- The graph shows a s significant increase on the popularity of television . It has risen from 19% in 1987 to 37% 1997.

- In recent decades the development of communication systems through the internet has revolutionised the way society is organised. It is common for interpersonal communication and daily tasks such as shopping and banking to be done online without any face to face interaction. There is a growing reliance on these networks to access information and services. E-learning is becoming an important part of education in schools and universities. There are a number of significant challenges facing society due to the use of these innovations. Cyber crimes and threats to privacy have been reported to be increasing in frequency. The potential negative effects of developing such communication systems need to be considered when assessing the overall changes that have occurred and the evolution of these technologies in the future.
