is regarded by Leaf as 'intolerably weak for so emphatic a position', but with el µêv ôn it carries weight: 'if in truth you really are'; cf. Denniston, Particles 392, and for other examples of forms of elvai in this position cf. 6.225, 16.515, Od.4.95, 17.159. nãoav áληθείην κατάλεξον belongs to the Odyssean formular group (πãoav) άληθείην καταλέξω/ κατέλεξα (6× Od., 1× HyHerm). In 409 μελεΐστι ταµών is Odyssean: cf. Od. 9.291 μελεΐστι ταµών, 18.339 διά μελεΐστι τάµησιν. Priam's fear that Akhilleus has chopped the body in pieces before giving it to the dogs goes even further than Akhilleus' own threats.

410-23 Hermes' reply amplifies the theme of the miraculous preservation of the corpse, leading up to the emphatic statement that the gods have taken care of Hektor after his death.

411 Cf. 22.335-6 σε μεν κύνες ήδ' οΙωνοί | έλκήσουσ' ... (etc.).

412-13 KEIVOS is probably deictic: 'there he lies', as in 3.391 etc. KEITOI is

۰,

t

picked up by the runover KEIMEVW in 414, and KEITON in 419. OUTWS means 'just as he was'.

413–14 δυωδεκάτη ... κειμένω 'this is the twelfth day that he has been lying there'; see on 31. ήώς is the vulgate reading, with the variants fibe in a few MSS and fibn in one or two. As it is now night Leaf and van Leeuwen object to ήώς, arguing that it has come in through the influence of 1.493 or 21.80. If one reads fibe or fibn the use of δυωδεκάτη as a substantive can be supported by, for example, 1.425, Od. 2.374. But equally these readings could be due to scholarly qualms in antiquity over fiώς, and it may well be used simply to mean 'day': cf. (e.g.) 13.794 etc.

414-15 These verses are paralleled by the description of decay at 19.25-7, and 19.31 which is almost identical with 415.

416-17 Cf. 12-16, where the neutral Μενοιτιάδαο θανόντος is used instead of the more emotive έοῦ ἐτάροιο φίλοιο; and for the first part of 417 cf. 22.465 ἐλκον ἀκηδέστως (see comment). Here, however, the lack of due κῆδος is contrasted with the gods' care for the body (422 κήδονται).

418-23 The divine protection by Aphrodite and Apollo was described at 23.184-91 and 24.18-21. Here it is something to excite wonder $(\theta\eta \circ 10)$: the body's freshness ($tep \sigma \eta \epsilon_1 s$) would accord with the dark cloud spread over it by Apollo to keep off the sun's rays (23.188-91), the 'washing of blood' and closure of wounds with Aphrodite's anointing (23.186-7). The motif of wonder here, together with the recollection at 421 of the many wounds given by the Greeks, echoes the description at 22.369-71 of how the Achaeans wondered ($\theta\eta\eta\sigma\alpha\nu\tau\sigma$) at Hektor's body as they all ran up and stabbed him (cf. T on 24.418 and 421). Cf. the reference at 24.394 to their admiration for him.

418 $\theta\eta\sigma\sigma\sigma$, a contracted form of the second person singular present optative of $\theta\eta\epsilon\sigma\mu\sigma\alpha$ (cf. $\theta\epsilon\sigma\sigma\mu\alpha\alpha$), is the spelling of Aristarchus (Did/T) and some MSS. The majority have $\theta\epsilon\sigma\sigma\alpha$, which presumably comes from confusion with forms such as $\theta\epsilon\sigma\rho\mu\epsilon\nu$ etc. (cf. Monro, HG Appendix C, pp. 384-6). $\alpha\nu\tau\sigma\sigma\epsilon\pi\epsilon\lambda\theta\omega\nu$ is Odyssean (5×); cf. $\alpha\lambda\lambda\sigma\sigma\sigma\sigma\sigma\sigma\epsilon\pi\epsilon\lambda\theta\omega\nu$ etc. in II., usually in a hostile context.

419 Exponences: cf. 757 Eponences, again of Hektor's body. The epithet is applied to $\lambda\omega\tau\delta_5$ at 14.348, just before the description of the divine cloud from which drip shining dewdrops (350–1). In $\pi\epsilon\rho\delta$ alua vévi $\pi\tau\alpha$ the noun is probably an internal accusative ('he is washed of blood'); cf. 16.667, 18.345 etc.

420 $\mu\alpha\rho\delta$ s occurs nowhere else in Homer, and seems to keep its original connexion with $\mu\alpha\ell\nu\omega$ here, meaning 'stained' (with blood etc.). It reappears in Heraclitus (61) and later. $(\sigma\nu\mu)\mu\nu\omega$ is also new, and recurs only at 637 ($\mu\nu\sigma\alpha\nu$); cf. fifth-century tragedy and later poetry and prose. T describes this statement as miraculous ($\pi\alpha\rho\delta\delta\delta\xi\nu\nu$), since wounds made after death would not normally close, and there seems to have been debate over this point going back at least to Aristotle (fr. 167 R.), whom T quotes.

۰.

422-3 This forms the climax of Hermes' speech: divine responsibility is after all vindicated. In this context $\kappa h \delta \sigma r \sigma r$ presumably has a double sense, as at 21.123, 22.465, 24.417. For the form $\epsilon \eta \sigma \sigma$ ('your') see on 15.138. T records that 423 was athetized as unnecessary, and because the use of the pronoun $\sigma \phi r$ here was un-Homeric. The criticisms seem to go back to Aristophanes. The second is untrue, and, as to the first, the verse does in fact add something important: even if the gods could not save Hektor from his fated death, they are still concerned for him as one who was dear to them (cf. 33-8, 66-70, etc.). Priam's answer echoes this and draws the general moral (425-8). Moreover, 422-3 are again echoed by Hekabe in her lament at 749-50, just as 754-9 echo 416-21.

424 ŵs párro, yhonoev dé: cf. 6.212, 17.567, $5 \times Od$., and for the whole verse cf. 200.

425-8 These verses pick up the theme of Zeus's speech at 66-70: again Priam's piety is revealed (see 3011.). Cf. Od. 24.351-2, where old Laertes exclaims that after all the gods do exist on Olumpos, if the suitors have truly paid for their insolence. Both statements are thematically significant, occurring as they do at the end of each poem. $\frac{1}{2}$ valoua dopa recurs in this position in the verse at HyDem 369, of offerings to the gods. διδοῦναι is a unique form, presumably lengthened metri gratia, for διδόναι, the nearest parallel being ζευγνῦμεν (16.145); cf. Chantraine, GHI, 104, 486. It appears to have troubled Aristophanes (Erbse ad loc.), and shocked Eustathius (1357.19ff.). In 426 εl ποτ' ξην γε ('if ever in fact he was') is a formular phrase expressing 'nostalgia and regret at how things have changed' (Kirk on 3.180). Eustathius says that it is 'spoken in a very pathetic and characteristic way, as if such a great man as Hektor never really existed' (περιπαθῶς λεχθέν καl συνήθως, ὡς εl μὴ γέγονἑ ποτε ὁ τοσοῦτος Ἐκτωρ).

In 428 $\tau\omega$ ('therefore') is the vulgate reading, but some MSS have $\tau\omega\nu$ (also, in T as variant), with which one would have to understand the antecedent 'his offerings'; this, however, is rather remote. For $\delta\pi\epsilon\mu\nu\eta\sigma\alpha\nu\tau\sigma$ in this context cf. Hes. Th. 503 of of $\delta\pi\epsilon\mu\nu\eta\sigma\alpha\nu\tau\sigma$ $\chi\delta\rho\nu\nu$ $\epsilon\dot{\nu}\epsilon\rho\gamma\epsilon\sigma i\delta\omega\nu$, Thuc. 1.137.2 $\alpha\dot{\nu}\tau\omega$ $\chi\delta\rho\nu\nu$ $\delta\pi\sigma\rho\mu\nu\eta\sigma\epsilon\sigma\theta\alpha$ $\delta\xi\alpha\nu$, E. Alc. 299 $\sigma\dot{\nu}$ $\nu\dot{\nu}\nu$ $\rho\sigma\nu\tau\delta'$ $\delta\pi\delta\rho\mu\eta\sigma\alpha$ $\chi\delta\rho\nu$. The compound verb occurs only here in Homer. Many MSS read $\epsilon\pi\epsilon\mu\nu\eta\sigma\alpha\nu\tau\sigma$, and forms of this compound occur at 15.662, 17.103, but it is less appropriate here (so Eustathius). The phrase $\kappa\alpha$ $\epsilon\nu$ $\theta\alpha\nu\dot{\alpha}\tau\sigma\delta$ $\pi\epsilon\rho$ $\alpha^{\dagger}\sigma\eta$ recurs at 750, in the similar comment of Hekabe.

429-31 After Priam's pious observation he unconsciously exemplifies what he has said, by offering a drinking-cup to Hermes, and asking in return for protection and safe escort with the favour of the gods, using language typical of prayers. The &Ausov is a two-handled drinking-cup: cf.

11.774, and $6 \times Od.$; for καλον άλεισον cf. Od. 4.591, 22.9. It is sometimes a synonym for δέπας (ἀμφικύπελλον); cf. LfgrE s.v., F. Brommer, Hermes 77 (1942) 356-7, 363-4, G. Bruns, Arch. Hom. Q 43. T (on 433-4) assumes that this is the Thracian cup described at 234-5 as the most precious vessel in the ransom (cf. Eust. 1357.31ff.). For (430) πέμψον ... σύν γε θεοῖσιν cf. 9.49 σύν γὰρ θεῷ εἰλήλουθμεν, etc.

432-9 Hermes ironically again suggests that Priam is 'testing' him, since he cannot accept a gift without Akhilleus' orders. But he promises with great warmth to escort him wherever he wishes to go.

433 This verse echoes 390, again with assonance, and yepoil vew tepoil are artfully juxtaposed. For ouble methons (cf. 219 etc. $(6 \times Il., 1 \times Od.)$).

434 κέλεαι (with synizesis) is a modern editorial spelling (Wolf), for the manuscripts' κέλη (with contraction). Elsewhere in Il. we find κέλεαι (cf.] δ5 κέλεαι at 12.235, 14.96, objecting to a suggestion), whereas in the Odyssey we have [καl με κέλεαι (4.812),] ή με κέλεαι (5.174), πῶς γάρ με κέλεαι (10.337). It hardly matters which spelling we choose here, but for -η see 13.818 with comment, Chantraine, GH 1 57. παρέξ 'Αχιλῆα means 'behind Akhilleus' back', παρέκ having an implication of deception or disregard; cf. 10.391 παρέκ νόον ήγαγε, etc.

435-6 For this mixture of reverence and fear of one's superior cf. 1.331, 3.172, etc. (with Richardson on HyDem 190), and especially Od. 17.188-9, where Eurnaios says of his master Telemakhos άλλά τον αίδέομαι καὶ δείδια, μή μοι ὁπίσσω ¦ νεικείŋ χαλεπαὶ δὲ ἀνάκτων εἰσὶν ὁμοκλαί. For the form συλεύειν (instead of the normal συλᾶν) cf. 5.48.

437-9 For αν... κε cf. 11.187 etc., Chantraine, GH II 345. One papyrus offers σοι μέν here, which Chantraine thinks could be original, but no change seems necessary. The repetition of πομπός ... πομπόν in 437 and 439 is suitable in allusion to Hermes' rôle as divine escort (cf. πομπαῖος, ψυχοπομπός), as at 153, 182, and again at 461. The phrase κλυτόν Άργος occurs only here, and presumably implies 'all the way to my home in Greece', i.e. Pelasgian Argos in Thessaly (cf. 2.681). For ένδυκέως in 438 see on 23.90, and for the combination of 'by ship ... on foot (πεζός)' cf. 9.328-9, Od. 1.171-3 (etc.), 11.58, 11.159, Pind. P. 10.29. Here the phrase acts as a hyperbole: 'or even (if you ask) on foot' (T). Verse 439 means '(if I did so) no one would (dare to) fight with you, thinking lightly of me as your escort'. Cf. 9.55 | οὕ τίς τοι τὸν μῦθον ὀνόσσεται.

440-2 Suiting action to words Hermes at once leaps aboard the chariot, seizes the reins, and inspires the horses and mules with strength. That is all that we hear of the rest of the journey, which is accomplished (one assumes) with the briskness of divine inspiration. Hermes' swiftness is again stressed at 446 ($\check{\alpha}\phi\alpha\rho$), although there it is more remarkable. | $\check{\eta}$ kai $\check{\alpha}v\alpha\imath\xi\alpha\varsigma$ is repeated at 621, of Akhilleus; cf. 1.584 $\check{\omega}\varsigma$ $\check{\alpha}\rho'$ $\check{\epsilon}\phi\eta$ · kai $\check{\alpha}v\alpha\imath\xi\alpha\varsigma$. For 440-1

317

cf. 17.481-2 Άλκιμέδων δὲ βοηθόον ἄρμ' ἐπορούσας | καρπαλίμως μάστιγα και ήνία λάζετο χερσίν; and for 442 cf. 17.456 Ιπποισιν ἐνέπνευσεν μένος ήῦ |.

443-69 When they reach the Achaean wall Hermes puts the guards to sleep and opens the gates. They arrive at Akhilleus' hut, whose structure is described. Hermes opens the great doors, and they enter. He then reveals his true identity, tells Priam to entreat Akhilleus, and departs

443-7 The main clause after άλλ' ὅτε ... comes probably at 445. The guards were described as being in the space between wall and trench at 9.66-7, 9.87, etc. πύργους νεῶν means 'the fortifications of the ships'. For the association of.δόρπα with φυλακτῆρες cf. 9.66 δόρπα τ' ἐφοπλισόμεσθα· φυλακτῆρες δὲ ἕκαστοι | λεξάσθων ... In 445 τοῖσι δ' ἐφ' ὑπνον ἔχευε belongs to an Odyssean group of phrases: ὑπνον ἔχευεν with dative, and variations, occurs $7 \times Od.$, $1 \times HyAphr$. For Hermes' soporific power cf. 343-4. ἅφαρ in 446 stresses again the divine ease with which he accomplishes what Akhilleus says no mortal could easily do (565-7). Cf. for example the infant Hermes' miraculous speed of action at HyHerm 15-23, 43-6, etc. For 446 cf. 21.537 ol δ' ἄνεσάν τε πύλας καὶ ἀπῶσαν ὀχῆας.

448-56 Akhilleus' κλισίη (perhaps we should say 'quarters' rather than 'hut'; the German Lager would be a good equivalent for κλισίη, which is related to khive etc.) was never described in detail earlier in the poem. Here it has become a full-scale dwelling, with thatched roof, a great courtyard, and a heavily bolted door. Later its allowa (644), µéyapov (647), and πρόδομος (673) are mentioned, as in the palaces of the Odyssey, although its thatched roof and fence of stakes suggest its rustic quality (see on 452-3). Such a description of a dwelling-place is common at this stage of an 'arrival scene' (6.240-50, 6.313-17, Od. 5.55-75, 7.81-133, 14.5-22; cf. Arend, Scenen 31-2, 37-8, 42-3, etc.), but it has its own special functions here, the most obvious being to build up the impression of Akhilleus' greatness, as if we saw the scene through the apprehensive eyes of Priam and Idaios (as at 352-60, etc.; cf. the onlooker's reaction of wonder at Od. 5.75, 7.82-3, 7.133). Like other forms of augnois, it prepares for the momentous meeting which is to follow. Akhilleus' own physical strength is shown by the detail of 454-6, as well as Hermes' miraculous aid. Moreover, the scale of Akhilleus' quarters will later enable Hektor's body to be washed and anointed without Priam's seeing it, an important precaution as the poet explains (582-6), and will allow Priam and Idaios to sleep apart from Akhilleus and Briseis, like guests in the Odyssey (673-6).

Thus the aggrandizement of the $\kappa\lambda_1\sigma_1\eta$ (so disturbing to Leaf and the analysts) is a natural consequence of the poet's narrative techniques, although again he comes much closer here to Odyssean patterns than in the rest of the poem.

Copyrighted Material

448 This verse belongs to a formular pattern: 11.618 ol δ' ὅτε δὴ κλισίην Νηληϊάδεω ἀφίκοντο, etc.; cf. also 431.

449 The phrasing resembles 20.146-7 (τεῖχος) ὑψηλόν, τό ῥά οἰ ... | ... ποίεον ...

450-1 A gabled roof is described in the simile at 23.712-13 (see comment) and is presumably meant here, since it is thatched. ἕρεψα | is used of roofing at 1.39 (temple); cf. Od. 23.193 (Odysseus' bedroom) εὖ καθύπερθεν ἕρεψα. Verse 451 means '(they roofed it) with shaggy thatch, reaped from the meadows'. It is a particularly euphonious four-word verse, with strong assonance of liquids and nasals, and a spondaic ending. The ancient commentators claim that ὄροφος signifies a type of straw, a view supported by either Aristotle or Theophrastus (Pollux 10.170 = Arist. fr. 268 R.). As Leaf pointed out, the English 'thatch' actually means 'roof' (cf. German 'Dach'), and so the interchange of sense would be natural. Apart from this Homeric use and the Aristotelian fragment, the form ὄροφος occurs nowhere else, and this might support a specialized sense. ὀροφή, a later word for 'roof', is used at Od. 22.298. Theocritus imitates λειμωνόθεν (Id. 7.80), Apollonius ἀμήσαντες (1.688); cf. Call. Hy. 3.164 ἑκ λειμῶνος ἀμησάμεναι.

452-3 The courtyard is surrounded by a close fence of stakes: cf. Eumaios' farmstead at Od. 14.11-12 σταυρούς δ' έκτος έλασσε διαμπερές ένθα καὶ ένθα, | πυκνούς καὶ θαμέας. σταυρός occurs nowhere else in Homer (cf. Hdt. 5.16, etc.), the usual word being σκόλοψ.

453-6 The door is held by a single great beam, called $\frac{1}{2}\pi i\beta\lambda\eta\varsigma$ (cf. $\frac{1}{2}\pi i\beta\dot{\alpha}\lambda\epsilon i\nu$), and at 455 μεγάλην κληίδα. $\frac{1}{2}\pi i\beta\lambda\eta\varsigma$, a Homeric hapax, occurs rarely later (Lysias, inscriptions, epigrams). $\frac{1}{2}\pi i\rho\eta\sigma\sigma\epsilon i\nu$ recurs only at 456 (cf. 18.571 $\dot{\rho}\eta\sigma\sigma\sigma\nu\tau\epsilon\varsigma$) and is the Ionic form of $\frac{1}{2}\pi i\rho\rho\dot{\alpha}\sigma\sigma\epsilon i\nu$ (S. OT 1244 $\pi\dot{\nu}\lambda\alpha\varsigma \dots \frac{1}{2}\pi i\rho\rho\dot{\alpha}\varsigma\sigma'$ $\frac{1}{2}\sigma\omega$, etc.), meaning 'slam shut' here. The contrast between Akhilleus' strength and that of others is a motif which occurred at 16.140-2, 17.76-8, 19.387-9 (his spear), and cf. 5.302-4, 11.636-7 (with comment), for similar comparisons.

457-9 The innovative contracted form $\tilde{\psi}\xi\epsilon$ occurs only here in Homer: cf. 446 $\tilde{\omega}i\xi\epsilon$, etc. Verse 458 is a variant form of 447, and 459 resembles 3.265, 8.492 $\xi\xi I \pi \pi \omega v (\delta') \Delta \pi \sigma \beta \Delta v \tau \epsilon \xi \pi \lambda \chi \delta \delta v \alpha$.

460-7 Hermes reveals his identity just before his departure, and instructs Priam how to approach Akhilleus. As Aristarchus observed (Arn/A 2.791), the moment of a god's departure was one of the most usual occasions for self-revelation: cf. 13.71-2, 21.7-13, Od. 1.319-20, 3.371-9, and see Richardson on HyDem 188-90 (p. 208), 275ff. (p. 252). For the typical language of this revelation see on HyDem 256-74, 268, and cf. especially here Od. 19.548-9 (the eagle in Penelope's dream) tyù ốt roi altros ốpuis | $\eta \alpha$ mápos, vũv aữre reòs móois tlà η λουθα. In such cases 'I have come' often implies 'to your aid'. The runover word 'Eputias in 461 is emphatic here. The rest of 461 recalls Zeus's promise (153, 182).

462-70 For eloqual ('I shall hasten') see on 21.334-5. elocuat occurs only here in Il., $4 \times Od$. In verses 463-4 veueoontov ... avtrav is usually taken to mean 'it would be offensive for mortals to entertain an immortal god in this way face to face'. Apart from 16.192 auparadouevos, araddeevos, Odyssean (5×, once in active, otherwise middle), meaning 'to greet', 'to show affection to'. It would also be possible to take it as 'for an immortal god thus to greet mortals face to face'. In the lliad, only the remote Ethiopians have the privilege of giving hospitality to the gods in their true form, but in the Odyssey the Phaeacians can also do so (7.201-6). In the past, however, the gods came in person to the wedding-feast of Peleus and Thetis (Il. 24.62-3).

465-7 Hermes ends by advising Priam on how to supplicate Akhilleus. The form is traditional: for clasping the knees, and invoking the family of the supplicated person, see on 22.338. Akhilleus' only son Neoptolemos was mentioned by him together with his father Peleus at 19.326-37 (see comments); cf. Od. 11.492-540. In fact Priam will not only clasp his knees but also kiss his hands, a gesture which adds a new dimension to this act of suppliancy (478-9, 505-6), and he will invoke only his father Peleus, in such a way as to link his own fate to that of Akhilleus' father (486-506).

468-9 $\varpi_5 \ldots \&m$ $\beta\eta$ is a traditional formula for departure (cf. 6.116 etc.), and the whole sentence is echoed at 694. The usual account of human reactions to a divine self-revelation or epiphany (see on HyDem 188-90, 275ff.) is here omitted, because it would detract from the main focus on Priam's approach to Akhilleus. In any case, Priam had already been told by Iris that Hermes would help him.

469-691 Priam's visit to Akhilleus

In general structure the whole of this episode corresponds to the schema of 'Visit' scenes, as described by Arend (Scenen 34-53, and on 322-691 see pp. 37-9). Normally in the lliad the visitor enters and finds the host and his companions engaged in some activity. He is seen, and the reaction of those inside is sometimes described. He is then welcomed, offered a seat, and usually invited to share in a meal. After these preliminaries conversation at last begins. Finally, a bed is sometimes prepared for the guest for the night.

Many of the main motifs of this typical structure are present here, but the nature of the situation gives rise to a series of significant variations, and the extensive dialogue sections create a different narrative technique from that of other visit scenes in the lliad (cf. Arend, Scenen 38-9). Thus Priam is unseen until he reaches Akhilleus. It is he who speaks first, in supplication. The offer of a seat (522) comes in Akhilleus' reply, but this leads to his long consolatory reflection on human misfortunes. Priam's refusal of this offer, because of his anxiety to complete his task (552-8), stirs Akhilleus' dormant anger and nearly destroys the precarious balance of sympathy just created between them (559-70). Priam then obeys (571). The traditional schema is interrupted by the series of actions through which the actual ransoming is effected (572-95), including the washing of Hektor's body, itself a feature of a Visit scene (see on 587-90). There follows Akhilleus' invitation to Priam to share in a meal, extended by the paradeigmatic story of Niobe (596-620). The meal is prepared and they eat together (621-7), but afterwards no further dialogue is reported. Instead, they simply gaze in wonder at each other (628-32), although in 632 kci $\mu \bar{\nu} \theta \sigma \nu$ dixov $\omega \nu$ suggests that Priam speaks. Finally Priam requests that he may be allowed to go to bed, and preparations are made for this, but with special precautions in case his presence is detected by the other Greek leaders, and there is further discussion of the truce for Hektor's funeral (633-72). They sleep: but Priam is soon woken by Hermes, who escorts him out of the Greek camp (673-91).

Within the Iliad the visit of the ambassadors to Akhilleus in book 9 (182-668) is the nearest parallel, and its differences are interesting. They find him playing the lyre and singing $\kappa\lambda t\alpha \, \dot{\alpha} \nu \delta \rho \tilde{\omega} \nu$, accompanied only by Patroklos, who sits in silence. They enter, and Akhilleus leaps up in astonishment (193 $\tau \alpha \phi \dot{\omega} \nu$). They are welcomed and seated, and food and drink is served. There follows the dialogue (222-655), after which they leave, except Phoinix who stays and sleeps in Akhilleus' quarters (656-68).

Still closer, however, is the description in the Odyssey of Odysseus' arrival at the palace of Alkinoos, and his reception there as a suppliant (Od. 7.14ff.; cf. Arend Scenen 42-4). Odysseus is escorted by the disguised Athene as far as the palace, and advised by her to supplicate Arete. Athene has cast over him a cloud of invisibility as he goes on his way. At his approach to the palace he stops and wonders at it, and it is described at length. Then he enters and finds the Phaeacians pouring their last libation of the day. He is still invisible until he reaches Arete. He clasps her knees, and the cloud disperses. All in the palace are silent in amazement. He makes his supplication, which is followed by a stunned silence, and sits down at the hearth. At length the process of receiving him begins to get under way. Alkinoos takes him by the hand, raises him and seats him on a chair, and from then on the normal courtesies reassert themselves to a large extent. The general tone of the Odyssean scenes is quite different, but the points of comparison are striking.

469-84 Priam enters the house, leaving Idaios outside, and finds Akhilleus who has just finished eating. Unnoticed by him or his companions he approaches, clasps his knees and kisses his hands. Akhilleus and the companions are struck with amazement 469-76 The narrative is rapid here with a very unusual run of six sentences with enjambment and sentence breaks in mid-verse, a type defined as 'skewed sentences' by Higble, Measure and Music 77, 112-20.

469-72 For 469 cf. 5.111 etc. ἀφ'/έξ Ιππων ἄλτο χαμᾶζε |.

472-6 Akhilleus sits alone, with his companions a little apart (at a distance which respects his state of mind), except his two squires Automedon and Alkimos, who are busy attending him. He has just finished eating and the table is still beside him. In book 9 it was Patroklos who sat with him while he sang, and it used to be he who served his meals (9.186-91, 201-20, 19.315-18), and at 572-5 we shall be reminded that they have taken the place of Patroklos after his death as Akhilleus' comrades. Akhilleus has broken his fast as Thetis urged him to do (128-30), and as we shall soon hear that Priam has not eaten since Hektor's death (641-2), and both share a meal together (621-7), the poet's mention of this particular detail must be significant. It suggests that Akhilleus' mood is quieter and more normal (cf. Deichgräber, Letzte Gesang 64, Macleod on 472-6, Nagler, Spontaneity 186-7). It may also add to the sense of Akhilleus as the lordly figure (Ail $105 in 472 perhaps suggests his majesty) who is in control of the situation, as he dines among his retainers, like Alkinoos and the Phaeacians who have just dined when Odysseus arrives (Od. 7.136-8, 188), or Menelaos who is giving a wedding-feast when Telemakhos comes to Sparta (4.1-19): cf. Edwards, HPI 308-9.

474 For Automedon see 9.209 etc., and for Alkimos (the short form of Alkimedon, to avoid the verbal jingle with the first name) cf. 16.197 etc. The two recur together at 574, 19.392.

475-6 Cf. Od. 5.196-7 THEN TAPA TRADA TRADA VERSENTIAL FORENTIAL TIMENT, and EFFECT IN THE SECOND SECOND

477-9 Ilplauos utyas occurs only here. At this momentous point it is appropriate to speak of 'mighty Priam' entering unseen, and it helps to prepare for the shock of surprise when he is suddenly seen, present in all his greatness.

At 8.371 Athene says that Thetis 'kissed Zeus' knees and took hold of his chin with her hand' (which is more than she is actually said to do at 1.500-2 and 1.512-13, where she just clasps his knees); cf. Od. 14.279, where Odysseus in a false tale supplicates the king of Egypt by kissing his knees. Only here in Homer does a suppliant kiss the hands, a gesture which is a sign of affection and welcome at Od. 21.225, 22.499-500, and especially 24.398. The next verse spells out the awful significance of this action. Verse 479 is a 'tricolon crescendo'. with heavy opening spondaic word ($\delta \varepsilon v \delta c$), followed by the more explicit $\delta v \delta \rho \circ \phi \delta v \circ c$, which in turn is 'glossed' by the still more precise relative clause of ol $\pi o\lambda ko_3 \kappa \tau dvov vlos$ (cf. 16.261n. for such glosses on compound words). $\chi \epsilon \tilde{p} \rho s \ldots dv \delta \rho o \phi vovs$ was used at 18.317, 23.18 of Akhilleus placing his hands on the breast of the dead Patroklos. Otherwise the epithet is nearly always (e.g. 509) applied in the genitive to Hektor (11×; 2× with Lukourgos and Ares). Here, in the context of the death of Priam's sons, this creates a strange reverberation, perhaps similar to the reversal of rôles in the following simile. These verses are echoed by Priam himself at 505-6, underlining still further the significance of his action. Supplication by touching or clasping someone's hands seems to be rare in later literature; cf. E. Hec. 273-6, 342-5. In the case of Priam, his action in kissing the hands of Akhilleus, the killer of his sons, perhaps 'defuses' their power to harm. The scene is portrayed on a fine silver bowl of the Augustan period, found in Denmark: LIMC 1. 1, p. 154, no. 687.

480-4 This must be the most dramatic moment in the whole of the Iliad, and its character is marked by a simile which is extremely individual. The effect of 477-9, followed by the elaboration of 480-4, is rather like that of a flash of lightning from a sky heavy with black clouds, followed by the long rumble of thunder. The simile concerns a homicide who goes into exile and seeks refuge in the house of a rich man, in the hope presumably of becoming his retainer: for this theme see on 23.85-90. The arn which has seized him could refer both to the circumstances which led him to kill and to the disastrous consequences of the act: he has become a man 'under a cloud' of disaster. It is this which (partly at least) causes the shock of surprise to those into whose house he enters when he appears in the doorway. As J. Gould remarks (7HS 93 (1973), 96 n. 111), this may not be so far from the later idea of pollution for bloodshed. It cannot, surely, be simply the unexpected suddenness of a stranger's appearance which is the point of comparison with Priam's entry and actions (cf. bT, although they also thought that the homicide was seeking purification; Macleod on 480-4: 'the bystanders are amazed simply at the unexpectedness of the arrival'; Parker, Miasma 135 n. 124: 'no more than surprise and curiosity'). But the way in which the simile is introduced suggests that there is more to it than that.

The aspect of the comparison which has most impressed modern readers is the reversal of rôles (already noted by Eustathius). In the narrative it is the supplicated man who is the killer, and the suppliant who is the rich man. Moreover, Priam is in his own homeland, whereas Akhilleus is a hostile invader. But the emotional charge involved in both situations is similar, and the poet has chosen an event, doubtless common in his own time, which would suggest to his audience more directly the intensity of the moment in the narrative. Cf. also Moulton, Similes 114–16.

480 άτη πυκινή implies that άτη has got a tight grip on the man.

482 The view that the homicide seeks purification led T to say that 'this may be an anachronism', i.e. something reflecting the poet's own times which occurs in a simile but not in the narrative, and on 11.690 T notes that purification for homicide does not occur in Homeric society.

482-4 This is a variation on the common reaction of surprise at an unexpected visitor in such scenes: cf. 9.193, 11.777 ταφών δ' άνόρουσεν 'Αχιλλεύς; Od. 7.144-5 (silent amazement of the Phaeacians in the parallel suppliant scene), 10.63 ol δ' άνά θυμόν έθάμβεον (Aiolos and family at Odysseus' second visit), 16.12-14 ταφών δ' άνόρουσε συβώτης (who drops the vessels he is holding). θάμβος denotes a strong reaction (cf. 23.815n.), and this is emphasized by the repetition θάμβος ... θάμβησεν ... θάμβησαν, rounded off by ές άλλήλους δὲ Ιδοντο. Cf. Keats:

Or like stout Cortez when with eagle eyes He stared at the Pacific – and all his men Look'd at each other with a wild surmise...

In 483 Πρίαμον θεοειδέα is more than just formular, and is in fact the only case of this phrase in the accusative (with synizesis; cf. 'Αλέξανδρον θεοειδέα). It is not just Priam's presence, but his godlike character, that impresses Akhilleus. See on 217, and on 472 (Δι φίλος), 477 (Πρίαμος μέγας).

485-512 Priam supplicates Akhilleus. They both weep

486-506 Nam epilogus quidem quis unquam poterit illis Priami rogantis Achillem precibus aequari? (Quintilian 10.1.50; he may really be thinking here of the whole of the last Book, as the poem's epilogue; see also on 776).

Priam's entreaty is based on the comparison of himself to Akhilleus' father, establishing a bond of sympathy between them. He begins and ends with this theme (486-9, 503-4), and in both cases this leads to the reflection that Priam is even more deserving of pity than Peleus (490-4, 504-6). In the first part Priam's exceptional misfortune is developed by the theme of the loss of so many of his children, by contrast to the survival of Peleus' only one, and this culminates in the reference to the death of the 'only' child who defended Troy, Hektor (493-501). After this emotional climax comes the reason for his journey, mentioned as briefly as possible (501-2). On the overall ring-structure see Lohmann, Reden 121-2, and on this theme of father-son relationships elsewhere in the poem see vol. v, p. 10.

486 The opening is very abrupt and direct, with no preamble. The vulgate reading oxio was supported by Zenodotus, ooio being that of Aristarchus and a group of MSS. The possessive adjective ooio is what is wanted. As with $\theta \cos \delta \cos \sin 483$, $\theta \cos 5 \sin \delta \sin 283$ surely has point: 'in calling him dear to the gods and godlike he averts the risk of dishonouring a suppliant', say bT, comparing Od. 5.447-8 on divine respect for $\xi \sin 0$.

487 τήλικος occurs only here in Il., $1 \times Od$. The phrase $t\pi l \gamma$ ήραος οὐδῷ was used once before in the poem, again by Priam of himself in an appeal for pity: see on 22.60, and cf. 515-16n.

488-9 περιναιέτης occurs only here and then in A.R. 4.470; cf. περιναιετάειν (4× Od.) and περικτίονες. άμφις έόντες perhaps glosses the epithet, as in 479; cf. Od. 2.65-6 περικτίονας άνθρώπους | of περιναιετάουσι. άμφις seems here to mean 'around', whereas elsewhere in Homer it means 'on either side'. Priam assumes that Peleus is harassed by those around him, just as he himself is harassed by the Greeks (e.g. cf. 6.255-6 πείρουσι of the Achaeans attacking the Trojans). Akhilleus is already anxious for his father at 19.334-7. In Od. 11.494-505 Akhilleus' ghost is eager to hear whether Peleus has lost his kingdom, but Odysseus cannot tell him. Later legends filled in the story with accounts of how he was dispossessed by Akastos or his sons: cf. E. Tro. 1126-8 with scholia, Sophocles' Peleus, TGF IV, ed. Radt, pp. 390-2, Soph. Fragments ed. Pearson, II, pp. 140-3, Apollodorus, Epit. 6.13, etc.

490-2 Peleus' one consolation is the news that his son is alive and hope for his return, although there is an underlying irony here, for we have been told so often that they will not meet again. For $\frac{1}{2}\pi i \tau^2 \frac{1}{2}\lambda\pi \epsilon \tau \alpha i \ldots$ | δψεσθαι cf. HyDem 35-6 $\frac{1}{2}\pi i \delta^2$ ήλπετο μητέρα κεδνήν | δψεσθαι. The form Τροίηθεν occurs only here in II., 6× Od.; 3× (άπδ) Τροίηθεν Ιόντα (etc.). It is natural that it should occur more often in the Odyssey. Some MSS and one papyrus read άπό Τροίηθε(ν) μολόντα, but -θεν is regular in such case-forms.

493-4 = 255-6 (with $\ddot{\omega} \mu \omega \epsilon \dot{\nu} \dot{\omega} \ldots$). There, however, Priam was contrasting the sons who survived with those who were lost, but here he thinks only of the dead, and goes on to elaborate in more detail their number and parentage.

495-7 For Priam's fifty sons cf. 6.242-6. 'It is the custom for foreign kings to have children from several women', say bT, and it is fairly clear that Homer is depicting Priam as a polygamous ruler, in contrast to Greek custom (cf. Hall, Barbarian 42-3). bT list as known wives, besides Hekabe (mother of nineteen according to 496), Arisbe daughter of Merops, Alexiroe daughter of Antandros, and Altes' daughter Laothoe. The first two do not occur in Homer, but the last was mentioned at 21.84-5, 22.46-8, as mother of Lukaon and Poludoros. At 8.302-5 we also hear of Kastianeira, mother of Gorguthion. Of Priam's fifty sons, twenty-two are mentioned in the Iliad. Two (Mestor and Troilos) died earlier in the war (257), eleven are killed in the course of the poem, and the remaining nine are named at 249-51. If we exclude the three children said to be from other wives (Lukaon, Poludoros and Gorguthion) we are left with nineteen, and so it is possible that all the nineteen sons of Hekabe are mentioned by the poet in the course of his narrative, although only five are explicitly said to be hers (Hektor, Paris, Antiphos, Deiphobos, Polites). For more complete lists cf. Apollod. 3.12.5; M. C. van der Kolf, RE s.v. Priamos, XXII, 1845-7. See also her article in Mnemosyne 7 (1954) 9-11 for reflections on the political background to Priam's marriages.

498-501 Priam contrasts the many whom furious Ares has destroyed with the 'only' son whom Akhilleus has just killed, Hektor. The name is postponed and stressed by its position, as at 742, 22.426, etc. On 498 the b scholia comment that 'in fear he does not say "you (killed)", in order not to anger him' (cf. 520-1, 22.423), and it is true that elsewhere the subject of yoúvar' Eluar is always a specific hero. But the rhetorical effect of climax is an important factor here. Leaf objected to 498 that it was a weak and unnecessary line, and that the rhythm was 'unusually bad and un-Epic'. But the rhythm of the first part of 498 actually recurs at 500:

Really, however, $\tau \tilde{\omega} \nu \mu \epsilon \nu \pi \sigma \lambda \tilde{\omega} \nu$ should be treated as a single metrical unit:

This is unusual, but not impossible.

Of 499 bT say that it is a form of hendiadys, meaning 'he who was the only one to protect the city', which may be right (cf. 6.403 olos γàp ἐρύετο 'lλιον Έκτωρ, and 22.507). But olos does have the implication of 'the only son who really counted at all'. ἄστυ καὶ αὐτούς means 'the city and its inhabitants'; cf. 14.47 νῆας ... καὶ αὐτούς, Od. 9.40 πόλιν ἔπραθον, ὥλεσα δ' αὐτούς. This is the vulgate reading. The variant καὶ αὐτός would mean 'by himself', but after olos this would hardly be necessary. In 500 πρώην means 'lately' as at 5.832; cf. 2.303(n.). ἀμυνόμενον περί πάτρης appropriately recalls Hektor's own exhortations at 12.243, 15.496.

501-2 'He does not go into detail about the gifts: for this would have destroyed the pathos' (T on 504). Verse 502 resembles 1.13 = 372 $\lambda u \sigma \delta \mu \epsilon v \delta \varsigma$ TE $\theta \omega \gamma \alpha \tau \rho \alpha \phi \epsilon \rho \omega \nu \tau' \delta \pi \epsilon \rho \epsilon \delta \sigma' \alpha \sigma \sigma \sigma$, of Khruses' supplication of the Greeks and Agamemnon, a significant echo in view of the analogies between the opening and close of the poem: cf. Reinhardt, IuD 63-8, Macleod, Iliad XXIV 33-4, and see Introduction, 'Structure'.

503-6 The conclusion echoes the opening (486-94; cf. bT 504), but with new developments, the appeal to reverence the gods and show pity to Priam, and the culminating reference to his unique act of kissing the hands of his son's killer. For 503 cf. 21.74 où dé µ' aldeo, kal µ' èlénoov, 22.82 (with comments), and Od. 9.269 άλλ' αίδειο, φέριστε, θεούς (mentioned by A as a variant reading). In view of 478-9, 506 ought to mean 'to stretch the hands (xeipe) of my son's killer towards my mouth'. This is an unusual sense of optytotal, which elsewhere means 'to reach out (one's own hands) for something', but the middle can surely also mean 'to reach to myself' as here. The alternative, favoured by Leaf, is to translate 'to reach with my hand (xeipi) to the mouth (etc.)', i.e. to touch his mouth or chin as a suppliant, the gesture described at 1.501-2 etc. This is what Priam does on a sixth-century B.C. relief inspired by this scene (Johansen, Iliad in Early Greek Art 49-51; cf. LIMC 1.1, p. 148, no. 642). Eustathius (1360.56ff.) seems to have read xeipos opteoi, and to have taken this as referring to Priam stretching out his hands to Akhilleus' chin. This version would give a less complex word-order, with avopos παιδοφόνοιο ποτί στόμα going together, whereas with the first version there is an interlacing effect, but this can be explained by the need to give prominence to avapos manaopovoio. The epithet occurs only here in early literature (cf. Hdt. 7.190, Euripides, etc.), and echoes 479.

507 = Od. 4.113 (Telemakhos weeps when Menelaos speaks of his father). On the difference in tone of the two scenes cf. Reinhardt, IuD 493-4(echoed by Griffin, HLD 67-9).

508 Akhilleus takes Priam by the hand, a gesture of acceptance, but instead of raising him at once from his suppliant position and seating him (cf. 515, 522), he gently pushes him away, overcome by emotion, and the storm of grief breaks. For the normal sequence denoting acceptance of the suppliant cf. Od. 7.159-71, Thuc. 1.137.1. The emotional tension or conflict is shown by Akhilleus' gesture of pushing Priam away, which would normally imply rejection (cf. 6.62-3 δ δ' $\delta\pi\delta$ 1000 $\delta\sigma\sigma\tau\sigma$ $\chi mpl |$ $\eta\rho\omega'$ 'Aδρηστον), but here is qualified by $\eta\kappa\alpha$ ('gently'). The sequence is wonderfully natural and powerfully effective. Cf. J. Gould, JHS 93 (1973) 78-80.

509-12 từ bề µvŋơaµ vw picks up µvŋơáµɛvoş in 504 (cf. 486), but Priam's speech has recalled to both their causes for grief, and in Akhilleus' case not just his father but also Patroklos. Cf. the effects of the laments for Patroklos in book 19 (301-2, 338-9): in the second of these it is the mention of Akhilleus' family left at home which stirs memories in his audience. Likewise in the Odyssey (4.183-202) Menelaos' regret for Odysseus' absence leads all who are present to weep, as they remember those whom they have lost. The sentence-structure từ $\delta k \dots \delta \mu k \dots \alpha v t d p$ 'Axi $\lambda k v j$ resembles 7.306-7, 12.400-4, Od. 8.360-2. In 510 Priam's self-abasement is clearly described: he is 'crouched' or 'curled up' ($k \lambda v \partial k j$) before Akhilleus' feet. This may be a further aspect of his suppliancy (cf. 22.220-1, and Gould, JHS 93 (1973) 94-5), but it surely also depicts his abject sense of grief, as at 162-5, 22.414.

513-51 Akhilleus then raises Priam to his feet and addresses him. He asks him to sit down, and offers him consolation, reflecting on the nature of human misfortune, and comparing Priam's fate with that of Peleus

513-14 For 513 cf. 23.10 autop Enel K' doooio тетарпώμεσθα ydolo, 23.98. Chrysippus (quoted by Galen, De plac. Hipp. 4.7.26 ed. P. de Lacy) read the alternative verse $d\lambda\lambda'$ dte dt kalwv te κυλινδόμενds te κορέσθη which is derived from Od. 4.541, 10.499. For 514 cf. Od. 6.140 θάρσος Evi φρεσi θῆκε καi Ex δέος είλετο yulwv. The verse was athetized (Arn/A) as unnecessary, and because of Aristarchus' view that yuïa referred only to the hands and feet, not to all the limbs, and so was out of place here; see on 23.627, but contrast bT on 3.34, who disagree. Passages such as Od. 10.361-3, 18.236-42 suggest that yuïa can have a wider sense (cf. LfgrE s.v.), and in Homer it is quite natural for the desire for tears to be seen as something physical, which affects the body as a whole: cf. Eust. 1362.12ff., and R. B. Onians, The Origins of European Thought (2nd edn., Cambridge 1954) 79.

515-16 Cf. Od. 7.168-9 (Alkinoos) χειρός έλών 'Οδυσῆα ... | ὤρσεν ... και έπι θρόνου είσε φαεινοῦ. Verse 516 echoes 22.74, in Priam's appeal to Hektor (cf. 487n.), and at last fulfils the hope of 22.418-20.

518-51 Akhilleus' speech answers and to some extent mirrors the structure of Priam's (cf. Lohmann, Reden 121-4). He begins by echoing and sympathizing with Priam's description of his misfortunes (518-21, 493-501). The ring-form is signalled by the repetition of ανσχεο σòν κατά θυμόν (518) in avoxeo ... obv kard bupov at the end (549), although the verb is aorist indicative in the first place, imperative in the second; and the theme of 522-4 is picked up at 550-1 ('there is no use in grieving'). Verses 525-33 are a general gnomic section (the jars of Zeus), illustrating the moral that all men have a certain share of miseries, and some are even worse off because they have unmixed troubles, rather than a mixture of good and ill. This is illustrated by the cases of Peleus and Priam (534-48), which are compared as in Priam's speech. But whereas Priam had seen his own fate as worst of all (493 mavámotµos), Akhilleus shows how both old men have had a mixture of blessings and sorrows, and Priam's reference to Akhilleus as the son who can still give Peleus joy (490-2) is answered by the description of himself as manacipion (540), a unique coinage which echoes and contrasts with Priam's πανάποτμος. Verses 538-40 pick up and answer 493-501: Priam's lost sons, and his 'only' son Hektor, are echoed by Peleus' failure to have sons who will succeed, and the doom of his only son Akhilleus. The structure of this whole section (534-48) resembles that of 488-502, since both speakers begin with Peleus, then move on to Akhilleus, and then make the comparison with Priam. But Akhilleus' reply is more general and reflective. In its use of gnomai, allegory and paradeigmata it resembles that of his tutor Phoinix (9.434-605; cf. Deichgräber, Letzte Gesang 69).

The speech is consolatory and foreshadows the themes of later consolationes, which express sympathy but correct the tendency to excessive grief, by pointing out that weeping has no practical use, suffering is common to all, others have endured worse, or that the person consoled has himself had worse to suffer before. Cf. R. Kassel, Untersuchungen zur griechischen und römischen Konsolationsliteratur (Munich 1958) 49-103, and Nisbet and Hubbard on Hor. Odes 1.24. The Consolatio ad Apollonium quotes 522-33 as an example of Homer's particular skill in this genre (Plutarch, Mor. 105 C-D). The emphasis on endurance, as man's response to the divine gift of troubles, is standard in later literature: see on 49 and HyDem 147-8. In the Iliad it occurs in Dione's consolation of Aphrodite at 5.382-402, where by a paradoxical reversal it is applied to divine endurance of troubles inflicted by giants or mortals.

518 & δείλ' is often used at the opening of a speech of pity; cf. 17.201, 17.443 etc., and especially Od. 11.618 (Herakles' ghost to Odysseus) & δείλ', ή τινά και σύ κακῶν μόρον ήγηλάζεις.

519-21 These lines echo Hekabe's at 203-5 ($\pi \omega_5$ totals), where see comment. Verses 520-1 also pick up Priam's reference to his sons (493-501), but Akhilleus is more explicit in taking responsibility for their deaths.

522-3 The formal invitation to the suppliant visitor to sit down, postponed to this late point, is here joined to the justification that they must lay their sorrow aside. Likewise Peisistratos is embarrassed at his tears, and Menelaos says flueis de klaududu uev easour (Od. 4.193-5, 4.212). For dlyea ... Easour cf. 18.112 = 19.65 (Akhilleus) dlla ta uev mpotertixea tasour dxvuevol mep. Ev ound katario an eans 'to lie undisturbed in our hearts'; cf. 527, of the jars 'stored' in Zeus's floor.

524 Both the word πρῆξις and this form of the sentiment are Odyssean: πρῆξις 6x; cf. Od. 10.202 = 568 ἀλλ' οὐ γάρ τις πρῆξις ἐγίγνετο μυρομένοισιν. Here cf. also 550, echoing 524, and 1.562 πρῆξαι δ' ἔμπης οῦ τι δυνήσεαι. Herakles' words imitate Akhilleus in his reply to Meleager's ghost at Bacchyl. 5.162-4 ἀλλ' οὐ γάρ τίς ἐστιν | πρᾶξις τάδε μυρομένοις, | χρή κεῖνο λέγειν δτι καὶ μέλλει τελεῖν (cf. Maehler's comments on the relationship of this to the Iliad scene, and on the other parallels). A and T have οὐ γάρ τίς τ' ἄνυσις as a variant. κρυεροῖο γόοιο recurs at Od. 4.103, 11.212; cf. Il. 13.48 κρυεροῖο φόβοιο |. Od. 4.100-4 possibly echo Il. 24.522-4: cf. Reinhardt, IuD 494-5. For the theme as a later commonplace cf. Nisbet and Hubbard on Hor. Odes 1.24.13.

329

525-6 If we read $\dot{\omega}_5$ the construction is suspended during the long passage on the jars of Zeus (527-33), and the apodosis comes with the example of Peleus at 534. It seems better, however, to follow Leaf and read $\dot{\omega}_5$ in 525, with 526 explaining the previous verse: 'for in such a way have the gods spun (destiny) for wretched mortals, that they should live in sorrow; but they themselves are free of care'. The verb $\dot{\epsilon}\pi$ in $\lambda\dot{\omega}\theta\epsilon$ iv occurs only here in II, but 7× Od., and always of a god or gods allotting destiny. For this idea, however, of the spun thread of fate see on 209-10, and cf. Od. 7.197 where the Fates are called $K\lambda\bar{\omega}\theta\epsilon$ 5. In 526 $\dot{\alpha}\chi\nu\nu\mu\epsilon\nu$ 55 is the vulgate reading, but $\dot{\alpha}\chi\nu\nu\mu\epsilon\nu$ 55 is well-attested, and as this is a normal Homeric construction it is probably correct; cf. 145-8, 6.207-8, etc. $\dot{\alpha}\kappa\eta\delta\epsilon\epsilon$ 5 is contrasted with $\dot{\alpha}\chi\nu\nu\mu\epsilon\nu\sigma$ 5. The epithet usually means 'uncared for', but 'uncaring' at 21.123, Od. 17.319, and 'without care' covers both. On the theme of these verses cf. Griffin, HLD 189-91.

T reasonably comments that 'he means to $\phi'\sigma \varepsilon_1 \theta \varepsilon_1 \delta v' \sigma \varepsilon_2$, since he portrays the gods of poetry as experiencing sorrow', and compares the Epicurean view of divinity. The point is rather that the gods' troubles do not strike deep, as those of mortals do. Nevertheless, the 'carefree' gods seem to be a step closer to the less involved deities of the Odyssey: cf. Od. 6.41-6, where 'Olumpos' is a remote place of permanent radiance and calm, in which the gods take their pleasure for all time.

527-33 The jars of Zeus can be regarded as a moral allegory, like the descriptions of Prayers and Ruin in the speeches at 9.502-12, 19.91-136; but this account of the nature of evil is more down-to-earth, less abstract than those ('not so much an allegory as a survival in popular fancy of what may once have been regarded as a real explanation', in Leaf's view). The popular character of the theme is suggested by its recurrence in Hesiod's story of Pandora's $\pi i\theta o_5$ (Erga 90-104; bT and schol. Erga 94 think the Hesiodic story was inspired by the Homeric passage). The $\pi i\theta o_5$ is a large storage jar, sunk into the floor of a store-room, as in the Mycenaean and Minoan palaces of the Late Bronze Age. In antiquity there was doubt as to whether Akhilleus speaks of two jars (one of evil and one of good) or three (two of evil and one of good). Pindar (P. 3.80-1) apparently took the second view:

μανθάνων οίσθα προτέρων[.] έν παρ' έσλὸν πήματα σύνδυο δαίονται βροτοῖς ἀθάνατοι.

Plato, however (Rep. 379D), took the first, although he gives a different text for 528, $\kappa\eta\rho\omega\nu$ $\xi\mu\pi\lambda\epsilon\omega$ δ $\mu\epsilon\nu$ $\xi\sigma\theta\lambda\omega\nu$ $\sigma\nu\tau\alpha\rho$ δ $\delta\epsilon\lambda\omega\nu$. Aristarchus evidently thought there were only two (Arn/A 527-8; cf. Arn, Nic/A 528), and this is surely right. Even so most naturally refers to one of two, and for the ellipse of Even μ before kakav cf. 22.157 ϕ evalues, δ δ' $\delta \pi$ in the before kakav, 7.240, etc.

The language of the whole passage is untypical. The word π 18005 occurs first here; cf. Od. 2.340, 23.305. & Δ 105 o δ 561 is an unusual phrase, but cf. 5.734, 8.385 π 07705 & π ' o δ 561, again with reference to Zeus's palace. In 528 the form $\frac{1}{2}$ 600 occurs first here, and then at Od. 8.325, 335 and 2× in the Hymns, in the phrases $\delta \omega \tau \eta \rho \epsilon_5/\delta \omega \tau \rho \epsilon_6 \omega v$; also $4\times$ in the Theogony. It must be a genitive plural of $\frac{1}{2}$ 5, meaning 'of good things'; for theories about the formation cf. Hainsworth on Od. 8.325. It should properly be written with psilosis, $\frac{1}{2}$ 600. The hiatus before it is unusual, and the Derveni papyrus (fourth century B.C.) quotes the line with $\frac{1}{2}$ 705 $\frac{1}{2}$ $\frac{1}{2}$ 600, which Bentley had conjectured: cf. the text in $\frac{2}{2}PE 47$ (1982), p. 12, col. xxii, line 7. But there is no obvious reason why the $\tau \epsilon$ should have been lost in all other texts, and it is more likely to be due to a conjecture. If $\delta \omega \tau \rho \epsilon 4\omega v$ is connected with Sanskrit $\frac{d}{d\epsilon} \frac{1}{d\epsilon} \frac{1}{d\epsilon}$

In 529 the compound ava- μ elyvu μ occurs first here (2× Od.); ka μ ulfas is given in most manuscripts, but it is better to keep the ke here. Kuperon (530) is the only instance of the middle of KUPEIV in surviving Greek literature; for the sense cf. Hes. Erga 691 πήματι κύρσας. In 531 λωβητός ('degraded') occurs first here; cf. Hes. Aspis 366, etc. βούβρωστις (532) is a highly individual word, which recurs in Callimachus (Hy. 6.102 Kokà βούβρωστις) and other Hellenistic and later poetry. It was interpreted in anitquity as meaning originally 'great hunger', 'famine', and hence (as here) 'great distress' (AbT, etc.). T mentions that at Smyrna there was a cult of Βούβρωστις, and that this was a deity invoked against one's enemies (cf. Plutarch, Mor. 694A-B). The sense 'ravening hunger' seems quite possible, in view of the connexions (as in the Odyssey) between this and the poverty of the outcast wanderer and lack of respect for him (despite pleas that beggars are under special divine protection). On the intensifying sense of Bou- in such compounds cf. Chantraine, Dict. s.v., and see on 13.824. The comparison with the ultimate fate of Bellerophon (made by bT) is not inappropriate:

> άλλ' ότε δή καί κείνος άπήχθετο πάσι θεοϊσιν, ήτοι ο κάπ πεδίον το Αλήϊον οίος άλᾶτο, δν θυμον κατέδων, πάτον άνθρώπων άλεείνων (6.200~2)

Here too the victim of Zeus's displeasure becomes an outcast and vagrant, wholly artuos(533).

bT (527-8) suggest that Zeus's defence of the gods as not to blame for men's troubles, at Od. 1.36-43, is designed to answer Akhilleus' words (cf. Introduction, 'The end of the lliad in relation to the Odyssey', and E. R. Dodds, The Greeks and the Irrational, Berkeley 1951, 32). Notice however that in the Odyssey Zeus does not deny that the gods are responsible for some troubles. What he says is that men add to their proper share of these, by their own follies (33-4). There is no direct contradiction with Akhilleus' speech.

529-30 Cf. Od. 4.236-7 (in a consolatory speech by Helen) άτὰρ θεὸς άλλοτε άλλω | Ζεὺς άγαθόν τε κακόν τε διδοῖ, 6.188-90 (... σὲ δὲ χρὴ τετλάμεν ἔμπης), etc.

534-42 These verses apply the reflections of 525-33 to Peleus, and especially the point of 529-30, for Peleus is an example of mixed good and evil fortune, as is Priam (543-8).

534-7 The exceptional favour of the gods to Peleus was shown above all by his marriage to a goddess, and the other gifts associated with this (16.380-1, 17.194-6, 18.84-5, 24.59-63, etc.). Cf. Hes. fr. 211 M-W, where at his wedding the song is $\tau pi_5 \mu \alpha \alpha \alpha \beta$ Alaxlôn kal $\tau \epsilon \tau p \alpha \kappa \beta \delta \beta \epsilon \pi n \lambda \epsilon \omega$ (etc.), and Pindar, P. 3.86-96 (in a passage echoing Akhilleus' speech), etc. But Peleus is also seen here as a rich and powerful ruler, in such a way as to stress the comparison with Priam (543-6). Verse 534 echoes the wording of 16.381 etc., 536 that of 16.596 ($\delta \lambda \beta \sigma_5$ only here in Il., 8× Od.).

538-40 Akhilleus has in mind here Priam's words about his own lost sons, and the death of his 'only' son Hektor (cf. 518 51n.). Verses 538-9 mean that Peleus has no sons destined to succeed as rulers (KPEIOVTWV). You'h occurs only here in II., $1 \times Od.$, $2 \times HyAp$.

In 540 παναώριος is a Homeric hapax, which recurs only in some late epigrams. ἄωρος in classical Greek means 'untimely', and can be used of death or of those who have died before their natural time. παναώριος was usually interpreted as meaning 'altogether untimely', although an alternative view took it as 'altogether despised' (Hdn/A, Eust.). Modern scholars have usually translated it as 'doomed to die young'. M. Pope (CQ 35 (1985) 1-8) suggests that it means 'untimely in all things', but this is contested by A. W. James (CQ 36 (1986) 527-9). Akhilleus' failure to return home and care for Peleus may well be associated with the idea of early death, as in the passage about his choice of fates at 9.410-16 and elsewhere in the poem (4.477-9, 17.301-3). It is, however, possible that παναώριον has a similar general sense to the corresponding πανάποτμος of 493, meaning 'unlucky in all ways'; cf. Leumann, HW 105, who translates both words by '(ganz) unglücklich'.

540-a In Greek society failure to care for one's parents in old age has always been regarded as one of the worst faults. Here it is even worse for Akhilleus, since he is not only unable to look after Peleus, but is forced to waste his life at Troy, giving trouble to Priam and his children. The emphatic fjum in 542 has the sense of 'I just sit around' as often (cf. 18.104 of Akhilleus, 1.134, 2.137, 2.255, etc.), and khow is bitterly ambiguous, 'troubling' or 'caring for', Akhilleus' lack of care for Peleus being contrasted with his 'concern' for the Trojans.

543-6 exotioner means we have heard tell'; cf. 14.125, etc. $\delta\lambda\beta$ 105 occurs only here in Il., 14× Od. (cf. $\delta\lambda\beta$ 05 536, $\delta\lambda\beta$ 10 $\delta\alpha$ ($\mu\omega\nu$ 3.182).

Verses 544-5 define the whole area within which Priam's kingdom lies, surrounded by Lesbos to the south, Phrygia to the east, and the Hellespont to the north. For the whole sentence cf. HyAp 30-45 800005 Kphth T' Evtos έχει ... (37) Λέσβος τ' ήγαθέη Μάκαρος έδος Αίολίωνος |... τόσσον έπ'... Ικετο Λητώ, and 2.845 δσσους Έλλήσποντος άγάρροος έντος έέργει (see on 844-5). avw occurs only here in the poem (cf. Od. 11.596) and appears to mean 'out there' or 'out to sea' (cf. dvdyew); and kottimepte seems to mean 'inland' here. Makar was a legendary colonist of Lesbos, which was called Makaria after him. Cf. AbT and references in Erbse ad loc.; RE s.v. Makar(eus). Two quotations in Plutarch and Dio Chrysostom, one secondcentury A.D. papyrus and a few MSS read µoxdowy, which could well be due to an ancient conjecture (cf. van der Valk, Researches II 597-8). The epithet consiguous in 545, applied only here to the Hellespont, is at first sight puzzling, and has been explained as referring to the whole sea off Troy and Thrace, not just the modern channel. It is called 'broad' at 7.86, 17.432. But the phrase could be influenced by memory of movies άπείρων (Hes. Th. 678); cf. πόντον άπείρονα (Aristarchus' reading in 1.350, and Od. 4.510).

Verse 546 echoes 535-6, only adding 'sons' here to 'wealth'. Cf. Od. 14.206 $\delta\lambda\beta\omega$ TE $\pi\lambda\omega\tau\omega$ TE Kol uldor. For the depletion of Priam's wealth cf. 18.288-92. Lesbos had been sacked by Akhilleus himself (9.129 etc.). $\tau\omega\nu$ in 546 presumably means 'among the inhabitants of these places', and uncertainty about its reference perhaps led to the variant $\tau\omega$.

547-8 Verse 547 balances 538. For 548 cf. 7.237 μάχας τ' άνδροκτασίας re, and Od. 11.612.

549-31 ανοχεο... σὸν κατὰ θυμόν echoes the opening theme (518), here with strong imperatives, and 550 recalls 524. For ἀλίαστον ('incessantly') of lamentation cf. 760. Verse 551 is a typically emphatic way of saying 'you will not be able to bring him back to life, whatever you do', i.e. 'even if you suffer more yourself for his sake, it will not do any good': Arn/A takes it this way, and compares 1.29 την δ' έγώ οὐ λύσω⁻ πρίν μιν καὶ γῆρος ἕπεισιν ... It would be clearer if we place a colon after ἀνστήσεις. The theme is common in later consolations: cf. Soph. El. 137-8, fr. 513 N. (=557 Radt), Hor. C. 1.24.11-18.

۰,

t

552-95 Priam refuses the offer of a seat, and asks Akhilleus to release Hektor's body as soon as possible. Akhilleus, however, warns him not to anger him and Priam gives way. The ransom is removed from the waggon, and the body is washed, dressed and put on a bier, which is placed on the waggon. Akhilleus asks Patroklos not to be angry because he has released the body of his enemy, and promises him a share in the ransom

That a visitor should refuse the offer of a seat owing to the urgency of the situation is a motif which has occurred already at 6.360-2 (Hektor with Helen), 11.648 (Patroklos' visit to Nestor) and 23.205 (Iris and the Winds). But here, by a touch of the poet's wand of genius, this theme suddenly takes on great importance, since it threatens to precipitate a crisis, and shows how in spite of the detached and gnomic speech which he has just made Akhilleus is still in a precarious state of tension which could easily be broken. Yet he does control himself, and in the preparation of Hektor's body he personally supervises what is done, and takes special care to avoid any further risk of provocation (583-6). A final sign of the conflict of his feelings is his brief speech to Patroklos' spirit, in which we see the embers of the urge for vengeance momentarily flicker into flame, and then die away for the last time. bT (569) aptly quote the view of Aristotle (fr. 168 R.), that his character is 'uneven' or 'inconsistent' (ανώμαλον); cf. Arist. Poet. 1454 a26-8, b8-15 and Eust. 1365.62-1366.2. An alternative view (bT 559, 569) was that Akhilleus shows anger in order to prevent Priam from upsetting him by his grief: this is based on 583-6. Plutarch (Mor. 31A-C) quotes Akhilleus' ability to master his anger as an example of self-control and self-knowledge. Cf. Deichgräber, Letzte Gesang 71: 'Man kann (mit Schadewaldt) fragen: Wo kennt sonst jemand sich selbst wie Achill hier?"

There are echoes of the opening scene of the poem (cf. Introduction, 'Structure'). Priam's request to Akhilleus and his accompanying prayer for his safe return home (554-7) are parallel to the prayer and request of Khruses (1.17-21), Akhilleus' warning to Priam not to anger him is paralleled by Agamemnon's response $(560, 569-70 \sim 1.26-8, 32)$. Both Agamemnon and Akhilleus refer to the divine support the suppliant receives, the first with contempt, the second with respect. Priam's fear and acquiescence are expressed in the same words as those applied to Khruses (571 = 1.33). But in book 1 the request for ransom is refused, whereas here it will be fulfilled. Cf. also E. Minchin, Greece and Rome 33 (1986) 11-19, on Akhilleus' speech and the parallels with book 1.

553-5 For the subjunctive form keiras cf. 19.32, Chantraine, GH 1 457. akyofy has the specific sense here of 'without the proper care due to a dead body'; cf. Od. 24.187. The situation is echoed at Od. 10.383-7, where Odysseus explains to Kirke that he cannot bear to eat until his companions have been restored to their normal form: cf. especially 386-7 $d\lambda\lambda^{*}$... | $\lambda \tilde{v} \sigma v$, $\ln^{2} \delta \Theta d\lambda \mu \sigma \tilde{\sigma} v$ lies to find a training training. For 555 cf. 137.

556-8 Aristarchus athetized 556-7 'because such prayers are unsuitable in the mouth of Priam, and the insincerity would be obvious' (Arn/A). The prayer of Khruses that the Greeks will take Troy and return home safely aroused similar debate (schol. Ab 1.18-19). But the parallelism of the two passages supports the second one. Leaf objected to the lengthening of $\mu\epsilon$ in the second half of the fourth foot before $\pi\rho\omega\tau\sigma\nu$, as a breach of 'Wernicke's Law', but there are a number of other exceptions to this, and $\mu\epsilon$ $\pi\rho\omega\tau\sigma\nu$ presumably would go closely together. Cf. his Appendix N, vol. II, especially pp. 636-7, and West, Greek Metre 37. $\pi\rho\omega\tau\sigma\nu$ must mean 'from the very first' here.

Verse 558 is omitted by several MSS, and is ignored by the scholia and Eustathius. In fact Herodian and Didymus discuss various explanations of Ecocy which assume that it stood on its own, and Sidonius read Enti $\mu\epsilon$ $\pi\rho\omega\tau'$ Elénocy in 557. Probably it is a late interpolation designed to complete the construction of Ecocy, which stands on its own at 569, 684, and elsewhere. For a similar case of probable interpolation with Eco cf. 20.312 with comment. Van der Valk (Researches II 218-21; see also GRBS 23 (1982) 301-3) argues that 20.312 and 24.558 were removed from the text by Aristarchus, but his case is not convincing. $\zeta\omega\epsilon\nu/\zeta\omega\epsilon$ Kol $\delta\rho\alpha\nu/\delta\rho\alpha$ $\phi\alpha\sigma$ $\hbar\epsilon\lambdaloio occurs elsewhere <math>2 \times II.$, $5 \times Od.$, and so its appearance at Od. 10.498, in a scene probably influenced by Iliad 24, does not automatically prove that 24.558 is genuine (as suggested by G. Beck, Philologus 109 (1965) 11). Cf. also Od. 13.359-60 cl KeV E α $\pi\rho\delta\phi\rho\omega\nu\mu\epsilon...$ | $c\dot{\nu}\tau\delta\nu$ $\tau\epsilon$ $\zeta\omega\epsilon\nu$, and Od. 16.388.

559 = 1.148 etc.

560-70 Akhilleus' speech is framed by the warnings to Priam not to upset him further (560, 568-70), between which are two balanced statements of the divine motivation behind the scenes, first Thetis' visit to her son (120-42), and second Akhilleus' realization that a god must have escorted Priam. The point he is making is that given this motivation any failure to respect Priam as a suppliant would be a direct offence against the orders of Zeus (570). Note also the 'ring' motif of 561 $\Delta 100000 \dots Cryclos$, 570 $\Delta 105 \dots Cryclos$.

560-2 Verse 560 echoes $1.32 \mu \eta \mu$ ' kpk $\theta_1 \zeta_{f}$, in Agamemnon's warning to Khruses (see on 552-95). For 561 cf. 194-5. The first hemistich of 562 resembles 1.352; for the second cf. 1.538, 1.556.

365-7 Cf. Od. 23.187-8 (Odysseus' bed) άνδρῶν δ' οῦ κέν τις ζωός βροτός, οὐδὲ μάλ' ήβῶν, | ῥεῖα μετοχλίσσειεν. There is more point to οὐδὲ μάλ' ήβῶν here, in relation to Priam, than in the Odyssey passage (cf. Reinhardt, IuD 483-4). In 566 the form φυλακός, for φύλαξ, occurs only here in Homer, except as a proper name (6.35, Od. 15.231), and seems to be Ionic (cf. a sixth-century inscription from Thasos, Herodotus, etc.); φύλακας is a minority variant. ἀχῆα is the reading of Aristarchus and a few MSS, the majority having ὀχῆας. The plural is perfectly possible, in spite of the singular bolt of 453-5. The bolt(s) of the Achaean Wall are similarly referred to as either singular or plural (12.121 etc., 12.455-62; see on 13.124-5). The compound μετοχλίζειν ('shift by force') occurs only here and in the Odyssey passage above, and then occasionally in Hellenistic and later authors. But cf. 12.447-8 (in the context of breaking open the Achaean gates with a great rock) τὸν δ' οῦ κε δῦ' ἀνέρε δήμου ἀρίστω | ὑηιδίως... ἁπ' οῦδεος ὁχλίσσειαν, and the similar passage at Od. 9.241-2.

335

568-70 For έν άλγεσι A gives the commoner ένὶ φρεσί as a variant (cf. Od. 15.486). But cf. Od. 21.88 κεῖται έν άλγεσι θυμός. Verses 568-70 echo 1.26-8 (Agamemnon to Khruses) μή σε, γέρον ... κιχείω ... | μή νύ τοι οὐ χραίσμη σκῆπτρον καὶ στέμμα θεοῖο. Khruses had also invoked divine sanction (1.21), but in vain. οὐδ' αὐτόν here is emphatic, 'not even yourself' (for μή ... οὐ cf. also 584, and Chantraine, GH II 336-7). Verse 569 picks up 557 ἐπεί με πρῶτον ἔασας. Verse 570 is echoed by 586. Διὸς ἐφετμάς refers specifically to Zeus's message to Akhilleus via Thetis, as well as more generally to Zeus as god of suppliants (Od. 13.213 etc.).

571 = 1.33, making quite clear the parallelism of the two scenes.

572-5 Akhilleus' sudden and rapid exit 'like a lion' dramatically indicates his state of mind: cf. bT 'the simile refers both to his ease of movement and his fierce appearance, in order that he may alarm Priam'; Moulton, Similes 114 'the short simile flashes by with a reminder of the strength and danger that are deep in Achilles' nature, even at the moment when he performs an act of respect and reconciliation'. Akhilleus was compared to a lion by Apollo at 41-3 because of his savage lack of respect and pity, but the simile recalls earlier passages where Akhilleus and other heroes were compared to a lion when attacking in battle: cf. 20.164-74 (IIn) telons 6' έτέρωθεν έναντίον ώρτο λέων ώς, etc.), 11.129, etc. Verse 573 belongs to the formular pattern 'not only, with him/her (followed two attendants, etc.)', for which see on 2.822-3, 3.143. Verse 574 recalls 474, but here the poet adds that the two squires were Akhilleus' most honoured companions after Patroklos' death. This echoes the description of Automedon at 16.145-6, and at Od. 24.78-9 Antilokhos replaces Patroklos in this place of honour. Patroklos will be in our minds, as in Akhilleus', during the following scene (582-90n., 591-5).

576-8 Normally in a Visit scene the horses (and mules) would be unyoked on arrival (e.g. Od. 4.35-42, and similarly 11. 8.433-5), but here this has been displaced by the unusual nature of the scene. καλήτωρ ('crier', 'summoner') occurs as a proper name at 13.541, 15.419, and nowhere else in literature; but it is surely a common noun rather than proper name here (pace 15.419–211.). Cf. Arn/A, D, and 701 κήρυκά τε άστυβοώτην. With due courtesy he too is seated, although on the simpler δίφρος (cf. T). Verses 578 -79 recall 275–76, where the ransom was loaded on to the waggon. The ancient variant ἐῦσσώτρου (Did/A, T, one papyrus, a few MSS) would mean 'with good wheels' (cf. σῶτρον, 'felloe', in Pollux; Homer's ἐπίσσωτρον, 'tire'), and it occurs once elsewhere, at Hes. Aspis 273 (ἐῦσσώτρου ἐπ' ἀπήνης). Van der Valk (Researches n 578) thinks this is the right reading here, and it was adopted by Leaf. The argument (cf. Macleod) that it would be un-Homeric to vary the epithet (from 275) is not necessarily conclusive, and the commoner ἑῦξέστου could well have replaced the unusual word.

Copyrighted Material

Book Twenty-Four

580-1 From the ransom itself three garments are set aside to dress and cover the body, a χ (των to be placed round it, and two larger robes to put under and over it. Hektor will thus be wrapped in Trojan clothing, rather than Greek (cf. the fine garments referred to by Andromakhe in her lament at 22.410-14). Cf. 18.352-3, where Patroklos' corpse is covered 'with fine linen... and above with a white robe'. Solon was said to have limited the number of garments used for burial to three (Plutarch, Sol. 21.5); cf. the fifth-century funerary law from Iulis in Ceos (IG 12.5.593.1-4): κατὰ τά]δε θά[πτ]εν τὸν θανόντα⁻ ἐν ἐμ[α]τίο[ις τρι]σὶ λευκοῖς, στρώματι καὶ ἐνδύματι [καὶ ἐ]πιβλέματι⁻ ἐξἕναι δὲ καὶ ἐν ἑλάσ[σ]οσ[ι]. On this and similar regulations see I. von Prott and L. Ziehen, Leges Graecorum Sacrae (Leipzig 1896) 219, 263. For the second half of 580 cf. 18.596 χιτῶνας ... ἑῦννήτους, Od. 7.97 πέπλοι... ἑῦννητοι.

582-90 Akhilleus himself supervises the washing, anointing and clothing of the body, and it is he who places it on the bier (589). The same rituals were performed for the body of Patroklos when it was brought back from the battle, at 18.343-53 (washing and anointing, placing on the bier and covering). These preparations would normally be performed by members of the dead man's own family, and it is highly significant that they should be undertaken by Akhilleus. The washing and anointing were strictly speaking unnecessary since the gods had kept the body fresh and clean, and Aphrodite herself had anointed it with ambrosial oil (413-23, 23.185-7). The poet's careful detailing of this ritual must be designed to stress the propriety with which Akhilleus now treats the body of his former enemy, just as again his concern to avoid distressing Priam and causing a breach of their understanding is emphasized. For a similar concern with funerary ritual shown by an enemy or a stranger in tragedy cf. S. Aj. 1378-95 (Odysseus and Aias), E. Supp. 765-8, Tro. 1150-5.

337

582-6 Exected v occurs first here, $2 \times Od$. The maids are ordered to wash the body in a place where Priam cannot see it, lest he should become distressed and so risk being killed through Akhilleus' anger. The sentence develops with an elaborate series of dependent clauses, unfolding the potential consequences. In 584 there were ancient variants korov or yoov for χόλον, and κατερύκοι for ερύσαιτο (cf. ού κατερύξει in some MSS). Herodian objected to xóhov and preferred yóov, which could well be a conjecture, but korrepúkoi is possible. For έρύσαιτο meaning 'keep hidden' cf. Od. 16.459. Verse 585 echoes 568 and 586 recalls 570, but Kol & котоктеічене is much more explicit. Leaf regards 586 as 'no doubt an interpolation', because 'the subj. άλίτηται after the historic tense is indefensible', and it is more effective if the consequences of Akhilleus' anger are left undefined, as at 569-70. This is reasonable, but the variation between optative and subjunctive is not so unusual (cf. 686 8, 14.162-5 with comment, etc.), and despite the length of the periodic structure (582-6) the explicit statement of 586, with all its shocking implications, should probably stand.

587-90 Verse 587 resembles 18.350 (the washing of Patroklos' body). But 587-8 also belong to the normal scene of washing someone in Visit scenes in the Odyssey: see on 18.343-55, and cf. Od. 3.467-8, 23.154-5, and similarly 4.49-50, 8.454-5, 17.88-9, with Arend, Scenen 124 n. 1. That is why only one $\phi \bar{\alpha} \rho \sigma_{5}$ is mentioned, instead of two. The washing of the dead body follows the same sequence as in the normal life of the living; the poet is adapting a motif typical of a Visit scene for a new purpose here. Placing the body on the bier (cf. 720, 18.352) was envisaged as the mother's task by Akhilleus in his speeches to Lukaon and Hektor at 21.123-4, 22.352-3. cvtros tor y' 'AxiAev's emphasizes Akhilleus' own participation, leading up to his outburst in the following verses.

591-5 Akhilleus still fears the resentment of Patroklos' ghost, and promises him a share in the ransom gifts. This is one of the very few points in the Homeric poems where we glimpse the idea that the living could fear the continuing anger of the dead (cf. Parker, Miasma 133-4), or that the dead might require any form of offerings after the actual burial was completed (cf. Od. 11.29-33).

Verses 594-5 were athetized (apparently by Aristarchus: Arn/A) on the grounds that it was incorrect for Akhilleus to speak of the gifts as a reason for releasing Hektor's body, when he was really obeying Zeus's command. But clearly the two motives go together, and Zeus himself had decreed that the ransom should be paid (119, 137). bT discuss how Akhilleus could make gifts to the dead man, which shows awareness that in Homer this is an unusual procedure. They add that it was customary to purge a murder by material compensation (quoting 9.632-4). The supposed 'materialism' of Akhilleus attracted the criticism of Plato (Rep. 390E): 'we shall not allow that Akhilleus could be so materialistic... as to release a dead body only in exchange for payment, and otherwise to be unwilling to do so'. This could be the ultimate source of the later athetesis.

۰,

In 591 $\phi i \lambda o v \delta'$ ovounvev traipov perhaps reminds us of the fact that Akhilleus has up to now avoided mentioning Patroklos' name. In 592 the form $\sigma \kappa v \delta \mu \alpha v$

596–632 Akhilleus returns inside, sits down opposite Priam, and invites him to share a meal, telling the story of Niobe as a precedent. The meal is prepared, they eat and drink, and then gaze at each other in wonder

The ransoming is completed (599), and the procedure of hospitality can be resumed even in these extraordinary circumstances. Normally a meal would have been offered to the guests on arrival, but here this was out of the question. Its occurrence now symbolizes and cements the bond of sympathy between Priam and Akhilleus (cf. Griffin, HLD 16: 'eating with old Priam resolves the passionate separateness of the hero'). At the same time it signifies the need for practical action in spite of grief, as was the case in book 19, where Akhilleus had to be persuaded to allow the army to eat before returning to battle (154-237). By contrast, however, it is here Akhilleus himself who urges Priam to break his twelve-day fast (cf. 641-2), and the function of the story of Niobe is to stress that this is justified even in the case of extremest sorrow.

596-8 Akhilleus' seat, called a $\theta p \delta vos$ at 515, is here a $\kappa \lambda i \sigma \mu \delta s$. Sometimes the two are distinguished, but they can be used as synonyms, e.g. 11.623, 11.645, and cf. West on Od. 1.130. Akhilleus sits 'by the opposite wall' to Priam, a phrase used of Akhilleus sitting facing Odysseus in the Embassy (9.218-19), and also applied to Penelope opposite Odysseus in the Recognition scene at Od. 23.89-90. It presumably suggests some distance or formality.

399-620 Akhilleus' speech is a clear example of ring-composition centred on a paradeigmatic story (cf. R. Ochler, Mythologische Exempla in der alteren griechischen Dichtung, Aarau 1925, 7, and Lohmann, Reden 13):

- A 599-601 Your son is free: you will see him tomorrow.
- B 601 Now let us think of eating,
- C 602 For even Niobe did so.
- D 603-12 Niobe's story.

339

- C 613 She ate, when she had tired of weeping,
 - 614-17 And now she still nurses her grief, even when turned to stone (cf. 619-20?).
- B 618-19 But come, let us also think of eating.
- A 619-20 After that you can mourn your son, when you have brought him back to Troy. He will cost you many tears.

Verses 614-17 were athetized by Aristophanes and Aristarchus (see comment), and the fact that they apparently interrupt the ring-structure has been taken as confirmation of this view. But they provide a parallel with the conclusion of Akhilleus' speech, for just as Niobe continues to mourn her children, so will Priam lament his son on his return to Troy (cf. von der Mühll, Hypomnema 385, Leaf on 614-17, Macleod on 596-620).

The version which Akhilleus gives of the myth of Niobe contains some puzzling features, which do not recur in later versions, except where these are clearly dependent on Homer. After her children are killed they lie unburied for nine days, because Zeus has 'turned the people to stone', and on the tenth day the gods themselves bury them (6t0-12). It is commonly believed that the story has been adapted to suit Priam's situation: the motif of Niobe breaking her fast is then an innovation. The period of her mourning for her unburied children parallels the time when Hektor has lain in Akhilleus' hut, or else the nine-day mourning which will take place at Troy (664-5, 784-7; cf. Eust. 1367.41ff.); and the gods' personal care for the burial echoes the gods' concern for Hektor's body. The motif of the people turned to stone derives from Niobe's petrifaction, and is introduced to explain why the Niobids lie unburied. Cf. Ochler, op. cit. 5-7, Kakridis, Researches 96-105, M. M. Willcock, CQ 14 (1964) 141-2, Macleod on 569-620; doubts about the above views are expressed by Lesky, RE xVII 646 s.v. Niobe; and see also W. Pötscher, Grazer Beiträge 12/13 (1985/6) 21-35 for a quite different view.

Whatever the truth about these details the chief point of the example is its function as an argument a fortiori. Priam has lost many sons killed by Akhilleus, but Niobe's were all killed together by Apollo and Artemis, and she is (by implication) a more famous figure of the past, especially if we accept 614-17 as genuine. Her story was later the subject of tragedies by Aeschylus and Sophocles (TGF ed. Radt, III, pp. 265-80, IV, pp. 363-73), and was always popular as an exemplum (e.g. S. Ant. 824-31, El. 150-2).

601 Akhilleus' suggestion that they share a meal is all the more significant since he has in fact recently eaten (475-6), as bT note (618-19).

602-9 The details of Niobe's parentage and origins varied in later versions (AbT 602, 604, with Erbse). Her father was either Tantalos (mentioned at Od. 11.582-92) or Pelops, and her home either Thebes or Lydia.

The number of her children also varied. The narrative is told with elegant economy. Verse 603 is picked up at the end of this section by 609 ($\delta\lambda$ ovto... $\delta\lambda$ εσσαν), and the balanced structure of 604 is developed in chiastic order in 605-6 (θ υγατέρες... υlέες... τούς μέν... τάς δ'...). Likewise the repetition in 608-9 stresses the bitter recompense for Niobe's boast. Verses 603-4 are echoed by Od. 10.5-6 (Aiolos) τοῦ καὶ δώδεκα παῖδες ένὶ μεγάροις γεγάασιν, | ἐξ μέν θυγατέρες, ἐξ δ' υlέες ἡβώοντες. For άργυρέοιο βιοῖο | in 605 cf. 1.49 (Apollo as plague-god), and 8.279 τόξου άπὸ κρατεροῦ ... $\delta\lambda$ έκοντα. In 607 the frequentative form Ισάσκετο is unique; cf. 12.435 Ισάζουσα. Verse 608 means 'she boasted that Leto had borne only two, whereas she herself had borne many'. According to Sappho (fr. 142 L-P), Leto and Niobe were close friends, just as Tantalos was the gods' companion in later legends.

610-12 For the nine-day period see on 660-7. Turning people into stone is a common motif in folk-tales, but there may be influence from the similarity of $\lambda\alpha\delta\varsigma$ and $\lambda\tilde{\alpha}\alpha\varsigma$ (stone), as in the story of Deukalion (noted by Eust. 1367.47ff.; cf. Hes. fr. 234 M-W, Pindar, O. 9.41-6). Cf. also 2.319 $\lambda\tilde{\alpha}\alpha\nu$ ydp µıv tônke Kpóvou πdïς dyku λ oµ η тεω of the snake at Aulis, Od. 13.163 ds µıv $\lambda\tilde{\alpha}\alpha\nu$ ônke of the Phaeacian ship turned to stone by Poseidon. bT assume that the people are petrified as an extension of Niobe's punishment (cf. Hes. Erga 240-3), but we are not given a reason.

614-17 These verses were rejected for several reasons (Arn, Did/A, bT):

- (i) If Niobe was turned to stone, how could she eat?
- (ii) It is an absurd consolation to say 'eat, for Niobe ate and was petrified'.
- (iii) The style is Hesiodic, especially άμφ' Άχελώιον έρρώσαντο (616).
- (iv) by is repeated thrice.
- (v) How can Niobe nurse her sorrows when turned to stone?

bT add

(vi) Akheloos is in Aetolia, not near Sipulos.

These objections are groundless. The origin of the story was clearly a rock-image on Mt Sipulos, identified as the sorrowing Niobe, the water flowing down its face being her tears, as Eustathius observed (1368.10ff.): compare the simile at 16.3-4 (see comment). This explains 617, which is echoed by Priam at 639 ($\kappa\eta\delta\epsilon\alpha \ \mu\nu\rho\alpha \ \pi\epsilon\sigma\sigma\omega$). The image is described by Pausanias (1.21.3). The other objections are answered by Leaf: the triple use of $\epsilon\nu$ is paralleled at 22.503-4 (see comment): $\epsilon\rho\omega\sigma\alpha\nu\tau\sigma$ of dancing is Hesiodic (Th. 8), but a natural extension of the Homeric sense 'move nimbly' (see on 1.529-30); an unknown Akheloos in Lydia is not strange, since the name is applied to many rivers; finally, Niobe was turned to stone not as punishment but because of her grief, which continues like Priam's.

These are, in fact, memorable and evocative verses, whose style is not out of place in Akhilleus' mouth. Cf. J. Griffin, JHS 106 (1986) 53: 'A last feature of Achilles' speech... is his tendency to invoke distant places and resounding names, lines which... open out into a spacious rhythm which goes with a vision of places far removed from the battle-ground of Troy or the crowded assembly of the Achaeans' (cf. also 56). This is especially true of these verses, which lift Akhilleus' consolation on to a different plane, as we rest our eyes on this great, solitary and distant figure, frozen in the image of perpetual grief.

Eustathius (1367.16ff.) praises the verbal echoes of the dative plural forms in 614 and the genitive plurals in 615-16, as well as the repetition of the preposition in 614-15, as adding to the beauty of the verses. For έν ούρεσιν οloπόλοισιν | cf. Od. 11.574. Mt Sipulos is north-east of Smyrna, and was regarded as the home of Tantalos (e.g. Pind O. 1.38). Verse 615 resembles 2.783 (again referring to a legendary place in Asia Minor) elv Άρίμοις, όθι φασί Τυφωέος έμμεναι εύνάς; Τ compares Pindar (Ν. 1.3) Όρτυγία δέμνιον Άρτέμιδος. The nymphs have their dwellings on Sipulos, and dance around the local river, like Hesiod's Muses who haunt Mt Helikon and dance round a spring on the mountain (Th. 1-8); cf. Th. 8 έπερρώσαντο δὲ ποσσίν. bT however offer other mythological explanations of bedwv evods, especially one which associated Sipulos with Rhea and her daughters. Instead of 'Ayeλώιov in 616 'some' read 'Ayeλήσιov, said to be a river in Lydia, after which Herakles named a son by Omphale according to T (cf. Panyassis fr. 17 K. νύμφαι Άχελήτιδες). A offers the variant Άχελήϊον. For Άχελῷος as a generic name for rivers or water in general, see on 21.194. In 617 θεών έκ could go either with κήδεα or πέσσει ('by the grace of the gods'), but the former seems more likely. For the metaphorical use of meodel ('digests' and so 'broods on', 'nurses') see on 4.512-13. Similar metaphors connected with food are used in the context of eating at 128-9 and Od. 10.378-9; cf. Pindar, O. 1.55-6 καταπέψαι μέγαν δλβον in a sympotic context, with Gerber's comment.

618-20 These verses resume the themes of 599-601, with σίτου in emphatic position. πολυδάκρυτος recurs $3 \times Od.$; cf. πολυδάκρυος at Il. 17.192, πολύδακρυς $6 \times Il.$, and for the phrase Od. 19.404, HyDem 220 πολυάρητος δέ τοι (μοι) έστίν.

621-32 The description of the meal follows conventional patterns: cf. Arend, Scenen 64-70 and Schema 8. Thus 623-4 = 7.317-18 (cf. Od. 19.422-3; $624 \ 4 \times \ 11.$, $1 \times \ 0d.$); 625-6 = 9.216-17 (Automedon here replaces Patroklos); 627-8 = 9.91-2, 9.221-2, etc. A meal is often followed by conversation (cf. 632, and 634ff.), but here this is varied by 629-32, a wonderful innovation: cf. T 630 ταῦτα δὲ πρός ἕκπληξιν τῶν ἀκροατῶν. 621-2 For the first hemistich of 621 cf. 440. διν άργυφον occurs only here; cf. Od. 10.85 άργυφα μηλα, and άργύφεος. For ξδερόν τε και άμφεπον cf. 23.167.

629-32 The mutual admiration of the two heroes is expressed in two balanced couplets, 631 echoing 629 with interchange of cases (diptoton) and repetition of the full patronymic formula for Priam, 630 and 632 giving the reasons for wonder, Akhilleus' godlike physique, Priam's noble appearance and words. For δσσος ξην οίός τε of Akhilleus cf. 21.108 ούχ όράφς οίος καl έγώ καλός τε μέγας τε; The phrase θεοΐσι γάρ άντα έώκει ('for he was like the gods to look upon') is echoed at HyDem 241. In 632 the balanced and chiastic order, with framing participles, is also effective. For Priam as wise counsellor bT compare 7.366 Δαρδανίδης Πρίαμος, θεόφιν μήστωρ άττάλαντος. H. J. Mette, Glotta 39 (1961) 52, calls this 'one of the finest scenes in Homeric epic'; cf. Deichgräber, Letzte Gesang 73-5.

633-76 Priam asks to be allowed to go to sleep, and Akhilleus orders beds to be prepared under the portico. A truce of eleven days is agreed for Hektor's burial. Idaios and Priam go to sleep outside, while Akhilleus sleeps in the hut with Briseis beside him

After the meal for the guests comes sleep, again a typical motif: cf. Arend, Scenen 101-5, with Schema 12. A similar but much briefer version of the theme occurred at the end of the Embassy, when Phoinix slept in Akhilleus' hut (9.658-68), but the closest parallels come in Odyssey 4.294-305 and 7.335-47. Verses 643-4 echo 9.658-9, where it was Patroklos who gave the order to the attendants, and 675 = 9.663. At 9.664-8, however, Akhilleus slept with a captive from Lesbos, Diomede, and Patroklos with one from Skuros, Iphis, whereas here Briseis is mentioned for the last time, reunited with Akhilleus (another echo of the opening of the poem), but Patroklos is gone. In Odyssey 4 Telemakhos takes the initiative in asking to go to bed as Priam does here (635-6 ~ Od. 4.294-5), and Od. 4.296-305 closely resemble 11. 24.643-8 and 673-6, with several identical verses (644-7 = Od. 4.297-300, 673 = 4.302). Od. 7.335-47 repeat the pattern closely, and 648 resembles Od. 7.340.

In the Odyssey it is normal for guests to sleep under the portico, rather than within the palace (cf. Od. 3.397-403, 20.1, 20.143), and even at ll.9.662-6 Phoinix seems to be apart from Akhilleus and Patroklos, although he is not outside. Here, however, Akhilleus gives a special justification for Priam's sleeping outside, which is oddly introduced by m_{10} poetic device to enable Priam to leave in secret on Hermes' orders (1370.11-2). Thus another normal motif of epic hospitality is used for a special purpose (cf. C. Rothe, Die Ilias als Dichtung, Paderborn 1910, 331). Given Priam's age and status it could have seemed discourteous to make him sleep outside, and that may be the point of $\xi\pi$ in the point of $\xi\pi$ is the point of $\xi\pi$ is the point of the 635-6 For λέξον ('put me to bed') cf. 14.252 έλεξα. ὄφρα καὶ ἤδη ... κοιμηθέντες recur at Od. 4.294-5 and 23.254-5. Aristarchus and some MSS read παυσώμεθα for ταρπώμεθα (Did/AT), probably a conjecture since the reason for preferring this is said to be that 'taking pleasure' in sleep would be unsuitable (ἀπρεπές, ἄκαιρον) in this context. The same variant occurs at Od. 23.255.

343

637-42 Priam's grief has manifested itself in the same way as that of Akhilleus, in sleeplessness (3-12), self-defilement (18.22-7); cf. 22.414, 24.162-5), and fasting (19.205-14, 19.303-8). For $\mu \upsilon \sigma \sigma \nu$ cf. 420 ($\mu \ell \mu \upsilon \kappa \epsilon \nu$). In 637-8 there is a chiastic antithesis, the two prepositional phrases with $\upsilon \pi \delta$ being juxtaposed and framed by their accompanying verbal clauses. $\kappa \eta \delta \epsilon \sigma \dots \pi \ell \sigma \sigma \omega$ (639) echoes Niobe in 617, and for 640 cf. 11.774 and 22.414. For $\lambda \sigma \upsilon \kappa \sigma \omega (642)$ cf. 22.325, with comment.

643-8 See on 633-76, 9.658-61. The epic word $p\bar{\eta}\gamma os$ ('blanket') occurred at 9.661 and is common in Od.; it is related to ptzev ('to dye') etc. (cf. Chantraine, Dict. s.v. ptzw), hence here πορφύρτα. Cf. Ibycus 316 PMG ποικίλα ptywara, Anacreon 447 PMG $d\lambda$ ιπόρφυρον ptyos. For τάπητες see on 230. Even in what appears to be the mundanely typical material of these verses the language and colometry are elegantly varied, the opening infinitive phrase (644) being developed with an effective tricolon, the first clause in enjambment (644-45), the second (645) in chiasmus with the first, and the third longer and more elaborate (646). Thus the poet adds dignity to such simple, everyday actions. Likewise the description in 647-8 of how the orders are carried out falls into two balanced whole-verse clauses (almost entirely dactylic) with homoeoteleuton, whether or not this feature was intentional. Both δdos (for δafs) and tyxovtew occur only here in Il., and then in similar scenes in Od. (4.300, 7.339-40, 22.497, 23.291, 23.294).

649 For tov 6' $t\pi$ interprotetov π pootéon cf. 16.744, Od. 22.194. The verb occurs only in this form in Homer. It ought to mean 'speaking provocatively' or something like this: cf. J. T. Hooker, CQ 36 (1986) 32-7. The scholia do not comment on the word, but Eustathius discusses it (1369.54ff.). He explains it as meaning μ troftos $\chi\lambda$ to χ ('with gentle mockery'), and adds that 'it introduces a false fear, so that the aged king should not be upset at being forced outside,' and that this fear is strengthened by Hermes' warning to Priam (683-9). Leaf suggests that the word either refers to Akhilleus' tone in speaking of Agamemnon (in which case he means what he is saying), or else means 'bantering,' which he thinks is a possible sense at Od. 24.240, KEPTOMIOS $t\pi$ teorow; unfortunately that passage is almost as puzzling. Willcock adopts the same translation, 'in a bantering tone', and adds 'what seems to be the case is that Achilles does not mean what he is saying', i.e. his speech is just a pretext designed by Akhilleus to enable Priam to escape. Cf. Macleod who translates 'teasing', 'mystifying', and says that it is used here of deception, not mockery. Hooker objects that keptopeiv does not have any inherent connotation of deception, even if it may acquire this in some contexts. But teasing provocation often is insincere, and this could be the point here, as if Akhilleus were to say 'I'm afraid, old man, that you will have to sleep outside. I can't risk having you in here, you know', in a gently provocative or mocking tone. Cf. 4.6 where Zeus speaks with ulterior motivation and παραβλήδην άγορεύων probably stresses the insincerity (see comment); Od. 13.325-7 (where Odysseus thinks Athene is not telling the truth, but just teasing him); Hes. Erga 788-9 where κέρτομα βάζειν goes with words for deception etc.; S. Ph. 1235; E. Hel. 619, IA 849; Theocr. Id. 1.62. REPTOMETS often later has the sense of 'you're joking, surely!'. A further interpretation is offered by P. V. Jones, in CQ 39 (1989) 247-50, who translates 'cutting him to the quick', and argues that the real or popular etymology of κερτομείν (from κήρ + τέμνειν) supports this. But there is no sign that Akhilleus' speech has this direct effect on Priam.

650-2 γ épov ϕ i $\lambda\epsilon$ is an advance on Akhilleus' earlier γ épov (560, 599), and it fits his semi-serious tone here. The actual chances of one of the other leaders turning up suddenly during the night are surely slender, and 651-52 is hardly true of the recent past. In fact, it looks as if η θ épus éortí is slipped in here to add a specious justification, as in the case of the testing of the troops, at 2.73; see on 2.73-5, where Kirk says 'It can also serve, vague as it is, to justify a kind of behaviour which a character – or the poet himself – does not wish to spend time in elaborating further.'

653-5 Verse 653 = 366. This warning, together with Hermes' similar words at 686-8, are the last we hear of Agamemnon, and they remind us of his brutality in the early parts of the poem. $dvd\beta\lambda\eta\sigma$ is $\lambda \nu \sigma$ is a euphemistically abstract expression, with two nouns in - σ is, for which 686-8 are more explicit. $\lambda \nu \sigma$ is occurs only here in Il., $1 \times Od$. Cf. 2.380 $d\nu d\beta\lambda\eta\sigma$ is kako $\tilde{\nu}$. For the shift from optative to subjunctive in 653-5 see on 582-6. A papyrus and some MSS have the easier $\gamma t \nu \sigma$ ito, but the subjunctive suggests that the hypothetical case is likely to occur, and (pace Leaf) seems preferable here (cf. also 686-8).

656-8 This essential piece of 'business', the discussion of the truce, is neatly slipped in here at the end of the scene, so that it does not interfere with the impact of the rest, and acts as a transition to the final scenes of the poem. For the Odyssean verse 656 see on 380. $\pi \circ \sigma \sigma \eta \alpha \rho$ is an absolute hapax, formed in an unusual way by analogy with $\alpha \sigma \tau \eta \alpha \rho$, $t v \tau \eta \alpha \rho$, etc. On these compounds with $-\eta \alpha \rho$ see Leumann, HW 98-101. $\kappa \tau \epsilon \rho \epsilon \tau \xi \ell \mu \epsilon v$ here refers to the whole process of burial, including the preparations.

660-7 Priam begins his speech with a courteous introduction: 'if you are really willing ... then if you were to act as follows you would do me a kindness'. Cf. the use of xapileotar meaning 'to oblige someone' (11.23 etc.). The reason given for a long truce is the practical difficulty of collecting wood for the pyre. In the case of Patroklos' funeral this only took part of a day (110-26), but Priam adds that the Trojans are under siege and afraid to leave the city. This motif is echoed at 778-81 and again at 799-800, and this emphasis right at the end of the poem reminds us of how fragile is the truce, and looks forward to the renewal of conflict soon to come. Aristarchus seems to have explained the nine-day period as due to ancient custom (Arn/A 665-6). On the other hand, at Od. 24.63-5 Akhilleus is mourned for seventeen days and burned on the eighteenth. According to Plutarch (1.yc. 27.2) Lycurgus prescribed a limit of eleven days for mourning, and at Athens in the classical period there was a ceremony on the ninth day aft r the burial (rà Evara), but here it is a question of nine days before the funeral. However, έννημαρ μέν ... τη δεκάτη δέ ... is a conventional period of time which recurs elsewhere in epic (see on 1.53-4, and Richardson on HyDem 47, p. 166). Above all it corresponds to the duration of the plague at 1.53-4, and thus forms the outermost element in the series of structural correspondences at the beginning and end of the poem (cf. Introduction, 'Structure'). One of the opening scenes is that of the plague and the pyres on which the Greek dead are burned, and the work ends with the pyre of Hektor and his burial.

For the funeral feast (665) see on 23.1-34, 29-34. To hold the feast directly after the burning and before the burial mound is built would be normal. In fact, the order is changed at 788-803 (see on 801-3). Souviro is optative like $ks \delta \tilde{v} \mu \epsilon \nu$ (16.99), Souvierto (Od. 18.248), etc.: cf. Chantraine, GH151. Verses 664-7 have a wearisomely repetitive character, each verse beginning with one of the series of time-references, and 667 concludes the speech on a note of sad resignation: 'on the twelfth day then let us fight, if we really must'.

669-70 Akhilleus' reply is brief and equally courteous. Verse 669 resembles 21.223. For examples of toral raira and similar expressions of assent in classical Greek cf. E. Fraenkel, Beobachtungen zu Aristophanes (Rome 1962) 77-89. These are the last words Akhilleus speaks in the poem. They set the seal on his reconciliation with Priam, and leave us with an impression of him as a commanding figure, in full control of the situation.

671-2 Akhilleus' gesture is described as one of reassurance (cf. 360-3 with comment). Grasping the hand $\tan \kappa \alpha \rho \pi \tilde{\omega}$ recurs at Od. 18.258, where Odysseus is saying goodbye to Penelope before leaving for Troy. There it may be a gesture of farewell, and perhaps a pledge of their love (cf. Fittschen, Sagendarstellungen 55). See also on 14.136-7.

673-6 See on 633-76, and for the $\pi\rho\delta\delta\rho\mu\sigma$; cf. Lorimer, HM 415-17. $\pi\rho\sigma\delta\delta\mu\omega$ $\delta\delta\mu\sigma\nu$ is a common type of 'pleonastic' expression, as in $\alpha \pi\sigma\lambda\sigma$; $\alpha \gamma \omega\nu$ (Od. 17.247) etc. Verse 674 = 282. In 675-6 Akhilleus follows his mother's advice (128-32), again a sign of the restoration of a more normal pattern of life. But the mention of Briseis sleeping with him, at the moment when we leave Akhilleus for the last time, has great poignancy, and if we recall book 9, where Patroklos too was mentioned at this point in the parallel scene (666-8), this adds a further tinge of sadness (cf. O. Taplin, in Chios 17-18).

677–718 Hermes comes to Priam and urges him to leave, and he and Idaios do so, under his escort. At the ford of the Skamandros Hermes leaves them. At dawn they reach the city. Kassandre sees them and announces the news to the Trojans, who come out to m et th m with Hekabe and Andromakhe, amid general lamentation

The transition from the scene in Akhilleus' hut to Troy is rapidly narrated. The return mirrors the outward journey (a type of ring-structure), but here the description is brief. Attention is focused on the arrival at Troy and the intense emotional reactions which this arouses. This sets the scene for the three great final laments of the poem (723-76).

677-86 This passage resembles the opening of book 2, where Zeus lies awake debating what to do $(677-8 \sim 2.1-2)$, and then sends the Dream which reproaches Agamemnon for sleeping and urges him to action (2.5-34). Cf. 10.1-4 (10.2 = 24.678) where Agamemnon lies awake pondering what to do, and see on these passages. The pattern is discussed in connexion with dream-sequences by Arend, Scenen 61-2. E. Lévy (Ktema 7 (1982) 23-41) argues that Hermes actually comes to Priam in a dream, but this is surely not the case here.

681 For lepoùs $\pi v \lambda \alpha \omega poùs$ cf. 10.56 $\phi v \lambda \alpha \omega v$ lepòv $\pi i \lambda os$. The epithet indicates the solemnity of their commission: cf. P. Wülfing von Martitz, Glotta 38 (1960) 300-1.

682 = 23.68 (see comment), etc.

683-8 Hermes rebukes Priam for sleeping at a time of such danger. For such rebukes by figures in visions and dreams see on 23.69-92. One could, if one wished, see this speech as an allegory, Hermes representing Priam's own good sense which suddenly reasserts itself, prompted by Akhilleus' warning. But Hermes' aid goes beyond more suggestion, here as elsewhere. In waking Priam he performs the rôle which is attributed to him at 24.344.

685-8 The ransoming itself is made the theme of Hermes' warning. $\pi\alpha \overline{\imath}\delta\epsilon\varsigma$ $\tau \alpha \cdots \lambda\epsilon\lambda\epsilon\mu\mu\epsilon\nu\omega$ means 'your sons, the ones who are left behind at home'. $\pi\alpha \overline{\imath}\delta\epsilon\varsigma$ $\tau\alpha$... would be possible for 'the sons left behind by you'. In 686-8 we have a shift from optative to subjunctive similar to those at 582-6, 653-5, etc. The repetition of the verb in 688 adds to the urgency.

۰.

ţ

689–91 Verse 689 resembles 1.33, 24.571 etc. Hermes himself yokes the horses and mules and takes charge of them for greater speed, and the dactylic rhythm of 691 (with $\beta lu \varphi \alpha$) is typical of such brief descriptions of journeys: cf. 6.511, 13.29–30, 20.497, and Richardson on HyDem 89, 171. The end of 691 echoes and contrasts with 688.

692-7 Verses 692-3 = 14.433-4, 21.1-2. Verse 693 is omitted in two papyri and some MSS, and is probably an addition (cf. 351 where the river's name is not given). Verse 694 = Od. 10.307, and 695 = II. 8.1 ($\mu t \nu$). Hermes departs at the same point where he met them on the outward journey, the boundary perhaps of Trojan territory, and just as he appeared at nightfall, so he leaves at dawn. They reach Troy 'with lamentation and groaning' soon after dawn. 'The god leaves for the home of the gods; dawn illumines the earth where there is suffering and sorrow' (Macleod, Iliad XXIV 48). For the imperfect Elw cf. Od. 4.2, Chantraine, GH 1 354.

697-9 Verses 697-8 pick up 691 ('no one saw them ... except ...'); for oubé tis $\lambda \lambda o_5 | \xi \gamma v \omega$ (etc.) ... $\lambda \lambda \lambda \Delta ...$ cf. 18.404-5, and for 698 cf. 7.139 avores ... $\kappa \alpha \lambda \lambda i \zeta \omega v \omega i \pi \epsilon_5$, Od. 23.147 avore $\omega \cdot \ldots \kappa \alpha \lambda \lambda i \zeta \omega v \omega \tau \epsilon_7 v v \alpha i \kappa \omega v$, and HyAp 154.

699-702 Kassandre makes a brief but memorable appearance here. The only other mention of her in the lliad was at 13.365-7 where Othruoneus was said to have tried to marry her, and she was called the fairest of Priam's daughters (see comment). The comparison of her to Aphrodite fits this description. In Od. 11.421-3 her later death at Klutaimestre's hands is recounted by Agamemnon's ghost. bT comment that she is watching because she is deeply anxious about her brother and father, and not because the poet has any knowledge of the tradition which made her inspired. They compare Nestor at 10.532; one could add Idomeneus at 23.450-1 (see comment). We cannot tell whether the poet really does have in mind her prophetic gifts, or whether her rôle as announcer of sad news may have helped to foster the later tradition of her as prophetess of doom. As often, however, one is inclined to think that the poet knows more than he tells us, and to read the scene in the light of what we ourselves know from later tradition.

For $kt\lambda\eta \chi\rho\nu\sigma t\eta$ 'Appolity cf. 19.282 (Briseis) where the situation is similar: Briseis sees the body of Patroklos and laments him. Kassandre has gone up to the highest point in the city to watch: cf. Idomeneus at 23.451. The scene resembles the $\tau ti \chi o \sigma \kappa \sigma \pi \alpha$ in book 3, where Helen watches from the walls (161-244), and cf. Andromakhe at 6.381-403. At 701 $\alpha \sigma \tau \nu \beta \omega \sigma \tau \eta s$ ('city-crier') is an absolute hapax, with - $\beta \omega \omega \tau \eta s$ by diectasis from - $\beta \omega \tau \eta s$, a contracted form of - $\beta \sigma \eta \tau \eta s$. Cf. 577 $\kappa \alpha \lambda \eta \tau \sigma \alpha$. These two unique words for the same idea are good evidence, if such were needed, of the great range of vocabulary which the poet had at his command. In 700-2 the sequence 'her father ... the herald ... and him ...' is dramatic. Hektor is not named, but he is above all the one she is hoping to see.

• .

703-6 For | κώκυσέν τ' άρ' ἐπειτα cf. 18.37. ὄψεσθε is most probably aorist imperative, as at Od. 8.313; cf. άξετε (778 etc.), Chantraine, GH 1 418. Kassandre dwells on the past joy of Hektor's safe return from battle (χαίρετε... χάρμα), in contrast to the present grief. Cf. 17.207 and 22.444, where again μάχης ἐκ νοστήσαντι was applied to Hektor in the context of his death. Here there is a bitter, almost ironic edge to Kassandre's words, as if Homer has in mind her rôle as the unwelcome harbinger of grief.

707-18 Kassandre's cry is the signal for a scene of great dramatic power (cf. bT 707-8), which recalls the scene of despair in Troy at Hektor's death (22.405ff.). In both cases this is the prelude for the more formal laments which follow. The technique resembles that of the battle-scenes, where individual episodes are preceded by more general descriptions of fighting. The impatience of Priam to make a way through the crowd is similar to the manner in which he angrily disperses the crowd and rebukes his sons at 237-64 (cf. Deichgräber, Letzte Gesang 79). Cf. also 6.238-41, where the women crowd round Hektor when he enters Troy.

708 For άάσχετον see on 5.892.

730-32 Andromakhe and Hekabe tear their hair in mourning for Hektor: τόν γε is accusative with τιλλέσθην, as if this meant 'they mourned him'. This is common with verbs of mourning ritual, e.g. Hdt. 2.61 τόν δὲ τύπτονται, E. Tro. 623 κἀπεκοψάμην νεκρόν, etc. For the action see on 22.77-8. They also throw themselves upon the waggon, and touch the dead man's head: cf. 724 where Andromakhe holds his head during her lament, and see on 23.136.

713-15 πρόπαν ήμαρ ές ήέλιον καταδύντα is formular $(3 \times 11., 6 \times 0d.)$, but for the whole sentence cf. 23.154-5 καl νύ κ' όδυρομένοισιν έδυ φάος ήελιοιο, | εl μή ... είπε ..., with comment.

716-17 Priam's words are peremptory, almost harsh: 'Let me pass through with the mules! Later you can have your fill of weeping...' $d\sigma \epsilon \sigma \theta \epsilon$ is a 'permissive' future, as in 6.70-1 $\sharp\pi\epsilon \tau \alpha \ldots \sigma \nu \lambda \eta \sigma \epsilon \tau \epsilon$, etc. $\kappa \lambda \alpha \nu \theta \mu \delta \varsigma$ occurs only here in II., $\delta \times Od$.

718-76 Hektor is brought home and laid on a bed. By it they set singers, who lead in singing a dirge, and the women join in keening. Andromakhe begins their lament, followed by Hekabe and Helen. All join in lamentation

Of all the scenes of lamentation in the last third of the poem this is the most formal. Only here is the mourning led by professional singers, who sing $\theta \rho \eta v \sigma_1$, formal laments, and the women set up an accompaniment of cries. Against this accompaniment are set the individual spoken laments of the women of the family, Hektor's wife, mother, and sister-in-law. These in turn are supported by more general lamentation. The speeches of Andromakhe and Hekabe echo and complement those in book 22 (431-6, 477-514), where again there were three speeches after Hektor's death, Priam's being the first (416-28). There, however, the poet kept Hektor's wife to the end, whereas here it is natural that she should lead the laments. That Helen should be the last to speak is, however, less expected, and it is surely significant that she, who was the cause of the war, should speak thus so near the poem's end.

To some extent the three laments are similar in structure. Each one is introduced and followed by parallel verses with variations (723, 747, 762; 746, 760, 776). Each begins by addressing the dead man, as husband, son, brother-in-law. The opening themes, Andromakhe's sense of loss of a husband, Hekabe's pride that her son was and is dear to the gods, Helen's loss of her only friend at Troy, are resumed at the end of each speech. The central part is a narrative section, Andromakhe's vision of Troy's fate, Hekabe's recollection of the deaths of her sons, Helen's memory of Hektor's kindness. There is closer parallelism between the shorter speeches of Hekabe and Helen. The openings (748-69, 762-63) are very similar to each other, and both speeches are concerned with Hektor's $\phi_i\lambda_i\alpha$, his nearness to the gods and to Helen. Both contain a contrast between Hektor and others (the rest of Hekabe's sons, Paris and the rest of Helen's relations by her marriage). On their structure see Lohmann, Reden 108-12, Alexiou, Ritual Lament 132-3.

There is also a clear association with Hektor's homecoming in book 6. There he was greeted by Hekabe, Helen and Andromakhe (254-62, 344-58, 407-39), and there are many links with these scenes, for example in Hekabe's concern there with Hektor's piety, Helen's self-reproach and sympathy for Hektor, Andromakhe's preoccupation with her own fate and that of her child. Each of the women speaks in character, in a way consistent with the speeches which they make elsewhere. On Andromakhe's lament and its connexions with books 6 and 22 see Lohmann, Andromache-Szenen 70-4.

Finally these laments are 'praise poems', encomia, like later funeral speeches. They praise Hektor's prowess in war, his piety, and his kindness. Cf. Reiner, Die rituelle Totenklage 62-7, 116-20, who comments on the close association between such praise poems and the development of epic poetry, $\kappa\lambda\epsilon\alpha$ $\delta\nu\delta\rho\omega\nu$. It is appropriate that these speeches should come at the end of the Iliad. So too, Beowulf ends in mourning and praise for the hero (3169-82, translated by M. Alexander):

Then the warriors rode around the barrow, twelve of them in all, athelings'.sons. They recited a dirge to declare their grief, spoke of the man, mourned their King. They praised his manhood and the prowess of his hands, they raised his name; it is right a man should be lavish in honouring his lord and friend, should love him in his heart when the leading-forth from the house of flesh befalls him at last. This was the manner of the mourning of the men of the Geats, sharers in the feast, at the fall of their lord: they said that he was of all the world's kings the gentlest of men, and the most gracious, the kindest to his people, the keenest for fame.

For a sensitive treatment of the whole theme of ritual lament see P. Levi, The Lamentation of the Dead (Anvil Press Poetry 1984).

719-22 The body is laid on a bed within the house. This is the beginning of the prothesis, which later would normally take place inside the house, and which was the chief occasion for the ritual lament; cf. 19.210-13, and Reiner, Die rituelle Totenklage 35ff. For $\tau \rho \eta \tau \sigma \bar{\sigma} s \ell \nu \lambda \epsilon \chi \ell \epsilon \sigma \sigma \sigma$ (with comment), and similar phrases $4 \times Od$. The epithet probably refers to the holes bored in the frame for leather thongs or fibres to be passed through to support the bedding: cf. Laser, Arch. Hom. P 30-2.

Verses 720-2 mean 'and by the bed they set singers, leaders of the dirges, who in the mournful song themselves led the dirge, while the women wailed in accompaniment'. The form of the sentence is broken after doibny, and instead of the simple verb topfytov, the sentence is divided into per and δέ clauses. ἀοιδός, θρηνεῖν, θρηνεῖν, and Εξαρχος occur only here in the poem; cf. doibos frequently in Od., doibh etc. in Il., oppreiv Od. 24.61, εξάρχειν common in II. εξαρχος is rare later, and particularly used in connexion with the cults of Dionusos and Sabazios in the classical period (E. Ba. 141, Dem. 18.260). The vulgate reading is opprovs, which would presumably be taken as an epithet (cf. 8pnycobours AT), and most MSS have $\xi d \rho \chi o \upsilon \sigma(t)$ as a verb with the relative clause of $\tau \epsilon \dots d \sigma t \delta \eta v$. But there is no evidence for this sense of oppivos, and the word order is un-Homeric. Ecopyos and Ecopyeiv are virtually technical terms for leading a group of singers or dancers: cf. ({\$) npxe y6010 18.316, 24.723, 24.747, 24.761, and 18.605-6 etc. In the laments for Patroklos the captive Trojan women take up the refrain (18.28-31, 18.339-42, 19.301-2), and at Akhilleus' funeral the Nereids (presumably led by Thetis) lament and the Muses sing a dirge antiphonally (Od. 24.55-61). Later, hired mourners were not uncommon: cf. A. Cho. 733, Pl. Laws 800E, Plut. Solon 21.4 (probably), and Alexiou, Ritual Lament 10-14. $\theta \rho \tilde{\eta} voi$ themselves developed into a particular type of lyric composition, like those of Simonides, Pindar and others (Reiner, Die rituelle Totenklage 71-100). It is possible that even in Homer there is a distinction between the more or less spontaneous y605 of relatives or friends, and the $\theta \rho \tilde{\eta} voi$ sung by outsiders or professionals (cf. 720-1, Od. 24.60-1, Reiner, Die rituelle Totenklage 9 etc., Alexiou, Ritual Lament 11-14).

In antiquity the practice of singing dirges was believed to be originally non-Greek or oriental (Reiner, Die rituelle Totenklage 59-61, 66), and ancient scholars noted that $\theta \rho \eta voi$ are mentioned only here in a Trojan context, and not in connexion with Patroklos (cf. T, Eust., Suda s.v. $\theta \rho \eta vo v \varsigma$). T adds that this is a reason for athetizing Od. 24.60-1. They may well be right to detect in this another feature differentiating the Trojans from the Greeks (cf. von der Mühll, Hypomnema 387; Hall, Barbarian 44, is sceptical). In the laments of Andromakhe and Hekabe, however, there is nothing obviously foreign, and their restraint is one of their remarkable features. In many societies such laments are primarily, or exclusively, the affair of women; E. Samter, Volkskunde im altsprachlichen Unterricht, 1 Homer (Berlin 1923) 124-30, collects many examples.

723-4 Andromakhe holds Hektor's head in her hands as she utters her lament (see on 23.136). The poet could have used the phrase $d\delta ivo\tilde{v}$ length for γ 23, as at 747 and 761. Instead he prefers the epithet $\lambda \epsilon v \kappa \omega \lambda \epsilon v o \varsigma$ for Andromakhe, which he had used of her in book 6 (371, 377), but otherwise reserved almost exclusively for Here (24×; once of Helen). This could be a further sign that he has in mind the meeting of Hektor and Andromakhe in book 6. Mark Edwards sees this as a visual touch: 'it is hard not to think that the change of the adjective is intended to evoke more vividly the picture of her bare arms around the corpse' (HPI 314). Instead of the majority reading $dv\delta po\phi \delta voio$ two papyri and some MSS have $l\pi\pi o \delta 4 \mu o corps$ at 736-9. For the two formulae see on 16.717-18.

725-45 She begins with the themes of Hektor's early death, her widowhood, and the fate of her child, with a clear echo of her lament in book 22 $(725-7 \sim 22.482-5; \text{ cf. also } 6.407-9)$. The one protector of Troy is gone $(728-30 \sim 22.507, 6.402-3)$, and she foresees the slavery in store for herself and the other Trojan women $(731-2 \sim 6.410-13, 6.450-63)$. Astuanax will either follow them into slavery, or else he will be killed, thrown from the wall by an Achaean in revenge for Hektor's killing of a kinsman (732-8). This goes beyond any earlier prediction about his fate

(6.476-81, 22.487-506). It leads to the subject of Hektor's fierceness in war (739), which will be counterbalanced by what Helen will say of his kindness, and this brings Andromakhe back to the sense of loss felt by the people, Hektor's family, and herself above all (740-2). She closes with a very personal touch: in dying, he could not stretch out his hands to her from his bed, or speak a last word which she could keep in her memory to console her grief (743-5). Just so at the end of her lament in book 22, she spoke of the clothes which should have been used for his funeral, but which were now no use to him. In both cases the underlying theme is the same, the denial of the normal consolations and rites associated with death. The speech moves naturally from one theme to the next, with a high frequency of enjambment, so that the thematic transitions often occur in mid-verse or mid-sentence, and many of the emphatic words (especially verbs) occur at the beginning of verses. This flowing style is similar to that of her speeches in books 6 and 22.

Andromakhe's vision of impending disaster is paralleled by one of the laments at the end of Beowulf (3150-5):

A woman of the Geats in grief sang out the lament for his death. Loudly she sang, her hair bound up, the burden of her fear that evil days were destined her — troops cut down, terror of armies, bondage, humiliation. Heaven swallowed the smoke.

725-6 She does not name him as Hekabe and Helen do, but simply calls him 'husband'. ἀπ' αίῶνος νέος ὥλεο is an unusual expression, which seems to mean 'you have been robbed of your (proper) span of life while still young' (cf. Eust. 1373.23). For ὅλλυσθαι with ἀπό or ἐκ cf. 18.107, Od. 15.91, and for χήρην see on 22.484. The sound-patterns of 725 are striking:

άνερ, άπ' αίῶνος νέος ῶλεο, κάδ δέ με χήρην.

For the complaint of desertion in 725ff. see on 22.484-6.

726-8 In 726-7, This 5' ... Surdupopol = 22.484-5. In a natural way at 727-8 Andromakhe speaks of her son dying when Troy is sacked, whereas at 732-5 she envisages that he may survive, and then again that he may be killed.

728-30 For Kar' akpns in connexion with Troy's sack cf. 13.772-3, 15.557-8, 22.411. $\frac{1}{2}\pi$ for Kar' akpns in connexion with Troy's sack cf. 13.772-3, 15.557-8, 22.411. $\frac{1}{2}\pi$ for Kar's (guardian') is glossed by the relative clause; see on 22.255. The frequentative imperfect protect (cf. product) occurs only here. $\frac{1}{2}\chi_{55}$ alludes to the etymology of Hektor's name (cf. T, and Pl. Crat. 393A-B), as with Astuanax (6.402-3, 22.506-7); cf. 5.473-4, where Sarpedon reproaches Hektor for thinking that he can 'hold the city alone', unaided by his allies. The chiastic order of the relative clause, with the two verbs juxtaposed at the beginning of 730, emphasizes the main idea. For 730 cf. 4.238 (with comment), etc.

731-2 Macleod suggests that ' $\delta \chi \eta \sigma \sigma \nu \tau \alpha_1$ seems to continue the wordplay, this time with a pathetic contrast: before, Hector "kept" them, now they "will be carried (off)". For $\delta \chi \epsilon \sigma \sigma \alpha_1$ in connexion with the sea cf. Od. 5.54; it is commonly used later of being on a ship. In the Cyclic epics and later tradition Andromakhe becomes the slave and concubine of Neoptolemos; cf. lliupersis, OCT vol. v, p. 108.9 (= Davies, EGF p. 62.31), llias Parva fr. 19 (= Davies, EGF fr. 20), etc.

732-40 Here Andromakhe addresses Astuanax instead of Hektor. Whether he is actually present or not we are not told, but the pathos of the apostrophe is the same. Cf. 741-2, where she again addresses Hektor in mid-sentence (and bT on 732, 739). In 732-3 (η kµol aù $\tau \tilde{\eta}$... kpyáčoio) the frequency of vowel-sounds and hiatus is noticeable, especially in kpya čenkéa kpyáčoio which mirrors the ugliness of what she has in mind. Again in 734 á $\theta\lambda\epsilon$ iww πρό čvaktos ἀµειλίχου has strong assonance. ἀµείλιχos is used of Hades and Erinus at 9.158, 9.568, the only other occurrences in the poem, and it is echoed by 739. πρό means 'in the face of' and so virtually 'on behalf of' (cf. 8.57).

734-9 That a child should be thrown from the walls in vengeance would, one imagines, not be so uncommon in a sack (cf. bT 735, Eust. 1373.43), and need not reflect a precisely formed tradition. In fact, Aristarchus (Arn/A, T) thought that this passage was the origin of the later legends. In the lliupersis Astuanax is killed by Odysseus, apparently by being thrown from the wall: OCT vol. v, p. 108.8 and lliupersis fr. 2 (=Davies, EGF p. 62.30, fr. 3). In the llias Parva (fr. 19.3-5 = Davies, EGF fr. 20.3-5) Neoptolemos seizes him by the foot and hurls him to his death:

> παΐδα δ' έλών έκ κόλπου έϋπλοκάμοιο τιθήνης βίψε ποδός τεταγών άπὸ πύργου, τὸν δὲ πεσόντα ἕλλαβε πορφύρεος θάνατος καὶ μοῖρα κραταιή

(cf. Paus. 10.25.9). The language of this version echoes or parallels that of the lliad, and it looks as if the poet is trying to outdo the Homeric version, by substituting $\pi \sigma \delta \delta \varsigma$ rerayów for $\chi \epsilon_1 \rho \delta \varsigma \epsilon_1 \delta \omega v$, as in ll. 1.591 (Hephaistos' fall from heaven). In Euripides' Troades Odysseus persuades the Greeks that Astuanax must die, and he is thrown from the wall (721-5, 1134-5). The death of Astuanax was often portrayed in archaic and later art (LIMC II.1 s.v. Astyanax 1), but it is uncertain whether he is the subject of two early representations, one on a late Geometric vase, the other on the Myconos pithos of the early seventh century (LIMC II.1 s.v. Astyanax 1 nos. 26 and 27), although in the second case many scholars have assumed that he is.

Andromakhe speculates that the agent of her son's death may be someone angry over a kinsman's death at Hektor's hand. This is not precisely mirrored in the later versions, but that does not tell us what tradition already existed. For vagueness over a similar future event, certainly already fixed by legend, cf. for example Akhilleus' uncertainty about his predicted death at 21.111-13, with comment. On the relationship of this passage to later versions see also Beck, Stellung 157-68. E. Tro. 742-4 look like an echo of this passage: (Andromakhe to Astuanax) f_1 Toũ πατρός δέ σ' εὐγένει' ἀποκτενεῖ,] f_1 τοῖσιν ἅλλοις γίγνεται σωτηρία, | τὸ δ' ἐσθλὸν οὐκ ἐς καιρὸν $f_1 λθέ σοι πατρός.$

The grimness of 734-5 is justified by the equally grim assertions of 736-9, and $\lambda \nu \gamma \rho \delta \nu \delta \lambda \epsilon \theta \rho o \nu (735)$ is echoed by $\epsilon \nu \delta \alpha \delta \lambda \nu \gamma \rho \eta (739)$, $\delta \lambda \gamma \epsilon \alpha \lambda \nu \gamma \rho \Delta (742)$, as 739 also picks up 734. $\delta \nu \alpha \xi$ meaning 'master' of a slave occurs only here in ll., frequently in Od. For 738 cf. 7.105, for 737-8 cf. 19.61 $\tau \omega \kappa' \sigma \nu$ $\tau \delta \sigma \sigma \sigma \tau \delta \sigma \Delta \xi$ Elov $\delta \sigma \pi \epsilon \tau \sigma \nu \sigma \delta \sigma \varsigma$.

740-2 These verses form a tricolon crescendo: 'the people ... his parents ... myself above all', with effective variation in the phrasing of each clause. The subject changes in each case, as does the tense of the verb (present, past, future), and the change to apostrophe in mid-sentence is particularly vivid, with 'Extop in emphatic runover position, followed at once by $l \mu ol \delta l$. For this juxtaposition and contrast of dead man and mourners cf. 725-6 (etc.), and Alexiou, Ritual Lament 171-7. Later, classical laments and epitaphs often emphasize the sorrow which the dead man has left to those who survive: S. Aj. 972-3 Alos yàp aùtois oùdit' $lotiv, d\lambda\lambda'$ $l \mu ol | \lambda i m dv dv los kal ydous biolx etai, and (e.g.) W. Peek, Griechische$ Versinschriften 1 (Heidelberg 1955) 697.5-6, 2002.7-8; R. Lattimore, Themesin Greek and Latin Epitaphs (Illinois 1962) 179-82.

Verse 741 = 17.37, and we should probably read $\delta p \rho \eta \tau \sigma v$ in both cases (see comment there). Cf. also 5.155-8.

743-5 bT (on 744) say 'this is true to life: for in one's sorrows the last words of those dear to one are a sweet thing for consolation'. Cf. Plut. Mor. 117B: 'if the dying man spoke to them, they always keep this in their mind as a kindling for grief'. At the end of the Agricola (45.5) Tacitus regrets that he and Agricola's daughter were not present at his death: exceptissemus certe mandata vocesque, quas penitus animo figeremus. Cf. Alexiou, Ritual Lament 183-4 for modern Greek examples. $\pi \nu \kappa \nu \delta \nu \epsilon \pi \sigma s$ (75, etc.) has particular force here: 'a word full of meaning', something enduring and substantial; cf. Martin, Language of Heroes 35-6. For the optative $\mu \epsilon \mu \nu \gamma \mu \eta \nu$ see on 23.361, and Chantraine, GH 1465.

746 = 22.515. The poet varies the verse describing this refrain after each lament (cf. 760, 776, and see on 22.429). Here it is the women, echoing 722, at 760 the y605 is more general, and at 776 it is the whole of the bijuos dimension. 747 This verse echoes 723 and is picked up again at 761; cf. 22.430 (Hekabe), etc.

748-59 Hekabe's lament at 22.431-6 was passionate and despairing (cf. 22.82-9, 24.201-16), but here she is unusually controlled. It is above all her fierce pride in the greatest of her sons which stands out, and this fits her character (cf. 22.432-6, 24.215-16). There may be an implicit sense of triumph, that after all Akhilleus failed in his attempt to disfigure Hektor's corpse, and all that he did was of no use to Patroklos after his death. By contrast the theme of Hektor's piety and the special divine protection of his body appears for the last time, and forms the chief encomiastic element in her lament. For this theme cf. especially 416-23, closely recalled here by her words. The speech falls into four sections of three verses each (noted by von Leutsch: see Leaf on 723). This gives it a steadily measured quality.

748-50 Verses 748-49 are echoed by Helen's opening words (762-3). For the comparison between life and death in 749-50 cf. Hekabe's first lament at 22.435-6 (with comment on 430-6). The repetition of $\pi\epsilon\rho$... $\pi\epsilon\rho$... stresses the antithesis: 'certainly in life you were dear to the gods: and after all ($\alpha\rho\alpha$), even in death ...' Verse 750 resembles Priam's pious reflection at 425-8.

751-6 Hekabe speaks as if Akhilleus had spared the lives of several of her sons, in contrast to his savagery against Hektor. Cf. Isos and Antiphos (11.104-6) whom he ransomed, and Lukaon (21.34ff.) who was sold by him to Euneos of Lemnos. Akhilleus himself spoke of the many Trojans he had spared before Patroklos' death (21.99-102). In 753 Samos is Samothrace, as at 78 etc. άμιχθαλόεις occurs only here in Homer, and again at HyAp 36 "Ιμβρος τ' εύκτιμένη και Λημνος άμιχθαλόεσσα; Antimachus (fr. 141 W.) apparently read μιχθαλόεσσαν. Callimachus (fr. 18.8 Pf.) has auxbadoessav hepa of a dark sea-mist; cf. Colluthus 208 άμιχθαλόεντος άπ' ήέρος δμβρον leïσα. The word was said to have survived in Cypriote with the sense evolution, but van der Valk doubts this (Researches 1 488). There is a discussion of it in a papyrus commentary on Callimachus (A. Henrichs, ZPE 4 (1969) 23-30, with Erbse v 509). The chief ancient suggestions were: prosperous, rocky and steep, hard to approach or inhospitable (duiktos), misty and hard to catch sight of The cloud of uncertainty around this foggy gloss has not been lifted by modern scholarship (Chantraine, Dict. and LfgrE s.v., Leumann, HW 214, etc.), unless I have myself failed to catch sight of a solution. The translation 'misty' would fit here.

έξέλετο ψυχήν is not a formular expression for killing someone (cf. 22.257 σήν δὲ ψυχήν ἀφέλωμαι). For ταναηκέι χαλκῷ see on 23.118. The frequentative form ἐνσταζω occurs only here in II., 2× Od. (16.109 = 20.319); cf.

Od. 18.224 puortantius. Both words denote rough or brutal handling. Verse 755 resembles 51-2, 416-17. The conclusion of 756 is bitter: cf. Akhilleus' words to Priam about Hektor at 551, oùbé un dvorthous.

757-9 For Epothers see on 419. πρόσφατος (only here in Homer; common in later Greek) means 'fresh'; the original sense was probably 'newly killed' (cf. Chantraine, Dict. s.v. $\theta\epsilon$ ivω). Verses 758-59 resemble several Odyssean passages referring to a sudden, painless death, sent by Apollo or Artemis or both: 3.279-80, 5.123-4, 11.172-3, 11.198-9, 15.410 11. A quotes the variant ols dyavoïoi βέλεσσιν ... καταπέφνη, which a papyrus has (and καταπέφνη in some MSS), and the 'generalizing' subjunctive seems better here than the aorist. Apollo's protection of the body (18-21, 23.188-91) makes this comparison particularly suitable (cf. Reinhardt, IuD 484), and these verses make a lovely, quiet close to this lament. Contrast the opening scene of book 1 (8-52): Apollo the destroyer becomes Apollo the preserver, who even in death keeps Hektor's body intact (see Introduction, 'Structure', pp. 5-6).

760 See on 746, and cf. 20.31 πόλεμον δ' άλίαστον έγειρε.

762-75 Helen's speech is a masterpiece of characterization and pathos, which should be compared with her speeches to Priam in book 3 (172-80), and to Hektor in book 6 (344-58). There and elsewhere (e.g. 3.242, 3.404, 3.410-12) remorse and bitterness about her marriage with Paris and contempt for him (cf. 3.428-36) were prominent. But her respect for Priam, who treated her so gently (3.162-5), and her sympathy for Hektor, who bore the chief burden of the fighting for her sake, also came out strongly (3.172, 6.354-8). Here too she stresses Hektor's kindness, and Priam's (770), in contrast by implication to her husband Paris and the other Trojans. Self-reproach comes out in her wish to have died before coming to Troy (764, if that is the right reading), and self-pity in 773-5, again characteristic of Helen (e.g. 3.411-12, 6.357-8). There is also a note of longing for home in 765-6, where she speaks of having been away for twenty years: cf. 3.174-6, 3.232-42 (Idomeneus, her brothers), and Od. 4.259-64. Throughout all Helen's speeches there runs a preoccupation with her complex family relationships, at home in Greece and here in Troy: that is why kinship words (days, haupos, haupon, moors, ulos, mais, αύτοκασιγνήτω, γνωτοί, γαλόω, είνατερες) recur so often (see on 3.180). Verses 762-63 echo 748-49. Helen uses 80mp of Hektor at 6.344, 6.355, and of Agamemnon at 3.180; cf. 24.769. It must be scanned botpow at 769, and either thus or δάξρων here.

763-7 The train of thought is 'truly Paris is my husband, and I had no right to expect such kindness from Hektor as I did from him: and yet ...'

764 The vulgate reading is $\dot{\omega}_5 \pi \rho l v \ddot{\omega} \phi \epsilon \lambda \lambda^* \dot{\alpha} \pi \rho \lambda \epsilon \sigma \delta \sigma \sigma$, but Aristarchus (Did/T) and some MSS read $\dot{\omega}_5 \pi \rho l v \ddot{\omega} \phi \epsilon \lambda \lambda \rho v \delta \lambda \epsilon \sigma \delta \sigma \sigma$. At 3.428-9 Helen wishes that Paris had been killed in his duel with Menelaos, but that was in an outburst of contempt against him just after that event. On the other hand her wish to have died herself echoes what she said both to Priam at 3.173-5 and to Hektor, even more passionately, at 6.345-8. Such a wish is common in laments: cf. Hekabe at 22.431-2, and Andromakhe at 22.481 ($iss \mu$) $ispen \lambda \in Texterson(1)$, with comment there.

765-7 Helen's point is that it is a very long time since she left home, and yet Hektor was never unkind to her. Twenty is a standard figure in Homer (e.g. 13.260, 16.847, Od. 4.360, 5.34, and Reinhardt, JuD 488-9). The Iliad takes place in the tenth year of the war, and for a longer period twenty is the next major figure: cf. 9.379, 22.349, 11.33-4, etc. AbT and Eustathius explained this as due to the time taken to gather the expedition (cf. 4.27-8, 11.765-70, Od. 24.115-19). One could add the wanderings of Paris on the way to Troy (6.289 -92), or later traditions of an abortive first expedition which landed in Mysia, of Akhilleus' stay in Skuros (schol. 19.326), and of the delay at Aulis before sailing for Troy, all of which were related in the Cyclic epics (cf. Kullmann, Quellen 189-200). But this is all unnecessary, and the poet may well have invented this detail ad hoc for Helen's speech (cf. J. T. Kakridis, Gnomon 32 (1960) 407). In the Odyssey Odysseus returns home in the twentieth year since he left, but this does not need to be reconciled with what Helen says. Her words at 765-6 are paralleled by Od. 19.222-3 (with reference to Odysseus); for discussion of the two passages and their possible relationship cf. Reinhardt, luD 485-90, J. T. Hooker, La Parola del Passato 127 (1986) 111-13.

For the pattern of 765-7 cf. 2.798 9 $\tilde{\eta}$ μέν δ $\tilde{\eta}$ μάλα πολλά μάχας εΙσήλυθον άνδρῶν, | άλλ' οὕ πω τοιόνδε τοσόνδε τε λαὸν ὅπωπα, and 10.548-50, Od. 4.267-70. In 767 ἀσύφηλον is a rare word, which recurs at 9.647 and very occasionally later (Quintus of Smyrna 9.521 and late prose). It must mean something like 'rude' or 'harmful' here; see Chantraine, Dict. and LfgrE s.v. Cf. Od. 4.690 (Odysseus) οῦτε τινὰ ῥέξας ἐξαίσιον οῦτε τι εἰπών.

768-72 This is the only case in Homer of a conditional clause with 'iterative' optative, but it is a natural corollary to temporal and relative clauses of this kind, and is common later (cf. Chantraine, GH II, 224-5). Most MSS read ένίσποι, which perhaps reflects A's variant ένίσσοι, itself a possible reading. But ένίπτειν is commoner and occurs on its own, without έπέεσσιν etc. For γαλόω and είνάτερες see on 22.473. The contrast in 770 suggests what the rough edge of Hekabe's tongue could do, and Priam's fatherly gentleness recalls 3.162-5 (cf. Priam's φίλον τέκος in 3.162). The picture of Hektor's kindness to her in 771-2 is enhanced by the repetitions and sentence-structure, with $\sigma v \dots \sigma \bar{\eta} \dots \sigma \sigma \bar{\sigma} \varsigma$... stressing his exceptional behaviour, έπέεσσι ... έπέσσι framing the whole, and άγανοφροσύνη...

àyavoĩs $\xi\pi\xi\epsilon\sigma\sigma$ 1 dwelling on his gentleness. There is similar pathos in the speech of Odysseus' mother at Od. 11.202-3:

άλλά με σός τε πόθος, σά τε μήδεα, φαίδιμ' Όδυσσεῦ, σῆ τ' ἀγανοφροσύνη μελιηδέα θυμὸν ἀπηύρα.

The contrast there with ois dyavois $\beta \epsilon \lambda \epsilon \sigma \sigma v$ at 199, and the fact that 199 repeats II. 24.759, suggests that the Iliad scene is in the poet's mind here, especially since dyavoppoouvn occurs nowhere else in Homer (cf. 20.467 dyavoppow) or later.

773-5 Helen returns to the present, her grief at the loss of Hektor, her self-pity and desolation. Like Andromakhe she links grief for Hektor with sorrow for herself, and kai $\epsilon\mu$ ' $\delta\mu\mu\rho\rho\nu$ recalls Andromakhe at 6.408 (cf. 24.727). The ending leaves a very bitter taste, with $\pi\epsilon\phi\rho$ (kaoiv ('shudder at') as the final word: cf. 19.325 $\rhoi\gamma\epsilon\delta\alpha\nu\eta$ 5 'Elévys.

776 'Not only the women lament here; for she aroused greater grief. With the greatest pathos ($\tilde{\epsilon}\lambda\epsilon\sigma\varsigma$) the poet concludes the lliad', comment bT, comparing later perorations. Leaf says that ' $\delta\eta\mu\sigma\varsigma$ is nowhere else used in the sense of multitude', but it presumably means the whole people of Troy; cf. 3.50 πόλη[†] τε παντί τε δήμω, etc. ἀπείρων elsewhere in Homer is applied to sea or land, except for Od. 8.340 δεσμοὶ ἀπείρωνε; but cf. HyAphr 120 ὅμιλος ἀπείριτος, Hes. Aspis 472 λαὸς ἀπείρων, HyDem 296 πολυπείρονα λαόν.

777-804 Priam orders the Trojans to collect wood for the pyre, and for nine days they do so. On the tenth day Hektor's body is burnt. Next day the pyre is quenched, the body is buried, and the people hold the funeral feast in Priam's palace

By contrast with the funeral of Patroklos, and with the leisurely pace of the narrative in this Book, the final description of Hektor's funeral rites is economical (cf. Eust. 1375.30ff.), although at 788-801 the actual burial is described in detail as at 23.250-7. The train of events resembles that for Patroklos, although not always in the same order. There (unusually) the funeral feast came before the burial (see on 23.1-34), and after the gathering of wood (110-26) the ekphora took place (128-37), followed by the building of the pyre (163-4), the burning (177-225), and burial. There is no mention here of funeral games, which would be quite out of place; they would not suit the state of siege and shortness of the truce. Moreover the poet wants as quiet and simple a close as possible, with all the emphasis falling on the burial itself. On the order of ceremonies see M. W. Edwards, 'The conventions of a Homeric funeral', in Studies in Honour of T. B. L. Webster (edd. J. H. Betts, J. T. Hooker and J. R. Green), 1 (Bristol 1986) 84-92.

778-81 Priam's speech contains the briefest of instructions (778), with a reassurance against ambush (cf. Akhilleus' promise at 669-72), echoed at 799-800. Entreak means that Akhilleus gave orders to this effect as a guarantee of security.

782-7 άγινεῖν recurs at 18.493, $4 \times Od.$, $5 \times HyAp$. For άσπετον ὕλην in this context cf. 23.127. The building of the pyre is taken for granted. Verse 785 = 6.175 (with ροδοδάκτυλος, which is a variant here too). φαεσίμβροτος occurs first here; cf. Od. 10.138, Hes. Th. 958 φαεσιμβρότου 'Hελίοιο. It is perhaps used because of ροδοδάκτυλος in 788. Εξέφερον is the technical word for the funeral procession; cf. Hdt. 7.117, etc., and see on 23.127-53. Verse 787 echoes 23.165 (άχνύμενοι κῆp).

788-801 The burial takes place after dawn, as at 226-57. Cf. Od. 24.72, and II. 7.433-6 (twilight before dawn), where 434 closely resembles 789; in both cases we should read flypero ('gathered'), with a few MSS here, for the vulgate \sharp ypero ('woke up'). Verse 788 = 1.477. For this Odyssean verse see comment there; but (pace Kirk) the echo of book 1 may be significant. Likewise the Odyssean 790 recalls 1.57 (see comment). Both assemblies follow immediately after the reference to 'nine days...on the tenth' (1.53-4, 24.784-5), even if in book 24 the gathering is actually on the eleventh day, not the tenth (but see on 801-3). Verse 790 is omitted by one papyrus and several groups of MSS including A, and it is dispensable, but the repetition in 789-90 is paralleled by Od. 2.8-9.

Verses 791-801 should be compared with 23.250-7, with comments. Verse 791 = 23.250, and the first half of 801 = 23.257. But the language of the rest is significantly varied, although the basic series of actions is similar. In both cases, after the pyre has been quenched with wine, the bones are gathered and covered with cloth, and a mound is built. There the tomb was to be a cenotaph (see on 254) until Akhilleus' own death. At 23.253 Patroklos' bones were put in a golden φιάλη for the time being, whereas here the bones can be placed directly in a coffin ($\lambda d\rho v \alpha \xi$), the equivalent of the $\sigma \circ \rho \circ \varsigma$ which will ultimately hold the remains of both Patroklos and his friend (see on 23.91). For the word Adpvat cf. 18.413, the only other occurrence in Homer. The grave is mentioned only here. κοίλην κάπετον of a grave recurs twice in Sophocles' Ajax (1165, 1403). Verses 797-8 seem to indicate a layer of stones over the grave, whereas the verb xtw (799, 801) suggests that these are then covered by a mound of earth: see on 255-6. The simple khalovtes of 23.252 is here developed into the full verse 794, with emphatic runover μυρόμενοι. Verse 796 is a lovely, euphonious four-word verse to describe the purple clothing with which the bones are covered: see on 23.254, both for this practice and for the colour described. Verse 798 is again a majestic four-word verse of similar type and almost identical rhythm, with three long dative forms framing the verb, which occurs only here in Il., $2 \times Od$. In 799–800 þíµ $\phi\alpha$ is significant: there is no time to delay, and the mention of the scouts and danger of attack are vivid touches, reminding the audience for the last time that this is only a brief pause in the larger action of the war. For $\sigma\kappa\sigma\pi\sigma$ $\eta\sigma\tau\sigma$ cf. 18.523.

The effect of the great burial-mounds of the Troad such as Hektor's is nowhere better described than by Hektor himself, before his duel with Aias, where he speaks of how his opponent's will become a landmark for passing sailors, who will pronounce his epitaph and so commemorate Hektor's own fame for ever (7.86-91).

801-3 At 665 Priam speaks of holding the feast directly after the funeral on the tenth day, before the building of the tumulus, whereas it actually occurs on the eleventh as the final ceremony, thus giving the quiet but celebratory ending. Mark Edwards comments: 'Perhaps this implies again the Trojans' fear of a Greek attack, but more probably it is to enable the poet to concentrate his ending not only upon the dead Hector but also upon the living and doomed Trojans and their city' (HPI 315). In 802 eV means 'in due fashion', like Latin rite; cf. 2.382-4, etc. ($\delta\alpha(\nu\nu\nu\tau')$) έρικυδέα δαῖτα is Odyssean (4×). For Πριάμοιο διοτρεφέος βασιλῆος cf. 5.464. That the feast should take place within the palace, rather than near the pyre, could again be due to the focus on Troy itself, but it may simply be the natural place for it to be held, since Priam would be the giver of the feast. Whatever the truth, these lines have a stately dignity appropriate to the conclusion.

804 Some ancient texts (T, one first-century A.D. papyrus) offered an alternative ending, which linked the lliad to the Aithiopis:

ώς οι γ' άμφίεπον τάφον Έκτορος. ήλθε δ' Άμάζων,

followed by

Άρηος θυγάτηρ μεγαλήτορος άνδροφόνοιο (T) or

Ότρήρ[η]<s> θυγάτηρ εὐειδής Πενθεσίλ (ε)
ια (pap. 104)

Cf. the summary of the Aithiopis (OCT vol. v, p. 105.22-3 = Davies, EGF p. 47.4): Άμαζων Πενθεσίλεια παραγίνεται Τρωσί συμμαχήσουσα, etc.

This simple but noble verse closes the poem, which began with the wrath of Akhilleus, and ends with the burial of Hektor, tamer of horses.

GENERAL INDEX TO VOLUME VI

Aeschylus: Choiphoroe, 182; fr. 350 N.*, 283; mourning figures in, 292; Niebe, 340; Phryges, 142, 282, 291; Psychagogoi, 256; Psychostasia, 129 after life, beliefs about, see psücht Agamemnon: and Khruses, 334-5; at funeral of Patroklos, 179; in the Games, 165, 207, 269-71; ruthlessness of, 62, 344-5 Agenor, 9, 96, 99-104 Aias (Locrian), 213, 219-24, 249-57 Aias (Telamonian), 245-9, 259-62, 264 Aides, alows, 15, 60, 115, 117-18, 280-2, 295, 317, 326-7 Aineias: duels with and divine rescue of, 10, 36-7; family of, 160 Aithe, 207, 217, 227 Aithiopis, 63, 143, 145, 202, 246, 272, 361 Akheloos, 69, 341-2 Akhilleus: and Agamemnon, 269-71, 344-5; and Agenor, 96-104; and Antilokhos, 228-9, 258; and Asteropaios, 65-70; and Lukaon, 56-65; and Patroklos, 144-6, 164-271, 273-5, 334, 338-9; and Priam, 272-3, 320-47; and Skamandros, 30, 51-6, 70-80; and Thetis, 288-90; at opening of lliad, 5, 272, 361; death of, 62-3, 75, 143, 174-5, 198-9, 273, 285-6, 289; descent from Zeus, 68; in conflict with Hektor, 32, 34, 105-49; in Games, 200-71; mutilates Hektor's body, 32, 144-9, 168, 190-1, 272-5, 280-2; savagery of, 281; shield of, see shield; style of speeches of 61-2, 133, 141-3, 328-34, 339-40, 342; see also fire imagery Aktorione, 225, 235-40 Alcidamas, 30 Alkimos (Alkimedon), 322 allegory, 27, 28-9, 30-1, 36-40, 41, 42, 45, 46-9, 54, 80, 330, 347 alliteration, 58, 69, 81, 82, 101, 141, 148, 235; see also assonance, sound-effects Altes, 60-1, 110 Amarunkeus, 237 Amphidamas, 175 Anaxagoras, 20 Andromakhe, 8-9, 105-6, 115, 117-18, 120, 152-63, 206, 349-50, 352-5

Ankaios, 238 Antilokhos, in chariot-race, 166, 202-3, 208-19, 224-36; in foot race, 249-58 Antimachus of Colophon, 29, 265, 268 Antisthenes, 29, 36 Aphrodite: defeated by Athene, 85-90; gifts of, 157; in Judgement of Paris, 277; protects Hektor's corpse, 164, 185, 190, 275. 315 Apollo: and death of Akhilleus, 63; and Niobe, 340-1; at beginning and end of Iliad, 5-7, 272-3, 280, 357; concern for Hektor's corpse, 147, 164, 185, 190-1, 273, 275-6, 280-2, 315, 357; dignity of, 10, 51-2; in conflict of Akhilleus and Hektor, 128-44; in the Games, 207, 214, 242, 265, 268; in the Theomachy, 85, g1-4; rescues Trojans, 96-108 apostrophe, 234, 283, 354, 355 Ares, 85-90 Arion, 212-13 Aristarchus, 35-6, 39, 43, 47; and passim in Commentary Ariston of Chios, 37 Aristophanes of Byzantium, 35, 64-5, 178, 259-60, 274, 316, 340 Aristotle: and Homer, 31-5; Homeric Problems, 28, 32-3, 35-6, 76, 87, 148, 207, 315-16, 334; Poetics, 1, 28, 33-6, 103, 129, 211, 334; Rheloric, 59; other works, 319 Artemis: and Niobe, 340-1; bringer of painless death, 357; in Theomachy, 85-6, 94-6 Asclepiades of Myrlea, 39 assonance, 58, 74, 78, 81, 136-7, 139, 160, 313, 319, 354; see also alliteration, sound-effects Asteropaios, 51, 65-70, 78, 229-30, 250, 259-60 Astuanax, 112-13, 152-3, 158-62, 352-5 asyndeton, 110, 136, 146, 155, 310 Ate, 15, 18, 130, 279, 323-4 Athene: aids Akhilleus, 70, 76-7, 105-6, 130-6; aids Diomedes, 207, 214-7; aids Odysseus, 249-56; gives up seat to Thetis, 287; in Judgement of Paris, 277-9; in Theomachy, 51, 85-90 Atrahasis, 55, 72

Automedon, 322, 336, 342 Axios, 66 Beownif, 350-1, 353 Briseis, 6, 17, 18, 289, 343, 347, 348 book-division, 1, 21-2 bT Scholia, 44, and passim in Commentary Burnt Njal, 144 Catalogue of Ships, 7-8 Chamaeleon, 87, 177 chariot, 57, 212, 225-6; chariot-race, 124-5, 164-6, 201-41 Chrysippus, 37 Cicero and Homer, 40-1 Cleanthes, 37, 42 consolation, 62-3, 328-34 Cornutus, 37 Crates of Mallos, 37-40, 47 cuirass (thorix), 229-30 Cypria, 278, 283, 299 Dawn, 179, 185, 196-7, 275, 348, 360 Deiphobos, 131-2, 135-6 Demeter, 17 Demetrius, On Style, 43, 74, 87, 122, 215 Demo, 38 Democritus, 39, 74 Diomedes: and Akhilleus, 10-11; in the Games, 206-7, 214-16, 219-22, 224, 228, 243, 259-62 Dionysius of Halicarnassus, 43–4 Dolon, 16, 154 dreams, 7-8, 127-8, 171-9, 216, 347 eagle, 73-4, 137, 305-6 Ection of Imbros, 57, 60, 152, 159, 251 Ection of Thebe, 262-3 Ekhepolos, 32, 207 Embassy to Akhilleus, 2, 3, 5, 12, 18, 321, 243 endurance (τλημοσύνη), 282, 328-34 enjambment and runover words, 57, 72, 97, 98, 122, 148, 150-1, 155, 167, 168, 179, 184, 214, 218, 221, 227, 234, 287, 321, 344, 353, 355 Enniu, 40, 46 Enops, 238 epanalepsis, 120-1, 239-40 Epcios, 8 n. 8, 16, 203, 241-5, 259, 262, 264 epithets: glossed, 322-3, 325; significant, 100, 107, 116, 135-6, 156, 232-4, 307, 322-5, 347, 352, 355; see also formulas ethos (1005), 14-15, 34, 45, 164-6 Eumelos, 8 n. 8, 203, 207, 214-16, 221, 227-8, 236

Euncos, 57, 60, 251 Eurualos, 241-5 Eurutos, 238-9 fame (kless), 19, 162, 350-1 fasting, 167, 170, 288-9, 322, 339-40, 344 fire imagery, 55, 97, 138 Flecker, The Old Ships, 79 formulas: localized, 205; metrically equivalent, 90, 93; system of, 53-4; unsuited to context, 95; variation of, 80-1; see also epithets four-word verses, 56, 70, 75, 82, 83, 121, 177, 195, 231, 260, 319, 360-1 funeral rites, 64, 79, 115, 139-43, 155-6, 162-3, 164-271, 337-8, 346, 350-1, 359-61; see also fasting, laments, mourning ritual games, 124-5, 164-6, 175-6, 201-71 Geometric art, 4-5, 182, 184, 201, 226, 239, 247, 270, 354 gods: and destiny, 330-2; and men, 15; divine comedy, 17; divine deceit, 9, 103-4, 107, 130-6; divine rescue, 9-10, 102-4; in disguise, 306ff.; moral rôle of, 22-3, 147, 273, 310; reveal their identity, 76, 107, 319; show concern for Hektor's corpse, 190-1, 276, 314-16, 356; wounded, 10; see also Theomachy Gorgias, 29, 31 greaves, 102-3 Hades, 173, 178 hair-offerings, 181-5 hapax legomena, xii, and passim in Commentary: absolute hapaxes, 67, 70, 79, 80, 81, 89, 95, 101, 114, 131, 142, 146, 158, 160, 180, 186, 189, 204, 210, 227, 235, 236, 244, 246, 247, 260, 270, 284, 303, 309, 310, 345, 348-9 Hekabe, 105, 114-15, 149, 151-2, 293-6, 303-4, 349-50, 352, 353, 356-7 Hektor: at end of poem, 5, 272, 361; body protected by gods, 190-1, 275-6, 314-16; concern for fame, 117, 162, 361; death of, 139-44; etymology of name, 115, 353-4; funeral of, 359-61; godlike status of, 146, 152, 300; in conflict with Akhilleus, 105-49; mutilated by Akhilleus after death, 32, 144-9, 168, 190-1, 272-5, 280-2; laments for 149-63, 167, 349-59; monologue of, 117-21; piety of, 126, 280, 284, 316; ransoming of body of, 141-2, 272-347

Helen, 8-9, 26, 48, 118-19, 154-5, 348, 349-50, 353, 357-9 Hellespont, 333 Hephaistos, 51-2, 55, 80-5 Heraclitus, Homeric Problems, 37-8 Heraclitus of Ephesus, 26 Here: and Thetis, 283, 287; as air, 54; in Judgement of Paris, 277-9; in Theomachy, 85-6, 94-6; supports Akhilleus, 80, 283 Hermes, 22-3, 85-6, 95, 273, 276, 278, 291, 306-20, 343-5, 347-8; functions of, 307-8; wand of, 308-9 Herodotus, 28 Hesiod, and Homer, 19, 26; and passim in Commentary Hippothoos, 299 Hippias of Thases, 211 homicide, 175, 323-4 honour (TIM), 15, 19, 118, 202, 232 Horace, 1, 15, 41, 42 Idaios, 306-7, 310, 347 Ida, Mt, 100-1, 123, 126, 180 Idomeneus, 213, 219-24 Ilias Latina, 41 llias Parva, 112–13, 246, 354 ihupersis, 112-13, 249, 354 1106, 310 Iphiklos, 238 Iris, 165, 191–4, 295, 284–6, 290–3 Juvenal, 154 Kamandre, 112-13, 348-9 Keats, 324

Khruseis, 6, 17, 18 Khruses, 3, 5, 18, 334-6 Khiofn of Akhilleus, 318-19 Klutomedes, 238 Kteatos, 238-9

laments, 115, 149-54, 158-63, 166-8, 285-6, 292, 307, 327-8, 348-59 Laomedon, 85, 91-2, 213, 278 Laothoe, 56, 60, 110-11 Latin translations of Homer, 40-1; see also Ilias Latima Lefkandi, 165, 176, 186, 188, 199-200, 251 Lemnos, 251-2 Leonteus, 262, 264 Lesbos, 333 Leto, 85-6, 95, 341 libation, 194-5, 303-5 Livius Andronicus, 40 Longinus, 44-6, 87, 110, 168, 283, 310

Lucilius, 40 Lucretius, 39, 41 Lukaon, 51, 56-65, 78, 110, 229-30, 250, 252, 325, 356 Makar, 939 marriage customs, 111, 115, 152, 157 Megacleides, 69, 129 Mekisteus, 243 Memnon, 129, 191, 202 Menelaos, in chariot-race, 166, 207-8, 214-19, 224-36 Meriones, 179-80, 213, 227, 259, 265-71 Mestor, 299, 325 metaphor, 87, 92, 93, 100, 101, 103, 115, 184, 189, 190, 342 Metrodorus of Lampsacus, 29, 38 moirs (and destiny), 15, 136, 295, 930; Moirai, 282 monologues, 99-101, 117-21 motif, repeated, 9-10, 11, 17-19, 23 mourning rituals, 109, 114, 150, 181-5, 288-9, 292, 340-1, 344, 346, 249; see also fasting, laments, funeral rites Mudon, 71 Myrmidons, 166-7, 181, 183-4 Mysians, 303 Neoplatonists and Homer, 26, 42, 45, 46-9 Nestor, 166, 201-2, 208-13, 224-5, 236-41 Niobe, 321, 339-42 Noemon, 166, 236 Nostoi, 249 oath, 231-2 Odysseus: as philosophical model, 41, 47-8; comic rôle of, 16, 256-7; in the Games, 245-58; and passim for references to Odyssey etc. Odyssey: ending, 7; relationship to Iliad, 16, 21-4, 25-6, 45, 273; and passim in 274-361 Oidipous, 243, 297 Okcanos, 68-9, 193 omen, 303-6 onomatopoeia, 74, 78, 79, 169, 177, 244; see also assonance, sound-effects Ophelestes, 71 Othruoneus, 348 pacan, 146

Paconians, 70 paradeigma, 225, 237, 339 Paris: and death of Akhilleus, 63, 143; Judgement of, 90, 276-9 pathos (πάθος), 14-15, 34, 45, 164-6

Patroklos: boyhood of, 174-6; defilement of his helmet, 147-8; funeral of, 164-200, 359-60; Games in honour of, 164-6, 200-71; his ghost visits Akhilleus 171-9 Pedasos, 56, 60-1 Pelegon, 66 Peleus, 149, 151, 172, 175, 185, 195, 205, 320, 324-5, 327-30, 332; wedding of, 283, 332 Phoenicians, 250-1 Phoinix, 18, 161, 175, 213, 235, 329, 343 Phrygia, 333 Phuleus, 238 Pindar, 27-8 pity, 15, 60, 115, 272, 276, 280-1, 295, 304-5, 324-7, 329, 359 Plato and Homer, 26, 30-1, 42, 45-6, 47, 107, 275, 285, 330, 338-9 Plutarch and Homer, 36, 37, 80, 93, 179, 236, 242, 261, 329, 334, 346, 355 pollution, 323-4 Poludoros, 56, 60-1, 110, 238, 312, 325 Poluktor, 314 Polupoites, 262, 264 Porphyry: Case of the Nymphs, 46-8; Homeric Questions, 46-7, 218 Poseidon: encourages Akhilleus, 51, 70, 76-7; god of horses, 205, 208-9, 212-13, 232-3; hostility to Troy, 277-9; in Theomachy, 85-6, 91-4 Pouludamas, 12, 117 prayer, 191-2, 268, 316, 335; before journey, 303-5; silent, 254-5 Priam: and funeral of Hektor, 359-61; and theme of fathers and sons, 17, 195, 324-7; appeals to Hektor not to fight, 105, 108-14; helps to save Trojans from Akhilleus, 96-8; his reactions to Hektor's death, 149-51; hostility between his and Aineias' families, 160; sons of, 160, 297, 299-301, 325-6, 328-9, 332, 347; visited by Iris, 284-5, 290-3 prizes in games, 124-5, 201, 203-5, 241, 246-7, 249-52, 258, 259-61, 262-4, 266-7, 269-71 Proclus, 46, 48 Protagoras, 28-9, 30, 52, 70 psicht and afterlife, 146, 171-2, 177-9, 202, 338-9 Pythagoras, 26 Quintilian, 44, 324

ransom, 111, 141-2, 162, 272, 288-90, 296-8, 301, 321, 334-9, 347 ring composition, 3, 4-14; and passim in Commentary (on speeches, etc.) recitation, 2-3, 7, 20, 27 sacrifices, 126, 280; to river-gods, 65, 185; at Patroklos' funeral, 185-9 Salamis in Cyprus, 187-8, 197, 199, 212 Samos (= Samothrace), 285, 356Sarpedon, 125-6, 148, 250, 259 Scaean gate, 107, 143, 156 Seleucus, 76 Separatists, 89-90, 100 Shakespeare, Richard III, 78 shield: of Agamemnon, 38; of Akhilleus, 17, 38, 73, 120 Sidonians, 57, 250-2 Sikuon, 207 similes: 8, 12, 17, 22–3, 52, 54–6, 73–4, 81, 83, 93, 95, 97, 100, 101, 105, 106, 108~9, 116~17, 120-1, 122, 123, 124, 125, 127-8, 133-4, 137-8, 156, 158, 177, 179, 184, 189, 195-6, 234, 244-5, 247, 253-4, 256, 281, 284-5, 323-4, 336, 341; and divine journeys, 22-3, 95, 284-5; and metaphor, 100, 184, 189; and structure of Iliad, 8, 12, 116-17; and theme of parents and children, 195~6; and world of poet, 17; build-up of similes before major event, 123; in speeches of Akhilleus, 133-4; language of, 158, and passim; psychological states in, 127-8; reversal of rôles in, 323-4; sequences of, 52, 97, 108-9, 122, 137-8, 195-6, 281, 336; short similes anticipating longer ones, 106, 108, 125, 127; spectator in, 81, 125 Simocis, 51, 70, 77-8 singers, 351-2 Sipulos, Mt, 341-2 Skamandros (Xanthos), 30, 51-85, 309-10, 347-8; two springs of, 123-4 Socrates, 29-30 soliloquy, see monologue Sophocles: Antigone, 145; Electra 212, 214, 215; his endings resemble Iliad's, 273; Nuobe, 340; Peleus, 325; Philoctetes, 75; portrayal of old age by, 297 sound-effects, 52, 54, 69, 71, 79, 83, 86, 92, 121, 122, 124, 141, 143, 145, 162, 171, 179-80, 225-6, 310, 348, 353, 354; see also alliteration, assonance, onomatopocia Sperkheios, 185 Stesichorus, 26, 59, 101, 176, 227, 242 Stesimbrotus of Thasos, 29, 60

366

Sthenelos: 226

Stoics and Homer, 36-40

structure of the Iliad, 1-14, 51-2, 105-6, 108, 116, 154, 165, 202, 272-3, 279, 326, 334, 346, 357 supplication, 3, 5, 18-19, 32, 56-65, 141-2, 149, 151, 320-8, 329, 335-6 Teikhoskopia, 8-9, 154, 348 Teukros, 265-8 Thackeray, Vanity Fair, 154 Theagenes of Rhegium, 27, 47 Thebais, 212-13 Thebe, 152, 159, 263 Theomachy, 10, 27, 45, 51-2, 85-96 Theophrastus, 43 Thersites, 16 Thetis, 167, 205; her mission from Zeus to Akhilleus, 284-90; wedding of, 283 Thoas, 252 Thracians, 260, 298, 317 Thucydides, 28 time-scheme of Iliad, 6-7 Troad, topography of, 82, 123-4 Troilos, 299–300, 325 Trojans, possible Oriental aspects of, 16, 65, 325-6, 352 Tros, 207, 213, 303 Troy: fall of, 52, 63, 84-5, 97, 112, 145, 154, 273, 353-5; hatred of Athene, Here and Poseidon for, 273, 277-9 trumpet, 86 tumulus, 198-200, 360-1 typical scenes and motifs, 57, 66, 75, 99, 100, 103-4, 117, 121, 132, 157, 191-3, 214, 215, 219-20, 225, 261, 284-6, 287, 288, 291, 293, 303, 306, 309-10, 318, 320-1, 324, 334, 336-8, 339, 342, 343 Tyrtaeus, 112-14 Virgil, 41-3, 74, 76-7, 116, 138, 168, 190, 197, 214, 215, 234, 241, 245, 253-7, 265-6, 300, 312 waggon, 293, 297, 301-3, 307, 337 Wall, Achaean, 2, 12, 336 Winds, 165, 191-7 word-play, 58, 104, 116-17, 298 Xenophanes, 26, 236 Zeno of Citium, 36 Zenodotus, 20-1, 35, 61, 69, 80, 98, 99, 101, 145, 209, 227, 252-3, 302, 324 Zephuros, 193-4, 205 Zeus: allows mutilation of Hektor's body, 147-9; as god of suppliants, 335-6; in Theomachy, 51, 72, 76-7, 85-7, 96; jars of, 328, 330-2; orders restoration of Hektor's body, 276-88, 290-3; proposes to save Hektor from death, 105-6, 121, 125-7; sends Hermes to escort Priam, 307-9; sends omen to Priam, 303-6; weighs fates of Akhilleus and Hektor, 105, 129-30

Zoilus, 32, 73

INDEX OF GREEK WORDS FOR ALL VOLUMES

Bold roman numerals refer to the volume of the commentary in which the immediately following Homeric book- and line-numbers occur. Italic figures refer to page-numbers in the introduction to the volume in question, or in introductory material later in the volume.

àdatos IV: 14.271-4 άτομαι ΠΙ: 9.116 aamros 20: 11.169; 12.166; IV: 25 åaros VI: 22.218 άβρομος IV: 13.41-2 άβροτάζω ΙΠ: 10.65; ΙV: 11 άβρότη Ιν: 11; 14.78-9 áryatós I: 1.275-6; 2.408; II: 31; III: 9.341; IV: 13.641-2, 13.666; 15.247-51; VI: 24.53 άγακλεής IV: 16.570-80; V: 17.716-19 Άγαμεμνόνεος π.: 10.46; τν: 16 άγανοφροσύνη VI: 24.772 άγαπάζω VI: 24.464 άγαπήνωρ Ιν: 13.756-9; νι: 23.113 άγανός 🕮: 11.1-2; ΙΥ: 14.501-5 άγγελίη, -ης Ι: 3.206; 4.384; III: 11.140; IV: 13.251-3 άγήνωρ 📼: 9.699 άγκαλίς VI: 22.503 άγκάς VI: 23.711 άγκυλομήτης Π: 9.37; ΙV: 16.431-2 άγκυλότοξος Π: 10.428; ΓV: 16.287-90 άγκυλοχείλης Ιν: 35; 16.428 άγλαίζομαι 🞞: 10.331 άγλαός 🛿: 15.445-51; 16.185-7 ayvun IV: 24; 13.165-8; 16.78-9, 16.370-1 άγορεύω I: 2.788-9; 4.1; II: 5.218; 8.4, 8.28-30 άγορή ε: 4.1; m: 9.11-12; V: 18.274-6, 18.497 άγοστῷ 20: 11.425 άγρότερος VI: 21.471 ayupis IV: 16.659-62 άγω IV: 16.221-4 άγών Π: 7.294-8; IV: 15.426-8; VI: 23.258 άδηκότες 🔟: 10.98 άδην IV: 13.315-16 άδμητος VI: 23.266 deixins #2: 12.433-5; VI: 22.395 διεκήλιος V: 18.77

άλλη IV: 16.372-6 ασίφρων ν: 20.182-3 άζηχής V: 17.740-1 δίομαι IV: 16.736 ຕ້ຖືອໂອອພ 🏛: 10.493 άήτη IV: 14.250-5; 15.626 άητος VI: 21.395 άθάνατος τ¥: 10; 14.198−9; 15.84~6 600m TOS VI: 22.386 Άθήνη Εν: 15.121-4 αί γάρ Ιν: 13.825-9 Alovie, -es 1: 2.406, 2.527; 11: 5.219-21; 7.164; 12.265-76; 18: 13.46; 15.301-5; V: 17.507-8 Alavii IV: 14.458-9; V: 17.123-39 Alyalwv I: 1.403-4 αίγίλιψ 🛲: 9.15; IV: 13.62-5; 15.271-6 alyloxos II: 5.692-3; IV: 15.18-31, 15.308-11 alyis 1: 2.446-51; 4.166-8; IV: 15.308-11; VI: 21.400 αίγνπιός Ι: 4.59-60; Γν: 13.531-3 Atons #: 5.844-5; IV: 11; 15.247-51 αίδώς, αίδέομαι, αίδοῖος Ι: 4.401-2; Π: 31; 5.528-32, 5.788-91; 6.166-7, 6.381-5; 7.344-6; III: 9.160-1; IV: 13.120-3; 15.657-8; VI: 24.44 άζηλος, άδηλος Ι: 2.318-19, 2.455-6; Π: 5.897 αίητος V: 18.410-11 aloho II: 8.15-16; IV: 16.364-5 allouda II: 6.242-50; V: 20.11-12; VI: 24.323 αθρηγενής εν: 15.170-1 albw IV: 16.293-6 ởĩkh IV: 15.709−12 atkūs vi: 22.336 alpartées 💵: 9.325-6; V: 19.310-13 atuwn, Atuwn II: 4.394-5; II: 5.48-50 alvapitns IV: 16.28-31 Alvelas IV: 13.459-61, 13.481-4, 13.541-4 alvouopos VI: 22.481

alvos VI: 23.652 alvõs 1: 3.158; 11: 10.547; VI: 24.198 αίόλος Ι: 2.816; 3.185; Π: 7.222; Π: 12.167-70; IV: 13.66-7 αίπός εν: 13.620-5 atnus I: 2.174, 2.537-9, 2.603-4; IV: 13.317-18, 13.769-73; 15.189-93, 15.223; ¥: 17.364-5 αίροντας ν: 17.722-4 &iotov IV: 15.252-3 atomos 1: 4.164; 11: 8.69-72; IV: 15.598-9 aloios VI: 24.376 αίσυητήρ Ιν: 13.427-33 αίσυμνητήρ VI: 24.347-8 αίχμη Ιν: 16.313-15 ắtu 🖪: 10.160, 10.532; IV: 14.37; 15.252-3 alwv rv: 16.450-5 akakijta IV: 16.185-7 άκαλός Π: 7.421-2 CONCOLUCE IV: 13.115-17 ákeopa IV: 15.394-8 άκηδής VE: 21.123; 24.526 άκημα IV: 15.394-8 άκήρατος Εν: 15.494-9; ντ: 24.303 άκήριος ντ: 21.466 άκλαντος VI: 22.386 άκλαάς ΠΙ: 12.318 ຕ່າວເປັນ VI: 22.304 6x417vos V: 19.163 δημων IV: 15.18-31 άκοντιστύς VI: 23.622 anoiw ev: 15.236-43; 16.514-16 akptiber IV: 16.548-53 ốκρις VI: 21.12 OKPITOS IV: 14.205-7 άκροκελαινιόων VI: 21.249 ስርተሳ መ: 11.631; IV: 13.322-5; 15.618-22 Accoplante 1: 2.513-15, 2.620-1; 11:750 άλαλύκτημαι III: 10.94 άλαός 🖬: 6.139-40 άλαστήσας 10: 12.162 άλαστος VI: 22.261 άλεισον ΝΙ: 24.429 Άλέξανδρος Ι: 3.16, 3.328-9; Ι: 43 άλίομαι Ιν: 14.461-4; 15.223; 16.710-11 άλήἴος 🖬: 9.125 άλίαστος Ιν: 14.57-63 άλιμυρήεις VI: 21.190 άλιτήμων VI: 24.157 άλκή III: 9.39 άλκιμος IV: 13.292-4; 15.445-51 άλλοφος III: 10.258 άλλοφρονίω IV: 15.128-9, 15.244-6; VI: 23.698 δλλως VI: 23.144 άλοσύδνης V: 20.207-9

άλς νι: 21.59 άλύσσω VI: 22.70 άλφάνω VI: 21.79 άλφεσίβοιος V: 18.593-4 άλωή V: 18.561-72; VI: 21.36 άμαιμάκετος Π: 6.179; ΓV: 16.326-9 άμαλός VI: 22.310 άμαξα VI: 24.266 άμάρη VI: 21.259 άμαρτάνω 🔟: 9.501 αμαρτοεπής IV: 13.824; V: 17.625-55 άματροχία VI: 23.422 άμβλήδην VI: 22.475 αμβολάδην VI: 21.364 άμβροσίη Ι: 2.19; Π: 5.339~42; ΙV: 14.170-1; 16.669-73 άμβρόσιος Ι: 2.19; ΙΙ: 5.775-7; ΠΙ: 10.41; ΙV: 14.172-4, 14.175-7 άμβροτος Π: 5.339-42; ΙV: 14.78-9; 16.669-73 άμείβομαι ΙΙ: 6.338-9; ΓV: 15.35 QuelBortes VI: 23.712 άμέρδω Ιν: 13.339-44 δμητος V: 19.221-4 άμήχανος 10: 10.164; 1V: 16.28-31; V: 19.273-5 άμιτροχίτων Ιν: 16.419-21 άμιχθαλόεις VI: 24.753 &uues IV: 9, 16 άμολγός I: 4.433-5; II: 11.173-7; IV: 12; 15.323-5; VI: 22.28 биоточ IV: 13.39-40 άμπυξ VI: 22.469 άμύμων II: 5.168-9; III: 10.19; IV: 13.641-2; 16.119-21 άμύντωρ Ιν: 13.383-5 άμύνω Ιν: 16.74-7, 16.521-6 άμφασίη V: 17.695-6 άμφήριστος VI; 23.382 άμφίβροτος 11:6.117-18;121:11.32;1V:10,11 άμφιγνήεις Ι: 1.607 augiyuos 1: 1.607; IV: 13.146-8; 15.386-7 άμφιδινέω VI: 23.562 άμφιέλισσα Ι: 2.165; ΠΙ: 9.683 αμφιέπω IV: 11; 16.122-4 άμφιθαλής VI: 22.496 αμφίθετος VI: 23.270 άμφιλύκη Π: 7.433 αμφίς II: 8.444-5; VI: 24.488 άμφιχάσκω VI: 23.79 άμφω Ιν: 13.611-12; 16.825 av IV: 13.126-8, 13.288-9 άναδέσμη VI: 22.469 ávalvouai V: 18.498-500 ανακυμβαλιάζω IV: 16.377-9 άναντα VI: 23.116

ävaf 1: 2.104; IV: 13.582-3; 15.323-5, 15.639-43; 16.233-48, 16.370-1, 16.514-16 (avat) ava IV: 16.233-48 άναπάλλω VII: 23.692 άναπνέω IV: 14.436-7; 15.233-5 άνάσσω IV: 13.216-18; 16.168-72 άνασχομένω VI: 23.660 άναφλύω VI: 21.361 άνδάνω IV: 16, 17; 14.340; 15.674-6; V: 17.645-7 ανδράγρια IV: 14.508-10 άνδράποδα Π: 7.473-5 άνδρειφάντης IV: 11; 16.179-81; V: 17.256-9 άνδροτήτα Ιν: 11; 16.855-8; νΙ: 24.6 άνδροφόνος III: 25; 9.351; IV: 16.716-20; VI: 24.479 άνδύεται ΙΥ: 13.222-5 ανεμοσιαπής IV: 16.221-4 άνεμοτρεφής II: 11.256; IV: 16.221-4 Άνεμώρεια Ιν: 14.307-8 avenios IV: 15; 13.463-7; 15.553-9 άνεφ 🖽: 9.30 avnkouonta IV: 15.235-43 av-, trev-froter 121: 10.134; 11.266 avnp IV: 14.91-4; 16.492-501; V: 18.429-35; 20.97-100 άνηρείψαντο ΕΥ: 34; 16.149~50; V: 20.233-35 άνθεμόεις VI: 23.885 avoos 1: 2.219; 4.473; IV: 13.427-33. 13.481-4 άνθρωπος IV: 14.354-62; 15.139-41; 16.262-5 ανιπτόποδες IV: 16.234-5 άνομαι ΠΙ: 10.251 άντικρύ VI: 23.673 avnitos VI: 24.213 άντιφερίζω VI: 21.357, 21.411 άντυξ VI: 21.38 άνω V: 18.468-73; VI: 24.544 ανώίστος VI: 21.39 άξίνη Ιν: 13.611-12 άξυλος Π: 11.155 αολλής IV: 15.494-9; 16.600-2 άορτήρ ΙΠ: 11.29-31 αοσσητήρ IV: 15.254-9 doutos V: 18.536-7 άπαείρω VI: 21.563 aneiriku II: 7.224-5; VI: 23.863 ameian IV: 14.479-85 anelpow VI: 24.545, 24.776 απέλεθρος III: 11.354 ἀπήνη VI: 24.275 annuts IV: 15.93-4; 16.33-5

άπινύσσω Ιν: 15.10-13 άπλοις VI: 24.230 αποδειροτομίω V: 18.336-7 άποδρύφω VI: 23.187 άποεργάθω VI: 21.599 αποθύμιος IV: 14.256-61 αποκηδίω IV: 14.427-32; VI: 23.413 απολέπω VI: 21.455 άπόλλυμι V: 18.82 anovalw IV: 16.83–8 απονέσμαι 🖽: 9.20 anonin to IV: 14.349-53 άποπτύω VI: 23.781 άποσκυδμαίνω VI: 24.65 άπουρίζω VI: 22.489 άπτοεπής II: 8.209-11; IV: 13.317-18 ἄρα IV: 15.271-6; 16.60-1 άρατός V: 18.410-11 άραρίσκω 1: 3.330-1; IV: 13.795-9; 16.211-17 άργαλίος IV: 13.667-72 Apyelol I: 1.42; 2.333-5, 2.529-30 Άργειφόντης εν: 16.179-81 άργεστής ΕΙ: 11.305-8; VI: 21.334 άργινόεις Ι: 175; 2.646-8; Π: 175 άργίπους VI: 24.211 "Apyos I: 2.108; II: 6.456-7 άργυρόηλος Ι: 2.45; ΙΙ: 11.29-31; ΙΥ: 10; 14.238-41, 14.402-8 αρείων IV: 16.556-62 άρετή Ι: 2.216 άρή III: 12.334; IV: 14.484-5; V: 18.429-35 άρηίθοος IV: 15.313-17 άρηϊκτάμενος VI: 22.72 άρημένος ν: 18.429-35 Apris 1: 2.381, 2.479, 2.540-1, 2.767; 3.128; 4.440-1, 4.491; II: 5.31, 5.35-6, 5.829-31; 7.208-11, 7.238-9, 7.330; IV: 13.301-3; 14.484-5; V: 20.150-2 άρητός V: 17.37 aporis IV: 19.62-5 άριστον IV: 33; VI: 24.124 άριαω IV: 13.438-41; 15.533-4 άρκιος III: 10.304 "Арктоз V: 18.487-9 άρματα IV: 13.533-9 άρματροχ(η VI: 23.505 άρμονίη VI: 22.255 apventhe m: 12.384-6; 1V: 16.740-4 άρνυμαι V: 20.247 άροιτο ΠΙ: 29 άροτήρ VI: 23.835 άρπυια IV: 16.149-50 άρρητος V: 17.37 άρτιεπής VI: 22.281 άρχή 1; 3.100; IV: 13.358-60

ασάμινθος III: 10.576 άσθμαίνω III: 10.496-7 Arios III: 12.95-5; IV: 13.383-401 άσις VI: 21.321 Άσκάλαφος ΙΥ: 13.478-80 boneries v: 19.65-8 andew IV: 14.178-9 άσκοπος VI: 24.157 åouevos IV: 14.104~8 άσπερχές Ιν: 16.60-1 aonis 1: 3.330-8, 3.335, 3.339; 4.90-1, 4.448-9; #: 5.452-3, 5.796-8; 6.117-18; 7.219-23, 7.267; II: 11.32; IV: 13.130-1, 13.159-61, 13.712-18 007600615 EV: 16.134-5 άστράγαλος νι: 23.88 ao rubowiths VI: 24.699-702 άσύφηλος VI: 24.767 άσφάραγος VI: 22.328 άτάλαντος IV: 11; 13.795-9; V: 17.256-9 άτάλλω ΙΨ: 13.27−31 άταλός II: 5.270-2; IV: 13.27-31; V: 18.567-8 άτάσθαλος VI: 22.418 άτέω V: 20.332-4 άττη 1: 1.412; 2.111; 3.100; 11: 8.236-7; III: 9.116. 9.502-12, 9.505; IV: 4; 13.41-2; 16.266-77; V: 19.85-138, 19.88; VI: 24.28 άτιτάλλω Ιν: 14.200-2 antos IV: 14.479-85 άτος IV: 13.745-6 Άτρείδα, -αο Ι: 1.16; 2.192 άτρύγετος IV: 14.203-4; V: 17.424~5 Άτρυτώνη Ι: 2.157; III: 10.284 άττα 🕮; 9.607 av V: 17.420-2; 20.215-18 αύγάζομαι Ιν: 13.837; νΙ: 23.458 aubán IV: 15.113-14 ต*ั้ง*ปี IV: 13.37 αύίαχος ΙV: 13.41-2 αύλή Π: 6.242-50; IV: 13.837 αύλός Π: 5.182-3; V: 17.297 αύλῶπις 🗉: 5.182-3 avos IV: 13.404-10 avti IV: 15.286-93; V: 17.420-2 άντή tv: 15.718-25; 16.633-4 autika V: 18.98-100 ດ້ບັງແກ່ 🎫: 9.609-10 άθτμήν VI: 23.765 αντόθι ΙV: 13.37 αύτόματος 2: 5.749-52; V: 18.372-9 autos VI: 22.351 αύτοσταδίη Ιν: 13.322-5 αύτοχόωνος VI: 23.826

αύτως IV: 13.446-7, 13.810; V: 17.143, 17.448-50, 17.631-3; 18.198, 18.338-42, 18.583-4; 20.347-50 άφαρ IV: 16.317-25 άφάρτερος VI: 23.3ε ι άφασίη ν: 17.695-6 άφητωρ 10: 9.404-5 άφικνέομαι Ιν: 13.613 -14 άφίστημι IV: 13-745-6 άφλοισμός Ιν: 15.605-9 Άχαιοί 1: 1.42; 2.333-5; Π: 43; 5.465; Π: 11.759; 17: 16.21 đω V: 19.399-403 BWTOV IV: 13.599 βαθεής Ε: 5.142-3; Εν: 16.765-9 βαθύζωνος 111: 9.593 βαθύκολπος III: 9.593; V: 18.121-5 βαθυρρείτης VI: 21.195 Balvw IV: 13.27-31 βάλλω IV: 13.288-9, 13.761-4; 14.29; 16.659-62, 16.737-9, 16.806-7; VI: 23.462 βαμβαίνω Π: 10.375 βασιλεύς Π: 9.160-1; 10.435; 11.46; 14: 13.582-3; V: 18.556-7 βάσκε 🔟: 11.186 βεβριθνία VI: 21.385 βέλτερος IV: 15.195-9, 15.511-12 βίομαι Ιν: 15.194 βηλός IV: 15.23-5; VI: 23.202 βιάσμαι VI: 21.451 βιβάς, -άσθων IV: 13.809; 15.306-7 βίη 1: 2.658~60; 4.386; II: 5.638-9; V: 17.24 βλάπτω IV: 15.489, 15.645-52; 16.659-62; VI: 22.15; 23.545, 23.774 βλήτρον Ιν: 15.677~8 βλοσυρός II: 7.212; IV: 15.605-9 βλοσυρῶπις 🞞: 11.36 βλωθρός IV: 13.389-91 βοάγρια £V: 14.508~10 βοείη II: 5.452-3; VI: 22.159 βοή 1: 2.408; 111: 9.31-49 Bon Boos IV: 13.476-7; V: 17.481-2 βολέω 🖬: 9.3 βόλομαι ΠΙ: 11.319 Boptys III: 9.5; IV: 14.394-9 βόσκω IV: 15.547 51 βούβρωστις VI: 24.532 βουγάίος ΙΥ: 13.824 βουληφόρος Ε: 5.180; Ε: 12.414; Ε: 13.219-20 βουλυτός IV: 16.779 βούς 1: 4.447; III: 12.137-8; IV: 15.547-51; 16.635-7

βοῶπις Ι: 1.200, 1.551; 3.144; 🛚: 7.8-13; ΙV: 11, 12; 15.49-55, 15.92; V: 18.357-9 βράσσων ΠΙ: 10.226 βραχεῖν VI: 21.9 βριήπυος Ιν: 13.521-5 Bpionis m: 9.132; IV: 16.56-9 βροτόεις IV: 14.508-10 βροτός ΙΙ: 5.339-42; ΙV: 5 βῶν 1: 4.447; 11: 5.452-3; 6.117-18; 7.238-9, 7.240-1; IV: 35, 36 yaïa II: 8.15-16; IV: 14.203-4 γαιήσχος I: 3; II: 9.183; IV: 13.43-5, 13.83-90 γαίω πι: 11.81 γάλοως VI: 22.473 γαμβρός Γν: 13.463-7 γαμέσσομαι Π: 9.394 yavaw IV: 19.262-5 γάρ 11: 7.73, 7.328; 111: 9.515; IV: 15.201-4 Γάργαρος μ: 8.47-8 YEXÓW V: 19.362-3 Fephvios 1: 2.336; III: 9.162 YEPOUDIOS VI: 22.119 yépupa 1: 4.371; 11: 5.87-8; 8.553; 111: 11.160 YA II: 8.15-16; IV: 14.203-4; 15.18-31 γηθοσύνη IV: 13.27-31 γλακτοφάγος ΙV: 13.4-7 ylaunh IV: 16.33-5 γλανκώπις Ι: 1.200; ΙΙ: 6.88 γλήνος II: 8.164-6; VI: 24.192 γλωχίς VI: 24.274 YVWTOS IV: 13.694-7; VI: 22.234 YÓVU IV: 14.436-7 γουνάζομαι ΙΙΙ: 11.130; VI: 22.345 yúalov I: 5.99-100; V: 17.314-18; 19.359-61 γύη Ι: 5.99-100; Π: 9.578 yuia 🛚: 5.122; IV: 13.510-15; VI: 24.514 YUUVÓS IV: 16.812-17; VI: 22.124 YUUVÓW IV: 16.311-12 δαήρ VI: 24.762 5αí III: 10.408 Ballo IV: 16.659-62 δοικτάμενος VI: 21.146, 21.555 δαιμόνιος Ι: 1.561; 2.200; 3.399; 4.31-3; II: 6.486; IV: 3; 13.448-9; VI: 24.194 δαίμων Ι: 1.561; ΙΙ: 8.164~6; ΙΙΙ: 9.600; 11.480, 11.792-3; IV: 5 Bais 1: 4-5; IV: 23; 15.586-8; VI: 24.43 δαίφρων Ι: 2.874-5; Ι: 5.181; 6.160-2; ΠΙ: 11.482 60xpuor IV: 14.157-8

δάμνημι Ιν: 14.198-9, 14.479-85; 16.812-17 Δαναοί Ι: 1.42; 2.529-30; Π: 5.37 банты IV: 16.156-63; VI: 23.183 δάσκιος Ιν: 15.271-6 δασπλήτις 🖬: 9 δατέφμαι VI: 23.121 δέγμενος Π: 9.191 δεδόκημαι Ιν: 15.728-30 δέελος 🎞: 10.466 Selbia IV: 14.43-8 δειδίσκομαι, δειδέχατο 🕮: 9.196-7, 9.224, 9.671; IV: 35 δείδω IV: 14.43-8; VI: 22.251 δείελος VI: 21.232 BEIKOVOIDUOI I: 4.4; EV: 15.84-6 δείλη VI: 21.111 δειλός IV: 13.275-8, 13.567-9; 16.836-8 Seivos IV: 14.383-7; 15.623-9; 16.104-6 δείπνον πι: 11.86; τν: 23 δειροτομέω VI: 21.89 δεκάχιλος Ιν: 14.147-52 δέμας IV: 13.673 δέος IV: 34; 14.383-7; 15.4-8 δέπας 🕮: 11.632-5; IV: 15.84-6 8épua IV: 16.340-1 8em V: 17.661-9 Δευκαλίων V: 20.478-80 δεύομαι Ιν: 13.308-10 BETTE #: 7.350; IV: 14.127-8 δεύτερος IV: 16.467-9; VI: 23.248 δέχομαι m: 9.191; 12.147-8; IV: 35; 15.87-8 δή IV: 14.364-6; 16.843-7 δηθά VI: 21.131 δήĭos II: 5.592-5; 6.331; 7.117-19; III: 9.674 δηϊστής Ιν: 13.206-9 δηλήμων VI: 24.33 δηλήσεται IV: 14.101-2 ðñuos I: 2.212, 2.547-51, 2.549-51; III: 12.213; IV: 16.433-9; VI: 24.776 δήν Ιν: 13.570-3; 16.736 δηρινθήτην IV: 33; 16.756 Δία, Δικεί, Διόθεν IV: 15.489; 16.173-5, 16.231-2 διά 🕮: 11.434-6; IV: 15.37-44 διάκτορος Ι: 2.103; ΙV: 14.157-8; VI: 24.339 διαμπιρίς II: 5.112-13; IV: 15.494-9 διάνδιχα 🖽: 9.37 διαπλήσσω VI: 23.120 διαπρύσιον V: 17.748 διδοίσθα V: 19.270 διδούνσι EV: 16.145-8; VI: 24.425 8180,005 VI: 23.641 Sun IV: 15.121-4

δίεμαι III: 12.304

Still Skr. 5

διιπετής IV: 16.173-5: V: 17.263-6 διτφιλος (Διτ φίλος) Π: 11.419; IV: 13.674-8 δίκη εν: 16.386-8 δινωτός Ι: 3.391; ΙV: 13.406-7; VI: 23.562 ∆iobev IV: 15.489 δĩos Ⅲ: 9.538; 12.21; IV: 14.75-7 διοτρεφής VI: 23.581 δίσκουρα VI: 23.523 δίφρος π: 5.608-9, 5.727-8, 5.729-31; 6.354; 🏛: 9.200 Διώρης Ι: 4.517; V: 17.471-4 δμήτειρα IV: 14.256-61 δοάσσετο ΙV: 13.445-8 Боке́ш ГV: 15.728-30 Δόλων III: 10.314 δόρυ IV: 13.246-8, 13.561; 16.141-4, 16.812-17 δούλη 🛄: 9.336 δουπέω II: 5.58; IV: 13.424-6; 15.419-21; 16.593-9; VI: 23.679 δραίνω 🖽: 10.96 δρατός VI: 23.169 5pipus IV: 15.696-8 δρυτόμος IV: 16.633~4; VI: 23.315 δύναμις VI: 23.891 δυσαριστοτόκεια V: 18.54 δυσκλέα Π: 9.22; IV: 34 δύσμορος VI: 22.60, 22.481 δυσπέμφελος εν: 16.747-8 δυωκαιεικοσίμετρος VI: 23.264 δώ IV: 14-173 ŧ, ŧ 1v: 13; 13.163-4, 13.492-5, 13.561, 13.802-5; 14.162-3; 15.165-7; 16.207-9, 16.735-6; V: 17.547-52; 20.170-1 ίαγη 🖽: 11.559 łαδότα III: 9.173 łavós IV: 14.172-4, 14.175-7, 14.180 laroovoi IV: 13.315–16 έάφθη IV: 13.541-4 ίσω πν: 15.472-5; 16.95-6 tγγυαλίζω IV: 15.490-3 EYPETO EV: 35 typhyoplai II: 10.67, 10.419 typnyopti III: 10.180-2 EXXENUS VI: 21.203 εγχος 1: 34; 3.330-8, 3.346-7, 3.355-60, 3.379-80; u: 5.568-9, 5.623-4, 5.625-6; 6.29-36, 6.124-7, 6.305-6; IV: 13.292-4, 13.518-20, 13.597; 16.313-15 łóanós IV: 14.172-4 έδνου πι: 9.146-8; τν: 13.365-7 45000 ths IV: 13.378-82 łekooi IV: 17; 13.260-1 έισάμην IV: 15.414-15, 15.539-45 Kouai IV: 14.436-7

ŧños IV: 15.138; V: 19.342-3 θείρω VI: 21.347 έθων 🕮: 9.540 ef m: 9.49; ev: 15.372-6, 15.568-71; 16.556-62 elaon III: 10.299 είατο IV: 15.10−13 e16éw IV: 14.235–6 £Тборан 1: 2.791-5; II: 7.59-60; IV: 13.191; 16.710-11, 16.716-20 slbuia v: 17.3-6 είκαιότεραι ΙV: 22 EXODI IV: 17; 13.260-1 είκοσινήριτος VI: 22.349 Είλείθυια πι: 11.270 είλήλουθμεν ΙΙΙ: 9.48-9 Elakov IV: 16.402-6 είλυφάζω ¥: 20.490-2 είλύω VI: 21.319 elus m: 11.808; rv: 16, 17; 13.317-18; 14.271-4, 14.331-3; 15.10-13, 15.80-3; 16.514-16 elvartipes VI: 22.473 EIVI IV: 15.150 elos V: 20.41-3 eine V: 17.237-9 elpai V: 18.530-2 ETOGTO, KATAELOATO III: 11.358; 12.118-19 ilon 🎞: 11.61 eloba III: 10.450 йока III: 11.799; IV: 13.446-7; 15.539-45 είσωπός εν: 15.653-4 eius IV: 18; 13.141-2, 13.143-4; V: 17.730 tx IV: 13.492~5; 15.78~9; 16.364-5 Έκάβη Ιν: 16.716-20 έκδεργος Ι: 1.474; Ε: 5.439; 7.23; IV: 12; 15.252-3; VI: 21.599-601 EKOOFV IV: 13.107-10; 16.633-4 5xaotos III: 9.88; IV: 15.286-93, 15.502-6; 16.168-72 Εκατηβόλος IV: 15.231-2 έκατόμβη Τ: τ.65; Π: 6.234-6 έκατόμπεδος VI: 23.164 bcylvouar IV: 14.115-20 $KOUNEV IV: 16.97-100 baivos m: 9.63; 11.653; IV: 15.45-6 έκηβόλος IV: 15.231-2; 16.716-20 ακηλος Π: 11.75-6 έκπαγλος 1: 1.145-6; 3.357-9, 3.415; IV: 13.413-16; VI: 21.452 έκτάδιος III: 10.134 Έκτόριος 10: 10.46; ΙV: 16 έκφέρω VI: 23.376 έκφεύγω IV: 14.402-8 έλαύνω IV: 13.315-16; 16.467-9 WERKO VI: 22.448

Έλένη π: 11369; IV: 13.765-9 EAROS VI: 24.44 ίλεφαίρομαι VI: 23.388 Lλικώπις Ι: 1.98 the II: 6.424; III: 9.466~9; 12.293; IV: 15.631; Exikon V: 18.401 EXEXITON IV: 13.685-8 έλκυστάζω VI: 23.187 ελλεδανός ν: 18.552-6 'Ελλοί IV: 16.234-5 Example IV: 13.41-2, 13.609-10; 14.364-6; 15-539~45 lubaive VI: 23.403 έμμεματώς ΓV: 13.775-87 Europe IV: 5; 15.189-93 μπάσσω VI: 22.441 έμπίπτω IV: 13.742-4; 15.56-77 έμπυριβήτης VI: 23.702 ev IV: 15.320-2; 15.669-73 ivavtios IV: 13.448-9 ivapa m: 10.528 ŧvaplζω Ⅳ: 16.849-50 Ινανλος IV: 16.70-1 Evõiva VI: 23.806 Evolutions VI: 23.90 EVERTEROS IV: 15.224-5 event IV: 14.180 trnis VI: 21.96; 23.252, 23.648 IVI IV: 13.485-6 EVVERYINOS IV: 14.147-52 Ervéwpos V: 18.349-52 έννοσίγαιος ΓV: 14.134-5 IVVULL IV: 14.175-7, 14.187; 16.669-73 ένοπή VI: 24.160 toopχos VI: 23.147 WOOIXOWN IV: 13.83-90; 14.134-5 Eviteouspyos VI: 24.277 evrundis VI: 24.163 ένῶπα Ιν: 15.320-2 έξαγω π: 7.336-7, 7.435-6 £αίσιος IV: 15.598-9 ξαρχος VI: 24.721 έξεναρίζω πι: 11.368; ΓV: 16.849~50 έξερωέω VI: 23.468 Ktoin VI: 24.235 işin III: 9.100-6 Einu IV: 13.636-9 tos III: 9.420, = tuós etc.; 11.142; IV: 13; 14.223-4, 14.249; 15.138; V: 19.342--3 Inavarionμι VI: 21.535 έπειδάν εν: 13.284-7 Interta IV: 13.742-4; 15.92 trin IV: 13.284-7; 16.450-5 ŧπήτριμος V: 18.208-14 έπίαχον Π: 9.50 Ηπβαίνω εν: 16.394-8

kmiβλης VI: 24-453 Lπιγράβδην VI: 2L166 tribiowus VI: 22.254 έπιδιφριάς III: 10.475 Emiliktós IV: 16.548-53 τπίθημα VI: 24.228 ŧπικείρω IV: 15.467-70; 16.394-8 tπικερτομέω VI: 24.649 tπίκλησις Π: 6.402-3; IV: 16.176-8; VI: 22.29 tuiksonos VI: 22.281 επικλώθω VI: 24.525 Inikoupos IV: 13.754-5 επινεφρίδιος VI: 21.204 Επινύσσω IV: 14.249 tπίουρος IV: 13.449-54 έπιόγομαι 101: 9.167 επιρρήσσω VI: 24.454 ŧπίρροθος 1: 4.389-90; 11: 5.807-8 επίσκοπος ΙΙ: 10.38; VI: 22.254 επισκύνιον V: 17.135-6 έπιστέφομαι Π: 11.36-7 έπίστιον IV: 35; 15.189-93 έπιστονάχεω VI: 24.79 επισχερώ III: 11.668; V: 18.66-70 tπιτάρροθος 1: 4.389-90; II: 5.807-8, 5.872-8 tπιτίθεμαι III: 10.46 έπλεν 🔟: 12.11 Ιπόρουσε Π: 5.793 Enos IV: 12, 19; 13.765-9; 14.233-41; 15.35, 15.84-6, 15.113-14, 15.209-11; V: 19.18-20 έποτρύνω IV: 15.254-9 έπταπόδης IV: 15.728-30 έπώχατο ΙΙΙ: 12.340 lpáw IV: 16.207-9 έρέπτομαι VI: 21.204 έρέριπτο IV: 14.13-15 έρεχθω VI: 23.317 έριβρεμέτης IV: 13.620-5 έριβῶλαξ 🖽: 9.479 EpiyBourros IV: 13.149-54; 15.286-93 Epibos v: 18.550-1 έρινύς Π: 9.454; ¥I: 21.412 Epioùvys EV: 11; 16.185-7; V: 20.34-5 "Epis, tpis 1: 4.440-1; 11: 7.111; V: 18.107-10 Epiotenty IV: 13.54; 15.286-93 Epros IV: 16.231-2 Epua IV: 14.409-12; 16.548-53 Eputions IV: 17; 15.212-17 łpos IV: 13.636-9; 14.294 έρπύζω VI: 23.224 έρράδατο ΙΠ: 12.430~Ι Eppe VI: 23.440 έρυμαι π: 6.305-6; 8.143 Eputráphartes EV: 15.352-4

έρύω, έρύομαι π: 8.143; πι: 9.248; 10.44; 12.454; IV: 15.286-93, 15.348-51; VI: 22.351 Epxariai IV: 16.481 έρχατάομαι IV: 15.526; 16.481 έρωδιός Π: 10.274-5 έρώη τν: 16.126-9, 16.301-5 Epus 1: 3.442; IV: 14.294 έσδύνω VI: 23.622 έσήλατο III: 12.438; IV: 16.556-62 loθiω VI: 23.182 10005 VI: 24.94 έσοράω IV: 13.478-80 έσπεο, σπείο 🞞: 10.285 Ισπέριος VI: 21.560 tomepos VI: 22.318 έσπόμενος Ιν: 13.570-3 lotavav 1: 4.33-5 torn, orn u: 5.170, 5.309~10, 5.610-11 iστωρ VI: 24.272 έσχατος 11: 10.434 Frai II: 6.239; III: 9.464; IV: 15.545-6 tra(i)plζω, -oμαι IV: 13.455-8; VI: 24.335 έταϊρος V: 17.151-2 ETEPOS IV: 16.179-81 108µ7705 IV: 16.698-701 εύηγενής VI: 23.8t EVITIKITS VI: 22.319 evineeving III: 11.427; VI: 23.81 Edimmos IV: 16.415-18 EUKVALIAES VI: 21.590-8 turtivevos I: 2.501, 2.546, 2.570-5, 2.591-4; u: 173-4, 192; 6.390-1 εύκνικλος IV: 13.712~18 εύληρα VI: 23.481 tunering IV: 16.141-4, 16.737-9; V: 17.9 εύναι IV: 14.75-7 τύξος Π: 10.373 εύπλεκτος VI: 23.115, 23.335 εύράξ ΠΙ: 13.251 εύρέα 101:9.72 EUppeilos IV: 14.433-4 εύρυόδεια IV: 16.635-7 τύρύσπα Ι: 1.498-9; IV: 19; 14.264-6 εύρυπυλής VI: 23.74 eupús EV: 9; 14.134-5; 15.189-93; 16.450-5 εύρύχορος m: 9.478; VI: 23.299 OS IV: 15.138; VI: 24.528 ύσκοπος VI: 24.24 Юσσωτρος VI: 24.578 lüstleavos VI: 21.511 100 TPO 05 IV: 13.599 EVTEXEOS III: 9.20 ейтехту ву: 16.56-9 rύφημέω III: 9.171-6 εύφρων Εν: 15.95-9

εύχομαι 1: 1.90-1, 1.91; 4.405; 11: 5.119; 7.294-8; IV: 13.54; 14.364-6, 14.484-5; V: 18.498-500 ŧὖχος II: 5.283-5; IV: 15.461-5 εύχωλή VI: 22.433 έφάλλομαι IV: 15.645-52 έφομαρτέω VI: 23.414 έχματα IV: 13.139; VI: 21.259 έχω IV: 13.47-51, 13.163-4, 13.608; 15.308-11; 16.340-1, 16.502-5 έχω (Fέχω) IV: 13.326-7, 13.679-80; 15.352-4 Lus IV: 18; V: 17.727 έωσφόρος t: 6; 2.48-9; VI: 23.226 ζαφλεγής VI: 21.465 ζαχρηής 11: 12.347; IV: 13.682-4 ζεύγλη V: 17-437-40 Ziqupos VI: 23.200 Zñv, Zñva, Znvós m: 12.235-6; rv: 13, 18; 14.157-8, 14.264-6; 15.78-9, 15.286-93 ζυγόδεσμου VI: 24.270 ζυγόν m: 9.186-7 ζώμα I: 4.186-7; VI: 23.683 ζώνη ΠΙ: 11.234 ζώννυμι IV: 14.175-7, 14.185; VI: 23.130 ζωός IV: 16.444-9 ζωστήρ Ι: 4.132-40, 4.132-3, 4.137-8, 4.186-7, 4.213; II: 6.218-19; III: 11.234; V: 20.413-15 f IV: 16.514-16 ň tv: 16.843-7; V: 17.170-2; 19.203-5 ሽ (ሲμί) 🏛: 9.620-3 ñatal III: 10.100 ήγέομαι πα: 9.168-9 ήδη IV: 16.843-7 ήδυμος III: 10.91; IV: 14.242 ne IV: 16.514-16 hépios I: 1.497; 3.7 ήεροφοίτης 🞞: 9.571 finy ma: 11.808 ήήρ (ἁήρ) 1: 3.381-2; 11: 5.127-30, [cf. 5.356], 5.775-7; 8.13, 8.15-16; Ⅳ: 14.286~8 ABETOS III: 10.37; VI: 22.229; 23.94 ñïa IV: 13.102-4 fios IV: 15.365-6 ήκιστος VI: 23.531 ήλακάτη τν: 16.183 Ήλειοι Π: 11.671 ήλίβατος εν: 15.271-6 ήλικίη VI: 22.419 ήλιτόμηνον V: 19.118-19 ήλός Ιν: 15.128-9

376

ήμα VI: 23.886

ήμαθόεις 🕮: 9.149-53 fjuap 1: 4.164; II: 6.455; 8.69-72; IV: 15.610-14 ຖິມເອີເວເ 🎞: 12.23 ημητέλειακον VI: 23.851 ήμιτάλαντον VI: 23.796 fμων VI: 23.886 Av IV: 15.502~6; 16.36-45 ήνεμόεις, -εσσα 1: 3.305; IV: 16 ήνία Ιν: 16.737-9 'Ηνιοπεύς IV: 13.386 ANOXEUS IV: 16.737-9 กุ้หรุ 🏛: 10.292-4 ήνορή Ιν: 16 NOW IV: 16.407-8 ňos III: 10.507-8; IV: 18; V: 17.727; 20.41-3 ήρα Ιν: 14.130-2 ήρίον ντ: 23.126 hpws IV: 13.628-30, 13.666; 16.780-3 ήσύχιος VI: 21.598 йтор IV: 15.252-3; 16.653-7 huytveios IV: 15.271-6; V: 18.318 ЛОТЕ 1: 2.455-83; 3.10 "Hώs, hữðev, hữði I: 1.447, 1.493-4; 2.48-9; #: 7.381-2, 7.433, 7.451; 8.508-9; 🖬: 11.50 θάλαμος 1: 3.174-5; 11: 6.286-96, 6.321-4 θάλος VI: 22.87, 22.502-4 θάμβος VI: 23.815; 24.482 Oávartos IV: 14.231; 15.494-9; 16.345-50, 16.441-3, 16.684-7 θιά 101: 10.47−50; IV: # Dielov IV: 16.228-30 Beleiv IV: 16.185-7 θείνω TV: 16.338-40, 16.827-9 θείος 188: 9.238; EV: 14 θέλγω VI: 21.276 64us, 64us 1: 1.187; 2.73-5; 1: 31; IV: 14.383-7; 15.87-8; 16.386-8; V: 20.4-5 θέμιστις 🞞: 9.156 BIÓDIV V: 17.100-5, 17.477-8 θεράπων 1: 1.320; 4.227, 4.229-30; Ε: 6.18-19; 7.165; #: 11.322; IV: 13.249-50, 13.386; 16.164-7 δέσκελος 1: g.130; VI: 23.107 θισπίσιος Ι: 1.69-70; IV: 15.637 Oltiis IV: 15.598-9; 16.570-4, 16.867 θήκατο III: 10.30-1; IV: 14.187 θήλυς 🕮: 10.27, 10.216 θήν 🎟: 10.104; 11.365; ΙV: 13.620-5 θήρ Ⅳ: 15.586-8 θήσατο VI: 24.58 θητεύω VI: 21.444 OVITOS IV: 14.198-9; 16.441-3 8005 IV: 14.256-61; 16.422-5

θράσος IV: 14.414-17 8partis IV: 13.723-5; 16.492-501, 16.603-7 BOTIVOS VI: 24.721 opnivus IV: 14.238~41; 15.728-30 θρόνα VI: 22.441 ôpóvos III; 9.200; 11.645; IV: 14.153-5, 14.238-41; 15.150 θρυλίσσω VI: 23.396 Opúov VI: 21.351 θυγατέρισσιν IV: 15.195-9 ουμοραίστής IV: 16.588-92 Bunos I: 1.193-4; 3.293-4, 3.395; 4.152~4, 4.470-2, 4.524; #: 5.670, 5.671-3; 6.201-2, 6.361; 7.24-5, 7.44-5, 7.52-3, 7.131, 7.195; 8.38-40; 🛋: 9.342, 9.495; 12.292-307; IV: 3; 15.252-3, 15.279-80, 15.286-93, 15.320-2; 16.119-21, 16.481 ouos, ounins #: 12; 6.86-98, 6.269-70; 8.47-8; IV: 15.151-4 BUOOTKOOS VI: 24.221 θυόω Ιν: 14.172-4 θυραωρός VI: 22.69 Bun, Buin IV: 13.667-72 δώρηξ 1: 34; 3.355-60; 4.135-6; 11: 5.99-100; V: 20.413-15 đώς IV: 13.102-4 la IV: 16 lá V: 20.67-9 laivw IV: 15.100-3; VE: 23.598; 24.119 'laoves ev: 13.685-8 ίάπτω IV: 13.541-4; 16.236-8 ίανω 🖪: 9.325-6; ΓΥ: 14.211-13 ίαχε V: 20.61-3 lαχή IV: 14.1 ໂγνύη IV: 13.211-13 184 IV: 11; 14.347-8 18n(s) IV: 13.448-9 ίδνόομαι 🔟: 12.205 ίδρώς Ιν: 13.703-7 ίδρώσα 🎫: 11.598 iovia 🖬: 9.270 liphiov VI: 22.159 lepós, ipós I: 4.102-3, 4.378; II: 6.20; III: 10.56-8; 11.84-5; IV: 10, 12, 17; 16.97~100, 16.407-8, 16.658; V: 17.464-5; 18.504-5 inios IV: 15.365-6 100mmlwv vi: 21.16g 1005 EV: 14.402-8; 16.600-2 lkávw IV: 14.298-9, 14.349-53; 15.502-6 Ikpia IV: 15.674-6 hour #1: 9.414 ίλαος 📰: 9.639 'lλήίος VI: 21.558 Ίλιον Ιν: 15.56-77, 15.69-71

7λιος T: 4.378; II: 43; 5.204, 5.445-8; III: 12.115; IV: 15; 14.489-505; 15.66-8 Πλιόφι VI: 21.295 ίλύς VI: 21.318 lucis III: 10.475; ¥I: 23.363 lµeven V: 20.365 1μερος TV: 14.198-9 Tupevai V: 20.365 Iviov III: 5.73; IV: 14.493-8 TEOV IV: 14.433-4 10815 VI: 23.850 loxiaipa II: 5.53-4 Ιππεύς IV: 16.20 1ππηλάτα III: 9.432; IV: 16.193-7 1ππόδαμος Ιν: 16.716-20 Ιπποδρόμος VI: 23.330 Ιπποι, -ω Ι: 3.1 13, 3.265; 4.141–2, 4.366, 4.499-500; II: 5.13, 5.194-5, 5.221-3, 5.236, 5.249-50, 5.770-2, 5 825-6; 8.45-6, 8.113-14 Ιπποιάλευθος IV: 16.126-9 1πποκορυστής IV: 16.287-90 lππότα m: 9.162; IV: 16.193-7 Tois IV: 15.168-72 ls ('might') VI: 21.356 is ('sinew') VI: 23.191 Ισοφαρίζω VI: 21.411 10TWP V: 18.501 lσχανάω 🛚: 5.89-90; IV: 15.718-25; V: 17.570-3; VI: 23.300 Iχανάω V: 17.570-3; VI: 23.300 Ιχθυόεις III: 9.4 IXVIOV IV: 13.70-2 1χώρ II: 12; 5.339-42, 5.416, 5.870-1 ίψαο εν: 16.236~8 ίωή πι: 10.139; IV: 16.126-9 xáy V: 20.458-60 κάγκανος VI: 21.364 Káð IV: 14.438-9 Kattán rojai 1: 1.582 x001x622 IV: 14.104-8 кавіота III: 9.488-9 KONOS IV: 16.106-11, 16.492-501, 16.684-7 κάλ IV: 14.442-8 καλάμη V: 19.221-4 καλαύροψ VI: 23.845 καλήτωρ IV: 15.419-21; VI: 24-577 καλλίτριχες IV: 13.818-20; 15.352-4 καλός IV: 13.611-12; 14-175-7; 15-313-17; 16.338-40 κάλυκας V: 18.401 κάλυμμα VI: 24.93 καλύπτρη εν: 14.184; VI: 22.406 Kaupovin VI: 22.257 KOLIÓVTES 1: 3.278-9

κανών IV: 13.406-7; VI: 23.761 кат IV: 16.104-6 κάπετος IV: 15.356-7; V: 18.564-6; VI: 24.797 KOTTÝW VI: 22.467 кар IV: 16.389-92 κάρα IV: 24; 14.175-7; 15.56-77; 16.548-53 καρός πα: 9.378 KODTEDOULIOS IV: 14.512; 15.330-6 καρχαλέος VI: 21.541 KODIYUTTOS IV: 15.545-6 Κασσάνδρη Ιν: 13.365-7 κασσίτερος VI: 21.592 καταδημοβορέω V: 18.300-2 KOTOLIVÚW VI: 23.135 катадифокы IV: 15.661-6 KOTOTTVE III: 10.258 κατακτανέω IV: 14.479 B5 Kátavia VI: 23.116 καταπρηνής IV: 15.113-14; 16.791-2 KATAGEVOUGI VI: 21.382 κατεπάλμενος Π: 11.94 KOTEPELTO IV: 14.13-15 KOTTIDO VI: 22.293 Kathow VI: 24-253 κατωμάδιος VI: 23.431 καυλός IV: 13.162; 16.338-40 KE(V) TV: 13.126-8, 13.288-9; 14.484-5 κέδρινος VI: 24.192 Keiluan IV: 15.472-5; 16.538-47 KEÏVOS IV: 15.45-6; 16.650-1 RELOVTES IV: 14.340 KELPW IV: 5; 14.465-9 KETOE VI: 23.461 κεκαδών, -οντο III: 11.334; IV: 15.573-5 KERAMYON, -OVTES III 11.168, 11.344; 12.125; IV: 17; 16.430 кеклиран II: 5.708-10; IV: 15.737-40 KEKOTTWY IV: 13.59-61 κεκρύφαλος VI: 22.469 κελαινεφής IV: 14.436-7 KELEVTIOW III: 12.265 керте́ IV: 14.214-7; VI: 23.337 KÉPOS IDT: 11.385 κερδίον IV: 15.195-9 KEPKÍS VI: 22.448 кертоµе́ IV: 16.261 KEOTOS IV:14.214-17 KEUQUÓS IV: 13.27-31 KRÚĐW VI: 23.244 κεφαλή εν: 14.470-4; 16.74-7; ν: 17.240-4; 18.82 KNBELLOV VI: 23.163 KHO605 VI: 23.160 κήδος IV: 13.463-7 κήδω VI: 24.240, 24.542

κήλιος IV: 15.742-6 whp I: 4.46; II: 5.811-13; 7.99-100; 8.73-4; m: 9.411; 12.326-7; IV: 5; 16.684-7 кђр IV: 16.481 кято, IV: 13.27-31 KIVUPÓS V: 17.3-6 KIXES IV: 16.342-4 клет III: 9.189; IV: 34 клют II: 5.2-3, 5.172-3; 6.357-8; 7.91; III: 9.413; IV: 10 кλήδην Ⅲ: 9.11-12 κληίς Π: 6.86-98; IV: 14.166-9; 16.168-72 κλήρος IV: 15.494-9 κλισίη IV: 13.260-1; VI: 24.448 KAIOHOS III: 9.200; 11.693 κλιτύς IV: 16.389-92 KAOTOTTEÚW V: 19.149-50 Κλυταιμήστρη Ι: 1.113 κλύω I: 3.86-7; II: 8.5-6; IV: 16.514-26 whun IV: 13.70-2 KYTHIDES I: 34; 3.330-1 KV(07) 1: 1.315-17, 1.447-68; 4.48-9; II: 18 κόίλος, κοίλος mi: 10.525; IV: 13.107-10, 13.358 KOLVAL IV: 22 κόλος IV: 16.114-18 κομιδή II: 8.186-90; ¥I: 23.411 κομίζω IV: 14.454-7; VI: 22.286 KOUDOWTHS I: 2.536, 2.542; 3.43 κοναβέω, κοναβίζω IV: 13.495-501 κονίω IV: 14.143-6 ແດກນອື່ອງເຊື້ອງ VI: 22.132 κορυθαίολος ΜΓ: 11.315; V: 20.38-40 κόρυμβος III: g.241-2 кориз 1: 2.816; 3.371-2; 4.274, 4.424-6; Ш: 7.206; IV: 13.130-1, 13.712-18 κορύσσω Ι: 2.272-7; 4.274. 4.424-6, 4.440~1; II: 7.206; IV: 13.795-9; VI: 21.306 котоз IV: 13.516-17 κοτύλη VI: 22.494 κοτυλήρυτου VI: 23.34 κούρητης III: 9.529; V: 19.192-3 xoupos IV: 13.95-6; 15.281-5 кратаю́ III: 11.118-19; IV: 19.345-60 κραττερώνυξ ΙV: 16.722-5 кратнофі 🕮: 10.156 κράτος 💵: 9.39 κρείουσα VI: 22.48 креюточи IV: 24, 34; 16.688-90 κρήγυον Ι: 1.106 KONOV IV: 14.184; 16.97-100; VE 22.470 KOIKOS VI: 24.272 KOOVKOV IV: 14.244-8 крóссса 🎟: 12.258-60

KOUÓRIS III: 9.2, 9.64; IV: 15 KTEATILW IV: 16.56-9 KT1005 VI: 24.98 KTIBET 10.334-5 κτίλος IV: 13.492-5 KUÓVIOS VI: 22.402 KÚCTVOS III: 11.24; IV: 13.562-3 wavoxattys IV: 13.562-3; 15.100-3 кивютат IV: 15.535-6; 16.745-50 κυδάνω IV: 14.71-3 หมะหม่า 11.638-41 κυλλοποδίων V: 18.369-71; VI: 21.331 кора I: 1.469; II: 4.422-3; 6.348 κύμβαχος 1: 5.586; Γν: 15.535-6 KUUNDIS IV: 14.290-1 KIVARINA VI: 21.394 with I: 34; 3.330-8, 3.336, 3.371-2; III: 10.258; 11.41; IV: 13.712-18 κυνώπα I: 1.225; II: 6.344 Κύπρις #: 5.327-30 rúpopan VI: 24.530 κύρω VI: 23.821 ки́ши I: 3.180; II: 6.344; 8.423-4; III: 10.360-4; VI: 22.345 KUKUTÓS VI: 22.409 κωκύω VI: 22.407 κώληψ ν1: 23.726 100405 EV: 14.16-19 λαβραγόρης VI: 23.479 λαβρεύομαι VI: 23.474. 23.478 λαβρός VI: 23.473-81 λαθικηδής VI: 22.83 λαίνεος VI: 22.154 λαισήια Π.: 12.425-6 λαιψηρός IV: 14.16-19; 15.269-70 Λαμπετίδης Ιν: 15.526 λαμπετόωντι IV: 15.526 λανθάνω Ιν: 13.269-71, 13.720-2; 15.58–61 λαός IV: 17, 18 λασσσόσς IV: 13.126-8; V: 20.38-40 λαρναξ VI: 24.795 λαυκανίη VI: 22.325 λέγω Ι: 2.435; 3.188; IV: 13.275-8 λειριόεις ΓV: 13.830-2 AUGKOLTOS V: 17.343-4 λέλαχον Ιν: 15.348-51 λεληκώς VI: 22.141-2 λελιημένοι 101: 12.106 λεξάσθων, λέξεο 🖬: 9.66-7, 9.617 λευγαλίος IV: 13.97-8 λευκάστης VI: 22.294 λινικός IV: 13.837; 14.185-6; 15.313-17 λευκώλενος IV: 15.92 λέων IV: 15.592-5; V: 17.133-6

ληϊτις 🞞: 10.460 Λήττος V: 17.601-2 Λητώ IV: 14.313-28; 16.849-50 λιάζομαι V1: 22.12 λιγύφθογγος ΜΕ: 9.20 λικριφίς Ιν: 14.461-4 Λιμνώρεια IV: 14.307-8 λινοθώρηξ Ι: 2.529-30, 2.830; 🛙: 5.612-14 λίνος V: 18.569-70 λιπαροκρήδεμνος Ιν: 16.867 λιπαρός VI: 22.406 λίς 11: 11: 239; 1: 17: 133-6 λίτομαι Ιν: 16.46-8 λόγος Ιν: 15.393 λοισθήϊος VI: 23.751 λοίσθος VI: 23.536 λούω IV: 14.3-7; 15.393 Aukin, Aukioi I: 4.101, 4.197; II: 5.105; [cf. III: 12.292] λύσσα ΙΙΙ: 9.239 λυσσώδης IV: 13.53 λύω IV: 13.402-23: 16.340-1 λώβη 🞞: 9.387; 11.142 λωτόεις ΠΙ: 12.283 λωτός IV: 14.347-8: VI: 21.351 uaivas VI: 22.460 μαίνομαι IV: 15.601-4, 15.605-9 μάκελλα VI: 21.259 μακών Ιν: 16.467-9 μάλα Ι: 1.173; 3.203-8; Π: 31; 5.406-9, 5.410-11, 5.607; 6.255-7; 8.102 μάν IV: 16, 17 Hantis I: 1.63, 1.69-70 μαρμάρεος IV: 14.271-4 μάρτυρος IV: 24; 14.271-4 μάσσομαι 🕮: 9.394 μάχαιρα μι: 11.844; ΙV: 13.609~10; V: 18.597-8 Μαχάων IV: 14.3-7, 14.115-20 μαχλοσύνη VI: 24.30 μάχομαι Ιν: 34, 36; 13.118-19 μεγάθυμος IV: 13.598-600; 15.440-1; 16.297-300 uryalpw VI: 23.865 μεγακήτης III: 11.5; VI: 21.22 μεγαλήτωρ ΙΙΙ: 22; 9.109; ΙV: 13.301-3; 15.674-6 μεγαλωστί Ιν: 16.775-6 μέγαρον ΠΙ: 9.144 μεθημοσύνη ΙΥ: 13.107-10 μεγνυμι IV: 13.290-1; 14.383-7 μείζων IV: 34, 35 μείλινος TV: 13.597; 16.114-18, 16.812-17 μειλιχίη IV: 15.741

µels V: 19.117

μελάνδετος εν: 15.713-15 μέλας Ιν: 16.684-7 μέλδω VI: 21.363 μελίη Ιν: 16.33-5, 16.141-4 μελιηδής V: 17.17 μέλπομαι Ιν: 13.636-9 μεματώς Ι: 2.473, 2.817-18; 4.40-1, 4.73; Π: 5.142-3; 7.24-5, 7.36; 8.56-7, 8.327; IV: 13.77-80, 13.775-87; 15.601-4; 16.754-5 μέμηλε Ιν: 13.295-7 μενεαίνω IV: 15.601-4; 16.490-1 Μενεσθεύς III: 12.331 WEVEXAPUTS IV 14.370-7; 15.582-5 μενσεικής VI: 23.139 μενοινάω Π: 7.36; IV: 13.77-80; 15.80-3 µevos I: 1.104-5; II: 5.135-6, 5.295-6, 5.514-16, 5.562-4; 6.407-9; 7.36; 8.358; II: 12.18; IV: 10, 12; 13.77-80, 13.444, 13.562-3 μερμηρίζειν Π: 8.167-8 ulpomes 1: 1.250; 3.402; IV: 13.567-9; V: 18.288-9 μεσαιπόλιος IV: 13.361 µeothers III: 12.269 μεσσοπαγής VI: 21.172 μετά IV: 13.301-3, 13.700; 15.115-19 μετανάστης 11: 9.648; IV: 16.59 μεταστοιχί VI: 23.358 μετάφρενον JV: 16.481, 16.791-2 μετεκίαθου III: 11.51-2, 11.714 μετοκλάζω εν: 13.279-81 μετοχλίζω VI: 24.567 μέτωπον IV: 15.100-3; 16.70-1 μέχρι(ς) IV: 13.143-4; VI: 24.128 μήλον Π: 5.140; ΓV: 16.352-5 μήνιμα VI: 22.358 µŋvıs III: 9.426; IV: 13.459~61; 15.223; 16.28-31 μήρινθος VI: 23.854 uts IV: 30 μήστωρ I: LI13; 4.328; II: 5.270-2 μιαρός VI: 24.420 μικρός Π: 5.800-1 μίνυνθα VI: 23.97 Mives IV: 14.321-2 μίτος VI: 23.762 μίτρη Ι: 4.132-40, 4.137-8, 4.186-7; Π: 5.316-17; IV: 16.419-21; V: 20.413-15 μογοστόκος III: 11.270; IV: 16.185-7 µoipa III: 5.674-6; 6.487-9; IIII: 30.369; IV: 5; 13.602-3; 15.206-8; 16.852-4 Mallove #: 11.750; IV: 13.46; 16.692-7 μολπή Ιν: 13.636 -9 μολύβδαινα VI: 24.80 μονωθείς JEE: 11.470 μορμύρω VI: 21.325

μορόεις IV: 14.182-3 μόρος IV: 5; 15.209-11 μόρσιμος IV: 15.610-14; VI: 22.13 μόρφνος VI: 24.316 μούσα 1: 1.1; 2.484, 2.485-6, 2.761-2; Π: 5.703 ναιετάω, ναίω Ι: 4.45; ΙΙ: 6.14-15; ΙV: 15.526 ναῦφι (ν) 🕮: 12.225; IV: 13.700 viertos 11: 9.149-53; 11.712 vers IV: 13.174-6 vérogi IV: 15.406-9 VENCEW VI: 24.29 νέκταρ V: 19.37-8 vérui IV: 16.521-6 VELIEOTITOS III: 11.649 véneous 1: 3.156, 3.411; 4.507; II: 6.335-6; 8.407-8; IV: 13.120-3 vénoma I: 2.780; VI: 23.177 veoapons VI: 21.346 violy VI: 23.604 vios IV: 13.95-6; 15.240-1; V: 17.35-7 veds IV: 15.426-8, 15.693-5 VEOTEVICTÓS VI: 21.592 VEPTEPOS IV: 15.224-5 VEDENTY IDETCE IV: 13.562-3; 14.292-3; 15.151-4; 16.297-300 VIČV IV: 13.723-5; 15.391-2, 15.426-8 VEWTERON IV: 27; 13.636-9; 14.140-2, 14.250-61, 14.317-18 νηγάτεος Ιν: 14.185-6 vhoupos I: 2.1-2; III: 10.91; IV: 14.242 ทา่เฮฮา IV: 15.601-4 UNKOUTTIN IV: 15.236-43; V: 20.13-18 VITTIN III: 9.491; IV: 15.962-4; V: 20.411-12 vittios 1: 1.38; IV: 15.104, 15.494-9; 16.7-10, 16.46-8, 16.833-4; V: 5, 9; 18.293-5, 18.311; 19.85-138 νηπύτιος VI: 21.410 vioopan IV: 13.185-7 voéw I: 1.343-4 VÚLIOS VI: 23.223 VŨV V: 17.477-8; 18.88 vúova VI: 23.332, 23.758 νύσσω IV: 14.20~6; 16.702-6 VOIV IV: 13.326-7; 15.212-17 Eavoos 1: 1.403-4; II: 6.172; V: 20.73-4; [cf. m: 12.313] Envos, Einos, Ennion 1: 4.387; 11: 6.215, 6.218-19; IV: 18; 13.624-5 ξίφος I: 1.7; 2.45; 3.330-8; IV: 16.338-40

Ev IV: 13.736-9

ξυνελαύνω VI: 22.129

Evrifia VI: 23.809 Euroxf VI: 23.330 Evotor IV: 13.496-501; 15.388-9 ð IV: 13.394-401; 16.358-63, 16.463-5, 16.467-9 б те IV: 13.481-4 δαρίζω VI: 22.127 δαριστύς IV: 13.290-1; V: 17.227-8 οβριμοεργός VI: 22.418 δβριμος III: 10.200; IV: 13.292-4, 13.518-20; 16.716-20 δyμos V: 18.544-7 OSUGORUS 1: 4.491 δίζυρός Ιν: 13.567-9 oing VI: 24.269 olktiotos VI: 22.76 'Οίλεύς ΕΕ: 11.92-100; 12.365; EV: 13, 24; 13.66-7 οίμα Ιν: 16.751-3 οίνοψ Ιν: 13.703-7 olos v: 18.105~6 ðis IV: 15.372-6 olotte IV: 15.718-25 δίω, δίομαι Ι: 1.169-71, 1.552-9, 1.561; Ι. 5.287-9; 6.352-3; IV: 13.149-54, 13.262-5 OKPUGEIS INT: 9.64; IV: 15 όλίγος Ι: 2.529-30; 4.442; Π: 5.800-1 δλμος 🎞: 11.147 δλοοίτροχος IV: 13.136-8 δλοφυδνός VI: 23.102 ομαρτίω IV: 13.584-5 όμηλικίη Ιν: 13.485-6 δμογάστριος VI: 21.95 opolios III: 9.440; IV: 13.358 ομοκλή εν: 16.145-8 δμοστιχάω IV: 15.631 όμφαλός, -όεσσα Π: 6.117-18; 7.267; IV: 13.190-4 δμως 🖽: 12.393 όνειαρ VI; 22.433 6veos VI: 23.775 ÖVOHAL V: 17.25; VI: 24.241 όνομακλήδην VI: 22.415 δνομάκλυτος VI: 22.51 όξυόεις ΙΙ: 5.48-50; IV: 13.584-5 ofús IV: 13.561, 13.584-5; 16.772-5 60V IV: 17 όπάων π: 7.165; ΓΥ: 13.249-50; 15.254-9 δπλα 22: 10.254 δπλότερος, -ότατος III: 9.57-8; IV: 14.267-70 δηπως IV: 16 οπνίω Ιν: 13.378-82 δργνια VI: 23.327

optyouan IV: 16.313-15; VI: 24.506 öperte III: 10.185 OPEXOLO VI: 23.30 όρῆτο IV: #4 ορθόκρατρος V: 18.3-4 бркиа, бркоз I: 3.73-5, 3.269-70, 3.276-91, 3.276-8; 4.155; 1: 7.69, 7.351-3, 7.411; IV: 14.271-9 δρμοι V: 18.401 õpvis III: 12.200, 12.218; IV: 15.690-2 δρνυμι IV: 13.269-71; 15.693-5 600005 VI: 24.451 Ορτίλοχος Π: 5.541-9 δρχαμος ΙV: 14.101-2 δρχατος Ιν: 14.122-5 δρωρε, δρώρει IV: 13.269-71; 16.633-4 5, ms IV: 17; 13.99-101, 13.481-4; 14.223-4, 14.249; 15.394-8; 16.52-5, 16.207-9, 16.444-9, 16.341-7 60(0)05 IV: 14.394-9; 15.358-61 бте IV: 13.481~4; 14.71-3; 16.33-5. 16.52-5, 16.225-7 ότέ IV: 15.277-8; 16.688-90 ortoioiv IV: 15.490-3 бті IV: 14.71-3; 16.33-5, 16.225-7 ouni IV: 15.716-17 ούλόμενος Ιν: 14.83-5 ούλος V: 17.756 ούρον 🕮: 10.351-2 ούτάζω Ιν: 13.288-9, 13.761-4; 16.467-9. 16.806-7; VI: 21.68 OUTWS TV: 13.446-7, 13.810 ovyi IV: 15.716-17 δφείλω 🔟: 11.686; IV: 34 õeiş III: 12.208 δφρα IV: 15.231-2, 15.547-51; 16.242-8 δφρυσεις VI: 22.411 όχέσμαι VI: 24.731 όχετηγός VI: 21.257 δχεύς III: 12.455-6; V: 20.413-15 δχθήσας Ψ: 17.90-3 όχλέω VI: 21.261 TC18040V05 VI: 24.506 παιήων 1: 1.473 παιπαλόεις 12:12.168 παλαισμοσύνη VI: 23.701 πάλη VI: 23.635 πάλιν Ι: 1.59; II: 5.257--8, 5.835-6; IV: 19.1-9 παλιώξις 🕮: 12.71-2; IV: 225; 15.69-71 Παλλάς ΙΙ: 5.1-3; ΙΙΙ: 10.245; ΙΥ: 15.610-14 πάλτο ΙΥ: 15.645-52 πανάποτμος VI: 24.255 παναφήλιξ VI: 22.490 Navaxanol I: 2.404, 2.529-30

παναώριος VI: 24.540 πανδαμάτωρ VI: 24.5 πανόψιος VI: 21.397 TOVOUBIN II: 11.709 πανύστατος VI: 23.532 παπταίνω Ιν: 14.101-2 παρά IV: 13.775-87; 15.279-80 παραί IV: 15.279-80 παραιβάτης VI: 23.132 παρακαταβάλλω VI: 23.127, 23.683 πάραντα VI: 23.116 παραφθαίησι 🖽: 10.346 πάρδαλις Ιν:13.102-4; νΙ: 21.573 παρείθη VI: 23.868 παρικπροφεύγω VI: 23.314 παρήορος Ν: 7.155-6; 8.87-91; IV: 16.152-4, 16.470-5; VI: 23.603 παρθένιος Ιν: 16.179-81 Πάρις Ι: 3.16; ΙΥ: 13.171-3 παρίσταο ΙΙΙ: 10.291 παροίτερος VI: 23.459 παροίχωκεν 🖽: 10.252 πάρος IV: 15.279-80; 16.627-32; V: 17.586-8; 20.121-4 πάρφασις Ιν: 14.216-17 näs 11: 6.498-9; IV: 13.611-12; 15.189-93 πάσαι εν: εδ πάτογος Ιν: 13.282-3; νΙ: 21.387 πατήρ IV: 14.349-53 πότρη Ιν: 13.345-60 πατροκασίγνητος VI: 21.469 Патрокле №: 19.287-8 Πατροκλέης IV: 309; 16.11, 16.554-5 Ποτρόκλεις Ιν: 34; 16.20 πεδάω VI: 23.585 πέζα VI; 24.272 πειρά VI: 21.459 πείραρ 🛚: 6.143; 7.101-2; 🕮: 12.79; Ⅳ: 13.358-60; V: 18.498-500, 18.501; VI: 23.350 πείρινς VI: 24.190 πτίρω VI: 24.8 TEARDON VI: 21.407 πέλεως IV: 13.611-12; VI: 23.114 πέλωρ μα: 9.158 πελώριος Ι: 3.226-7; ΠΙ: 10.439; V: 17.173-4; VI: 22.92 πέπλος ΙΥ: 14.180 menvuulvos II: 5.697-8; 7.274-6; III: 9.57-8; LL822; IV: 13.254; 14.449-53 minov 101: 9.251-8 πέπρωται EV: 5; 15.209-11 TETTUKOOUEVA VE 23.503 ntnuv II: 6.55; IV: 13.120-3; 15.436-9 περ III: 9.1 10; IV: 15.372-6; V: 20.20-30 miptan IV: 16.707-9

περιβάλλω VI: 23.276 περιγλαγής IV: 16.641-4 mpioifios VI: 21.163 περιδίδωμι VI: 23.485 περιδρύπτω VI: 23.395 TEOIVOLETTIS VI: 24.488 Mepipas V: 17.322-6 TEPKVÓS VI: 24.316 πέρνημι VI: 21.40, 21.58 mioonv I: 2.237; 4.512-13; #: 8.512-13 πετεηνός ΙV: 15.237-8, 15.690-2 πίτρη Ιν: 13.139 πευκάλιμος EV: 14.162-5; V: 20.34-5 πευιαδανός 111: 10.8 methoria V:17.155 πφνών Ιν: 16.827-9 πηγός III: 9.124; IV: 14.16-19 ттркто́с IV: 13.703-7 Πηλεύς IV: 16.33-5, 16.173-8 Thrukhaws IV: 13.92; 14.489~91 πηνίον VI: 23.762 πηχυς III: 11.375; IV: 13.582-3 πιαρ 🖬: 11.550-5 πίδαξ IV: 16.825 mitos IV: 15.680; VI: 24.527 πινύσσω IV: 14.249 πίσυρις Ιν: 16; 15.680 πιφαύσικω, «ομαι 10: 10.478; VI: 21.333 πλάζω VI: 21.269 πλανάομαι VI: 23.321 πλήθος VI: 23.639 πληθύς IV: 15.294-7. 15.301-5 Πληϊάδες V: 18.486 πληκτίζεσθαι VI: 21.499 πλόκαμος IV: 14.175-7 πλυνός VI: 22.153 πλύνω VI: 22.155 ποδηνεκής II: 6.1 17-18; IV: 15.645-52 TTOINTOS IV: 14.9-12 ποικίλος IV: 14.214-17; 16.134-5 moint IN: 13.658-9 ποιπνύω IV: 14.153-5 πόλις IV: 16.66-9 πολλός IV: 13.802-5; 14.33-6 πολύσινος 22: 9.673 πολυγηθής VI: 21.450 πολυδαίδαλος VI: 23.743 πολυδάκρυος IV: 14.157-8; V: 17.192 πολύδωρος VI: 22.88 πολυηγερής 🕮: 11.564 πολύκμητος II: 6.48-50; III: 10.379 πολύμηλος IV: 14.489-91; 16.179-92 πολύμητις VI: 21.355 πολυπίδαξ I: 8.47-8; IV: 14.157-8; 16.233 πολύπυρος IV: 15.372-6

πολύς Ιν: 13.449-54, 13.611-12, 13.732-5, 13.802-5; 15.56-77; 16.326-9, 16.653-7 πολυτρηρώς #: 5.778 πολύφλοισβος IV: 15.381-4 πολύφορβος IV: 14.200-2 πονίομαι II: 5.84; IV: 13.288-9 πόνος Ι: 2.291; 4.456; Ε: 5.84, 5.517; 6.522 ποντόπορος IV: 15.693-5, 15.704-6 πόντος 🕮: 9.4; ¥Ι: 21.59 πόποι IV: 13.99-101; 16.49-50 πορδαλις ΙV: 13.102-4 πόρος VI: 21.1 πόρπαι V: 18.401 πορφύριος IV: 16.389-92; V: 17.360-2; VI: 21.326 πορφύρω Ιν: 14.16-19; νι: 21.551 πόρω, έπορον ΙV: 15.209-11; 16.141-4 Ποσειδάων Ιν: 13.10-38 ποσσήμαρ VI: 24.657 ποτί IV: 8, 17; 14.173, 14.396 ποῦ IV: 15.440-1 moüs IV: 13.383-5; 15.405; 16.297-300 Πράμνειος 🔟: 11.639 πρέσβα IV: 14.194-7 πρηξις VI: 24.524 Πρισμίδης III: 11.295; IV: 13.427-33 Relation 14: 13.171-3 πρίν Ιν: 15.56-77; 16.627-32 πρόβατον ΙV: 14.122-5 προθέλυμνος III: 10.15; IV: 13.130-1 προκρόσσοι IV: 14.33-6 πρόμαχος Ι: 3.16, 3.19-20, 3.44-5; Ι: 23; 5.134; 7.74-5; 8.99-100; IV: 15.340-2 πρόμος εν: 15.286-93 προπροκυλίνδομαι VI: 22.223 πρός ΙΝ: 17 πρόσθεν εν: 13.502-5, 13.802-5 προσσόθεν ΨΤ: 23.533 πρόσφατος VI: 24.757 προσφύω VI: 24.213 πρότερος εν: 15.656 προτί ΙΙΙ: 11.831-2; IV: 8, 19 προτιόσσομαι VI: 22.356 πρότμησις 🖬: 11.424 πρόφασις ν: 19.261-3, 19.301-2 προφερής Μ: 10.353 πρόφρασσα Π: 10.290 πρόχνυ 🛄: 9.570; ΙV: 14.436-7; 16.389-92; VI: 21.460 πρόχοος VI: 24.304 πρυλίες II: 5.743-4; III: 11.47-55; IV: 15-515-17 πρύμνη IV: 14.31-2 πρυμνός IV: 14.31-2; 16.313-15; V: 17.617-19 πρών Ιν: 16.297-900; ν: 17.747

πρώτιστος IV: 14.295-6 πρωτόγονος VI: 23.864 πρωτοπαγής VI: 24.267 πρῶτος IV: 13.170, 13.502-5; 14.31-2, 14.295-6; 15.656; 16.399-400 πτέρνη VI: 22.397 πτήσσω IV: 14.40 πτολίπορθος IV: 15.56-77; VI: 21.550 πτύσσομαι IV: 13.134-5 πτύω VI: 23.697 πτώξ V: 17.676--8; VI: 22.310 πύκα IV: 15.685-9 TURINOS IV: 14.166-9, 14.294; 15.461-5 πυλαωρός VI: 21.530; 22.69 πύξινος VI: 24.269 πῦρ ΙΥ: 15.596; 16.293-6 πύργος, •ηδόν 1: 4.333-5, 4.508; Π: 23: 7.219-23, 7.219, 7.338; 8.517-21; 11: 12.43 πυρετός VI: 22.31 πυρόφορος IV: 14.122-5 πω IV: 15.426-8 βα IV: 16.176-8, 16.228-30 ρόβδος III: 12.297; IV: 13.59-61, 13.406-7 padivós VI: 23.583 þía IV: 13,143-4; V: 17,461-3; 20,101-2 Péa IV: 14.203-4; 15.185-8 ρίζω Ι: 2.400-1; 🗉: 5.373-4 6005 IV: 16.855-8 peia IV: 13.143-4; 15.490-3; V: 17.461-9 ρηγνύσι V: 17.751 phyos VI: 24.644 ρηξήνωρ IV: 13.322-5 Phoos m 10.435 ρητός VI: 21.445 pivóv IV: 16.635-7 ρινοτόρος VI: 21.392 ριπή IV: 14.414-17 pinttáoko IV: 15.23-5 pobavós V: 18.573-6 pobóeis VI: 23.186 puopar m: 9.248, 9.396; IV: 15.18-31, 15.139-41 ουστάζω VI: 24.755 ρωχμός VI: 23.420 σάπος 1: 3.330-8, 3.335; 4.90-1; II: 6.1 17-18; 7.219-23, 7.245-8, 7.267; III: 11.485; IV: 13.130-1, 13.708-10; 14.402-8 σαλπίζω VI: 21.388 oavlões V: 18.274-6 σαόφρων VI: 21.462 oców III: 9.424, 9.681 Σαρπήδων ΙΙ: 5.663; IV: 972; [cf. III: 12.292]

σουρωτήρ 🖽: 10.153 odw IV: 16.358-63 otias V: 17.739 Σελλοί Γν: 16.234-5 σεύω, -ομαι τν: 13.126-8; 15.272; ν: 17.461-3 σήμα Ι: 1.403-4; Π: 6.168-9, 6.170-1, 6.176-7, 6.417-20; 7.86, 7.175-7; 8.169-71; VI: 23.326 σημάντωρ IV: 15.323-5 obevos IV: 13.246-8; V: 18.274-6 σιγαλόεις VI: 22.154 σιδήρειος, -eos V: 52; VI: 23.177 σίδηρος V: 18.32-4 σιφλόω IV: 14.140-2 Σκάμανδρος ΙΙ: 5.35-6; ΙΙΙ: 12.21; V: 20.73-4 στάλλω VI: 23.191 σκέπτομαι Ιν: 16.358-63 OKATTOHOL IV: 14.454-7 σκήπτρον Ι: 1.234-9; 2.86, 2.101-8, 2.109; II: 7.277-8, 7.412; III: 10.321-3; IV: 13.59-61 OKIÓEIS IV: 13.754-5; 14.225-30 σκύζομαι VI: 24.113 σκώληξ IV: 13.564-6, 13.654-5 σκώλος IV: 13.564-6 σμαραγέω VI: 21.199 σμερδαλέος Ι: 2.334; ΙΙ: 5.302-4; 7.479; IV: 15.685-9 σμερδνός Ιν: 15.685-9 Σμινθεύς Ι: 1.39 σμύχω VI: 22.411 σόλος VI: 23.826 0005 IV: 16.249-52 σορός VI: 23.91 σοφίη Ιν: 15.410-13 σπείο, έσπεο 11: 10.285 ontrow 1: 3.296 σπιδής III: 1 L.754 σπλάχνα Ι: 3.295-301 σταδίη Π: 7.240-1; IV: 13.312-14 στάθμη Ιν: 15.410-13 στείομεν IV: 36; 15.294-7 στενάχω εν: 16.487-9 στεροπηγερέτα IV: 16.297-300 στεύται III: 9.241-2 orie avn III: 11.96; IV: 13.136-8; 16.97-100 orthoavos IV: 13.736-9 στεφανόω V: 18.485 στή, Ιστη Π: 5.170, 5.309-10, 5.610-11 othowai VI: 22.350 στιβαρός IV: 15.125-7; 16.801-2 στίχες Ι: 2.92-3; 3.77, 3.326-7, [cf. 3.341]; n: 5.166 otixos IV: 16.173-5 στόμα IV: 15.388-9

384

atta tara ana att

στρατός IV: 16.72-3 OTPETTÓS I: 3.439-40; E: 5.112-13; VI: 21.31 στρεύγομαι ΙV: 15.511-12 στρεφεδίνεω Ιν: 16.791-2 στρόμβος Ιν: 14.413 στροφάλιγγι IV: 16.775-6 συλάω IV: 13.201-3; 15.426-8 συμπλαταγίω VI: 23.102 σύν Ιν: 13.736-9; 14.501-5 συναγείρω εν: 15.680 ouvarlow III: 10.499; IV: 15.680 ouvere IV: 16.740-4 συνεοχμός IV: 14.465-9 ouver the mat 12.26 ouvioraum IV: 14.96-100 ourtonul 1: 1.76; 1: 7-44-5 σφιδανόν Ιν: 16.372-6 σφενδόνη EV: 13.598-600 σφώ IV: 13.47-51; 15.146-8 σφώίν IV: 13.326-7; 15.155-6 σχεδόθεν εν: 16.806-7 σχεδόν IV: 15.452-60; 16.806-7 σχέτλιος Ι: 2.112; 3.414; Π: 31; Π: 9.19; 10.164; IV: 16.203-6; VI: 22.41, 22.86; 24.33 aws IV: 13.769-73; 16.249-52 ταγός VI: 23.160 ταλάφρων Ιν: 13.298-300 ταναός IV: 16.588-92 τανηλεγής VI: 22.210 TOWNER'S IV: 14.383-7; 16.765-9 τανύφλοιος IV: 16.765-9 τανύω VI: 23.324 TOTTIS VI: 24.230 τάρ V: 18.182 ταρβίω IV: 13.284-7 ταρχύω II: 7.85; IV: 16.456-7 τάφρος Γν: 15.343-4, 15.356-7 те 1: 1.218; 11: 5.137-42, 5.885-7; 8.186-90; EV: 14.16-19, 14.147-52, 14.484-5; 15.224-5, 15.358-61, 15.702-9; V: 37 TELY 11: 11.200-1; IV: 8 TEIOS V: 19.188-9; 20.41-3 THUMP 1: 1.525-7; 11: 7.30-2, 7.70 TEKOS III: 9.444; EV: 14 Τελαμώνιος, -ιάδης 11: 9.622-3; IV: 19; 13.66-7; 14.409-12, 14.460 TEXELOS VI: 24.315 τελέω IV: 14.194-7 τέλος 11: 11.439, 11.727-30; 14: 13.602-3; 16.627-32 τέλσον IV: 13.703-7; V: 18.544-7 TELEVOS III: 12.313; IV: 14.122-5 TEUVW IV: 13.703-7; 16.141-4 τίμω IV: 13.703-7

THOÃO V: 19.342-3 TEOS EV: 8; 16.64-5 répas I: 1.73~5; 4.394~5, 4.398, 4.408; II: 6.183; 8.223-6; III: 11.27-8 τέρμα VI: 23.309 τερμιόεις IV: 16.803 τεσσαράβοιος VI: 23.705 TETOYOV IV: 15.23-5 τετραθέλυμνος IV: 13.130-1 τετράκυκλος VI: 24.324 τετραφάληρος ΙΙ: 5.743-4; IV: 13.132-3 τετράφαλος m: 12.384; VI: 22.315 τιύχια Ι: 3.86-94, 3.195-6; 4.419; 🛙: 6.234-6, 6.321-4, 6.417-20; 7.122, 7.207 τεύχω IV: 13.346-8; 14.9-12; VI: 23.741 TEWS V: 17.727; 19.188-9 tň IV: 14.218-23 THOMA IV: 16.747-8 τηλεθάω VI: 22.423 τηλύγετος 11: 9.143, 9.482, 9.630; IV: 13.470 TTOS V: 19.188-9; 20.41-3 Tin V: 17.170-2 TIGEIGI IV: 16.262-5 τιθήμενος III: 10.34 Τιθωνός ΕΠ: 11.1-2 тіктю П: 6.154-5 τιμή Ι: 1.175-6 านที่ร (านท์ตร) 🏛: 9.605 τιτύσκομαι Ιν: 13.556~9 τλάω 🖬: 5.382, 5.385 τλήμων ΠΙ: 10.231-2 τλητός VI: 24.49 τοί, ταί εν: 19; 13.358 ' TOTOS IV: 13.674-8; VI: 23.246 TOTOBEOGI III: 10.462 τολυπεύω IV: 14.85-7 TOEEVTAS VI: 23.850 τορνόομαι VI: 23.255 той = ой V: 19.322-3, 19.331-3 τόφρα Ιν: 15.231-2; ν: 17.79-81 τράπεζα ΠΙ: 9.216; 11.628-9 τραφερή IV: 14.307-8 τρέφω IV: 14.307-8; 15.605-9, 15.618-22 τρητός VI: 24.720 τρίγληνος IV: 14.182-3 τρίζω VE: 23.714 τρίπολος ν: 18.541-2 TPIS V: 18.155-6; 20.445-8 Τριτογένεια Ι: 4.513-16 7000015 IV: 15.618-22 τρύζω 🖬: 9.311 τρυφάλεια Ι: 3.330-8, 3.371-2; IV: 13.132-3 TURTÓS IV: 14.9-12 τυμβοχόη VI: 21.323

τύνη III: 12.237; IV: 16.64-5 τύπτω IV: 13.288-9; 16.859-63 TUTOON IV: 16.710-11; VI: 24.170 TUAXOS II: 6.139-40; IV: 14.16-19, 14.140-2 τώς IV: 14.43-8; 15.277-8 ύβρις m: 9.368; IV: 13.333-5 UBPIOTAS IV: 13.633-5 Uyph IV: 14.307-8 ύδωρ IV: 15.37-44 vlós, -ús IV: 13.185-7, 13.345-60; 15.244-6; 16.176-8 Unitor IV: 15.494-9 бинілі інг. го.380 ύπαί IV: 16.372-6 UTTELV1/1008 VI: 22.491 ύπερβαίνω 🔟: 9.501 ύπερδέα ν: 17.327-30 ύπερέπτω VI: 21.271 ύπερηφανίοντες ΙΙ: 11.694-5 umipθυμος Π: 5.76-8, 5.376; Ⅲ: 9.233; IV: 14.250-5; 15.135-6, 15.576-8 ύπερφίαλος IV: 13.292-4 ύπηνήτης VI: 24.348 ύπό IV: 16.200-2, 16.490-1 ύπόδρα Ι: 1.148-71; 2.217, 2.245; IV: 15.10-13 ύπολίζων V: 18.517-19 ύσμίνη εν: 13.206-9 ύστάτιος IV: 15.631 ύψι IV: 14.75-7 ύψικάρηνος ΠΙ: 12.132 UNITERALS VI: 22.308 ύψιπέτηλος ΙV: 13.437 ύψιπέτης 🛄: 12.201 ¢011105 IV: 13.434-6, 13.837 ¢œeivω IV: 13.275−8 φαιδιμόεις εν: 13.685-8 ¢aivw IV: 13.275−8; 14.127-8 φάλαγξ Ι: 2.558; 3.77; 4.252-4, 4.421-8; II: 5.92, 5.166; 7.138-41 φάλαρον IV: 16.104-6 φαληριάω IV: 13.795-9 φάλος 1: 3.362; II: 5.743-4; 6.9-11; III· 10.258; 11.41; IV: 13.132-3 ¢áos IV: 17; 13.837; 14.342-5; 15.741; 16.188-92 φάσγανον Ι: 7; 2.45; Π: 7.303-5; Ⅳ: 14.402-8; 16.338-40 φάσκω IV: 13.99-101 ¢0000¢óvos IV: 15.237-8 φαυλότεραι εν: 22 φέριστος, φέρτατος ΠΙ: 9.110 ♦ 10 TPOV V: 18.236 φεύγω IV: 14.80-1, 14.83-5; VI: 21.6

фή IV: 14.499-500 φημί IV: 13.83-90; 14.127-8; VI: 21.361 φήρ, Φῆρες Ι: 1.268; 2.742-4; ΕΥ: 16 φθέγγομαι ΠΙ: 10.67, 10.457 φιαλη VI: 23.243, 23.270 Φιλομμειδής Ι: 3.424; IV: 14.187-223, 14.211-13; VI: 21.416 φίλος Ι: 3.30-1, 3.402; Ι: 31; 4.189; 6.471-5; 7.274-82; 8.281; Ⅲ: 9.555; Ⅳ: 13.73-5; 14.208-10; 16.450-5, 16.603-7; VI: 21.99-113 φλεγμα VI: 21.337 φλέψ IV: 13.545-7 φλοϊσβος III: 10.416; IV: 15.605-9 φοβέω, -ούμαι III: 10.10; VI: 22.11 φόβος, III: 9.2; IV:13.470 CONVINCERS IN: 10.133; IV: 16.803 φοίνιξ VI: 23.454 000 IV: 15.631 ¢óvos, -¢óvtns I: 2.103; 4.394-5; II: 6.154-5; 7. 466; IV: 16.156-63 φορήναι III: 10.270 φόως IV: 17; 16.188-92 φραδής VI: 24.354 φράζω IV: 14.3-7, 14.499-500; 15.160-7; 16.645-8 φρήν 1: 1.103, 1.114-15, 1.188-92, 1.193-4; 3.108, 3.442; II: 5.326; 8.559; III: 9.342, 9.496; IV: 3; 14.162-5, 14.294; 15.160-7; 16.481; VI: 23.104 φρίξ II: 7.63-6; VI: 21.126 φρίσσω II: 7.61-2, 7.63-6 φρονέω VI: 22.59 φύζα m: 9.2; 10.31 1; IV: 16.653-7 φύλακος IV: 14.157-8; VI: 24.566 ¢ῦλου Ι: 2.362-3, 2.668-70, 2.840-1; Ⅳ: 14.354-62 φυλοπις IV: 13.633-5 φύξηλις V: 17.143 φύρω VI: 24.162 φυσίζοος 1: 3.243-4; VI: 21.63 ϕ ico, -ouch I: 1.512-13; II: 6.149, 6.253 φωνίω IV: 15.35 ♦ωριαμός VI: 24.228 Xazw IV: 13.531-3; 16.698-701, 16.736 χαίρω IV: 14.267-70; 15.95-9 χάλκεος II: 5.784-6; III: 11.241; IV: 13.183-4, 13.597; 16.114-18, 16.812-17, 16.859-63; V: 52; 18.222 χαλκίς εν: 14.290-1 χαλκογλώχις VI: 22.225 χαλκοκορυστής IV: 16.534-6 χαλκός Ι: 2.417; 3.348-9; 4.412-4, 4.485-6, 4.510-11; II: 5.887; 7.220, 7.245-8, 7.259. 7.267; IV: 13.561; 15.742-6; V: 19.221-4

• ;

χαλκότνπος ¥: 19.25-7 Xanaxitan IV: 13.438-41; 15.330-6 XOUCLEWITS IV: 16.234-5 χαριέστεραι εν: 22 χάρις EV: 14.233-41, 14.235-6, 14.267-70; 15.742-6; 17.51-2 χάρμη Ι: 4.222; ΙΙ: 7.217-18; ΙΥ: 13.81-2 χείλος IV: 16.428 xelp I: 1.88-9, 1.351, 1.446; 4.518, 4.523, 4.541~2; II: 5.30, 5.122, 5.336-8, 5.568-9; 6.81-2, 6.233, 6.255-7; 7.122, 7.130; 17: 13.531-3 χέραδος VI: 21.319 χερμάδιον 1: 4.518; 1: 5.302-4; III 11.264-5 XEPVIBOV IV: 14.157-8; VI: 24.304 χεύμα VI: 23.561 χηραμός VI: 21.495 χήρη VI: 22.484 χίμαιρα 🗉: 6.179-83 XITWV I: 3.355-60; II: 5.112-13, 5.734-7; IV: 13.438-41; 16.419-21 xógivos V: 18.468-73 χόλος 1: 4.23, 4.512-13; 11: 6.166-7, 6.326; 8.407-8; IV: 13.516-17; 15.223; 16.28-31, 16.203-6; V: 18.107-10 χορός V: 18.590-2 XPETOS 10: 11.686; 1V: 34

χριώ 23: 9.197-8 χροιή IV: 14.162-5 χρόμαδος VI: 23.688 Xpovos IV: 15.511-12 xpuodopos EV: 14.157-8; 15.254-9 χρυστιλάκατος Ιν: 16.183 χρυσόθρονος IV: 14.153-5 χρώς ER: 10.575; IV: 13.191; 14.162-5 XUTOS VI: 29.256 XWORD VI: 22.291, 23.385 wheas IV: 16.582-3 yiás IV: 16.458-61 ψυχή Ι: 1.3; 🖩: 5.295-6, 5.696; 7.131; IV: 14.517-19; 15.252-3; 16.450-5 ώδε 💵 10.537; 12.346; IV: 13.326-7 ώκύαλος IV: 15.704-6 ώκύμορος ΕΥ: 15.440-1 ώλκα Γν: 13.703-7 ώμογέρων VI: 23.791 ὦπα IV: 15.320-2 Colortos V: 17.79-81, 17.687-9; 19.413-14 ŵs IV: 14.294; V: 19.13-17 ŵș rv: 13.216-18 ພ່າຍໄດ້ກໍ 🛿: 14.517-19 ώτώεις VI: 23.264

۰,

This is the sixth and final volume of the major Commentary on Homer's lliad issued under the General Editorship of Professor G. S. Kirk. It consists of introductory chapters dealing with the structure and main themes of the poem, book division, the end of the lliad in relation to the Odyssey, and the criticism and interpretation of the Homeric poems in antiquity. The commentary follows. (The Greek text is not included.) This volume contains a consolidated index of Greek words in all six volumes. This project is the first large-scale commentary in English on the lliad for nearly one hundred years, and takes special account of language, style, thematic structure and narrative technique, as well as of the cultural and social background to the work.

The Commentary is an essential reference work for all students of Greek literature, and archaeologists and historians will also find that it contains matters of relevance to them.

Cover design by James Butler

BP/7/92