Gabriel Prosser (1776–1800), a slave blacksmith from Henrico County, Virginia, became a leader and organizer of an attempted rebellion that sought to end slavery in 1800. Born to enslaved parents in the same year that fellow Virginian Thomas Jefferson wrote the Declaration of Independence, Gabriel grew up on his master Thomas Prosser's rural Brookfield plantation located about six miles outside the state capital of Richmond. Gabriel was the youngest son in a religious slave family and followed his father into a skilled trade, receiving training as a blacksmith. By age 20, Gabriel had become an exceptional slave. He stood well over six feet tall, and thanks to his blacksmithing skills, his ability to read (and perhaps write), and his intelligence and self-confidence, he was becoming a respected figure in the slave community. Gabriel's master had already begun to acknowledge Gabriel's skill and ability by giving him wide latitude to move freely about the surrounding area to hire his labor out.

By the 1790s, Gabriel managed a blacksmith's shop and trained other Prosser slaves in metalworking. Largely free from direct white supervision, he regularly hired out his time in the area around Brookfield and within Richmond city limits. Richmond at that time had become a rapidly urbanizing trading center in which wealthy planters, businessmen, white workers, free blacks, and slaves routinely mingled. Living in such close proximity to the city and often participating in the interracial working-class culture of Richmond, Gabriel became familiar with American revolutionary rhetoric and impassioned politics, the slave revolution in Saint Domingue, and the Quasi-War with France. Also influenced by egalitarian Christian millennialism, Gabriel came to abhor the inequality of Virginia society and to detest slavery and white slaveholders in particular.

His growing anger with white privilege burst into public view in September 1799. Former Brookfield overseer Absalom Johnson caught Gabriel, his brother Solomon, and slave Jupiter stealing a pig from the farm Johnson rented in Henrico County. Confronted by Johnson, Gabriel attacked him, biting off a portion of Johnson's ear. All three slaves were arrested. On October 7, Gabriel was found guilty of maiming and was sentenced to 39 lashes at the public whipping post and a branding of his left thumb. This brush with the law of slavery did not crush Gabriel's desire to fight slavery and white privilege.

Sometime in the spring of 1800, Gabriel and other skilled and literate slaves in Richmond City and Henrico County (including his brother Solomon) began to plan the violent overthrow of white slaveholders. They were informed by overheated campaigning in the tumultuous election of 1800 and by news of successful black liberation on Hispaniola. These skilled slaves used their unsupervised time in Richmond to scout the locations of armories. The conspirators sought recruits at Sunday slave gatherings, including religious services, funerals, and afternoon picnics. They sought to harness the energies of evangelical Christian slaves in the rural countryside, but to serve a secular egalitarian revolution. With the movements of skilled slaves hiring their own time, free and slave river-men working local waterways, and weekly gatherings of slaves in the counties surrounding Richmond, the conspiracy grew as the summer progressed. Slaves from as far away as Caroline County, Petersburg, and Norfolk joined the conspiracy.

The rebels spent the summer fashioning swords out of scythes and planning their attack on white slaveholders. All rebels were to meet in Henrico on the evening of Saturday, August 30, 1800. The rebels would split into three columns, one marching on the capitol building and taking Governor Monroe hostage. Others would set fire to Richmond's riverside warehouse district, seize weapons and ammunition, and blockade Mayo's Bridge. The rebels would kill whites in Richmond and demand the end of slavery. Tremendous thunderstorms and flooding on the evening of August 30 washed out bridges and prevented the slaves from gathering, so the attack was postponed until the next day.

By that time, vague rumors of the revolt were circulating among whites, but little attention was paid to them. On that Saturday, however, two Henrico slaves mentioned the plot to Mosby Sheppard, who sent an urgent message to the governor. Monroe ordered patrols for Saturday and Sunday. On Sunday, a white patroller received another warning about the revolt. Monroe was again notified and sent out Henrico magistrates to Thomas Prosser's plantation. Gabriel had disappeared, but they questioned a young slave named Ben, who revealed the details of the plot. Monroe mobilized the militia while magistrates continued with the investigation. At least 70 slaves were tried, and 44 were convicted, 26 were publicly hanged, and the remainder were pardoned or transported out of the United States.

Meanwhile, Gabriel remained at large. On September 14, downriver from Richmond, Gabriel boarded a schooner headed to Norfolk. On September 23, the ship arrived in Norfolk, and two slaves reported Gabriel's presence on the schooner to authorities. The next day, he was arrested and transported to Richmond. Within three weeks, Gabriel had been convicted and sentenced to death. He was publicly hanged on Friday, October 10, bringing to a close what may have been the largest attempted slave revolt on U.S. soil.

Gang System

The gang system was a labor routine used primarily on large plantations producing one crop that called for groups of enslaved people to work together on the same job at the same time. Jobs or chores using the gang system were often driven by the seasonal needs of the crop and the processing required to prepare the crop for market. Almost every plantation used the gang system to some extent, but some used it only for specific chores, whereas others used it as a specific means of organizing the bulk of the plantation labor for crop production. In some regions, depending on the crop type, it was not uncommon for these jobs to be strenuous and dangerous and for the “gang” to be composed mainly of Africans who were purchased for their strength and youth—and worked until they could no longer physically perform the job at hand. Through this system of labor, the enslaved workers could be easily supervised by the overseer, who would ensure that they worked hard and continuously: the slaves could not ease up their pace, take breaks, or take “advantage” of the planter by breaking tools or instituting behavior that might slow down the process of the assigned chore.

In North America, the gang system first took root in the tobacco enterprise of Virginia and the Chesapeake region. Small gangs were cost-effective and easy to supervise; they were often formed with one strong worker in each gang who could set the pace for the entire group of workers. The gang would be expected to work at the tempo and for the duration of that strongest member of the group. The gang system continued to develop as a favored labor system as the United States experienced westward expansion in the 19th century. Gang labor was particularly well suited for the growing cotton production of the inland regions.

In the Caribbean and in South America, the gang system of labor was used extensively on the sugar plantations—the dominant cash crop of the region. The intense work required to cultivate, harvest, and process sugarcane could best be accomplished through the use of closely supervised gangs of Africans who could be worked long, grueling hours as needed. Whether planting, tending, or harvesting the cane, gang labor was available on demand and could be worked almost nonstop until the process was complete. The same was true for the severe and brutal work of processing the cane to produce the raw sugar product: milling and boiling the stalks had to be completed within a specific period of time after the cane was harvested. Strong, young Africans were favored for work on these plantations and usually did not experience a long life expectancy doing this work. The enslaved populations on these plantations were not self-perpetuating, and to keep up with the demand for sugar, the plantations continually relied on the purchase of newly acquired Africans through the slave trade.

Garner, Margaret

Margaret Garner (1833–1858) was an enslaved woman in Kentucky who escaped to the free soil of Ohio with her family in 1856. Surrounded by federal marshals, Garner murdered her two-year-old daughter to prevent her return to slavery. The four-week fugitive slave trial that followed was one of the longest and costliest in American history. It received national attention and galvanized opponents of slavery as a symbol of that system’s evils. Then as now, Garner stood as an iconic image of African American women’s slave resistance.

Margaret Garner was born into slavery on June 4, 1833, at Maplewood, a northern Kentucky plantation owned by the Gaines family. John Pollard Gaines, who became the second territorial governor of Oregon in 1849, purchased Maplewood in 1825. Margaret and her parents were among about a dozen slaves who worked on the Gaines plantation, which focused on hog-raising and was one of the most productive in Boone County. Maplewood’s slaves created a strong community culture among themselves and with slaves who resided at nearby plantations, sustaining familial and other ties with cross-plantation marriages, work, and travel. At age five or six, Margaret went to work in John Pollard Gaines's house, where her duties involved looking after his 11 children.

John Pollard Gaines's positions in the state and national legislatures frequently called him away from Maplewood, and his wife's numerous pregnancies left her too weak to manage the plantation. Various male family members and friends filled this vacuum from time to time, creating a volatile environment that may have encouraged some of Maplewood's slaves, including Margaret's mother Priscilla in 1846, to attempt escape. For Margaret, another change in plantation management precipitated her breaking point. Just before leaving for Oregon, John Pollard Gaines sold Maplewood to his brother Archibald Kinkead Gaines, who owned the Arkansas plantation Gaines Landing with Benjamin Gaines, another brother. Archibald Gaines imposed more stringent discipline on Maplewood's slaves and disrupted their families and community by hiring out their labor. The specter of sale was a constant presence. Around the time of Maplewood's transfer to Archibald Gaines, 16-year-old Margaret married Robert Garner, a 15-year-old slave of James Marshall, and bore her first child, Thomas, in March 1850. Three more children followed: Samuel in 1852, Mary in 1853, and Cilla in 1855. Perhaps fearing that their family would be split apart, Margaret and Robert took advantage of the cold winter of 1856 to make their escape. Margaret was several months pregnant at the time.

At 10 or 11 p.m. on January 27, 1856, Robert stole a sleigh from James Marshall's plantation and drove himself, his parents Simon and Mary, Margaret, and their four children to the Kentucky border city of Covington. There, the party traversed a frozen Ohio River to Cincinnati, where Margaret's free uncle and cousin, Joe and Elijah Kite, had a cabin. Taking shelter in the cabin, the Garners planned to embark on the Underground Railroad, bound for Canada. On the other side of the river, however, Archibald Gaines and James Marshall's son Thomas had discovered the Garner's absence and pursued them to Cincinnati. Under the provisions of the Fugitive Slave Law, passed in 1850, slave owners could reclaim slaves who escaped to free states with the additional aid of federal marshals. At about 10 a.m. on

Engraving of Margaret Garner, a fugitive slave who killed her own daughter rather than see the child returned to slavery, illustrated in Harper's Weekly, 1867. (Library of Congress)

January 28, 11 men circled the Kites' cabin. When they finally forced their way inside, they found that Margaret had cut two-year-old Mary's throat and appeared poised to kill her three other children. The marshals arrested and jailed Margaret and the other Garners.

The Garners' fugitive slave trial began on January 30. Their attorney, Ohio abolitionist John Jolliffe, claimed that the adult Garners were already free by virtue of prior visits to Ohio and that the children born after those visits were also free. The trial lasted four weeks and gripped the national and abolitionist press, with the exception of the Deep South, before Judge John L. Pendery ruled on February 26 that all seven Garners continued to be the property of their respective masters and should be returned to Kentucky. On February 28, the Garners traveled back to Kentucky in shackles.

Before Ohio officials could demand the return of the adult Garners to stand trial for outstanding murder charges, Archibald Gaines sent them and the three children to Gaines Landing in Arkansas on March 7 aboard the steamship Henry Lewis. While en route, another ship hit the Henry Lewis near Troy, Indiana. Margaret Garner either jumped or fell into the Ohio River with baby Cilla, who drowned. The rest of the party continued the journey to Arkansas, arriving at Gaines Landing on March 10, and began working on its cotton crop. Archibald Gaines continued to frustrate Ohio authorities' attempts to try Margaret for murder. At the end of April, Benjamin Gaines relocated the Garners from Arkansas to New Orleans and by 1858 had sold them to Judge DeWitt Clinton Bonham, who owned the 600-acre Willow Grove plantation in Issaquena County, Mississippi. Margaret died of typhoid fever at Willow Grove in the late summer or early fall of 1858.

Several artistic works have commemorated Margaret Garner's struggle to save her children from slavery. During the fugitive slave trial, Margaret was the subject of numerous antislavery poems, sermons, speeches, and public meetings. Both proslavery and abolitionist authors produced novelized accounts of Mary Garner's death, including Abolitionism Unveiled by Henry Field James (1856), Liberty or Death! by Hattia M'Keehan (1859), and Chattanooga by Garner attorney John Jolliffe (1858). In 1867, artist Thomas Satterwhite Noble depicted Margaret Garner's confrontation with federal marshals in his painting The Modern Medea. In the 20th century, Margaret Garner's story inspired Toni Morrison's novel Beloved (1987) and its 1998 film adaptation. Morrison also wrote the libretto for the opera Margaret Garner, which premiered at the Detroit Opera House on May 7, 2005.

Garnet, Henry Highland

Rev. Henry Highland Garnet (1815–1882) was one of the most militant black abolitionists of the antebellum era. Known for his oratory skills and strength of character, Garnet's greatest period of activity and accomplishment was from 1840 to 1865. He continued his activism after 1865, as many other abolitionists did, in fighting for equal rights after the Civil War.

Henry Highland Garnet was born on December 23, 1815, in New Market, Kent County, Maryland. He and his parents were the slaves of Col. William Spencer, as had been his grandfather before him, an African chief of the Mandingo people. In 1824, Henry's family and his extended relatives escaped from Kent County. After reaching Wilmington, Delaware, the runaway party separated; Henry and his family went to New Hope, Bucks County, Pennsylvania, where Henry began school at nine years old. After a few months, in 1825, they moved to New York. It was in New York that Henry's father, George, changed their family name to Garnet, and the name of Henry was given to him.

Garnet was sent in 1826 to the New York African Free School No.1 on Mulberry Street, which was founded by the New York Society for the Manumission of Slaves, where, as 1 of 300, he received an excellent elementary education until 1828. When he was 13, Garnet served as a cabin boy for two voyages to Cuba. After returning from sea, Garnet discovered that his family had narrowly escaped being returned to slavery. His father was almost recaptured by slave hunters, and his sister was arrested and then released based on a fake alibi stating that she was a New York resident when she was said to have been a slave in Maryland. Garnet's mother had been taken in and hidden by neighbors. Everything the family owned had been either stolen or destroyed by the slave hunters, making life even more difficult. Garnet was incensed at the attack on his family, and despite being only about 14 years of age, he went out looking for the slave catchers with a knife, exhibiting a fearlessness and courage that would later inspire others. Eventually, he became indentured to a Captain Epenetus Smith in Smithtown, Long Island, for over two years. Captain Smith's son, Samuel, who was 10 years Garnet's senior, tutored Garnet while he was indentured to Samuel's father. It was at this time Garnet lost the use of his right leg from an injury, whereupon he returned to his family in New York.

In 1831, Henry Garnet entered the new High School for Colored Youth in New York, where he studied the classics and Greek and Latin languages. Encouraged and mentored by Theodore Sedgwick Wright, pastor of the First Colored Presbyterian Church of New York, Garnet soon prepared himself for the ministry. Wright would become his lifelong friend; he baptized Garnet and, in 1841, married him to his wife Julia Williams.

In 1835, Garnet entered Noyes Academy in Canaan, New Hampshire, a new high school formed by abolitionists who vowed to admit African American youth on equal terms with white youth. Garnet, who was 19 at the time, traveled with two classmates, Alexander Crummell and Thomas S. Sydney. Their trip to Canaan, however, foreshadowed the state of race relations in New Hampshire. They were not allowed cabins on the steamboat that took them from New York to Providence, Rhode Island, and when they transferred to the stagecoach that was to take them to Canaan, they were not allowed to ride inside but rather had to ride on top. Garnet, because of his infirmed leg and asthma, suffered greatly from the exposure to the elements, as did his companions Crummell and Sydney, who remained without bed or food despite their stately dress and middle-class appearance. Approximately a month later, Garnet and his fellow black students left Noyes and the state of New Hampshire, with a mob at the outskirts of Canaan making sure that they did. This was the same mob of local white farmers that had torn down and then burned the Noyes Academy school buildings a few weeks earlier.

The following year, Garnet, Crummell, and Sydney entered Oneida Institute in Whitesboro, New York, which was under the leadership of Rev. Beriah Green, a white professor of intellectual and moral philosophy and president of the institution. This was where Garnet was exposed to the moral suasionist views that he used when he returned to New York in 1840 and gave his first speech at the American Anti-Slavery Society. Garnet made an immediate impression, as did his ability to use humor effectively. In that same year, he graduated with honors from the Oneida Institute.

Garnet began his early career teaching youth in the black school district of Troy, New York. While teaching, he also conducted religious meetings at the First Presbyterian Church and was ordained in 1841 as a ruling elder. In 1842, he became licensed to preach by the Presbytery of Troy, and the following year, he was ordained and installed as pastor of the Liberty Street Presbyterian Church of Troy, a position he held until 1848. This church was important to the Underground Railroad in helping slaves escape and was used frequently to hold state and national colored convention meetings.

Garnet had been forced to amputate his injured leg in 1840, but that did not seem to hamper his activism. He was one of the leaders and organizers of the New York and national conventions and was a pioneer of the radical black abolitionist sentiment espoused in the 1840s. For one year, Garnet sustained a weekly publication titled the Clarion, which took up the issue of oppression. He was an advocate of the temperance movement and frequently spoke on it. Additionally, Garnet was at the forefront of politically uniting abolitionism with party politics.

Perhaps Garnet's most famous speech was his "Address to the Slaves of the United States" given at the National Colored Convention held in Buffalo, New York, in 1843. Although Garnet did not specifically call for insurrection, he urged the slaves to fight for their liberty and argued that if they were to die in the effort, that would be better than enslavement. He urged them to remember their forefathers from Africa who certainly would have fought enslavement and the brutal treatment at the hands of slave owners. Garnet told them to remember that they were among 4 million slaves living in the South, so they should not be afraid. Yet if it was to end in a violent confrontation where whites would have as their goal to put everyone to death, the possibility of liberty would be worth it.

The 1843 convention was a high point in Garnet's leadership within the black abolitionist movement. Although he did not specifically champion insurrection, the convention leaders were still uncomfortable advocating that slaves use force. Frederick Douglass morosely predicted that an insurrection of the slaves would end in their death, which would be inappropriate for the convention to sanction. The "Address" was submitted for a vote of ratification at the Buffalo convention and for approval for mass distribution. Garnet's pamphlet was circumvented from publication, however, by one vote, but five years later, it was published along with David Walker's "Appeal" by white abolitionist John Brown at his own expense.

Garnet's most significant contribution was his willingness to try different strategies or renew old ones in order to achieve emancipation and civil rights. By the 1840s, a shift from the ideas of moral suasion to political action was evident. Garnet was one of the first to endorse the Liberty Party, a third-party movement founded in 1840 by abolitionists who were supportive of political action, by giving a noteworthy speech at the Liberty Party Convention. He played a leading role in the efforts to obtain suffrage in New York in the early 1840s. By 1841, Garnet had presented 17 petitions for black suffrage to the New York State legislature, 15 of which came from and were signed exclusively by African Americans.

In 1850, Garnet was invited to lecture for the Free Labor Movement in England, where he lived for over two years with his wife and family. While in Europe, he traveled through Bavaria, Prussia, and France, spending significant time in those countries lecturing on behalf of the antislavery cause. The United Presbyterian Church of Scotland was so impressed by Garnet that they hired him as their first black missionary to work in Sterling Grange Hill, Jamaica, in 1852, but after three years of missionary work, he contracted a fever and was ordered by his doctors to return to the United States.

Back in New York, Garnet began a ministry at the Shiloh Church on Prince Street, where he succeeded his longtime friend Theodore S. Wright. Garnet was able to build an effective ministry, and his church was soon overflowing with patrons. His sermons on various political events, such as the Dred Scott decision, the death of John Brown, and the Emancipation Proclamation, were reprinted at length in the daily press.

The increase in racial hatred that emerged by the middle of the 19th century, expressed through laws, limited economic opportunities, and race riots, impelled Garnet to proclaim the necessity of the doctrine of Black Nationalism, and out of these ideas grew the African Civilization Society in 1858, a biracial organization primarily funded by white philanthropists. Garnet defended its mission to bring Christianity to Africa and argued that through the use of free labor in cotton and sugar production, it would destroy the American plantation system. In 1861, Garnet was president of this society. But the Civil War ended his emigration efforts and his black nationalist perspective.

Upon the outbreak of the Civil War, Garnet called on black men to serve, and upon government authorization, black men enlisted in significant numbers. Garnet signed up as chaplain to the black troops on Rikers Island. He established a hospital on Rikers Island and organized a Ladies Committee for the Aid of Sick Soldiers.

In 1864, Garnet received a call to pastor at the Fifteenth Street Presbyterian Church in Washington, D.C. On the first anniversary of the ratification of the Thirteenth Amendment, Garnet preached to the House of Representatives, the first African American to speak in the halls of Congress. In his speech, Garnet urged Congress to not let slavery be reinstated, but rather remain firmly condemned by law. The power of Garnet's oratory skills left the congressmen emotional and amazed.

During Reconstruction, Garnet was a solid Republican and worked briefly for the Freedmen's Bureau. He pressed the federal government to give greater assistance to the freedmen and to distribute land to blacks for them to begin their lives as free people.

In January 1882, Garnet became the U.S. ambassador to Liberia, which was his last wish. He was not in good health, however, and died in Africa one month later. He was given a state funeral by the Liberian government, and Edward Wilmot Blyden, the founder of West African nationalism, preached at his funeral.

Garrison, William Lloyd

William Lloyd Garrison (1805–1879), among the most important abolitionists in 19th century America, was born in Newburyport, Massachusetts. His early childhood was filled with difficulty. When he was three years old, his father abandoned the family, and by 1814, he had begun a number of apprenticeships, but the one that would have the most importance to his work in his adult years began in 1818, when he started a seven-year stint as an apprentice printer with the Newburyport Herald.

Garrison's first encounter with abolition began in Boston in 1828 when he met Benjamin Lundy, an abolitionist who favored emancipation, but also the colonization of slaves. Meeting with Lundy altered Garrison's life forever. Less than a year after he met Lundy, Garrison began delivering abolitionist speeches and embarked on his abolitionist crusade that would span more than three decades. In his early speeches, he informed his crowd that he favored colonization and gradual emancipation. Those views would soon change.

After learning of Garrison's antislavery speeches, Lundy decided to invite Garrison to Baltimore, Maryland, to aid in the publication of Lundy's abolitionist newspaper, the Genius of Universal Emancipation. Garrison accepted the offer, but when he arrived in Baltimore in the summer of 1829, his views on abolition and colonization were slowly beginning to change. He now believed that the only solution to the slave problem was immediate emancipation and integration. Garrison's language in the Genius of Universal Emancipation was strong as he condemned many who supported slavery. In November 1829, Garrison condemned Francis Todd for his involvement in the slave trade. Several months later, in February 1830, Garrison was indicted in Baltimore for libel against Todd. Garrison had no funds to hire a defense attorney, but a Baltimore lawyer, Charles Mitchell who hailed from Connecticut, decided to take the case pro bono. Despite Mitchell's efforts, Garrison was found guilty and ordered to serve a six-month prison sentence or pay $70 in fines and court costs. Because he had little money, Garrison went to jail. He remained in prison until June 5, 1830, when a sympathetic New York philanthropist, Arthur Tappan, paid the $70 to secure Garrison's release.

Garrison's time in prison hardened his views on slavery. While in jail, he recorded the stories of many of the runaway slaves who were being held in the Baltimore jail. When he was released, Garrison used these slaves' stories as examples of the horrible nature of the institution of slavery. Also in prison, Garrison further educated himself on the evils of slavery. He studied numerous antislavery writings from Great Britain and used the time to compile, in writing, his views on slavery and colonization. His thoughts proved valuable for abolitionist lectures as well as for laying the foundation for his book Thoughts on African Colonization: Or an Impartial Exhibition of the Doctrines, Principles and Purposes of the American Colonization Society, Together with the Resolutions, Addresses and Remonstrances of the Free People of Color, published in June 1832.

Upon being released from prison, Garrison moved to Boston and prepared to launch his own campaign against slavery through the skills he had learned as a child—the press. Even though he understood the importance of the publication of anti-slave literature, he knew that it could not be done successfully without the support of local free blacks. In the latter half of 1830, support among Boston's free blacks grew, and by the end of the year, a committee comprising African American women began a fund-raising campaign to support Garrison's abolitionist newspaper the Liberator. On January 1, 1831, with the assistance of copublisher Isaac Knapp, Garrison published the first volume of the Liberator. Garrison's publication sparked outrage throughout the South, with many fearing that he was trying to incite a slave insurrection—something that in later years he openly condoned. Southerners' fears about the influence of Garrison's Liberator became realized several months after the inaugural issue with Nat Turner's revolt in Virginia. Although Turner started his revolt for numerous reasons, many believed that he was heavily influenced by Garrison's publication. For his seemingly radical views and powerful anti-slave rhetoric, Garrison became a wanted man in many slave states. For example, the Georgia House of Representatives offered a $5,000 reward for Garrison's capture. The city government in Washington, D.C., tried to prevent free blacks from taking copies from the post office, and a grand jury in North Carolina indicted Garrison on charges that he was trying to incite a slave insurrection through publication of his weekly newspaper.

The year following publication of the Liberator, Garrison continued his crusade against slavery when he helped to organize the New England Anti-Slavery Society. In 1833, he played a prominent role in the creation of the American Anti-Slavery Society. Despite Garrison's commitment to the abolition of slavery, his "radical" views and condemnation of the U.S. Constitution alienated him from many abolitionists and eventually caused a permanent rift within the movement. This divide, which occurred at an 1840 anti-slavery convention, ultimately led to the development of two warring factions in the abolitionist movement; Garrison and his followers remained within the American Anti-Slavery Society, and the Tappan brothers led another faction into the American and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society. Garrison's extreme political views also ultimately alienated Frederick Douglass. Whereas Garrison viewed the Constitution as a proslavery document, Douglass, arguably the most important free black leader in the 19th century, viewed the Constitution as an important tool in ending the institution of slavery. By 1851, Garrison's and Douglass's differing views were creating growing tension. Although Garrison admired Douglass for running away from his master, Garrison challenged Douglass's intellectual ability—stating that a former slave could not have as much intelligence as Garrison. The rift between Douglass and Garrison would never be reconciled.

Garrison's sometimes harsh, blunt language alienated many abolitionists but also infuriated many proslavery advocates. Hatred for Garrison sometimes placed the radical abolitionist in harm's way. For example, in Boston in 1835, an anti-abolitionist mob called for Garrison's execution. Although he escaped the mob without any major bodily harm, Garrison apparently did not mind being in danger because he believed that if he were wounded or killed, he would become a martyr in the righteous cause of abolition.

For nearly the next two decades, Garrison watched as slavery tore the nation apart, placing it on a path to civil war. As events in the country intensified and became bloody, beginning with Kansas in the 1850s, Garrison, although a Christian, condoned violence as a means to end slavery. In October 1859, after John Brown's unsuccessful raid on Harpers Ferry, Garrison portrayed Brown as a martyr to the abolitionist movement. In a speech Garrison delivered in Boston on the date of Brown's execution in Charles Town, Virginia, December 2, 1859, Garrison told the onlookers that he was elated to see that after so many decades, people had finally come to realize that the only way to end slavery was through violence. Compromise, for Garrison, was not an option.

After Brown's raid on Harpers Ferry and Abraham Lincoln's victory in the 1860 presidential race, civil war seemed imminent. On April 12, 1861, the American Civil War began with the bombardment of Fort Sumter. When the war broke out, many abolitionists refused to support the war effort because the conflict's purpose was not to end slavery. Again Garrison parted with mainstream abolitionists when he supported the war as a possible way to end slavery.

Despite Garrison's wishes for immediate emancipation, President Lincoln did not believe it to be prudent. Because Lincoln, who openly condemned slavery, refused to immediately emancipate the slaves, he came under Garrison's scrutiny. When Lincoln issued his preliminary Emancipation Proclamation on September 22, 1862, Garrison condemned it because it was not all-encompassing—it freed slaves only in areas in rebellion. Although displeased with the selectivity of the Emancipation Proclamation, Garrison did view it as an important step in the permanent abolition of slavery.

As the Civil War progressed, Garrison watched with joy as African Americans were recruited into the Union Army. Certainly he was overjoyed in May 1863 as he watched the 54th Massachusetts Infantry, the first African American regiment raised in the North, parade through the streets of Boston before it went to South Carolina. During the parade, many in the regiment, including its commander, Col. Robert Gould Shaw, respectfully acknowledged Garrison as they passed him. Despite his differences with many abolitionists, they recognized, by the middle of the Civil War, that Garrison was one of the most important figures in fueling the abolitionist movement.

After the Civil War ended in the spring of 1865, the U.S. government recognized Garrison's important role in the abolition movement and invited him to attend the flag-raising ceremony at Fort Sumter on April 14, 1865. Finally Garrison received praise for his role in energizing the abolitionist movement in the North. When he arrived in Charleston, aboard a U.S. steamer, former slaves greeted him as a hero. On several occasions he was reportedly carried through the streets in triumph. Sadly, the same day that Garrison received the adoration of the newly freed people, President Lincoln was assassinated while attending a play at Ford's Theater in Washington, D.C.

Praise for Garrison after the Civil War did not end with his visit to Charleston. In many places throughout the nation, Garrison became an icon. He was praised by many as being the person ultimately responsible for the emancipation of the slaves. His iconic status led many to suggest that Garrison should occupy the Massachusetts Senate seat left vacant after the death of Sen. Charles Sumner in 1874. Garrison declined. He was further lionized when his image was captured in sculpture and various publications.

With the end of the Civil War, Garrison firmly believed that the work of the American Anti-Slavery Society, which he had helped to organize in 1833, was complete and that the organization should be dissolved. Garrison's proposal to disband the American Anti-Slavery Society was soundly defeated, and Garrison stepped down as the organization's president. On December 29, 1865, Garrison published his last issue of the Liberator and in essence silenced himself as the nation rebuilt, and the future of African Americans was uncertain.

In 1865, Garrison was greatly saddened by the death of President Lincoln. Although not overjoyed with his successor, Andrew Johnson, Garrison decided to support Johnson. After enduring several months of Johnson's increasingly negative attitude toward African Americans, Garrison began to lose confidence in the nation's chief executive and called for his impeachment along with many other Republican leaders. Although he made it clear that he was losing confidence in Johnson, Garrison did not make his position on African American suffrage in the postwar era obvious. Although Garrison believed that African Americans should receive their freedom, he did not necessarily believe that they should automatically be given the right to vote. He firmly believed that countless years in slavery had dulled their intellect and that many newly freed slaves would be unfit to cast their vote. African American suffrage, he supposed, would be something that would come with time.

Many former abolitionists condemned Garrison's views on African American suffrage in the post-Civil War era; however, Garrison cared little and could do nothing to respond because he did not have the luxury of conveying his position in a weekly publication any longer. Health problems also prevented Garrison from taking any active role in Reconstruction. Garrison died on May 24, 1879. News of his death prompted officials in Massachusetts to order flags flown at half-staff. The eulogies at his funeral commemorated his vital role in bringing to the forefront the horrors of slavery and in ending slavery.

Gradual Emancipation

Gradual emancipation was the most common method used to abolish slavery in the Northern states. Although Vermont adopted an immediate emancipation statute, and Massachusetts' courts abolished slavery in 1783 as a matter of interpretation of that state's 1780 constitution, other Northern states did so through gradual emancipation plans.

In most cases, the gradual emancipation acts passed in the Northern states shared similar stipulations; they slowly phased out slavery over a period of time, by setting different dates on which people would be freed according to their date of birth. Although these statutes weakened slavery, they obviously did not abolish the system entirely. All enslaved people who were born before the state designated dates were still resigned to a life of bondage. Even for those born after that date, freedom was postponed because children were still born into a state of indentured servitude. Although they could look forward to eventual emancipation, they were forced to toil much of their productive years under slavery. In New York, for example, the legislature in 1799 adopted a law that stated that any slave born in New York on or after July 4 of that year would become free on attaining age 25 if a woman or 28 if a man. It also prohibited exportation of slaves from New York. Obviously, this measure meant that slavery would not immediately end in New York, and there were still slaves in that state for several more decades.

The Lockean political philosophy of the American Revolution placed special emphasis on property rights, and from the perspective of many white Northerners, gradual emancipation's advantage over immediate abolition lay in the respect it extended to the property rights of the masters. If a state gave the master 25 or 28 years' ownership of his slaves, he might still hope to extract a profit from the relationship, even if not so great a profit as he had contemplated on acquiring the slave in the first place. (In some cases, this doubtless meant selling slaves to purchasers further south, which helps to explain the New York law's ban on such sales.) In addition, proponents of gradual emancipation justified it by saying that the lag time between adoption of the plan and the actual freedom of the slave enabled the master to impart economic skills useful in earning a living; an untrained slave freed to face the world, the theory said, was more likely to sink than to swim.

Besides Northern reformers, some notable Southern political figures proposed gradual emancipation schemes for their states. For example, Prof. St. George Tucker's "American" edition of Sir William Blackstone's Commentaries on the Laws of England (published in 1803), which formed the basis of legal instruction at the University of Virginia and other Southern schools for decades, included an appendix republishing his 1796 gradual emancipation plan. In addition, after the Southampton Rebellion of 1831, the Virginia General Assembly spent several months on a fruitless debate about adopting the gradual emancipation bill first proposed by Thomas Jefferson in 1777.

Gradual emancipation was widely viewed as a “reasonable” alternative both to perpetual acceptance of slavery, which Tucker, Jefferson, and others denigrated, and to immediate abolition—which, as Patrick Henry put it, would have bankrupted every significant man in Virginia (the South). The post-Southampton debate exposed even gradual emancipation’s impracticability in a Virginia society in which whites could not bear the idea of a large population of freedmen among them, and so it sank into oblivion even in the Upper South thereafter.

Radical abolitionists such as William Lloyd Garrison, for their part, disliked the idea for another reason: it did not give the enslaved person immediate freedom. What respect did the property rights of the master deserve, they asked, when the property in question was the stolen labor of the innocent slave? Garrison’s the Liberator rejected any accommodation for slaveholders, including gradual emancipation.

The most significant unadopted gradual emancipation proposal of all was doubtlessly the one made by President Abraham Lincoln in his annual message to Congress in 1862. There, he proposed a constitutional amendment giving compensation to slaveholders in states that would free their slaves by January 1, 1900, either gradually or all at once. Of course, his conceptual amendment was never adopted. See also: Abolition, Slavery; Garrison, William Lloyd; Jefferson, Thomas; Lincoln, Abraham; Northern Slavery

Great Awakening

The “Great Awakening” is a term used to describe an epoch of revivals, evangelical crusades, and reinvigorated piety among American Christians during the mid-18th century. Historians map this phenomenon from Germany to Scotland, from London, England, to New Haven, Connecticut. Uniting these geographically disparate locales was the desire to affirm religious belief over and above the rationalism of the concomitant Enlightenment. Although many contributors to the Awakening were highly educated and committed intellectuals, the overarching theological thrust of this movement was to encourage heartfelt conversion and the acceptance of Christ as personal savior. The chronological position of these awakenings has led many historians to argue for a connection between the populist fervor of the American Revolution and the individuated religious enthusiasm of the revivals. No matter its political consequence, the Great Awakening remains a critical benchmark in religious history, in that it marks the beginning of evangelical dominance within American Protestant churches.

“Great Awakening” was first deployed by Joseph Tracy in 1842 to describe the religious character of the colonies. However, scholars argue that the Great Awakening usefully brackets revivals spanning from the mid-1720s to the late 1770s. Throughout this 50-year period, evidence of renewed Christianity surfaced up and down the eastern seaboard. The roots of this wide-ranging movement can be found in New Jersey and Massachusetts. In northern New Jersey, Dutch Reformed minister Theodorus J. Freylinghuysen decided to exclude parishioners from communion until they could actively testify to their repentance and reliance on the Holy Spirit. Freylinghuysen’s bold reaction to the rote formalism of Christian worship influenced surrounding ministers, including Presbyterian Gilbert Tennent. Tennent was one of four Scots-Irish clergyman sons of William Tennent, founder of “the Log College,” a seminary particularly devoted to the craft of preaching. Now known as Princeton University, the Log College encouraged ministers to preach in such a way as to provoke pious regeneration among their congregants.

The influence of the Log College is difficult to trace. Some historians believe the effects of this Middle Colonies’ enthusiasm can be observed among New England Congregationalists and Baptists during subsequent decades.

Others argue that the revivals in New England were solely the product of one charismatic genius, Jonathan Edwards. Minister of the Congregational church in Northampton, Massachusetts, Edwards forcefully rejected the pervasive Arminianism among his parishioners. Arminian theology emphasized the human ability to obtain God's grace; Edwards countered that justification occurred by faith alone and not by human ability to engender grace. Edwards's sermons on justification by faith alone were vivid, moving, and terrifying, simultaneously impressing his listeners with detailed philosophical proofs and condemning them for their sinful self-indulgence. Aside from his gifts as an orator, Edwards was a keen thinker and writer; his record of the revivals, A Faithful Narrative of the Surprising Work of God (1737), proved very influential at home and abroad. In England, Edwards's writings encouraged John Wesley and George Whitefield to pursue lengthy evangelical tours.

George Whitefield's travels in America came directly on the heels of Edwards's revivals in the Connecticut River Valley. A leading figure in the founding of Methodism, Whitefield arrived from England in 1739 and immediately launched a 14-month tour. During that and subsequent trips, Whitefield argued that man was completely reliant on the mercy of God. Although such a claim was hardly unique within post-Reformation Christianity, Whitefield's presentational tactics were. Whitefield was, in the words of one historian, a "divine dramatist," a clergyman who embraced theatrical tropes to prompt conversion. Whether weeping openly or bellowing about brimstone, Whitefield garnered a groundswell of popular support through his blending of Christianity and entertainment.

Whitefield's style became the headlining feature of the Great Awakening. However, quieter versions of the Awakening occurred outside the tabernacle. Missionaries, inspired by Edwards, Whitefield, and other proponents of the new Christianity, increasingly traveled southward to ply the gospel. Although evangelicalism initially struggled to gain footing in the South, this early missionary work began the conversion pattern that would eventually produce the Bible Belt. Moreover, Christian proselytizing during the mid-17th century produced increasingly independent African American religious activity in the South. The honor for the first continuing black church is usually given to the Silver Bluff Church in Aiken County, South Carolina, where during the mid-1770s, an African American preacher, David George, established a congregation. Although only a minor step in the long struggle for African American denominational independence, George's church emblemizes an era of increasing Christian autonomy and authority.

Across the countryside, Whitefield and others encouraged individual testimonies. Often, women and African Americans would participate, describing their conversion experiences. Conservative and moderate clergy harbored deep distrust for the touring itinerants who fostered such indifference to caste and social position and encouraged emotional bombast at their revivals. Evangelicals countered that these critics were false Christians, lacking any evidence of God's grace. Within churches and denominations, this discord gained momentum. The resultant denominational schism saw the emergence of Congregationalist New Lights alongside Presbyterian New Side as revivalists and advocates for Christian piety, and Congregationalist Old Lights and Presbyterian Old Side as revival critics and proponents of rational faith.

Although there were obvious results of the Great Awakening, including sectarian splits, the notoriety of George Whitefield, and an increased Protestant investment in the conversion experience, many historians continue to dispute both the meaning and the reality of the "Great Awakening." Did the revivals foster revolutionary democracy or theological conservatism? Were there as many revivals as Jonathan Edwards and Joseph Tracy reported? One historian has gone so far as to argue that the "Great Awakening" never existed; it was merely an invention of anxious ministers. Either way, the mid-18th-century revivals continue to foster, as they did in their own time, great debate and staunch opinions.

In fact, the Great Awakening had a profoundly important influence on the debate over slavery in several ways. First, this movement was based on religious revivals that were automatically inclusive; the purpose of a revival was to create an emotionally expressive and powerful conversion to Christianity, and thus, not only did the emotionalism appeal to Africans, but the focus on converting souls—all souls—meant that Africans were included in these gatherings. This alone started to cause more Africans to become interested in Christianity, and particularly after 1740, black people began to join Christian churches in increasingly large numbers. In addition, this form of evangelical Christianity called for people to liberate themselves from sin, and it was not difficult to translate ideas about liberation from sin into notions of personal liberation. Black people, in particular, could clearly see the relationship between spiritual liberation and physical liberation from earthly bondage. Finally, religious revivals created a sense of “spiritual equality” between all the participants, which meant that whites began to view blacks as not just their spiritual equals, but their spiritual brothers and sisters. Of course, this transformation in turn not only caused whites to think of black people as human beings with souls, but also opened the possibility of viewing them as equals. Obviously, this extreme transformation in ideology made it increasingly difficult to imagine holding them in bondage.

As a result, inspired by the Great Awakening, religious converts in the North joined the antislavery movement in an effort to save the soul of the nation. Ultimately, antislavery made its way to the Northern political agenda, at least in part due to the growing awareness that slavery was incompatible with Christianity.

Grimke Sisters

Sarah Moore Grimke (1792–1873) and Angelina Grimke Weld (1805–1879) were pioneering social activists. Abolitionists, writers, educators, and women’s rights activists, the sisters achieved many notable firsts, with Angelina being the first woman both to publicly debate men over abolition and to address a state legislature. Lifelong opponents of slavery and racism, the sisters expended their considerable talents agitating for emancipation and civil rights for enslaved African Americans and, taking valuable lessons from their public abolitionism, spearheaded the later-developing crusades for women’s rights and gender equality.

The sisters were born in Charleston, South Carolina, into a wealthy family with a prestigious lineage in the state. Their father, Judge John Faucheraud Grimke, was a part of the state’s ruling elite. In addition to his seat in the judiciary, Grimke was a major landholder and slave owner with a distinguished military career during the American Revolution. The sisters’ mother, Mary Smith, belonged to another wealthy and prestigious Charleston family whose lineage included two colonial governors.

From an early age, each of the sisters displayed open hostility toward slavery, and each acted against what they considered an unjust system in different ways. At age four, Sarah witnessed a slave being whipped and fled the scene in tears; she was later found down at the harbor begging a ship captain to take her somewhere where such things did not happen. Sarah later rebelled by willfully violating South Carolina’s laws and teaching family slaves to read, using the Bible as her textbook. When she was caught, her father disciplined both her and her waiting maid severely but did not punish the slave corporally. For her part, Angelina witnessed a slave boy, the property of the school mistress, whose back and legs were so freshly whipped that the scabs had only begun to close, and she was horrified by the evident cruelty. Sarah later related that young Angelina fainted at school and that she, concerned, pressed her younger sister as to the cause.

In 1818, Sarah accompanied her dying father north to Philadelphia, where he hoped to receive medical treatment not available in Charleston. Sarah cared for her father during his final months and, remaining in Philadelphia for two months following her father’s death, became acquainted with Quakerism. Returning to Philadelphia in 1821, Sarah became more involved with the Philadelphia meeting, the local Quaker congregation, and was formally accepted as a member in 1823. The relationship between Sarah and the Quaker elders was strained from the outset, however, because Sarah objected to the meeting’s practice of requiring that attendees sit segregated by race. In 1829, when Angelina joined Sarah at the Philadelphia meeting, the sisters jointly began to protest the treatment of African Americans in the meeting in both word and action, by openly questioning the practice during meetings and by choosing to sit with black attendees rather than white. Having left the South in order to get away from slavery, the sisters began to confront the realities of Northern racism in their new home.

The sisters tried to develop professionally but were continually stymied by the norms of Philadelphia society and the rigidity of the group. Sarah, who had chafed against the limits placed on a young woman's education and had been heartbroken when she was forbidden to study law, dedicated much of her time to learning theology, with an eye toward becoming a Quaker minister. Angelina contacted activist Catherine Beecher, seeking to attend her women's seminary and later to become a teacher, but the meeting denied her permission to move to Hartford, Connecticut, in order to pursue this, offering her instead a position teaching in one of their schools. Angelina accepted but chafed at the rebuke, while Sarah found herself continually at odds with the meeting's leadership, who blocked her attempts to advance in the ministry.

Frustrated by the meeting, and the restrictions placed on them because of their gender, the sisters gradually turned more and more of their effort to public abolitionism. They became active members of the Philadelphia branch of the American Anti-Slavery Society (AASS), where Angelina served on the committee for the improvement of people of color. Angelina had been inspired by a lecture given by George Thompson, a British abolitionist whose speaking engagements were controversial in the North and frequently the site of riots. Thompson compared American slavery to biblical slavery, and found that the American model did not match with its biblical counterpart, concluding that despite the claims of Southern clergy, the Bible did not sanction slavery. Thompson further endorsed immediate abolitionism, rather than gradual manumission, beginning with slave children and the elderly, and pushed further for the legalization of slave marriages, the end to the internal slave trade, and a system of apprenticeships established to provide the freed slaves practical training. These were all positions and argumentative styles that Angelina later would incorporate into her writings.

Thompson also directly precipitated the sisters' involvement in the abolitionist movement. In an 1835 issue of the Liberator, William Lloyd Garrison appealed to the residents of Boston to renounce mob violence and to let Thompson lecture unmolested and unthreatened. Angelina, moved by Garrison's support of the man who had strongly influenced her, wrote Garrison a letter in which she forthrightly outlined her own antislavery beliefs, telling Garrison that his cause was holy and that she believed it God's will that emancipation come to the United States. Garrison quickly reprinted the letter in the Liberator, and it was picked up and reprinted in other Northern newspapers, bringing Angelina Grimke to the attention of the abolitionist movement. Later in the year, Angelina's letter was reprinted in several abolitionist pamphlets, distributed in Boston and throughout the North.

Though her letter aroused widespread protest in Philadelphia and exacerbated her tensions with the Philadelphia meeting, Angelina refused to retreat from her position. In 1836, she published a 36-page pamphlet titled Appeal to the Christian Women of the South, which exhorted Southern women to seek actively to overthrow slavery in the South. Angelina sounded many of the themes she had heard from Thompson but drew also upon her direct experience with slavery from her Southern upbringing. This pamphlet, which merged political and biblical arguments, caused such a storm in the sisters' hometown of Charleston that copies were seized at the post office and burned before they could be distributed. The only such pamphlet written by a Southern woman for other Southern women, the Appeal is remarkable both for its lack of ostentation in the writing itself and for its suggestions that Southern women practice selective civil disobedience in willfully ignoring "unjust" laws.

Angelina followed her Appeal to the Christian Women of the South with An Appeal to the Women of the Nominally Free States (1837), in which she urged reform in the North and pressed Northerners particularly on the question of race and racism, linking Northern racism with Southern slavery. Sarah, meanwhile, also published a controversial pamphlet in 1836, her Epistle to the Clergy of the Southern States. Published by the AASS, the Epistle laid out Sarah's argument against slavery and used the Bible to refute the Southern clergy's contentions that slavery was biblically justified; where Angelina exhorted Southern women to take the moral lead in opposing slavery, Sarah directed her attention at the ministers themselves.

In 1837, the sisters accepted an invitation from Elizur Wright, secretary of the AASS, to speak to several women's groups in New York. The speeches (particularly Angelina's) were so successful that the sisters began speaking to larger "mixed" crowds, both men and women, and embarked on a speaking tour of the New England states. The tour lasted nearly six months, during which time the sisters gave approximately 90 lectures in nearly 70 towns, speaking before an estimated total audience in excess of 40,000.

The tour was hardly free of controversy, however. If the South was incensed over the sisters' open attacks on slavery, the sisters' prominent public role upset the North nearly as much. As rare as it was for women to speak in public, it was especially rare for them to address mixed audiences, and much of the public's response to this was negative. The Council of Congregational Ministers of Massachusetts issued a "pastoral letter" forbidding their congregations to open their churches to female speakers. The letter, and many editorials, reiterated the common belief that a woman's proscribed sphere prohibited her from undertaking to lecture men in public and that doing so not only was a violation of her subordinate gender role but was itself "unnatural" and opened the society to ruin and condemnation. Because they spoke openly about matters such as rape and women's bodies, the sisters also found themselves frequently the targets of accusations of lewdness, ungodliness, and mental derangement.

Undaunted, the sisters continued their speaking tour, which culminated with Angelina's appearance before the Massachusetts Legislature on February 21, 1838; this was the first time in American history that a woman addressed a state legislative body. The sisters also responded to the gender-based attacks they had suffered in print. In 1838, Sarah published Letters on the Equality of the Sexes and the Condition of Women, in which she presented an original, biblically driven case for equality between men and women in all areas of life, including the right to speak in public without fear of harassment and addressing unequal educational opportunities and professional limitations imposed on women. The Letters also specifically addressed the travails of female slaves, whom Sarah saw as the ultimate victims of an oppressive, patriarchal society, and joined biblical and political arguments for feminism into arguments for abolition. Angelina, meanwhile, published her Letters to Catherine Beecher, also in 1838, in response to the famous reformer's assertion that the Grimkes had gone too far in their public appearances and that they had acted in ways unbecoming respectable women of their generation. Rebutting Beecher's claim that women should not speak in public, Angelina's Letters went so far as to argue that women should be permitted to study the law and to be elected to legislative positions, in order to influence the writing of law. In seeking to extend the influence of women into the legislature and the legal process itself, Angelina had clearly moved beyond the ideas she had expressed in her 1836 Appeal, which sought to bring women's influence to bear on social custom and practice.

The sisters' long speaking tour and publications did nothing to improve their relationship with the Philadelphia meeting, which repeatedly threatened the sisters with expulsion if they would not recant and retire to private life. The sisters refused to be cowed by threats and chose not to leave the meeting, instead leaving it to the Quaker elders to suffer the embarrassment of expelling them. In 1838, the meeting took advantage of a technicality to expel the sisters. Angelina was expelled when she married Theodore Dwight Weld, the famous abolitionist orator, and Sarah was expelled for attending the wedding.

The strain of the speaking tour and new family life took its toll, and the sisters retired from public life following the wedding, retiring to a farm in New Jersey overlooking the Hudson. Angelina and Theodore had three children, and Sarah lived with their growing family. Their retirement from active public life was not a cessation of activity, however; the three reformers compiled and published American Slavery as It Is in 1839. Drawing on over 2,000 newspaper articles and the sisters' first-person experience with slavery in their home state of South Carolina, the exposé of the horrors of slavery inspired Harriet Beecher Stowe's 1852 novel Uncle Tom's Cabin.

The Grimkes' combination of their particular talents and their personal circumstances made them speakers, writers, and reformers of considerable reach and impact. Their undeniable gift for public speaking, courage, Southern lineage and upbringing, and gender combined to make them controversial, popular, and highly effective lecturers and writers. They were leaders in coupling feminism and abolitionism, and their insistence that reformers should abjure racism and agitate on behalf of the humanity and personhood of the slave put them ahead of most of even the most radical of their contemporaries. Sarah Grimke died on December 23, 1873, and Angelina Grimke Weld died on October 26, 1879.

Haitian Revolution

The Haitian Revolution (1791–1804) began as an outgrowth of the French Revolution and then turned into a slave revolt before ending as a war of independence. One of the three great Atlantic revolutions of its era (with the American War of Independence and the French Revolution), it marked the only successful example of a slave revolt in world history and the creation of the first independent black republic in the world.

The Road to Revolution (1789–1791)

The beginning of the Haitian Revolution is usually set in 1791, but social unrest, itself a result of the colony's internal tensions, had reached a crisis point years before the slaves actually revolted. On the eve of the revolution, Haiti (then known as Saint-Domingue) was by far the most prosperous of France's colonies. It was the largest exporter of sugar and coffee in the world and single-handedly assured a trade surplus in the overall balance of French commerce. All three basic components of Saint-Domingue's society, however, held long-standing grievances against the metropolis.

Whites represented only 5 percent of Saint-Domingue's population, but they stood at the apex of the social and racial pyramid. Most prominent were the slave-owning planters (or grands blancs), who owned most of the lucrative sugar plantations. Despite their privileged status, the grands blancs repeatedly complained about the colonial bond, particularly the lack of self-government and the extensive powers of the Paris-appointed governor and intendant, which they claimed amounted to a “ministerial dictatorship.” They also pointed to the mercantilist trade restrictions (or exclusif) that limited their ability to trade outside of the French empire and to their dependence on merchants from Bordeaux and Nantes. The colonial plebs known as petits blancs held few or no slaves, but they were also turbulent because of their insistence on racial discrimination against free people of color. When the French Revolution broke out in 1789, some grands blancs openly dreamed of independence from France, thinking it would grant them full political autonomy and the freedom to trade with England and the United States. Reflecting the confused situation in the metropolis, whites quarreled with each other ceaselessly, oblivious to the risk their political fractiousness represented in a population made up almost entirely of slaves.

Free people of color, also representing about 5 percent of Saint-Domingue’s population, were equally interested in the political developments in revolutionary France. Though many free people of color were former slaves who had obtained manumission (or the illegitimate children of a white planter and a black slave), they generally avoided calls for slave emancipation. Instead, they aspired to the white planter model, bought plantations (particularly in the south and in the coffee sector), and became slave owners themselves. Their main grievance was the regime of racial discrimination that emerged in the second half of the 18th century, under which they were relegated to secondary legal status despite their economic affluence. With the election of deputies to the Estates General (1788) and the passage of the Declarations of the Rights of Man and of the Citizens (1789), free blacks demanded full equality under the law and the right to appoint deputies to the French National Assembly. When this request was rejected, two free mulattoes, Jean-Baptiste Chavannes and Vincent Ogé, rebelled in 1790. Their revolt proved short-lived, and Chavannes and Ogé were executed in 1791.

Saint-Domingue’s half-million slaves, representing 90 percent of the population, had remained relatively quiescent for much of the colony’s rise (with the exception of the Makandal conspiracy in the 1750s). Some forms of resistance were present, such as infanticide, maroonage, and poisoning, but overall, the slaves seemed more docile than their equivalents in Jamaica and elsewhere. All this changed abruptly in August 1791.

The Slave Uprising (1791–1793)

The slave uprising began in the rich, sugar-producing plain around Cap Français (present-day Cap-Haïtien or Cap) in August 1791. According to an oft-repeated story (based on a 19th-century history by Antoine Dalmas that is not fully reliable), representatives from various plantations gathered in Bois Caïman for a Vodun ceremony during which the houngan (Vaudou priest) Boukman Dutty invoked the lwa (spirit) of war, Ogun, and sacrificed a black pig. All present allegedly drank the animal’s blood, swore to fight the whites, and then dispersed in a storm. The ensuing uprising is better documented. Within a few weeks, the entire plain of Cap went up in flames, and up to 100,000 slaves joined the revolt, though Cap itself was saved.

Because of a dearth of sources, it is somewhat difficult to assess the slaves’ motives for revolting. Some historians view the revolt as an outgrowth of the French Revolution, claiming that the slaves became aware of the ideals of the Enlightenment (particularly the writings of the Abbé Raynal) and fought to obtain liberté and égalité. Others doubt that the largely illiterate slaves were so well informed and point out that many slaves mistakenly believed that the French monarch, Louis XVI, had granted them a three-day weekend. The recent influx of African slaves prior to the revolt has also been cited as a contributing factor (two-thirds of the slave population were African-born in 1791), but long-time Creole slaves often joined in the uprising as well. White contemporaries liked to blame the uprising on the nefarious influence of foreign agents (Spanish or British) or French envoys of the Société des Amis des Noirs (founded in 1788 to combat the slave trade). Yet another conspiracy theory held that Governor Philibert de Blanchelande had engineered the uprising in a misguided attempt to scare the revolutionary authorities in Paris away from their radical agenda.

Because of their lack of trust in the metropolis, the planters initially chose to appeal to Jamaica, Cuba, and the United States for help instead of France. The planters and colonial troops killed the slave rebel Boukman, but the uprising continued under the leadership of Jean-François Papillon and Georges Biassou. They were seconded by a 50-year-old coachman named Toussaint Bréda (later Toussaint Louverture), who may have played a leading role behind the scenes in the early uprising. In December 1791, Louverture offered colonial authorities a negotiated settlement, under which the rebel leaders would have convinced their supporters to return to the plantations in exchange for better working conditions and a handful of manumissions. French agents showed some interest, but they had to back down because of the intransigence of local planters. In 1792, the rebel army announced that it now pursued a goal of general emancipation for all slaves.

In April 1792, the French parliament granted full equality to free people of color, in part to fulfill the idealistic principles of the Declarations of the Rights of Man, but also to obtain their support in putting down the slave revolt. Despite the urgency of the crisis, white planters in Saint-Domingue initially balked at this measure, before finally assenting to it. White–mulatto acrimony remained a constant for the rest of the revolution, but in the short term, mulatto support helped contain the slave revolt.

The Foreign Invasion (1793–1798)

By 1793, the French revolution's radical turn had led to a general European war. England and Spain seized this opportunity to attack Saint-Domingue. English troops seized the main ports in the south and west (including the administrative capital in Port-au-Prince), while Spain invaded the colony's central and northern areas from Spanish Santo Domingo. Many conservative white and mulatto planters collaborated with the English invaders, whose labor views mirrored their own. Many slave rebels, including Jean-François, Biassou, and Louverture, entered the Spanish army. France controlled only parts of the interior and capital.

Simultaneous operations led to the British invasion of Martinique and the temporary occupation of Guadeloupe.

With the French facing a dual foreign invasion, at odds with conservative whites and rebellious slaves, and unable to obtain significant reinforcements from the metropolis because of the naval war with England, the situation quickly became dire for the French envoys in Cap. Making matters worse, a dispute arose between Gen. François Galbaud and the agent Léger-Félicité Sonthonax in which Cap was burned and much of its white population forced into exile in the United States (June 1793). Hoping to convince some black rebels to side with him, Sonthonax issued an emancipation decree in August 1793. The measure contradicted his instructions, but the three delegates he sent to France convinced the French Convention to ratify his decision and extend it to other colonies under French control in February 1794. The sweeping change finally brought France's colonial policy in sync with its revolutionary principles; it also proved militarily sound as black allies helped France reconquer Guadeloupe and hold on to Saint-Domingue.

The most notable convert was Toussaint Louverture, who defected from the Spanish to the French army in May or June 1794, possibly because of the emancipation decree or because of a feud with his superiors (Biassou and Jean-François remained in Spain's employ until their death). Louverture's volte-face brought Saint-Domingue's central regions back into the French fold. When Louverture helped defeat a mulatto uprising led by Jean-Louis Villatte in June 1796, the French governor Etienne Laveaux promoted Louverture to division general and heralded him as the black Spartacus prophesied in Raynal's writings. Louverture's campaign against the British invaders was long inconclusive, but his influence began to rise beyond purely military matters and into the political arena. He arranged for Laveaux and Sonthonax to leave for France and then engineered a "popular" uprising in Fort Dauphin in 1798 that forced a new French agent, Gabriel d'Hédouville, to return to France.

Because of events in Europe, Spain sued for peace in 1795 and withdrew its forces from Saint-Domingue (the 1795 Treaty of Basel also stipulated that Spanish Santo Domingo would be ceded to France, but the Spanish governor Don Joaquín García remained in office because France organized no official transfer of authority). The high cost of the Saint-Domingue expedition, in addition to human losses caused by yellow fever and the military stalemate, convinced England to evacuate its own troops in 1798. After meeting Louverture in Môle St. Nicholas in October 1798, the British negotiator Brig. Gen. Thomas Maitland agreed to withdraw all British forces in exchange for a private promise that Louverture would not attack British Jamaica.

Louverture's Reign (1798–1802)

Hédouville's replacement, Philippe Roume, served as French agent until 1801, but his political authority quickly became nonexistent, and Louverture was the de facto ruler of the colony until February 1802. When in power, Louverture continued his negotiations with Maitland, signing a new convention in May 1799 under which the British acquiesced to Saint-Domingue's commerce (even as they fought France in Europe) against a renewed pledge that Louverture would not attack Jamaica. Louverture complied with the terms of the convention, denouncing in November 1799 an invasion of Jamaica prepared by Roume.

With the onset of the Quasi-War between France and the United State, the U.S. Congress imposed an embargo on all commerce to French colonies in retaliation for French privateering in the Caribbean. The embargo proved devastating for Saint-Domingue, whose economy rested on exports of tropical produce and imports of foodstuffs and weapons. After writing to U.S. president John Adams, Louverture signed an agreement in April 1799 to resume U.S. exports to Saint-Domingue in exchange for a halt to French privateering out of the colony's ports.

Until then, the southern region had remained under the control of the mulatto general André Rigaud, who sharply criticized Louverture for his treasonous dealings with the Anglo-Saxon enemy, his harsh labor practices, and his suspected plans of independence. Louverture levied similar accusations, and a bloody civil war known as the War of the South (or War of the Knives) broke out in June 1799. Louverture had an overwhelming superiority in manpower, but the better-supplied Rigaud organized uprisings in Louverture's rear and almost won in the opening weeks of the war. Louverture's military fortunes later recovered, and with the help of the U.S. Navy, his second-in-command Jean-Jacques Dessalines captured the strategic port of Jacmel and then Rigaud's stronghold of Cayes in July 1800. Rigaud fled into exile, and Louverture, after a wave of repression aimed at Rigaud sympathizers, asserted his authority over all of Saint-Domingue.

In the last months of the War of the South, Louverture forced Roume to issue a decree authorizing him to take over Santo Domingo. But the Spanish governor, urged on by the local population and the French agent in Santo Domingo, François de Kerversau, rejected a first attempt to take over the colony. When Roume subsequently rescinded his order, Louverture had him jailed and easily invaded Santo Domingo in January 1801.

After 10 years of slave revolt, foreign invasion, and civil war, Saint-Domingue enjoyed its first period of sustained peace, and Louverture worked to revive the local economy. His black constituents would have liked to divide the old plantations into small plots dedicated to subsistence farming, but Louverture concluded that land redistribution would result in the ruin of the export-based plantation economy. Instead, he maintained a system (already in place under Sonthonax and Hédouville) that forced former slaves to remain on their plantation as semi-free cultivators who were paid yet unable to seek alternative employment. The policy helped bring about a partial recovery (to about one-third of the most prosperous year on record), but it led to widespread labor abuse and deep resentment against the Louverture regime. In October 1801, a peasant rebellion broke out near Cap, led by Louverture's nephew Moïse.

In parallel to his economic plans, Louverture implemented a constitution that made him governor general for life with the authority to appoint his successor. The constitution was drafted and published without any input from the metropolis, leading many to suspect that Louverture was on a path to independence. Louverture insisted that he had no such intention and sent his director of fortifications, Charles Vincent, to France in July 1801 with a copy of the constitution.

The Leclerc-Rochambeau Expedition (1801–1803)

By the time Vincent reached Paris in October 1801, the First Consul Napoléon Bonaparte had decided to remove Louverture from office. Bonaparte had initially thought that he could employ Louverture and his army in offensive operations against Jamaica, but news of the takeover of Santo Domingo and the abuse inflicted on Roume made him change his mind. Vincent's return, along with the London peace protocols earlier that month, only confirmed Bonaparte's belief that Louverture was a rebellious governor who had to be brought to heel. Bonaparte put his brother-in-law, Gen. Victoire Leclerc, at the head of a 20,000-man expedition that left for Saint-Domingue in December 1801. Many suspected that Bonaparte ultimately intended to restore slavery, but he officially reasserted his commitment to emancipation, and his secret instructions to Leclerc were silent on the issue.

Leclerc landed near Cap in February 1802, and after short, fruitless negotiations, he launched an all-out military campaign against Louverture's army. Cap was burned, but Leclerc captured all the major cities and advanced into the interior. The battle of Ravine-à-Couleuvres and the siege of Crête-à-Pierrot proved costly to Leclerc's army, but many of Louverture's generals defected to the French side, and Louverture agreed to a ceasefire. Under its terms, Louverture was to retire to his plantation at Ennery, but Leclerc soon accused Louverture of planning a new uprising and deported him to France, where he died in captivity in April 1803.

The colony briefly recovered following Louverture's departure, but guerilla warfare resumed in the summer of 1802 because many peasants became convinced that the French intended to restore slavery. News had reached Saint-Domingue that Bonaparte had maintained slavery in Martinique and restored it in Guadeloupe, so a campaign by Leclerc to disarm the population was interpreted as an attempt to prepare the ground for similar measures in Saint-Domingue. Black colonial troops, including Dessalines, initially remained on the French side, but French atrocities convinced most of them to defect in October 1802. By that time, the French army had been decimated by tropical fevers that eventually claimed the life of Leclerc himself.

Leclerc's successor, Donatien de Rochambeau, managed to remain in control of coastal areas in the winter of 1802–1803 because of new reinforcements from France and because Dessalines focused his attention on interne-cine warfare with other rebel bands. Rochambeau is vividly remembered today among Haitians for the extreme cruelty with which he prosecuted the war (including the use of man-hunting dogs). Leclerc has a better reputation, even though he had initiated many of these policies, even announcing his intention to kill the entire black population of the island to obtain a lasting peace.

In June 1803, the resumption of the war with England cut off the influx of reinforcements that kept Rochambeau's expeditionary force alive. Dessalines began capturing isolated French ports one by one, attacking by land while the British Navy blockaded the French by sea. Following the battle of Vertières (November 1803), Rochambeau left Cap with the last remnants of the Leclerc expedition, only to be captured and sent to Jamaica. The French remained in control of Santo Domingo, where they fought off an attempted invasion by Dessalines in 1805, only to be expelled by the Spanish population in 1809 following Bonaparte's invasion of Spain.

Dessalines and his generals declared the colony independent in January 1804, renaming it Haiti after its pre-colonial Taino name. They also massacred most of the remaining white planters the following spring. Other French planters who had left in time were scattered from Cuba to New Orleans, Charleston, Philadelphia, and France itself. All told, the revolution had probably resulted in the death of one-third of Haiti's population. France continued to regard Haiti as a rebellious colony until 1825, when it recognized the country's independence against a monetary indemnity earmarked for the exiled planters.

Hall, Prince

Prince Hall (?–1807) established one of the first African American institutions, the fraternal order known as Prince Hall Masonry, when he formed an African Masonic lodge in Boston during the late 18th century. A prominent Revolutionary-era activist and speaker, Hall's early life remains a mystery to scholars. Compounding the documentary lack is the preponderance of other African American men named Prince Hall listed in the Massachusetts census during his lifetime. From the available information, we can conclude that Hall was the slave of a Boston leather-dresser named William Hall for 21 years. In April 1770, William gave Prince his freedom, leaving him with a valuable skill to trade upon. Shortly after his manumission, Prince Hall opened his own shop, The Golden Fleece, which quickly became a profitable business. Married several times, Hall was also a member in good standing at Andrew Crosswell's Congregational church, firmly ensconcing himself among the free black elite of the city.

Hall believed his economic ascent ought to achieve him certain social advantages. In his first publicly recorded act, Hall petitioned to become a member of Boston's St. John's Lodge of Freemasons but was turned away. At the time, Masonic lodges formed a critical site of middle-class economic organization; Hall's rejection from such an organization, presumably because of his racial status, insulted the upwardly mobile Hall. Not to be dissuaded, Hall and 14 other free black men approached, and gained admission to, a British army lodge of Freemasons. When the regiment withdrew from Boston, Hall and his fellow black Masons were issued a limited permit to meet independently. On July 3, 1775, they formed African Lodge No. 1, the first African American Masonic organization, and Hall was made the master; however, it was not until April 29, 1787, that Hall and his associates received their official charter authorizing African Lodge No. 459.

Throughout the Revolutionary years, Hall actively pursued public protest. In 1777, he petitioned the Massachusetts state legislature demanding abolition; in 1786, he offered 700 black troops to Governor James Bowdoin to quell Shays' Rebellion. Although neither gesture proved immediately effective, both acts demonstrated Hall's increasing authority in the black community. By 1787, Hall proposed that the state legislature allocate money to send Massachusetts blacks back to a settlement on the African coast. When the issue failed to achieve a response, Hall returned to petitioning the state for improved conditions among his fellow black citizens. Although blacks were taxed similarly to white citizens, their children were not included in the public school system. In lieu of a return to Africa, Hall became a tireless advocate for black public education and, more broadly, black social conditions in New England.

Hall's most prominent intellectual legacy has been the survival of two speeches given to his colleagues at the African Lodge. The first "charge," delivered in 1792, used a careful genealogy of ancient imagery to unite his black audience. According to Hall's rendition of history, blacks were meant to triumph; they had been destined by their forefathers, by their unique suffering, and by their particular occupation of the United States. If this first "charge" was bent on unifying black Masons under a common communal narrative, his second "charge," delivered in 1797, focused their purpose. In his 1797 address, Hall pointed to the recent example of Haiti, where a slave revolt had led to the creation of a black nation. Although Hall was careful not to indict all white America, his second charge revealed that he was increasingly disenchanted with his white brothers, particular those white Masons who failed to recognize the African Lodge. Haiti, therefore, became an exemplar of black self-determination, a model Hall encouraged his brethren to remember as they temporarily endured the burden of American inequality.

Hall's speeches to the African Lodge model the sort of independence prescribed by black Masonic culture at the turn from the 18th to the 19th century. As white America continued to exclude free blacks from its economic and social institutions, Masonic societies became critical sites of alternative organization and unification. These groups sought not insurrection, but financial and familial endurance. Following the authorization of African Lodge No. 459, several other black lodges opened in eastern cities, such as Providence, Rhode Island, and Philadelphia, Pennsylvania. During the first half of the 19th century, few free Northern black men failed to join these lodges. The black independent church movement, as well as the eventual "negro conventions," would be largely funded and bureaucratically subsidized by Masons.

Prince Hall died in Boston on December 4, 1807. Within a year of his death, his followers renamed their order the Prince Hall Masons in honor of their courageous founder.

Hamilton, William

The early life of William Hamilton (1773–1836) remains something of mystery; he was even rumored to be the illegitimate son of Alexander Hamilton, secretary of the treasury. Yet despite his obscure early years, Hamilton soon gained training as a carpenter and spent most of his life as an activist. His first public action came when he was still a young man. In 1796, William Hamilton took a stand against racism and joined his brethren in their exodus from the John Street Methodist Church in New York City. Outraged by racial prejudice within the congregation, James Varick, William Hamilton, and Peter Williams Sr. split from the white Methodists and established the African Methodist Church. Through their religious and political action, these men successfully created the first independent black religious institution in New York City.

Beyond his church affiliations, Hamilton also engaged in explicitly political activities. On January 1, 1808, New York's black community held a celebration honoring the official end of the slave trade, and William Hamilton served on the committee of arrangements. Later that year, Hamilton expanded his service to black New York by helping to reorganize the most influential mutual aid association in the city. On June 6, 1808, William Hamilton was a charter member of the African Society for Mutual Relief and was elected as the organization's first president. Throughout his life, Hamilton was passionately committed to black associations and institution building and, in 1809, publicly declared that only autonomous organizations could fortify the community and provide the foundation for unity.

Over the years, William Hamilton also developed a reputation as a powerful orator. For the first anniversary of the abolition of the slave trade in 1809, the African Society selected Hamilton as their keynote speaker for the celebration. He delivered a bold message that ignored moral uplift and championed early notions of Pan-Africanism and Black Nationalism. For Hamilton, identity was the critical issue, and he argued for unity among all African people regardless of their geographic location. He urged his people to view themselves as Africans and encouraged them to embrace the term African because he believed national boundaries should not prevent people of African descent from recognizing their interconnectedness. Reflecting an early Pan-African philosophy, Hamilton sought to unify all African people throughout the Diaspora based on their shared identity and heritage.

In addition to Pan-Africanism, William Hamilton also demonstrated tendencies toward Black Nationalism. Although he clearly supported identification with Africa, he simultaneously called for black unity in the United States. Using the African Society as a model, Hamilton argued that institution building would strengthen the community and provide hope for the future. He commended the African Society for its cohesion, its dedication to moral uplift, and its amelioration of poverty. Without community, Hamilton remarked, life is miserable, and advancement is nearly impossible. By stressing African pride, Hamilton hoped that blacks would use their common identity and heritage as a foundation for collective political action. In 1815, Hamilton gave another public address in which he criticized all those who had participated in, and benefited from, slavery. Hamilton also boldly suggested that blacks (and Africans elsewhere in the Diaspora) could have a solution to their plight, arguing that Africa should be the seat of global political power in the future.

Perhaps the most important year in Hamilton's public career was 1827, a time when he helped create Freedom's Journal, the first black newspaper in the United States, and was also the orator for New York's Emancipation Day celebration. Although Hamilton took a rather controversial position regarding the emancipation festivities, by denouncing the community's public parade, he still graced the pulpit and delivered an address honoring the abolition of slavery in New York State. His speech was a complicated amalgamation of the various ideas circulating in the black community, including African pride, gratitude to benevolent whites, and moral uplift. Hamilton opened by reveling in the meaning of Emancipation Day, a moment that signified the liberation of African people. Hamilton impressed upon the audience that the privileges of freedom and equality were due to all humans, even those who asserted their African ancestry. To Hamilton, therefore, it was possible to be both a child of Africa and an American citizen; in fact, throughout his speech, he repeatedly referred to his audience both as the "sons of Afric" and as "citizens" of the United States. Although Hamilton commenced with a passionate introduction, asserting the rights of Africa's descendants to American citizenship, he clearly understood the political stakes on Emancipation Day. Aware that they were poised at a crucial moment in the battle for public opinion, Hamilton apparently recognized that black civil rights would be granted only if they could demonstrate their worthiness. As a result, the majority of his speech dramatically departed from his oration in 1815, in which he had focused primarily on Pan-Africanism and Black Nationalism. Instead, he sought to redeem the image of his race by humbly offering thanks to their white benefactors and issuing a call for moral improvement.

Between 1827 and 1832, Hamilton was relatively silent until he resurfaced during the colored convention movement. Surprisingly, however, Hamilton had apparently become completely consumed with moral improvement and dramatically reversed his position on emigration. At the 1832 convention, William Hamilton addressed the delegates and attempted to convince them that support of migration to Canada was a serious strategic error. Anti-colonization had become a watchword of the black community in the 1830s and influenced every aspect of their political activism. Later that same year, when the headmaster of the African Free School, Charles Andrews, espoused pro-colonizationist views, William Hamilton led a boycott of the school until Andrews was fired from his position.

Hamilton remained active in the colored convention movement and was a convener of the 1834 meeting, which was held in New York City. In his opening address, he again attacked colonization and the American Colonization Society, as well as the cruel system of racial prejudice that oppressed his people. Ironically, less than a month after his speech, a violent anti-abolition riot swept through the black community in New York City. Years later, Hamilton was remembered for his bravery during the pogrom, when he boldly defended his home and family with weapons. Just two years after the riot, in 1836, William Hamilton died in New York City.

Hammon, Jupiter

Born into slavery, Jupiter Hammon (1711–1806) grew up on the estate of Henry Lloyd near Oyster Bay in New York. Offered an education and allowed to study religion in the Lloyd family library, Hammon expressed a particular interest in the doctrines of the Protestant faith. In his early twenties, he raised enough money to purchase a Bible from his owner and around 1740 became a part-time preacher and a gifted writer. His Evening Thought: Salvation by Christ, with Penitential Cries, a broadside on salvation and piety, was published in 1760, making him the first African American male to be published in North America. The honor of the first African American publication goes to Lucy Terry, whose publication “Bars Fight” preceded Evening Thought by a few years.

Hammon's theology, a mixture of evangelical and moderate Calvinistic Anglicanism, focused on the importance of Christ's work of atonement, the perseverance of the saints, and the importance of the gospel in evangelism. After reading Solomon Stoddard's Safety of Appearing at the Day of Judgment in the Righteousness of Christ, he became convinced of the need for regeneration through a sole reliance on “the merits of Jesus.” Although not as theonomic as Stoddard, who emphasized the importance of the law to instill fear in the hearts of potential converts, Hammon celebrated the persuasiveness of the gospel in spiritual transformation, thus contributing to the history of African American preaching. He emphasized the importance of “holy living” and encouraged fellow African American slaves to work out their salvation in fear and trembling.

When Henry Lloyd died in 1763, Hammon was transferred to Henry's son, Joseph, who became a patriot in the American Revolution but later escaped with his family to Connecticut when the British invaded New York. Unlike many slaves who took the opportunity to run away when the British arrived, Hammon decided to stay with the Lloyd family. During the war, he completed “An Address to Phyllis Wheatley,” a poem that links the imagery of African American heritage with the realities of the Christian faith. A year later, the Connecticut Courant printed his “An Essay on Ten Virgins.”

Two of his most influential works—A Winter Piece (1779) and Address to the Negroes of the State of New York (1787)—combined the ideals of the Revolution with the doctrines of the Protestant religion. His exhortation to live a holy life raised the important issue of black identity in post-Revolutionary America. In A Winter Piece, Hammon called for not only inner moral reform among blacks, but also the need to assert and cultivate African identity within the context of American society—that is, to become a nation within a nation. The Revolution forced blacks to reconcile their African consciousness with an American identity. In this sense, Hammon is an important predecessor of W. E. B. Du Bois, who over a century later sought to resolve the dilemma that divided the souls of black folks: reconciling the duality of “African” and “American.”

His Address to the Negroes dealt with the relationship between earthly and otherworldly emancipation. Recognizing the powerful impact of Revolutionary thinking, Hammon hoped that the rhetoric of the Revolution, especially notions of liberty and equality, would inspire slave owners to reconsider their actions. He nonetheless rested on the power and sovereignty of God, and argued that freedom would manifest only as the result of God's grace. Although encouraging other slaves to seek freedom, Hammon expressed no interest in his own emancipation. Although he believed in the pursuit of freedom, he maintained that spiritual emancipation was infinitely greater than earthly liberty. Although he questioned whether slavery was morally just and in alignment with Christianity, Hammon reminded his listeners to obey their masters in the Lord. Awaiting the ultimate freedom in the next life, Hammon chose to remain in continual servitude. In a number of publications, he acknowledged his faithful service to three generations of Lloyds. Perhaps the reason he chose not to become a freeman was either that it was not offered to him by the Lloyds or because of his old age; in the latter case, he may have considered it better to live out the remainder of his years with the Lloyd family. The Address was printed in New York in 1787. In 1806, the Pennsylvania Society for Promoting the Abolition of Slavery reprinted and distributed more than 500 copies.

The details of Hammon's life, including the exact date of his death, remain a mystery. Much of what he wrote passed through his white supporters. He notes that many of his friends provided editorial assistance for many of his writings, and no one is certain whether, in reality, such assistance meant editorial liberty, yet it is most unlikely that the African Americanisms in Hammon's religious prose were a mere figment of white imagination. Jupiter Hammon should be celebrated as an early architect of African American identity.

Hemings, Sally

Sally Hemings (1773–1835), a slave on the Monticello plantation owned by Thomas Jefferson, had several children who were fathered by Thomas Jefferson. Hemings was born in Albemarle County, Virginia, to Elizabeth (Betty) Hemings and John Wayles. Sally Hemings's grandmother was an African who was impregnated by a white ship captain named Hemings. Her child Elizabeth (Betty) Hemings became a slave of John Wayles, the father of Martha Wayles Jefferson, the wife of Thomas Jefferson. Elizabeth had six children, one of which was Sally Hemings. Elizabeth Hemings and her children were given to Thomas and Martha Jefferson on division of the Wayles estate. Sally Hemings, the half-sister of Martha Wayles, was a slave on the Monticello plantation for most of her life. Many described her as having long straight hair and looking almost white, given that both her father and grandfather were white.

In 1787, Thomas Jefferson asked that an older slave accompany his daughter Mary to Paris so that she could be with him during his time there. Rather than send an older slave, Elizabeth and Francis Eppes, Mary's aunt and uncle, sent Sally, who was only 14 years old at the time. While in Paris, Sally Hemings and Thomas Jefferson are suspected to have begun a sexual relationship that lasted until at least 1808, the birth date of her last child. The older brother of Sally Hemings, James, was already in Paris training to be a chef. In 1788, Jefferson began paying both Hemingses half of servant wages. Hemings and Jefferson made an agreement that he would free her children when they reached 21 years of age, if she returned to the United States with him. Sally Hemings returned from Paris in 1789. James Callender drew attention to the affair between Thomas Jefferson and Sally Hemings by publishing a story in 1802 when he was upset because Thomas Jefferson would not help him with his career.

The Hemings family had been privileged by the Jefferson family. Most of the Jefferson household staff was part of the Hemings family. Sally continued to serve as the personal assistant to Mary Jefferson until Mary married and cleaned and maintained Thomas Jefferson's clothing. Jefferson freed two of Sally Hemings's brothers, James and Robert. He also sold her sister Mary to a white man named Thomas Bell. The two became a couple and resided in Charlottesville, Virginia.

Sally Hemings and Thomas Jefferson allegedly had six children, two of whom died when they were infants. Some say that Sally may have given birth to a seventh child, Thomas, in 1789. Madison, Sally Hemings's son, stated that his mother gave birth shortly after returning from Paris, although Jefferson made no record of this birth as he did with all of the other Hemings children. The first child of Hemings that shows up in Jefferson's records is a child named Harriet. This child was born in 1795 and died in 1797. Hemings's next child, a boy named Beverly, was born in 1798.

Hemings named a second child Harriet upon her birth in 1801. Both Beverly and his sister Harriet left the plantation in 1822. Beverly left first and never returned, nor was she sought after by Jefferson. At age 21, Harriet was given 50 dollars and put on a stagecoach to Philadelphia by a Monticello overseer. Sally Hemings then had an unnamed daughter who died as an infant. The last two children, Madison and Eston, were born in 1805 and 1808, respectively. Upon Jefferson's death, he freed both of these two men as agreed. In his will he wrote that they should be given as apprentices to John Hemings, Sally Hemings's brother, until they turned 21 years old, at which time they should then be freed. Furthermore, Jefferson petitioned the state of Virginia to allow Madison and Eston to remain free citizens in Virginia. Because Madison was already 21, which Jefferson must have known, he would be freed immediately. Eston was 18 years old, but Jefferson's daughter, Martha Randolph, freed him at that time. Sometime after Jefferson's death, Martha Randolph freed Sally Hemings. A census-taker listed Sally, Madison, and Eston as white in 1830.

Sally Hemings lived in Charlottesville, Virginia, until her death in 1835. Beverly and Harriet married whites in Washington, D.C., and Maryland. Madison and Eston moved to Pike County, Ohio. They were both considered black in Ohio and subject to the rules regarding black people in Ohio. Eston Hemings adopted a new name and moved to Madison, Wisconsin, where he and his family adopted a white identity.

House Servants

House servants usually made up the minority of slaves on any given slave plantation. The organization of plantation life necessitated that African Americans must maintain the domestic sphere, which was primarily defined as the home and social world of the slave owner. The house servant was obligated as a slave to perform domestic, social, familial duties within the plantation household. Under slavery, "domestic servants" and "craftsmen" constituted most of the individuals occupying the realm of house servants.

Domestic servants cared for the home of the slave owner; these individuals cooked the meals, washed the clothes, and drove the carriages for the slave owners. They also cared for the infants of the slave owners, ran errands, wove, arranged the dining room, and performed numerous tasks within the domestic sphere. House servants were subjected to the whims and demands of the slave owner and family all day and all night; there were no set rules or order in the daily schedule of a house servant.

Within the complex hierarchical landscape of plantation life, house servants were a sort of privileged class of enslaved African Americans. Both the slave owners and some of the slaves themselves regarded house servants as socially above the status of field hands, in part because house servants sometimes lived in the homes of the slave owners, typically had better clothing and ate better food than their "field" counterparts, and participated more than their field counterparts in the social world of the slave owner. Consequently, some house servants even tried to marry their children between and among each other, duplicating a system of exclusion and prejudice that they themselves were entrapped in.

Men, women, and children were all employed in the capacity of house servitude, but the majority of domestic servants were female because the peculiar institution of slavery ascribed to African American women the role of caretaker while simultaneously consigning African American women to domestic servitude. House servants traveled from plantation to plantation and at times were hired out to different plantations; this mobility expanded the role and duties of a house servant. House servants became ambassadors of social customs, as well as carriers and transmitters of African American cultural reality.

Although all African Americans performed important roles in distinct domains within the institution of slavery, some nontraditional house servants were skilled bondsmen who were excluded both from the domestic sphere of plantation life and from the field. These valued individuals were architects, homebuilders, shoemakers, weavers, and mechanics, and they composed another distinct social and intellectual class within the hierarchy of plantation social life.

House servants were important because they demonstrated the social and intellectual versatility of African American people. Inadvertently, the slave owners allowed African Americans living under the peculiar institution of slavery to demonstrate to themselves that they were intelligent, functional, literate, communicative, and complex beings—all contrary to the portrayal of house servants as interpreted by the slave owners.

Immediatism

Immediatism is the principle or practice of immediate action, often associated with programs for social reform, specifically the international antislavery movements of the 19th century. As it relates to antislavery, immediatism is the demand for direct emancipation of individual slaves, without any preconditions or intermediate stages of obligatory servitude. Immediatism is often defined against the contrary principle of gradualism, which entailed the eventual emancipation of slaves under certain conditions, such as apprenticeship or the eventual removal of freed slaves through foreign colonization.

Reformers who worked to end slavery in the Americas and the Caribbean advocated both gradualism and immediatism to varying degrees throughout the 18th and 19th centuries. Gradualist strategies, most notably the effort to colonize freed slaves outside of the United States, dominated antislavery principles until the 1830s, when a variety of factors tipped the balance toward immediatism. The transition to immediatism was a response to a specific set of conditions within the antislavery movement, but also part of a larger pattern of contemporary intellectual development.

The most significant factor to guide abolitionists toward immediatism was growing opposition to gradualist doctrine and frustration with failed gradualist methods. This sentiment developed throughout the 1820s on both sides of the Atlantic, in England through the publication of an influential pamphlet in 1824 by Elizabeth Heyrick that called for the Immediate, Not Gradual Abolition of slavery and in the United States through the agitations of such black abolitionists as David Walker. These early immediatists assailed colonization and other gradualist methods as compromises with evil, practices that did more to sustain the institution of slavery than weaken it. The African American critique of colonization also noted its racist connotations, namely the assumption that people of African descent did not belong in the United States. Heyrick's impatience with British reformers and politicians who accommodated Caribbean slave owners also reflected the frustrations of a number of American abolitionists who observed similar postures toward the slave interest in their own country.

As for the larger intellectual developments that contributed to the rise of immediatism, the most prominent influence on this process was evangelical Christianity. The growing popularity of religious revivals during the early 19th century instilled many Protestants with a new conception of human nature and sin. Evangelical Christians moved away from longstanding views of sin as a natural and unavoidable part of the world order toward an understanding of sin as voluntary and thereby vulnerable to the strength of human will. Christians were not only capable of avoiding sin, but also responsible for removing sin from the Christian community through evangelical reform. Slavery became a primary target for these reformers. They understood slavery not as an abstract evil inherited from history, but as a sin or crime committed by individuals. This evangelical logic easily translated into principles of immediatism. Just as those who converted to the cause of evangelicalism and repented sin did so immediately, those who rejected the sin of slavery immediately devoted themselves to its abolition.

A major turning point in the American antislavery community’s shift toward immediatism came with William Lloyd Garrison’s rejection of gradualism in 1830. Garrison was an ardent gradualist and active promoter of colonization when African American abolitionists in Philadelphia and Baltimore convinced him that his work had failed to diminish the institution of slavery and exposed him to the doctrine of immediate and unconditional emancipation. In 1831, Garrison published the first issue of the Liberator, a periodical that soon became the nation’s most influential exponent of immediate abolition. Throughout the 1830s, immediatism became central to the American antislavery movement. A number of antislavery organizations, including the American Anti-Slavery Society, sprang up throughout the northern and western states and declared their devotion to principles of immediatism.

Though increasingly popular among members of the transatlantic reform community, the precise meaning of immediatism was still open to interpretation. The call for immediate abolition rarely translated into a demand for the immediate emancipation of all slaves in the Americas. Instead, immediatism took more personal or rhetorical meanings, for example, an immediate commitment to end slavery or immediate recognition and repentance of the sin of slavery. The methods employed by early immediatists also reflected this ambiguity. Antislavery societies pushed for abolition through moral suasion, exerting pressure on slaveholders and those who supported them through a variety of means, including the dispersion of antislavery publications and consumer boycotts of slave-produced goods.

Throughout the 1830s, most immediatists shunned political methods and the compromises that typically came along with them, but by the 1840s, many realized the viability of a political path to abolition. Chartered in 1840, the Liberty Party won over most American abolitionists through the centerpiece of its party platform: the immediate abolition of slavery wherever constitutionally possible. The Liberty Party’s lack of success led political abolitionism into more compromising directions and disheartened many immediatists. The dispute over methods, between moral suasion and political activism, fed into a number of other divisions (including race) to fracture the temporary unity that immediatism brought to the abolitionist community. Nonetheless, immediatism remained an ideological fixture of the American antislavery movement until the ratification of the Thirteenth Amendment in 1865.

Jacobs, Harriet

Harriet Ann Jacobs (1813–1897), also known as “Hatty,” “Linda Brent,” and “Linda Jacobs,” was a slave until 1852, a Civil War and Reconstruction relief worker, an antislavery activist, and the author of the autobiographical Incidents in the Life of a Slave Girl.

Jacobs was born a slave in Edenton, North Carolina, in 1813, the child of Delilah, a slave, and Elijah, a slave and skilled carpenter. Elijah taught Hatty and her brother John to value education. When Hatty was six, her mother died, and it was at this time that Hatty learned of her own status as a slave. Hatty and her brother went to live with Delilah’s mistress, Margaret Horniblow; a period Jacobs later recalled as happy. Miss Margaret taught Harriet sewing (a marketable skill) as well as reading and spelling before it became illegal to teach reading to slaves. Margaret died when Harriet was 12. Margaret had specified in her will that Harriet was to become the slave of her niece, Mary Matilda Norcom, the five-year-old daughter of Dr. James Norcom, who thereby became in effect Harriet’s master.

As a young woman, Harriet fell in love with a freeborn black carpenter who wanted to purchase and marry her, but Dr. Norcom refused permission and threatened to shoot him if he approached her. Norcom wanted her for himself, and she became a target of his sexual harassment. Now 15 years old, she resisted him, and hoping to deter him, she became the mistress of Samuel Tredwell Sawyer, an unmarried man from a family of some wealth and power, by whom she became pregnant. When Mrs. Norcom, fearing a liaison between her husband and Harriet, banned her from the Norcom house, Harriet went to live with her grandmother, Molly. Harriet’s grandmother had been emancipated from slavery in Edenton, whereupon she opened a bakery-teashop there to make a living. Harriet became the mother of two children by Sawyer, who arranged with Molly to support Harriet and their offspring. When Norcom transferred Harriet a few miles away from town to the plantation household of his married son, she went, only to run away. She was 21 years old, and Dr. Norcom’s search for her began.

The year was 1835, and Jacobs began her nearly seven years of concealment in a garret of her grandmother’s house. The garret, a small space above an attached storeroom, was nine feet long and seven feet wide. The highest part of the roof was three feet above the space, and it sloped down to the floor of the garret. A trap door provided access to the storeroom below. Subject to rats running over her bed, stifling summer heat, rain that drenched her through a flimsy roof, and severe winter cold, she sometimes became ill and also crippled from inability to move about in the cramped space. She attempted to recover the use of her limbs by a little movement in the constricted space.

Foremost in Harriet’s plans was the well-being of her children, who were then living in Molly’s house but who were not told of their mother’s presence in the garret. After five years of confinement, Harriet descended in secret to bid farewell to her daughter Louisa, who was about to be sent to New York as a slave to her father’s cousin. Nearly two years later, Harriet descended for the last time, said goodbye to her son Joseph, and fled to New York.

When Jacobs became situated in the Northern states, a minister suggested that she write the story of her seven-year imprisonment. Jacobs’s first priority was to become employed, educate and free Louisa and Joseph, and make a home for her family. Eventually she succeeded.

Jacobs found a job as a baby nurse in the home of Nathaniel Parker Willis, a writer. When his wife Mary died, he took Harriet and his child to England to visit relatives. During her 10-month stay in England, activist Frederick Douglass, who was escaping slave hunters, also fled to England, where he lectured and raised money for the antislavery movement.

Jacobs and her brother John worked as antislavery activists in the Northern United States. John, who had also escaped to the North, gave lectures with Douglass. Meanwhile, the escapees were under threat of capture; the Fugitive Slave Law was passed in 1850. The threat finally ended for Jacobs while she was in the employ of Nathaniel Willis, who had married again; his wife Cornelia purchased the freedom of Harriet and her children.

Jacobs reunited with Louisa and Joseph in the Northern states. She supported herself as a seamstress and as landlady of a boardinghouse. While her son traveled westward with her brother John in search of gold, her daughter sought a position as a teacher.

In Rochester, New York, Jacobs met Amy Post, who was involved with antislavery and women's rights issues. Post was instrumental in convincing Jacobs that she should write a book about the evils of slavery. Jacobs used the pseudonym "Linda Brent" and fictionalized the names of other people in her narrative but stated that her story was true. Edited, reorganized, and promoted by Lydia Maria Child, the book gained other support for publication, and Jacobs traveled to promote it. Jacobs became known as an author and reporter-activist.

During the Civil War, Jacobs worked in Alexandria, Virginia, as a relief worker in the refugee settlement and the hospitals. She and daughter Louisa also worked to support a free school, named the Jacobs School in Harriet's honor, to be administered under black leadership. With Louisa as teacher, it opened in January 1864.

After the war, Harriet and Louisa worked for Reconstruction. In Savannah, Georgia, they worked to enable self-reliance among the freedmen. In the late 1870s, they moved to Washington, D.C., and opened a boardinghouse for whites and later another boardinghouse for the black elite. When the houses closed, the Jacobs women worked in domestic service, and Louisa pursued a teaching position; they were also involved in social activism.

Jay, John

John Jay (1745–1829) served in many positions: he was a lawyer, member of the Provincial Assembly, state legislator, leading New York Whig, main author of New York's 1777 Constitution, chief justice of New York, member and president of Congress, secretary for foreign affairs, minister to Spain, chief negotiator of the Treaty of Paris, coauthor of The Federalist, member of the New York Ratification Convention, first chief justice of the United States, negotiator of Jay's Treaty, coauthor of George Washington's Farewell Address, governor of New York, president of the American Bible Society, and abolitionist.

The Jay family, a prominent merchant family, fled France in the wake of Louis XIV's 1685 Revocation of the Edict of Nantes. Born in New York, New York, on December 12, 1745, John Jay received part of his education in a francophone school in New Rochelle, and resentment of Catholicism would mark him throughout his life. At age 14, young John was sent to King's College (now Columbia University) in New York, where he formed close relationships with several other members of the colonial elite. On graduation, Jay read law under prominent New York lawyer Benjamin Kissam.

John Jay entered into practice in 1768 with Robert R. Livingston, who one day would be chancellor of New York. Jay found law remunerative but uninspiring. It did allow him to widen his circle of contacts, however. That circle was unparalleled after his marriage in 1774 to Sarah Livingston, daughter of future New Jersey governor William Livingston and a member of New York's most socially and politically eminent family.

Jay's marriage came just as the Imperial Crisis of the 1760s and 1770s reached its climactic stage, and Jay was at the forefront of New York's opposition to the Intolerable Acts adopted by Parliament in 1774. He sat in Congress from its inception, and he played a leading role in formulating the colonies' response to British policy. Jay generally hoped for reconciliation with Britain in the First Continental Congress because, as he later noted, Britain had given his family a refuge from Bourbon persecution. Yet Jay also insisted that colonial rights be respected, even if it came to war.

As the struggle commenced, Jay proved a prolific and powerful penman on behalf first of colonial rights and then of independence. His standard rhetorical tropes included reminders of the Old Testament and invocations of the rights of Englishmen. In 1777, Jay returned to New York from his post in Congress to participate in the drafting of New York's first republican constitution. Thanks to his and like-minded delegates' efforts, New York's government featured a better balance among the branches than was adopted by such states as Pennsylvania and Virginia in their first passes at writing constitutions. Jay also retained property requirements for suffrage, which would endure into the 1820s. However, family circumstances forced Jay's departure before the final version's adoption, and Jay lamented that his proposals dealing with elimination of slavery did not form part of the completed document. Slaves in New York would have to wait decades longer for a remedy to their plight.

Although others touted Jay for governor, he believed that he could contribute to New York's new government more substantially by helping to inaugurate its new judiciary, and so Jay became his state's first republican chief justice. In his first charge to a New York grand jury, Jay noted that whatever the beauty of their new constitution's form, it was up to the people of New York to give it life—and virtue.

In 1778, Jay returned to Congress to push New York's position in the Vermont dispute. Like other leading New Yorkers, Jay denied that Vermont should be recognized as a separate state. Soon enough, his fellow congressmen elected him president of Congress, and he remained in that position until deputed to negotiate an alliance with Spain the following year. His mission to Spain proved entirely fruitless because the junior Bourbon monarchy refused substantial commitments, either of men or of money, to the American cause.

Congress next posted Jay to Paris, where his intransigence and hostility to the French were instrumental in wringing a very favorable—Jay would have said providential—peace from Great Britain. By the terms of the 1783 Treaty of Paris, the United States' boundaries were extended from the Appalachians to the Mississippi River, a remarkable increase in the new republic's area.

Jay returned to America to assume the post of secretary for foreign affairs under the Articles of Confederation. Like other federal politicians of the 1780s, Jay's chief experience was of the "imbecility" (James Madison's term) of the country's first federal constitution. He thus became a Federalist, an advocate of a stronger federal union. He also helped to form the New York Manumission Society in 1785, in an effort to force the state to pass a gradual emancipation act. Although Governor George Clinton defeated efforts to make Jay a member of New York's delegation to the 1787 Philadelphia Convention, he joined Alexander Hamilton in leadership of the Empire State's pro-ratification forces. An illness limited Jay's contribution to The Federalist to only five essays, but number 2—on the prospects of the young republic—is among the most eloquent. In the Poughkeepsie Convention, Hamilton and Jay offered a very nationalistic take on the new Constitution, one that would soon be known as "Hamiltonian." Jay's personal diplomacy in the convention was credited with persuading the anti-federalist majority that it could capitulate with grace.

Jay's good friend George Washington went to Jay's house en route to his inauguration as the first president under the federal Constitution, and in the course of consultations there, he offered Jay his choice of offices in the new government. To the general's surprise, Jay opted not for the top office in the cabinet—that of secretary of state—but for the chief justiceship. As in New York a decade earlier, Jay believed that his experience and temperament best fitted him to give firmness to the new judicial branch.

Jay's view of his role as chief justice was that it was to be supportive of the new government—and thus of the executive. Jay joined his colleagues in refusing to give the president formal advisory opinions, but he did operate on behalf of Washington behind closed doors. Finally, he even accepted appointment to head a special diplomatic mission to resolve outstanding difficulties with the British. Jay's Treaty of 1795, the product of a year's negotiation (and thus absence from the capital), made Jay a very controversial figure. It likely cost Jay the succession to the presidency. However, characteristically, Jay put the national interest ahead of his own, and although the treaty touched off a firestorm of opposition from the nascent Republican Party, it has won Jay praise as a practical statesman from recent historians. In compliance with it, the Peace of Paris finally won implementation, and a new war with Britain was averted.

Upon his return from Europe, Jay was met with news of his election as governor of New York. In that office, he signed gradual emancipation legislation in 1799 of the type he had wanted to see included in New York's constitution in 1777. Although Jay did own slaves, he also supported the idea of abolition during and after his public career, and his children would take prominent roles in the cause after him.

The federal elections of 1800 threatened the defeat of Jay's Federalist Party and the elevation of Hamilton's long-time enemy Thomas Jefferson. Hamilton wrote to Jay to suggest that the system for allocating New York's presidential electors be changed by New York's lame-duck legislative majority, but Jay judged such chicanery (which would have mirrored Republican James Madison's manipulation of Virginia's domestic political system) beneath him. When Oliver Ellsworth resigned the chief justiceship, President John Adams offered it to Jay, but Jay refused. After a long public life, he wanted to retire into the presence of his beloved wife.

Jay left office just as Adams did, and his wife died shortly thereafter. He lived a widower for another quarter-century, and he only rarely spoke out on public issues. One matter about which Jay's position was very well known was that of the future of slavery, which he hoped to see disappear. Thus, as he opposed the War of 1812, so Jay also opposed admission to the Union of Missouri with a constitution allowing slavery.

John Jay died on May 17, 1829, at age 83. He deserves to be numbered right after George Washington, Alexander Hamilton, James Madison, and Thomas Jefferson among the ablest and most significant of the founding fathers.

Jefferson, Thomas

Thomas Jefferson (1743–1826) was a politician who was involved in several magnificent scientific and cultural achievements of his time. Most notably, Jefferson was one of the authors of the Declaration of Independence and is viewed as the one of the founding fathers of the United States. Even so, Jefferson's views on African Americans and slavery remained deeply conflicted and troubled throughout his life. Although Jefferson possessed some antislavery leanings, he remained a slaveholder until his death, and he strongly believed in the inherent inferiority of African Americans.

As a young man, Jefferson was instrumental in the movement to end slavery in Northern states and was involved in the effort to end slavery nationally. In 1769, he led a very aggressive but unsuccessful campaign to end slavery in Virginia. Jefferson was successful in getting legislation passed that made it unlawful for any further importation of slaves into Virginia in 1778. Writing in 1781, he expressed his views that slavery should be eliminated in a widely read publication in the colonies titled Notes on the State of Virginia. He attempted to eliminate slavery entirely in the Continental Congress in 1784. He also served as ambassador to France from 1784 to 1789, as secretary of state from 1790 until 1793, and as vice president of the United States from 1797 to 1801.

Jefferson was elected president of the United States and served two consecutive terms from 1801 to 1809. In the election of 1800, Thomas Jefferson and Aaron Burr tied in the number of votes received in the Electoral College. The election was therefore decided in the deadlocked, bitterly divided U.S. House of Representatives, which ultimately handed Jefferson the presidency. Recent scholarship has concluded that the three-fifths clause of the Constitution, which allowed each slave to be counted as three-fifths of a vote, gave Jefferson the presidency. The three-fifths clause allowed slave owners to vote three-fifths of their African American slaves against their will. It was the three-fifths compromise that gave Jefferson enough votes to tie Aaron Burr in the elections and to gain control of the House of Representatives. A dozen or more of the Electoral College votes he received were the result of the clause. These votes were cast by the will of slaveholders, not African Americans. In 1804, he was reelected in a landslide. It is paradoxical that Jefferson, who pushed for legislation and wrote about the great immorality of slavery, would be elected by the vote of slave owners.

Jefferson is criticized by modern historians because throughout his career he wrote on the unethical practice of slavery, and yet he owned slaves himself and never made any effort to free any of them, even after America's independence and when abolition of slavery was no longer unlawful. Modern researchers continue to be puzzled that Jefferson's philosophy of "all men are created equal" was invented by a slave owner. Even more, they note that although Notes on the State of Virginia espoused antislavery thought, it also articulated the belief that there were distinct racial differences between whites and blacks that rendered black people hopelessly inferior. Moreover, Jefferson was a staunch colonizationist who argued that if black people gained freedom, they should be relocated back to Africa in order to prevent race-mixing and racial equality. In fact, Jefferson's views brought him into conflict with black abolitionists such as Benjamin Banneker and David Walker. Banneker, in particular, raised the contradiction between Jefferson's belief in liberty and equality and his status as a slaveholder. Indeed, adding to the complexity of Jefferson is the realization that Jefferson's aristocratic lifestyle could not have existed without the help of slavery. Jefferson benefited from it both economically and politically. Ultimately, he would not have been president without it.

Jefferson's motives have also been challenged in recent years. He was well aware that the opposition raised to slave trafficking did not necessarily mean that the interested parties were opposed to slavery. Some American slave owners saw the abolition of slave trafficking as an opportunity to eliminate competition so that the offspring of their own slaves could be marketed into the regions west of the Mississippi. Thomas Jefferson failed utterly to offer any direct remedies for any type of racial prejudice or injustice, and his writings do contain references to African Americans being in some ways inferior to whites. In addition, he helped to set precedent and engage in the removal of Native Americans from their land.

It is fair to note that Jefferson went up against tremendous opposition to his antislavery stance and continually spoke out against it for his entire life. In the 1820s, Jefferson stated that his quest to bring about an end to slavery was even more difficult than he had imagined. While President, Jefferson stated that he had given up on the abolition of slavery in 1805. Even though Jefferson came to the realization that slavery would not be abolished during his life, he did continue to encourage others to end it. Jefferson's writings have proven to be instrumental in providing foundation for future abolitionists to justify their causes. Leading figures such as John Quincy Adams, Daniel Webster, and Abraham Lincoln all quoted and relied on the philosophies of Jefferson as reasoning to push for emancipation.

After the Louisiana Purchase, Jefferson philosophized that the territory should be filled with small farmers and should be maintained as free territory. Jefferson attempted to include a provision for the abolition of slavery in all newly acquired territories after 1800. Congress defeated Jefferson's proposal for the abolishment of the expansion of slavery into the territories. This vision was never actually realized. In the years after the purchase and even before Jefferson's death, the region saw an influx of more and more slaves. In the process, slavery became more and more ingrained into American society, both politically and economically. Jefferson's personal records show he owned 187 slaves, some of whom were inherited at the death of his wife. To aid in financial hardship, Jefferson had placed a lien against some of his slaves, which made it difficult to free them upon his death. At that time, Jefferson had arranged for some of his slaves to be emancipated. Although not without criticism from modern historians, Edmund Bacon, who had worked for Jefferson at Monticello from 1806 to 1822, stated that he believed that if the situation would have presented itself, then Jefferson would have freed all of them. Much of the public clearly supported slave trafficking; nevertheless, Jefferson continued to vocalize his beliefs. Joining in Jefferson's cause were several prominent founding fathers.

Adding to Jefferson's seemingly paradoxical relationship between his philosophy and actions was his ongoing sexual relationship with one of his African American slaves, Sally Hemings, who was his wife's half-sister. Jefferson fathered one or more of Sally Hemings's children, two of whom he emancipated upon his death.

Jefferson died July 4, 1826.

Jennings, Elizabeth

Elizabeth Jennings (1830?–1901) was born in New York to a prominent black leader, Thomas L. Jennings. There is some controversy surrounding the date of her birth; the U.S. census reports that she was born in 1830, but her death certificate suggests that she was born in 1826. Regardless of her exact birth date, Elizabeth Jennings was born into an activist family. Not only was her father an established member of the black leadership, but her mother (also named Elizabeth) was also a founding member of the New York Ladies Literary Society. Established in September 1834, the organization was created to acquire literary and scientific knowledge. On the association's third anniversary, her mother delivered a moving speech urging women to action. Perhaps inspired by her parents, the junior Elizabeth Jennings ultimately became an activist in her own right. When still a child, Jennings and her siblings (William, Thomas Jr., and Matilda) all received education and went on to have successful careers.

Although Elizabeth Jennings was largely absent from the public sphere as a young girl, she was abruptly launched into fame in a celebrated desegregation case. In the early 1850s, New York City's segregated streetcars had become a symbolic reminder of the black community's second-class citizenship. In the mid-19th century, public transportation in New York City was dominated by a series of streetcar companies that controlled the city's railways. Not surprisingly, they created policies under which African Americans were forced to ride in separate cars marked for their use. These regulations were not only discriminatory and morally offensive, but also inconvenient because the "colored" cars tended to run infrequently. As early as 1850, black leaders, frustrated by unequal treatment, began to lodge complaints against the railway companies. However, it was not until 1854 that the problem of segregated streetcars garnered significant public attention. Elizabeth's father, Thomas Jennings, later credited his daughter with being the first to openly challenge segregated streetcars.

On July 16, 1854, schoolteacher Elizabeth Jennings and her friend Sarah Adams began their regular journey to church. However, on this particular Sunday, Jennings was attacked and abused by a streetcar conductor, an incident that catapulted her into fame and sparked a movement. According to the New York Tribune, Jennings attempted to board a Third Avenue streetcar on her way to church, as she did every week. However, on July 16, she and her companion Sarah Adams were refused entrance. The conductor told her that she must wait for the next car that was intended to accommodate black passengers. Jennings insisted that she did not want to be detained and refused to leave the car. This action, of course, resulted in a conflict with the conductor, who tried to convince Jennings to get onto another car, but she was adamant in her objection. In her response to the conductor, she made simultaneous claims to respectability and her American birthright.

As would be expected, Elizabeth Jennings's strong attitude and bold personality were not well received by the streetcar conductor. In response to her claim to equal rights, the conductor tried to drag Jennings from the car violently. Yet Jennings clung to the window ledge, while the conductor and the driver both pulled her down. All the while, her friend, Sarah Adams, was also being dragged from the car, screaming for them to release Jennings. Apparently, Adams's warnings did little to influence them because they were not satisfied until they had removed her from the car. However, Jennings was not so easily deterred. Refusing to surrender, Jennings jumped back into the car, and the conductor drove to the police. Although it was her right to ride, the police officer ignored Jennings's version of the events and likewise dragged her from the car.

In response to Jennings's encounter, the black community organized a mass meeting during which they heard Jennings's story and resolved to take action. Jennings herself was unable to attend because of her injuries, but she had prepared a statement that was read to the entire assembly. Outraged, the community passed a series of resolutions denouncing the conductor's actions and declaring their intentions to address the situation. Soon, they formed the Legal Rights Association, through which they demanded the rights of black people as citizens and asserted their equal right to transportation on the streetcars. Jennings's father, Thomas, led the Legal Rights Association and vociferously fought on his daughter's behalf. As promised, the black community brought the problem of discrimination to public attention. In 1855, Jennings's case was tried in court, and the jury found in her favor. Jennings's attorney was Chester A. Arthur, who later became the 21st president of the United States. The judge had already concluded that black people had the same right to ride the streetcars as any other citizen and could not be excluded on the basis of race. Therefore, the jury was really left only with the responsibility of assigning damages. Although Elizabeth Jennings sought $500, the jury was divided and awarded her only $225. Regardless, the decision was a crucial victory for the black community; a court of law had determined that they had the same rights to ride public transportation as any other citizen.

Following the resolution of her case, Elizabeth Jennings (as with many black women during the 19th century) withdrew from the public realm. She married Charles Graham sometime in the late 1850s, but tragedy struck her family in 1863. During the vicious Civil War draft riots in New York City, her young son Thomas died, apparently due to convulsions. She and her husband braved the rioters and managed to get her son's body to Greenwood Cemetery in Brooklyn for a proper burial. Her husband died just a few years later, in 1867. Despite her personal tragedies, Elizabeth Jennings Graham remained committed to the African American community. In 1890, she berated the community for not financially supporting T. Thomas Fortune's newspaper, and in 1895, she established a kindergarten in her own home. She remained active until her death in 1901.

Thomas L. Jennings (1791–1859) was born in New York City as a free man. Little is known about Jennings's early life, but by 1821, he was making his living as a tailor. In fact, he became the first black man in the United States to hold a patent after he created an innovative dry cleaning process called "dry scouring." Throughout his life, Jennings used his fame and fortune in support of his race. Jennings was a founder and trustee of the Abyssinian Baptist Church and later gave substantial sums of money to the abolitionist cause. His first public act, however, was in service of the United States. He was still a young man during the War of 1812, but although black men were not initially allowed to fight, Jennings responded to the pleas for assistance in fortifying New York City from British invasion. In fact, Jennings, along with his friend Peter Williams Jr., was among the leaders of the black crew.

Despite Jennings's early efforts to protect the nation, just several years later, he had begun to question the future of the black race in the United States. Following the Haitian Revolution, many black New Yorkers had begun to consider migrating to Haiti. Because Haiti was the first free and independent black nation in the Western Hemisphere, it seemed to offer the goals of equality and citizenship that free blacks sought. By 1818, black activists had developed the Haytian Emigration Society of Coloured People, and Thomas Jennings served on the board of managers. Jennings continued to endorse immigration to Haiti until the late 1820s, when the movement lost support because of Haiti's internal problems. Thereafter, Jennings dedicated himself to various race uplift activities.

In 1827, Jennings served on the organizing committee for New York City's Emancipation Day celebration. This was a powerful moment for black New Yorkers, for according to the stipulations of the state's Gradual Emancipation Act, July 4, 1827, would be the legal end to slavery in New York. As with traditional celebrations in the black community, the organizing committee decided to have an official address with prayers delivered from the various religious orders. Jennings probably did not expect, however, that he would find himself at the center of a community controversy. In planning the commemoration, the committee took a rather unorthodox position, which threatened an important tradition among black New Yorkers. Apparently fearful that whites would oppose a procession, they abandoned the tradition of parading and declared that the black community should abstain from appearing on the streets that day. Concerned about their public image, the group argued that they wanted to show their gratitude for abolition and therefore wanted to prevent racial violence or negative publicity.

Although the organizing committee was carefully crafting a celebration that would serve their race-uplift strategy, the vast majority of black New Yorkers had a different agenda. Wanting to fully celebrate freedom in their distinct cultural and political style, another group formed their own planning commission to organize a separate event. Unconcerned with public perception, this alternative group created a celebration that challenged American society and flaunted their African heritage. Apparently reveling in their cultural legacy, they remained committed to the tradition of parading, a decision that represented not only a cultural connection to Africa, but also a desire to celebrate the power of community. The debate over how to properly commemorate emancipation raged for months, but the community finally agreed to hold separate celebrations.

Later that same year, Jennings became actively involved in the black education movement, which was viewed as a critical aspect of race uplift. On December 27, 1827, a meeting was held between black leaders and the trustees of the African Free School. African Society members Peter Williams Jr. and Thomas L. Jennings were appointed as the chair and secretary, respectively. Recognizing that the African Free School was not reaching as many children as it could, leaders resolved to review conditions in the black community and ascertain why more children were not attending school. One of the solutions they identified was to promote education through the formation of literary societies. Jennings played an active role in establishing the Phoenix Society in 1833, an organization whose purpose was to uplift the black community morally and intellectually. The society also attempted to open two high schools in the following years, but both institutions floundered due to financial problems.

Beyond his work with education, Jennings also became publicly active around the issues of abolition and colonization. Surprisingly, Jennings, who had previously supported Haitian migration, reversed his position and spoke against migration to Canada at the National Colored Convention in 1832. Jennings maintained that advocating emigration could undermine their attempts to gain citizenship in the United States. Jennings apparently believed his role as an activist should be to advocate for black rights in the United States, which would explain his participation in the formation of the New York Anti-Slavery Society in December 1833. Likewise, Jennings also became committed to the suffrage movement and helped organize a meeting in February 1837, where a group of black men drafted a petition arguing for their right to equal suffrage. Although they managed to garner significant support, the petition not only failed to pass the state legislature, but was overwhelmingly defeated, with only 11 affirmative votes. Frustrated by the failure of petitioning, Jennings assisted in the creation of a new organization, the American Reform Board of Disfranchised Commissioners, which used more militant language to demand the immediate extension of citizenship. However, this organization also floundered, and black men in New York did not gain the unrestricted right to vote until the passage of the 15th Amendment in 1870.

During the 1840s, Thomas Jennings was largely silent on political issues. However, in 1854, his daughter, black schoolteacher Elizabeth Jennings, launched him back into the spotlight. Elizabeth Jennings played a critical role in the struggle that eventually culminated in unrestricted access to streetcars. After Jennings was assaulted by a conductor and a police officer, a public meeting was held to address the problem of segregated streetcars in New York City. Thomas Jennings was elected as the president of a new organization, the Legal Rights Association, which was designed to secure equality in public facilities. Even after his daughter won her case, Jennings labored unceasingly to raise public consciousness about the continuing problem of racial discrimination and raise money to fight it. Jennings died on February 11, 1859, in New York City.

Jones, Absalom

Absalom Jones (1746–1818) was a black activist and abolitionist in Philadelphia who helped found the African Episcopal Church. Jones was born enslaved in Sussex County, Delaware, where at an early age he taught himself to read. At 16 years of age, he was taken to Philadelphia and put to work as a clerk and handyman in a retail store. Through arrangement with his owner, Jones was allowed to work additional hours in the evenings and to keep the additional earned wages as his own. By the 1780s, he had earned his freedom, married and bought his wife's freedom, and purchased property in Philadelphia.

As a lay minister and teacher at St. George's Methodist Church in Philadelphia, Jones met and joined forces with another lay minister there, Richard Allen. In their role at St. George's, they ministered to the African Americans attending the established church for whites. Together they formed the Free African Society in 1787. Like other mutual aid societies, the Free African Society was established to provide services to its members not available to even wealthy free people of color through traditional white establishments, such as life insurance and burial provisions, but it also served both secular and sacred purposes through nondenominational prayer meetings and other gatherings. The organization sought to provide services for members as well as to improve the character and social actions of its associates.

Although the Free African Society and the black members of St. George's Methodist Church flourished under

Allen and Jones, increasing racial tensions and incidents led to concerns that the African American members of St. George's would separate from the church's main congregation. In 1792, an official split did occur when the white trustees of St. George's tried to prevent Jones from praying in what they perceived as the "white" section of the church. Grievously insulted, the black congregants left the church as a whole.

With this break in the congregation of St. George's Methodist Church, Absalom Jones began to organize "the African Church." Although a number of the white members of St. George's fought the division—the established black congregants had brought a solid economic base to the church—many white abolitionists supported Jones's efforts to establish an independent church. When Jones began construction on his new facility in 1793, donations from these same abolitionists aided the building fund.

Another divide in the former St. George's congregation took place in 1794 when Absalom Jones and Richard Allen disagreed on the denomination of the new church. Whereas Allen and a few of the black congregants believed the new church should be Methodist and be a truly independent black church, the majority of black congregants sided with Jones, who applied to the Episcopal Church for membership. The African Church was accepted into the white-led Episcopal Diocese of Philadelphia, and the church was named the African Episcopal Church of St. Thomas, with Absalom Jones ordained as deacon. In 1802, Jones was ordained an Episcopal priest, the first Episcopal priest of African descent. Richard Allen went on to establish Bethel African Methodist Episcopal Church (in the Methodist tradition) in Philadelphia and became the first AME bishop.

Absalom Jones, like other African American religious and social leaders in the post-Revolutionary period, continued to strive for the egalitarian principals of the American Revolution, believing that blacks could prevail if they continued to insist on those liberties promised to those who supported the new nation. Jones believed the African Americans had the opportunity to help establish their position in the new society.

As an active abolitionist, Jones petitioned the U.S. Congress—the first African American to do so—in 1797 on behalf of four men who were facing the possibility of being re-enslaved. Having been manumitted in North Carolina, the men went to Philadelphia for fear of being sold back into slavery. In a document full of revolutionary rhetoric, Jones petitioned that slavery violated the spirit of the U.S. Constitution, and as a result, the Congress had the ability to abolish it. Congress refused to accept his petition.

Kansas-Nebraska Act, 1854

Stephen Douglas, U.S. senator from Illinois and Northern Democrat, brokered the Kansas-Nebraska Act for a variety of reasons; principal among them were his desire to see construction of a transcontinental railroad begin, his designs on the presidency, and his naiveté regarding the extreme volatility of the slavery debate. The 1854 Kansas-Nebraska Act was one of the most important events leading to the Civil War. Douglas had successfully managed to navigate the partisan and sectional divides during congressional discussions leading up to passage of the Compromise of 1850. In 1854, this tactic utterly destroyed one political party, splintered another along sectional lines, greatly bolstered the political sway of the so-called slave power of the cotton-producing South, and set the nation on a direct path toward war.

Using popular sovereignty—the ability of western settlers to vote on the issue of slavery—as the solution to partisan and sectional strife, Douglas sponsored the Kansas-Nebraska Bill in January 1854 as part of a larger plan to encourage settlement in the Kansas-Nebraska territory. The most controversial element of this proposal was the repeal of the 1820 Missouri Compromise. Douglas felt that eliminating the compromise line and allowing slavery into territories previously declared free would help populate the region. Of course, this was also part of a larger design. In addition to being a congressman and a former justice on the Illinois Supreme Court, Douglas was a major investor in Chicago real estate. In 1850, he had secured a land grant from the federal government for the Illinois Central Railroad linking Chicago to Mobile, Alabama. The resulting increase in the value of his Chicago real estate netted Douglas a small fortune. The possibility of building a railroad between Chicago and San Francisco promised to produce an enormous increase in his property value. To do so, however, required support from Southern proslavery Democrats seeking to expand slavery into previously prohibited areas. Likewise, if he hoped to receive the Democratic Party nomination for the presidency, Douglas needed strong support from the South. Thus, the successful repeal of the Missouri Compromise promised to satisfy Southern, proslavery constituents.

Douglas offered popular sovereignty as a concession to the South so that his self-interested plan to increase the value of his property could advance undeterred. The Kansas-Nebraska bill would allow settlers in this territory to decide on the issue of slavery by voting. Douglas proved a bit naïve in making this concession. He assumed that the topography and climate in the Great Plains would not be conducive to cash crop cultivation. In turn, he believed that few slave owners would venture into the territory and that more free states than slave states would form from the Kansas-Nebraska territory. He underestimated the will of the pro-expansion slave-owning aristocracy, and by blurring the boundaries between free and slave states, Douglas increased the fears of the “slave power” voiced by Free Soilers and African Americans.

The Kansas-Nebraska Act passed on May 30, 1854. Reactions against it were immediate. Because the congressional vote followed sectional as opposed to partisan lines, the act caused the complete collapse of the Whig Party as its Southern members defected and joined their counterparts in the Democratic Party. Workers throughout the North held rallies to oppose the act. Although they still distanced themselves from radical abolitionism, they did adopt the jargon and symbolism employed by abolitionists. On the eve of congressional elections in 1854, ex-Whigs, antislavery Democrats, Free Soilers, and abolitionists voiced their collective opposition to the slave power through the formation of the Republican Party. As Abraham Lincoln noted in an October 16, 1854, speech, the revolutionary spirit unleashed in 1776 was undermined by the spirit of the Kansas-Nebraska Act—despite its call for popular sovereignty. In this particular case, the right to vote on the issue of slavery was a rationale for slavery, white supremacy, and the continued expansion of the influences of the South’s “slave power.” Lincoln went on to state that whereas the Declaration of Independence declared that all men were created equal, the 1854 act simply reinforced the savage inequities inherent in chattel slavery under the ruse of “self government” in the Kansas-Nebraska territory. In Lincoln’s assessment, liberty lost ground to bondage as a direct result of the 1854 act. Far from being representative of classical liberal doctrine, popular sovereignty, as articulated by Douglas and his allies, was a clear and conscious acquiescence to white supremacy, slavery, and the Southern aristocracy.

Although historians are left to ponder why Douglas offered such a sizable concession to Southern aristocrats, the Kansas-Nebraska Act can be measured as a resounding victory for the “slave power.” This fact was not lost on the scores of slave owners pouring over the Missouri border into Kansas two months before the passage of the 1854 act in order to secure prime land for cash crop cultivation. Nor was it lost on the thousands of Free Soilers who became radicalized to the point that they not only opposed the westward expansions of slavery, but also began to militantly oppose the institution of slavery itself. Moreover, this concession demonstrated to free blacks that no section of the United States, neither the North nor the territories that had previously excluded slavery, could serve as a true haven for liberty. The result of this convergence of forces was guerilla warfare in Kansas, the emergence of militant Free Soilers and abolitionists who favored the use of violence, and an increasingly radicalized agenda among African American leaders and organizations.

Langston, John Mercer

John Mercer Langston (1829–1897), attorney, educator, and diplomat, became one of the most prominent African American educators and reformers of the postbellum era.

Born on a plantation in Louisa County, Virginia, Langston’s father was the white owner, his mother a former slave. When both parents died in 1834, Langston and his brothers inherited part of the estate and moved to Ohio.

Langston attended Oberlin College (1844–1849), excelling in debate and oratory. After graduation, when racial barriers prevented him from attending law school, he returned to Oberlin (1850) for a theology degree (1852) and spent an additional year acquiring instruction in extemporaneous speaking. Meanwhile, he became involved in the Ohio black convention movement and began advocating migration to Canada and the West Indies. His emigrationist philosophy emphasized self-reliance and self-respect, which remained core beliefs long after he had abandoned emigration as a solution to the problems of African Americans.

Langston studied law (1853–1854) under Philemon Bliss of Elyria, Ohio, and became Ohio’s first black attorney (September 1854). Partnering with a white attorney, Langston built a lucrative practice near Oberlin. He married Caroline Wall, daughter of a wealthy white North Carolinian and an African American mother, and became the nation’s first African American elected official when he was elected as clerk of Brownhelm township (spring 1855). He also became secretary of the board of education and school visitor.

After assisting with the Underground Railroad and recruiting African Americans into the Union Army during the Civil War, John Mercer Langston went on to found the first African American law school, serve as U.S. minister to Haiti, and represent Virginia in the U.S. House of Representatives. (Perry-Castaneda Library)

In May 1855, Langston addressed the American Anti-Slavery Society in New York City, galvanizing the audience by delivering a powerful indictment of slavery and American racism. Later in 1855, the family moved to Oberlin, where Langston was elected clerk of Russia township and expanded his law practice. He assisted black Oberlin students with housing and funds and became a member of the village council and board of education. He was building a statewide reputation for eloquence and trial skills.

During the Civil War, Langston recruited volunteers for black regiments in Massachusetts and Ohio. Although Langston, like other wealthy men, hired a substitute for military service, in the spring of 1865, he requested command of a black regiment. The war ended before he received the commission, however. Meanwhile, he continued working for African American social and political equality, heading the National Equal Rights League and speaking about African American suffrage and the Emancipation Proclamation.

After the war, Langston turned to the work of racial justice. He met with President Andrew Johnson (April 1865) and toured the border states, speaking to freedmen and legislators. He was appointed inspector-general of the Freedmen's Bureau (1867) and lectured throughout the South about education for freedmen. Although the work led Langston to anticipate rewards from the Republican Party, he declined appointments as commissioner of the Freedmen's Bureau and minister to Haiti.

In 1869, Langston joined the law department of Howard University, becoming the nation's first black law professor at a black law school. He quickly became dean and began enhancing the department's reputation. During his last two years at Howard, he served as vice president and acting president, for which service the university awarded him an LL.D. Yet in 1875, the racially motivated white board of trustees rebuffed his bid for a permanent appointment as president.

Meanwhile, Langston continued his work on behalf of the freedman. President Grant appointed him to the Freedmen's Savings and Trust (1872) and to the District of Columbia Board of Health, an acknowledgement of his accomplishments at Howard and his efforts in the 1872 Grant campaign. Langston's advocacy of the Republican Party increased in the later 1870s. He was a delegate to the 1876 Republican National Convention and after the election anticipated a high-level appointment—perhaps commissioner of agriculture—because of his work. But there was room for only one high-profile African American, and Frederick Douglass took precedence.

Instead, Langston received the post of minister resident and consul-general to Haiti—which he had rejected earlier. Although he was considered the dean of the Port-au-Prince diplomatic corps for much of his tenure (1877–1885), his record was mixed. He devoted his energy to a succession of private claims against Haiti, most of which Washington classified as groundless disputes without international status. Implementing U.S. policy during years of upheaval in Haiti, he tended to be either too involved or too removed from events. He took a yearly leave of absence regardless of the Haitian political situation, returning to the United States to conduct private business or campaign for Republicans. Some writers credit Langston with diplomatic skill, mastery of local customs, and prestige within Haitian society. Other assessments argue that his actions undermined the sovereignty of the hemisphere's only independent black nation, that his obsession with color hampered his ability to deal with Haitian leaders, that he failed to improve the consular service, and that he misunderstood Haitian culture.

After leaving diplomatic service, Langston became president of Virginia Normal and Collegiate Institute (1885 to December 1887), ultimately resigning because of ongoing conflicts with the college's Board of Visitors. Then, to demonstrate the electoral possibilities open to African Americans, in 1888 he ran for Congress from Virginia's Fourth District. In the convoluted contest, the state Republican chairman opposed and sabotaged Langston's efforts, and Frederick Douglass spoke against Langston. When Langston's opponent was declared the winner, Langston challenged the result in a dispute that dragged on for 18 months. He was finally seated (September 23, 1890), becoming the first African American elected to Congress from Virginia. But Congress adjourned eight days after he was seated, and six weeks from elections. Langston was renominated—despite opposition from the Virginia Republican leadership—but lost the ballot. This time, he chose not to contest the outcome. In 1892, he declined renomination, saying that Republicans would have greater success with a white candidate.

Langston nevertheless continued to believe in the Republican Party as an agent for racial justice. In February 1889, he headed an African American delegation to President-elect Benjamin Harrison. He was a delegate in 1890 to the Virginia Republican state convention and in 1892 to the Republican state and national conventions. He retired in 1894, published his memoirs that year, and died in 1897.

Throughout a multifaceted and productive career, Langston was an unwavering proponent of the Republican Party and a tireless campaigner on its behalf. Although he was mentioned for cabinet-level appointments and a vice presidential nomination, racial barriers proved impenetrable. His themes, on which he spoke regularly, were equality before the law, equal opportunity, political and economic empowerment, education, self-reliance, and self-respect, and his addresses spellbound audiences and pointed to a higher calling and a better future. The complexity of his biography became more evident in the 20th century, as writers criticized his support of the Republican Party even after it had abandoned African Americans; actions that suggested disingenuousness and self-aggrandizement; and ambivalence on matters of color originating in his own mixed-race ancestry. Nevertheless, the predominant assessment in the early 21st century parallels the common view in the 19th: he was one of the nation's most extraordinary African American leaders.

The Liberator

First published on January 1, 1831, by William Lloyd Garrison and copublisher Isaac Knapp, the Liberator became the first publication in the United States dedicated to immediate abolition. Based in Boston, Massachusetts, the four-page newspaper the Liberator explained to its audience—primarily sympathetic whites and free blacks in the North—that slavery ought to be abolished immediately, that colonization ought to be prevented, and that some of the basic rights of citizenship should be extended to African Americans. Furthermore, the Liberator declared that the best way to bring about the end of the institution of slavery was through nonviolence.

William Lloyd Garrison had previous experience in publishing an antislavery newspaper in Baltimore, Maryland, and he understood that without the support of the local free black population where the paper was to be published, the endeavor would be a dismal failure. In Boston, Garrison found a supportive contingent of free blacks who formed a committee and began raising funds for publication of the Liberator. During the first year of publication, it was clear that Garrison's chief supporters would be Boston's free black population—out of approximately 450 subscribers, nearly 400 were African American. The abolitionist paper received support from other free blacks throughout the North as well. For example, James Forten, a leader of the free black community of Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, sent Garrison a check for $54—enough to pay for 27 subscriptions. The timing of the money's arrival, one week after the initial issue was published, could not have been better because many of the items needed to publish the weekly abolitionist paper were purchased on credit.

Although Northern free blacks undoubtedly agreed with much of what Garrison published, they used the paper to their advantage. Northern free black organizations, such as the Adelpic Union Library Association, used advertising space in the Liberator to promote various educational opportunities and abolitionist meetings.

Non-abolitionists in the North viewed Garrison's publication as radical, and it was despised greatly in the South. Southern slave owners feared that if the Liberator found its way into the slaveholding South, it might incite a major slave insurrection. Several months after the initial issue was published, Nat Turner's revolt broke out in Virginia, and many slave owners believed that the abolitionist publication helped to fuel the fires of Turner's rebellion. Fearful of the Liberator's power, slaveholding areas implemented stringent restrictions against Garrison's publication. For example, free blacks and slaves in the nation's capital, Washington, D.C., were forbidden to read the paper. The state of South Carolina forbade anyone to read or have a copy of the Liberator in his or her possession and implemented a $1,500 reward to anyone who turned in a violator of this law. Furthermore, many local courts throughout the South indicted Garrison on charges of disturbing the peace and called for the federal government to stop publication of the Liberator. Southern whites also confronted harsh punishment should they be found with a copy of the abolitionist paper. A white Georgia male, for example, who had subscribed to the Liberator was taken from his home by a mob and brutalized; he was tarred and feathered, set on fire, dunked in a river, and whipped.

Undoubtedly the greatest hatred toward the Liberator came from the South, but some of the more moderate abolitionists in the North also disapproved of Garrison's paper and tried to discourage its publication. Some abolitionists feared that the powerful, antislavery rhetoric in the Liberator might delay the end of slavery because it would cause slave owners to more vigorously resist emancipation. Moreover, abolitionists who favored the colonization of African Americans lambasted Garrison's paper—believing that the only way that abolition could work was if all former slaves and free blacks were sent to another land. Garrison's Liberator further infuriated abolitionists when he attacked specific individuals in the publication. He attacked notable figures including Harriet Beecher Stowe, author of Uncle Tom's Cabin. The Liberator claimed that Stowe's depictions of slaves in her book were extremely racist. Anyone who did not hold the same views on abolition became targets for criticism in Garrison's columns.

Other Northerners attacked the Liberator and called for an indefinite suspension of publication so as to provide harmony between North and South. Many prominent Northerners believed, and justifiably so, that Garrison's powerful antislavery message might eventually cause slaveholding states to leave the Union in order to protect the institution of slavery and the Southern economy

Despite the animosity that many, both Northerners and Southerners, exhibited toward the Liberator, it was an important publication in bringing about the end of slavery. For more than three decades, it brought to the forefront the horrors of slavery and shaped abolitionist thinking. After its long life, Garrison ceased publication of the Liberator on December 29, 1865. With the conclusion of the Civil War and the emancipation of the slaves, Garrison believed that the purpose of the abolitionist movement and the Liberator had been served.

Liberia

Liberia, a present-day country in Western Africa, was the primary destination of African Americans who left the United States during the colonization movement of the early to mid-1800s. Since the founding of the American Republic in 1776, the issue of slavery had plagued the country. During the Revolutionary War, Americans emphasized that all men were created equal. Following the conclusion of the war, the idea of equality for all remained. But while Americans emphasized equality, they simultaneously continued the inequitable practice of slavery. It was during this time that the colonization movement, which promoted the transfer of African Americans back to Africa, became a viable solution for America's contradictory actions.

In December 1816, Rev. Robert S. Finley established a colonization society in the United States. With the support of such prominent individuals as Thomas Jefferson, James Madison, James Monroe, and Henry Clay, Finley established the American Colonization Society (ACS) in January 1817. The ACS sought to relocate former slaves and freed African Americans. The colonization movement was primarily concerned with the transfer of freed blacks. The majority of ACS supporters and members were slave owners themselves. Although they did not wish to abolish slavery, they did wish to relocate freed blacks, whom they deemed dangerous. The freed blacks, especially in the South, were viewed as potential sources of insurrection.

An associate justice of the U.S. Supreme Court, Bushrod Washington, was elected the first president of the ACS. Washington, along with newly elected U.S. president James Monroe, worked to convince the U.S. Congress to support the ACS's colonization program. Congress appropriated $100,000 and helped the ACS secure African territory for the transfer of African Americans.

By 1820, the ACS was ready to send its first voyage of African Americans back to Africa. On January 31, 1820, the Elizabeth sailed from New York Harbor with hundreds of African Americans on board. Six weeks later, the ship landed on the West Coast of Africa. The initial settlement for the African Americans on board was the town of Campellar. After a few months in Campellar, many of the settlers became extremely ill and died. When President Monroe heard of the unhealthy conditions in Campellar, he sent a new expedition to gather the remaining settlers from Campellar and build a permanent settlement. Nautilus left for Africa in January 1823. After picking up the living members of the first ACS voyage, the Nautilus sailed down the West African coast until it came upon Cape Messurado. In December 1823, the settlers arrived in Cape Messurado and demanded that the local leader, King Peter, sell the land to the ACS. At first, King Peter refused, but when the American settlers drew their pistols, he acquiesced. Cape Messurado was conceded to the ACS, and the Americans achieved their dream of a colony for freed African American slaves. This new colony was Liberia.

In June 1847, the people of Liberia—some of whom were former U.S. residents—declared their independence. The ACS, U.S. government, and Liberian people had had conflicting ideas on governance since the founding of the colony. By 1847, the Liberian people were ready to cut their ties with the United States. Liberia became the first democratic republic on the African continent. The country's first elected president was Joseph Jenkins Roberts—a former Virginian who had immigrated to Liberia in 1829.

Although Liberia declared its independence in 1847, the United States did not recognize it until after the Civil War.

Once Liberia was founded, the ACS had to work to continue the flow of African Americans from the United States to Liberia. The movement was initially slow to gain popularity among African Americans; however, interest rose significantly following the Nat Turner slave rebellion in 1831 and the conclusion of the Mexican War in 1848. The Civil War in the United States brought the conclusion of the colonization movement. When the Civil War ended, slavery was abolished, and African Americans were granted equality under the 13th, 14th, and 15th amendments. Consequently, a colonization movement was no longer deemed necessary. Although minor colonization movements, such as that of Marcus Garvey, occurred in the 20th century, the movement came to a relative end with the conclusion of the Civil War.

Liberia continued as a democratic republic, even after the colonization movement came to a close. Relations between the indigenous Liberians and those who immigrated to the colony from the United States, however, were not democratic. The Americo-Liberians—those who emigrated from the United States—formed an elite class in Liberia, and the indigenous people suffered some of the same inequalities in their homeland that the Americo-Liberians had suffered in the United States. A two-tiered social structure continued in Liberia until 1980, when a military coup, led by Samuel K. Doe—a native Liberian—assassinated President William Tolbert and overthrew the Liberian government that had held power since independence in 1847. See also: Abolition, Slavery; American Colonization Society; Destination, Sierra Leone

Liberty Party

The Liberty Party, founded in 1840, was the first American political party solely devoted to the abolition of slavery. Moral suasion, which sought to appeal to the conscience of individual slaveholders in order to induce them to emancipate their slaves, had dominated 1830s antislavery activism. By the end of the decade, however, it had become clear that this tactic had made little positive impact, leading many abolitionists to envision a different approach to the slavery problem. Although the Liberty Party failed to elect any national officers in 1840 or 1844, the appearance of a national antislavery party forced the Whigs and Democrats to take a stand on the slavery issue and laid the groundwork for the rise of the Republican Party in the 1850s.

The move into politics was a contentious issue for abolitionists, leading to a schism in the American Anti-Slavery Society at its 1840 annual meeting. The wing of the abolitionist movement led by Boston editor William Lloyd Garrison resisted political involvement, fearing that it would corrupt the ideals of the antislavery movement and force compromise on important principles. Supporters of the Liberty Party, led by New York merchant Lewis Tappan, argued that the antislavery movement must move into the political sphere to achieve its goals. Most leaders of the Liberty Party did not believe that the federal government had the power to eradicate the institution of slavery where it already existed. An antislavery government could, however, abolish slavery in Washington, D.C., and prevent its expansion into new territories, thereby hastening its end.

After leaving the American Anti-Slavery Society, Liberty Party supporters nominated James G. Birney for president in 1840 and called on committed evangelicals and antislavery advocates to shun the established parties, the Whigs and the Democrats, who were viewed as too soft on the slavery issue. In the aftermath of the depression of 1837, the Liberty Party was perceived as a poorly funded third party that took no stand on economic issues and had little chance of winning; they managed to secure only 7,000 votes. In 1844, Birney's second candidacy under the auspices of the Liberty Party fared little better. The party dissolved before the 1848 election and was replaced by the Free Soil Party as the antislavery alternative in American politics.

The legacy of the Liberty Party is mixed. On the one hand, the party forced Northern politicians to address the slavery issue for fear of losing abolitionist votes. By bringing slavery to the center of national politics, it is undeniable that the Liberty Party hastened the end of the institution. However, Garrison's fears of the corruption of principle inevitable in political involvement were partially vindicated. The movement of antislavery to the center of the national political scene was accompanied by a distinct shift in emphasis. Northern politicians increasingly voiced their antislavery appeals in terms of the institution's negative effects on white Northern labor and business, rather than on moral rectitude or slavery's dehumanization of African Americans. Although the Liberty Party dissolved before the culmination of this trend, the effects would become clear in the rhetoric of the Free Soil and Republican parties in later years.

Lincoln, Abraham

Abraham Lincoln (1809–1865) was the 16th president of the United States, serving from March 1861 until his assassination in April 1865. Shortly after Lincoln's election, the southern states seceded from the United States, primarily due to conflict over the issue of slavery, and the country disintegrated into two separate entities—the Union (the North) and the Confederacy (the South). The resulting effort to bring the South back into the Union is known as the Civil War, the bloodiest war in American history. During this sectional crisis, Lincoln was faced with the daunting task of guiding the Union through war and reuniting the United States. Most notably, however, Lincoln was also forced to grapple with the issues of slavery, emancipation, and the future of African Americans in the United States. Although Lincoln is commonly known as the “Great Emancipator” because he signed the Emancipation Proclamation, his true legacy regarding African Americans is highly complex and hotly contested.

Lincoln was born February 12, 1809, in Hardin County, Kentucky, which was then considered the frontier of American settlement. In 1816, Lincoln's parents moved to Spencer County, Indiana, a move that Lincoln recalled was partly because of his parents' opposition to slavery and partly due to a property dispute. In 1830, the Lincoln family moved just outside Decatur, Illinois. Shortly after moving to Illinois, Lincoln was employed by a local businessman to transport goods by raft down the Mississippi River to the port at New Orleans. It is possible that Lincoln witnessed the horrors of slave trading and the abuse of enslaved African Americans during his travels.

Lincoln unsuccessfully campaigned for the Illinois state legislature in 1832 when he was 23 years old. Meanwhile, he attempted several business ventures and other endeavors unsuccessfully, until he discovered William Blackstone's Commentaries on the Laws of England. Lincoln studied law on his own, partnered in the practice of law with Stephen T. Logan, and became one of the most prominent attorneys in Illinois. In 1834, he won a seat in the Illinois House of Representatives, where he served four consecutive terms.

In 1837, Lincoln publicly spoke out against slavery for the first time. While speaking in front of the legislature, he attacked slavery on the basis of immorality. During his time in the Illinois state government, Lincoln fought to persuade fellow congressmen to ban slavery and prevent it from spreading. Yet his relationship to slavery and slaveholders remained deeply conflicted. In 1840, Lincoln married Mary Todd, the daughter of an influential slaveholding family in Kentucky. More significantly, Lincoln was tremendously influenced by Henry Clay, a powerful Whig politician and Kentucky slaveholder who brokered both the Missouri Compromise and the Compromise of 1850. Although Clay was praised for establishing compromises that preserved the Union, he remained committed to protecting slavery where it already existed. The Missouri Compromise, for example, sought to limit the extension of slavery in the Northern territories, but it allowed for Missouri to be admitted as a slave state. Moreover, the Compromise of 1850 had devastating repercussions for the black population, since one component of that compromise—the Fugitive Slave Act—turned the Northern states into hunting grounds for slave-catchers and denied civil rights to free black people in the courts. Lincoln, however, remained an admirer of Henry Clay and soon became his colleague in the halls of Congress.

In 1846, Lincoln was elected to the U.S. House of Representatives but he only served a two year term. For the next decade, Lincoln focused most of his energies on his legal career. However the passage of the Kansas-Nebraska Act in 1854 catapulted Lincoln back into the political arena. Although the Missouri Compromise of 1820 had placed limits on the spread of slavery into U.S. territories, this act was nullified by the Kansas-Nebraska Act. Outraged by the notion of extending slavery into new territories, Lincoln decided to seek election as the U.S. senator from Illinois. He successfully became the Republican nominee because his political ideologies on slavery were perceived by most within his party as more moderate than most candidates, therefore perhaps making him more electable. Lincoln did, indeed, prove to be a moderate voice within the Republican Party on the issue of slavery.

Soon after receiving the nomination, Lincoln gave a soon-to-be-famous speech in which he said, "A house divided against itself cannot stand." The speech was representative of the fragmentation the country faced over slavery that ultimately led to the Civil War; in Lincoln's view, the United States could no longer remain divided over the issue of slavery and he urged the nation to resolve the issue one way or another. Yet Lincoln stopped short of advocating for total abolition. Instead, he limited his criticism by raising opposition only to the idea of expanding slavery beyond the current slave states. However in 1858, even that notion was considered highly controversial. Lincoln's challenger for the U.S. Senate seat was Stephen A. Douglas, representing the Democratic Party. Douglas believed that because the people were sovereign, each individual state should choose whether it would be a slave or free state. Not surprisingly, the two men sparred over the issue regularly during the election, and their verbal exchanges became known as the Lincoln-Douglas debates of 1858.

The election of 1858 revealed a great deal about Lincoln's ambivalent views toward slavery; he believed that slavery was immoral and that African Americans had undeniable rights and liberties granted to them through the Declaration of Independence and the U.S. Constitution, but he also believed that the federal government did not possess the authority to rescind slavery in states where it already existed. In addition, Lincoln was a staunch colonizationist who believed that the free black population ought to be removed from the United States. It was, perhaps, for these reasons that Lincoln gained tremendous support within the Republican Party. Although Lincoln lost the Senate race, his speeches during the campaign brought him national attention that transformed the presidential race of 1860.

In May 1860, Lincoln was selected as the Republican nominee for president. Again, his opponent was Democrat Stephen A. Douglas; this time, however, the outcome would be much different. Even though Lincoln was considered by most as a political moderate, he won in every Northern state where slavery was not permitted. Lincoln won the election virtually without any support in the slave states of the South, where his name was not present on seven of the ballots. Lincoln won only two counties in the southern United States. Because of Lincoln's opposition to the extension of slavery, many governmental officials declared that they would secede if Lincoln were elected president. Indeed, shortly after Lincoln's election, seven Southern states organized and officially seceded from the United States.

Even worse, in February 1861, in Baltimore, Maryland, an attempt was made to assassinate then President-elect Lincoln. Tensions were so heated at Lincoln's inauguration that a large number of federal marshals were stationed on the ground and on top of buildings in Washington and were ordered to "shoot to kill" anyone who made a move to harm the president. Despite political pressure, Lincoln continued to proclaim his position against the extension of slavery. In his inaugural speech, Lincoln stated his support for the Corwin Amendment to the Constitution. The Corwin Amendment, which had already passed in both the Senate and the House, essentially protected slavery where it already existed but prevented the spread of the institution into U.S. territories. However, Lincoln was in complete opposition to the Crittenden Compromise, which allowed slavery to spread. Although there were a few final attempts to preserve the Union, the spring of 1861 sealed the country's fate. In April, shots were fired at Fort Sumter and in the following month, four more states joined the Confederacy, which brought the total number in the Confederate States of America to 11. The United States dissolved into civil war, and Lincoln was placed in the unenviable position of forcing the Confederacy back into the Union.

Since the Civil War was fought primarily over the issue of slavery, it was during this era that Lincoln's views on slavery and African Americans became most important. Soon after the war commenced, radical factions within the Republican Party began pressuring Lincoln to pass an emancipation act. However Lincoln was extremely reluctant to do so. His central concern, of course, was the preservation of the Union, and he was convinced that abolishing slavery would alienate the South permanently. More personally, Lincoln was opposed to the idea of housing a large free black population in the United States. In fact, Lincoln was a supporter of the American Colonization Society, an organization dedicated to forcibly removing free blacks from the country, and proposed the establishment of a black colony where African Americans, once freed, could escape the racism and prejudices of the South. In 1861 and 1862, Lincoln attempted to arrange for African Americans to migrate to Panama and an island in the Caribbean to escape anticipated problems of remaining in the South. In 1862, Lincoln held a conference for African Americans in Washington where he tried to build support for the establishment of such colony. Lincoln continued to support a colonization policy until his death in 1865.

Lincoln was so concerned about the idea of black emancipation that, throughout the war, he refused to allow slaves to be freed even after Union forces prevailed in a particular region. In 1861, John C. Fremont, who was in charge of the Union army in Missouri, issued a proclamation that all slaves in the state were free. Lincoln was fearful that this would lead bordering slave states that were fighting with the North, such as Kansas, Kentucky, and West Virginia, to join the Confederacy. Lincoln modified the proclamation to free only slaves of Confederate soldiers or those who were directly aiding in the fighting. Fremont refused, and Lincoln relieved him of his command. Issues surrounding African Americans during the Civil War came up again in May 1862, when Gen. David Hunter enlisted black soldiers in the occupied district under his control. General Hunter tried to free all slaves owned by Confederates in the states of South Carolina, Georgia, and Florida. Lincoln forced Hunter to relieve all African American Union soldiers from duty and to nullify the attempts made in freeing the slaves in those regions. In so doing, Lincoln reiterated his policy of Union preservation, not the abolition of slavery.

In July 1862, Lincoln finally succumbed to political pressure and allowed black soldiers to enlist in the Union Army. But one month later, on August 22, 1862, Lincoln wrote a letter indicating that his primary objective throughout the entire struggle was to preserve the Union at all costs, and indicated that if slavery must exist in order for the Union to survive, he was willing to allow slavery to thrive. Yet as the war dragged on, the Radical Republicans, an abolitionist faction of the Republican Party, criticized Lincoln for moving too slowly in abolishing slavery. Finally, on September 22, 1862, Lincoln unveiled the Emancipation Proclamation, which went into effect on January 1, 1863.

Not surprisingly, Lincoln has long been celebrated for passing the Emancipation Proclamation because most believed that this legislation legally brought an end to slavery. However, in reality, this was not the case. First, the Emancipation Proclamation only freed slaves in Confederate states. This meant that slavery was allowed in the border states that had remained loyal to the Union. In addition, the proclamation contained passages that strongly endorsed and encouraged colonization and the forced removal of emancipated black people. Most importantly, however, was the fact that since Lincoln had no real authority over the Confederacy, the Emancipation Proclamation was essentially unenforceable in the South. Indeed, at the time of the proclamation only a few African Americans immediately benefited from the order.

Still, the proclamation had the desired effect. The news of freedom spread rapidly on plantations, and black people were inspired to flee from plantations in larger numbers. And as the Union forces advanced, many more African Americans were freed and given refuge behind Union lines. Moreover, Lincoln's efforts to defeat the rebellion in the South were greatly advantaged by the issuance of the Proclamation. Internationally, the British and other governments who were supporting the South primarily for financial gain were forced to abandon those policies, once Lincoln took a firm stand against slavery. In addition, as black people fled the plantations and joined the Union, the Confederacy essentially collapsed—both financially and militarily.

Yet even as the war came to a close, and the Emancipation Proclamation slowly took effect, Lincoln continued to reveal his conflicted views toward slavery and African Americans. As he reflected on the process of reuniting the North and South, Lincoln feared that if Reconstruction policy was too harsh on the Confederacy, the Confederate states would be permanently alienated, and the Union would not be preserved. Throughout the Civil War, he encouraged restoration of formal governments and popularly elected officials in an effort to try to return the South to normalcy. Many congressional leaders pressed for permanent marshal law and for former Confederate supporters to be executed, but Lincoln vetoed the Wade-Davis Bill, which would have imposed much harsher penalties on former Confederates. However Lincoln also supported the notion of passing a 13th Amendment to the Constitution that would permanently prohibit slavery in all U.S. states and territories. This amendment, of course, did go into effect several months after Lincoln's death. Even so, Lincoln remained supportive of colonizing free blacks outside of the United States. Approximately one week prior to Lincoln's assassination, he asked Gen. Benjamin F. Butler to establish a program to relocate African Americans to Panama. Even though the program was abandoned after Lincoln was assassinated, it indicates that Lincoln had still not fully reconciled the notion of having a free and equal black population within U.S. borders.

On April 14, 1865, shortly after General Lee surrendered, Abraham and Mary Todd attended a play in Washington at Ford's Theater called Our American Cousin. Lincoln was occupying reserved seating in the balcony when John Wilkes Booth, a prominent actor, walked unnoticed from behind Lincoln and shot him. Booth was a strong Confederate sympathizer, and had plotted with several others to kill Lincoln for his views on slavery. Lincoln was immediately taken from the theater to a private home, where he lay in a coma for nine hours before finally dying the morning of April 15, 1865.

Lord Dunmore

John Murray, the 4th Earl of Dunmore (1732–1809), was the last royal governor of the Virginia Colony. History remembers Murray best for “Dunmore’s Proclamation,” the first Emancipation Proclamation.

Lord Dunmore first came to Virginia from a New York governorship in December 1771 as successor to the late Governor Botetourt. Dunmore negotiated the peace with the Shawnee in Dunmore’s War in 1774, and he was in office at the beginning of the American Revolution.

On November 7, 1775, Dunmore issued an edict known as Lord Dunmore’s Proclamation. It offered freedom to black servants or slaves who were willing to take up arms against the American rebels. By 1775, the British were losing the war, and in hopes of regaining the advantage, Dunmore issued his proclamation. Several enslaved Williamsburg men anticipated him by seven months. In April 1775, a small number of enslaved men visited Dunmore’s Palace and volunteered to serve under the British banner. He turned them away.

Although on the surface, this proclamation appeared magnanimous, there was one essential problem. Murray offered to free only the enslaved of Patriots, his enemy. He did not free his own slaves or those of his fellow Loyalists. Even the few who qualified for Murray’s offer had to meet certain provisions. The slaves had to (1) escape their owners and guards, (2) successfully navigate the perils of the roads (potholes, pirates, and slave patrols) leading to the harbor, and once they reached the water, (3) negotiate a ride to make it to the ship William in the Norfolk harbor. Once there, the recruits had to state and demonstrate firearms skills. Only then did the slaves meet the terms and conditions Dunmore set forth for their emancipation under his proclamation.

Still, Dunmore’s Proclamation affected the Patriot cause, and they reacted. In less than a month, on December 4, 1775, the Patriots prepared to fight back. The Committee of Safety doubled slave patrols on both sides of the Chesapeake Bay. Owners lectured their slaves against the evils of Dunmore, and the Committee of Safety warned owners verbally and in print to watch their slaves, their neighbors, and their neighbors’ slaves closely.

The Ethiopian Regiment, as Dunmore’s black troops called themselves, totaled 600 at its height. The men distinguished themselves by wearing a sash across their chests inscribed with the phrase “Liberty to Slaves.” Dunmore’s black regiment served in at least two minor skirmishes and only one major battle. The skirmishes were at Kemp’s Landing on the Elizabeth River in mid-November and a bombardment of Hampton in late November 1775. On December 9, 1775, they fought at the “Battle of Great Bridge” on the Elizabeth River (below Norfolk) and lost badly. Sixty-one died, including three officers, in just 25 minutes of fighting. That day, the Ethiopian Regiment fortified the north end of the bridge. On the opposite side were 700 Patriots, Col. William Woodford’s 2nd Virginia Regiment, which had occupied the south end of the bridge since December 1. Great Bridge was the major land entry point into the city of Norfolk. History records the names of at least three of the combatants at Great Bridge. James Anderson and Casar were former slaves among the injured in Dunmore’s Ethiopian Regiment. William Flora, of Woodford’s Regiment, was the last to leave his post holding the bridge, under a hail of gunfire.

As a result, by June 8, 1776, Dunmore feared for his life, left his Williamsburg residence for good, and took refuge on board the man-of-war Fowey at Yorktown. Dunmore left his slaves behind. Officials auctioned them off and sent his Lordship’s slaves to work in the lead mines. With his troops suffering more from disease (smallpox) than from combat casualties, Dunmore admitted defeat in June 1776 and left the Chesapeake. He moved temporarily to Tucker’s Mill near Portsmouth and finally to Gwynn’s Island near the Rappahannock. Along the way, approximately 300 escaped slaves joined Dunmore’s forces. Among them were several enslaved persons owned by Col. Landon Carter of Sabine Hall Plantation, Richmond County, Virginia: Billy, Joe, Moses, John, Lancaster Sam, Manuel, Panticove, Peter, and Postillion. Carter reported them missing on June 26, 1776, and said they went to Dunmore. After General Cornwallis’s surrender at Yorktown, Dunmore’s healthiest surviving troops accompanied him to New York to fight again. The injured and infirmed traveled with other Loyalists to Savannah, Georgia, and Charleston, South Carolina. From 1787 to 1796, Dunmore was governor of the Bahamas, where he served the thousands of black Loyalists sent there after the war.

Beginning as a tactic of war, it appears that in the end, Dunmore’s Proclamation did indeed lead him to become perhaps not the “Great Liberator,” but at least someone who did his best to liberate enslaved African Americans. So respected was Dunmore among African Americans that the New York Journal reported at least one African American woman there named her child for him. The newspaper further reported that an African American man in Philadelphia harassed whites in the streets with threats of the coming of Dunmore and his black regiment turning the tide of the war. Whether or not such reports are true, and despite the fact that his proclamation was one-sided, offering freedom only to the enslaved of his enemy, he became “the African Hero,” and the name Dunmore carried hope for a free and equal future in the slave quarters and homes of free African Americans in the new America.

Louisiana Purchase

When President Jefferson purchased the Louisiana Territory from France in 1803, America doubled its size; 13 present-day states, in whole or in part, were created from the new territory. The Louisiana Territory was divided into two territories after it was acquired. Land north of the 33rd parallel was designated “Territory of Louisiana,” and the southern section of land, less the West Florida Territory, was called the Territory of Orleans.

In 1804, the U.S. Congress restricted slaves coming into the Louisiana Territory to those who were the property of actual settlers. The slave revolt in St. Domingue (now Haiti), which resulted in the Haitian Revolution, brought to New Orleans a wave of more than 10,000 French-speaking black refugees. Two years later, slave revolts in a parish south of New Orleans caused the U.S. government to send troops to stop the slaves’ advances on New Orleans. The following year, 1812, Louisiana was admitted into the Union, and Congress organized the Missouri Territory. Slavery was legal in the Missouri Territory, and about 10,000 slaves lived in the territory by 1818 when the territory sought statehood. Missouri’s admission as a state would have upset the balance between slave and free states. In order to resolve the problem, Congressman James Tallmadge of New York introduced an amendment to admit the state but to prohibit the bringing of any more slaves into the state and to grant freedom to the children of slaves born in the state after its admission. The Tallmadge amendment passed the House but not the Senate. When Maine applied for statehood during the next session of Congress, the Missouri Compromise was passed. Maine was admitted as a free state, and the compromise authorized Missouri to write a constitution and decide for itself whether slavery would be permitted in the state. The Missouri Compromise also prohibited slavery in all areas north of the southern boundary of Missouri, with the exception of the state of Missouri. Congress fashioned a second compromise to prohibit Missouri’s legislature from denying black citizens their constitutional rights. Missouri’s new constitution permitted slavery within the state and prohibited free blacks from entering the state. Missouri was admitted as a slave state in 1821.

The Missouri Compromise was an attempt to settle the debate over slavery in the Louisiana Territory. The act, passed in 1820, temporarily maintained the balance between free and slave states, but the issue arose again when Kansas and Nebraska were seeking territorial status. Both areas had been controlled by the Missouri Compromise, but Sen. Stephen A. Douglas of Illinois introduced the Kansas-Nebraska Act in Congress to permit popular sovereignty in both Kansas and Nebraska. Southern Congressmen supported the bill, but antislavery proponents bitterly opposed it. When President Franklin Pierce signed the Kansas-Nebraska Act into law, slavery became possible in both territories, and the issue over the expansion of slavery once again became a major issue. The unanswered question regarding slavery in the territory of the Louisiana Purchase hastened the onset of the Civil War.

Louverture, Toussaint

Toussaint Louverture (1743?–1803) was a former slave and planter who played a leading role in the Haitian slave revolt, fought in the armies of Spain and France, became governor of Saint-Domingue (Haiti), and then died in exile in France.

Toussaint Louverture was the son of Gaou-Guinou, the son of an African chief of the Arrada (Allada) nation in present-day Benin who was captured in combat and sold in French Saint-Domingue (present-day Haiti). According to the tradition, Louverture was born near Cap François (present-day Cap Haïtien or Cap) on May 20, 1743, but archival sources cite various years, and his first name suggests that he was born on All Saints Day (November 1). He was first known as Toussaint Bréda, after the plantation where he worked. The nickname Louverture (or L'Ouverture) only appeared in the 1790s. Meaning “an opening” in French, it came, according to various sources, from the gap in his front teeth, his ability to create an opening through enemy lines, or his association with the Vaudou lwa (spirit) Papa Legba.

A slave on a plantation owned by the Comte de Noé, Louverture benefited from unusually favorable working conditions. When most other slaves in the northern plain of Cap were assigned arduous field duties on sugarcane plantations, he was put in charge of the plantation's cattle and horses and served as veterinarian and coachman. Louverture also learned how to read, though his handwriting and spelling remained hesitant throughout his adult life. He particularly revered the Abbé Raynal, whose history of French colonization in the West Indies denounced the treatment of slaves and predicted that a “black Spartacus”

Toussaint Louverture rose from enslavement to the military and political leadership of the Haitian struggle for independence within the French Revolution. (The British Library)

would one day lead a major slave revolt. Louverture eventually became convinced that he was the black Spartacus prophesied by Raynal.

Louverture married another slave called Suzanne, adopted her mixed-blood son Placide, and fathered two other sons of his own, Isaac and Saint-Jean. The oral tradition cites various other daughters and illegitimate children, but sources on this issue are weak. Louverture's extended family included various individuals destined to play a leading role in the Haitian Revolution, including his brothers Paul and Pierre Louverture and his nephews Moïse and Charles Belair.

Louverture was unusually close to the manager of his plantation, Bayon de Libertat, who eventually freed him prior to 1776. Thereafter, Louverture established himself as a planter and bought slaves of his own. At the time of the Haitian Revolution, many knew that he had been freed prior to the slave revolt, making him an ancien libre (as opposed to the nouveaux libres who were freed during the revolution). His slave-owning past, however, was not uncovered until the 1970s.

Aside from the Makandal poison conspiracy (1758), Saint-Domingue's slaves remained relatively subservient until the outbreak of the French Revolution in 1789 upset the colony's delicate racial and social balance. After 1789, some conservative whites prepared to break away from France so that they could distance themselves from its revolutionary agenda and escape its trade restrictions. Free people of color, such as the Mulattoes Jean-Baptiste Chavannes and Vincent Ogé, lobbied the French National Assembly for an end to the racial discrimination prevalent in Saint-Domingue and led a short-lived revolt in 1790. In August 1791, the slaves themselves, who represented 90 percent of the colony's population, revolted throughout the northern plain of Cap.

Louverture lived in the area directly affected by the slave uprising, but his role during the initial uprising remains unclear. Some scholars think that he played no role in the initial uprising (which was masterminded by the Vaudou priest Boukman) and joined the revolt only after he had seen his former master Bayon de Libertat to safety. Others think that Louverture participated in the uprising from the beginning but hid his own involvement for fear that the revolt might fail. A similar theory holds that he was following orders from Governor Philibert de Blanchelande, who allegedly encouraged the slaves to revolt in order to scare the French government into abandoning its revolutionary agenda.

Louverture had for sure joined the rebellion by late 1791, when he proposed colonial authorities bring the revolt to an end in exchange for limited concessions. Following Boukman's death, Louverture served under the rebel leaders Jean-François Papillon and Georges Biassou, first as doctor, then as secretary, and then as aide-de-camp. The planters' intransigence doomed Louverture's attempt at negotiation and forced the rebels to continue fighting. In July 1792, they announced that their demands now included general emancipation for all of Saint-Domingue's slaves (Louverture did not personally sign this letter, but he may have used his teenage nephew Charles Belair as a stand-in).

In 1793, the French Revolution's more radical turn, including the execution of Louis XVI, led to a general European war between France and conservative monarchies such as England and Spain. These nations saw the war as an opportunity to attack Saint-Domingue, which had become the leading world exporter of sugar and coffee and France's most valuable colony in the 1780s. English troops seized many ports along the western coast, including the colonial capital of Port-au-Prince, while Spain attacked from the neighboring colony of Santo Domingo in the East.

Louverture, along with his superiors Jean-François and Biassou, enlisted in the Spanish army after the declaration of war. Spain, like France and England, was a slave-owning power, but they cited their loyalty to the Bourbon dynasty to explain their service in Spanish ranks. Jean-François and Biassou led units of Spanish auxiliaries for the rest of their careers. Louverture, however, abandoned Spanish ranks in May or June 1794 and defected to the French army. His motives for doing so remain mysterious. He may have reacted to the radical shifts in France's colonial policy, including the decision by French commissioner Léger-Félicité Sonthonax to abolish slavery in Saint-Domingue (August 1793) and the decree of the French Convention that extended emancipation to most French colonies (February 1794). He also seems to have encountered serious difficulties in his relationship with his black and Spanish superiors.

After joining the French army, Louverture played a leading role fighting the British occupation troops in Saint-Domingue's north and west and the Spanish invasion in the east. Spain sued for peace by 1795; the British evacuated their last troops in 1798. Louverture also helped diffuse a revolt by the mulatto Jean-Louis Villatte in March 1796. Following the Villatte affair, the French general Etienne Laveaux promoted Louverture to division general. Louverture also arranged for his two sons, Placide and Isaac, to be sent to France, where they studied at the Institut des Colonies under the Abbé Coisson. A metropolitan education had been a sign of social success in prerevolutionary Saint-Domingue, but it also left Louverture vulnerable should France decide to retaliate against him by holding his sons hostage.

Following Laveaux's own departure for France, Louverture maneuvered to force subsequent French commissioners, including Sonthonax and Gabriel d'Hédouville, to leave the island. A cautious, occasionally duplicitous leader, Louverture did not overtly oppose France's envoys. Instead, he had rivals appointed as deputies to the French parliament. He also engineered "spontaneous" popular demonstrations and then encouraged envoys to sail away for their own safety. The ploy, which he used repeatedly, allowed him to eliminate obstacles to his rule while officially remaining loyal to France. By late 1798, he was the dominant military and political figure in western and northern Saint-Domingue (the mulatto general André Rigaud controlled the southern region; various maroon bands were active in the mountainous interior; and eastern Hispaniola remained a Spanish colony even though it had been ceded to France by the 1795 Treaty of Basel).

During his tenure as governor of Saint-Domingue, Louverture's primary concern was to revive the plantation economy that had underpinned the colony's immense wealth. As a former slave, he was genuinely opposed to the restoration of slavery, which at any rate would have been impossible to impose on the black majority. But as a former planter, he also noted that the abolition of slavery had led to a precipitous drop in the exports of coffee and particularly sugar. Continued exports were vital if Louverture wished to obtain revenue for his regime, finance his army, and generally bring the Saint-Domingue economy back to its former splendor. Sugar cultivation was reliant on heavy capital investments and, as such, could flourish only on large estates. Former slaves, however, associated plantation labor with slavery and dreamed of carving out the large estates into small plots and living off small-scale subsistence agriculture.

To solve this dilemma, earlier French agents such as Sonthonax and Hédouville, as well as governors of other French colonies, such as Guadeloupe's Victor Hugues, invented an intermediate laborer status dubbed cultivateur. Cultivators were not slaves, could not be whipped, and were paid a portion of the crop. They were not, however, free to leave the plantations and were locked into obligatory, long-term contracts to ensure that plantations had access to a stable labor pool. Eager to revive production, Louverture preserved the cultivator system, even instituting lifelong contracts and reducing the laborers' salary from one-third to one-fourth of the crop. The system was brutally enforced by Louverture's subordinate, Gen. Jean-Jacques Dessalines, and led to popular dissatisfaction with Louverture's rule. In October 1801, Louverture's own nephew Moyse revolted to protest labor conditions, only to be executed on Louverture's orders.

Louverture also incited some white planters to return from exile because he needed their expertise and capital to revive sugar plantations. He made sure, however, that many plantations were leased out to fellow officers of color and that white planters never regained the prominent social status they had once occupied. Louverture also hired many whites as secretaries, confessors, diplomats, legists, and administrators. The army, on the other hand, was dominated by officers and soldiers of color.

In 1798, tensions between France and the United States led to an undeclared Quasi-War. The hostilities impacted Louverture directly because French privateers soon began to seize U.S. merchants along the coast of Saint-Domingue, and the U.S. Congress retaliated by imposing an embargo on all trade to France and its colonies. Saint-Domingue, a major exporter of tropical crops and importer of foodstuffs, had always been heavily reliant on foreign trade. When U.S. merchants stopped visiting Saint-Domingue's ports, just as French merchants themselves were absent because of the naval war with England and the United States, Louverture feared that trade disruptions would lead to financial ruin and starvation. In November 1798, Louverture thus wrote to U.S. president John Adams and offered to halt all French privateering out of Saint-Domingue in exchange for a lifting of the U.S. embargo. A convention along these lines was signed in April 1799, and trade resumed the following summer, even as France and the United States continued the Quasi War (which did not end until the Treaty of Mortefontaine in September 1800).

England, which had been at war with France continuously since 1793, represented another threat to Saint-Domingue's revival. In 1798, Louverture negotiated with Brig.-Gen. Thomas Maitland to obtain the departure of the last British troops from Port-au-Prince and Môle St. Nicolas. A year later, he signed another convention with Maitland under which he promised not to attack British colonies, such as Jamaica, in exchange for British protection of his commerce. Louverture subsequently canceled a planned invasion of Jamaica and sent diplomatic envoys to Jamaica and England.

Louverture's closeness to the British served as the casus belli for the conflict that erupted in the summer of 1799 with Louverture's southern rival Rigaud. Rigaud accused Louverture of disloyalty for dealing with the English enemy; of plotting to declare independence; and of planning to restore slavery. The war was also caused by Rigaud and Louverture's competing ambitions and racial enmity between mulattoes and blacks. Known as the War of the South (or War of the Knives), the brutal conflict lasted until July 1800, devastating the south in the process. Louverture's army was on the defensive at first and then captured the strategic port of Jacmel and overwhelmed Rigaud's forces.

Following his victory against Rigaud, Louverture pressured the French agent Philippe Roume to allow him to take over Santo Domingo, which had been ceded to France in 1795 but remained under Spanish rule. Officially, Louverture explained that the invasion would put an end to Spanish kidnapping of black citizens of Saint-Domingue. He most likely also hoped to deny France a landing spot in Santo Domingo if it ever decided to send an expedition to remove Louverture from power. Pressured by Louverture, Roume authorized the takeover and then rescinded his order. Louverture imprisoned Roume and eventually exiled him to the United States; in the meantime, he sent his army to take Santo Domingo by force (January 1801).

Now in control of all of Hispaniola, Louverture summoned 10 delegates to draft a constitution for the colony. Presented to the public in July 1801, the constitution made Louverture governor general for life with the power to appoint his successor. Louverture informed France of the constitution only after it had been promulgated. Various observers concluded that the bold document was a preliminary to an outright declaration of independence, but Louverture, probably anxious to maintain some tenuous link to the only European power that had abolished slavery, continued to emphasize his loyalty to the metropolis.

After he took over in a 1799 coup d'état, First Consul Napoléon Bonaparte hesitated on the proper policy to adopt toward Louverture. He initially considered keeping Louverture as an ally, whose troops could be used for offensive operations against the English. In 1801, however, after hearing of the invasion of Santo Domingo, Roume's imprisonment, and Louverture's constitution, Bonaparte prepared a vast expedition intended to remove Louverture from power. Many suspected that Bonaparte also intended to restore slavery in Saint-Domingue (as he did in Guadeloupe and other French colonies), but Bonaparte insisted that he remained committed to emancipation in Saint-Domingue's case.

The London peace protocols (October 1801), which began a short period of peace with England, allowed a massive French fleet to cross the Atlantic. The initial expedition carried 20,000 troops; a total of 43,000 troops, in addition to sailors, left for Saint-Domingue in 1801–1803. They were led by Bonaparte's brother-in-law, Gen. Victoire Emmanuel Leclerc. When Leclerc landed in Cap in February 1802, he insisted that he had come merely to reinforce Louverture's army, not restore slavery, while acting in an aggressive manner. Louverture replied that he had always been loyal to France, while ordering his army to burn various cities, including Cap, to the ground. Leclerc attempted desultory negotiations by sending Louverture's sons (who had traveled with the expedition) in an attempt to mollify their father, but all-out fighting soon began as a result of both sides' intransigence.

The campaign lasted throughout the spring of 1802. Per Louverture's orders, his subordinates, such as Dessalines, burned towns, massacred white planters, and retreated to the island's mountainous interior to wage a guerilla war. Louverture himself fought a delaying action at Ravine-à-Couleuvres, while Dessalines forced the bulk of the French army into a costly siege at Crête-à-Pierrot. By May 1802, Leclerc's forces were ravaged by the costly campaign. Louverture, meanwhile, was abandoned by many of his own generals, including his brother Paul and the commander of Cap, Henri Christophe. Exhausted, both sides agreed to a ceasefire, under which Louverture surrendered his command but was allowed to retire on his plantation at Ennery.

Dessalines, who harbored ambitions for the overall command of the black army, privately informed Leclerc that Louverture was planning to renew the fighting as soon as yellow fever had decimated French ranks. Leclerc, who was under orders from Bonaparte to deport Saint-Domingue's leading officers of color, arranged to capture Louverture by surprise. Louverture and his family were put on the frigate Créole, then the ship-of-the-line Héros, and sent to France in June 1802. Before leaving, Louverture famously said that exiling him might cut the "tree of liberty" but that new saplings would soon spring from its roots. The rebellion indeed continued, becoming general by the fall of 1802 as black troops became convinced that the French had come to exterminate the black population or re-enslave it. The rebellion eventually succeeded and led to Haiti's independence in 1804.

Louverture's family was separated when they arrived in France's main military port on the Atlantic, Brest. Louverture's stepson Placide, who had fought with him in the spring 1802 campaign, was held captive in Belle Île. His wife Suzanne and sons Isaac and St. Jean were sent to Bayonne and then Agen. Louverture, accompanied by his servant

Mars Plaisir, was transported to the prison of Fort de Joux in the Jura mountains. While in captivity, Louverture repeatedly appealed to Bonaparte to complain of Leclerc's behavior and insist of his loyalty to the First Consul and to France. Bonaparte never personally replied, but he sent an aide-de-camp to obtain the location of Louverture's alleged treasure. When Louverture denied the existence of such a treasure, Bonaparte tightened the conditions of Louverture's detention. Alone, mistreated, and bitterly cold, the aging Louverture died in his cell in April 1803. Rumors spread that he had been poisoned on Bonaparte's orders, but the autopsy report indicates that Louverture died of pneumonia.

Louverture remained as controversial in death as he had been in life. Nineteenth-century abolitionists admired him as a former slave who had risen from humble circumstances to lead a colony. His enemies recognized his intelligence but also accused him of duplicity and disloyalty to France. Strangely, Haitians initially held him in low esteem because, contrary to his successor Dessalines, he had never dared to declare outright independence or kill all whites. Louverture's image improved in the 20th century, and Haitians now regard him as one of their revolutionary heroes, on par with Dessalines. A plaque honoring Louverture now stands in the French Pantheon, where outstanding French historical characters are buried (Louverture's actual body, dumped in the prison's cemetery, was lost in a subsequent renovation of the Fort de Joux).

Manumission

Manumission is the legal act of freeing one's slaves. Like many other aspects of slavery, laws regarding manumission varied across time and place, but as slavery became institutionalized during the colonial era, legislatures codified the practice of manumission. In contrast to manumission practices in British North America, and later the United States, France and Spain had very liberal manumission laws in their empires; the Catholic Church encouraged manumission, and laws were enacted that gave every slave the right to purchase his or her freedom at an established and fair price. In the United States, however, a general fear of a free black population commingling with slaves and possibly agitating for rebellion led many legislatures to make manumission difficult for the slaveholder and more restrictive for any manumitted slaves. After 1705 in Virginia, for example, slaveholders could not manumit without approval of the governor or the council, and freed slaves were required to leave the colony unless the courts granted a stay.

During the American Revolution, manumission underwent a significant change. Many slaveholders, particularly those in Virginia, had a difficult time justifying slavery in light of the ideals for which the war was fought. As Southern states wrote their first constitutions, they liberalized laws regarding manumission. This led to a doubling of the free black population in the South over the next two decades. Only a small fraction, however, followed George Washington's example of providing a financial legacy for their manumitted slaves. Over the course of the war, the British manumitted approximately 14,000 slaves for supporting the Loyalist cause. Americans manumitted hundreds more for meritorious services rendered during the Revolution. In the North, manumissions increased as slavery was abolished through gradual emancipation.

By 1810, however, the rate of manumission in the south steeply declined, and it was practiced mainly only in the urban areas and in the border states. The public attitude changed because of the Haitian Revolution and Gabriel Prosser's revolt in Virginia in 1800. Moreover, slavery became viewed less as a necessary evil in the mind of Southerners and more as a positive good. With manumission no longer socially acceptable, slaveholders who wished to manumit their slaves outright were viewed by their white neighbors as dangerous subversives tearing apart the very fabric of society.

In response to changed attitudes after 1810, states enacted burdensome regulations that made it harder for slaveholders to manumit their slaves. Generally, the Upper South states required slaveholders to gain the permission of the courts in order to free their slaves. In the Deep South, the slaveholders needed authorization from the state legislature. All states had age requirements that did not allow the young and strong or the old and feeble to receive manumission. Some states made it more difficult to free slaves through a will, which was a common form of manumission. In addition, creditors were allowed to consider slaves an asset of the estate, and dozens of manumitted slaves were re-enslaved under this provision. States retained the right to manumit slaves for meritorious conduct. In the antebellum period, some slaves were manumitted for informing authorities of impending revolts.

Despite these restrictions, masters continued to manumit slaves. Slave owners who owned one or two slaves, be they yeoman farmers or artisans, manumitted their slaves in times of economic duress. Artisans in Baltimore employed a form of slavery for a set number of years and manumitted the slave at the end of that term. The cumbersome and costly process of legal manumission led many slaveholders to free their slaves outside the law. There was little the authorities could do to someone who simply sent his slave north or refused to exercise any control over the enslaved.

Most slaveholders required some sort of compensation for manumission. Because slaveholders had traditionally sold slaves to raise cash, this was more palatable to Southern public opinion. This practice led to abuses. It was not uncommon for slaveholders to take money and not follow through on the promise to free a slave or to ask for more money after the initial cost was met. Slave purchases were often made by relatives who wanted to free their spouse. In the late 18th and early 19th centuries, manumission societies, run mainly by Quakers in the South, purchased slaves and either manumitted them outright or kept them nominally as bondsmen but compensated them for their labor. Literate slaves tried to raise money to purchase their spouses by appealing to Northern antislavery publications. Such journals as the New York Journal of Commerce conducted fund-raising campaigns to purchase specific slaves with the purpose of manumitting them.

Manumitted slaves were required to leave the state unless they received an exemption from either the courts or the legislature. Although some manumitted slaves immigrated to Liberia, according to the wishes of their former masters, most either mixed into the existing free black populations in the South or, more likely, migrated north to cities such as Philadelphia, Pennsylvania. Wherever they went, they faced discrimination, poverty, and unemployment. See also: Abolition, Slavery; Gradual Emancipation

Maroon Societies

Maroons societies were independent black communities established by fugitive slaves throughout the Americas in an effort to escape bondage and create a viable, permanent free society. From the establishment of the first Spanish colonies in the Caribbean up to the abolition of slavery in the 19th century, escaped Africans set up autonomous settlements and became a major force of rebellion and mass resistance to colonial authorities. Maroon societies existed in the Caribbean and in North, South, and Central America, interacting with all the major colonial powers (English, Spanish, French, Portuguese, and Dutch.) Though most suffered persecution at the hands of slave owners and colonists, a number were able to negotiate treaties granting them legitimacy and permanent freedom. Despite difficulties brought on by modernization and political repression, maroon communities survive to the present day in every part of the hemisphere. Maroon societies, therefore, represent not only one of the earliest forms of resistance to colonial power but also the first self-ruling African communities in the New World.

The term “maroon” comes from the Spanish cimarrón and is believed to be of indigenous Caribbean origin. The French verb maroonage means to take flight or become a fugitive; the phenomenon of petite maroonage, noted by Gabriel Debien, refers to cases of individual or temporary flight and is distinguished from grand maroonage, the formation of permanent fugitive slave communities. Petit maroonage includes slaves who briefly absconded to escape punishment and cases such as runaways who blended into the black populations of cities, as well as “maritime maroons” who became sailors and pirates. However, it was through grand maroonage that escaped slaves created the defiant, self-governing communities known as maroon societies. In each colonial realm, local nomenclature described these new social entities: Spanish palenques and cumbes; Portuguese quilombos, mocambos, cumbes, and mambises; English maroons and runaways; French maroonage; and Dutch bosnegers, or bush negroes.

The earliest maroon societies appeared in Spanish Santo Domingo. Beginning in the early 1500s, escaped Africans journeyed to the hilly interior and north coast of modern-day Dominican Republic, in many cases living among native peoples. Because the settlers of Santo Domingo relied largely on Indian slave labor, maroonage initially referred to escaped Indians as well as Africans. Over the course of the 16th century, maroonage spread to the Spanish mainland and was increasingly associated with African fugitives.

With Europeans concentrated in urban zones and plantations, an important factor for the survival of escaped slaves was their interaction with native populations. Maroons collaborated with, fought against, and blended with native peoples as they created their own settlements. In the Esmeraldas region of Ecuador, initial conflict between Africans and Natives soon gave way to political alliances. The intermarriage of Africans and Natives created a new ethnic group called mulattoes or zambos. In some parts of Spanish America, especially Panama and Florida, maroons also played key roles in European colonial rivalries. Panamanian maroons assisted Francis Drake’s attempt to hijack the Spanish silver convoy in 1573 as it traveled across the isthmus bound for Spain. In the Florida community of Gracia Real de Santa Teresa de Mose, near St. Augustine, maroons allied with the Spanish crown successfully defended the settlement from British and Native attacks. These maroons were granted their freedom in return for military service, the first group of Africans to negotiate emancipation in what is now the United States.

By the 17th century, the British, French, and Dutch had established colonies with a thriving mercantile economy in sugar, tobacco, cotton, and rice. The booming Atlantic slave trade led to a concurrent rise in maroon settlements. In North America, escaped slaves settled land outside of colonial control such as the western mountains and the Great Dismal Swamp of Virginia and the Carolinas. Despite the ephemeral nature of these settlements, maroonage in the mainland British colonies continued up to the 1860s.

The 1600s also saw the formation of what would become the largest known maroon settlement in the Americas: the Quilombo de Palmares in the province of Pernambuco, Brazil. Celebrated today as the first African Republic of the New World, Palmares was a federation of closely aligned communities called mocambos, operating under a supreme ruler called the Ganga-Zumba. With population estimates ranging anywhere from 2,000 to 30,000, Palmares supported a flourishing farming and trading economy. The maroons also staged frequent raids on nearby colonial settlements. After numerous attempts at suppression, the Portuguese annihilated the community in 1694.

From the plantations of the Dutch colony of Suriname, large-scale maroonage led to the establishment of autonomous communities in the colony's interior by people such as the Saramaka, Ndjuka, Matawai, and Boni. Fierce battles with colonial militias in the 18th century resulted in treaties granting the Ndjuka and Saramaka independence and tribute payments. In return, they were expected to return newly escaped slaves. Nonetheless, by the late 18th and early 19th centuries, the Dutch were again at war with the Aluku, or Boni, maroons. The survival of the Suriname maroons and those of neighboring French Guiana has provided an invaluable window to the rich culture and history of maroon societies, a synthesis of foundational African practices interwoven with Native and European elements.

Integral communities also survive in Jamaica, where maroons emerged during Spanish occupation of the island. From 1655 to the mid-18th century, the Jamaica maroons fought fiercely to maintain their freedom against British forces, finally winning recognition from the British Crown under the condition that they were to end their aggressive raids, return new runaways, and assist British forces in subduing slave revolts. Although these terms guaranteed maroon autonomy, they drove a fatal wedge between these free blacks and plantation slaves. Some of the best-known maroon communities, Trelawny town, Nanny town, and Clarendon, and heroes such as Cudjoe, Cuffee, and Nanny, emerged from the Jamaican experience.

Caught between their desire to defend their independence and their obligations to colonial authorities, maroons were often forced into strained and even belligerent relations with society. Those maroons who did enter in direct conflict with colonial armies risked the total dissolution of their communities and a return to enslavement. After battling with British authorities at the end of the 18th century, the Trelawny town maroons found themselves exiled to Nova Scotia and then to Sierra Leone. Another case resulting from violence between maroons and British settlers led to the forced migration of the Black Caribs or Garifuna people from the island of St. Vincent in the 1790s. After suffering mistreatment and decimation on the islands of Baliceau and Roatán, they were brought to Honduras under protection of the Spanish Crown. From there, they migrated along the Central American coast. Today numerous Garifuna communities can be found from modern-day Belize to the northern coast of Nicaragua.

Maroon societies also exerted widespread influence in colonial North America. French, and later Spanish, New Orleans was home to many maroon groups, especially in the tidal wetlands area of the Gulf coast. In Spanish Florida, African slaves fleeing the British colonies settled among communities of Red Creek Indians from Alabama, leading to the creation of the Seminole people, whose name is another derivation of cimarrón. The Seminoles fought two long wars against the U.S. Army. The first war, from 1816 to 1818, ended in an uneasy peace. However, white settlers continued to covet Native land in Florida, and slave owners remained eager to recover runaways. The policy of Indian removal brought on a second war that saw the forced migration of Seminoles to the Oklahoma territory in 1842. Eventually one group of Seminoles left in search of better conditions in Mexico, while the other remained in Oklahoma. Both communities still exist today.

The social formation of maroon communities has followed many patterns. Native people often played a major role, as in the case of 16th-century Santo Domingo, Esmeraldas on the Ecuadorian coast, and the union of Caribs and Africans in Saint Vincent. With about two African males arriving in the Americas for every female, maroon men sought to increase the number of women in their communities by intermarrying with native women and raiding villages and plantations. Though leadership followed a patriarchal structure, women exercised critical roles in the many areas needed for survival: military defense and raiding, farming, hunting, and relations with colonial settlers and authorities.

Maroon societies generally formed either in remote areas, far enough from colonial settlements to render them less susceptible to attack, or in inhospitable areas near colonial settlements such as swamps, hill country, and mangrove forests. Although the latter locations facilitated raiding and commerce, protecting the community from attack remained of paramount importance. Nestled within a combination of natural barriers and man-made palisades or spiked moats, maroon communities were designed to give members time to escape in case of military assault. Maroons relied on guerrilla tactics and surprise raids to achieve their military ends. They also counted on intelligence and material support from plantation slaves. In response, authorities mounted numerous offensives and hired agents to recapture runaways. In the United States, these were the “slave patrols”; in Brazil, they were capitões-do-mato; in Spanish America, they were the santa hermandad.

Early maroon societies were largely composed of first-generation enslaved Africans. It is thought that those born in the Americas, often called Creoles, had less incentive to escape the plantation system to which they had been acclimated from childhood. After the 18th century, however, larger numbers of American-born slaves fled as well. Maroon societies have played an important role in the retention of African culture. Scholars believe Palmares was based on a Central African pattern of social formation called the ki-lombo used among the Imbangala warriors to create new bands based on capture and raiding. African linguistic forms have survived in various maroon cultures, especially the Saramaka maroons of Surinam, who developed a language combining African, Native, and Dutch elements. Saramaka altars and music also illustrate the direct African lineage of maroon art and aesthetics.

The plight of maroon societies continued after independence. Today, major communities of maroon descent continue to live in Oklahoma, Surinam, Jamaica, Honduras, and Colombia. However, maroons have seen the erosion of their lifestyle and communities. Political pressures from national governments unwilling to recognize colonial treaties, along with the cultural and social changes wrought by modernization, have led to the diminishment of maroon landholdings and the weakening of their cohesion as a people.

At the same time, maroons have become an ever more important symbol for people of African descent in the Americas. In Brazil, annual celebrations of the great king Zumbi of Palmares have acquired national significance as a day of black consciousness. Nanny Day is celebrated in Jamaica, and maroon such as like Alonso de Illescas in Ecuador are recognized as symbols of black independence, autonomy, and ongoing resistance.

Massachusetts 54th Regiment

The 54th Massachusetts Infantry Regiment, one of the first regiments of African American soldiers to be organized during the Civil War, was in many respects the most important. Governor John Albion Andrew of Massachusetts, an ardent abolitionist, was one of the first public figures to understand the importance of the participation of black soldiers in the war against the Confederacy, to the Union cause and to the future of black Americans. Almost immediately after the Emancipation Proclamation went into effect, he asked Secretary of War Edwin Stanton, on January 26, 1863, for authorization to recruit for the 54th. Andrew wanted the regiment, the first to be recruited in the North and the fourth overall after the Louisiana Native Guards (September 1862), the First Kansas Colored Volunteers (September 1862), and the First South Carolina Infantry (October 1862), to be a model for future black units, one that would through its performance shape perceptions of black Americans throughout the world.

Within days, he selected Captain Robert Gould Shaw, then a captain in the 2nd Massachusetts Infantry, to be its colonel and commander. The son of Francis G. Shaw, a merchant and prominent abolitionist, Shaw was only 25 years old and a veteran of combat at Cedar Mountain and Antietam. He was fond of the 2nd Massachusetts and confident of promotion in it. Command of the 54th came with significant risks, of failure, isolation, and ridicule, but he accepted the challenge. He turned out to be a brilliant choice.

Massachusetts had few free black men of military age, so recruitment extended as far west as Chicago. George L. Stearns, a supporter of John Brown in Kansas during the late 1850s, led the recruitment drive as agent of the committee appointed by Andrew to superintend the process. Supporters included the most influential black abolitionists: Frederick Douglass, William Wells Brown, Charles L. Remond, John S. Rock, Henry Highland Garnet, and William C. Nell. Douglass's sons, Charles and Lewis, were among the first to enlist from New York. Volunteer soldiers came to the Readville, Massachusetts, camp in the spring of 1863 from 10 of the Union states, as well as from North Carolina, Louisiana, and even Canada, believing that the future of all African Americans would be determined by the war and their contributions to it. The nation had focused its attention on them, and they knew that if they proved themselves on the battlefield, they could help bring about the end of slavery and racial injustice. Soon they were so many that later arrivals became the nucleus of another regiment, the 55th.

The 54th's active service began on May 28, 1863, when the regiment set sail for duty in South Carolina. At St. Simon's Island, Shaw reported to Col. James Montgomery. The regiment's first operation was a July raid against the undefended coastal town of Darien, Georgia. Under Montgomery's orders, the 54th participated in the looting and burning of Darien, including destruction of nearly 100 residences, three churches, and the courthouse. Shaw objected in writing but obeyed his orders, leaving the town ablaze.

After returning to South Carolina, the regiment became involved in Brig. Gen. Quincy A. Gilmore's offensive to close Charleston harbor. South Carolina was the cradle of secession, and Charleston was its focal point. The city was very strongly fortified and defended, making assault from the land impossible and approach from the sea extremely difficult. Of modest military value and vulnerable to isolation by blockade, Charleston remained a target of high symbolic significance. As Gilmore planned to attack the city, Colonel Shaw, who wanted a role in more than raiding, particularly of the Montgomery variety, feared the 54th would be left out of the fight and made his concerns known to his superiors. He soon got his opportunity. On July 8, he received orders to prepare to deploy as part of Gen. Alfred H. Terry's 4,000-man division for "a diversionary demonstration" on James Island south of Charleston. Confederate forces under Gen. P. G. T. Beauregard viewed the feint as the main attack and struck the right flank of the Union line, giving the 54th its first real taste of combat. The regiment took the brunt of the attack and held, preventing the enemy from flanking the Union line and striking the white 10th Connecticut. The successful stand earned praise from General Terry, the grateful Connecticut soldiers, and the Northern press. The 54th suffered 14 killed, 18 wounded, and 13 captured. It gained widespread respect and appeared to pass the test for which Governor Andrew had enlisted it.

Within a week, the nation had much more conclusive proof of the battle-worthiness of the 54th and the willingness of black soldiers to fight for the Union and an America without slavery. At dusk on July 18, the 54th formed up at the head of a 14-regiment assault force, ready to attack Fort Wagner on Morris Island in Charleston harbor. The huge fortification of palmetto log and earth at the north end of the narrow barren island, with its sand beaches, low hills, and salt marshes, was a key to Charleston itself, and the 54th would be the vanguard, the first to reach and strike this formidable obstacle, with 13 white regiments coming behind.

The charge of the 54th covered 600 yards of exposed beach, crossed a moat, and surged up the walls of the fort. Advancing through heavy fire with Shaw in the lead, the regiment reached the top, a few men even getting inside, before withering fire forced them to withdraw. Sgt. William Carney of C Company carried the national colors to the very parapet of Fort Wagner and safely brought the flag back, later receiving the Medal of Honor for his bravery. Colonel Shaw died leading the charge, and almost half of the 600 attackers were killed, wounded, or captured. The white regiments also suffered substantial casualties. After the repulse, Gilmore called off the attack, which was a major operational disaster. Fort Wagner was not actually taken until September 6, and its occupation had little bearing on the war's outcome, but from a social and symbolic perspective, the assault was very important. Shaw and the 54th became symbols of the dedication and commitment of the black soldier, proving that African Americans would give their all to crush secession. Colonel Shaw's burial by the enemy in a common grave with his fallen soldiers caused howls of protest from the North but ultimately cemented his position as a martyr to the causes of reunion and abolition.

July 1863 was clearly a military turning point. The Union won key victories at Gettysburg and at Vicksburg. But the behavior of the 54th, underscoring the valorous performance of black troops at Milliken's Bend (June 7) and Port Hudson (May 27) also showed that the black soldier was able to play a major role in the prosecution of the war. With 30 black regiments in the field and 30 more by the end of the year, Union manpower was surging while Confederate forces were declining. Black soldiers became an increasingly vital part of the sword that would end slavery. In so doing, they would stake a strong claim on citizenship.

After Fort Wagner, the 54th remained in South Carolina, occupied with the routine work of digging and constructing trenches and fortifications. Discontent began to spread through the unit, whose soldiers were convinced that they bore a disproportionate portion of such work and resented it. Moreover, the government denied them the $13 monthly pay of soldiers and insisted that because they enlisted based on the Militia Act's authorization for enrollment of black laborers, they deserved only the lower compensation of $10 per month minus $3 for their clothing. Also, the killing of innocent black victims in the rampage known as the New York draft riot raised serious questions about whether their sacrifice was worthwhile.

The complaints of the officers and men of the 54th regarding unfair imposition of fatigue duty finally received a hearing. General Gilmore ordered such practices ended in November. However, the critical issue of pay still festered. For nearly a year and a half, soldiers of the 54th and other

Massachusetts black regiments refused any money rather than accept anything less than that due to them as soldiers. Their families suffered acute hardship, allayed to some extent by private philanthropy. When the state of Massachusetts offered to make up the difference between what the government offered and what was rightfully theirs, the men of the regiment, realizing that acceptance of unequal pay would affirm a subordinate status, stood firm. Finally, at the end of September 1864, the attorney general issued a ruling that allowed the soldiers to receive the pay that was their due.

The 54th remained on active service until the end of the war. It participated in two bloody Union defeats during 1864, at Olustee, Florida, in February and at Honey Hill, South Carolina, at the end of November. Neither battle was significant to the outcome of the war. In January 1865, Sgt. Stephen A. Swails of the regiment became the first African American line officer. Col. Edward N. Hallowell, who succeeded Colonel Shaw in command, recommended Swails for a commission, and Governor Andrew approved. The army chain of command finally approved the promotion, and Sgts. Peter Vogelsang and Frank M. Welch also won commissions and served briefly as officers.

In February 1865, the regiment returned to Charleston, this time as part of the occupying force. The bulk of the regiment arrived on February 25, but part of B Company entered Charleston on February 18, the first Union soldiers into town after the Confederates fled. Except for a six-week period from mid-March to the end of April, when it participated in one of the last campaigns of the war, including a sharp skirmish at Boykin's Mill, South Carolina, on April 28, the regiment remained in Charleston as part of the provost guard until August, when the men boarded ships and returned to Massachusetts.

In two years of wartime service, the 54th participated in five armed encounters with the enemy. It suffered total casualties of 5 officers and 95 men killed, as well as 20 officers and 274 wounded and 93 dead due to disease and accident. It fought its battles in some of the more obscure and inconsequential theaters of war and, like most black regiments, spent more time in manual labor than in combat. Still, the 54th's contribution went far beyond the routine facts of service, to the dramatic impact of its gallant conduct at Fort Wagner, showing the whole country that African Americans made worthy soldiers. The 54th passed the test of combat with flying colors, fought a successful struggle for equal pay, and produced the first black line officers.

At the end of the 20th century, the history of the 54th was more widely known than ever before. Augustus Saint Gaudens's spectacular memorial to Colonel Shaw and the regiment on Boston Common, dedicated in 1897, was one of only three Civil War monuments to commemorate the service of black soldiers for an entire century after the conflict. Then, in 1989, the film Glory, based on Peter Burchard's 1965 book One Gallant Rush, captured the attention and imagination of audiences all over America. It was followed by television documentaries and several new books. The brave deeds of the 54th were brought out of obscurity and popularized. Like the Minute Men and Rough Riders of other eras, the 54th joined a pantheon of universally familiar American military heroes.

Methodist Camp Meetings

Methodist camp meetings became a popular way for people of European and African descent to interact within the setting of a Protestant revival. John Wesley (1703–1791), an Oxford-educated Anglican minister, promoted a form of conversion and religious experience that would later compel ministers to found the Methodist church and endorse a revivalistic form of worship that often occurred in the context of camp meetings. The experience of conversion, according to Wesley, required a “witness of the Spirit,” or the direct indwelling of the Holy Spirit in the heart of a believer. Many Protestants criticized such claims as mere “enthusiasm” during the period known as the Great Awakening (ca. 1735–1745), whereas many others embraced the teachings of popular revivalists. The individualization of conscience and the inversion of authority, in particular, appealed to many European Americans and African Americans.

People of European and African descent began to share a common religious space during revivals in Virginia and North Carolina before and immediately after the American Revolution. The resultant interracial events produced novel forms of Protestant worship in America. The European emphasis on the spoken word combined with the African tradition of applying dance and song to words. Also, during interracial revivals, European Americans started to exhibit dynamic relationships with revival preachers in the form of verbal exhortations and demonstrations of the indwelling of the spirit. In other words, white Protestants did not simply convert enslaved and free Africans without undergoing radical changes themselves.

Francis Asbury (1745–1816) established the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1787. He ordained hundreds of new Methodist ministers who would come to be known as “circuit riders,” or itinerant preachers, because of their willingness to travel to places far removed from the more populated areas of the eastern seaboard. Historians have referred to the years from 1787 to 1805 as the period of the “Great Revival,” due in large part to the emergence of the Methodist camp meeting as a popular mode of communal and individual religious expression. The most famous camp meeting occurred at Cane Ridge, Kentucky, in 1801, but thousands of smaller and larger meetings occurred throughout the United States and western territories. The effectiveness of revivalism and the high number of conversions have compelled many historians to refer to the first four decades of the 19th century as the Second Great Awakening.

It was during the Second Great Awakening that Methodism became the largest Protestant denomination in the United States. This unprecedented success was due in large part to the popularity of the Methodist camp meeting. Camp meetings came out of the revival tradition of Virginia. They usually occurred in rural areas, and people usually traveled great distances to participate in what would sometimes last over a week. Local and itinerant ministers expressed a message of sin, damnation, conversion, and salvation. They took advantage of their personal charisma and their ability to elicit emotional responses from the audience. The audience of converted and unconverted people responded with verbal and bodily gestures that sometimes frightened outside observers. Some common forms of spiritual possession included shaking, laughing, shouting, dancing, barking, and jerking.

Though racial segregation often occurred during camp meetings, both African and European Americans participated in shouting exercises. These “shouting Methodists,” as they came to be known, best demonstrate the influence of African religious practices on Protestantism in the form of the “ring shout.” The ring shout was characterized by circular dancing, repetitious singing, and call-and-response. Sometimes potential converts and people in mourning stood or knelt in the middle of the ring shout. Also, during larger camp meetings, there could be multiple rings formed at the same time. The raucous, lay-driven ring shouts often bothered camp meeting leaders because of the tendency to shift attention away from the pulpit. More critical observers referred to ring shouts as examples of extravagant emotion and the unwanted influence of African culture.

Methodist camp meetings brought people of many cultural, racial, and religious backgrounds together. They also transformed the ways in which many people experienced conversion on an individual and communal level. The incorporation of bodily activity into Methodist worship stood in stark contrast to the sedate practices of other European and American denominations. Moreover, the movement of Methodist worship to outdoor settings continued and enhanced the success of the revival tradition. Yet despite such triumphs, the participation of African Americans in camp meetings underwent a reduction during the antebellum period as white Methodist leaders accommodated themselves to the slaveholding ethic of elite Southerners. A proslavery and patriarchal ideology fused with Methodist spirituality to further alienate African Americans from the experience of conversion during camp meetings. As the Southern states moved closer to secession, many African American Methodists took their experiences of the camp meetings to their plantation quarters, away from much of the authority of ministers and slaveholders, where they began to cultivate a Protestant culture that would flourish after emancipation. See also: Evangelism; Ring Shout; Second Great Awakening

Mexican War

The Mexican War, fought between 1846 and 1848, between the United States and Mexico was a conflict primarily over the expansion of slavery. Inspired by the concept of Manifest Destiny, the United States gained a sizable territory with the signing of the Treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo in February 1848. More important, the war opened the wounds of slavery and federal regulation.

In the 1830s and 1840s, America witnessed an age of westward expansion. During this period, thousands of Americans migrated into the western territories. By 1845, it had become clear that Americans demanded more territory. In July 1845, the editor of an expansionist newspaper named John L. O'Sullivan wrote of a concept called "manifest destiny." By 1846, newspapers had embraced the concept of America's right to westward territories that did not belong to the United States. In close association with the concept of Manifest Destiny, there was a movement called Young America, whose leading proponent was George Sanders. The supporters of the Young America movement believed that the United States had a special mission that would eventually envelop the entire world. The idea of Manifest Destiny and the missionary Young America movement provided the context for American expansion.

An additional factor was Texas. In 1836, Anglos living in Texas achieved independence from their parent state of Mexico. Mexico refused to accept Texan independence. Over the next nine years, Mexico engaged in border conflict with the Republic of Texas. The 1844 election of the ardent expansionist James K. Polk exacerbated the situation. One of Polk's campaign promises was the annexation of Texas, and in 1845, the United States indeed annexed the Republic of Texas, making Texas a new state. This worsened tensions between the United States and Mexico. In addition, many Northerners viewed the annexation of Texas as a dilemma, in that it would offset the precocious balance of power between the free and slave states in the Congress.

In November 1845, Polk tried to negotiate diplomatically through John Slidell, but he failed. Tensions reached a boiling point in January 1846, when Polk ordered Zachary Taylor to head to Texas, with about 4,000 troops, to guard against a possible Mexican invasion. On May 9, 1846, after a brief skirmish in the Rio Grande vicinity, Polk asked for a declaration of war against Mexico. With the stated intentions of acquiring New Mexico and California, the war started in earnest.

President Polk called for an enlistment of 50,000 soldiers. In the flood of patriotism that followed the declaration of war, 200,000 Americans enlisted. Free blacks also wished to participate in the war. Many freedmen joined the army to show their loyalty to the country, and upon joining, free blacks were placed in segregated units. Among the many African American units was the 1st Regiment of Volunteers from New York, the Fourth Artillery, as well as many infantry units. There is also evidence of African Americans joining the U.S. Navy. Clearly, the number of African Americans in combat was comparatively low, but their participation cannot be overlooked in the overall success of the war.

The initial goal of the Mexican War was territorial expansion. This was evident because of the emergence of Manifest Destiny, population expansion, and the Young America movement. However, once the war started, the goal and the issue of the war involved the expansion of slavery. In August 1846, the issue of slavery became integrated into the national war debate. President Polk introduced an appropriations bill into Congress. A freshman congressman from Pennsylvania, David Wilmot, attached an amendment to the bill that would have barred slavery and involuntary servitude from all lands acquired from Mexico as a result of the war. The Wilmot Proviso had a profound effect on the national debate during the war. Despite the fact that it passed the House of Representatives, it failed to pass in the Senate. It polarized Northerners in regard to the issue of slavery. It split both the Whigs and the Democrats along sectional lines. The Whigs believed that no extra territory should be taken, and the Democrats believed in popular sovereignty and the right to remove the decision from the federal government.

In response to the Wilmot Proviso and the new territories acquired from Mexico, a new political party emerged that was strictly abolitionist. The Wilmot Proviso planted the seed for the Free Soil Party. Organized in 1848, the Free Soil Party opposed the extension of slavery into the territories. Indeed, it proposed the abolition of slavery. The Free Soil

Party and its ideas evolved from abolitionists in the Democratic Party as well as the Whig and Liberty Parties, which were considered extreme antislavery supporters. In late 1848, the Free Soilers held their first political nominating convention. At the convention, the delegates nominated an abolitionist and former president of the United States, Martin Van Buren, as well as the son of former president and abolitionist John Quincy Adams, Charles Francis Adams. Slavery and its extension into the new territories monopolized the party's political agenda. In the election of 1848, Van Buren received 291,501 popular votes, which accounted for 10.1 percent of the total vote. The results were the most successful third-party tally since the inception of the nation. The favorable results illustrated the importance of slavery in the aftermath of the Mexican War.

In addition to the success of the Free Soil Party, the other two parties split over the issue of slavery in the new territories. The Democratic Party divided between Southern and Northern Democrats. Southern Democrats believed that slavery was an inviolable right, whereas Northern Democrats believed in "popular sovereignty," or the right of the settlers in the territory to choose whether they wished slavery to exist in their territory. The Whig Party divided between Southern Whigs, or "Cotton Whigs," and Northern Whigs, or "Conscience Whigs." The Mexican War not only introduced new territories into the Union, but also politicized the nation over the issue of slavery.

Missouri Compromise

The Missouri Compromise was a congressional agreement passed in 1820 that attempted to resolve the intense hostility that had emerged over the extension of slavery. In 1818, the territory of Missouri applied to admission into the Union as a slave state, a move that caused tremendous conflict between pro- and antislavery forces. The compromise, fashioned by Henry Clay, was viewed as a temporary solution to the crisis. However, rather than solving the crisis, the Missouri Compromise exacerbated the dilemma of the extension of slavery into the new territories.

By December 1818, the citizens of the territory of Missouri, once a part of the vast Louisiana territory, were prepared for admission into the Union. Most of the settlers who had migrated into the territory were from the South. In 1818, there were close to 66,000 inhabitants in the region, including 10,000 slaves. Thus, it was clear that if the territory were to be admitted into the Union, it would do so as a slave state. Indeed, the territorial legislature accepted the tenets of slavery, and the admission application promoted the tenets of slavery. As the admission bill entered the House of Representatives for debate, the question of slavery was unleashed.

In February 1819, a congressman from New York, James Tallmadge, added to the admission bill an additional amendment, commonly known as the Tallmadge Amendment. The amendment forbade the future importation of slaves into Missouri and called for the ultimate emancipation of all slaves born in Missouri. The House, voting along sectional lines, accepted the Tallmadge Amendment. The Senate, however, refused to accept it, and the bill was subsequently defeated in the Senate. Southern politicians criticized the bill for its sense of intrusiveness, and Northern politicians viewed the bill as inherently weak in its supervision of the "peculiar institution."

In response to the Tallmadge Amendment, the Senate proposed its alternative. Under the Senate bill, there would be no restrictions on slavery in the new state. It was evident that a crisis loomed on the horizon. The crisis was exacerbated by protests throughout the Northeast as well as the disturbing legislation passed by Missouri to forbid the migration of free blacks and mulattoes into the new state. After a protracted crisis, Missouri agreed not to abridge the constitutional rights of any American citizens. The crisis was not resolved. The issue of Missouri's status upon its entrance into the Union was still vague.

The severity of the conflict was indeed colossal. One reason for the severity of the crisis hearkened to the Northwest Ordinance of 1787, which banned slavery north of the Ohio River. Since the nation's origins, it had been legally accepted that slavery would not be allowed north of the so-called Mason-Dixon divide, but Missouri was north of the line. A second, and more noteworthy, problem was political in nature. Since the passage of the Constitution, it had been accepted that in the Congress, there must exist equal representation. In other words, there must be the same number of free and slave states. In 1819, Alabama was admitted into the Union as a slave state, thus equalizing the proportion of free and slave states, at 11 free and slave states. The admission of Missouri as a slave state would offset the balance in the Congress. When Congress was dismissed in late 1819, the crisis still had not been resolved in toto.

When Congress reconvened in 1820, an opportunity emerged that would resolve the crisis. With the issue of Missouri lingering, the territory of Maine was prepared for admission into the Union. On January 3, 1820, the territory of Maine, which originated as the northern province of Massachusetts, passed an admissions bill. In 1820, there were two disconnected admission bills on the table: Missouri and Maine. After heated debate, the Congress, led by Henry Clay as well as Jesse B. Thomas, connected the two admission bills in what has become known as the Missouri Compromise.

Under the terms of the Missouri Compromise, the issue of admission and slavery were enjoined under one bill. First, the territory of Missouri was admitted as a slave state (or at least with no federal requirements regarding slavery). Second, the territory of Maine was admitted as a free state. In a controversial aspect of the compromise, the Louisiana territory was essentially divided at the 36°30' line. In the future, the status, free or slave, of any territory that applied for admission into the Union would be determined by the latitude line. A territory that was north of the line must be admitted as free, and a territory south of the line can be admitted as slave. The 36°30' line established a demarcation cord between the free North and the slave South.

After the passage of the compromise, politicians and citizens on both sides believed that peace had been achieved. In the long term, it established a dividing line within the national consciousness. More importantly, it politicized the nation on the issue of slavery for the next 30 years. The division between free and slave continued as the demarcation point until the 1854 passage of the Kansas-Nebraska Act, which specifically repealed the tenets of the 1820 Missouri Compromise.

Moral Uplift

Moral uplift, also known as racial uplift, describes the processes of moral, social, political, economic, and educational development through which African Americans believed they could create progress within African American communities throughout the United States—and achieve equality—during the 19th and 20th centuries. In the decades leading up to and after emancipation, African American advocates of moral uplift maintained that working toward and achieving social, political, and spiritual progress would help end oppression and bring about equality. Many supporters of uplift ideology believed that moral and racial uplift were naturally intertwined, and they often used the two terms interchangeably. Many argued that racial uplift meant achieving high spiritual goals and likewise that achieving racial progress meant spiritual progress. Additionally, they asserted that moral uplift would undermine and eventually eradicate white American racist attitudes about African Americans, specifically ideas that they were inherently licentious, unintelligent, lazy, culturally bereft, and sexually aggressive. Achieving these goals entailed acquiring education, maintaining a sound family life, and having pride in ownership of property. Although the idea of moral uplift in African American communities throughout the United States emerged prior to the American Civil War and the emancipation of African American slaves, it did not become a concrete possibility until the closing decades of the 19th century, when racial violence, legal segregation, political exclusion, and debt peonage gave it increasing urgency.

Led primarily by middle-class African American community members, the concept and practice of moral uplift fostered African American accommodation to white American mainstream values and behaviors as well as forging African American revolutionary thought and resistance to these mainstream values. Moral uplift for many of its advocates required its adherents to adapt and conform to the behavioral patterns and ethical values reflected in Euro-American Victorian culture. Victorian culture, which remained dominant from the late 19th century well into the 20th century, emphasized strict commitment to Protestant moral ethos of hard work, temperance, and prudence. For many other advocates, however, uplift meant utilizing strategies of self-help and self-improvement to develop social, political, and economic strength in African American communities and families. This entailed modifying negatively perceived behaviors, such as laziness, stealing, or sexual transgressions; it also entailed creating African American-owned and operated institutions, such as schools, women's clubs, and businesses, independent of white American control. Thus, as one of the few African American institutions free of white dominance and interference, churches became platforms for community leaders to convey messages of moral uplift through self-help and self-improvement. They were also the primary sources of community schools and uplift programs, as well as resources of large consumer bases for local and national African American businesses. In short, many African Americans learned the concept of moral uplift through their churches.

For many of its advocates, moral uplift also meant taking the responsibilities of freedom seriously and adapting to traditional gender roles within African American communities and families. Consequently, achieving racial uplift meant that African American men set good examples of manhood for others, acquired and maintained gainful employment, and assumed strong leadership roles in their communities and families. For African American women, achieving this same goal meant that they occupied roles as domestic and moral guardians, champions of high moral standards in and outside of the home. Conforming to these roles was a means of both uplifting the race and challenging notions of African American ineptitude and moral laxity. Nonetheless, conforming also restricted African American men and women and created tensions among the poor and middle class in African American communities.

Although the notion and praxis of moral uplift in African American communities fostered a sense of group unity, moral uplift leaders often projected racist attitudes that white Americans held about all African Americans onto poor African Americans, making moral uplift's message inconsistent with its practice. Consequently, moral uplift was often as divisive as it was harmonious within African American communities. Undergirding the arguments of many uplift spokespersons was the idea that not all African Americans were capable of achieving uplift outside of African American middle-class—often patriarchal—leadership. Indeed, many African American intellectuals, such as W. E. B. Du Bois, asserted that only a percentage of African Americans could achieve uplift through self-improvement. Furthermore, racist notions about poor African Americans buttressed the arguments of many uplift intellectuals and advocates. In particular, many moral uplift thinkers upheld the idea that that poor African Americans were irresponsible in the execution of their personal and civic duties.

One immediate result of the contradiction built into moral uplift was a shift in the nature of the concept from a phenomenon that focused on achieving group freedom and equality to one that focused increasingly on maintaining the high civilization of African American middle-class life. Another result of this paradox was the increasing isolation of the poor within African American communities. The shift in uplift ideals, and in the practice of uplift leaders, ultimately led to an increase of poor African American spiritual and secular institutions that promoted reactionary behavior to those championed by middle-class African Americans. Such institutions allowed poor African Americans to express themselves free of middle-class Victorian etiquette. Thus, as the 19th century came to an end, and the 20th century progressed, moral uplift proved a great paradox. Although it gave African Americans numerous strategies for combating white racism and working toward racial equality, it also served to exaggerate existing class divisions among African Americans.

Despite the problems inherent in moral uplift ideology, it manifested itself in various sectors of African American life, such as in educational institutions and policy, in politics, and in culture. Many proponents of moral uplift believed that education was integral to its success among African Americans. Education, therefore, became a crucial part of uplift traditions and training. Leaders in African American communities held that acquiring education was a way of creating opportunities for African Americans and a means of enabling them to rise out of poverty. Furthermore, many believed that education helped make African Americans better individuals and well-informed students. Accordingly, African American pedagogy became the impetus for a burgeoning intellectual class. Nonetheless, although many believed in the great contribution education could make to the uplift of African Americans, no cohesive plan existed among leaders as to how they might achieve this.

The clearest example of this is in the philosophical divide between the two most prominent thinkers of the late 19th and early 20th centuries—Booker T. Washington, ex-slave turned educator, writer, orator, and social and political leader, and William Edward Burghardt Du Bois, civil rights activist, public intellectual, educator, writer, and historian. Washington believed that the best way to achieve uplift through education was to provide students with industrial training—usually for jobs in domestic or public service. Training in agricultural practices and mechanics, he argued, would help earn the respect and trust of suspicious white Americans. Du Bois, however, contended that classical education was more appropriate, for it would prepare African American students for roles as future leaders of American society who could demand equal treatment from white Americans. Most African Americans found themselves on one side of this debate or the other. The debate over the role of education in moral uplift, however, was multilayered; it included many challenging and dissenting voices, in particular African American women, who argued that education—industrial or classical—should include female students as well and prepare them for leadership roles alongside their male counterparts. Conversely, many women argued that education for young African American women should reinforce their future roles in the home as wives and mothers.

Politics represents yet another area African Americans saw as central to achieving uplift. African American political thinkers, however, faced problems slightly different from those faced by proponents of either industrial or classical education. With the rise of more militant and violently aggressive opposition to African American struggles for equality, from the late 19th century well into the 20th, white Americans managed to exclude African Americans from the political arena. The use of lynching, rape, terrorism, and vigilante tactics against African Americans made participation in the political events around them virtually impossible. Even the threat of white violence against them, however, did not stop African Americans from attempting to participate in American political processes, nor did it stop African American intellectuals from maintaining a dialogue within their communities and without about prevention strategies and means of improving their plight through the political system.

Conversely, challenging voices also filled African American political life, and plans for producing moral uplift through political activity varied. Some African Americans argued that uplift was possible through the help of liberal white Americans, which sometimes entailed accommodating to patriarchal racist white attitudes or assimilation into white culture. Other African Americans rejected this idea and argued that self-help was the key to political success; white American help could too easily become control and interference. Likewise, issues of gender remained in the fore, as African American women increased their demands for greater participation and influence in the political sphere during the 20th century. Class division also complicated the push for uplift through politics, as middle-class African American leaders used uplift ideologies to exclude poor African Americans from leadership roles in many uplift organizations, just as they had used messages of uplift to degrade the poor and solidify their middle-class status.

Perhaps the most expansive area for the development of uplift ideology was within African American culture. Culture provided the greatest venue for uplift ideology, through art, poetry, music, language, television, and film. Messages of uplift continue to permeate African American culture, and the immensity of cultural artifacts allows for the modification of the notion of uplift to suit audiences that span various social, economic, religious, and political spectrums. Leaders in the cultural arena reflect the diversity of the African American community and reveal the blend of heterogeneous perceptions of moral uplift within that community. They also provide a portrait of the many challenging voices to ideals of racial and moral uplift within African American communities, as well as a unique take on those voices. Furthermore, culture provides a far greater, and indeed more complicated, resource for documented thought on racial uplift that stretches across social, political, and economic boundaries. In effect, the realm of culture represents the most comprehensive avenue for uplift ideology. It allows the greatest number of African Americans to voice their interpretations of the meanings of uplift. It has also provided, and continues to provide, a viable space for African Americans to shape and reshape the meanings of uplift over the course of their history.

Though moral uplift did not represent a perfect solution to gaining freedom and equality, it did generate a sense of cohesion among African Americans. It also provided numerous positions of leadership for both men and women in African American communities in the United States. Additionally, uplift ideology fostered the creation of African American–owned businesses and educational facilities, as well as social clubs, orders, sororities, and fraternities. Consequently, moral uplift has remained a resilient thread in African American social, political, religious, economic, and cultural history.

Nell, William Cooper

William Cooper Nell (1816–1874) was born in Boston, Massachusetts, where he became involved in the abolitionist cause alongside such men as Frederick Douglass and

William Lloyd Garrison. Nell is considered to be the first African American to produce scholarly history about African Americans. Nell's abolitionist advocacy and his interest in the history of African Americans were a direct result of his father, William G. Nell, a Revolutionary War veteran, and of the younger Nell's contact with African American activist David Walker. Nell Sr. was a tailor who ran a shop just a few doors down from David Walker's used clothing store in Boston. Both Nell Sr. and Walker were members of the General Colored Association of Massachusetts, an anti-slavery association founded in 1826.

Nell was educated at Boston's segregated Smith School, where he received an elementary education. He excelled as a student there and ended up qualifying for Boston's prestigious Franklin Medal for academic achievement. Unfortunately, Nell was denied this honor because of his race. He was allowed to attend the special dinner in honor of the recipients only as a waiter. This experience greatly affected Nell and fueled his desire to combat racial barriers.

Nell devoted much of his career to abolitionist and integrationist causes. In 1832, at the age of 16, Nell was the secretary of the Juvenile Garrison Independent Society, a group of African American youths dedicated to education, community service, and self-help. In 1849, Nell and other leading integrationists called a meeting to protest the reopening of the Smith School, Boston's segregated African American school. Throughout his life, Nell was a vocal and ardent integrationist. Ironically, this led Nell to condemn black-only institutions such as the Massachusetts General Colored Assembly, of which his father was a member.

Nell channeled his education into work as a copyist and editor, and he eventually became a journalist. His journalistic aspirations brought him into contact with renowned abolitionist William Lloyd Garrison. Nell became an errand boy for Garrison's Liberator and soon was made an apprentice copyist and printer. This experience was directed into a job as a reporter for Garrison's paper, and eventually, Nell became a close friend of Garrison. During this relationship, Nell became an ardent Garrisonian, espousing Garrison's use of moral suasion and nonviolent resistance. Nell also used his writing and editing skills to help Frederick Douglass with the publication of Douglass's newspaper, the North Star.

During the period of Nell's newspaper work, he developed a desire to produce a history of African American servicemen. Nell's determination to chronicle this history was fueled by poet John Greenleaf Whittier's published remarks to the National Era newspaper in July 1847, which expressed Whittier's regret and dismay that no attempt had been made to chronicle the history of African Americans who had served in the United States' wars. Despite the patriotism, loyalty, and bravery exhibited by these African American men, they had been neglected while their white compatriots had been lauded as heroes.

In response to this lament, Nell published, in 1851, a 24-page pamphlet titled Services of the Colored Americans in the Wars of 1776 and 1812. The second edition of this pamphlet, published the next year in 1852, was expanded to 40 pages. Finally, in 1855, the seeds of Nell's scholarly desire came to complete fruition, and he published the full-sized text: The Colored Patriots of the American Revolution: With Sketches of Several Distinguished Colored Persons: To Which Is Added a Brief Survey of the Condition and Prospects of Colored Americans.

Nell's history was the first African American history that utilized historical sources rather than relying solely on the Bible as a primary source (such as the histories written by black scholars such as Robert Benjamin Lewis and James W. C. Pennington). Nineteenth-century African American history was mostly composed of religious-themed polemics against white supremacy and justifications for African American emancipation. But Nell made auspicious use of historical documents and primary sources such as local and national newspapers, military records, and antislavery written works. Nell's historical interpretation still retained a contributionist character; it was designed to illuminate the contributions that African Americans had made to the United States in an effort to justify the emancipation and equal treatment of African Americans.

Nell died in 1874. He had faded into obscurity after the Civil War, having become a casualty of standing in the shadows of such prominent leaders as Garrison and Douglass. Although Nell was a powerful writer and orator himself, his natural humility never allowed him to take a more central role like the leaders with whom he had surrounded himself.

New York Draft Riots

The New York Draft Riots of July 1863 were a clear manifestation of the unpopularity of the American Civil War with the Northern poor. The riots also showed the clear bias of the conscription system toward the wealthy of society and reinforced the notion of "rich man's war, poor man's fight." Attacks on blacks were a clear sign of the difficulties that faced minorities as various ethnic and political groups fought over the lower-wage jobs. In addition, it also showed that the minorities and African Americans were continued targets for white dissatisfaction for political and economic reasons.

By 1863, the federal government had begun to look for new ways to increase enlistments in the Union Army. The Federal Militia Act of 1862 was expected to provide roughly 300,000 men for military service. Unfortunately, widespread opposition prevented the federal government from fully implementing its provisions. Northern states already used a bounty system to increase recruiting of their quota of regiments for military service. On March 3, 1863, President Abraham Lincoln signed the Enrollment Act. This act provided for the enrollment of all households within a congressional district by government agents. Then a lottery was held to see which men would be called up for military service. If enough men volunteered in a district, then the lottery was not held. Drafted men could obtain the services of a substitute to go in their place or pay $300 to exempt themselves from military service.

In New York, Governor Horatio Seymour, a Democrat, opposed the act and worked to prevent its implementation in the state. Many Democratic politicians within New York City opposed the national conscription act and continued to encourage popular support against it and the Republican administration of President Lincoln. In addition, anti-black violence was on the rise in Northern cities, especially in New York City. Freedmen, who worked for a lower wage, were replacing immigrant workers. Blacks were brought in to replace striking Irish dockworkers in June 1863, and police prevented the striking Irish workers from using mob violence against these replacements. In the same month, federal enrollment agents started working their way through the congressional districts in the city to enroll men for the first lottery.

On July 11, 1863, the first names of the lottery were drawn in the city. Unfortunately, at the same time, nearly all of the New York State National Guard (NYSNG) was out of the state; the regiments were deployed in Pennsylvania to cover portions of that state during the Gettysburg campaign. On July 13, riots broke out in response to the opening of the draft office. A large mob burned the draft office and looted stores and wealthy homes on Lexington Ave. The bottom floor of the New York Tribune was burned, and the Brooks Brothers store was attacked and looted by the crowd. Up to that point, the mob consisted of the poor of the city and was mainly German and Irish. The next day, the mob turned into more of an Irish mob and quickly focused on those minorities who they believed were taking their jobs and were the cause of the war itself. In short order, African Americans were being targeted within the city. Soon, individual blacks were being attacked on the street and lynched in daylight.

Rioters in New York City lynch an African American in July 1863, illustration from Harper's Weekly. The passage of the Union Conscription Act in March to recruit soldiers for the Union Army was a hugely unpopular act that led to violent riots in New York City. Many Southern sympathizers focused their attacks on abolitionists and African Americans. (Library of Congress)

Businesses that employed blacks were soon attacked by the mob, and their buildings were burned to the ground. Even the Colored Orphan Asylum was attacked and burned; fortunately, all the children were able to escape.

The New York City police attempted to control the crowds, but they were also attacked by mobs of men and women cruising the city streets. Republicans, policemen, wealthy individuals, and blacks all were assaulted on the streets by the mobs. The crowd overran one armory, and thereby the rioters gained weapons to fight police barricades and assault additional blocks of the city. In Pennsylvania, the deployed regiments of the NYSNG were ordered back to the city. U.S. Army regulars from Governor's Island were sent over to clear the streets with muskets with fixed bayonets. The provost marshal even requested the U.S. Navy to station an armed steamer near the business district and send ashore U.S. Marines to assist the police.

The arrival of the NYSNG regiments soon spelled the end of the riots in the city. Portions of numerous regiments were sent into the street to clear away barricades and return law and order to the streets. As a measure to calm the crowds, the draft lottery was ordered suspended within the city. By July 17, law and order was completely restored in the city. The next day, additional regiments from the Union Army of the Potomac arrived to help patrol the city. Over 1,000 fatalities occurred during the period of July 12–17, 1863, with $2 million of property damage.

Despite the fears over another citywide riot, conscription officials made plans to hold another draft for New York City in mid-August 1863. On August 17, the mayor and police commissioner requested the First Division, NYSNG, to be deployed to protect the draft locations and vital parts of the city. Maj. Gen. Charles W. Sandford deployed 13 regiments throughout the city. This time, no violence occurred during the draft, and General Sandford left his division deployed until mid-September 1863.

The riots of July 1863 were an indication of the problems that freedmen and other minorities experienced as they competed for the lower-wage jobs in the national economy. In addition, the extreme violence showed that the Northern cities remained a hotbed for Confederate support through political parties fighting over the voting strength of factions within the American melting pot.

Newsom, Celia

Celia Newsom (1836–1855), born into slavery in Missouri, was tried for the murder of her master in 1855, thus launching a little-known, yet significant challenge to the sexual exploitation of women that accompanied the American institution of slavery. Celia's case exemplifies the precarious position of slave women in a society that simultaneously viewed them as sexual objects and property with limited rights.

In 1850, at the age of 14, Celia was bought by farmer Robert Newsom, a widower with four adult children, of Callaway County, Missouri. Newsom purchased Celia the year following his wife's death and immediately established a sexual relationship with the 14-year-old by raping her during the journey home. Celia gave birth to two children, both fathered by Newsom, during her time on the Newsom family farm.

In the beginning of 1855, Celia commenced a relationship with a Newsom family slave named George. Shortly after the start of their relationship, Celia became pregnant with a child fathered by either George or Newsom. George informed Celia that he would end the relationship if she did not cease having sexual relations with Robert Newsom.

One afternoon in June 1855, Celia, ill with pregnancy-related symptoms and desiring to maintain her relationship with George, asked Newsom to stop having sexual relations with her. He refused to end the relationship, and she threatened to harm him if he visited her that evening. Celia later retrieved a stick to defend herself if he returned.

That night, Newsom returned to Celia's cabin. According to Celia, Newsom attempted to touch her and she hit him on the head with the stick she had saved. Newsom staggered toward the floor and raised his hands. Celia, assuming he was going to hurt her, hit him a second time. Newsom fell to the floor and died. Celia placed Newsom's body and the stick in the cabin fireplace. When the ashes finally cooled, she removed and hid the bones and disposed of a portion of the ashes.

The next morning, Celia solicited the help of Newsom's grandson to remove the ashes from her hearth. The grandson, unaware of the content of the ashes, complied. Meanwhile, Newsom's family formed a search party when they realized he was missing. Upon questioning, George suggested that Celia had information about Newsom's location. Celia, after steadfastly denying knowledge of Newsom's whereabouts throughout a threatening interrogation, offered a detailed confession.

On October 9, 1855, a judge and jury of 12 white men began hearing the case, The State of Missouri versus Celia, a Slave. Celia, on trial for her life, was not able to give evidence on her own behalf because Missouri state law prohibited slaves from testifying against whites. However, because of a state law requiring court-appointed counsel for slaves indicted for capital crimes, Celia received an attorney. Circuit court judge William Augustus Hall appointed defense attorneys John Jameson, Isaac N. Boulware, and Nathan Kouns to Celia's case. John Jameson, who was lead counsel in Celia's case, had a solid reputation in the community and was considered a competent attorney.

The defense team entered a plea of not guilty for Celia and subsequently employed three strategies to support their argument. First, the defense called an expert witness to challenge the physical evidence and suggest that the ill and pregnant teenaged Celia could not have carried out such a crime on her own. Second, Jameson presented a line of questioning to the prosecution and defense witnesses that established that Celia had been having a sexual relationship with Newsom since age 14, had asked him to stop, and had not intended to kill him but to merely hurt him so that he would cease the relationship and, finally, that she had stated that she hit Newsom a second time because he had thrown his hands up and she feared for her life. This testimony supported the argument that Celia killed Newsom when defending herself, which would lead to a manslaughter conviction and eliminate the potential for execution.

The prosecution objected to the defense's lines of questioning throughout the trial, and such objections were sustained by Judge Hall. After exhausting all lines of defense, Celia's counsel relied on the Missouri state law that permitted both sides of the case to submit special instructions for the judge to choose to present to the jury. Jameson, in an attempt to reduce the crime to manslaughter, desired to instruct the jury to consider Celia's motives and right of self-defense. Additionally, in an attempt to prove justifiable homicide, the defense instructed the jury that Missouri law permitted women to apply deadly force when protecting themselves against unwelcome sexual advances.

The prosecution objected to the defense's instructions and offered counter instructions that noted the evidence did not support the self-defense argument and stressed the fact that Celia was Newsom's property, and therefore he had the legal right to do as he pleased. The judge sustained the prosecution's objections and adopted its instructions. The jury sentenced Celia to hang.

Supporters helped Celia escape to a hideaway until her appeal could be heard. The appeal was rejected, and Celia was hanged on December 21, 1855.

Northern Slavery

Slavery in the North, traditionally demarcated by the Mason-Dixon line, separated two systems of slavery that functioned differently in a variety of ways including the type work slaves performed and the extent to which plantation slavery became entrenched in each region. These differences between North and South, supported by religious and philosophical principles such as Quakerism and the rhetoric of freedom from the Revolution, ultimately led

Northern states to decide for abolition through the legislative process during the first years of the new republic instead of adhering to slavery as the South did.

Northern slavery began with the importation of African slaves in 1626, when members of the Dutch West India Company settling in New Netherland diverted shipments of slaves from the West Indies. Although the Dutch had a plethora of land and resources, labor was the limiting factor in their colonization equation. Without a constant supply of white wage labor, the Dutch turned to slave labor. Slaves built roads and forts for defense, as well as cleared land for agriculture, providing a constant supply of food and defenses against British and Indian incursions.

Similar to the Dutch, Swedish colonists in southeastern Pennsylvania as well as English colonists in Massachusetts, Rhode Island, and Connecticut used slaves as substitutes for wage laborers. Bonded Africans soon made their appearance in Connecticut and Rhode Island in 1639, New Hampshire in 1645, and Massachusetts in 1637. The lack of substantial white populations, the availability of cheap land, and the desire of white settlers to own and farm land of their own combined to make wage labor on larger farms or for the public good extremely unpopular. The dearth of wage labor in the Northern colonies soon made slavery a popular and acceptable substitute measure. Therefore, the story of slavery in the North revolves around the availability of wage labor to farm even the most modest of fields.

Elite colonists typically bought slaves because they were able to afford a large capital outlay after they arrived from the West Indies (very rarely were there direct shipments from Africa because it was felt that unacclimated Africans were too dangerous). Those with larger farms or resources purchased slaves primarily for agricultural labor. However, slaves expanded their presence in colonial society by becoming coopers, blacksmiths, shoemakers, carpenters, and other types of artisans. Slaves also became essential for the burgeoning iron and the New England shipbuilding industries.

After the acceptance of slaves outside of their traditional agricultural roles, slave owners began to hire out slaves for wages. Owners received a constant income from their investment while simultaneously retaining access to the slave during harvest season. Hiring out slaves allowed farmers to recoup the losses they had previously taken when their slaves sat idle during off-peak growing times.

This dilemma was especially felt in the North as compared to the South because the crops slaves helped grow (wheat, millet, barley, flax, corn, vegetables, and apples) were not as valuable economically as the rice, cotton, or tobacco of the South. In addition, because the typical slave of the North grew wheat on a medium-size farm, his economic output was substantially smaller than that of slaves in the South, and thus slave owners had to find a way for slaves to increase their income potential; therefore, the hiring out system became popular.

Because slavery never became associated with cash crop production, remaining a substitute system for wage labor, the slave population in the Northern colonies never matched that of the South. On the eve of the American Revolution, Massachusetts had 5,249 slaves, constituting just 1.55 percent of the state's population, and New Hampshire's slave population accounted for only .93 percent of their population. Rhode Island and Connecticut's slave population were the largest in New England, 5.46 percent and 3.27 percent, respectively, and New York housed the largest slave population, representing 13.42 percent of its population. New Jersey had 6.2 percent of its population classified as slave, and Pennsylvania had .86 percent.

Although the economic roles and numbers of slaves in the North were vastly different from Southern society, their treatment was not. "Black codes" prescribing the legal basis of slavery and regulating the system employed were passed during the late 17th century across the North. New York's slave codes were particularly harsh, mandating severe punishments for criminal offenses and legally defining who qualified as a slave under the law. Treatment at the level of master and slave also mirrored the South, although with significant variance based on the master. Whipping, castration, and death were mechanisms masters frequently employed against disobedient slaves. Maltreatment caused slaves to rebel through a variety of means: work stoppages, running away, or open revolt. Northern farmers noted that without constant supervision, slaves would not complete farm work, and newspaper ads routinely advertised for the return of fugitive slaves. In regard to open revolt, organizing any structured rebellion was difficult in the North because the average slave owner owned only one or two slaves. Large holdings that created an independent slave culture were nonexistent in the North. Therefore, organizing a revolt usually occurred in an urban environment. Two revolts of note occurred in New York City in 1712 and 1741.

In each, slaves conspired to murder their masters but were eventually stopped and apprehended by the white colonial establishment. Twenty-one slaves were executed after killing nine whites during the 1712 revolt, which also produced a harsher state slave code in 1714, and 11 slaves were executed after the 1741 revolt.

The American Revolution dramatically changed the shape of slavery in the Northern colonies. The outbreak of war fueled abolitionist sentiment in the North that had been present since the mid-1700s. The largest group of anti-slavery supporters was the Quakers. Quakers had outlawed slaveholding among their own members by the mid-1700s and determined a noble task would be to rid the United States of the evil institution. Quaker activism helped to introduce numerous bills into the colonial legislatures and began the attack on slavery. Quakers initially lobbied for better treatment for slaves, for ending the importation of Africans into the colonies, and for the end of stringent requirements for manumitting slaves, which in most colonies required a slave owner to post a bond as high as 200 pounds as well as pay a yearly supplement in order to free a slave, leading many slave owners to choose to keep their slaves instead of manumitting them.

The outbreak of the American Revolution caused a new brand of abolitionist spirit that joined with Quakerism to fight for black freedom. Rhetoric touting that the relationship between slavery and freedom was the same as between the American colonies and Great Britain soon galvanized a share of the population to question the suitability of fighting for freedom while at the same time enslaving another race. The first state to emancipate its slave population did so not by a vote of the legislature but by judicial review. In September 1781, Quok Walker, a slave, sued his master to gain his freedom because slaves in Massachusetts had equal access to the judiciary. Quaker support for Walker as well as Boston's leading position in the independence movement led the state supreme court to declare that slavery was inconsistent with the state constitution, therefore ending slavery without legislative action.

Connecticut voted to end slavery next when, in January 1784, legislators revised all of their state laws and unknowingly voted on part of a revised statute that included a provision for the gradual emancipation of slavery when newborn slaves reached the age of 25. The legislature did not repeal the act because legislative activism on the slavery issue over the prior 15 years had galvanized many against the continuance of slavery. The fact that Rhode Island passed a gradual emancipation bill in February 1784 with the assistance of Quakers also helped Connecticut to continue its plan for abolition. Rhode Island voted to grant freedom to those born to slaves after March 1, 1784, although the state had previously granted freedom to any slave volunteering to fight in the state militia during the Revolution. New Hampshire, through a complicated legislative process, had essentially limited slavery's expansion by the early 1790s. Thus, by 1795, abolition had begun across New England.

Although the majority of the abolitionist sentiment in the North centered on New England, Pennsylvania vied with Massachusetts as the leader in Northern abolition. Philadelphia, the largest center of Quaker activism in the United States, pressured the rest of Pennsylvania to support abolition ahead of her neighbors: New York and New Jersey. Coupled with the rhetoric of freedom stemming from the Revolution, the Pennsylvania legislature passed a gradual emancipation bill in 1780. Although Pennsylvania slaveholders were compensated with the allowance that they could any newborn slaves until they were 28 years old, legislators realized that any loss of labor could be compensated with wage labor from the immigration boom legislators thought would occur after the Revolution. Thus, emancipation in Pennsylvania resulted not only from the support of Quakers and the Enlightenment idea of freedom, but also from an examination of the economic situation in the state. Economic factors coupled with racism led to the failure of advocates of complete abolition in the state legislature in 1800; however, by 1820, only 211 slaves remained in the state, and by 1840, slavery had completely disappeared within Pennsylvania's borders.

Abolition did not come as easily in New York and New Jersey as it did in Pennsylvania or New England. The year 1784 saw the defeat of a New York abolition bill based primarily on economic grounds by Dutch planters in the lower Hudson Valley. After that defeat, New York Quakers allied with the newly formed New York Manumission Society to introduce another abolition bill in 1785. Although the lobbying efforts of the Manumission Society and the Quakers again failed to pass an abolition program, they succeeded in easing voluntary manumission requirements as well as prohibiting the importation of any further slaves into the state. After another intense lobbying campaign, New York passed a gradual emancipation law to take effect on July 4, 1799. Any child born to a slave after that date would be free after 28 years of indenture for men and 25 years for women. Key to the passage of the emancipation bill was a compensated abolition program that allowed slaveholders to abandon their slaves' newborn children to the care of the state. After the abolition of slavery across the North, New York emancipated all slaves born before July 4, 1799, as of July 4, 1827. On July 4, 1827, slavery in New York finally died.

New Jersey, the last Northern state to enact a gradual emancipation program, had, along with New York, the longest relationship with slaves. Dutch settlers from New York had crossed the Hudson River and settled in the eastern half of New Jersey in the mid-1600s, establishing an agricultural economy based on slavery. The western half of New Jersey developed a wage-based economic system primarily because of the large landless population. This, coupled with influence from the heavy Quaker population based in Philadelphia, meant west Jersey had few slaves. New Jersey passed a gradual emancipation bill that took effect on July 4, 1804. The bill essentially provided the same provisions as the New York plan; however, New Jersey never passed a complete abolition program as in New York. Slavery existed in New Jersey until the passage of the 13th Amendment (which New Jersey initially rejected) in 1865, which ended the slave experience in the North.

Northup, Solomon

Solomon Northup (1808–1863), a free African American native of New York, was kidnapped into slavery in 1841 and spent 12 years in captivity. His autobiographical memoir, Twelve Years a Slave, recounts his capture, transportation, and life as a slave. Long recognized for its comprehensive detail and accuracy, Northup's remarkable chronicle of his experience is an unusually candid portrait of slave life in the antebellum American South.

Solomon Northup was born in Essex County, New York, in 1808. The freeborn son of former slave Mintus Northup, young Solomon was raised on a farm in Sandy Hill, Washington County, where his father worked as a laborer. Crediting his father with instilling virtues of industry and integrity, Northup later drew upon these values to critique slavery. Upon Mintus's death in 1829, Northup married Anne Hampton, a quadroon domestic worker from Sandy Hill. In order to support their new household, Northup cut and repaired canals, chopped wood, worked the railroad, and cultivated a small farm. Eager to distinguish himself, he also gained notoriety as a skilled fiddle player. Using money earned through Solomon's musical engagements and Anne's work as a cook, the couple moved to Saratoga Springs, New York, where they resided with their three children until Northup's capture in 1841.

Northup's harrowing journey into slavery began in March 1841, when he accepted employment as a musician in a traveling circus based in Washington, D.C. Believing he was protected by recently acquired free papers and his close association with his white employers, he arrived ready for work with only mild apprehensions. During his second night in the capital, however, the promise of his journey abruptly ended. He found himself drugged and chained in a dark room, which he soon discovered was the cell of a Washington slave pen. From the pen, he was taken via steamboat to Virginia and then Louisiana, where he would spend the duration of his captivity.

The intimate account of his kidnapping and transportation, especially his detailed portrait of bondsmen and women spirited away from their homes and families, demonstrates the physical and psychological strain that accompanied forced migration from plantations along the East Coast to the cotton and sugar fields of the Southwest. Slaves such as Eliza, a slave mother divided from her two children, and Lethe, a bondswoman separated from her husband, shared their horrific stories as they collectively prayed to be freed from suffering. In speaking as a free man who described the slave experience from within, Northup's observations provide an unusually objective, yet personal view of the internal slave trade.

Northup's experiences as a newly enslaved man along the low and marshy lands of the Red River offer similar insight. Like his fellow bondsmen and women, Northup participated in various occupations, ranging from "sunup to sundown" cotton picking to the skilled occupations of carpentry and music. During the early years, he experienced kindness from fellow slaves, who shared the joys of holiday and community and the sorrows of servitude. But he also maintained his distance, never confiding in his fellow bondsmen and women that he was a free man, fearing that they would betray his secret, and he would be sold further west.

His relationships with white superiors were similarly complex. Whether operating under a kind or unjust master, he constantly sounded a similar note: the system of slavery was corrupt. Indeed, as a slave he worked under masters and overseers across the bayou, some of whom he remembered fondly, others with abhorrence. The tension between slave and free came to a climax for Northup when he struck his master during an attempted whipping. The altercation would have resulted in Northup's death by hanging, if local whites had not interceded.

With the help of friends from Saratoga, Solomon Northup regained his freedom in 1853 after 12 years a slave.

Overseers

The overseer played a vital role in the operation of slavery in the American South from the colonial era through the Civil War. With the exception of the planter, no other figure in the hierarchy of the plantation system was more responsible for the success or failure of plantation agriculture than the overseer, whose primary responsibility was to manage and maintain the plantation's most valuable resource, its slaves. Overseers used the whip, the stocks, beatings, the gun, and the noose to maintain slave obedience, punish rebelliousness, and inspire fear. At the same time, overseers were required to encourage slave morale to promote productivity. An overseer often had to curry the slaves' favor in order to ensure his own employment, which depended on the planter's assessment of the overseer's ability to keep order, produce profits, and maintain the slaves' well-being. The longevity of large-scale plantation agriculture in the colonial and antebellum South would not have been possible without the overseer.

Because the typical Southern slave owner in the antebellum South owned fewer than five slaves, most slave owners had no need to employ an overseer. Of the approximately 4 million slaves in the South in 1860, only one-fourth lived on plantations that owned 50 or more slaves. Overseers were rarely employed on plantations or farms that held fewer than 30 slaves. The number of overseers in the seven leading Southern slaveholding states in 1860 was 37,883.

On those plantations that did employ overseers, the overseer usually had the authority to inflict severe punishments on slaves for the slightest infraction of work discipline as well as the power to intrude in every aspect of their daily lives. Overseers could whip a slave for any number of trivial or serious offenses. Many overseers tried to gain sexual favors from female slaves, who might be beaten or raped if they refused the overseer's advances. The overseer's role as enforcer of the planter's rule over the plantation's slave population made the overseer the most prominent representative of the violence that was inherent in the Southern slave system.

The value of overseers to the operation of slavery was never more apparent than during the Civil War, when service in the Confederate Army required that most able-bodied Southern white males be away from their farms and plantations for long periods of time. Heightened fear of slave uprisings and the need to maintain crop production convinced most planters that overseers should be exempted from military service. An amendment to the Confederate Conscription Act of April 1862 exempted one white male for every plantation that held 20 or more slaves. This exemption provoked outrage among poor and middle-class whites, who believed that their fathers and sons were fighting while wealthy planters and their overseers stayed at home. Popular outcry against the "Twenty Negro Law" forced the Confederate Congress to impose tighter restrictions on which plantations and overseers could be exempted.

Eventually, the advance of Union armies combined to undermine the authority of the overseers who remained at work on Southern plantations. Slaves became more insubordinate and ran away in ever-increasing numbers with the approach of Union troops. Although most overseers escaped any form of punishment, some captured overseers were forced to work for the Union Army, and a few died at the hands of angry slaves and avenging freedmen. The fall of the Confederacy meant an end to slavery and an end to the peculiar role of the overseer in Southern history.

Patrollers

Patrollers were white citizens who composed slave patrols, groups that roamed the Southern countryside and cities in search of slaves, free blacks, and suspicious whites. Slave patrols preserved slavery by limiting the activities of slaves, inhibiting runaways, and making sure that slaves did not challenge the terms of their enslavement to any significant degree. They were racially focused law enforcement groups composed of slaveholders and non-slaveholders alike.

The slave patrol had its origins in the Caribbean, principally Barbados. When Barbadians immigrated to the North American colonies, they brought the system of slave patrols with them. Most of the early patrollers were drawn from the militia, and it seems that the slave patrol system fused fear over slave rebellion with concern over a Spanish invasion into an organization designed to buttress the slave regime. South Carolina created the first official slave patrol system in 1704, and other colonies quickly fell in line.

A host of laws governed the activities of slave and patrollers. In the American South, African Americans were assumed to be slaves unless they could prove otherwise. All slaves had to carry passes if they were to travel beyond their master's household or plantation. Slave patrols were designed to enforce these laws. Southern states typically mandated patrol duty for white males, and it came to be seen as an inconvenient venture like jury duty. Eventually, the local government appointed patrollers, scheduled them, created territories or "beats" for the various patrol groups, and punished shirkers.

Most patrollers were middle-class taxpayers; about one-half owned slaves, although most patrollers owned fewer than five bondservants. Almost all patrol captains were slave owners and typically owned more slaves than average. The patrol system mirrored Southern society in its structure and designation of power, as large slaveholders tended to control both. Plantation owners often "treated" the men of their patrol with dinner and drinks before going into the field. Slave patrols built a sense of camaraderie and social interaction in the participants because most patrollers knew each other and were assigned to familiar terrain.

Patrollers typically were on duty during nighttime hours and particularly on weekends, when slaves were more active in moving about the countryside. Before going on duty, they took temporary oaths as agents of the city or county. In the country, patrollers rode on horseback and carried guns, whips, and ropes. In the city, they walked their beats and were less conspicuous. Patrollers checked slave passes, tracked runaways if any were reported, dispersed clandestine slave meetings, and searched slave quarters for contraband. They had the authority to arrest slaves on the spot and send them to the local jail for further examination.

The potential for abuse of the patrol system was tremendous. Slaves remembered how patrollers might whip men for no good reason or simply harass bondservants for amusement. Slaves countered the patrollers' power in many ways. Bondservants knew the typical "beat" routes and avoided them when moving about the countryside. A well-forged pass also provided a measure of protection for slaves. Violence in response to patrollers was rare, but not unheard of.

Patrollers were vital to preserving slavery by instilling a sense of dread expectation in slaves. Bondservants thought twice before running away because a patroller might be on duty in the next county. It appears that patrollers also maintained their activities after the Civil War. The Ku Klux Klan adopted the methods and activities of the patrollers and even replicated patrol “beats” in its efforts to inhibit African American political and social activism.

Payne, Daniel

Daniel Alexander Payne (1811–1893) was one of the most important figures in the 19th-century African Methodist Episcopal Church and was the first black president of Wilberforce College. Born free in Charleston, South Carolina, Payne was the son of mixed-race parents, London and Martha Payne, who died when he was young but still provided for his education. After completing two years at Minor’s Moralistic Society School in Charleston, Payne, always a voracious student, was tutored by Thomas Bonneau, a prominent free African American in Charleston. Payne ran his own day school for free African Americans in Charleston—as well as a less formal night school for slaves—between 1829 and 1835, when South Carolina passed laws prohibiting such efforts.

Payne moved North soon after, stopping first in New York City, where he met Rev. Peter Williams Jr., the Tappan brothers, and a number of other early abolitionists. These interactions arguably marked the beginning of Payne’s more politicized and activist faith. Though he had joined the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1826, he chose to study at the Lutheran seminary at Gettysburg, Pennsylvania, was licensed to preach in 1837, and was formally ordained by the Franklin Synod of the Lutheran Church two years later. Poor health limited his studies, and racist hesitation to assign him a parish curtailed his preaching. Thus, Payne once again turned to teaching and founded a school for young African Americans in Philadelphia. In 1841, he joined the African Methodist Episcopal Church (AME), for whom he traveled extensively and served congregations in Baltimore and Washington, D.C. Payne’s desires for both a highly educated clergy and a more formal church structure chafed some of his parishioners and some AME leaders. Further, his health—various respiratory ailments and problems with his sight—continued to trouble him at times, and in what he later referred to as a time of “trouble and affliction,” he suffered the death of his first wife (Julia Ferris, whom he married in 1847) and their infant daughter. Nonetheless, in 1848, he was appointed the AME historian, and by 1850, he had helped bring about sweeping changes within the AME Church hierarchy that included creating a clearly articulated course of study for all ministers, more formalized record-keeping, greater attention to publications, more services, and a greater attention to expanding AME efforts in the West. He was elected an AME bishop at the church’s 1852 General Conference after being selected by Bishop William Paul Quinn to give the conference’s opening sermon.

In the 1850s, Payne crisscrossed the North (including Canada)—and even occasionally visited the Upper South—advocating for African American faith, education, and civil rights. His book of poetry Pleasures and Other Miscellaneous Poems appeared in 1850, and he was a key figure in founding and funding the Indianapolis-based AME quarterly the Repository of Religion and Literature and of Science and Art, which first appeared in 1858 and which regularly contained contributions from Payne. He lectured and preached extensively, mentored younger ministers (ranging from Elisha Weaver to Thomas M. D. Ward to Alexander Wayman), greatly expanded AME missionary efforts, and continued to support both church record-keeping and publication—including working on his own History of the African Methodist Episcopal Church. In 1853, he married Eliza Clark of Cincinnati; they moved to Tawawa Spring, Ohio—near Wilberforce—three years later.

His place within the AME hierarchy secure, Payne continued to expand his national reach during and after the Civil War. In 1863, he led efforts to purchase Wilberforce, a small college in Ohio that had been founded seven years earlier by the Methodist Episcopal Church. Payne served as the institution’s president until 1876, continued to be active in its administration long after, and made the school a model for other historically black colleges. His fund-raising efforts—first to purchase Wilberforce and then to rebuild it after arson devastated the school in 1865—were massive. At the war’s end, he traveled south with a delegation of AME ministers; this extended tour led to the formation of the AME’s South Carolina Conference in 1865 and marked the church’s first efforts toward a major expansion in the South. In 1866, Payne published some of the work that would eventually make up his History as the Semi-Centenary and the Retrospection of the African Methodist Episcopal Church.

During this period, Payne worked with most of the national African American leaders of the time, beginning a long friendship with, among others, Frederick Douglass.

During the final decades of his life, Payne's role became more focused on being the AME Church's elder statesman and chronicler. His Treatise on Domestic Education appeared in 1886, followed by his autobiography Recollections of Seventy Years in 1888 and his History in 1891. His role at Wilberforce shifted to chancellor and dean of the Theological School (which eventually separated from Wilberforce and was later named for him). He attended international religious conferences in 1868 and 1881 and helped open the World Parliament of Religions at the 1893 Columbian Exposition in Chicago. He died at home only a few weeks after his speech at the exposition. The January 25, 1894, Christian Recorder eulogized him as a truly great man, and the AME Church instructed all congregations to set aside time to memorialize him at their January 28, 1894, services.

Pennington, James William Charles

James William Charles Pennington (1807/09–1871) was an abolitionist, activist, expertly trained blacksmith, educator, and historian and a Congregational, Presbyterian, and African Methodist Episcopal minister. Born into slavery on Maryland's Eastern Shore in Queen Ann's County, Pennington was originally given the name James Pembroke. At the age of four, he, his brother, and his mother were given to the son of his master, who moved to Washington County in the western part of the state, 200 hundred miles away from his father.

Pennington made his decision to escape slavery in 1827. After arriving in Pennsylvania in his early twenties, he changed his name. He spent several months studying under a Quaker teacher who took him in and taught him to read and write, and by the early 1830s, he had gained fair proficiency in Greek and Latin. Then he moved to New York City, where he continued his education. Eventually, he studied theology and became a pastor.

In 1831, Brooklyn activists elected him a delegate to the first annual General Convention for the Improvement of the Free Colored People, held in Philadelphia, founded by AME Church bishop Richard Allen in 1830. He was again elected a delegate from 1832 to 1834. In early 1833, he took a position for $200 a year as the teacher of a segregated school for Africans in New Town, Long Island, seven miles from his Brooklyn home. During 1834, he moved to Long Island, where he continued to pursue an education in night school.

On September 15, 1838, as a 31-year-old minister, Pennington conducted the wedding of the 21-year old refugee Frederick Douglass and his bride Anna Murray, a free woman of Baltimore, in New York City, just shortly after Douglass had escaped, with his bride's help, from enslavement in Maryland's Eastern Shore. Pennington, like Douglass, advocated independently run and controlled African seminaries, manual labor, and normal schools until desegregation in the Northern United States could be achieved. He thought that the colored people ought to do their part in educating men with the whites. The white people established schools for black and white; why should not the colored people start schools and workshops for white and black?

In addition to his involvement in the American Anti-Slavery Society, he became an advocate of African American abolitionist and religious organizations. An evangelical Christian, Pennington tied his work as an abolitionist to his Christian commitment. After some years, he moved to New Haven, Connecticut, in 1834 to pursue theological studies in preparation for the Christian ministry. Because he was African, Yale's School of Divinity refused to enroll him as a regular student. Officials did allow him to attend lectures, but they did not permit him to participate in classes or to borrow books from the library. He successfully completed his training and qualified for the ministry, returned to Brooklyn in 1837, and received his ordination and license in 1838.

One year later, in 1839, he became the pastor of the newly formed African Congregational Church in New Town. In 1840, he left for Hartford, Connecticut, to become pastor of Talcott Street Colored Congregational Church. He was twice elected president of the Hartford Central Association of Congregational ministers, a body composed exclusively of Europeans. He also became a teacher at Hartford's Free African School. In 1848, he left Hartford to take up the highly prestigious pastorate of the First Colored Presbyterian Church in New York City.

From 1847 through 1855, Pennington served as pastor of Shiloh Presbyterian Church, one of the most respected African American Presbyterian congregations in the United States. During the 1840s and 1850s, Pennington held pastorates in African Congregational churches in Newtown, Long Island; Hartford, Connecticut; and New York City.

On September 8, 1841, he met with William Cooper Nell, David Ruggles, and John B. Vashon to organize the first annual convention of the American Reform Board of Disfranchised Commissioners, a radical organization in New York City that advocated for black male suffrage. And he became the founder and president of the Union Missionary Society in 1843 (which later became the American Missionary Society), an African-led organization created to evangelize Africa, Jamaica, and other parts of the world. Pennington also advocated for African emigration from the United States to Jamaica. His work as head of the American Missionary Society launched him into national and international prominence and led to his nomination to the World Anti-Slavery Convention in London, England, at which he represented Connecticut in 1843. While in Europe he called for international pressure against the American enslaver regime and a boycott of all enslaver-produced American goods. He also denounced apartheid caste discrimination against non-enslaved Africans in the Northern United States. Later he was nominated the vice president of the National Convention of Colored Americans and Their Friends, which was held in Troy, New York, on October 6, 1847.

Some of his publications include his 1841 A Text Book of the Origin and History of Colored People, one of the first history textbooks for African American teachers, designed to meet the needs of teachers, such as himself, who were dedicated to the inspiration as well as instruction of African Americans. In it he asserted the African origin of ancient Kemetic civilization and the Kushite origin of Africans in the United States. He also argued against European claims to superiority and established the African origins of western European civilization. In 1849, he authored an autobiographical memoir of slavery, The Fugitive Blacksmith, or Events in the History of James W. C. Pennington, Pastor of a Presbyterian Church in New York, Formerly a Slave in the State of Maryland, United States (1849). Pennington kept his status as a runaway slave secret until he published his autobiography. A few of his sermons and addresses were published as pamphlets.

In 1850, he traveled to Europe, where he remained until Scottish friends purchased his freedom for $150 the following year. In that same year, the University of Heidelberg in Germany awarded him an honorary doctorate of divinity. He also attended the second World Peace Congress in Paris with fellow African abolitionist William Wells Brown and agreed with Brown that enslavement was a form of war against Africans, although he opposed armed struggle. Pennington insisted on the use of moral power and arbitration in international and other conflicts. He argued, however, that slavery, as a system, threatened world peace and must be eliminated. He also urged international economic boycotts of American commodities produced by enslaved African labor. With abolitionist Henry Highland Garnet, he also attended the World Peace Congress in Frankfurt, Germany, where he again urged international cooperation in the struggle against enslavement in the United States and the boycotting of American slave-produced goods. By the time he left Britain, he had become a leading figure in the international abolition, peace, and temperance movements.

Pennington's fame as the author of The Fugitive Blacksmith, an international antislavery lecturer, and a New York City civil rights leader caused Harriet Beecher Stowe to single him out in Uncle Tom's Cabin (1852) as an exemplary figure in the free African American community.

By 1853 he had also become a leading figure in the United States and the pastor of the largest African Presbyterian church in the country. That year, he was elected president of the National Free Colored People's Convention in Rochester—Douglass's base of operations—at which 140 delegates from eight states attended. He was also heavily involved in New York City's covert and illegal smuggling and relocation of African escapees from the enslaver dictatorships of the Southern states.

Pennington's reputation became damaged by accusations of misappropriation of funds, a bout with alcoholism in the 1850s, and vigorous opposition from abolitionist supporters. Garrisonians felt competitive with Pennington over contributions received and envious of his stature in national and international abolitionism. These issues received considerable attention in the 1850s, but in 1854, Pennington suffered a more devastating blow. His brother, Stephen, and his two nephews were captured as fugitive slaves. Although Pennington raised enough money to purchase their freedom, his nephews had already been sold into bondage in the Deep South.

Even so, Pennington remained politically active. In 1855, Pennington appeared before the Colored National Council and advocated for education. Later that year, he became active in the desegregation movement after he was ejected from a public streetcar in New York City for failing to comply with segregated seating requirements. When he complained to police, Pennington was arrested and jailed, only to have the charges later dismissed. He later formed the Legal Rights Association (LRA) in New York City with the physician Dr. James McCune Smith, who was trained at the University of Glasgow in Scotland, and the Rev. Henry Highland Garnet. The LRA fought to end segregation in public accommodations, taking up cases of African Americans forced off public streetcars until the Civil War. Instead of armed resistance, he proposed forgiveness and the endurance of wrong. But during the Civil War, he reversed himself, advocating African American support of, and enlistment in, the armed struggle. After problems in New York City that took a toll on African Americans lives, and threats to his wife's safety from Europeans, from mostly Irish Catholic ruffians, he, like African nationalists a century later, argued for the study of the use of weapons and the right of self-defense.

Pennington returned to England and in 1861 edited and published the autobiography of J. H. Banks titled A Narrative of Events in the Life of J. H. Banks, an Escaped Slave, from the Cotton State of Alabama in America. Banks, who was living in Liverpool, had escaped from enslavement in Alabama. Pennington visited England three times during his career and lectured in London, Paris, and Brussels.

At the end of the Civil War, Pennington broke from the Presbyterians and joined the Missouri conference of the AME Church because of his impatience with the former's reluctance to get involved with uplift efforts for the freed Africans. He served in Mississippi with the AME Church. In the 1860s, he traveled, under the Congregationalists, to Portland, Maine, and under the Presbyterians to Jacksonville, Florida, where he died.

Poor, Salem

Born into slavery, Salem Poor (ca. 1750–?) was a celebrated hero of the American Revolution. In 1769, he bought his freedom for £27, a year's salary for a 1700s working-class person. He married Nancy, a free African American woman, and they had one son. Under the command of Gen. George Washington, Salem Poor was one of the Minutemen present at the Battle of Bunker Hill in Massachusetts and in the battles at Valley Forge, Pennsylvania; White Plains, New York; and Monmouth, New Jersey. Of the approximately 30 to 103 other African Americans at Bunker Hill with Poor, those named were the following: (1) Seasor and Pharaoh of Col. James Scamman's York County Regiment of Foot (infantry), who were among the troops who received the now legendary order "Don't fire until you see the whites of their eyes"; (2) Barzillai Lew of Chelmsford, a cooper (barrel maker) prior to the war who became a fifer and was already a veteran of the French and Indian War; and (3) Cuff Whittemore, who survived a musket ball shot through his hat and scavenged the sword of a British officer. With Poor at Valley Forge was the 1st Rhode Island Regiment, which included 150 to 300 African Americans; one-fourth of the troops at White Plains, New York, were African American.

History credits Poor with killing British Lt. Col. James Abercrombie at Bunker Hill on June 17, 1775. Six months later, on December 5, 1775, 14 of the officers under whom Poor served petitioned the Massachusetts General Court to recognize Poor for his bravery in that battle. Of the 2,000 to 4,000 patriots present at Bunker Hill, no one else (white or African American) received this honor. Unfortunately, no record exists that he ever received the commendation, and history does not record what became of him after the war.

Although there was no commendation, Poor received accolades later. On July 4, 1876, in a speech for America's Centennial, George Washington Williams remembered Salem Poor, Peter Salem, and all the African American troops at Bunker Hill. In early July 1927, a call went out that July 17, 1927, should be declared "Peter Salem Day," to observe the anniversary of the Battle of Bunker Hill and to honor both Salem and Poor for their exploits that day. The National Equal Rights League issued the call via an advertisement in the Chicago Defender (the largest African American newspaper of the time). America again invoked the name of Salem Poor for the Bicentennial. The U.S. Post Office honored him with a postage stamp on May 25, 1975, as part of the 1976 Bicentennial Series. Though court officials of the period ignored his service, modern-day federal workers recognized the "brave and gallant" soldier.

Port Royal Experiment

The Port Royal Experiment is the term given to a humanitarian effort begun in South Carolina in late 1861 to determine whether former slaves would be self-sufficient, to test the theory that free labor was more viable than slave labor, and to prepare former bondsmen for emancipation and eventual citizenship in the United States.

On November 7, 1861, a fleet of U.S. Naval ships engaged the Confederate position at Port Royal Sound in Beaufort County, South Carolina. The ensuing battle, called the Battle of Port Royal, was a swift and decisive victory for the Union war effort. The Confederate retreat left the Union in control of this coastal area and the adjacent region, referred to as the Sea Islands, for the duration of the Civil War. As a result of the battle, most of the white residents, including the planter families, evacuated and left behind the vast majority of their slave workforce. On this newly vacated land, which counted roughly 50 plantation properties, were estimated an 8,000 to 10,000 individuals who had recently been held in slavery.

Federal officials experienced grave concern over such a large number of slaves suddenly within their lines. Part of the concern was humanitarian; with the traditional social structure upset, and a large federal force garrisoning in the area, there was the potential for a severe shortage of food, medicine, and clothing. Another issue stemmed from political considerations. President Lincoln's government was not yet ready to take the step of emancipation, for fear of public dissent, but neither did they wish to return the slaves to their masters, where their labor could be exploited to aid the Confederate war effort. As a result, the decision was made to follow a precedent set earlier in the Civil War, and the abandoned slaves were declared "contrabands of war" or simply "contrabands." Another concern was financial; at the time of the Union occupation, a sizable crop of Sea Island cotton, a lucrative commodity denied Northern business since the outbreak of hostilities, was currently in harvest. An attempt to salvage the cotton and return the profit to the government coffers had to be made. The U.S. Department of the Treasury, headed by Secretary Salmon P. Chase, was given jurisdiction over matters relating to abandoned enemy property and thus over the contrabands and the cotton.

In late 1861 and early 1862, Secretary Chase sent several Treasury agents into the region to assess the contraband situation and attend to the cotton interest. The capture of Port Royal and plight of the slaves had made national news. Fearful for the slaves' welfare, a New York American Missionary Association sent their own representative to gather information. After receiving suggestions from these various parties, Chase decided to back a cooperative venture between the government agencies and Boston and New York philanthropic organizations. The contrabands were placed back into the fields, tasked with harvesting the Sea Island cotton, and were provided wages for their labor. The federal officials' focus was on the cotton crop, and the civilian volunteers agreed to provide such services as public education; both sectors would continue to supply material necessities as able.

In March 1862, a steamer transported the first wave of Northern volunteers into the area; they were from Boston and New York and were called "Gideonites" by the Union soldiers. Although this was meant as a derogatory term, the name has become nearly synonymous with their goodwill efforts. With limited resources and limited support, these volunteers began to establish or organize free school and churches for the contrabands, issue supplies, or serve as advisors to a plantation community.

A month later, a Philadelphian contingent of Gideonites arrived, including Laura Towne, who would reside permanently in the area and found the Penn School. Other Gideonites followed, including Charlotte Forten, the first Northern African American schoolteacher to come south to educate the Port Royal slaves. On January 1, 1863, the Emancipation Proclamation went into effect on the Sea Islands, but for former slaves who were already involved in the Port Royal Experiment, conditions did not change significantly. Perhaps the most notable difference was that the term "contraband" was finally dropped and replaced with "freedmen."

Shortly after emancipation, the plantation land in the region was officially seized by the federal government for nonpayment of taxes. Many of those who supported the Port Royal Experiment lobbied the government to institute a program that would carve up these abandoned plantations into smaller plots, which would then be sold at a reduced rate to freedmen families. Instead, much of the plantation lands, numbering over 100,000 acres, was sold to private Northern investors, leaving only slightly more than 34,000 acres for purchase by the freedmen.

In March 1865, as the Civil War came to a close, the Bureau of Refugees, Freedmen, and Abandoned Lands, simply called the Freedmen's Bureau, was established, superseding the agencies running the Port Royal Experiment. Former officers of the experiment found they were in a unique position to lend their skills and experience to this new agency and joined their ranks, many staying on until the disbanding of the Freedman's Bureau in 1872.

Although there were difficulties and setbacks, the Port Royal Experiment was ultimately deemed a success, and referred to later as a "Rehearsal for Reconstruction." Interaction between the former slaves and the civilian and military agencies helped to dispel negative cultural stereotypes. In their diaries and letters home, the Gideonites remarked at the intelligence and natural ability exhibited by their students. Despite serious cultural misunderstandings and episodes of graft from unscrupulous businessmen or outright abuse from federal soldiers, the contrabands worked diligently and efficiently, transitioning easily into the role of freed citizens.

Pritchard, Gullah Jack

Jack Pritchard (?–1822), also known as Cooter Jack, was an African-born spiritualist principally involved in Denmark Vesey's slave conspiracy in Charleston, South Carolina, in 1822. Not much is known about his origins except for a handful of firsthand accounts before and after the 1822 conspiracy trials. The claim in court records that he was "Angolan" (a Bantu-speaker from West-Central Africa) is likely due to Jack's connection to Gullah culture. Although Gullah culture is a polyglot of African cultures that did indeed include Bantu-speaking, West-Central African components (including Angolan), Gullahs were also connected to import streams from Sierra Leone and Senegambia. According to Zaphaniah Kingsley—a slave trader and planter residing near St. John's River in East Florida—Gullah Jack originated from an East African kingdom or city-state named M'Choolay Moreema. Though he may have originated in East Africa, Kingsley notes that Gullah Jack was quite familiar with the languages spoken in Angola, and this perhaps explains his easy immersion into Gullah culture in South Carolina on the eve of the Vesey plot. Sold as a prisoner of war near the East African port town of Zanzibar, Gullah Jack was transported to east Florida and, eventually, to South Carolina in the early 1800s. In Charleston, Jack was a slave on the plantation owned by Paul Pritchard where he served as a field hand and, unbeknownst to his master, as an inspirational religious leader.

Gullah Jack's personal charisma and connection to the large number of Gullahs in and outside of Charleston explains his importance in the planning of the alleged plot. In addition, Jack had spiritual affiliations with slaves who attended services at Charleston's African Church and those who respected or feared the power of African conjure. The African Church, an offshoot of the African Methodist Episcopal Church, became one of the central points in the organization of the plot. It would be, however, Jack's role as a conjurer that proved most critical to Denmark Vesey and other conspirators. Through his contact with spiritual realms defined by African parameters, Jack was reputed to be invulnerable to harm. Having served as a "doctor" in Charleston for more than 15 years before the conspiracy, Jack's reputation as a mystic who could not be killed, shot, or caught allowed him to sway enslaved Africans of all backgrounds who respected him as both a conjurer and the "general" of the conspiracy.

Gullah Jack's influence extended into a number of spheres. According to court testimony and other contemporary sources, even country-born slaves—those born within the confines of North America—greatly feared his powers as a conjurer. In his most critical role, Jack was to distribute charms to slave combatants that were said to render them invincible. This particular activity was mirrored in a number of slave rebellions and conspiracies throughout the early modern Atlantic World. The fact that not one slave questioned the validity of Jack's powers during the course of the trials is testimony to the continuing connection they had to African spiritual beliefs and values.

For Gullah Jack's conjurations to work during the planned revolt, slaves had to first fast on corn and peanuts the night before the outbreak. The following morning, the rebels were to place Jack's charms, consisting of crab claws—or what the conspirators referred to as "cullahs"—in their mouths in order to be rendered invulnerable. Jack also presided over a ceremony in which a small group of conspirators ate a half-cooked fowl to solidify their bond. Oathing ceremonies of this sort were common features of slave rebellions and conspiracies in the Americas.

Gullah Jack's role as a recruiter in the conspiracy was equally significant. The fear inspired by his abilities often became sufficient inducement to compel slaves to join the plot. During the trial of Julius Forrest, for example, Harry Haig testified that Jack had "charmed" both men into joining the conspiracy and that even after Jack was arrested, Haig felt that he was magically bound to not speak about the plot. More than likely, he feared Jack's alleged ability to produce poison and marshal other spiritual means to punish those who would betray the plot. The dread inspired by Jack's ability as a conjurer was not limited to blacks alone. One of his contingency plans, in case the rebellion failed, was so frightening that all mention of it was intentionally omitted from the version of the trial record made publicly available by judges Lionel Kennedy and Thomas Parker. Henry Haig, one of the conspirators who turned state's witness, told the court that Jack had planned to poison wells and water pumps throughout Charleston as a means of killing as many whites as possible.

Because of his considerable influence, Jack was able to recruit enough slaves to lead an entire unit, known as the Gullah Company. As revealed by court officials during Gullah Jack's trial, this unit was assigned to kill the city guard and capture the arsenal during the outbreak. Leading up to the appointed date for the rebellion, the Gullah Company met on a monthly basis from December 1821 until June 1822 to solidify their plans and involve more recruits from slaves living along the coastline and Sea Islands. To find additional enlistees for his company, Jack was sent by Monday Gell—a noted harness-maker and fellow leader of the plot—to get the support of slaves living in the countryside on the outskirts of Charleston. Jack returned having reportedly enlisted some 6,000 slaves from Goose Creek and Dorchester counties.

Once the plot unraveled, Jack momentarily went into hiding. He even went as far as to cut his mustache and otherwise disguise his appearance. Found guilty in connection to his role in the conspiracy, Gullah Jack Pritchard was hanged on July 12, 1822.

Purvis, Robert

Robert Purvis (1810–1898) was an influential abolitionist and activist in the 19th century, born in Charleston, South Carolina. Robert Purvis' father was William Purvis, a white man who had immigrated to America in 1790 and become a naturalized citizen. His mother was Harriet Judah, a freeborn black woman whose Moroccan mother had been kidnapped sold into slavery. Purvis's maternal grandfather was Baron Judah, a German. At age nine, Purvis was sent to Philadelphia for education in a private school. When his father died in 1826, Robert and his brothers, William Jr. and Joseph, inherited their father's estate. Of fair complexion, Purvis could have passed for white but chose to identify himself as black.

He and fellow black abolitionists James Forten and William Whipper drafted a memorial to the Pennsylvania legislature in 1832 opposing a bill barring the migration of free blacks into Pennsylvania. The following year, Purvis joined white abolitionist William Lloyd Garrison and others in founding the American Anti-Slavery Society. In 1834, Purvis protested the "special passport" for colored persons issued to him for travel to England, and he was able to travel to England for a meeting of abolitionists on the customary American "full passport" given to white Americans. In 1835, he helped organize the Young Men's Antislavery Society and the American Moral Reform Society (AMRS). As an AMRS member, Purvis believed that self-improvement, religion, and temperance would win black equal rights. But by 1848, he realized no amount of education or self-help would end racial prejudice and slavery.

Purvis was also active in the Pennsylvania Antislavery Society and the Philadelphia Library of Colored Persons. Purvis opposed the American Colonization Society as a tool of slaveholders who wanted to rid the country of free blacks. In 1837, Pennsylvania approved a new state constitution disenfranchising blacks. In response, Purvis wrote the "Appeal of Forty Thousand Citizens to Protest Disenfranchisement in Pennsylvania." When he and wife Harriet sought to enter Pennsylvania Hall in Philadelphia for an abolitionist meeting, they were heckled because they were mistaken for an interracial couple.

In 1839, Purvis headed the Philadelphia Vigilance Committee, an organization that aided fugitive slaves. From 1845 to 1850, Purvis served as the president of the Pennsylvania Anti-Slavery Group. After he and his family were threatened during the 1842 Philadelphia riot, Purvis moved to Byberry in nearby Bucks County. In defiance of the 1850 Fugitive Slave Law, Purvis used his house as an Underground Railroad station. But Purvis also fought for the rights of free blacks. When his township excluded his children from attending local schools in 1853, Purvis refused to pay his taxes. The township later reversed its decision, allowing Purvis's children to attend the township school. In 1855, he protested the U.S. Supreme Court's Dred Scott case ruling. Purvis championed black troops in the Civil War; in 1863, he presented the regiment flag to the 6th regiment of the United States Colored Troops. A firm believer in human rights, Purvis promoted temperance, women's suffrage, and prison reform. Purvis died on April 15, 1898, in Philadelphia.

Quakers (Society of Friends)

The Quakers (Society of Friends) are a denomination of Christianity that took a relatively strong stance against slavery in the United States. Founded in England in the early 1650s by George Fox (1624–1691), the Society of Friends argued that one could find God through one's own Inner Light without help from a mediator. Rather than being preached to in a church, Quakers sat in a circle in meetinghouses, speaking only when they felt the urge to do so from their Inner Light. Fox's egalitarian belief that everyone could reach God on his or her own, given that each woman and man was equal in the eyes of their creator, resulted in many Quaker members feeling repulsed by slavery. By the 1670s, Fox contended that slavery ran contrary to the teachings of the Bible and represented an affront to God.

The antislavery sentiments expressed by George Fox in England found their way into Quaker meetinghouses in the United States. The earliest extant antislavery proclamation in the United States, dating from 1688, was signed by four Quakers in Germantown Pennsylvania. However, the stance of the Society of Friends in America toward slavery remained ambiguous through the 17th and early 18th centuries, and many Quakers continued to hold slaves.

During the 1750s, the Society of Friends became more decidedly opposed to the institution of slavery, particularly in certain regions of the country. John Woolman (1720–1772), a Quaker from New Jersey, wrote and spoke persuasively to Friends on the issue of slavery in the Northeast. His efforts had a significant impact on the views of Quakers: through the 1770s, Quaker meetings became increasingly hostile toward slavery, and in 1776, the Philadelphia Yearly Meeting outlawed the ownership of slaves among its members.

However, during the early 19th century, Quakers continued to disagree over the issue of slavery. In the late 1820s, the Society of Friends split between the Orthodox Quakers, who altered the Quaker religion to resemble other denominations of Protestant Christianity, and Hicksite Quakers, who remained true to traditional Quaker practices. Whereas the Hicksite Quakers commonly opposed slavery in antebellum America, the Orthodox Quakers, who were more prone to follow the views of mainstream society, did not take a strong stand against slavery. Despite these inconsistencies, Quakers disproportionately filled the ranks of the abolitionist movement, including antislavery leaders of note such as Lucretia Mott and Prudence Crandall.

Although Quakers made up an important part of the antislavery struggle, the attitude of antebellum Quakers toward African Americans was not egalitarian. It was not until 1784 that a black woman was allowed to join Quaker meetinghouses, a decision that was not reached without debate.

Title page of Anthony Benezet's Observations on the inslaving, importing and purchasing of Negroes... presented at the yearly meeting of Quakers in London, 1760. (Library of Congress)

Even after the formal admittance of African Americans into the meetinghouse, African Americans were frequently disenfranchised, often being relegated to pews located in the back.

In spite of the limitations to Quaker abolitionism, the Society of Friends played an integral part in the antislavery movement. After emancipation, Quaker involvement in issues of race declined, and by the early 20th century, Quakers had become largely uninvolved in issues of race. Nevertheless, some Quakers continued to be associated with groups such as the NAACP. Although Quaker interest in issues of race grew during the Civil Rights movement, they did not play as central a part in the issue of race as they had in the antislavery crusade.

Born in Falmouth, Massachusetts, Charles Ray (1807–1886) rose to prominence in the mid-19th century as a religious leader, abolitionist, suffragist, and newspaper editor. Although Ray was first employed as a boot maker, he experienced a religious awakening at the age of 23 and decided to pursue the ministry within the Methodist church. He was first educated at Wesleyan Academy in Massachusetts and then entered Wesleyan University in Connecticut, which offered training to Methodist teachers and preachers. Ray soon left Wesleyan, however, after he endured severe racism from his classmates. By 1833, he had relocated to New York City, and the following year he married Henrietta Regulus, who became the first president of New York's Ladies Literary Society, an organization dedicated to the advancement of black women. Although Henrietta died in 1836, Ray eventually married Charlotte Augusta Burroughs in 1840.

Shortly after his arrival in New York City, Charles Ray became active in the black community's vibrant political life, particularly regarding the issues of abolition and black male suffrage. In 1837, Ray, along with Philip A. Bell and Samuel Cornish, established the Colored American newspaper. In 1839, he assumed the editorship of the Colored American, a position he held until the paper folded in 1841. Through his role as editor of the paper, Ray gained national fame and was able to articulate his political views to a wide audience.

Even so, Charles Ray also worked within local and national organizations to advance the causes of abolition and suffrage. In 1837, he joined the Young Men's Anti-Slavery Society, an organization that was loosely affiliated with William Lloyd Garrison's American Anti-Slavery Society. Soon thereafter, however, the young activist was required to take an important stand on the split within the abolitionist movement. At the 1840 American Anti-Slavery Society (AASS) convention, the fragile antislavery coalition splintered into warring factions over a variety of issues, including the proper place of religion in the movement, the question of political participation, and the role of women. One group sided with William Lloyd Garrison and remained within the AASS; the rest defected from the AASS and joined the New York City-based Tappan brothers, Arthur and Lewis, in forming the American and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society (AFASS). Although most of the black New Yorkers supported the Tappan brothers, Charles Ray did not abandon William Lloyd Garrison; instead, Ray ultimately tried to remain neutral and maintain ties with both factions because he felt it was in the black community's best interest to affiliate with anyone who acted on behalf of the abolitionist cause. This event was especially significant because it revealed Ray's deep and abiding commitment to the abolition movement beyond personal or organizational strife.

In fact, Ray's personal commitment to abolition permeated every aspect of his life. In 1847, Ray joined the New York State Vigilance Committee (NYSVC), a biracial statewide organization dedicated to assisting and protecting fugitives founded by Quaker Isaac Hopper. He was also a strident opponent of the 1850 Fugitive Slave Act, a component of the Compromise of 1850 that imposed harsh regulations in an effort to prevent potential fugitives from fleeing bondage. His concern for the cause of fugitives was so strong that according to some sources, he was a conductor on the Underground Railroad.

In addition to his work on behalf of abolition, Charles Ray was also an ardent supporter of black suffrage rights. In New York State, where black men were subjected to strict (and usually unattainable) property qualifications in order to gain voting rights, Ray agitated unceasingly to obtain universal male suffrage. Beginning in June 1840, Ray and numerous other black activists routinely gathered in statewide "colored" suffrage conventions. They argued, in particular, that their disadvantaged political condition was the root of all the other problems facing the black community and that they must not be deterred in their mission to gain voting rights. Building on the momentum of these gatherings, which met almost annually until the outbreak of Civil War, activists bombarded the New York state legislatures with petitions demanding equal access to the vote. Although black New Yorkers did not gain the right to vote until the passage of the 15th Amendment in 1870, Ray and his fellow activists never surrendered the fight. Indeed, Ray not only advocated black suffrage rights but also supported both the Liberty Party and the Radical Abolition Party.

Despite Charles Ray's strong commitment to racial advancement, he did not always agree with his fellow activists on the issue of political strategy. In 1843, Charles Ray represented New York at the National Colored Convention. Although he was a staunch abolitionist, Charles Ray attacked Henry Highland Garnet's famous "Address to the Slaves," arguing that it was too radical and that moral suasion would ultimately prevail. Garnet and Ray faced off again in 1849 at a public meeting held in New York City to discuss colonization. Although Garnet was increasingly concerned about the future of the black race in the United States and suggested that the black community should consider repatriation, Ray asserted that black people had a long and proud history in the United States that they should fight to protect. In fact, their differing views on the issue of colonization remained a point of contention between these old friends well into the 1860s.

Later in life, Charles Ray dedicated himself primarily to the issue of black education. In 1847, Ray helped to establish the Society for the Promotion of Education Among Colored Children (SPECC), and in 1850, he formed the American League of Colored Laborers, which advocated for education and training in mechanical skills as a method to improve conditions for black people. Three years later, he represented New York City at the 1853 Colored Convention and likewise focused his efforts on education. In 1859, he was elected as the president of SPECC and called for a thorough review of city-run schools in New York. While president of SPECC (from 1859 to 1865), Ray was instrumental in founding two elementary schools, fighting for the desegregation of all white schools, and lobbying for adequate support for all black schools.

Although Charles Ray is mostly known for his political activities and commitment to education, it is important to note that despite his early fight against racism within the American Christian community, he finally achieved his religious goals and was ordained as a pastor of New York's Bethesda Congregational Church in 1845, a position he held until his death. Charles Ray died in New York on August 15, 1886, at the age of 79.

Reason, Charles

Born to Haitian immigrant parents, Charles Reason (1818–1893) attended the African Free School as a young boy and developed a talent for mathematics at a very young age. When he was only 14, Reason became an instructor at the school and used his salary to hire additional tutors. Reason later decided to pursue a future in the ministry, but he was denied entrance into the General Theological Seminary of the Protestant Episcopal Church based on his race. Disgusted, he left the church and enrolled at McGrawville College in upstate New York. Beyond his brother, Patrick (who became a famous artist and engraver), little is known about Charles Reason's private life, except that he was married and widowed three times, and his third wife was named Clorice Esteve.

Charles Reason began his political career in December 1833 when he joined the New York Anti-Slavery Society (NYASS), a branch of the American Anti-Slavery Society, which embraced a radical policy of immediate abolition and black civil rights. In August 1837, Reason became committed to the cause of suffrage and attended a public meeting of young black leaders. Three years later, he and activist Charles Ray issued a call for a state convention of black men to discuss strategies for gaining voting rights. The outcome was a series of state conventions, the first of which was held in Albany in August 1840. The following August, there was another state suffrage convention, where Charles Reason and Henry Highland Garnet were asked to draft a public address to the citizens of New York State. Unfortunately, the two men quickly found themselves at odds. Because the document was going to be widely circulated, Reason was disturbed by a passage that he felt might too strongly suggest violent resistance and reflect poorly on the black population. In response, Garnet became extremely annoyed, and a raucous debate ensued. In fact, the discussion lasted all night and was not resolved until the following morning when the convention elected to adopt the controversial passage. Notably, although Reason had objected to words of resistance being issued to a wider audience, he drafted another address from the convention, which was directed specifically to the black community and urged them to action. Their message especially targeted black men who, Reason claimed, needed to stand up for their manhood and defend their families against injustice. There were also particularly strong words directed at black ministers who, in his view, had not sufficiently used their influence and position to advance the cause of the race.

Reason's commitment to black rights in the United States also fueled his opposition to colonization. In 1851, he attacked the Liberian Agricultural and Emigration Society, and in 1860, he again strongly criticized his childhood friend, Henry Highland Garnet, for his support of African colonization.

For Charles Reason, however, the key to race uplift was black education. In 1847, Reason and Charles Ray created the Society for the Promotion of Education Among Colored Children, and he served as a school superintendent in 1848. He also advocated for the creation of manual labor and industrial schools and, in 1850, helped form the American League of Colored Laborers, which focused on industrial education. In 1849, Reason became the first black professor in the United States, when he was hired at New York Central College in McGrawville, New York. Yet just three years later, Reason resigned to become principal of Philadelphia's Institute for Colored Youth. The following year, he represented Pennsylvania at the National Colored Convention. However, in 1855, Charles Reason returned to New York City, where he served as a teacher and school administrator. In 1873, he launched a successful crusade against the city's policy of segregated schools. One year after Charles Reason retired, he died in New York City in 1893.

Reason, Patrick

Patrick Reason (1817–1857) was born in New York City to parents who had fled from Haiti following the Haitian Revolution. As a young boy, he attended the New York African Free School, where his talent for art was quickly recognized. He was soon apprenticed to a white engraver who taught him the craft. At the age of 13, Reason received attention for designing the frontispiece to a book documenting the history of the African Free School. His brother, Charles, was also uniquely talented in language and mathematics and went on to distinguish himself. However, beyond Charles, little is known about Patrick's personal life. It is not clear whether he ever married or had children. Instead, Patrick Reason made art and engravings his life's work, creating portraits of leading abolitionists during his career. Perhaps his most famous pieces were an engraving of the abolitionist symbol, "Am I Not a Man and a Brother," in 1835 as well as his creation of a similar image titled “Am I Not a Woman and a Sister.”

Engraving by Patrick Reason titled "Am I not a Man and a Brother?" 1835. (Library of Congress)

While still a young man, Patrick Reason became more actively involved in the abolitionist movement. He joined the New York Anti-Slavery Society, a branch of the American Anti-Slavery Society, which embraced a radical policy of immediate abolition and black civil rights. When the Tappan brothers, Arthur and Lewis, who were wealthy white New York abolitionists, withdrew from the American Anti-Slavery Society over the nomination of a woman to the executive council, a number of black New Yorkers including Patrick Reason were part of this dissenting faction. Reason ultimately worked with the Tappans to create a new organization, the American and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society.

Beyond abolition, Patrick Reason was also deeply concerned with suffrage rights. On July 27, 1840, the black community in New York City gathered to discuss the state convention and select delegates. Under the leadership of Patrick Reason, the group attempted to pass resolutions supporting the convention and the need for political elevation. Unfortunately, however, the meeting quickly dissolved into argument and dissension. John Peterson offered a resolution stating that because of overwhelming prejudice, it was ridiculous to believe that black people could advance their cause through any separate action. Although Patrick Reason declared the motion out of order, Peterson and James McCune Smith refused to be silenced. During the rest of the night, Peterson and Smith apparently attempted to pass a series of resolutions opposing the state convention, but they were unable to gain adequate support. The debates persisted until late that night when they were forced to adjourn without any conclusive decisions.

Despite the debates plaguing the movement in the days before the convention, the state meeting in 1840 was apparently quite successful. When it convened in August in the city of Albany, African Americans came from throughout the state to discuss the condition of their people and make plans for obtaining the suffrage. The New York City delegation dominated the convention, with Charles Ray as the chairman and Theodore Wright, Charles Reason, Patrick Reason, and William Johnson holding influential positions. Patrick Reason was also one of the conveners of the second state convention in 1841. Throughout most of the 1840s, Reason committed to his art; however, he reemerged briefly in 1857 to support another suffrage convention. Sadly, the 1857 state convention was a dismal failure because the New York State legislature refused to consider their petitions. Shortly thereafter, in late 1857, Patrick Reason died in New York City.

Remond, Charles L.

Charles Lenox Remond (1810–1873) was an abolitionist, a newspaper agent, a Union Army recruiter, and one of America’s first great African American orators. Remond was born in Salem, Massachusetts, one year before his father, John Lenox Remond, a native of Curaçao, was admitted to citizenship by the Essex County Court. Both his parents, John and Nancy, were observers and participants in the antislavery movement.

Charles attended the local Salem schools and at 17 became an abolitionist. He was agent for the Liberator in 1832 and the Weekly Advocate and Colored American newspapers in 1837. He joined the Massachusetts Anti-Slavery Society in 1834 and became a life member in the American Anti-Slavery Society. He was appointed one of the agents for the Massachusetts Anti-Slavery Society in 1838.

Remond was the first black abolitionist lecturer and was considered to be the most eloquent prior to Frederick Douglass. Beginning his lecturing career in Alfred, Maine, at the formation of a county antislavery society, Remond continued to travel and lecture throughout Maine, Rhode Island, and Massachusetts. After several lecture experiences, he wrote to Thomas Cole of Boston that slavery was trembling and prejudice was fading, and he hoped that both would soon be buried.

In 1840, the American Anti-Slavery Society selected him to be one of their delegates to attend the World Anti-Slavery Society Convention in London on June 12, along with such notables as William Lloyd Garrison, Nathaniel Peabody Rogers, and William Adams. His ability to attend had been financially supported by funds raised by the Bangor (Maine) Female Anti-Slavery Society, the Portland Sewing Circle, and the Newport Young Ladies Juvenile Anti-Slavery Society. This support enabled him to remain in the United Kingdom for 18 months traveling and lecturing in England, Scotland, and Ireland.

His voyage from the United States to Liverpool was marred by being denied a cabin and forced to travel in steerage. Arriving in London, he thought he would be able to remove discrimination from his thoughts until he learned that all women attending the convention were refused seating on the delegate floor. He, Garrison, and Rogers protested and sat in the gallery along with Lucretia Mott, Lady Anna Isabelle Milbanke Byron, and other women. While at the convention, he spoke at the anniversary meeting of the British and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society. He was universally welcomed during his lecture tour.

He returned to Boston on December 4, 1841, and brought with him an address signed by Daniel O'Connell, Lord Mayor of Dublin, and 60,000 Irishmen urging Irishmen in the United States to oppose slavery by peaceful means and to insist on liberty for all regardless of color, creed, or country.

On February 22, 1842, Remond became the first black man to address the Massachusetts House of Representatives Legislative Committee in a speech titled "Rights of Colored Persons in Travelling," protesting his Jim Crow experiences on the railways and steamboats.

His sister, Sarah Parker, a budding abolitionist lecturer, accompanied him on his lectures through New York State in 1856. February 26, 1860, found him at an antislavery meeting in Worcester at the Old Briney Hall. He spoke following Frederick P. Brown, brother of John Brown.

Remond, Frederick Douglass, William Wells Brown, Lewis Hayden, and John S. Rock were appointed as commanders to serve as recruiting agents for the Union Army. Recruiting began February 16, 1863, in West End, a part of Boston, and on May 18, Gov. John A. Andres delivered the state and national colors to Col. Robert Gould Shaw, the commander of the 54th Massachusetts Regiment.

At the National Convention of the American Equal Rights Association on May 9, 1867, Remond opposed the word "colored" in one of the resolutions. He was elected one of the vice presidents of the organization and served on its finance committee. This same year, he was back lecturing in western New York and in Boston. His health was taking a toll on him as he suffered from consumption.

In a letter dated April 5, 1869, and published in the National Anti-Slavery Standard, Remond wrote that he opposed colored schools with colored teachers and colored churches with colored ministers. In June 1856, he operated a "Ladies and Gentleman's Dining Room" at 5 Higginson Square, a family restaurant. This location had always been a Remond establishment, started by his father, John. Remond's second wife was Elizabeth Thayer Magee, and in 1866, they were living well in Wakefield, Massachusetts. He was appointed a stamp clerk in the Boston Customs House in 1871.

He died at his home in Wakefield on December 22, 1873. John T. Sargent, Wendell Phillips, and William Lloyd Garrison conducted the services. His wife Elizabeth died February 3, 1872. His survivors included two sons, Charles L. Jr. and Ernest R. Remond, and other family members including his sister, Sarah Parker Remond (Pintor), and his father, John. He was buried in Harmony Grove Cemetery, Salem, Massachusetts.

Remond, Sarah Parker

---

Dr. Sarah Parker Remond (1826-1894), a freeborn antislavery lecturer, writer, and medical doctor, was the first black woman to tour and lecture across Great Britain on behalf of the American Anti-Slavery Society. She was a rarity on the international lecturing circuit: educated, passionate, articulate, and black; consequently, her presence generated excitement and attention and inspired numerous press articles, pamphlets, and financial contributions. The devoutly moral antislavery message that she delivered was one that she had been learning ever since she was a young child growing up in Salem, Massachusetts.

Remond was one of eight children born to John, an immigrant from the Dutch Island of Curacao, and Nancy, a freeborn fancy cake maker whose father had fought in the Continental Army. In addition to owning a successful catering, provisioning, and hairdressing business, the Remonds were part of an elite group of middle-class, educated, freeborn antislavery activists: Sarah's father was a life member of the Massachusetts Anti-Slavery Society and was active in local politics and school desegregation; her mother and sisters were active members of the Massachusetts and Salem female antislavery societies; and her older brother, Charles Lenox, was the first black lecturer for the American Anti-Slavery Society and was considered to be the nation's leading black abolitionist up until around 1842 (coincidentally, this is the same year that Frederick Douglass first appeared on the lecturing circuit). That same year, he became the first person of color to testify before the Massachusetts legislature on behalf of the abolitionists against segregated seating on public conveyances. In addition, three of her sisters, Maritcha, Caroline, and Cecilia, co-owned the successful Ladies Hair Work Salon in Salem. Her family was involved in a tight network of abolitionists that included the Philadelphia-based Forten family (Charlotte Forten Grimke lived with Charles and his wife while attending high school), the New York-based Lyons family (conductors on the Underground Railroad who temporarily relocated to Salem when their home was attacked during the New York Draft Riots), William Lloyd Garrison, and Wendell Phillips.

Although her family was prosperous and successful, they were black, and life in the antebellum North included frequent exposure to racism and segregation. In 1835, Remond and her sister passed the qualifying examination and entered Salem High School. Less than a week later, they were forced to withdraw because of a decision by the segregationist school committee. Her father responded in two ways: first, by relocating the family to Rhode Island so that the girls could attend a private school for blacks, and second, by mounting a successful six-year campaign to desegregate the Salem school system. When Remond and her family finally returned to Salem in 1841, she decided to continue her education through less-structured means, which included reading books, newspapers, and pamphlets and attending antislavery lectures and cultural events.

In 1853, at Boston's Howard Athenaeum, she participated in her first act of documented civil disobedience when she was forcibly ejected after refusing to sit in the segregated gallery. In the midst of the ejection, she was injured by the police and later successfully sued the owners of the theater for $500 in damages. Three years later, with Abby Kelly Foster's encouragement, she joined her brother and Foster and began lecturing with the American Anti-Slavery Society. Although she was inexperienced, she quickly became one of their most persuasive and effective speakers, and though she had never experienced slavery, she passionately spoke out against the inhumane treatment of slaves and the sexual exploitation of enslaved women. Her passion and commitment to the cause was able to motivate and persuade audiences to financially support the abolitionist movement.

In 1848, Charles became the first black man to travel to Great Britain on behalf of the American Anti-Slavery Society; 10 years later, they invited Remond to take their message abroad. She arrived in 1859 and began a speaking tour that included more than 45 lectures in 18 cities and towns. As a result of the tour, her popularity, and her success, she was one of the few people primarily responsible for generating British support for the abolitionist movement. In addition, she began pursuing her degree and attended the Bedford College for Ladies (now part of the University of London). At the height of the Civil War, she began lecturing to raise money to support the Union Army, and when the war ended, she changed her message and began speaking out on the behalf of the Freedman's Aid Association. One year later, she moved to Florence, Italy, and began studying medicine at the Santa Maria Nuova Hospital. When she received her medical diploma in 1871, she began a second career practicing medicine in Italy that lasted for close to 20 years. Six years later, she married Lazzaro Pinter, a native of Sardinia. Although Remond never returned to America, her life and experiences provide a model of how the free black community trained, nurtured, and supported those few women who chose to speak up and out.

Republican Party

One of the two major political parties in the United States, the Republican Party or “Grand Old Party” (GOP) was the first political party supported by African Americans, who embraced the party after the American Civil War for its role in ending slavery, for giving freedmen the vote, and for encouraging black education. The Republican Party emerged as a response to the intensification of the sectional crisis during the 1850s. In 1854, a coalition of former Whigs, Free Soilers, and disillusioned Northern Democrats founded the Republican Party in meetings held in Wisconsin and Michigan. Under the leadership of their nominee, Abraham Lincoln, the Republicans won the presidential election of 1860.

Although the Democratic Party attacked the Republicans as “black Republicans,” as standard bearers of abolition and black equality, abolitionists were a minority faction within the party. Most Republicans, including Lincoln, opposed the idea of slavery and its expansion; however, in order to preserve the Union, they were willing to see slavery continue if it remained confined to the South. Only the most radical Republicans believed blacks should enjoy full political and social equality with whites. It took prolonged and bloody civil war to convince most Republicans to support black emancipation.

During the Civil War, the Republicans led the Union to victory and introduced measures to weaken and eliminate slavery. The most important of these initiatives was the Emancipation Proclamation of January 1, 1863, which proclaimed freedom for all slaves still under Confederate control. Emancipation also meant that slavery would end once the Union won the war. Congress recognized this fact in 1865 by passing the Thirteenth Amendment, which finally abolished slavery in the United States.

Wartime factions within the Republican Party engaged in disputes concerning the conduct of the war but especially on the conduct of the subsequent peace. Radicals believed Reconstruction must destroy the power of the old slave-owning elite and ensure freedom, suffrage, and civil rights for African Americans. Moderates believed Reconstruction would be successful only if the North pursued a policy of reconciliation with the defeated states, which would have to accept the Thirteenth Amendment and some basic rights for black people, excluding the vote. Lincoln’s death and the pro-Southern policies of President Andrew Johnson allowed Republican Radicals in Congress to take control of Reconstruction policies.

The Radicals overrode Johnson’s opposition to pass the Freedmen’s Bureau bill, civil rights legislation, and the Fourteenth Amendment. They also pushed to build pro-Republican state governments in the South through a combination of military pressure and black male suffrage, which allowed Republicans to win state offices across the South. Among the new officeholders were many African American national, state, and local politicians.

Radical successes were short-lived, however. As early as 1868, Republicans were losing their enthusiasm for Reconstruction and particularly for black suffrage and civil rights, issues that lost white votes to the Democrats. Republican president Ulysses S. Grant used his power to fight Ku Klux Klan violence in the South but failed to stem the backlash against Reconstruction. Republicans held onto power in 1877 as a result of the political maneuvering that followed the deadlocked presidential election of 1876, but the outcome was the end of Reconstruction and the reestablishment of Democratic control throughout the South.

After Reconstruction, African Americans remained loyal to the Republican Party. Blacks remained an important part of the GOP constituency, especially in the South, where 90 percent of the black population still lived in 1900. Black Republicans in the South formed an alliance with the few whites who were still willing to work with them. This “black and tan” coalition opposed the “lily-whites,” Republicans who wanted to build a purely white-controlled party in the South, for control of the GOP in Dixie. In the end, the Republicans failed to break the Democratic hold on political power in the South and alienated black voters. Alienation and the migration of large numbers of blacks to the North loosened the traditional bond between blacks and the GOP. The Great Depression and the popularity of President Franklin Roosevelt’s New Deal finally gave the Democratic Party a majority of the black vote in the presidential election of 1936.

During the 1950s and 1960s, anti-communism and a philosophy of limited government increasingly formed the core of the GOP agenda. Republican conservatism found a home in the South, where the growth of the Civil Rights movement and its growing identification with the Democratic Party led many Southern Democrats to switch their allegiance to the GOP. Republican presidential candidates pursued the votes of conservative white Southerners and working-class whites in the North, the same groups that had once been the core of the Democratic vote. The cultural and economic values of these voting blocks often conflicted with the political and economic goals of African Americans, who saw the Democratic Party as the party most supportive of civil rights and federal policies that addressed issues important to black communities: poverty, jobs, judicial inequities, and education.

With the election of Ronald Reagan to the presidency in the 1980s, the conservative triumph in the GOP was complete. Reagan attacked government as the problem, not the solution to America's problems, and opposed policies that enjoyed widespread African American support: extension of the Voting Rights Act; the creation of a national holiday honoring Dr. Martin Luther King Jr.; affirmative action; and antiapartheid legislation.

After Reagan, the Republican administrations of George H. W. Bush and his son, George W. Bush, failed to increase African American support for the Republicans. President George H. W. Bush's appointment of Clarence Thomas to the U.S. Supreme Court angered most African Americans, who, even though Thomas was black, opposed the conservative appointee as someone likely to seek to overturn federal policies favorable to African Americans. George W. Bush's controversial victory in the 2000 presidential election further angered many African Americans, who believed the Republicans had "stolen" the election by engaging in voter fraud to disenfranchise black voters. Although the junior Bush's administration did see the appointment of two African Americans (Colin Powell and Condoleezza Rice) as succeeding secretaries of state, the Republicans continued to lose African American votes: only 11 percent of African Americans voted for George W. Bush in the 2004 election. The unpopularity of the Bush administration in 2008, combined with the Democrats' candidate for president, Barack Obama, the first black presidential nominee of either major political party, made the Republican relationship with African Americans more tenuous than at any other time in the history of the GOP.

Ruggles, David

David Ruggles (1810–1849), born free in Norwich, Connecticut, became an antislavery activist, journalist and hydrotherapist. The oldest of seven children born to David Sr., a blacksmith, and Nancy, a well-known caterer, Ruggles attended the Sabbath School for the Poor in Norwich. In 1827, the same year that New York freed its slaves, Ruggles moved to New York City, where he started a grocery store. From 1829 until 1933, his grocery business flourished; but in 1833, he abandoned his business to take up the abolitionist cause.

Ruggles began his abolitionist career as a canvassing agent and militant spokesman for the Emancipator and Journal of Public Morals, the official weekly of the American Anti-Slavery Society. He spoke on such issues as colonization, black education, and the black national convention movement. Local organizations and churches soon requested Ruggles as a speaker, and he used these opportunities to urge blacks to improve their lives and support abolition. In 1834, Ruggles opened the first known black-owned bookstore and sold antislavery materials.

With the publication of Extinguisher, Extinguished... or David M. Reese, M.D. "Used Up," Ruggles began his journalistic career. In this pamphlet, he lashed out at David M. Reese, a local white proponent of colonization. Vehemently opposed to colonization, Ruggles considered it whites' ploy to rid the country of free blacks in order to perpetuate the institution of slavery. Using his own press, Ruggles published another pamphlet titled The Abrogation of the Seventh Commandment by the American Churches (1835), in which he accused slave owners of violating the seventh commandment when they forcibly copulated with slave women, and in which he lashed out at Southern white women who looked askance at their male relatives who fathered and misused slave offspring.

In January and February 1835, Ruggles published five searing antislavery articles in the Emancipator. In these, he urged blacks to subscribe to antislavery journals because subscriptions aided the antislavery cause and kept the black press alive. Deflecting blacks' excuses for not buying newspapers, Ruggles warned blacks that they had a moral obligation to condemn slavery.

Ruggles and others organized the New York Committee of Vigilance in late 1835. He solicited and collected funds for the Committee, went to private residences to inform hidden slaves of their freedom, sought the arrest of suspected slave traders, and personally aided many slaves on the Underground Railroad—the most famous of whom was Frederick Douglass. Ruggles was often incarcerated as an accessory to kidnappings as he helped to free fugitives. With the legal support of the New York Manumission Society, the New York Committee of Vigilance, under Ruggles's direction, petitioned the New York City government to grant jury trials to fugitives for the purpose of establishing their identity.

So intent was Ruggles in rooting out slavery that in 1838, he founded the Mirror of Liberty, considered the first black American magazine; from 1838 to 1841, this popular periodical gave accounts of kidnappings, court cases, and other antislavery activities. In his Colored American columns, he wrote about kidnappings on interstate transportation, and, in 1839, he listed in Slaveholders Directory the names and addresses of all those involved in kidnapping. Ruggles also published an article in the Colored American in 1838 that damaged his abolitionist career. The article accused John Russell, a local black man, of trafficking in slaves. Russell sued Ruggles, the newspaper, and Samuel Cornish, the Colored American's owner, for libel and won $600. Cornish subsequently refused to publish Ruggles's letter of self-vindication and sought assistance in removing Ruggles from his post as secretary of the Committee of Vigilance. Exorbitant fines, failing health, and poor eyesight hastened Ruggles's retirement from the abolitionist movement.

With the help of Lydia Maria Child, Ruggles, now destitute, went to Northampton, Massachusetts, in 1842 to live. As a cure for his ailments, he tried hydrotherapy, which Vincent Priessnitz, a native of Austrian Silesia, had practiced. Ruggles's eyesight and general health improved with water treatment. The results encouraged him to practice the water cure on others. The Northampton Association aided him in housing his practice in a refurbished watermill, the first known water-cure facility in America. His patients came to him from across America.

Ruggles dedicated his life to helping others. When he died at 39 years of age, his body was returned to Connecticut for burial.

Russwurm, John

John Russwurm (1799–1851) was born in Jamaica in 1799 to an enslaved mother and a white merchant father. His father moved young Russwurm to Quebec when he was only 8 years old, yet shortly thereafter, they moved to Maine, where his father married another woman. Russwurm lived in Maine and was educated at the Hebron Academy. In 1824, he enrolled in Bowdoin College, and when he graduated in 1826, Russwurm was among the first black college graduates in the United States. Russwurm even delivered the commencement address, which was titled "The Condition and Prospects of Haiti." The speech's focus on Haiti reflected Russwurm's political beliefs and foreshadowed his future commitment to black voluntary emigration. Russwurm eventually made emigration and public communication his life's work, becoming a staunch emigrationist and influential leader in the United States and Liberia. He made a particular impact on black political discourse in the antebellum era, by creating and publishing two black newspapers. Immediately after graduation, Russwurm moved to Boston, where he taught at the Primus Hall School for black children.

By 1827, the year of legal emancipation in New York State, John Russwurm had relocated to New York City and was chosen to edit Freedom's Journal, the first black newspaper in the United States. Freedom's Journal was founded, in part, as a response to the negative depictions of blacks that regularly appeared in mainstream newspapers. Thus, when the first issue of Freedom's Journal appeared on March 16, 1827, the editors wanted it to be the voice of the black leadership and hoped that it would present an accurate view of their people to combat the continual racist onslaught on their character. With the assistance of his coeditor, Samuel Cornish, Russwurm built Freedom's Journal into a powerful political tool. Its influence reached far beyond New York, and from its inception, Freedom's Journal had the support of some of the most recognized black activists in the United States, including Bostonian David Walker.

Freedom's Journal was particularly active in the movement to uplift the race by improving black education. John Russwurm was especially committed to education, and he became involved in various movements designed to encourage black children to attend school. In 1828, he became the secretary for the African Dorcas Association, an organization designed to provide necessities to young children who hoped to attend school. In 1829, John Russwurm wrote in the pages of Freedom's Journal that more effort should be directed toward the education of youth because the future was in their hands. Respectability was a matter of serious concern for Russwurm, who also routinely denounced the tradition of black parades. Initially, some black leaders seemed convinced of the merits of parading, and the issue became the center of serious debate in the 19th century. Most famously, Russwurm gave a biting indictment of blacks in Brooklyn for holding an emancipation parade in 1828. Although they had participated in the New York celebration, Brooklynites had resolved to have a parade in the streets of their own neighborhood. Russwurm argued that the Brooklyn parade reflected poor taste and brought out the lower members of society, but he was particularly frustrated by the behavior of women. He seemed to be especially concerned with the frivolity and perceived lack of morality that allegedly accompanied the Brooklyn parade. He used Freedom's Journal to urge his brethren to consider their actions more seriously, particularly to consider whether their time and money might be put to some more beneficial use.

Although Russwurm was deeply committed to respectability and proper conduct, his most powerful commitment was to the cause of emigration. In fact, it was his belief in black migration that caused Freedom's Journal to suffer from internal division. John Russwurm and Samuel Cornish had both been staunch emigrationists originally, but the rising tide of racism within the colonization movement caused Cornish to reconsider his position. Cornish began to use Freedom's Journal to speak out against colonization, and as an alternative, he advocated black settlement in rural areas. However, John Russwurm continued to support emigration, and their conflicting ideologies were doomed to collide. By September 1827, Cornish had resigned from the paper, and Russwurm continued to edit Freedom's Journal on his own. Although Freedom's Journal hung on until March 1829, Russwurm received many complaints about the quality and content of the paper.

In the last issues of the paper, Russwurm publicly endorsed colonization. Despite the colonizationists' severe racism, Russwurm's argument contained a logical and accurate critique of life in the United States in which he argued that the mark of race would always prevent black people from achieving full equality. He advocated that blacks migrate to Liberia rather than remain in the United States, where race prevented black men from reaching their potential. The black community responded angrily because they felt he had become a pawn of the white racist members of the American Colonization Society. In fact, following his announcement about his plans to repatriate, the black community expressed their displeasure in the form of a riot. Chanting "traitor" throughout the Five Points neighborhood, a group of black folks hung an effigy of Russwurm in the square that they proceeded to pelt with rocks and set ablaze. The final issue of Freedom's Journal appeared on March 28, 1829. Russwurm's departing words were bitter, stating that he had been mistreated and misunderstood by his community.

Just a few months after Freedom's Journal disintegrated, John Russwurm accepted a position as superintendent of schools in Liberia. He was well received in Africa; he edited a newspaper, the Liberia Herald, and in 1833, he married Sarah McGill, who was the daughter of the lieutenant governor of Monrovia. Together, they had three sons and a daughter. By 1836, he had become governor of the Maryland colony in Cape Palmas, and he remained in that position until his death in 1851.

Salem, Peter

Born into slavery in Framingham, Massachusetts, Peter Salem (1750–1816) was a hero of the American Revolution. Salem's original owner was Jeremy Belknap, a New England historian. Peter's surname Salem comes from the town of Salem, Massachusetts, where Belknap lived prior to moving to Framingham. Jeremy sold Peter to Maj. Lawson Buckminster, who allowed Peter to enlist when the Revolutionary War began. Salem first saw action at the Battle of Lexington and Concord. He was part of Capt. Simon Edgel's Framingham Minuteman Company. Other African Americans with Salem at Lexington and Concord were Private Pompey, Joshua Boylston's Prince, Cato Stedman, Cato Bordman, Pomp Blackman, and Prince Estabrook.

History remembers Salem for killing the British general John Pitcairn at the Battle of Bunker Hill on June 17, 1775. With Salem at Bunker Hill were Season and Pharaoh of Col. James Scamman's York County Regiment of Foot (infantry). They received the legendary order "Don't fire until you see the whites of their eyes!" That order symbolizes the state of mind of the poorly outfitted colonists facing powerful British forces. Also present was Barzillai Lew of Chelmsford. A cooper (barrel maker) before the war, he became a fifer and was already a veteran of the French and Indian War. Yet another African American patriot warrior present at the Battle of Bunker Hill was Cuff Whittemore. He survived a musket ball shot through his hat and went on to scavenge the sword of a British officer.

Unlike Salem Poor, Peter Salem received a commendation from the Massachusetts General Court for his bravery at Bunker Hill. When General Washington issued a decree that forbade military recruiters to enlist slaves, they almost discharged Salem. To prevent this, Belknap freed Salem outright. Washington reversed himself after Lord Dunmore issued his proclamation offering freedom to Patriot slaves.

Salem remained in the army until the end of the war in 1783, after which he settled in a cabin that he built himself in Leicester, Massachusetts, and became a cane weaver. Some time later, he returned to Framingham and died there in the poor house on August 16, 1816. In 1882, the citizens of Framingham, Massachusetts, erected a monument there in Salem's honor.

John Trumbull allegedly immortalized Salem as part of his famous 1786 painting The Death of General Warren at the Battle of Bunker's Hill. The detail containing that image became a six-cent postage stamp on October 18, 1968. The post office issued the stamp in memory of John Trumbull, as part of the American Artist series. There is some controversy as to the accuracy of Trumbull's painting. We know that about 30 to 103 African Americans were present at the battle, and the one pictured in Trumbull's painting may not be Salem. Recent scholarship says the man immortalized in Trumbull's painting is Asaba, the personal manservant of Lieutenant Grosvenor of Connecticut. Whether or not Trumbull's likeness is actually him, Peter Salem remains a hero of the Battle of Bunker Hill and worthy of our recognition and praise.

Saunders, Prince

Prince Saunders (1775?–1839) was an activist, abolitionist, and advocate for immigration to Haitian who influenced black politics in the 19th century. Born free in Lebanon, Connecticut, Saunders spent some of his youth in Vermont and worked as a teacher in rural Connecticut for the African School of Colchester, Connecticut, for several years before moving to Boston in 1808. There, he joined the small but growing free black community, serving as secretary to the African Masonic Lodge under community leader Prince Hall.

In Boston, Saunders continued his career as a teacher for that city's African School, working alongside such prominent Boston blacks as Rev. Thomas Paul. Saunders and Paul sought to improve the educational opportunities for the city's black community and secure support for the school. Saunders negotiated a $4,000 annual grant for three additional schools in Boston's African School system.

However, Saunders became a supporter of Paul Cuffe, the famous African American sea captain and organizer of African colonization. In 1815, Cuffe transported 38 Boston blacks to West Africa. Interested in moving to Britain's Sierra Leone colony in West Africa, Saunders sailed to London to make additional inquiries. In London, Saunders met philanthropist and abolitionist William Wilberforce, who convinced him that Haiti and the Haitian king, Henri Christophe, needed his skills more urgently than Africa.

Saunders traveled to Haiti in 1815 as part of a delegation of foreigners who came to introduce new farming methods, schools, the English language, and the Protestant religion. Saunders became an advisor to King Henri Christophe and recruited teachers for the nation's schools. Christophe believed the future of his nation depended on the education and economic welfare of the people and instituted universal education for all Haitian citizens.

In the late 1810s, Saunders was dispatched by Christophe on a speaking tour of England and the United States to promote the kingdom. Coinciding with these tours, Saunders published a collection of documents showcasing Christophe's rule, called Haytian Papers, first in London and then in Boston. Saunders secured prestigious speaking engagements at the Augustinian Society, a Philadelphia African American elite organization, about the kingdom's progress. He also spoke to the American Convention for the Abolition of Slavery in 1818 in Philadelphia, suggesting Haiti as a potential site of African American emigration.

Conditions in the United States during the 1810s pushed many Northern African Americans to consider leaving the United States. Despite the freedom gained after the American Revolution, many free blacks faced a society retreating from its own revolutionary promises of liberty and equality. This retreat took place throughout Northern cities during the first decade of the 1800s and was characterized by open hostility toward free blacks, which manifested itself in the rising street violence against blacks and in the denial of black suffrage rights.

When Saunders arrived in the United States on his promotional tour to discuss Haiti's attractions as an African American emigrant destination, he was met with enthusiastic audiences. This enthusiasm for Haiti was in marked contrast to the resistance proponents of African colonization encountered. Neither Paul Cuffe's Sierra Leone project nor the elite white American Colonization Society's (ACS) Liberian project succeeded in their contemporary missions of sending substantial numbers of free blacks out of the United States.

After Saunders' trip to the U.S., he reported to Christophe that hundreds of African Americans were eager to emigrate from New England and the Middle States. Before the migration scheme could commence, however, Christophe committed suicide in the face of a rebellion, ending Prince Saunders's formal role in sending American blacks to Haiti. Even so, Saunders's early efforts informed subsequent emigration projects. In the 1820s, President Jean Pierre Boyer, the leader of a united Haiti following the deaths of President Alexandre Petion and King Henri Christophe, established an emigration project that brought between 6,000 and 13,000 African Americans to Haiti.

Saunders continued his association with Haiti for the remainder of his life. According to some accounts, Saunders served in President Jean Pierre Boyer's administration as attorney general. When Prince Saunders died in Port-au-Prince in 1839, eulogies commemorating the work he did on behalf of African Americans and for the Haitian nation were published widely.

Scott, Dred

Dred Scott (ca. 1800–1857) was a slave whose suit for freedom would become one of the most infamous and divisive court cases in American history. Scott first went to the courts in 1846, arguing that residence in the free state of Illinois and the free territory of Wisconsin had made him a free man. Although Scott lost his initial suit on a technicality, the case made it to the Supreme Court 11 years later. Chief Justice Roger B. Taney's 1857 ruling in Dred Scott v. Sandford kept Scott in slavery, denied the citizenship of African Americans, and exacerbated the division between North and South.

Scott was born around 1800 in Virginia. He moved with Peter Blow, his master, to St. Louis in 1830. In 1832, Scott was sold to Dr. John Emerson, a surgeon in the U.S. Army. Scott moved with Emerson from Missouri to the free state of Illinois in 1834 and later to the free territory of Wisconsin. In Wisconsin, Scott met and married Harriet Robinson, who was subsequently purchased by Emerson. In 1837, Emerson was transferred south, first to Missouri and then to Florida, taking his slaves with him. Dr. Emerson died in 1843, leaving all his possessions to his wife, Eliza, and naming his brother-in-law, John Sanford of St. Louis, executor of the estate. Eliza Emerson hired Scott out to relations and friends for three years. In 1846, Scott tried to buy his freedom, along with Harriet's. Mrs. Emerson refused, prompting Dred Scott to sue for freedom in the Missouri circuit court in April 1846.

In March 1857, Chief Justice Roger B. Taney delivered the majority opinion in Dred Scott v. Sandford. Taney, a proslavery judge from Maryland, considered his ruling the final word on the slavery controversy. First, his majority opinion stated the unconstitutionality of the Missouri Compromise, passed in 1820, which had ruled that territories north of 36°30' latitude (the southern border of Missouri) would not allow slavery. Although neither Illinois nor Wisconsin allowed slavery, Taney ruled that the Missouri Compromise violated slave owners' right to the free movement of property throughout the free territories. Most importantly, he argued that the federal government had no constitutional right to involve itself with the institution of slavery in any of its states or territories.

In his zeal to kill the slavery controversy and uphold the Southern point of view, Taney went a step further, ruling that free and enslaved African Americans were not citizens. Although the Declaration of Independence had suggested that "all men are created equal," Taney argued that African Americans were not intended to be considered as part of the body politic and therefore were not entitled to civil rights.

Southern Democrats immediately lauded Taney's decision, elated that the Southern point of view had been elevated to the highest law of the land. Northern Republicans and abolitionists, however, were aghast. Taney had upheld the institution of slavery and provided it with a judicial backing. Although Taney did not go so far as to sanction the spread of slavery to all the states and territories, including those in the North, many feared that it was but a small step from Taney's decision to this eventuality.

The Dred Scott decision must be viewed in the context of the turbulent 1850s, which marked the apex of a 30-year battle between North and South over the legality of slavery and its place in American life. The Compromise of 1850, the work of Sen. Henry Clay, was meant to calm both Northern and Southern tempers. The compromise, however, contained a provision for the strengthening of the Fugitive Slave Act, originally passed in 1793. The stronger bill required Northerners to aid in the capture of suspected fugitives from slavery or suffer federal prosecution. The battle over the territory of Kansas in the mid-1850s and the caning of Massachusetts senator Charles Sumner by a Southern congressman in 1856 further alienated the sections and gave fodder to Northern fears of a "slave power conspiracy" to subvert the principles of free government and make slavery a national institution. The Dred Scott decision confirmed the North's deepest fears. Having already witnessed the proslavery inclinations of Congress and President James Buchanan, the North now had to resign itself to a judiciary branch that was staunchly proslavery. The entire government, it seemed, was beholden to the slave power. Further compromise seemed all but impossible.

Peter Blow's sons bought Scott's freedom soon after the verdict was returned. Scott died less than a year after the decision.

Second Great Awakening

The “Second Great Awakening” refers to a pattern of Protestant revivals that occurred between 1790 and 1830 throughout the eastern half of the United States. Its title derives from the first Great Awakening, which occurred during the mid-18th century, largely in New England and the Middle Colonies. Although both awakenings emphasized revival worship patterns, including individual testimonials, charismatic preaching, and ministerial itinerancy, the Second Great Awakening codified many of these tactics, producing several new denominations and encouraging sweeping social reform movements.

The Second Great Awakening is usefully divided into three areas: New England, the western frontier, and upstate New York. During the first decades of the 19th century, Congregationalists in Connecticut and New Hampshire participated in a series of sedate, cognitive exercises in Christian piety. Led by Timothy Dwight, the president of Yale College, these revivals were less expressions of religious fervor than articulations of religious devotion. Worried that Yale students had collapsed into disbelief, Dwight launched a movement to demonstrate the connection between the intellectual life and Christian commitment. Lyman Beecher and Nathaniel William Taylor, two towering figures in 19th-century American Protestantism, were inspired by Dwight’s call to moral seriousness and religious control. Like Jonathan Edwards, a leader in the first Great Awakening, these men believed that revivals were the work of God and that the purpose of such revivals was to propel sinners to salvation under the guidance of God.

At the same time as these contemplative New England meetings, Methodist and Presbyterian ministers led raucous camp meetings on the western frontier. Including ecstatic behavior, fiery preaching, and socioeconomic diversity among participants, these gatherings would become the trademark of the Second Great Awakening. The genesis of the frontier awakening can be traced to the preaching of James McGready, a Presbyterian from Logan County, Kentucky, and Barton Stone, the eventual founder of the Disciples of Christ. McGready and Stone ignited a series of revivals at Gasper River and Cane Ridge, Kentucky. Led by Stone, the Cane Ridge revival attracted more than 10,000 people for several days of sermons, testimonials, and hymns. Smaller versions of Cane Ridge occurred up and down the frontier as itinerant preachers advocated the gospel to the far borders of the United States. In their attempts to reach the unlettered in Kentucky, Tennessee, and southern Ohio, these Baptist, Presbyterian, and Methodist ministers elaborated the ritual process of conversion. Rather than emphasize doctrine or creedal commitment, preachers sought to construct a clear process by which people might be led to salvation. As the U.S. population grew from 5 to 30 million inhabitants during the early 19th century, these awakenings assimilated rural Americans into a common evangelical worldview.

Frontiersmen were not the only beneficiaries of the Second Great Awakening. In the new trading towns of upstate New York, Charles G. Finney blazed a powerful trail. Unlike his New England antecedents, Finney saw no reason to obscure the emotional and ritual aspects of religious experience. He sought to prescribe not only how believers ought to understand Christ, but also how they came to Christ. To do so, he concocted a series of “new measures” to describe the specific tactics of a revival. For some, this seemed to transgress the power of God; for others, Finney’s labors were interpreted as God’s work on earth. Whether you endorsed or dismissed Finney’s measures, his impact was indisputable: through his tours, he converted thousands and encouraged countless more to take up service to God through social reform. When Finney retired in 1832, the Second Great Awakening as a distinct phenomenon effectively came to an end.

By the 1830s, the effects of the Second Great Awakening among African Americans were abundant. Following the American Revolution, few blacks were Christians. However, these statistics dramatically altered over the subsequent 40 years. For example, according to some estimates, there were fewer than 2,000 black Methodists in 1787; by 1815, there were an estimated 40,000. Following the lackluster Anglican missionary efforts, Methodists and Baptist ministers found inordinate success among African Americans. The revivals that blazed through upstate New York and the western frontier challenged slavery as an institution, encouraged immediate conversion among the uneducated, and emboldened a generation of black preachers. During the course of the Second Great Awakening, Richard Allen and Absalom Jones established the first independent black Methodist and black Episcopal churches in Philadelphia, and black Baptist congregations flourished in the South. However, this racial progress was not without its downside; evangelical America remained predominantly racist, excluding blacks from national denominational meetings and black ministers from positions of authority. Nevertheless, the allowance of black church bodies under the auspices of white sects engendered black leadership and, eventually, black denominational independence.

Furthermore, the theology of the Second Great Awakening spawned some of the most significant social reforms in the history of America, including the abolitionist movement. Early 19th-century revivalists not only attempted to convert citizens; they also tried to convince them that their nation held a special place in the eyes of God. Men not only were capable of determining their individual salvation, touring evangelicals argued, but also could choose to save their society. Charles Finney, in particular, preached the possibility of present-day perfection. Awakening converts formed the core of 19th-century social reform, including efforts to improve education and promote temperance, abolition, and peace. The subsequent “benevolent empire” would play a critical role in the social improvement of the nascent nation.

Seminole Wars

The Seminole Wars were a series of military conflicts waged between the Seminole societies and the U.S. government over territory. More than any other 19th-century conflicts with native peoples, the three Seminole wars (1817–1818, 1835–1842, 1855–1858) were intertwined with the issue of slavery. Even before the War of 1812, American slave owners in Georgia saw the Seminoles in Spanish Florida as a threat to their property. They provided a haven to blacks fleeing enslavement in Georgia and the Carolinas, with runaways forming free enclaves among the Indians and others entering Seminole communities as slaves, albeit of a much less onerous variety, living in separate villages, sharing in the Indian culture, and having obligations amounting usually to one-third of their crops. Because of the importance they put on avoiding capture, they were more determined in their resistance to the whites than their Indian hosts. Also, they served the Indians well as interpreters of the English language and enemy culture.

Illustration of an attack on white settlers in Florida by Seminoles and African Americans, from An Authentic Narrative of the Seminole War, 1836. (Library of Congress)

The conflict that became the first Seminole War started during the War of 1812 with two invasions of Florida, Andrew Jackson's western campaign against the Creeks and Georgian incursions in the east. In July 1816, Jackson and Creek Indian allies hunting for slaves destroyed the Seminole stronghold on the Apalachicola River, forcing the Indians and their black allies east and south into peninsular Florida. Jackson's 1818 campaign accelerated this movement by destroying Seminole towns in Florida. The United States acquired Spanish Florida in the Adams-Onís Treaty of February 22, 1819, a direct result of Jackson's military operations. This acquisition of Florida had major consequences for Seminoles and blacks alike. In the years leading to the second war in 1835, the U.S. government, pressured by slave owners, considered two options: removal or consolidation on a reservation. Meanwhile, government negotiators in Florida pressed for the return of runaway slaves. In the 1820s, starving Indians raided whites' cattle herds, and slaveholders petitioned for removal of the Seminoles from Florida. The Indian Removal Act of May 28, 1830, providing for the taking of Indian land in exchange for land in the west, resolved the policy debate but not the conflict. Removal plans envisioned placing the Seminoles among the Creeks, but blacks with the Seminoles feared the Creeks would enslave them and sell them to whites.

At the Treaty of Moultrie Creek of September 18, 1823, Seminole leaders promised to apprehend and return runaways. Many were returned, but about 800 black slaves remained among the Seminoles. On paper, the Seminoles also accepted a 4-million-acre reservation, but most leaders never intended to move, and many harbored runaways.

The Seminoles did not want to leave Florida and worried that the Creeks would steal black people from them. White Florida entrepreneurs, fearing loss of their business, also urged them to stay. But the steadiest pressure to resist came from the blacks among them. When the situation disintegrated into war in 1835, blacks were prominent in almost all major fights, as combatants and as the focus of operations. Attacks on plantations in the St. John's River valley around Christmas 1835 liberated hundreds of slaves, swelling Seminole ranks and panicking sugar-growers. Sporadic but bitter fighting continued until 1842. By then, resistance so diminished that Col. William Worth declared hostilities over. Still, groups of Seminoles remained at large, evidence that the American victory was incomplete.

The effect of the second war spilled over into the national debate over slavery. Congressional opponents of slavery used appropriations bills as opportunities to skirt the "gag rule," enacted by a Congress dominated by slave owners in 1836 to halt discussion of slavery. Some representatives, including former president John Quincy Adams, alert to opportunities to challenge this rule, brought up the issue whenever possible, and the Seminole conflict, involving questions of runaways, slaveholder support, and black fighters among the Indians, fit their purposes.

Among blacks who fought alongside the Indians, an escaped slave named Abraham, formerly the property of a Pensacola physician, emerged as a chief. Known for his oratory and religious enthusiasms, Abraham accompanied a Seminole delegation to Washington, D.C., in 1826, as interpreter. While pretending to accept removal, he secretly planned war and plotted with plantation slaves in Florida. Although Osceola was the preeminent Seminole leader in the long struggle, Abraham fought alongside him, led war parties, and negotiated with American officers. John Cavallo, also known as Gopher John, John Horse, and Juan Caballo, also emerged as a leader. Cavallo later accepted removal to Indian Territory and then returned to Florida as a guide and interpreter for the army. In 1850, he led the black Seminoles from Indian Territory to Mexico and remained there until after the Civil War. They returned as scouts for the army against southwestern societies, including Apaches, Comanches, and Kiowas.

The third war started in December 1855 with an Indian attack on an army encampment. White expansion southward brought on the conflict, which lasted until May 1858. It ended with scarcely 100 Seminoles still at large. A total of nearly 4,000 Indians and their black allies were in Indian Territory, and an unknown number were dead. Army losses were about 1,500, with 328 killed in combat, including 74 officers. Most of the others died from disease. The conflict was the longest, most savage guerilla war experienced by American forces until the Vietnam War of 1960–1975. See also: Black Seminoles; Maroon Societies

Shadd, Abraham

Abraham Doras Shadd (1801–1882) was a free black shoemaker, abolitionist, activist, and politician. Shadd followed in his father's footsteps and worked as a shoemaker in Wilmington, Delaware. He and his wife, Harriet Parnell Shadd, had 13 children, including the well-known writer and activist Mary Ann Shadd Cary. After gaining some wealth as a shoemaker, Shadd became a prominent member of the free black community in Wilmington, Delaware, by the 1830s. As a well-known abolitionist and activist for black civil rights in Delaware, Shadd initially opposed efforts by national and local colonization societies to send African Americans out of the country to places such as Liberia, but Shadd himself later moved to Canada.

In 1831, at a meeting of local black leaders in Wilmington, Delaware, Shadd was chosen, along with Rev. Peter Spencer and William S. Thomas, to write a declaration in opposition to the colonization movement. In this declaration, the three men argued that African Americans should be afforded the same rights as other Americans. Because racism prevented African Americans from fully exercising their rights, activists and reformers should work on ending prejudice and improving opportunities for African Americans rather than sending them out of the country, they argued. This anticolonization declaration was published a year later in William Lloyd Garrison's book Thoughts on African Colonization (1832) as an example of African American opposition to colonization.

Shadd was also active in the black convention movement of the 1830s. He attended, and actively participated in, several during that decade. At the First Annual Convention of Free Persons of Colour, held in Philadelphia, Shadd was elected vice president of the convention. He attended the 1832 and 1833 conventions as well. In 1833, at the Convention for the Improvement of the Free People of Colour, Shadd again played a prominent role and was elected president of the convention. During the early 1830s, Shadd also acted as an agent of William Lloyd Garrison's abolitionist newspaper, the Liberator, in Delaware, in attempt to expand awareness of and gain subscribers to the newspaper.

In 1833, the Shadd family left Delaware, a slave state, and moved to West Chester, Pennsylvania, located about 15 miles south of Philadelphia. By the early 1830s, life in Delaware was becoming more and more difficult for free African Americans, as new anti-black laws were instituted and as free blacks became the targets of the growing colonization movement. As a prominent member of Wilmington's free black community, Shadd feared that he and his family might become targets themselves, and thus, they moved to a "free" state, nearby Pennsylvania. Shadd undoubtedly also wanted to move closer to the action. Philadelphia had a thriving free black community and was home to many of the important abolitionist meetings and conventions in the 1830s.

Not long after the Shadd family moved to West Chester, Shadd attended the founding meeting of the American Anti-Slavery Society in Philadelphia in December 1833. Shadd was one of six African Americans named to that society's board of managers. He later attended the 1835 and 1836 annual meetings of the society. By the late 1830s, however, Shadd's interest in black conventions and antislavery meetings waned. Often little was accomplished at the meetings, and usually the same sentiments were declared: an end to slavery and racial "uplift" for African Americans. Although Shadd attended fewer meetings by the late 1830s, his commitment to racial justice never wavered. While living in Wilmington, and later in West Chester, the Shadds actively participated in the Underground Railroad, helping African Americans escape from enslavement in the South.

Shadd continued his activism in the 1840s. In July 1840, he returned to Wilmington to speak before a crowd of African American men as part of the First of August celebrations, which were common in many African American communities. These festivities celebrated the end of slavery in the British West Indies, which officially occurred on July 31, 1834. Shadd spoke in Wilmington's colored schoolhouse about black education and temperance. His talk was later published in the Colored American, a black-owned newspaper, in August 1840. Later in the decade, in 1848, he participated in a meeting of local Pennsylvania African American leaders who met to oppose the Pennsylvania law that denied African Americans the right to vote. The law was passed in 1838; prior to that, free men, regardless of color, had the legal right to vote. The new law of 1838 allowed only white men to vote in Pennsylvania. Shadd was one of seven men to draft a letter of protest to the Pennsylvania state legislature, calling for the repeal of the law that disenfranchised African American men.

By the early 1850s, Shadd again was preparing to move with his family, undoubtedly upset by the increasingly repressive measures in both Pennsylvania and the nation as a whole; in Pennsylvania, the legislature was considering barring free blacks from moving into the state, and the U.S. Congress had recently passed the Fugitive Slave Law in 1850. In 1851, two of Shadd's children, Mary Ann and Isaac, moved to a town in Canada West (present-day Ontario), just north of Detroit, Michigan. Although Shadd had been a longtime opponent of both African colonization and Canadian migration, he and the rest of the Shadd family soon followed Mary Ann and Isaac to Canada West in 1852, where they settled in Raleigh Township. In 1859, Shadd was elected to the Raleigh Town Council and thus was the only person of African descent to gain an elective office in Canada West prior to the outbreak of the American Civil War. Shadd lived in Canada until his death in 1882.

Sierra Leone

The Republic of Sierra Leone is a small troubled country in West Africa. It is bordered on the west by Atlantic Ocean, on the north and east by Guinea, and on the south by Liberia. Its population is 5.8 million with 71,740 sq km of land and 120 sq km of water. About 10 percent of the population are descendants of freed slaves from the United States, the United Kingdom, Spain, and Cuba. It has tropical, humid summer and rain seasons. Its major cities are Freetown, Koindu, Bo, Kenema, and Makeni. Its major ethnic groups are Temne (30%), Mende (30%), Creole (10%), foreigners (1%), and others (29%). Sierra Leone has 60 percent Muslims, 10 percent Christians, and 30 percent African religions. The official language is English, but many speak Creole. Thirty-one percent of the population is literate. The nation has limited resources and little development because of insecurity and foreign domination of its minerals.

Sierra Leone is a democratic country. The Fulani Muslims converted many Mende and Temne people to Islam in the 18th century.

Archeologists affirm that people have been living in Sierra Leone since 2500 B.C.E. The Portuguese invaded it in 1460, named it “Lion Mountain,” and made it a slave-trade port. In 1787, freed slaves were deported to Sierra Leone from the United States, Cuba and Jamaica. The British invaded it in 1808, trained many slaves as missionaries, and established Fouray Bay College in 1827. Sierra Leone gained its independence on April 27, 1961. During the British rule, little development was made. President Ahmad Tejan Kabbah was elected in 1996, reinstated in 1998, and reelected in 2002. Sierra Leone has fought several wars that jeopardized her development. Many peace agreements have been made but not implemented. The United Nations had 8,000 peace-keeping troops in Sierra Leone as of 2004. At present, Sierra Leone is an underdeveloped country with 68 percent of the population living below poverty level.

Slave Breeding

The 1787 Constitutional Convention in Philadelphia set the stage for one of the most oppressive practices in the history of plantation slavery in the United States. As profits from tobacco steadily declined in the post-Revolutionary period, convention delegates from the Chesapeake—seeking to find a new source of revenue for their tidewater slaveholding constituencies—sought to end the direct imports of Africans into the United States. In this scenario, the prices for slaves in Virginia and Maryland would increase over time, ensuring the continued profitability of slavery in the Upper South. On the other hand, planters in the Lower South sought to extend the Atlantic slave trade indefinitely, assuming rightly that an increasing number of slave laborers would be required for the crop that would soon become the most profitable one in human history: cotton.

In the ensuing compromise, delegates agreed to a date certain for the end of the slave trade—January 1, 1808—which would give Lower South planters 20 years to import slaves and make necessary adjustments to accommodate the future need for additional labor. Within that time frame, planters in the cotton-producing Lower South greatly increased the number of African imports and created new mechanisms for the production and distribution of new labor. These two new methods—slave breeding and the domestic slave trade—turned the Upper South into a site for the reproduction of successive waves of new labor, who were then transported to the Lower South to help meet the enormous and ever-growing labor demand in the period between 1810 and 1860.

Between 1810 and 1860, a million enslaved African Americans were traded from the Upper South to the Lower South and into the western states and territories into which slavery was expanding as a result of the Louisiana Purchase, the 1836 Texas Revolution, and the 1846–1848 Mexican War. Many of those involved in this internal or domestic slave trade were children, teenagers, and young adult males. Slave breeding was a particularly vile system in which young enslaved women, often as young as ages 13 or 14, were paired with men and forced to bear children. In some cases, specific enslaved women could have as many as five or six children before turning 20. Enslaved women, at certain points, were offered incentives, and a few were even manumitted for providing their owners with 10 to 15 children. Although a handful of scholars have doubted the ubiquity or even the very existence of this practice, both slave narratives and the ex-slave interviews collected by the Works Progress Administration (WPA) in the 1930s provide harrowing firsthand accounts of the separation of mothers and fathers from their children. It was this very evidence that led sociologist E. Franklin Frazier and Sen. Daniel Patrick Moynihan to draw connections between slave breeding and the domestic slave trade and the instabilities and “webs of pathology” within 20th-century African American families.

Among historians, there is no clear consensus on whether slave breeding was a systematic and conscious attempt to increase slave supply in the cotton-producing regions of the Lower South. Indeed, there is even evidence that slave breeding may not have been unique to the Upper South and that it might actually have been more prevalent as a practice in the Lower South. Whatever the case may be, it is certain that slave breeding was not simply a figment of the collective imagination of 19th-century abolitionists and a handful of sympathetic 20th-century historians.

Slave Codes

A key component in the complex social and political system governing slavery, slave codes emerged as part of an extensive body of law aimed at regulating the lives and activities of enslaved African Americans in the United States. Slave codes were clear in defining slaves as property without full legal status, and they made slavery a permanent condition that was usually inherited through one's mother. The reach of these codes extended beyond those enslaved, however, given that many also had provisions that regulated free African Americans, their movement, their employment, and their options for housing and setting up permanent residence. The reach, breadth, and severity of individual slave codes varied, but all had a vested interest in curtailing slave resistance, policing the everyday lives of those enslaved, and protecting slave owners. Although these codes are commonly associated with Southern slave states, they could be found in their Northern counterparts as well.

All slave codes shared certain characteristics in terms of the control they attempted to wield over the personal activities of enslaved and often free African Americans, but individual slave states had their own codes in place that dictated their provisions and informed their court systems.

Enslaved African Americans had very few legal rights in a court of law; their testimony was seldom duly considered in any litigation involving whites and could be dismissed in its entirety. Trials for enslaved blacks were occasionally held in taverns or country stores and seldom resulted in parity. Codes banned enslaved individuals from owning property, marrying, or entering into contracts. They were also written to exert dominion over the language that slaves spoke and the clothes that they wore. Speaking words considered defamatory meant that one could be arrested, whipped, and/or sold at auction. Manumission, or the freeing of one's slaves, was also restricted through slave codes in many states, in an effort to secure the growth of slavery and restrict the presence of free African Americans.

Because slave codes were used largely to act as a form of social control, they were always subject to reformulation if a state felt that they needed to be strengthened in order to further discourage slave rebellions or to supplement already existing laws set out to protect the property and physical well-being of slave owners. Those enslaved were not allowed to assemble freely with one another or engage in communal worship, they could not be taught to read or write or possess literature that was considered inflammatory, and they could not vacate an owner's premises without explicit permission. Codes made it illegal for slaves to own firearms, attend unlawful assemblies, and participate in riots. Thus, the codes not only operated in an attempt to inhibit any form of resistance carried out by an individual person who was enslaved, but also were developed to suppress any semblance of communal gatherings that might lead to wide-scale uprisings or rebellions. As the rich history of African Americans makes clear, however, not all resistance could be curtailed, and many who were enslaved remained resolute in their pursuit of freedom.

The sheer brutality of slave codes and their corresponding punishments made them one of the most inhumane aspects of slavery. Submission to these codes was enforced through various measures, most of which exerted extreme force over any enslaved person found to act against a given code. Whippings, beatings, and floggings were commonly used forms of punishment, but other codes called for branding, dismemberment, imprisonment, and for males, castration. A 1690 statute in South Carolina, for instance, stated that slaves or runaways who struck a white person would be severely whipped on the first offense, followed by slitting of the nose and burning of a part of one's face with an iron for a second offense. A third offense could include death or any other punishment. In Virginia, robbing or committing any other major offense could be met with 60 lashes, being placed in stocks, and dismemberment. Slave owners, on the other hand, who killed their slaves or other enslaved blacks were usually subject only to fines.

Slave codes were frequently enforced by what were known as “slave patrols,” or groups of usually white men who went around various plantations making sure that slaves were inside of their quarters or otherwise not moving about freely. These patrols are sometimes seen as precursors to the Ku Klux Klan that flourished following emancipation, given the violence that they inflicted and the haunting presence that they had.

Slave codes were also antecedents to the black codes developed immediately after the American Civil War that extended throughout the earliest waves of Reconstruction. Like their predecessors, these later codes were developed to act as an agent of social control in the interest of curbing the social, political, and economic opportunities available to African Americans, who though legally free from bondage, were subject to an ever-increasing number of laws that in many ways attempted to reenact the restrictions and chief aims of slave codes.

Slave Diet

The slave diet emerged out of enslaved peoples’ practice of “making do” with the leftovers, scraps, and other locally available ingredients and food rations. The slave diet was also influenced by slaves' incorporation of widely circulated African, European, and indigenous foods and food practices, which they adapted to the material conditions of slavery.

Malnutrition and disease plagued the millions of enslaved Africans who were hoarded onto trading ships and transported to the Americas via the Middle Passage. Slave ship captains and trading companies employed various techniques to ensure that the greatest number of slaves made it to their destinations alive. Some especially astute companies concluded that Africans fared better during transport when they were fed some of their customary foods alongside some European staples such as dried beans, wheat, and barley. Corn, yams, malagueta peppers, millet, rice, palm oil, salt, and rum were a few of the staple provisions commonly stocked on slavers to accommodate the slaves' diet. Journals from several English slavers credit African women with preparing much of the food onboard the slavers. Generally speaking, most Africans who were transported to the United States came from agricultural societies. Those who hailed from Africa's Gold Coast were often transported alongside foodstuffs such as boiled yams, taros, okra, callaloo, watermelon, and plantains, which they incorporated into their New World diets. Bananas, spinach, mustard greens, eggplant, cassava, chilies, coconuts, oranges, avocados, legumes such as black-eyed and cow peas, broad beans, peanuts, and cola nuts were also transported to the Americas with the enslaved peoples and became incorporated into the diets of both slaves and their masters.

The foods that slaves subsisted on while in captivity varied greatly depending on their region of origin, the geographical location and size of the plantation to which they were tenured, the generosity or frugality of the plantation master or mistress, and the division of labor between house and field slaves. Food resources were closely monitored and rationed, and luxury ingredients such as fresh meat, spices, white flour, sugar, coffee, tea, and alcohol were reserved for the plantation kitchens. Slaves who cooked and cleaned in their masters' homes had direct access to these goods and ample opportunity to steal from the big house. House slaves who worked as cooks, maids, servants, mammies, and butlers sometimes lived in or closer to the big house and were usually allocated better quality and greater quantities of foods than the field slaves, who occupied a lesser position in plantation hierarchy. The children of field slaves provided the least amount of physical labor on the plantation and were sometimes allocated inadequate portions of the least nutritious foods. Sometimes they subsisted on only a stale piece of bread for breakfast, no noon meal, and the equivalent of a shared slop trough of leftovers for dinner. As a result, they were often malnourished.

On the sugarcane plantations of the Caribbean, saltcod was incorporated into the diets of field workers. Saltcod was inexpensive and easily transported and provided a cheap and nonperishable source of protein to sustain Caribbean slaves who performed backbreaking manual labor. Along the Georgia and Carolina Sea Islands, some plantation owners doled out a weekly food ration consisting of a peck of corn and a bushel of sweet potatoes; a quart of salt had to last a month, and slaves were sometimes granted salted meat and molasses to sustain them through especially labor-intensive tasks. Coarse flour, rice, and cornmeal were also distributed in closely monitored quantities. Slaves were allocated the least desirable portions of butchered meats—usually intestines, organs, ribs, heads and tails. Slaves had very rudimentary cooking equipment and little free time, so their culinary methods needed to be efficient. Boiling, frying, and grilling over open flame were popular cooking techniques.

Slaves were subject to harsh working conditions and inadequate food supply. The persistent lack of food, time, and material resources necessitated resourcefulness on the part of the slave. It was not uncommon for slaves to surreptitiously scavenge from the plantation larder under the cover of night to stave off hunger and provide for their families. Hunger and theft of dry goods, meat, livestock, and eggs are commonly cited in slave narratives. Significant numbers of slaves supplemented their meager rations with wild foods gathered from the fringes of their masters' properties. In addition to picking fruits, nuts, wild greens, and berries, many slaves trapped small game in the wooded areas on the fringes of plantation properties. Those with access to streams and coastal areas applied their skills to catch fresh fish, oysters, and shrimp. Some plantation owners also granted slaves permission to raise small barnyard birds and cultivate vegetables in their own private gardens. But slaves could tend their gardens and buy, sell, trade, scavenge, or cook for themselves only after the day's work had been completed.

Slave Driver

Within the hierarchy of plantation slavery, slave drivers were a vital cog in the operation of forced agricultural labor in the colonial and antebellum South. Drivers, or head slaves, typically supervised work gangs of 20 to 30 field slaves on cotton, rice, tobacco, and sugar plantations. These black men and women were responsible for organizing work gangs, maintaining the pace of work, guarding crops from arson, distributing food rations to field hands, and disciplining slaves lagging in their work duties. Unlike white overseers, who typically carried guns and rode or had access to horses, drivers utilized whips to maintain discipline and, very often, worked alongside members of the work gangs as agricultural laborers themselves.

The task of supervising work gangs was typically set aside for enslaved men and women who had served their owners with some degree of loyalty. They tended to be older, and many were male. Within the slave community, drivers occupied a tenuous space. As part of both the plantation hierarchy and the slave community, drivers had to be careful to perform their supervisory duties without being too harsh or draconian. This is because overly brutal drivers were sometimes killed by poison or other means by fellow slaves. Overt brutality was likely mitigated, in a few cases, by the fact that drivers were sometimes supervising family members and other loved ones. On the other hand, an overly permissive and lax driver could be returned to the status of field hand by his owner. Examples of maintaining this delicate balance include drivers who administered “fake” whippings, drivers who actively protected members of their work gangs from abusive white overseers, and a handful—including Nat Turner—who led or assisted in slave revolts. See also: Gang System; Overseers

Slave Plantation

Throughout the Southern North American colonies, and later Southern United States, plantations, or large-scale commercial farms, provided the foundation of the Southern agricultural system. What distinguished the plantation from the farm, in addition to size, was the use of a large slave labor force to grow primarily staple crops for profit. The model established in Virginia, and later adopted by other colonies as the economic pattern, focused initially on tobacco as the primary cash crop. Additional crops such as sugarcane, rice, and later cotton were grown on large plantations for distant markets.

Most white Southerners were farmers and did not own slaves, although most aspired to be able to purchase a slave. Those who did own slaves generally owned fewer than 10 slaves. To be called a “planter,” a plantation owner had to own 20 or more slaves. According to the 1860 census, only 1 out of every 30 Southern whites was a planter; fewer than 11,000 held 50 or more slaves, and fewer than 2,500 held over 100. A privileged elite of 11 planters owned more than 500, and only 1 master held more than 1,000.

From the 17th century, ownership of black slaves, in addition to land, identified the economically privileged. The possession of slaves became a badge of upper-class status. This division between management and labor set the planter apart from the small slaveholders, who often worked side by side in the fields along with the slaves. Within Southern society, the planter group, making up less than 4 percent of the adult white male population, held more than half the slaves. They produced most of the tobacco and cotton and all of the rice and sugar. Additionally, these planters dominated local, state, and national politics. Often planters lived in the grandeur that myth attributes to the entire class. Some planters’ wealth allowed for the leisure time to cultivate “Southern hospitality,” learning, and politics. Yet more regularly, the setting was less appealing. Generally, because planters managed a large enterprise, they had less time for leisure than legend suggests.

Contrary to popular mythology, most plantation mistresses did not live a life of idle leisure. For most, just as the masters busied himself with the business of managing the plantation, the mistress supervised the domestic household, oversaw the procurement and preparation of food, and organized the house cleaning and care of the sick. Often when the masters were away, the mistress also took on the responsibility of managing both the domestic and the business portions of the plantation.

Most slaves, whether on small farms or plantations, lived with their masters and worked under their supervision. Slaves living on larger plantations or those with absentee owners often worked under an overseer. Overseers on the largest plantations frequently came from the middle class of small farmers or were younger sons of planters. Most overseers desired to become slaveholders themselves; however, some preferred this middle-management position and moved from one plantation to another seeking more profitable opportunities. Generally, overseers were white, yet on occasion there were black overseers. The more common management position to which a slave could rise was that of “driver.” Slave drivers were assigned a small group of slaves and the task of getting that group to work without creating discord. Contemporary observers blamed any discord and much of the cruelty to slaves on the overseers. For much of the 18th century and into the 19th century, overseers were paid with a portion of the plantation’s crops. Thus, the system held built-in reasons for overseers to demand more of slaves than they were often able to give. Even after most planters moved to a salary system for overseers, no overseer who failed to make a good crop could expect to be retained. So the pressure to produce successful crops at the expense of the slaves remained. Therefore, overseers had to find the balance between being too lenient and being too harsh. In the end, power on the slave plantation rested on force. Violence and the threat of violence were an inherent part of this slave society, and standing at the top of this system were the planters.

For the slaves who labored on plantations, the preferred jobs were those of skilled craftsmen or domestic servants. Most, however, labored as field hands. Field hands worked long hours, from dusk till dawn; were housed in small wooden shacks with dirt floors; were provided a new set of clothes twice a year (shoes provided only in winter); and were seen by doctors only in the event of serious illness. It could be assumed that most slaves, if they had a choice, would have preferred to live on a small farm because the general perception was that life on a farm was less harsh than that on a plantation. However, slaves on the plantation had the advantage of close contact with fellow Africans with whom they shared cultural norms and practices and developed a unique slave culture.

Slave Quarters

Slave quarters were the designated area on an antebellum plantation where the majority of the enslaved people had their cabins and tended their gardens. On many of the larger plantations, this section resembled a small village, and its size demonstrated the extent of the slaveholder’s wealth and power to visitors and slaves alike. The contrast between the big house and the cabins of the quarters strengthened the existing paternalistic system by reinforcing both physical and psychological distance between master and slave.

The house servants generally stayed in proximity to the main residence above the kitchen, workshop, or stables. Behind and beyond the owner’s domicile, the more numerous farm workers lodged close to the fields in considerably inferior accommodations. Most Southern planters had little incentive to divert their resources for the benefit of slaves until the advent of the agricultural reform movements of the mid-19th century; several of these educational campaigns cited the economic advantages of providing clean, well-built dwellings for the captive labor force.

Slave housing varied considerably as to size and quality and depended on when and where the structures were built, as well as the financial situation of the landowner. Depending on geography and local custom, the cabins in the quarters might consist of stone, brick, plank, or most commonly, log. In his autobiography, Booker T. Washington, who was born a slave, described his birthplace as a typical one-room log cabin, about 14 by 16 feet square, without glazed windows or a proper door. A large open fireplace served for both heating and cooking. In the center of the dirt floor was a large, deep hole covered with boards where Washington's mother stored sweet potatoes during the winter.

Rudimentary habitations such as Washington's could be quite crowded. Often entire extended families, from babies to grandparents, shared the same single room and slept on crude beds of straw or corn-shucks. Despite the lack of most material comforts, the relatives living together developed and nurtured close familial ties. The inhabitants of the other nearby cabins provided additional opportunities for fellowship and community.

This sense of community mitigated the oppressive effects of slavery, to some degree. An elaborate network of kinship linked slaves together. The quarters became a clearinghouse for news that affected the enslaved population and provided a gathering place where storytelling became a primary means of passing survival skills and cultural heritage on to succeeding generations. The residents shared information about births, deaths, illnesses, and separations that had occurred on their own and other plantations. This continuous dialogue enabled the enslaved people to preserve their sense of self-identity and to maintain connections within their often forcibly divided families.

The quarters were the nexus of black family life. As such, they functioned as the primary sites from which the folkways and customs of a distinctive African American culture emerged and matured. Besides the overseer, few whites ventured into the quarters, and when they did, they did not stay long. Enslaved people created a separate vision of reality within the restricted, yet malleable space allotted to them. This alternative landscape, created almost entirely by the slaves themselves, facilitated racial solidarity and provided temporary respite from their owners' control after the work day had ended.

Slave Resistance

In 1791, the former Haitian slave Toussaint Louverture transformed a slave rebellion into a revolution and the abolition of slavery. The success of the Haitian revolution instilled fear in the slaveholders of the Southern United States. This fear was well founded. After slave importation was legally ended in 1808, the U.S. South was the only area of the Americas to maintain and grow its slave population by natural increase. But as slavery grew in the Southern states, so too did American slave resistance. By the time of the Civil War, more than 250 small-scale slave revolts had occurred in the South.

One significant revolt was that planned by Gabriel (Prosser). He spent months planning his rebellion for August 1800, in the Richmond area of Virginia. About 1,000 slaves, many armed, met at the agreed-upon place on August 30, but a rainstorm had flooded the roads and bridges, making the rebellion impossible. Meanwhile, two slaves had informed their master of the plot. Responding to the master's plea, Virginia's governor, James Monroe, sent in the state militia. Prosser attempted to escape but was betrayed again by two other slaves. Along with his 15 other rebels, he was hung on October 7. In total, at least 35 rebels were executed in the wake of the failed rebellion.

Denmark Vesey planned another abortive large-scale rebellion, this time in South Carolina. Vesey—born Telemarque—was brought from West Africa as a slave and sold to Joseph Vesey in 1771. In 1800, he won a lottery prize and purchased his freedom, and in 1822, he began planning a rebellion with other members of his African church. The revolt was scheduled for July 14, 1822, but several slaves confessed the plot to their masters in June. Vesey and his co-conspirators were captured on June 22, and 37 people were executed soon after, including Vesey himself on July 2.

Fears of attempted revolts became more acute in the South—where approximately 40 percent of the Southern population was black, and black-white ratios on larger plantations exceeded 10 to 1. Paranoia became particularly acute after Nat Turner's rebellion in 1831. But for abolitionists, Prosser, Vesey, and Turner became martyrs to the slaves' cause, like Toussaint Louverture. As late as 1855, the black abolitionist William Wells Brown predicted that a great slave leader would yet appear in the Southern states.

Beyond this violent slave resistance in the U.S. South itself, Africans had also mutinied on slave ships 392 times by 1860—on as many as 10 percent of slave-ship voyages. Most famous were the Amistad and Creole revolts of 1839 and 1841. In late June 1839, captive West Africans rebelled and seized control of the Spanish slave-ship Amistad, which was traveling along the coast of Cuba. The rebel leader was Sengbe Pieh (popularly known as Joseph Cinque), and he ordered the surviving crew members to sail the ship, with its 53 slaves, to Africa. But for two months, the crew moved the ship back west at night, until it was sighted and seized by the U.S. Navy off the coast of Long Island in late August. The Africans were charged with murder, and abolitionists took up their cause. They were declared legally free by a federal trial court in 1840 and by the Supreme Court in 1841. By 1842, they had returned to Africa.

Around the same time, in 1841, Madison Washington led a slave revolt onboard the U.S. brig Creole and brought into sharp relief the now-divergent paths of Britain and America around the question of slavery. The ship left the port of Richmond, Virginia, on October 25, 1841, with 135 slaves. It was bound for New Orleans, Louisiana, where the slaves would be sold at auction. As it neared Abaco Island in the Bahamas, Washington and 18 other slaves seized pistols and knives, subdued the crew, and sailed for British-controlled Nassau, a port in the Bahamas. The British Emancipation Act of 1833 had ended slavery in the empire, and the slaves knew they would be freed upon entering the port. The U.S. secretary of state demanded that the British return the slaves and the ship, but British officials ruled that local laws applied to the Creole. The slaves were taken ashore and set free, and the Creole eventually reached New Orleans on December 2, 1841, without its human cargo. In 1853, the former slave and abolitionist Frederick Douglass used elements of the Creole incident in his historical novella The Heroic Slave.

Such forcible resistance made the antislavery crusade a precursor of the violent Civil War. The white abolitionist John Brown certainly saw the connection between Washington's revolt and his own violent action, taken on the eve of the war. He purportedly sent for Washington while preparing his October 1859 raid on Harpers Ferry, and though Washington did not join him, Brown took inspiration from the Creole revolt and hoped that an armed slave rebellion across the South would accompany his own raid.

That effort took place on October 16, 1859. With his interracial band of 21 men, Brown launched an attack against the institution of slavery. He captured the town of Harpers Ferry, intending that slaves use arms from its federal arsenal to rise up and claim their freedom. But federal forces overwhelmed the band after 36 hours, and Brown was indicted on counts of assault, murder, conspiracy, and treason. Most of his men were hung, including Shields Green, a fugitive slave from Charleston, South Carolina. Green had escaped from slavery and reached Canada, only to return to the United States to seek out Douglass. On August 19, 1859, he had joined Douglass at a meeting with Brown, in a disused quarry pit near Chambersburg, Pennsylvania. Brown tried to persuade both Douglass and Green to join his raid on Harpers Ferry, and although Douglass refused, Green agreed.

During the raid, Green severed telegraph wires and helped capture the armory, the arsenal, and the rifle works. He went to bring in slaves from the surrounding areas as soon as the arsenal was captured. This meant he was outside the town when Brown and his men surrendered. But when hearing that all was lost, he reentered the besieged area to be by Brown's side. In a newspaper article a few years later, Douglass put Green alongside Vesey and Nat Turner as men who gave everything and fell as martyrs for the cause of antislavery.

The violent slave resistance attempted by Green, Prosser, Vesey, Turner, Cinque, and Washington also had a long-established rhetorical counterpart. Outnumbered on plantations and alarmed by slave revolts, slaveholders were further disturbed by abolitionists' rhetoric of violent resistance. As early as 1829, David Walker's scripture-infused pamphlet Appeal to the Coloured Citizens had called for violent slave resistance. Walker—a free black and most likely a conspirator in Vesey's plans for rebellion—encouraged slave uprisings and prophesied a black revolution. He also instructed blacks to kill anyone who tried to enslave them. In 1830, runaway slaves were purportedly discovered with copies of Walker's Appeal, and other armed slaves launched an uprising near New Bern, apparently incited by the same pamphlet.

This abolitionist rhetoric of violent resistance became more prevalent after the Fugitive Slave Law of 1850. Now the advocated resistance was defensive, rather than the aggressive resistance of slave rebellions. Numerous black abolitionists, including former slaves, promoted defensive action against attempts to enforce the law. One, Joshua B. Smith, circulated weapons at an abolitionist meeting, and at another meeting, in Philadelphia on October 14, 1850, several hundred free blacks passed a resolution that they would resist to the death any attempt to enforce the law. The following year, fugitives fought slave catchers trying to re-enslave them in Pennsylvania, and the black radical James McCune Smith insisted that whites could understand slave resistance only if it was performed in their own language—force.

In fact, fugitive slaves and their allies repeatedly performed defensive acts of resistance. For example, John Brown responded to the Fugitive Slave Law by forming the League of Gileadites, a black self-defense unit named after the biblical army tested by God before battle. To the league's black members in Springfield, Massachusetts, he suggested a range of guerilla tactics. And as another form of resistance to slavery, this defensive action was apparently effective. In June 1854, a few days after both federal and state military forces had arrived in Boston to return Anthony Burns to slavery, William Wells Brown visited Springfield. He observed that the league was more than ready to carry out John Brown's advice. When slave catchers arrived, the authorities anticipated violent resistance and advised them to leave. Fearful for their safety, the slave catchers left town for New York without attempting to take anyone by force. No fugitive slave was ever disturbed in Springfield after that, remembered William Wells Brown.

Yet although these acts of defensive and aggressive violence garnered the most press attention as methods of slave resistance, American slaves did practice other methods too. On a day-to-day basis, they could work slowly, steal food, and break equipment. Many attempted escape, some for short periods in order to temporarily deny their masters access to labor power and so effect negotiations over marriage rights, free time, and religious freedoms. Others left permanently and formed fugitive communities, or “maroon colonies,” in the surrounding forests, swamps, and mountains. Still others left for the free states. Assisted by the Underground Railroad, a vast network of individuals who helped fugitive slaves reach the North and Canada, as many as 100,000 people escaped between 1830 and 1860.

By the time of the Civil War, Frederick Douglass had summed up and celebrated all these varied methods of slave resistance. As a slave, he had practiced day-to-day resistance, explaining in his autobiography that he would stay at camp meetings longer than expected by his master. He then embraced the method of escape in 1838, commented that northbound fugitives were acting out the Declaration of Independence itself, and praised the Underground Railroad as a profound and perilously achieved gift to enslaved people. But he also celebrated violent resistance. Eventually, he came to see all methods as parts of the same whole: a drive to resist and to gain freedom.

Smith, Gerrit

Gerrit Smith (1797–1874) was a white abolitionist and philanthropist. He was born in Utica, New York, in 1797. As a teenager, he worked on his father's farm in Peterboro, New York, alongside slaves. Smith always maintained that it was this experience that prompted him to devote his life to ending slavery. Upon Smith's graduation from Hamilton College in 1818, his father gave him most of the land he owned. As a result, at the age of 21, he was one of the largest landowners in New York. In 1822, he married Ann Carroll Fitzhugh, with whom he had eight children.

In 1835, he attended a meeting of the New York Anti-Slavery Society in Utica, New York. The meeting was disrupted by a mob, and a number of delegates were beaten. As a result, he invited the society to meet at his estate in Peterboro. This deepened his commitment to abolition. In the 1840s, Smith donated over 120,000 acres of land to more than 3,000 poor black men in Northern New York. He wanted to ensure that they met a state requirement that only men who owned property could vote. Additionally, Smith believed that giving the land to the men would allow them to become self-sufficient.

Smith was one of the founding members of the Liberty Party, a national political party that promoted abolitionism in the west. He was the party's presidential candidate in the 1848 and 1852 elections and was elected to the U.S. House of Representatives in 1853 as an independent. While in Congress, he was a strong spokesman for the abolitionist movement. After serving only one term, he decided not to run for reelection. He used his home as a station for the Underground Railroad, a group of antislavery activists who assisted slaves escaping from their owners. In 1850, a fugitive slave from Missouri named William John Henry was captured in Syracuse, New York. Smith quickly came to his aid and paid for Henry's legal defense. He was ultimately set free, and for the next seven years, Smith held an annual celebration in honor of Henry's freedom.

Smith had a longstanding friendship with fellow abolitionist John Brown. In 1849, he sold Brown 244 acres of land in North Elba, New York. Brown settled his family, and many black families, on the land. Smith donated money to Brown to establish a refuge for fugitive slaves in Virginia. In 1859, Brown and a group of supporters raided a federal arsenal at Harpers Ferry, Virginia. They wanted to acquire guns to create an army dedicated to freeing slaves. This is generally considered to be one of the primary events that prompted the Civil War. Brown was arrested, and a check from Smith was discovered in his pocket. Smith denied any knowledge of the raid itself and always maintained that he was merely supporting Brown's efforts to build the slave refuge.

After Brown was hanged for insurrection, Smith became worried that he would be arrested and executed. The local militia in Peterboro was called up to protect his estate. The governor of Virginia encouraged slave owners to capture Smith and bring him to the state to stand trial. As a result of his intense fear of being arrested, Smith experienced a mental breakdown and spent seven weeks in a mental asylum.

After the Civil War, Smith remained active in the abolitionist movement. He wrote an essay critical of the nation for failing to strongly support the rights of blacks. Gerrit Smith died on December 28, 1874.

Smith, James McCune

James McCune Smith (1813–1865) was born in New York City to parents who had successfully obtained their freedom. As a young boy, he was educated in the African Free Schools, where he established lifelong relationships with others who would also become significant activists, including Henry Highland Garnet and George Downing. Even as a child, Smith's intelligence singled him out for special recognition. At the age of 11, he was selected by the African Free School teachers to prepare a speech in honor of a visit from Revolutionary War hero General Lafayette. When he was 14, Smith witnessed one of the most historic occasions in New York City's black community, the Emancipation Day celebration. Despite his young age, Smith later wrote one of the most revealing accounts of the commemorative activities, which included a parade complete with drums, dancing, and music. Although Smith was clearly inspired by the excitement of legal emancipation, he was soon faced with the persistence of racism. Despite his obvious gift for science, Smith was denied admission to American medical schools on the basis of race. Sorely disappointed, he soon received assistance from activist Peter Williams Jr., who arranged for Smith to enroll at the University of Glasgow in Scotland. Thus, in 1832, Smith sailed for Scotland, where he spent the next five years earning three degrees: a BA (1835), an MA (1836), and an MD (1837).

In 1837, Smith returned to his home in New York City and opened a successful medical practice and two pharmacies. His political activism began almost immediately; he fought openly against slavery and helped to create the Young Men's Anti-Slavery Society shortly after his return home. Yet he soon found that most of his associates were obsessed with another political issue: the growing rise of the American Colonization Society, an organization that they feared would forcibly remove black people from the United States. Smith responded to the call by joining the anticolonization struggle. On January 8, 1839, black New Yorkers convened the "Great Anti-Colonization Meeting" in order to protest against the "scheme" of African colonization. Smith was among the strongest leaders who addressed the crowd, offering an unequivocal manifesto on the horrors of colonization. Describing the notion as anti-republican and un-Christian, they asserted the United States as the only logical home for free blacks. Smith's reputation as an orator also led him to deliver two additional addresses in the 1840s: "A Lecture on the Haitian Revolution" in 1841 and "The Destiny of the People of Color" in 1843.

James McCune Smith's determination to eradicate racism and claim American citizenship on behalf of the race often caused him to assume rather controversial positions. During the 1840s, for example, he was extremely outspoken in his opposition to separate black organizations. He believed that, given racial conflict in the United States, it was necessary to form successful biracial coalitions. As a result, he opposed the call for a statewide colored convention in New York on the grounds that independent black action was a form of racial exclusivity that threatened the cause of racial advancement. After considerable debate and conflict, Smith was finally convinced to attend the New York State colored conventions, but he never relinquished his concerns about potential racial divisiveness. Instead, he increased his public activities on a wide range of political issues locally and nationally.

On the local level, Smith demonstrated his growing concern with the plight of working-class blacks. In 1843, he became the physician for the Colored Orphan Asylum and diligently worked for more than a decade on behalf of these children. In 1850, Smith also assisted in the establishment of a new organization to address the needs of black workers, the American League of Colored Laborers, which advocated for education and training in mechanical skills as a method to improve conditions for their people.

In the following year, he convened a gathering of black New Yorkers to assess the state of their people. Dr. Smith prepared a rather elaborate statement on the socioeconomic status of the black community, outlining the vice plaguing their people and the economic problems that drove people to desperation. He revealed that black people had been denied equal access to education and skilled training and had therefore been reduced to the lowest occupations. In response, Smith developed a practical, though ill conceived, solution to his people's struggles. Although similar plans had not been successful, Smith suggested that black people should abandon the city en masse and relocate back to the country. Through this project, Smith developed a friendship with white abolitionist Gerrit Smith, and the two men collaborated for many years thereafter. Obviously, the plan never fully took shape, but Smith's plan for a return to an agricultural lifestyle demonstrated both his desperation and his dedication to improving conditions for his people.

James McCune Smith's national activism manifested itself in a wide range of issues during the 1850s. At the opening of the decade, he became particularly active following the passage of the Fugitive Slave Act. Outraged by this legislation, Smith joined the Committee of Thirteen, an organization designed to protect and defend fugitives. He became particularly famous for a public confrontation with his white pastor at St. Phillip's Church, during which Smith chastised him for not opposing the Fugitive Slave Act. After the minister declared that they must uphold the laws of the United States, James McCune Smith confronted him and reportedly "raised the Devil" with his anger. His activism with the Committee of Thirteen eventually caused Smith to refocus his energies on the cause of anticolonization. In January 1852, the Committee of Thirteen convened the black community in Abyssinian Baptist Church to declare their opposition to colonization and assert their rights as American citizens. They were particularly concerned because New York governor Hunt had endorsed colonization and was apparently considering a plan to provide funds to finance forced removal of the black population. Smith was elected as a delegate to a meeting with the governor and ultimately convinced Hunt to reverse his position.

During this period, Smith also gained a reputation within the national black leadership. He was a regular contributor to Frederick Douglass's newspapers under the pseudonym Communipaw. He also represented New York City at the 1853 Colored Convention and played a critical role in attempting to create a national black organization, the National Council of the Colored People (NCCP). The idea for the NCCP was to implement the success of local associations on the national level and create a power-base of black leaders across the North. However, the NCCP was plagued by disorganization from its inception, and the organization never fully developed. Unable to reproduce their local effectiveness on the national level, activists abandoned the NCCP in 1855, only two years after it commenced.

Despite the failure of the NCCP, however, James McCune Smith remained nationally active. In particular, in 1855, he became the first black man in American history to chair a national political convention. The Radical Abolition Party, formerly the Liberty Party, held its inaugural convention in Syracuse, New York, in June 1855 and hoped to gain the endorsement of black voters by selecting Smith as its chairman. Ironically, Smith had opposed the Liberty Party in the 1840s because he believed the organization had not sufficiently advocated on behalf of the free black population. However, the reorganized political party made a concerted effort to incorporate black men, and Smith had been convinced to provide his support to the struggling organization. Smith was rewarded for his loyalty, for they selected him as the nominee for secretary of state in 1857. Yet despite their best efforts, the Radical Abolition Party did not make major inroads with either the black community or the American political system. As a result, by 1858, most black leaders, including Smith, had abandoned the organization.

Even with all of Smith's political activism, perhaps his most well-known activity was his very public conflict with Henry Highland Garnet beginning in 1858. Garnet had recently founded the African Civilization Society, an organization designed to spread religion and establish business relationships in Africa. In particular, the society was interested in exploring the possibility of cotton production in West Africa, an endeavor it hoped would provide competition for Southern cotton and destroy the system of slavery. However, the controversial portion of the plans lay in the idea that free blacks should migrate from the United States and assist in the development of Liberia. Although Garnet insisted that emigration should be entirely voluntary, both Smith and fellow activists George Downing and Frederick Douglass denounced Garnet and his society. There was, in particular, a very public confrontation between Smith and Garnet that played out in the pages of the Anglo-African Magazine. Smith challenged Garnet to focus his energy on the condition of black people in the United States, instead of other countries throughout the world. According to Smith, he and Garnet had made a pledge 25 years earlier that they would devote their lives to uplift the black race, fight for abolition, and gain the suffrage. Smith maintained that because they had not yet achieved their goals, Garnet was obligated to honor his agreement. For months, the two men exchanged ugly words about each other and the colonization issue, a nasty debate that ultimately deeply wounded both of the old friends. In fact, Smith and Garnet remained at odds until 1862 when they reunited over the cause of slaves during the Civil War.

Up until his death, Smith remained active in the black community. In 1861, he helped finance the creation of the black newspaper the Anglo-African Magazine and, in 1863, was appointed as a professor of anthropology at the black Wilberforce College. Unfortunately, a continuing heart problem prevented Smith from actually joining the faculty, a condition that eventually took his life in November 1865. His final major contribution was authoring an introduction to Henry Highland Garnet's address before Congress in February 1865. It was, in the end, a beautiful tribute to his friend, and old adversary, and their shared commitment to black liberation. Smith died on November 17, 1865, just weeks after the passage of the 13th Amendment. He left behind a wife and five children.

Southern Free Blacks

Prior to the American Revolution, free black people were rare in the South, but following the Revolution, the number of free blacks in the South increased. For example, in Virginia in 1782, less than 1 percent of the total African American population was free; however, by 1800, the number of free blacks was more than 4 percent of the total African American population. In the wake of the Revolution, slaves were freed through manumission, or they simply used the chaos created by the Revolution to flee their masters.

Although the number of free blacks increased in the immediate aftermath of the American Revolution, so too did the fear of free blacks inciting a slave uprising increase in the South. Sensing that free blacks might become agitators of a slave revolt, most Southern states passed laws that required the monitoring of free blacks. In 1793, for instance, Virginia passed a law stating that all free blacks had to register with the local county court. Similarly, a South Carolina law limited the mobility of free black sailors; anytime a ship docked at a South Carolina port, the free blacks were jailed until the ship's departure. It was the responsibility of the ship's captain to pay for the cost of jailing, and if he refused to pay, the free blacks could be sold as slaves.

Laws created after 1800 were aimed at forcing free blacks out of a state or preventing slaves from becoming free. North Carolina required free blacks to leave the state 90 days after receiving their freedom, and Virginia passed a law requiring free blacks to leave the state after 1 year. States such as Georgia, South Carolina, Alabama, and Mississippi outlawed manumission by a slave owner.

Following Nat Turner's revolt in 1831, restrictions against free blacks were tightened further. In Raleigh, North Carolina, every free black was arrested following Turner's Virginia revolt. Virginia's state legislature denied free blacks the right to trial by jury and also forbade free blacks from preaching. Throughout the South, the rights of free blacks became severely restricted as they were prohibited from conducting business or even selling produce.

Despite the many limitations placed on free blacks, namely the time that newly freed blacks could remain in a state, the laws were not enforced actively in all areas throughout the South. Free blacks lived in Southern states for decades with the aid of their former masters or sympathetic whites who proved to the local county courts or state legislatures that a free black was important to the local economy and would be well-behaved.

Regardless of whether free blacks were allowed to remain in a state, there were still certain things that had to be done to protect their freedom. Each free black was required to register with local county courts and carry a freedom certificate at all times. If a free black person was stopped and could not prove his or her freedom, he or she could be fined and sold into slavery. Even if a free black person could prove his or her freedom, the person's safety was not guaranteed. It became quite profitable during the first half of the 19th century to kidnap free black families and sell them into slavery.

Another obstacle confronting free black families was providing for their children. On numerous occasions, free black parents signed indentures for their children that bound them to a white employer. The reasons for indenturing a child were twofold—first, some families were too poor to care for their children, and second, some parents believed that it would prove useful for their children to learn a skill as an apprentice. Despite the parents' good intentions, many white employers treated the indentured children horribly. Conditions for many young apprentices were comparable to that of slaves. The horrible treatment caused many to run away. The free black children were tracked and, if found, confronted severe punishment—their indenture could be extended, or they could be sold into slavery. Many Southern free blacks, despite the dangers, also worked hard to help slaves escape. If a free black was caught helping a slave, he or she could be sold into slavery or in some cases executed. Nonetheless, free blacks hid runaways and obtained vital information that slaves could use to obtain their freedom.

In the mid-19th century, animosity toward free blacks continued to deepen as Southern states tried to find ways to rid themselves of free blacks. Some states pushed colonization as a solution, and some states, such as Virginia, offered free blacks the option to return to slavery and choose their own master. Anti-free black propaganda was rampant as well. For example George Fitzhugh, a native of Port Royal Virginia, wrote a number of works on problems that free blacks created in a slave society.

Despite many repressive laws, Southern free blacks did have some successes. Some were able to purchase loved ones still on bondage, and others were able to become businessmen and skilled craftsmen. Regardless of their efforts and as much as they tried, however, Southern free blacks would not enjoy any of the basic rights of free people until after the end of the American Civil War.

Stewart, Maria

Maria Miller Stewart (1803–1879) was the first American woman to speak in public to an audience comprising different genders and races. She was also one of the first African American women to conspicuously write and speak boldly about political matters.

Maria Miller was born in Hartford, Connecticut, in 1803. She was orphaned at the age of five and was consequently indentured to a clergyman and his family until she was 15 years old. Although Miller was born free, she never received any formal education. Her literacy was gained by reading the Bible and through attendance at Sabbath Schools, or schools for religious instruction. Miller's mastery of the Bible would later prove to be one of the major catalysts for her anti-enslavement and women's rights activism. She believed herself to be a God-ordained prophet, activist, and abolitionist.

In 1826, at age 23, Maria Miller married James Stewart, a successful property owner and entrepreneur in Boston, Massachusetts. Maria Miller became Mrs. Maria W. Stewart, after adopting her husband's middle initial as well as his last name. The Stewarts were married by the Rev. Thomas Paul, a prominent figure in both the antislavery and independent black Baptist church movements. Reverend Paul's pastorate was located in the African Meeting House, the epicenter for many of the antislavery activities that took place in the Boston area. Stewart would later give one of her powerful speeches there in 1831. After three years of marriage, Stewart's husband became gravely ill—perhaps suffering from scarlet fever—and died. This was the same year that David Walker published his antislavery pamphlet titled An Appeal to the Coloured Citizens of the World.

Because the Stewarts were childless, and because of unscrupulous white businessmen to whom Stewart's husband had entrusted his business affairs, Stewart was left with no inheritance from her husband, although she should have been left with sufficient resources for a comfortable life. The white businessmen with whom her husband had done business for years essentially stole his assets by claiming that he had died while indebted to them. Stewart promptly took her case to court. Although the judge acknowledged the merits of Stewart's case and the unethical behavior of the defendants, the judge ultimately decided the case against Stewart.

This harsh experience led Stewart to encourage black women to sue for their rights and to emphatically resist the social limitations placed on them. Stewart encouraged woman to develop varied interests out of the domestic sphere, fully develop their intellectual capacities, and become activists for equal rights. She also placed high priority on women educating their children in the ways of God, black community solidarity, and knowledge of African history.

Stewart's activism was also heavily influenced by her spiritual conversion and the person and writings of David Walker. After the deaths of both her husband and Walker, which occurred one year apart, Stewart reexamined the Bible as a means to deal with her grief. Her Bible reading led her to conclude that slavery was sinful and that God would undoubtedly punish slaveholders. Stewart was confident in her proclamation because it was God who had "called" her into public service to speak out in support of abolition and justice.

Stewart's first essay, titled "Religion and the Pure Principles of Morality," was published in 1831 in the abolitionist publication the Liberator. Following Walker's lead, Stewart laid bare the hypocrisy of a nation that claimed Christianity but would allow the wretchedness of enslavement. Likewise, Stewart used her rhetorical skill to stridently chastise blacks who would not take up the anti-enslavement cause for fear of reprisal. A product of her time, Stewart also chastised black women for not striving to be chaste and refined women. Stewart believed that moral defect and character gave white people all the more reason for enslaving them. The core of Stewart's beliefs were that blacks in America possessed a rich history in Africa worthy of duplication in America; that blacks possessed great intellect and moral virtue; that community solidarity was essential to black people's advancement in society; and that education would lead to liberty.

Stewart's messages underscore the fact that although many whites were sympathetic to the abolitionist cause, there were just as many whites who, although they believed in abolitionism, did not consider any black person, bond or free, as equal in humanity. Belief in black self-help spurred Stewart to become a founding member of the Afric-American Literary Society, whose mission was to advance morality, purity, and knowledge within the black community.

Stewart's rhetoric and style proved to be too revolutionary, even for the black community. Because blacks were working to gain acceptance within the white community, Stewart's forceful rhetoric, denunciation, and exposition of the ills of the black community were seen as a threat to the advancement of the community to which she belonged. The rejection and opposition Stewart received succeeded in muffling her powerful voice. After scarcely three years, Stewart chose to end her public activist career. She died in relative obscurity in 1879.

Still, William

From the 1860s through the end his life 40 years later, William Still (1821–1902) was the model of late-19th-century civic activism, entrepreneurship, and philanthropy. Amassing considerable wealth across a variety of ventures (including real estate, heating stoves, and coal), Still simultaneously pushed a reform agenda aimed at bettering the lives of others. He served on the Freedmen's Aid Commission after the Civil War, supported orphanages and almshouses, organized against some of Philadelphia's earliest Jim Crow laws, and received election to such bodies as the Philadelphia Board of Trade. Yet, had none of this occurred, had his life's achievements included only that accomplished before the Civil War, William Still's place in history would have been assured nonetheless. As his obituary in the New York Times reminded readers, he was "the Father of the Underground Railroad."

William Still was born in New Jersey in 1821, the son of a fugitive slave mother and a freed father. As late as 1807, his parents, Levin and Sidney Steel, had been enslaved in Maryland. Levin's owner allowed him to purchase his freedom and leave the state. But that also meant leaving his wife and four children. Undaunted, Levin and Sidney conspired to rendezvous in New Jersey. After one thwarted attempt to flee to her husband with all their children in tow, Sidney Steel fled again, this time with only two of the children (the Steels hoped to return later for their two eldest sons, but the boys were soon sold south).

Changing their identities (Sidney became "Charity"; the Steels became the "Stills"), the family lived under a guise of free status. At least a dozen more children were born to Levin and Charity Still while they were exiled in New Jersey, including William. The Stills eventually acquired land and lived the life of a farm family. William received little formal education but did become literate and avidly pursued a course of self-education. By the age of 24, he felt ready to take on the world and traveled to Philadelphia to seek his fortune.

Philadelphia in the 1840s was a promising place for a young African American man. The city's black population had grown consistently during the antebellum years, largely at the expense of other states' black populations. As the 1850 census demonstrated, only 4 in 10 black Philadelphians were natives of Pennsylvania. More tellingly, 50 percent of blacks in the city had been born in slave states. Despite such beginnings, black Philadelphians supported more than a dozen churches and numerous societies, organizations, and benevolent groups. Indeed, real estate ownership among African Americans in the city was the highest in the North.

Working odd jobs around the city for three years—bricklayer, stevedore, teamster, waiter, and domestic, among other jobs—William met his fate, twice, in 1847. First he came to know the woman who would be his wife, Letitia George. Next, William answered a help-wanted advertisement from the Pennsylvania Anti-Slavery Society. Knowing his own family's struggle against slavery, he recognized an opportunity to contribute to the cause. From this decision, he received an unexpected reward in 1850. While working in the Anti-Slavery Society's office, he was introduced to a fugitive slave from Alabama. William quickly discovered the man to be his brother Peter (whom he had never met), one of the children left behind when Sidney Steel fled Maryland. Soon, then, after 40 years, mother and son were finally reunited.

William Still rose to chairman of the Pennsylvania Anti-Slavery Society in 1851. The following year, he and nearly two dozen others formed a "vigilance" committee. Like its counterparts elsewhere—especially Boston and New York—the Philadelphia Vigilance Committee aided fugitive slaves coming to the city. Offering shelter, food, medical attention, finance, transportation, and a network of contacts in other cities, the committee helped blacks keep running, urging most on to Canada. Through this organization, William Still made his greatest impact.

Still served as acting committee chairman for the vigilance committee, corresponding with kindred groups across the nation and keeping record of the group's activities—documenting and interviewing persons assisted, maintaining a file of correspondences with co-conspirators, and tracking funds expended to those in the field. The number of fugitives coming to and through Philadelphia increased exponentially as the antebellum era pressed forth.

From 1852 through 1860, Still was perhaps the most active agent of the Underground Railroad, documenting nearly 800 fugitives as having arrived at his Philadelphia offices (more than half from Maryland, Still's own ancestral home). In his work, he came to depend on hundreds of little-known and anonymous Philadelphians; he cooperated and conspired with like-minded reformers around the nation, including Harriet Tubman, Thomas Garrett, and Lewis Tappan. Meanwhile, Still and his Philadelphia cohorts assisted in many daring and noted escapes. Some, such as Henry "Box" Brown, who was "mailed" to freedom from Richmond, Virginia, had been Underground Railroad operations from beginning to end. Most of Still's work, however, involved assistance given to those literally arriving at his door—those whose escapes had been mainly the product of Southern people's efforts. Still used runaway ads cut from Southern newspapers to track who was on the run and might be coming his way.

In 1859, William Still aided several of John Brown's accomplices fleeing western Virginia after their ill-fated insurrection at Harpers Ferry. Somehow linked to the insurrectionaries, and fearing investigation, Still took several precautions, including burying his journals from a decade of Underground Railroad activity in a local black cemetery, where they remained until well after the war. Still exhumed the journals by 1872 and published them as The Underground Railroad: A Record of Facts, Authentic Narratives, Letters, Etc. The result of Still's meticulous recordation, the book serves as the most solid documentation that an "underground" of agents, loosely coordinated, did in fact exist for the purpose of assisting enslaved persons fleeing to freedom. William Still died in 1902.

Stowe, Harriet Beecher

Harriet Beecher Stowe (1811–1896) was a 19th-century American novelist whose Uncle Tom's Cabin (1852) is forever etched into the annals of African American history. Born on June 14, 1811, in Litchfield, Connecticut, to Rev. Lyman Beecher, a well-known Congregational minister, and Roxanna Foote Beecher (who died when Harriet was five years old), Harriet was one of 11 brothers and sisters. Under Reverend Beecher's direction, Harriet and her siblings—many of whom went on to secure national reputations in their own right—committed their lives to education and reform. Harriet's first-rate education (remarkably unusual for a 19th-century woman) was first cultivated within the doors of her sister Catherine's school, the Hartford Female Seminary, where Harriet would later teach.

Her education was further advanced in 1832 when Reverend Beecher was named president of Lane Theological Seminary, and Harriet moved along with her family to Cincinnati, Ohio. There Harriet attended lectures, and shortly thereafter, Harriet married Calvin Stowe, a professor, in 1836. Together, the Stowes had seven children, six of whom were born in Cincinnati, and in 1850, Calvin Stowe became a part of the faculty at Bowdoin College in Brunswick, Maine, where the Stowe family lived for the next three years. Calvin Stowe greatly encouraged Harriet to continue writing (also highly unusual for a 19th-century woman), and such encouragement would bring to fruition the publication of Uncle Tom's Cabin in 1852.

Uncle Tom, an African American slave who in the novel's opening scene is leading prayer among his fellow slaves, quickly learns that he is to be sold to help pay off his master's debts. Instead of fleeing (as he was advised to do by friends and family) Uncle Tom resigns himself to the condition that he faces. Relying on Christian faith and fortitude, the novel chronicles Uncle Tom's heroic endurance of the horrors of slavery, which would ultimately put to shame the Christianity of Southern slave-owning families and sympathizers who often used Christianity to justify enslaving African Americans. In addition to chronicling the sufferings of Uncle Tom, Stowe's novel (in keeping with the genre of sentimentalism) depicts exaggerated characterizations of both African Americans and whites, which together amounted to unflattering portraits of Southern American slavery that would reach as far as Europe.

Stowe's antislavery novel was designed to prick the consciences of both Northern and Southern readers about the horrors of slavery. The novel was first published as a serial appearing in the National Era between 1851 and 1852. The story was published in 40 installments, and Stowe was paid a mere $300. When the story was published as a two-volume novel in March 1852, 300,000 copies were sold in the first year, and nearly 2 million copies were sold worldwide by 1857. Although Stowe's work was largely credited for fostering both open and latent abolitionist sentiment among readers throughout the United States and world, it did not do so without controversy, for the most infamous literary personage in American literary history (the novel's namesake, Uncle Tom) and Stowe's lack of firsthand experience with Southern slavery sparked endless debate about the veracity of Stowe's novel that continued well into the 20th century.

In 1853, Stowe published an apologetic to defend her fictional account, titled The Key to "Uncle Tom's Cabin"; Presenting the Original Facts and Documents upon Which the Story Is Founded. The work was designed to provide verifiable accounts and documentation for the characterizations used for Stowe's novel, particularly for her depiction of Uncle Tom. Stowe relays in the work that the depiction of Uncle Tom is largely taken from the Rev. Josiah Henson's first autobiography, The Autobiography of Josiah Henson (1849). Stowe visited twice with Henson, once at her home in Andover in 1849 and a second time in 1850 at her brother's house in Boston. Although Henson proudly declared in his second edition of the autobiography in 1858 that he was the historical personage of Stowe's Uncle Tom and was proud of it, many African American commentators on the figure were not as enthusiastic.

One such commentator was African American novelist and essayist James Baldwin, whose 1949 essay "Everybody's Protest Novel" severely denounces Stowe's novel. Baldwin—who would eventually publish his Go Tell It on the Mountain (1952) exactly 100 years after the publication of Uncle Tom's Cabin—labeled Stowe's Tom so thoroughly unrealistic that the book intimates that African Americans must necessarily become implausibly pious in order for American whites to recognize their humanity. This criticism partly fueled Baldwin's realistic portrayal of African American engagement with Christianity in Go Tell It on the Mountain through the depiction of his primary character Gabriel Grimes, whose last name and immoral actions in the novel suggested that African American humanity need not be improbable. In spite of such withering criticism, Uncle Tom's Cabin's place in the annals of African American history remains secure.

Abraham Lincoln allegedly told Harriet Beecher Stowe that she was the one who started the Civil War, and famed African American scholar William Edward Burghardt Du Bois suggested in an October 27, 1945, article appearing in the Chicago Defender that Stowe's work was understandable and necessary given the time period. He goes on to describe Stowe as brave and her efforts as the best and most successful on behalf of African Americans in a century, arguing that thus, neither Stowe nor Uncle Tom's Cabin should be roundly criticized by African Americans.

Sumner, Charles

Charles Sumner (1811–1874) devoted his life to securing freedom and full civil and political rights for African Americans. As a lawyer, abolitionist, and senator, Sumner gained a reputation as a passionate civil rights advocate and a sparkling orator. In the Senate, Sumner established himself as an uncompromising opponent of slavery and a true radical on issues of race. An 1856 beating on the floor of the Senate by a proslavery Congressman crippled Sumner for more than three years, but upon returning to Washington, he quickly picked up where he had left off, repeatedly urging newly elected President Lincoln to emancipate the slaves after Southern secession. During Reconstruction, Sumner would emerge as the senatorial leader of the radical wing of the Republican Party.

Charles Sumner was born in Boston on January 6, 1811. After graduating from Harvard and being admitted to the Massachusetts Bar, Sumner worked as a lawyer and educational reformer until the mid-1840s. On July 4, 1845, Sumner delivered a speech in Boston denouncing American hostilities toward Mexico, thereby becoming a player in Massachusetts politics and antislavery activism. Three years later, he deserted the Whig party in favor of John Quincy Adams's Free Soil campaign. After Daniel Webster retired, Sumner was elected to the Senate as a Free Soiler in 1851.

In 1854, Congress passed the Kansas-Nebraska Act, which proposed to invalidate the Missouri Compromise of 1820 and settle the two new western territories on the basis of popular sovereignty. Soon, settlers flocked to Kansas, leading to a bloody guerilla war between pro- and antislavery settlers. In May 1856, Charles Sumner delivered a two-day oration in the Senate titled "The Crime Against Kansas," in which he viciously attacked slavery, the South, and the violence in Kansas. In the course of his speech, Sumner insulted elderly South Carolina senator Andrew Butler. Two days later, while Sumner was working at his desk on the Senate floor, Butler's nephew, South Carolina congressman Preston Brooks, entered the chamber and savagely beat Sumner over the head with his heavy wooden cane, breaking the cane and almost killing Sumner. The event, known as “Bleeding Sumner,” added to the ferocity of the sectional conflict, as Northerners decried Brooks’ action and declared it indicative of the South’s failure as a civilization, whereas Southerners showered Brooks with praise and sent him hundreds of new canes to replace his broken one. Despite his inability to appear on the floor of the Senate for three years, Sumner’s Massachusetts constituency reelected him overwhelmingly.

After his recovery, Sumner retained his radical posture toward the South, refusing to countenance any further compromise with slavery during the secession crisis of 1860–1861. Upon the outbreak of hostilities, Sumner immediately called for the use of African American troops in the Union Army, a position he would maintain throughout the war. He clashed with Lincoln over the dismissal of Gen. John C. Fremont, who had ordered the emancipation of all slaves in the state of Missouri against the president’s wishes. Sumner continually urged Lincoln to emancipate the slaves and to acknowledge that slavery was at the root of the conflict. In 1864, Sumner introduced the 13th Amendment, which outlawed slavery, to the Senate.

Following the cessation of hostilities in 1865, Charles Sumner demanded full civil and political rights, including manhood suffrage, for the freedmen of the South. He loudly criticized the Reconstruction policies of Andrew Johnson, who had assumed the presidency after Lincoln’s assassination in April 1865. In May of that year, Johnson embarked on a lenient policy of Reconstruction that pardoned most Confederates and did not change the voting laws of the Southern states. As Johnson began vetoing bills passed by Congress, Sumner called for impeachment of the president. The midterm congressional elections of 1866 returned a commanding majority for the Radical wing of the Republican Party, which allowed the passage of congressional bills over Johnson’s veto. Sumner was instrumental in the passage of the 14th Amendment, which secured citizenship and civil rights for Southern freedman, and the Reconstruction Acts of 1867 and 1868, which put the South under Northern military rule in order to restore order and enforce African American civil rights. In late 1867, the House Judiciary Committee voted to impeach Johnson. Despite Sumner’s ferocity during the trial, Johnson was not convicted.

In 1870, Sumner adamantly refused to support President Ulysses S. Grant’s proposal for the annexation of the Dominican Republic. Sumner’s insistence on seeking reparations (known as the Alabama Claims) from England for their material support of the Confederacy further alienated Grant. In 1871, the Senate removed Sumner from his post as the chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, a position he had held since 1861. Disgusted with President Grant, Sumner renounced the Radical Republican Party he had helped to found and threw his support to Horace Greeley, the Liberal Republican candidate, in the presidential election of 1872. Charles Sumner died in 1874.

Tappan, Arthur

Arthur Tappan (1786–1865) was, along with his younger brother Lewis (1788–1873), a leading force among antebellum reformers—especially those now known as more “conservative” abolitionists. Born in Northampton, Massachusetts, to merchant Benjamin Tappan and Sarah Homes, Tappan was raised in a deeply Calvinist home. In 1801, he gained a clerkship in a dry goods store in Boston; a few years later, he began his own importing business in Portland, Maine. In 1809, he moved the business to Montreal, where he met and later (on September 18, 1810) married Frances Antill; the couple would later have eight children.

At the beginning of the War of 1812, Tappan returned to New York, but he struggled financially until the 1820s, when he began a very successful silk business. His brother Lewis joined the firm in 1828. Although both Tappan brothers became wealthy, much of that wealth was quickly given to charities—including the American Bible Society, the American Education Society, the American Home Mission, the American Sunday School Union, the American Temperance Union, the American Tract Society, and the New York Magdalene Society. Hoping to use the press to further moralize, Tappan also poured funds into the ultimately unsuccessful New York Journal of Commerce. He gave to churches (including the Broadway Tabernacle, because of his ties to activist minister Charles Grandison Finney) and to colleges (including Auburn Seminary, Kenyon College, Lane Seminary, and Oberlin College) as well.

Tappan’s involvement in such reform efforts led naturally to concerns related to slavery. In 1829, he led the effort to finance the return to Africa of Abd-al-Rahman, a Timbo prince enslaved in Mississippi, and he joined the American Colonization Society. Tappan quickly began to question the Colonization Society’s efforts and motivations, however, and soon became involved with abolitionists who believed in the strategy of immediatism. It was Tappan’s money that freed William Lloyd Garrison from a Baltimore jail in 1830 and Tappan’s money that, along with funds from key black and white leaders, allowed Garrison to establish his Liberator in 1831. Working with several key figures in the early abolitionist movement, Tappan helped found the American Anti-Slavery Society in 1833; he was elected the society’s first president and largely funded the society’s newspaper, the Emancipator. Although Lewis was arguably the more radical of the brothers and ultimately much more active in the abolitionist movement, both were targeted by various proslavery groups, and both were repeatedly threatened. Both—along with many black New Yorkers—suffered losses in the July 1834 New York City anti-black riot. Undeterred, the Tappans fought for and funded more national distribution of antislavery materials and supported causes ranging from Prudence Crandall’s school to the various petition drives against slavery.

The complex factionalism within the abolitionist movement, though, began to marginalize the Tappan brothers. Some abolitionists questioned their emphasis on religion; some, their stance against allowing women to participate fully in the movement’s organizations; some, their occasional racist comments and sense of superiority; some, their desire to hold fast to a nationally controlled organization in the face of various local and state organizations’ sometime-success. The Panic of 1837 also devastated both of the Tappan brothers, and Arthur Tappan was forced to close his silk business, although he eventually regained some of his financial footing. Tensions between the Tappans and other antislavery leaders—especially Garrison—came to a head in 1840 when the American Anti-Slavery Society elected Abby Kelly to its executive board. Both Tappans resigned and quickly moved to create an organization that embodied their more conservative and focused version of abolition, the American and Foreign Anti-Slavery (AFASS) Society. This new society was central in establishing the National Era—and thus in ensuring that Harriet Beecher Stowe’s Uncle Tom’s Cabin, which it later serialized, reached a mass audience. The AFASS was also among the factions that supported James Birney and the new Liberty Party in the 1840s. However, it was never as influential as the growing Garrisonian movement.

Tappan himself was, along with his brother Lewis, active in founding the American Missionary Association in 1846—an organization that would become important to postbellum efforts to educate freed people. He also continued his charitable work, although these efforts were limited by another financial failure in 1842. He essentially retired from public life in the 1850s, though he later rejoiced at the Emancipation Proclamation and the Union victory shortly before his death at his home in New Haven.

Tappan, Lewis

Lewis Tappan (1788–1873) was an ardent and dedicated abolitionist who, along with his brother Arthur, spent most of life battling against slavery. Born in Northampton, Massachusetts, Lewis Tappan grew up in a Calvinistic evangelical home. Entering the business world in his teens, he faced difficult times as a merchant, eventually declaring bankruptcy in the woolen and cotton industries. In the late 1820s, Lewis partnered with his more successful brother Arthur, and the two achieved lucrative success in the silk trade. A matured businessman, founder of the Journal of Commerce, and creator of “credit reporting,” Lewis saw his business acumen, along with his Protestant faith, help shape his approach to economic and moral reform.

In the early part of the 19th century, the United States was rapidly turning into a market-driven consumer society. Innovations in transportation, communication, and technology; a chaotic banking system; and the growing tensions between labor and capital decisively reordered American society. Yet one of the most significant market issues that helped increase the wealth of the United States was slavery—an expanding business that underwrote antebellum politics and culture. Although recognizing the profitability of slavery, Lewis believed that chattel bondage violated the moral dictates of the Bible. He worked tirelessly to abolish the institution despite the numerous threats against his life, which included the burning of his home in 1834. In the early 1830s, both he and Arthur met William Lloyd Garrison, the fiery editor of the radical abolitionist newspaper the Liberator and, with the help of Theodore Weld, founded the American Anti-Slavery Society (AASS). Lewis financially backed Joshua Leavitt’s Emancipator, the most widely read antislavery newsletter, and gave full-fledged support to the Underground Railroad after Congress passed the Fugitive Slave Act in 1850.

The famous Amistad case elevated Lewis to the status of a crucial leader in the antislavery cause. A mutiny on board the slave ship Amistad made national headlines in 1839. Lewis found that the incident provided a critical opportunity to legally challenge slavery in the United States. He not only financed the defense for the Mendes—whose recognized leader, Cinque, he befriended—but also garnered the support of a number of early abolitionists, including former president John Quincy Adams, who argued on behalf of the mutineers before the U.S. Supreme Court. After the high court ruled in favor of the Mendes, Lewis facilitated the men’s return to Sierra Leone.

Although committed to the antislavery cause, Lewis was often wary of the direction of the abolitionist movement. Unlike his brother and a majority of antislavery advocates, Lewis was committed to black equality. He worked to eliminate segregation in church-house seating; helped establish Oberlin College, the first interracial and coed academic institution; and supported the presence of black preachers at AASS conferences. At the same time, however, Lewis disapproved of the emerging feminism spawned by the antislavery movement. Many radical abolitionists, including Garrison, supported the public participation of women in moral reform. Lewis, on the other hand, believed that a woman’s place was in the domestic sphere. As women became an increasing presence in the AASS, Lewis and others broke from the society and established the American and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society.

After transferring ownership of his credit agency to Benjamin Douglass, he retired from business in order to spend the rest of his life fighting slavery. In 1873, a decade after the passage of the Emancipation Proclamation, Lewis Tappan died in New York.

Thirteenth Amendment

On December 18, 1865, Congress passed the Thirteenth Amendment, a Constitutional amendment that freed slaves nationally. Today, the Thirteenth Amendment arguably remains a little-used but potentially important federal power for enforcing civil rights against all vestiges of slavery that reincarnate as racial discrimination.

African American history is partly legal history, and constitutional law is at the heart of it. Although freedom is enshrined as a universal principle in the Declaration of Independence, the U.S. Constitution, in its original form, protected both slavery and liberty. This was as contradictory as it was paradoxical. Striking a compromise with delegates from South Carolina and Georgia at the 1787 Constitutional Convention in a pact-with-the-devil exchange for ratification (William Lloyd Garrison, America's leading abolitionist, stigmatized it as "an agreement with Hell"), several constitutional provisions preserved the institution of slavery: the Fugitive Slave Clause (barring free states from emancipating runaway slaves and requiring their return to their masters); the now-lapsed Slave Importation Clause (allowing the Atlantic slave trade to continue for 20 years, until 1808, by immunizing it from congressional action); and the Three-Fifths Clause (diminishing blacks to three-fifths the value of whites for numeration, thereby giving the South a disproportionate representation in the House of Representatives). The Importation Clause was not truly a sunset clause because it contained no express prohibition of slavery. Even passage of the Bill of Rights (the First through Tenth Amendments) in 1791 failed to attenuate, much less eliminate, the original Constitution's protections of slavery. This changed in 1865. The Thirteenth Amendment abolished slavery and thus radically altered the Constitution, as part of what some legal scholars call the "Second Constitution." Ironically, ratification of the Thirteenth Amendment marked the first time that the word "slavery" appeared in the Constitution, even though the Constitution explicitly protected slavery.

Abolition of slavery is not freedom from all oppression. Slavery's roots are deep in American history and are not yet fully extirpated. Racism is a ghost of the slaver's psyche, and legislation alone cannot transform human behavior. Yet the Thirteenth Amendment empowered the government to strike down any legislation that abridges liberties on the basis of race. But this was not always so. Originally known as the Abolition Amendment, its intent was to give practical effect to the Declaration of Independence's self-evident truths "that all men are created equal; that they are endowed by their creator with certain unalienable rights; that among these, are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness." Of course, such unalienable rights did not extend to aliens (non-citizens), which is why the Fourteenth Amendment (1868) had to precede the Fifteenth, by granting citizenship to anyone born or naturalized in the United States. Grounded in liberty and equality principles, the Thirteenth Amendment bans involuntary labor except as punishment for a crime, and it authorizes Congress to pass laws rationally tailored to extinguish all traces of slavery.

Under Section 2, which legal scholars call the Enforcement Clause, the Thirteenth Amendment was also supposed to eradicate any vestiges of forced labor. Thus, to enforce the Thirteenth Amendment, Congress quickly passed the Civil Rights Act of 1866 (over President Andrew Johnson's veto), the Slave Kidnapping Act of 1866, the Peonage Act of 1867, and the Judiciary Act of 1867. But a series of Supreme Court decisions during Reconstruction effectively emasculated the amendment, through crabbed interpretation and curtailed application. With the splendid exception of peonage cases, the Thirteenth Amendment remained a dead letter under such segregationist Supreme Court rulings as Plessy v. Ferguson, which used color as a badge for discrimination while professing an "equal but separate" doctrine. One reason for this is that the Thirteenth Amendment was deficient in that it lacked any formal recognition of equality under the law. This defect would later be cured by enactment of the Equal Protection Clause under the Fourteenth Amendment.

The Thirteenth Amendment is far more than an emancipation law. Through its enforcement power, it is also a civil rights instrument, although rarely used. The social transformation that the framers of the Thirteenth Amendment had envisioned could be achieved only where the federal government could enforce freedom. Sadly, it took over a century for the Supreme Court to discover in the Thirteenth Amendment a fresh constitutional source of power for enforcing certain civil rights. The landmark decision of Jones v. Alfred H. Mayer Co., 392 U.S. 409 (1968), restored the civil rights value of the amendment and transformed it into a potentially potent civil rights instrument. Jones established Congress's power to enact legislation against private racial discrimination. It did so by empowering Congress to pass laws that prevent any intrusions on liberty that are "rationally related" to slavery, thus providing a new and powerful basis for federal legislation barring race discrimination.

There are lessons to be learned from the role of the Thirteenth Amendment in African American history. Alexander Tsesis, who may be today's leading authority on the Thirteenth Amendment, observes that each new generation must reexamine the nation's past, its core documents, and its moral progress as a constitutional democracy. Tsesis argues that the Thirteenth Amendment offers a more forthright warranty of freedom than other constitutional provisions on which the Supreme Court has relied. And beyond the amendment's role in barring racist labor practices, Tsesis advocates a progressive legal theory that legislatively and judicially expands the power of the Thirteenth Amendment to curb all coercive practices and repressive conduct rationally related to abridgments of freedom. Congress has virtual plenary power to protect individual rights under the Thirteenth Amendment. Yet this legislative power remains largely untapped. The Supreme Court, moreover, has yet to fully consider what freedoms Congress may protect pursuant to the Thirteenth Amendment. Judicial analysis under the Thirteenth Amendment asks the question, Is the act or law an incident or badge of servitude? An answer of "yes" to this constitutional test should trigger the Thirteenth Amendment's enforcement power. The Thirteenth Amendment has transformed the Declaration's national aspiration for freedom and equality by abolishing the Constitution's protections of slavery—thereby establishing federal power to enforce civil rights against all recrudescing vestiges of slavery that (as stated previously) reincarnate as racial discrimination.

Three-Fifths Compromise

The three-fifths compromise is a term that refers to the taxation and apportionment accommodation reached between Northern and Southern states at the Philadelphia Convention of 1787. Under it, each slave counted as three-fifths of a person for purposes of direct taxation and apportionment of the House of Representatives.

The Philadelphia Convention met under the rubric of an effort to devise amendments to the Articles of Confederation. Proposed in 1777 as a charter for the Revolutionary union of the states, the Articles seemed inadequate to Federalists from the beginning. Even before their ratification, leading figures such as George Washington, James Madison, Robert Morris, and John Jay favored a stronger union. Thus, when the Convention assembled, Madison was prepared. Through its spokesman, Governor Edmund Randolph, the Virginia delegation presented the Virginia Plan, a proposal for a new federal constitution featuring apportionment by population in both houses of a bicameral congress.

Small-state delegates demurred. Perhaps apportionment by population had theoretical resonance, but it did not seem so abstract a matter coming from Virginia, which happened to be the most extensive and most populous state. Finally, William Paterson of New Jersey presented an alternative plan. Where Virginia had proposed to nationalize the government, giving it its own executive and judicial branches, the ability to conclude treaties without involving the states, and elections for congressmen without state legislatures' involvement, the New Jersey Plan proposed to leave much as it had been before. Most importantly, the small states insisted that apportionment of the congress must remain, as it had been under the Articles, by state. That is, each state, from tiny Rhode Island and Delaware to massive Virginia and Massachusetts, must have an equal vote.

Complicating this matter was the question of how slaves should be counted. When it came to legislative apportionment, Southern delegates said that slaves should count just as anyone else did. Northerners, led by Rufus King of Massachusetts and Pennsylvania's Governor Morris, thought it entirely unjustifiable that ownership of slaves, who were precluded from participating in politics in any way, should give masters more weight in legislation than others. Why, they wanted to know, should slaves count at all?

In the end, however, the slave and free states compromised on the three-fifths ratio. Yet from the beginning, the three-fifths compromise was controversial. It provoked heated debate in some Northern states, whereas Federalists in South Carolina pointed to it as evidence that the proposed federal charter should be ratified. It became an especially sore subject after the election of 1800, in which the Republican ticket of Thomas Jefferson and Aaron Burr unseated incumbent President John Adams by a three-electoral-vote margin, which could be accounted for in its entirety by the three-fifths clause's bonus to slaveholders in the Electoral College.

As the Virginia Dynasty of 1801–1825, and the accompanying Republican domination of Congress, wore on, Federalists in New England noted that policies such as the War of 1812 hurt their section. The Hartford Convention of 1814 therefore included among its proposals a constitutional amendment to eliminate the three-fifths compromise in the area of apportionment. Nothing came of this proposal, however.

The presence of the three-fifths clause in the pre-Civil War Constitution was one bit of the evidence to which defenders of slavery pointed in arguing that the existence of slavery was taken for granted by the men who made the United States, that its continued existence was part of the bargain to which the states all subscribed when they entered into the “more perfect union” of Morris's Preamble. The Thirteenth Amendment ultimately made the three-fifths clause inoperative, although it remains part of the constitutional text.

Transportation (as Punishment for Slave Resistance)

As punishment for serious crimes such as attempted murder, burglary, or slave resistance, antebellum Southern lawmakers and judges increasingly sold slaves out of state, in a practice known as transportation. Transportation accomplished the same purpose as execution; it removed the offending individual from the local slave society and also protected the master's investment. The sale of the slave paid for the cost of jailing at the local and state level, covered transferal of slaves from their master's residence to jail and on to prospective buyers, and compensated owners for their loss.

Many Southern slave owners believed transportation protected their capital investment and also improved the conditions of slavery. Thomas Jefferson first advocated transportation for slave convicts and endorsed Virginia's 1801 transportation law after the planned uprising led by Gabriel Prosser in 1800. Jefferson and others viewed capital punishment of slaves as a condemnation of the already condemned.

Generally, the practice of transportation moved slaves from the Upper South to the Lower South and later to states in the Southwest. Occasionally, slaves were transported out of the United States and sold in the Caribbean. As the practice was codified into law, most states required that slaves convicted and sentenced to transportation be removed from their borders. Slave traders usually complied with this requirement; however, this was often due to the demands of the market rather than a desire to follow the letter of the law. Increasingly, buyers from the Deep South complained that the Upper South used them as a dumping ground for all of their enslaved criminals.

Truth, Sojourner

Sojourner Truth (1797–1883) was born in slavery to James and Elizabeth Baumfree (or Bomefree) on the Hardenbergh estate located in Ulster County, New York, then a Dutch settlement, as Isabella Baumfree. She was one of 13 children. As a young child, she spoke only Dutch until she was sold at the age of nine years and subsequently forced to speak English. Her second owner, Charles Hardenbergh, died in 1808, and she was sold to John Neely for $100 along with a herd of sheep. While with Neely, Isabella was beaten and harshly treated for mispronouncing terms in English. In her own words, it was at this early age that she began to embrace religion through fervent prayer. Between the years 1808 and 1810, Isabella was sold twice more. She was purchased by Martinus Schryver for $105, leaving the Neely home and remaining only a year before she was sold to John Dumont in 1810. She remained with the Dumonts from 1810 to 1827. While in the Dumont home, Isabella endured harsh punishments that also may have involved sexual abuse and harassment. In 1815, Isabella entered a forbidden relationship with a slave called Robert who had a different owner. One night, after Robert managed a secret visit with Isabella, he was savagely beaten, never to be heard from again. A daughter, Diana, was born of this relationship shortly thereafter. John Dumont forced Isabella to marry in 1817 to an older slave named Thomas. They had a total of four children together, including Peter, James, Elizabeth, and Sophia, all born between the years 1822 and 1826.

Isabella eventually ran away from the Dumont home in 1827, leaving with her daughter Sophia. Upon her escape, she found herself in the service of Isaac and Maria Van Wagenen. Though Dumont demanded compensation from the couple, they agreed to pay only $20 to allow Isabella to remain with them. Contact with the Quakers helped Isabella retrieve her son Peter from a plantation in Alabama. She was the first African American to sue successfully in court over the issue of slavery when she retrieved her son; he had been sold in an illegal sale. Isabella left Ulster County with a white evangelical teacher by the name of Miss Gear in 1829 after claiming to have undergone a serious religious conversion.

Between the years 1829–and 1834, Isabella Baumfree began to develop her skills as a public speaker and as a dynamic preacher. The Second Great Awakening was in progress, as marked by a series of revivals and reform movements, and she began to preach regularly at camp meetings in the late 1820s and through the 1830s. During this time, she met the religious reformer Elijah Pierson, who advocated a strict following of the Old Testament. He led a small group in his home where Isabella came to serve as the housekeeper. Isabella embraced this religious revivalism and along with it the utopian cooperative ideal because she was seen as a spiritual equal. It was at this time that she also met Robert Matthias (known as Prophet Matthias), who took over the group until the death of Pierson in 1834. Upon the death of Pierson, Matthias was accused of orchestrating his death but was subsequently acquitted. Matthias relocated west, and Isabella moved to New York City with little or no possessions, eventually becoming an itinerant preacher. In 1843, she formally changed her name to Sojourner Truth, informing friends that she was “called” by the Holy Spirit on June 1, or the day of Pentecost (which commemorates the day when the Holy Spirit filled the disciples of Jesus and gave them the power to preach to strangers). It has been suggested by at least one biographer that Isabella Baumfree became fixated on the concept of “the truth” as a result of several events prior to 1843. These events included her experience as a slave, having been abused, the court case involving her son Peter (when she was forced to prove that she was indeed the mother of Peter), and having to prove her credibility once again in 1835 after being accused of poisoning by a couple for whom she worked. One can say that the word “truth” combined with Sojourner, which connotes traveler, embodies the life work of Sojourner Truth as an activist for social reform in American history. These events, combined with the influence of 19th-century Perfectionism (early Pentecostalism), helped to shape the ideas and reform efforts of Sojourner Truth. Sojourner Truth joined the Northampton Association of Education and Industry in Massachusetts in 1844, thereby broadening her role in American reform.

The Northampton Association of Education and Industry was founded by abolitionists and consisted of 210 members living on 500 acres of farmland. They promoted women's rights, antislavery activities, and cooperative labor through the running of saw mills, operating a silk factory, and raising livestock. Sojourner Truth became acquainted with William Lloyd Garrison, Frederick Douglass, and David Ruggles while at Northampton. Association members such as George Benson and Olive Gilbert gave their support and encouragement to Truth after the community's profit-making ventures failed. William Lloyd Garrison published The Narrative of Sojourner Truth: A Northern Slave in 1850 after Truth dictated her story to Olive Gilbert. This 128-page pamphlet detailed Truth's life as a slave, her conversion, and her association with the “Kingdom” of Robert Matthias between the years 1832 and 1835. Truth often relied on friends to dictate her letters and memoirs. She never went to school, nor did she learn to read or write over the course of her lifetime. The spoken word and photographs became the chief forms of communication through which Truth was able to personally transmit knowledge about herself to the public.

On the eve of the Civil War and during the war, Sojourner Truth became a popular supporter and orator for the antislavery cause, women's rights, spiritualism, and non-violence. She attended the Women's Rights Convention in Akron, Ohio, in 1851, where she may have delivered her now-famous “Ain't I a Woman?” speech, as was recorded by women's rights activist Frances Dana Gage. Truth worked with antislavery editor of the Bugle Marius Robinson during 1851–1853. In 1853, Sojourner Truth spoke at a suffragist convention and met Harriet Beecher Stowe. Sojourner was also influenced by the Progressive Friends (a splinter sect of the Quakers). This group advocated some of the same beliefs embraced by Sojourner Truth. She eventually sold her home in Northampton in 1857 to relocate near the Progressive Friends in Harmonia, Michigan.

Sojourner Truth was one of few African American women to become famous for her social activism through her speeches on the antislavery lecture circuit before the Civil War. She was a commanding figure at more than six feet tall with a booming voice. Truth often distributed prints of herself on small cards to raise money for her many causes. These photographs along with her writings were used also used by Truth as a form of self-support as she traversed both the antislavery and reform lecture circuits of the 19th century. Truth was not only an important figure in the abolitionist movement, but also a central figure in American reform despite the challenges she faced as an African American woman. In 1858, when challenged about her gender, Truth reportedly bared her breasts before a crowd of spectators. She continued to speak out against slavery and supported the Union's cause during the Civil War by calling for the enlistment of African American troops (her grandson James Caldwell served with the all-black 54th Regiment of Massachusetts).

Sojourner Truth as a now-popular figure in American reform was characterized by Harriet Beecher Stowe in an article about Truth titled "The Libyan Sibyl" (also the title of a statue created by William Story presented at the London World Exhibition in 1862) that appeared in the Atlantic Monthly in 1863, and she also appeared in a painting with President Lincoln upon a visit to Washington, D.C.

Truth worked for the National Freedman's Relief Association, a government camp for refugee slaves, and the Freedman's Hospital. She also worked to assist the Freedmen's Bureau in relocating refugee slaves from Washington to Ohio and Michigan. While in Washington, she was instrumental in calling for the desegregation of streetcars. After the war, she moved to Battle Creek, Michigan, in 1867. She continued to preach, teach, and advocate for reform through the 1870s. In 1871, she was one of the first women to vote in a Michigan election.

Sojourner Truth did not end her many reform efforts after the Civil War. In the 1870s, she became a supporter of the idea of the distribution of land allotments from the federal government to free slaves. She spoke on this issue while traveling through New York, New Jersey, and New England. The westward expansion of the country inspired an "exodusters" movement in the late 1870s as many ex-slaves began to migrate west. Sojourner Truth gave her support to these exodusters by helping those in need and in stump speeches. She continued to make limited appearances around Michigan between the years 1880 and 1882, speaking on topics such as temperance and capital punishment until her death in 1883.

Sojourner Truth occupies an integral place in the history of African Americans and in the history of America. She was involved in many of the major reform movements of her day, including abolition, women's rights, temperance, and desegregation. She was an ex-slave and self-made woman with no formal education at a time when the majority of African Americans were forced into impoverishment because of discrimination. Her path to prominence occurred largely before the Civil War and emancipation, and this is significant. The black bourgeoisie in America remained virtually nonexistent before, during, and immediately after the Civil War. Through her writings and speeches, Truth was able to purchase first a home in Northampton, Massachusetts (1850), and then a home in Harmonia, Michigan (1856). Although she did receive a modest sum as a result of her work with the Freedmen's Bureau, her means of support was primarily self-generated. Both her activism and her personal struggle to survive embody the tradition of self-help intrinsic to the black experience in America. Although scholars will continue to debate her words, Truth should be understood within the matrix of the history of the African American experience in which oral tradition plays an important role. We can associate the legacy of Sojourner Truth with the rise of abolition, the antecedents of black feminism, and the Civil Rights movement.

Tubman, Harriet

Harriet Tubman (1822?–1913) was a fugitive slave who rose to prominence as an abolitionist and active conductor on the Underground Railroad; it is believed that she was personally responsible for liberating numerous slaves.

Originally born with the name Araminta Ross, Harriet Tubman was one of at least eight children born to Ben Ross and Harriet Green Ross of Dorchester County on Maryland's Eastern Shore, probably in 1822. Though Araminta (or "Minty" for short, as she was also known) was enslaved, freedom had come to an expansive segment of Eastern Shore blacks by the 19th century. Accordingly, most black families in the region straddled the divide between slavery and freedom. Indeed, Araminta's parents received freedom during her lifetime. Yet unlike some other places, no self-segregating free black community existed on the Eastern Shore, separate and apart from the enslaved. Rather, meaningful relations and voluntary connections made for a single black community, at once enslaved and free.

Araminta worked as a domestic slave during her childhood, largely hired out by her owner to other masters. Subjected to the harshest physical and mental abuses, young Minty was often returned broken to her home plantation, where her mother would be allowed to nurse the girl back to health, only to see her sent out again to another damaging environment. Yet it was in these years, as Araminta grew from an adolescent to a young woman, that she first began to recognize her own strength, physical and moral. The harshness of her enslavement often tested these traits, and one particular event changed the course of Araminta's life. While in a general store, Araminta witnessed another enslaved person fleeing a pursuer close behind. The pursuer picked up a large metal object and flung it at the fleeing man. Missing the intended target, the object struck a crushing blow to the side of Araminta's head. Left bleeding and dazed by the incident, she spent months recovering. For the remainder of her life, she suffered an undiagnosed disorder that caused her to lapse into deep unconsciousness without warning, for several minutes at a time. She also began to experience what might be termed an extra sensory perception, and her attempts to reckon with this fostered an intensified religious spirituality. Reaching adulthood, Araminta took her mother's name, Harriet, and eventually married a free man, John Tubman.

In her late twenties, with kinfolk all around her, Harriet Tubman might have felt somewhat stable within the context of slavery (though certainly never content). Yet the specter of the domestic slave trade between the Upper South and the Deep South haunted her. The trade had claimed at least three of her siblings over the years and a great number of extended kin. A relative or loved one being sold south was like a death in the family. Unlike actual death, however, a "social" death tormented black families in ways that lingered over lifetimes.

Hailed as "the Moses of her people" because of her courageous rescues of hundreds of slaves on the Underground Railroad, Harriet Tubman was a living symbol of the resistance of African Americans to slavery in the United States. (Library of Congress)

In 1849, upon hearing rumors that they would be sold south, Harriet and two of her brothers decided to run. Quickly, their owner advertised the escape, offering a $300 reward for their return. In a matter of days, however, the trio returned voluntarily; Harriet wanted to remain at large, but her brothers convinced her to go back. A few weeks later, Harriet fled again—this time alone, this time forever. She likely told only a few of her closest acquaintances of her intentions. She could not convince her husband to flee with her.

The route to freedom was a familiar one for fugitives of Maryland's Eastern Shore. Moving northeastward along the Choptank River, Harriett passed into neighboring Delaware. From there, she trod on to Philadelphia and freedom. Along the way, she sought and received assistance from an array of folk—whites, Quakers, free blacks, enslaved blacks, kinfolk, and kind strangers. Beyond these broadest details, little else is known of Tubman's escape from slavery in 1849.

At the time of Harriet's arrival, Philadelphia represented a forward guard of sorts in the emerging national conflict over slavery. Although a native free black population had developed following the abolition of slavery in Pennsylvania during the late 18th century, by the mid-19th century, blacks born elsewhere, who had come to Philadelphia seeking freedom, overwhelmed the numbers of freeborn black natives. Likewise, abolitionist and antislavery sentiments pulsed in the city. An antislavery society had begun there in 1833, and a committee of vigilance was active, functioning chiefly to aid fugitive slaves passing through the city, plotting against a strengthening slavocracy as it appeared certain to all that a reckoning drew near. Thus, the overlapping communities of abolitionist Philadelphians and freedom-seeking Southerners made for a unique context for the fugitive Tubman.

It is likely that Tubman would have been aware of the political movement afoot (abolition), recognizing in it perhaps timely and practical applications as she designed to rescue her family from slavery. It is clear that some form of communication—however sporadic and imperfect—allowed Tubman to keep tabs on affairs back in Dorchester County, Maryland. Indeed, she took her first steps toward her destiny in response to news from home that family members were to be sold.

Philadelphia was the commencement point for the eastern lines of the Underground Railroad. Fully decentralized, though at least loosely coordinated over long distances, the Underground Railroad operated as the practical expression of vigilance committees' work. In the broader context, however, what became known as the Underground Railroad actually drew from older processes of resistance, assistance, and escape that had begun in the South, on plantations, with the enslaved themselves. Runaways generally escaped the South—got off of the plantations—without abolitionists' help. A communication system existed among the enslaved populations and could be especially effective where they enjoyed regular contact with itinerant blacks and free blacks. Such conditions existed throughout the antebellum Chesapeake, and Harriet Tubman came to rely on these lines in plotting her rescue missions.

Methodologically, over her career in this work, Tubman rarely ventured onto plantations herself, preferring instead coordinated rendezvous. On the plantation, word would go out that Harriet was coming—selection of a particular hymn for Sunday service, for example, is known to have been one manner of announcement. Preparations for those intending to go away with her were made immediately. Harriet conducted her first rescue mission to save a niece from the auction block in Dorchester County. Though she acted as a central organizer of the mission, Harriet's niece and her niece's husband actually executed the escape. Tubman met the couple in Baltimore and escorted the woman to Philadelphia. On other trips, Harriet moved into the heart of the plantation districts to steal away with family members and others. On only one or two occasions did Tubman initiate a mission not intended to include a family member; nearly all Tubman-aided fugitives moved out of Maryland's Eastern Shore counties. With unwavering faith, unshakeable courage, and unlimited resourcefulness, Harriet ventured repeatedly into the South and came out with freedom-seekers in tow. Though some of these charges settled in the Northern United States, many more followed Harriet to St. Catherine's, Canada, where communities of fugitive expatriates had emerged by the mid-19th century.

One of Tubman's earliest biographers, Sarah Bradford, exaggerated Harriet's accomplishments in assisting slaves to freedom, claiming 19 trips and 300 fugitives. Why the fabrication was deemed necessary is unclear, but historians have since documented an impressive record of at least a dozen trips with approximately 75 rescued.

Tubman's Underground Railroad activity ceased early in the American Civil War, when her efforts shifted to support for the Union cause. Though she played many roles during the conflict—field nurse, spy, guide—she proved most effective in moving slaves off of plantations following the Emancipation Proclamation (1863), assisting hundreds in liberating themselves within the hostile environment of a recalcitrant South. In the refugee and contraband camps, her experience with the needs of fugitives on the run proved equally vital. She took to the work with great energy.

If Tubman emerged from the war a hero and national figure, unlike others, she parlayed neither into wealth, power, or position. Rather, the ordinary woman of extraordinary abilities went back to work for those in need, assisting elderly and indigent blacks in her adopted hometown of Auburn, New York. From the personal vantage, though, the rewards of her struggle were satisfying. After nearly two decades, her family was free and largely together with her. She was unable to recover a sister sold south during her childhood but had managed to save that sister's children and grandchildren, seeing them grow into adulthood a free people. Harriet also found romantic love again. Her marriage to John Tubman in 1844 had ended with her flight five years later when John, who was already free, had refused to go with her. When she returned to take him away two years later, in 1851, he declined, having moved on and remarried. After the war, however, Tubman came to love another man, Nelson Davis, a Civil War veteran 20 years her junior. She married Davis in 1869 and lived happily with him until his untimely death (1888) ended their union.

By the late 19th century, as racism, pseudoscience, and discriminatory practice threatened not only the African American future but perspectives on black history as well, reform leaders sought out heroines and heroes to celebrate. Tubman proved an easy choice. She emerged as one of the first African American women to be conceded icon status. Similarly, when women began to push gender and equity issues to the forefront of national debate during the last decade of the 19th century, in Tubman they found hard evidence of past greatness. Tubman was a featured speaker at the inaugural meeting of the National Association of Colored Women's Clubs in 1896, introduced to the convention-goers as "Mother Harriet." After the turn of the 20th century, as Tubman entered the concluding years of life, she continued to work tirelessly to establish a home for the aged and needy, the Harriet Tubman Home in Auburn, New York. Harriet Ross Tubman Davis died on March 10, 1913.

Turner, Nat

In August 1831, Nat Turner led 70 other slaves in a rebellion in Southampton County, Virginia. The insurrection and its aftermath left approximately 160 people dead, black and white, and is the most famous slave revolt in American history. Criticized for his indiscriminate slaughter of whites, while simultaneously celebrated as a black resistance hero and a martyr to the slaves' cause, Turner continues to be a controversial topic in historiography and popular culture.

Born on October 2, 1800, Nat was called by the surname of his owner, Samuel Turner of Southampton County. He was deeply religious from a young age and repeatedly received visions and messages from God. By early 1828, he felt sure that God had selected him for a special purpose. On February 12, 1831, he interpreted a solar eclipse as the final sign from God that he should begin preparations for his armed revolt in Southampton County. Like David Walker, Turner saw himself as a prophet doing God's work, and in fact, Turner may also have been inspired by Walker's fiery and widely distributed pamphlet Appeal to the Coloured Citizens of the World, which appeared in the South during 1829 and 1830.

Initially, Turner recruited only a small number of fellow slaves, but the plan soon grew to include at least 70 rebels—both slaves and free blacks. On August 21, he led his brigade into an armed rebellion. Using knives and hatchets, so as to move quietly without the sound of guns, Turner and his men visited houses, killed white people, and freed slaves. A total of 55 whites (including women and children) died, most as a result of stabbing or bludgeoning. Historians disagree, however, about the premeditated nature of these murders. Stephen B. Oates states that Turner asked his followers to kill every white person they encountered, but Herbert Aptheker cites a newspaper explanation that the rebels did not intend to slaughter whites and resorted to killing only in order to intimidate their enemies.

By August 23, local white militia and three artillery companies had fully suppressed the rebellion. Turner went into hiding, where he would remain for several months. But other militias arrived from Virginia and North Carolina counties and began several weeks of violent retaliation against black people. At least 100 blacks were slaughtered during the vigilante justice, both participants in the revolt and others who had had nothing to do with Turner. By way of a legal response, the Virginia General Assembly passed new legislation that prevented literacy for free black people (as well as slaves).

Turner was eventually discovered hiding in a swamp on October 30. His trial lawyer, Thomas Gray, conducted interviews in prison, soon publishing that material as The Confessions of Nat Turner. Turner himself self-consciously fashioned himself as a Christ-like figure: when asked what he thought of his fast-approaching execution, he observed that Christ, too, had been crucified. On November 5, he was sentenced to death by hanging, and on November 11, he was executed in Jerusalem, Virginia. His body was beheaded and quartered. Another 48 black men and women were charged with conspiracy, insurrection, and treason, and 18 black people (including one woman) were sentenced to death.

Turner was dead, but his message traveled. The geography of the rebellion, which took place around the Great Dismal Swamp of Virginia and North Carolina, took on a mythic quality. For slave narrators and fiction writers, the swamp became an alternate slave space within the boundaries of the South. Although the presence of escaped slaves in Southern swamps was not a new image, it was only in the wake of the Nat Turner rebellion that slaves were imaginatively linked to the swamp as a sanctuary.

The insurrection continued to resonate down the years politically too—especially within the abolitionist movement. Some abolitionists looked past Turner's violence and explained it as self-defense within an existing state of war (slavery) that had been declared on black people. For example, in August 1861, the Atlantic Monthly published an article by the abolitionist Thomas Wentworth Higginson. Defending Turner's slave revolt, Higginson pointed out that his men were impressively self-possessed during the insurrection. Most had been systematically brutalized from childhood and had witnessed the rape of their wives, mothers, and sisters, yet they avoided any similar abuse of whites, he explained. Others framed the rebellion as an act of patriotic dissent in line with the American Revolution, claiming that Turner had initially planned the rebellion to take place on July 4, 1831.

Still other abolitionists used Turner's revolt as a warning to the South of more violence to come. In November 1859, Wendell Phillips claimed that Turner's success showed slave rebellion to be possible and slavery an institution under threat. Continuing to reflect on the message of Nat Turner's violence, the Anglo-African Magazine published an article on December 31, 1859, that examined his "terrible logic" and wondered if the only future for black emancipation was by Turner's method: the "extirpation" of whites. The magazine reprinted Turner's public confession for its readers. And in 1881, Frederick Douglass claimed that the South remembered Turner with fear for decades after his insurrection and that this shaped the Southern response to events such as John Brown's raid. Turner may also have inspired Brown's actions at Harpers Ferry. The epitome of the rebellious slave, Turner proved to Brown that slaves would fight. Brown admired Turner and remembered 1831 as he planned his own violent insurrection of October 1859.

Uncle Tom's Cabin

Written in 1852, Harriet Beecher Stowe's Uncle Tom's Cabin, or Life among the Lowly, was a novel describing her vision of life in the slave South. The book had such a profound effect on Northern abolitionist thought that it radically altered Northern public opinion of the "peculiar institution." Thus, it drastically weakened the tenuous peace between North and South in the 1850s.

In 1850, amid the national dialogue over the viability of slavery in the newly conquered territories of the West, Congress pressed through Congress the Compromise of 1850. The compromise stipulated that California would enter the union as a free state and that the other conquered territories—that is, New Mexico, Arizona, and Utah—would be admitted into the union through popular sovereignty. Popular sovereignty was a political doctrine by which the citizens of a territory would vote on the status (slave or free) of the territory upon admittance into the union. The most heated component of the compromise was the Fugitive Slave Act. According to this act, any runaway slave caught in the North must be immediately returned to his or her Southern plantation owners. This law inflamed the passions of the Northerners, who viewed the law as immoral. Essentially, the law made Northerners responsible for patrolling slaves. One of the most vocal of the abolitionists was Harriet Beecher Stowe.

Harriet Beecher Stowe was born in Litchfield, Connecticut. Her father was the staunch abolitionist Congregationalist preacher Lyman Beecher, and her brother was the equally famous Henry Ward Beecher. In 1836, she married Calvin E. Stowe, who was also involved in the abolitionist movement. Angered by the passage of the Fugitive Slave Law, Harriet Stowe initiated writing for an abolitionist newspaper called the National Era. Throughout 1851, Uncle Tom's Cabin emerged in a serialized form in the newspaper. On March 20, 1852, the serialized articles were published as a full-scale book that was widely disseminated throughout the nation for its harsh criticism of the institution of slavery. In the first nine weeks, the book sold 10,000 copies. By the end of 1852, Northerners had bought 300,000 copies of the book. The astounding number of copies sold made the book the second best-selling book of the 19th century, after the Bible.

The narrative of the story deals with the lives and travails of three slaves: Tom, Eliza, and George. The life of each of these slaves assumes a drastic turn. Eliza and George escape slavery and get married in the novel. Tom, however, is not entirely lucky. In the novel, Tom is sold to numerous masters—some masters are good, and some were exploitative. In the end, after many trials and tribulations, Uncle Tom meets his death at the hands of his last master, Simon Legree.

A major theme throughout the book is a harsh criticism of the institution of slavery. After its publication, Uncle

Tom's Cabin served as a symbolic criticism of the institution of slavery as well as the political system of the South. The book was a major critique of the institution, and it catapulted slavery into the limelight. Most scholars agree that the publication of the novel was an immediate cause of the American Civil War.

Underground Railroad

Thousands of fugitive slaves escaped from the South and traveled north to reach freedom in Canada and the northern United States in the years before the Civil War. The network of escape routes, the people who helped the escaping slaves, and the loosely organized system that these people developed became known as the Underground Railroad. It is not certain when the "railroad" began, but as early as 1787, Quakers had organized a system for helping fugitive slaves. By the 1830s, transporting slaves into freedom had become a more frequent happening. Although the exact origin of the name Underground Railroad is unknown, it is thought the name was first used either because of the popularity of the new steam railroads or because a slave owner who was unsuccessfully pursuing his runaway slave commented that the slave seemed to have disappeared on an underground road. The word "underground" may also have been used because of the secret nature of the network. Two Underground Railroad networks existed—the Northern Underground Railroad and the Southern Underground Railroad. Each complemented the other but had different functions. The Southern railroad helped the slaves run and escape to the Northern states. Once the fugitives had crossed the Mason-Dixon Line and the rivers that served as boundaries between slave and free states, the Northern railroad network began its work to keep the fugitives from being captured and returned to their owners in the slave states.

Railroad terms were used in the escape network. "Stations" were the hiding places, places of safety, and stops along the freedom route and were usually spaced between 10 and 30 miles apart. The routes between stations were known as "lines." "Station masters" sheltered the slaves in the stations and provided the fugitives with food, clothing, and protection until they were transported to the next station. Hiding places included homes, barns, and churches and cellars, well-concealed secret rooms, attics, and crawl spaces within those buildings. Slaves were also hidden in cornfields and wagons, and in one Michigan location, they were hidden in a cave. "Conductors" were primarily white abolitionists or free blacks who traveled to the South to collect the slaves and escort them north. The conductors also arranged transportation for the slaves and were responsible for getting the escapees to the next station. Fugitive slaves usually traveled at night and were hidden by the station masters during the day. Canada was referred to as "Heaven" and "Canaan," and the escaping slaves were referred to as "baggage," "bundles of wood," "loads of potatoes," "parcels," and "cargo." The Big Dipper and North Star were used as navigation guides for the escapees, and the Big Dipper was referred to as the "drinking gourd." Coded phrases were also used to signify the arrival of slaves, to indicate that fugitive slaves were in the area, to remind escapees that dogs were unable to follow scents through water, and to alert slaves that an escape was being planned. Candles were sometimes placed in windows as codes to indicate "stations" on an escape route because people involved in the Underground Railroad may have known only locations of stations and not the names of the station masters. Church sermons contained coded words to alert railroad participants to the arrival of runaways, and quilt designs informed slaves of routes and available shelter.

Reaching freedom was not an easy task for the fugitives. Some slaves walked to freedom. Others were transported north by boat, train, horse, wagon, and even caskets that were carried by other escapees in "funeral" processions. Black and white abolitionists denounced slavery, and many Quakers and other religious groups that mirrored the attitudes undertook important roles in the Underground Railroad to help escaping slaves on their way to freedom.

The names of sympathizers and participants in the railroad network were often not known to each other or to the public. People often worked independently to assist the fugitive slaves because their activity was illegal, and they did not know whom they could trust. Many Quakers served as conductors and station masters. Levi Coffin, a Quaker and former Southerner, had become active in assisting fugitive runaway slaves in North Carolina before he moved to Indiana. When Coffin moved to Newport, Indiana, near the Ohio border and Ohio River Valley, he continued his efforts and enlisted the assistance of local Quakers. Coffin is said to have been the “president” of the Underground Railroad because of his assistance to more than 2,000 slaves in their attempts to reach freedom.

Harriet Tubman, a Pennsylvania resident and former slave from Maryland, became a famous conductor of the Underground Railroad when she secretly returned to help numerous slaves escape into freedom. Tubman was known as the “Moses of Her People” because of her bravery and dangerous undertakings, and slave owners offered large rewards for her capture because she also was a fugitive slave and was breaking the law in slave states by helping other slaves escape.

The Underground Railroad encompassed 14 Northern states. Most escapees who fled to Canada settled in Ontario, but fugitives’ traveling routes through New York and New England reached the province of Quebec. The two most important crossing points into Canada, however, were Niagara Falls and Detroit. The Underground Railroad’s lines ran thousands of miles and stretched from the Deep South, Virginia, and Kentucky through Ohio, Indiana, and Michigan. From Maryland, lines ran across Pennsylvania, New Jersey, New York, and New England. Routes also ran from Iowa and Missouri to Canada through Illinois, Wisconsin, and Michigan.

Many runaway slaves from the territory west of the Delaware River were taken to Philadelphia before following a route into Canada. One route took the fugitives from Philadelphia to Jersey City, New Jersey, by crossing the Delaware River and then going on to New York. A second route began on the Delaware River approximately 50 miles south of Philadelphia and continued through New Jersey. A third route, which also began on the Delaware River, started near Dover, Delaware, and eventually joined the lines leading from Philadelphia. A fourth line running through New Jersey was a branch of the Philadelphia line that ran through Bucks County, Pennsylvania, and on to New York.

Abolitionists, Quakers, and other progressive religious groups in Boston and other New England cities helped fugitives continue their journey north to Canada. Many of the fugitives reached the New England port cities by ship and then continued their journey by land through New Hampshire and Vermont into Quebec province. Other fugitive slaves arrived in New England from Pennsylvania routes that crossed New Jersey and New York before entering New England.

Several escape routes, which began at the Ohio River and continued north through Ohio to Lake Erie or through Indiana and Michigan into Canada, were used by approximately 40,000 fugitive slaves. The Ohio River towns of Marietta and Ripley were important stations. One Ohio route branched out near Washington Court House and continued to Sandusky, Lorian, Ashtabula, or Cleveland before ending at Lake Erie. Another route from the Ohio River took runaways north through Chillicothe or Columbus. The John Rankin home in Ripley, Ohio, was an important station on the shores of the Ohio River, and it was at this home where Harriet Beecher Stowe listened to a slave's story from which she later crafted Uncle Tom's Cabin.

Indiana's escape routes ran from the Ohio River near Evansville, Jeffersonville, and Madison to the Chicago-Detroit route or to the terminus at Lake Erie near Toledo. Two main routes led from Evansville—one north to Michigan City close to the Michigan state line and the other through Terre Haute and Lafayette to the Wabash River. Another main line ran through Indianapolis to South Bend and on the Michigan line. The eastern line in Indiana ran north from Fountain City, formerly Newport, to Fort Wayne and beyond, where it either terminated near Toledo or continued into Michigan.

Michigan had at least seven routes, and more than 200 stations harbored slaves before they were transported to Canada and freedom. Some routes ended near Sault Ste. Marie, Port Huron, and Saginaw, but most routes ended in Detroit. Six lines ran through Cass County, one of the state's southern gateways. The county's prairies and rich fertile soil were attractive to Quaker settlers who came to the area in the 1830s, and the townships in which they lived became locations for sheltering and assisting the fugitive slaves as the slaves traveled to freedom. The Illinois line that began near St. Louis and the Quaker line that ran through Cincinnati intersected near Vandalia, a small Cass County, Michigan, community. Nathan Thomas, a Quaker, founding member of the Republican Party, and Kalamazoo County's first physician, was an active conductor for the railroad and helped arrange transportation for more than 1,000 fugitive slaves from his home in Schoolcraft to the next stations in the Battle Creek area.

Slaves escaping through southern Illinois received shelter in Alton and Illinoistown before being transported north. Illinoistown, which is in the modern-day East St. Louis area, presented a potential hazard to the fugitives because of the city's proximity to the slave state of Missouri, but it was a point from which the runaways were led up the Mississippi River to Alton and other stations to the north. Once in Alton, the slaves traveled by tunnel and overland to northern areas. Iowa also had an Underground Railroad network. Towns near the Missouri border such as Salem, Iowa, became important stops for the railroad, as did other Iowa communities such as Tabor and Lewis. Cities across central Iowa also provided shelter for the escaping slaves.

As the exodus of slaves from the South became more pronounced, slave owners began offering rewards for the return of their property. Some Northerners who were aware of the reward offers pretended to befriend the fugitive slaves but betrayed them to receive the rewards. Slave hunters made raids into Northern states to gather slaves for return to their owners. Sometimes the raiders were met with resistance, and other times, they were able to retrieve the slaves. In 1850, Congress passed the Fugitive Slave Act, which required citizens in free states to assist in the return of slaves to their owners. The federal act made it illegal for anyone to help escaped slaves and fined or imprisoned those who refused to return runaways. The stringent act's purpose was to deter slaves from escaping and to enlist the assistance of those who were aware of the runaways in their region. The act, however, did not deter the efforts or success of the Underground Railroad network. Before the passage of the Fugitive Slave Act, many runaway slaves did not continue on to Canada but settled in both urban and rural areas where other blacks had settled in Northern states. After the act's passage, it became more dangerous to assist the fugitives and more risky for the fugitives to settle in any area where there was a possibility of being returned to an owner. As a result, many escaping slaves continued on into Canada or fled to the Caribbean or Europe. After the federal act's passage, some states also enacted laws that made it illegal for state and local officials not to assist slave catchers.

The number of slaves who traveled the Underground Railroad to freedom cannot be stated with certainty, but it is estimated that between 70,000 and 100,000 used the routes in attempts to escape to freedom from the 1830s until the 1860s.

Union Army

During the Civil War of 1861–1865, more than 180,000 African Americans served in the Union Army, the Northern military force that defeated the Confederate rebellion and by so doing enforced emancipation.

In the early years of the Civil War, the federal government did not allow black men to enlist in the Union Army. But on July 17, 1862, government officials authorized the enlistment of blacks as laborers or soldiers, and on August 25, Brig. Gen. Rufus Saxton, military governor in the sea islands of South Carolina, started to recruit five regiments of volunteers. The officers were white, setting a pattern that remained virtually unbroken throughout the war, with only about two dozen black chaplains and surgeons and with three men of the 54th Massachusetts Infantry briefly attaining officer status at the end of the war. With the Emancipation Proclamation in September and the flight of slaves to Union lines, the army and emancipation became inextricably and permanently connected.

By the middle of 1863, there were 30 black regiments, among them the renowned 54th Massachusetts Infantry. On May 1, the War Department established a Bureau of Colored Troops to manage recruitment of men and officers for new regiments, usually known as “U.S.C.T.,” or United States Colored Troops. Most were infantry units, of nearly 1,000 men each. Many state units were re-designated as U.S.C.T. units at the same time. Ultimately, there were 120 infantry regiments, 24 regiments and 10 batteries of artillery, and 7 cavalry regiments. Overall, they were 9 percent of Union forces, and at the end of the war, the number of black Union soldiers under arms equaled the entire strength of the Confederate Army.

During the spring and summer of 1863, black units served in their first major battles. The first of three major engagements, the assault on Port Hudson, Louisiana, on May 27, 1863, resulted in a Union defeat but favorable publicity. The second, also in Louisiana, at Milliken’s Bend, was part of Gen. Ulysses Grant’s Vicksburg campaign and may have been the only major combat action in which black soldiers won a victory that was critical to the Union cause. The third, and best known, was the assault on Fort Wagner, South Carolina, on July 17, by the 54th Massachusetts Infantry. These battles brought black soldiers favorable attention and public respect. Overall, black soldiers participated in 449 engagements, including 39 major ones. About 37,300 died, primarily from disease (as did white soldiers). Seventeen received the Medal of Honor. But partly because many white commanders remained reluctant to trust them in combat, and partly because many black units served in the secondary western theater of operations, the major contributions of African Americans remained in carrying out other duties—building and maintaining railroads and fortifications; protecting bridges and telegraph lines; and securing camps set up for escaped former slaves, known as “contrabands”—that freed white soldiers for combat.

Only from the summer of 1864 did this change substantially. The need to bring more manpower to bear against Richmond, Virginia, led to the largest assembly of black combat power of the war, major black involvement in the battle for Petersburg, and ultimately establishment of an entire corps of black soldiers (the 25th) in the Army of the James. Maj. Gen. Benjamin F. Butler, who commanded the Army of the James, was a vocal advocate of the combat use of black soldiers. Fourteen black soldiers in his command received the Medal of Honor for bravery in the September 29, 1864, assault on New Market Heights near Richmond. Fittingly, black soldiers were among the Union forces who marched victoriously into the Confederate capital at the end of the war.

Service for black soldiers differed from that of white soldiers in significant ways. Above all, they viewed the conflict differently, as about abolition, rather than merely restoration of the Union. Second, they had to fight discrimination within Union ranks. The most glaring example was the denial of equal pay. In June 1863, the War Department decided that black privates would not get the same $13 per month earned by white privates and instead would be paid as laborers, $10 per month, minus $3 per month for clothing. A storm of protest, including the mass refusal of black troops to accept any pay less than their rightful wage, led to restoration in October 1864, after more than a year of hardship for soldiers and their families.

Black soldiers knew that their enemy perceived them differently. Confederate policy provided for sale into slavery of captured black soldiers. Moreover, black soldiers and their white officers were sometimes summarily killed by Confederate captors. The best-known example took place at Fort Pillow, Tennessee, on April 12, 1864. Some Union commanders tried to protect their men from Confederate mistreatment. In the fall of 1864, Benjamin Butler in Virginia learned that the enemy used black captives to build James River fortifications. So he put Confederate prisoners to work on Union defenses, drawing enemy protests and threats but ultimately ending Confederate use of Union prisoners as forced labor. Ultimately, black soldiers fought two wars, one against an unrelenting military foe and another to establish their claim on citizenship and equality. Their success led directly to the opening of the regular army to black enlisted men after the Civil War.

Urban Slavery

Although most often associated with rural plantation society, slavery was also an important part of American urban life, both North and South, during most of the antebellum period. Urban slavery was dramatically different from what was found in rural areas. The city, with its economic, demographic, and social vitality, provided a context that not only shaped the organization and experience of slavery but also undermined slaveholders' ability to control their slaves. The result was an urban environment that afforded enslaved men and women greater opportunities to resist the dehumanizing effects of slavery in a number of ways.

Two of the best opportunities slaves had to reclaim their humanity came from their living and working conditions. The demography of urban slavery was such that a high proportion of urban families owned at least some slaves. In the absence of agricultural labor and with a premium on space, the vast majority of urban enslaved individuals worked as domestic servants and lived if not in the same household as slaveholders, then on the same lot. For these slaves, such proximity meant both a severe lack of privacy and the potential for more intimate interactions with those in the position to grant their freedom.

Not all urban slaves lived and worked within the master's household. Against the vigorous protestation of city authorities, many urban slaves were able to live beyond the reach of slaveholders in boarding houses or the homes of free blacks. Many urban slaves also leased their labor to others under an arrangement known as "hiring out." More than a means for urban slaves to earn the cash needed to purchase their freedom, hiring out engendered a less dependent relationship between slaveholders and slaves, one more akin to that of employer-employee. Whether they performed outwork or not, urban slaves were still seen throughout the city doing a variety of jobs from factory work to laundry, portage, the skilled trades, and everything in between. Regardless of where or how they labored, urban slaves achieved a significant amount of autonomy simply in the completion of the daily errands of urban life.

Close living and working conditions in the city also enabled enslaved men and women the opportunity to forge lasting ties with other urban residents. In grog shops, friends' homes, the church, and even the city street, slaves established and maintained supportive relationships with free blacks, sympathetic whites, and each other. Though prescriptions against slave marriage and an overabundance of black women complicated the formation of monogamous heterosexual relationships in the city, fairly stable family units were not unusual among urban slaves. Through these connections, urban slaves gained not only experience with the practical side of freedom but also membership in a community that viewed them as much more than another's property.

It was this community-building with free blacks, whose very presence in the city challenged notions of African American inferiority and bondage, that most dismayed urban whites. The very visible cooperation between free and enslaved blacks fed the fears of urban whites who were constantly paranoid about slave insurrection. Seeking to neutralize subversive elements, municipal authorities responded with measures aimed at curtailing the freedom of the city's entire black population. Urban slaveholders and their allies instituted armed patrols, segregated spaces, and publicly administered corporal punishments in the hopes of terrorizing urban blacks into submission. Throughout the antebellum period, urban slaveholders also attempted to discourage rebellion by selling young enslaved men to the country, leaving a population of supposedly passive slave women in their place. Despite these efforts, many urban slaves refused to accept their subjugation. Enslaved men and women not only persistently engaged in small-scale acts of resistance; they also continued to join rural slaves in using the anonymity of the city to escape human bondage.

Despite these hardships, urban slaves led lives their rural counterparts would have envied. They were overall much better fed, clothed, housed, and cared for than slaves living out in the country and enjoyed liberties impossible on the plantation. Slaves also constituted as much as 20 percent of the population in some cities and provided an important source of cheap, menial labor in many others. However, by the 1860s, slavery had been declining in most parts of urban America for more than a generation. Ultimately, life in the city enabled enslaved men and women too much independence for slaveholders and municipal authorities to easily control. Their continual insubordination coupled with increasing demand for slave labor as the Civil War approached led many urban slaveholders to sell their slaves to rural planters farther south. Those who remained in the city continued to make use of opportunities to resist the inhumane and oppressive realities of slavery that the bustling urban environment provided them.

Vesey, Denmark

Denmark Vesey (1767–1822) was the alleged leader of one of the largest slave conspiracies in the history of North American slavery. On May 25, 1822, the uncovering of the Vesey plot sent shock waves throughout the slaveholding South. After being implicated in the conspiracy by a house servant, three slaves—William Paul, Mingo Harth, and Peter Poyas—were arrested by city authorities on May 31. Because they maintained their composure, both Mingo Harth and Peter Poyas were released the same day after questioning. William Paul, however, remained in custody as late as June 8. Fearing what he believed to be his imminent execution at the gallows, William made additional revelations about the plot. He claimed in his confession to have been aware of the conspiracy for some time and claimed that it was extensive, involving the massacre of all whites in Charleston. In addition, William made mention of a conjure man, Gullah Jack Pritchard, who had created charms that would render the conspirators immune to the weapons wielded by whites. This testimony was the first hint of the central role that African cultural factors had played in the formation of the planned rebellion.

Even after this initial admission, it was not until June 14 that the information provided by William was confirmed by Charleston city officials. On that date, Maj. John Wilson—commander of a local militia company—visited Charleston city intendant James Hamilton and presented him with additional proof of the existence of a large-scale slave conspiracy. His wife’s slave, George, had told Major Wilson that a plot to rise and burn the city was to commence on June 16 at midnight. George voluntarily served as a spy, and the intelligence he relayed to his master was particularly damaging for the conspirators’ plans.

On June 14, 1822, Intendant Hamilton communicated the plans for the revolt to Governor Bennett, who immediately acted to ensure the security of Charleston. Five military companies under the command of Col. Robert Hayne were ordered to patrol city streets and guard against insurrection. On the night of the planned rebellion, the rebels discovered Colonel Hayne’s troops and a sizable contingent of volunteers patrolling the area surrounding the city. The rebel leaders—Denmark Vesey, Monday Gell, and Peter Poyas—decided to delay the revolt, but after a number of slaves were arrested on June 18, the plot was effectively over. With these arrests, full disclosure of the conspiracy soon followed.

The plot reportedly included between 6,600 and 9,000 slaves divided into six attack units. According to the confession of John Enslow—an enslaved African-born cooper (barrel maker) involved in the plot—the original plan called for five of these groups to storm Charleston, capturing weapons caches and killing all whites they found. After the main guard houses, the arsenals, a naval store, and the city magazine were taken, the rest of Charleston would be set on fire to create an additional distraction. The sixth unit of rebels would patrol the city’s streets on horseback initially and would later be used to recruit more slaves from the surrounding countryside. By mid-June, some 500 weapons had been crafted, bought, or stolen, and access to a local militia company’s arsenal was made available by a slave who had a copy of the key. The conspirators reportedly made note of every store and house in Charleston containing weapons, while hundreds of slaves who were expert horse handlers and riders were actively recruited. They even made use of a barber who had volunteered to craft wigs and mustaches to conceal the identities of the conspirators. Once the city was completely captured, the rebels planned to plunder Charleston’s banks of all available gold and silver specie and set sail for the black Republic of Haiti, where they hoped to receive political asylum. The revelations made by William Paul completely undermined these plans, and with the arrests of key figures in this conspiracy on June 18, all hopes of a successful revolution were soon ended.

The trials of the captured conspirators began on June 19. Arrested soon after was Denmark Vesey, leader of the insurgent army. A great deal regarding his early life was revealed to court officials during trial testimony. At the age of 14, Denmark was one of 390 slaves whom Captain Joseph Vesey transported onboard a Massachusetts brig named the Prospect from St. Thomas to Cape Francois, Saint-Domingue, in October or September 1781. During the passage to Saint-Domingue, young Denmark—nicknamed Telemaque by the crew—was distinguished for his “beauty, alertness, and intelligence” and became a “pet” onboard the ship. Once the ship arrived at Cape Francois, Captain Vesey, “having no use for the boy,” sold him and returned to St. Thomas. Allegedly subject to periodic epileptic fits, however, young Denmark was judged unsound by the French sugar planter who purchased him, and he was returned to Captain Vesey sometime after April 23, 1782.

Denmark likely lived with Captain Vesey in Norfolk, Virginia, until the British completed their evacuation of Charleston in 1782. Having mastered French, Creole, Danish, and English, young Denmark proved useful as a shipmate on Captain Vesey’s voyages. Denmark traveled extensively and may have visited West Africa on more than one occasion. By 1783, Captain Vesey had settled in Charleston, and Denmark remained his slave until 1799. In that year, Denmark won a $1,500 prize in the East Bay Street lottery. On December 31, 1799, the 33-year-old Denmark petitioned for his freedom. He paid Captain Vesey $600 to be released from service and used the rest of his lottery earnings to open a carpentry shop in downtown Charleston. As a carpenter, Denmark Vesey entered a sizable class of free black skilled professionals in Charleston. He utilized his considerable talents as a carpenter to amass a great deal of wealth. It was reported that by 1822, he owned property worth about $8,000. Though contemporary accounts note that Vesey owned as many as three houses in Charleston, no proof exists to confirm this claim. He did, however, rent a house from a Dr. Trezevant on 20 Bull Street according to an 1821 city directory.

Not much is known about Vesey’s ethnic background. David Robertson has recently forwarded the possibility that he was a Muslim from the Western Sudanic region of Upper Guinea. Robertson claims that Vesey's actions demonstrate an accordance to Islamic teaching, given that he apparently had multiple wives throughout Charleston and abstained from alcoholic drinks. Robertson has also postulated that the date chosen for the planned rebellion and even the numbers he picked in winning the lottery that paid for his freedom had numerological meanings linked directly to Islam. The date for the rebellion, July 14, 1822, according to Robertson was representative of the Prophet Muhammad's name. Also, this day on the Islamic lunar calendar marked the last two months of that Islamic year—Dhu al-Qa'dah and Dhu al-Hijah. The etymological base for Dhu al-Hijah—Hijrah—means “to migrate, withdraw, or to make an exodus” in Arabic, which was exactly what the rebels had planned once Charleston was destroyed.

Aside from Robinson's largely unfounded speculation that Denmark Vesey was a Muslim of possibly Mande origin, there is a stronger possibility that he either was an Akan or was born to Akan-speaking parents. Denmark was bought in 1781 by Captain Vesey on the Danish Caribbean island of St. Thomas. Although we do know with some certainty that he was born in 1767, it is not known where Denmark was from originally—leaving open the possibility that he was from either Africa or Danish St. Thomas. During the 18th century, some 41 percent of imports from identifiable regions sent to the Danish Virgin Islands were from the Gold Coast. Other enslaved African groups that were brought to the Danish Virgin Islands in large numbers included those from West-Central Africa (21 percent), the Bight of Biafra (21 percent), and the Windward Coast (7 percent). Although Douglas Egerton claims that Denmark was of “Ashanti” origin, there simply is no reliable way to verify his ethnicity as Akan or to show that he was specifically from the kingdom of Asante.

Though Denmark's ethnicity is largely uncertain, a great deal has been written about the implications of his socioeconomic status in the shaping of the 1822 plot. The fact that many of the conspiracy's leaders were urban artisans has prompted Richard Wade to contend that there was likely no real plot beyond a few loose words from disenfranchised free people of color residing in Charleston. According to Wade, the nature of urban slavery—which provided significant degrees of freedom and latitude—was not very conducive to slave resistance. This relative sense of freedom, in addition to the well-organized police forces in the major cities, would sufficiently deter those seeking to engage in resistive acts. But with examples of slave uprisings and plots in North American urban areas, what becomes obvious is that even an increase in the relative amount of freedom enjoyed by urban slaves did not alter their determination to seek true liberty. Even quasi-free blacks, such as Denmark Vesey, understood that their liberty would always be limited and threatened as long as slavery existed in North America. In some very real sense, free blacks were simply slaves without masters.

A variety of Pan-African elements influenced this conspiracy and demonstrate a level of intercultural collaboration. Along with Jack Pritchard's Gullah Company, Denmark Vesey also relied on aid from the “French band” in formulating his plot. This band, which had apparently been prepared for some time before June 1822, was composed of about 300 slaves who had fled Saint-Domingue with their masters in the wake of the 1791 uprising led by Toussaint Louverture. Once the rebellion was to begin, they were to raid a Mr. Duqueron's store near the Inspection and procure weapons and ammunition. Similar to the members of the Gullah society, the Saint-Domingue slaves also used a subversive language, in this case Creole French, to help plan the revolt while maintaining a high level of secrecy.

Haiti influenced other crucial areas of the conspiracy. Vesey was reported to have read passages in the newspapers that related to the revolt on the former French Caribbean island as a means of encouraging his fellow conspirators and enlistees. One particular newspaper article used by Vesey related the story of the Haitian defeat over an invading Spanish army. Having spent some time earlier in his life in Saint-Domingue, Vesey had learned French and used this ability as a tool to facilitate resistance. During the planning of the rebellion, two letters requesting military aid from Haiti were reportedly drafted by Vesey. One of the letters was to be carried by a ship's steward whose brother was allegedly a general in the Haitian military. The other, addressed directly to President Boyer of Haiti, was to be conveyed via a ship's cook. Despite the fact that he was not in direct contact with Haitian officials, Vesey and other leaders frequently claimed that armies from both Santo Domingo and Africa were to provide assistance as a means to further inspire fellow conspirators.

In addition to Gullah and Domingan elements, other more directly African elements were present in the conspiracy. Monday Gell led a company of “Ibos,” and Africans from Senegambia and Sierra Leone were another segment of South Carolina's slave population playing an integral role in the events unfolding in 1822. Imported in large numbers because of their expertise in rice cultivation, Africans from the Western Sudan were to have a profound impact on cultural developments throughout the region. The two most apparent Gambian-born slaves involved in the conspiracy—Mingo Harth and Perault Strohecker—engaged in activities bearing a strong cultural stamp from their West African places of origin.

Identified by his first name as possibly a Gambian-born Mande-speaker, Mingo eventually became one of the most important figures in the conspiracy. Perault, according to his brief biography detailed in the court proceedings, was a Mande-speaker born in the Western Sudanic region near Gorée. Both men were expert horse handlers and had the responsibility of either recruiting for or leading the slave cavalries. Monday Gell testified that Mingo was to take his master's horse and fight on horseback during the revolt. In the trial of Mingo's younger brother, Isaac Harth, Monday further claimed that he also belonged to a cavalry company and was an accomplished horse rider. Perault was to lead a horse company and, like Mingo and Isaac, was a noted horse rider. During the outbreak of violence, the various horse companies were to patrol the streets and prevent whites from assembling. Understanding the strategic importance represented by having use of a cavalry, Vesey actively recruited men with some experience with horses. In this manner, Vesey ultimately recruited about 100 draymen to serve in the slave cavalry during the revolt.

The fact that as many as three enslaved Gambians—Mingo, Isaac, and Perault—were intimately involved with recruiting for, leading, or joining the slave cavalry demonstrates an important continuity of Gambian military culture in North America. From as early as the year 1100, the Mande and other Gambian groups had been renowned in the Western Sudan for being fierce horse warriors. Between 1100 and 1500, Gambian cavalry forces swept across an extensive territory in the Sahel, savanna, and woodland areas of the Western Sudan and became primarily responsible for the rise of the Mali and Songhai empires. The unique disease ecology created by trypanosomiasis-infected tsetse flies contained the spread of horse warrior empires, as well as the horses themselves, to the region north of the Upper Guinea coastal rivers. Even as late as the mid-19th century, horse warriors continued to be a determining factor in warfare and state formation in the Western Sudanic region of Upper Guinea. Gambian horsemen were infamous among Europeans around the Atlantic World for three centuries prior to the Vesey conspiracy.

After the conspiracy trials, 35 men were executed, 32 were banished from the state, and 53 were either acquitted or discharged. Denmark Vesey, the principal leader of the conspiracy, was hanged on July 2, 1822, along with five of his followers. In the aftermath of the conspiracy trials, South Carolina lawmakers worked diligently to pass a harsher slave code and to cut off any dangerous influences from Haiti. The Negro-Seamen's Acts, passed in December 1822, banned free black sailors from entering Charleston and forced them to stay aboard their ships. This specific law was meant to prevent any form of communication—and thus inspiration—from reaching the enslaved masses in South Carolina from Haiti, as a direct response to the plan initiated by Vesey and its Pan-Africanist implications. See also: Negro Seamen Acts; Pritchard, Gullah Jack; Slave Resistance

Walker, David

David Walker (1796/97–1830) was perhaps the most influential African American author in the 19th century because he wrote a highly inflammatory, searing exposé of American slavery in 1829, the first nationally circulated critique of slavery written by a black person.

Born free to a slave father and a free mother in Wilmington, North Carolina, Walker moved to Boston in ca. 1824, and in 1829, he published and disseminated one of the most influential and radical antislavery essays written in America: Appeal in Four Articles; Together with a Preamble, to the Coloured Citizens of the World, but in Particular and Very Expressly, to Those of the United States of America. Because of this pamphlet, Walker is considered both one of the most important 19th-century African American writers and a precursor of the more radical strains of African American social and political writing.

Although David Walker's birthday has traditionally been given as September 28, 1785 (the date provided in a biography written by Henry Highland Garnet in his 1848 reprint of Walker's Appeal), this same biography states that Walker died at age 34 (not 44). Also, records in Boston give Walker's age at death as 33. Using this and other evidence, historian Peter P. Hinks makes a convincing case that Walker was born in Wilmington in 1796 or 1797.

Sometime between 1815 and 1820, Walker moved south to Charleston, South Carolina, with its large population of free blacks (including many who had been influenced by the Haitian Revolution) and its superior employment opportunities. Charleston also offered both numerous politically oriented black organizations and significant educational opportunities—thus helping account for Walker's sense of blacks as a potentially powerful political group and the wide-ranging knowledge and sophisticated writing in his Appeal. Additionally, Charleston's mix of ready employment, black political discussion, and educational support was intertwined with black churches that proclaimed that the Bible supported both racial equality and uprisings against injustice. Although we do not know Walker's views on Christianity at this time, his later views and actions were very much in keeping with these beliefs so prevalent in Charleston.

Probably in 1824, Walker moved north to Boston and opened a used clothing store. In 1826, he married Eliza

Butler, with whom he apparently had three children. That same year, Walker joined the most powerful black organization in Boston by becoming a Freemason in the African Lodge (#459) of Boston's Prince Hall Masons. Thus, within approximately two years of his arrival in Boston, Walker (now 30 years old) had married into an established (although not especially important) Bostonian black family and had joined an influential organization that promoted abolition and the rights of African Americans. From this beginning, Walker quickly rose to prominence in politically active circles in Boston, becoming both a community leader and an abolitionist writer and speaker.

In 1828, Walker helped create and then became a spokesperson for the Massachusetts General Colored Association (MGCA). The MGCA was important not only for its political position against slavery and racism but also for its national perspective that promoted coalitions with African American organizations in other cities. Walker also supported and published in America's first African American newspaper, Freedom's Journal, one of whose main goals was to argue against the American Colonization Society's advocacy for the return of African Americans to Africa (African Americans, Freedom's Journal argued, were an integral part of the new nation and would not accept a second uprooting). From early speeches and articles, we see that even before publication of the Appeal, Walker's historically informed public arguments, which used biblical scripture to advocate the elimination of racism for the good of the nation, cast Walker as America's earliest example of a Martin Luther King Jr.-type figure.

From September 1829 to June 1830, three editions of Walker's Appeal were published, each increasingly heated in its criticisms. In addition to publishing his pamphlet, Walker also worked to facilitate distribution of his Appeal through the South, largely via a combination of sailors, merchants, and Southern ministries. Although the level of success of this distribution seems to have been moderate in number of copies, the message spread widely. Also, the discovery of the Appeal by authorities led to states strengthening existing legislation as well as passing new legislation to repress slave literacy, to restrict the autonomy of black churches, to limit the mobility of free blacks, and to reduce freedom of the press (discussing the Appeal in the press counteracted the effects of confiscating Walker's text). Such unusually dramatic reactions stemmed primarily from the unmistakable power of Walker's argument, but additional factors contributing to these reactions included anxieties resulting from increasing resistance to slavery among Southern blacks, the growing tendency of black churches to conflate spiritual with political deliverance, and the fact that the Appeal was from "the North."

Soon after the third edition of the Appeal, Walker died. The traditional date given for the death of David Walker is June 28, 1830, and speculation that Walker was murdered, perhaps by poisoning in response to one of the many bounties purportedly put on his head by persons in the South, has become a nearly accepted fact by many. The Boston Index of Deaths, however, indicates that Walker died of consumption and not on June 28, but on August 6, 1830. This death was a week after the death of Walker's daughter

Lydia Ann Walker, who died of "lung fever." Whatever the reason, David Walker's death brought an early end to his life but not to the influence of his Appeal.

The continued (and continuing) influence of the Appeal stemmed from Walker's ability to present evidence in a global-historical context as part of an argument based on both Enlightenment political philosophy and Christian ethics. Walker's Appeal embraced the ideals grounding the U.S. Declaration of Independence and U.S. Constitution (the latter of which is echoed in Walker's title). It situated America's republican democracy as a political system that should but did not allow "God's will" because that system had been corrupted by greed and hypocrisy. Walker sharpened this overall argument by marshaling historical facts to declare that the condition of slaves in America was worse than the condition of any other people (any other group of slaves) in the history of humankind. Like Walker's most similar literary predecessor, Olaudah Equiano, Walker presented himself in the Christian tradition of Jeremiah, criticizing the evils and hypocrisy of his society. Unlike the more muted Equiano, however, Walker predicted that without reforms, godly retribution was inevitable.

Walker's Appeal predicted that if blacks did not rise up and destroy slavery and its proponents, God would destroy the United States. The fiery predictions in Walker's Appeal frightened many white Americans and spoke to the self-governance and separation of Black Nationalism later advocated by, for instance, Marcus Garvey and Malcolm X.

But Walker's Appeal was a complex and nuanced argument that cannot be reduced to mere advocacy for (or predictions of) revolt, civil war, and Black Nationalism, for Walker also promised that if the white population used its position of power to educate and Christianize blacks and offer them equal opportunities, then past injustices would be forgotten, and blacks would work with and join whites in a brotherly union of benefit to all Americans. Walker did make predictions of violence and suffering—many of which came true—but these predictions were not desired outcomes but undesired outcomes that Walker hoped to prevent by convincing America to choose another path.

This other path was not merely another path for whites but one also for blacks. Walker's Appeal had two distinct audiences, one white and one black. His white audience, Walker wanted to convince that although their society was based on the most civilized ideals of any society in the history of humankind, it was also the administrator of the most inhumane and barbaric economic system of that same history—a system of slavery based on a degree of unparalleled avarice (one of the most-repeated words in the opening of Walker's Appeal). Walker's avowed goal was to help white Americans see the truth of America's cruel and oppressive system and from this realization to enact change.

Walker's second audience was black Americans both free and enslaved. Although Walker was deeply sympathetic to the plight of African Americans, this sympathy did not prevent him from insisting that they also choose another path, a path of far greater and more courageous political activism based on more rigorous educations reinforced by religious (i.e., Christian) rigor and spiritual renewal. Walker declared deep agitation toward African Americans who professed acceptance of their current stations in life.

Thus, although Walker spent considerable time refuting the logic and evidence of, for instance, Thomas Jefferson's declarations of black inferiority in his Notes on the State of Virginia (1787), the restrictiveness of black life in America did not prevent Walker from demanding African American agency obtained through self-help and reinforced by African American communities that insist on education, religion, and moral integrity for all members. Although the reputation of Walker's Appeal has traditionally rested on Walker's self-defined public perception as a "restless disturber of the public peace" who predicted revolution and Black Nationalism, the lion's share of the Appeal (i.e., some of Article One and much of Articles Two, Three, and Four) spoke to the exigent need for African Americans to rise up not only physically (as in resistance and perhaps revolt) but also educationally, spiritually, and politically.

Because of the wide range of Walker's concerns and tone, his Appeal stands as a precursor to nearly all subsequent African American, nonfiction writing. Walker's emphasis on education, self-help, and the generosity of African Americans makes the Appeal an early expression of ideas later professed by, for instance, Booker T. Washington (e.g., "The Atlanta Exposition Address"). But although the "brotherly" elements of Walker have received too little attention, his Appeal nevertheless stands more clearly on the radical and fiery side of African American letters and political resistance.

Although there is no known evidence that Nat Turner, for instance, read Walker, it is likely that he at least knew of the Appeal, and many portrayed Turner's insurrection (August 1831) as a manifestation of Walker's pamphlet. There is ample evidence that people associated with other insurrections, or with potential insurrections, in the years leading up to the Civil War possessed copies of Walker's Appeal, and Walker's text was a major rallying point for opposition to slavery in antebellum America. Also, in addition to prominent white abolitionists, 19th-century African Americans who specifically acknowledge the influence of Walker included Maria Stewart and Frederick Douglass.

During the 20th century, we could hear Walker in W. E. B. Du Bois's analysis about the persistent race problem in America and the psychological impact of racism on African Americans, as well as Walker's inclusion of Africa in world history. Although Du Bois may not specifically have derived these themes from Walker, on more than one occasion, he acknowledged the importance of Walker to African American political thought.

Walker's themes could also be heard in the speeches of Martin Luther King Jr., but Walker's influence surfaced most strongly in figures such as Marcus Garvey, Malcolm X, and Eldridge Cleaver. These "black nationalist" expressions of Walker downplayed the Christian and integrationist elements of Walker's pamphlet while emphasizing Walker's call to immediate, physical (material) action.

The wide-ranging insights, global perspective, and eloquence of Walker's Appeal along with its influence on antebellum America, practically guaranteed both its impact on 20th-century African American letters and its continuing impact in this 21st century. As a historical document, Walker's Appeal remains one of the best early studies of the material and psychological results of racism, results that America continues to struggle with today.

Ward, Samuel Ringgold

Samuel Ringgold Ward (1817–1866?) is best known for his work for the antislavery societies of New York and Canada, his help in founding the Free Soil Party in 1848, and the publication of his Autobiography of a Fugitive Negro: His Anti-Slavery Labours in the United States, Canada and England in 1855. Ward was born in Maryland on October 17, 1817, the only child of slave parents who escaped to New York around the time he was three years old. In his subsequent life as a free person, Ward became a teacher and later a preacher who served an all-white congregation.

According to Ward, it was his mother Anne's idea to run away from the plantation rather than risk being sold away from her son, and his father William complied. The young family made it to a Quaker colony in New Jersey in 1820 and stayed for six years. By then, slave captures were on the increase. Ward had a second cousin and two first cousins kidnapped and returned to slavery, so his parents moved farther north for security, arriving in New York City in 1826.

According to family oral history, Ward's father was descended from an African prince, and his mother was the great-granddaughter of an Irish slave owner. Though no written proof existed, these stories served as proof to Ward that he was meant for better things. Rather than work full-time as a child, Ward attended public schools, apprenticed in a law office, and became a teacher in 1833 at the age of 16. Five years later, he married Emily Reynolds, with whom he would eventually have four children.

Ward began his antislavery efforts slowly, delivering an oration before a Literary Society in July 1837, with Lewis Tappan in the audience. His ministry and abolitionist work grew together over the years. In 1839, Ward earned his license to preach by the New York Congregational Association and became a minister. He also became a traveling agent of the New York Anti-Slavery Society and a member of the new Liberty Party and began editing antislavery newspapers with profits from his ministry.

After serving as the pastor of a church in Wayne County, New York, he preached at churches all around the state, settling again as a pastor in Cortland Village and later in Syracuse. It was from that city in 1851 that Ward and his family were forced to flee because of his involvement in the Jerry Rescue case. Since the passage of the Fugitive Slave Act in 1850, runaway kidnappings had risen dramatically. As Ward railed against these acts while attending the Liberty Party's annual convention in town, a local barrel maker named Jerry was taken by force under the auspices of the act. After failing to rescue the man on a first attempt, a large crowd of free persons and abolitionists gathered at the commissioner's office. They demanded his release and, in the meantime, there was a speech from Ward and famed lawyer and abolitionist Gerrit Smith, who was in town for the convention. Their virulent rhetoric caused the crowd to storm the building, and the marshal freed Jerry to avoid an act of mob violence. The authorities issued indictments for treason to all involved who could be named, so Ward quickly crossed into Canada. His family followed a few months later.

In Canada, Ward continued his abolitionist work as an agent for the Canadian Anti-Slavery Society. Though slavery had been abolished there in 1834, the society worked toward gaining Canadian support for antislavery work in the United States as well as working against racial discrimination in their country. Ward worked in Canada from 1851 until 1853, when he was sent to England to garner further support for the cause. His ticket had been purchased by Lewis Tappan. Yet onboard the steamer, Ward was required to eat meals in his room rather than the main dining hall to avoid unrest among the other passengers. He received superior treatment once in England and met many abolitionists known worldwide, including Harriet Beecher Stowe, who had published Uncle Tom's Cabin the previous year, and Elizabeth Taylor Greenfield, America's first black concert singer, also known as the Black Swan. Ward also succeeded in raising over £1,200 for the Canadian Anti-Slavery Society in his 10-month tour.

In 1855, Ward wrote his autobiography on the suggestion of several antislavery activists in the United States and England. In the autobiography, he briefly discussed his early years and focused on his antislavery work in Canada, detailing many legal cases of discrimination and their outcomes, and overseas. With the proceeds, he purchased land in Jamaica from one of his English benefactors and moved his family there when his tour concluded. He worked as a minister and a farmer and died in 1866.

Whipper, William

William Whipper (1804–1876) was a black abolitionist and advocate of equal rights for all people, regardless of race.

Whipper was born on February 22, 1804, to a slave woman and her white master. His obituary states that he was born in Little Britain Township, Lancaster County, Pennsylvania. But there are no extant records to prove that claim or document his early life. It is known that by 1828, Whipper was in Philadelphia, working as a steam scourer. Whipper had little formal education but was in demand as an orator in the Philadelphia African American community. In 1828, Whipper gave an “Address before the Colored Reading Society of Philadelphia.” In 1833, he delivered a eulogy about the British abolitionist William Wilberforce and was a founder of the Philadelphia Library of Colored Persons. In 1834, Whipper spoke before the Colored Temperance Society of Philadelphia.

Like other black abolitionists, Whipper was influenced by William Lloyd Garrison's ideas, especially that of moral suasion, which emphasized the sinfulness of slavery. Once slaveholders realized that slavery was sinful, then racial prejudice would cease, and slavery would be abolished. But Whipper differed from Garrison in becoming politically active. He joined James Forten and Robert Purvis in 1832 in petitioning the Pennsylvania state legislature against a proposed law banning black immigration into Pennsylvania. Whipper also attended all the national colored conventions between 1830 and 1835. At the 1832 and 1833 meetings, he voted against the migration of free blacks to Canada. Whipper attended the 1848 State Convention of Colored Citizens of Pennsylvania as well as the 1853 and 1855 National Negro Conventions. But it was at the 1835 convention, where the American Moral Reform Society (AMRS) was founded, that Whipper emerged as a national black leader. Although James Forten was elected president of the AMRS, Whipper controlled the organization. He helped draft its constitution, served as its secretary, and edited its journal—the National Reformer—from 1838 to 1839. The newspaper promoted Garrisonian ideals such as the equality of women, the boycotting of consumer goods made with slave labor, the uplift of the human race, and opposition to any “complexional” designations or black separatist institutions. In order to realize the Christian ideal of brotherhood, thought Whipper, men must drop all racial and geographical distinctions. This creed brought Whipper into conflict with the black nationalists Samuel Cornish, Frederick A. Hinton, and Junius Morel, who accused Whipper of lacking race pride. In 1837, Whipper published in Cornish's newspaper—the Colored American—his essay on nonviolence, “Non-Resistance to Offensive Aggression.” Cornish disagreed with Whipper, arguing that sometimes, militant action by African Americans was justified. These disagreements put an end to the AMRS in 1841. But in an 1849 letter to Frederick Douglass, Whipper reversed his earlier view, telling Douglass that he now saw that black institutions were necessary.

Whipper moved from Philadelphia to Columbia, Pennsylvania, in 1835, but life there was not easy. In 1835, a race riot broke out, and Whipper reportedly stopped rioters from burning down the town. On March 10, 1836, he married Harriet L. L. Smith. Whipper and Harriet's brother, Stephen Smith, formed a lumber and coal company based in Columbia and Philadelphia. The company prospered, enabling Whipper to use his profits to finance his interests. Between 1847 and 1860, he donated $1,000 annually to the abolitionist cause. Whipper also purchased stock in the Reading and Columbia Railroad; he used these railroad cars to harbor fugitive slaves and send them to Canada. Fugitive slaves came from Maryland and crossed the Wrightsville-Columbia bridge over the Susquehanna River to Whipper's house at the end of the bridge. In William Still's book The Underground Railroad, Whipper claimed to have helped hundreds of slaves escape to freedom. In retaliation for his Underground Railroad activity, arsonists tried to burn down Smith and Whipper's lumberyards in Columbia several times.

The passage of the 1850 Fugitive Slave Act made Whipper change his mind about Canadian migration. In 1853, he and Stephen Smith began visiting Canada and bought property in the black community of Dawn, near Dresden, Ontario, where his sister Mary Ann and his brother-in-law James Hollinsworth lived. In 1861, Whipper was about to move to Canada when the Civil War broke out. He kept busy managing his lumberyard in Philadelphia with his nephew, James W. Purnell, an associate of Martin Delany. Whipper also was active in the Social, Civil, and Statistical Association of the Colored People of Philadelphia. In 1866, Whipper was in the delegation headed by Frederick Douglass that presented to President Andrew Johnson African Americans' civil rights concerns. In 1867, Whipper was appointed head cashier of the Philadelphia branch of the Freedman's Bank, and this job prompted him in 1868 to sell his Columbia house and purchase a home in New Brunswick, New Jersey. Although Whipper's bank was solvent, the collapse of the national Freedman's Bank in 1873 caused the closing of the Philadelphia branch and the loss of much of Whipper's personal savings. He died in Philadelphia on March 9, 1876.

Wilberforce, William

William Wilberforce (1759–1833) was one of the most active and influential British abolitionists in the 18th and 19th centuries. Wilberforce was born in Hull to a prosperous Yorkshire merchant/banking family on August 24, 1759. The Elizabethan house of his birth is now the Wilberforce House Museum. A serious and scholarly youth, it is said his campaign against slavery began at the early age of 14 when he wrote a letter to the Yorkshire Gazette condemning the institution. At age 17, he entered Cambridge University and at university met William Pitt, the future prime minister, who would be a friend throughout his life.

His affluent background gave him the freedom to pursue his political ambitions. At age 21, he became a member of Parliament for Hull, advancing four years later to occupy the more important county seat of Yorkshire. His initial parliamentary career as a backbencher was not particularly distinguished, although he was noted for his spirit, charm, and impressive oratory. The turning point in his life and politics came with his acceptance of evangelical Christianity in 1785. From this time on, Wilberforce's politics were driven by morality. He waged campaigns for criminal law reform and the suppression of vice as well as the improvement of public manners. Following the suggestion of William Pitt, he became Parliamentary leader of the abolition movement, although he did not join the Abolition Society until 1794.

Working with Thomas Clarkson, Wilberforce reviewed the accumulated evidence against the slave trade. He then presented this evidence to the Privy Council in 1788 at a time when abolitionist feelings had grown. This hearing went poorly, and other political crises pushed slavery off center stage. Nevertheless, in 1789, Wilberforce presented his Abolition Bill to Parliament. His speech on this occasion was celebrated as one of the most eloquent ever delivered.

The slave trade abolition bill faced many delays and was sent to a select committee for additional review. A new general election pushed the matter further from the forefront of politics. It was not until April 18, 1791, that Wilberforce again put his bill before Parliament. However, Parliament failed to endorse the measure, and the Abolition Bill failed. He next took the matter forward on April 2, 1792. This effort was compromised through the efforts of Henry Dundas, and immediate abolition became gradual. This compromised measure did pass, with the slave trade set to end in 1796. Delaying tactics again, led by West Indian interests along with war with France and the rise of Napoleon, pushed abolition aside. Yet Wilberforce did not surrender.

The cause of trade abolition improved after 1804, and the Abolition Society was reformed, drawing new converts while maintaining the old parliamentary guard. The bill again failed in 1804 and 1805, but Wilberforce stood firm and wrote an important abolitionist tract in 1806 that stirred public sentiment. In January 1807, the bill was introduced once more and received positive endorsements by the Whig government and by the new Irish members. On February 23, 1807, Parliament finally voted in favor of abolition. The Abolition Act received Royal Assent on March 25, 1807, and became law. Wilberforce's untiring efforts for this cause reached fruition, and he was readily applauded by the House of Commons and by the nation for his achievement.

The slave trade was now illegal in British ships, but the problem of slavery remained, and enforcement was difficult. Wilberforce knew that the only real solution was the end of slavery. Unfortunately, total and immediate emancipation lacked political support. During this time, Wilberforce, now in his fifties, took up other causes such as Catholic Emancipation and the Corn Laws. In 1812, suffering from poor health, he gave up his demanding Yorkshire seat and took on a less stressful seat in the Bramber pocket borough. He also worked on a Slave Registration Bill that was necessary for slave trade regulation. Wilberforce made little progress in this campaign and after 1815 gave up compromise and demanded a complete end to slavery.

Unfortunately, his poor health diminished his old ardor, but he still managed to attack slavery in public and in the House of Commons. In 1823, he published a pamphlet denouncing slavery and through this effort helped in the establishment of the Anti-Slavery Society. The goal was now complete emancipation in all British colonies.

In 1825, Wilberforce resigned from Parliament and retired to his home at Mill Hill, 10 miles north of London. The parliamentary leadership in the slavery campaign now passed to Thomas Fowell Buxton. Wilberforce's last public engagement was to chair an Anti-Slavery Society meeting in 1830.

The Emancipation Bill's final reading came on July 26, 1833. Wilberforce lived to witness the event, but three days later, on July 29, 1833, he died and was buried in Westminster Abbey. Under terms of the act, the slave masters were handsomely compensated with £20 million, whereas the slaves received only graduated freedom and a life of continued plantation labor. Yet British emancipation gave courage to American abolitionists who also saw the drive to end slavery as a moral crusade.

Williams, Peter Jr.

Peter Williams Jr. (1786–1840) was unique among his brethren, born a free man in 18th-century New York City. His mother was a free woman from the West Indies, and his father, a known activist in the black community, had purchased his freedom about the time young Peter Jr. was born. As a child, Williams Jr. attended New York's African Free School and was inspired to become an activist and community leader at a young age. When Williams was only 18, he was selected to give an address to honor the abolition of the slave trade. On January 1, 1808, Williams delivered "An Oration on the Abolition of the Slave Trade," which was a powerful political treatise highlighting the horrors of the slave trade and the duties of free blacks. His carefully constructed message demonstrated his ability to combine notions of African pride and racial unity with moral uplift and personal responsibility. Ultimately, Williams's plan for the future blended morality and African heritage to create a vision of unity and empowerment for Africans throughout the Diaspora.

Just six months later, he helped to redesign the most enduring autonomous black organization in New York City, the African Society for Mutual Relief (ASMR). Although the ASMR was originally founded as a mutual relief organization, its organizers had an alternative purpose from the beginning: to combat the racism and oppression that plagued their lives and uplift the race. The ASMR became the leading black organization in 19th-century New York, eventually focusing not just on mutual relief but also on abolition, colonization, education, and suffrage. As one of the ASMR's leading members, Williams Jr. eventually became an ardent abolitionist and was also deeply committed to emigration and education.

Following Williams's participation in the 1808 slave trade commemoration, he also became converted to the Episcopalian Church. This was a controversial move at the time, given that his father was a devout Methodist and had helped create the independent African Methodist Church in New York City. However, in 1809, Peter Williams Jr. rebelled against his father's example and became a lay reader for the black Episcopalian church in New York City. By 1818, they had constructed a building located in the heart of the black community, which they named St. Phillips after the first priest to convert Africans to the faith. One year later, on October 20, 1820, Peter Williams Jr. became the first black man to be ordained by the Episcopal Church, and in July 1826, he advanced to the priesthood and became the first black Episcopal priest in the United States.

In addition to his religious contributions, Williams was, at his core, an activist. Deeply committed to moral uplift and efforts to gain citizenship, Williams hoped that service in the military would convince American society that black men could be useful contributors to the country. In 1812, Peter Williams Jr. became deeply involved in the war effort and called on his brothers and sisters to help fortify the city of New York against the British. However, following the War of 1812, Williams began to explore alternative strategies. Perhaps disappointed by the persistent racism that kept his people as second-class citizens, he began to question whether black people truly had a future in the United States.

By 1816, Peter Williams Jr. had become a public advocate of emigration, and he urged his people to consider leaving the United States in favor of more hospitable locations such as Sierra Leone, Haiti, and Canada. Influenced by the journeys of black emigrationist Paul Cuffe, Williams became increasingly interested in African emigration and became the leader of the New York City branch of the African Institution, an organization designed to promote migration to Sierra Leone. Between 1815 and Cuffe's death in 1817, the two men corresponded regularly and discussed various emigration schemes. In particular, by 1816, Cuffe and Williams also had become interested in migration to Haiti. Even after Cuffe's death, Williams continued his passion for emigration. In 1824, Peter Williams became the president of the New York Haytien Emigration Society and visited Haiti to investigate the conditions on behalf of the free black community in the United States. Yet immigration to Haiti was soon plagued by internal conflict in the Haitian government, and Williams reportedly returned to Haiti to help rescue some of his people who wanted to return to the United States. Likewise, the rising tide of racism in the colonization movement caused Williams to withdraw his support for African migration.

As a result, Williams eventually reversed his position on African and Haitian migration in favor of Canada. In fact, Williams became a passionate opponent of African colonization but still advocated for immigration to Canada. Indeed, in 1830, Williams appeared before his people and urged them to consider immigrating to Canada in case they were forcibly removed from the United States. Since Williams had become a staunch emigrationist, he had harbored a fear that the United States might eventually become uninhabitable for free blacks, a belief that was certainly bolstered by the 1829 riot in Cincinnati, which had forced their Ohio brethren to flee to Canada. Perhaps most painful for Williams was the realization that, in spite of their loyalty and patriotism, the free black population was being pushed out of the country by evil forces in the form of the American Colonization Society (ACS). Therefore, Williams's pragmatic solution was for black people to consider voluntary migration to Canada.

Despite William's commitment to emigration, he never gave up hope that free blacks might create a place for themselves in the United States, and he tirelessly agitated for the rights of his people in this country. In fact, he was part of a group of black activists who initially developed the idea for a colored convention movement. Peter Williams Jr., Thomas L. Jennings, Peter Vogelsang, Theodore Wright, and Benjamin Paul formed the Wilberforce Colony Society in 1830 for the purpose of investigating the possibility of Canadian migration. Shortly thereafter, they commenced their most influential activity; they issued a call for Northern black leaders to craft a unified position on colonization and emigration, either to collectively remain or to leave. Among those to receive the appeal was Hezekiah Grice, a well-respected activist in Baltimore who had been a long-time supporter of emigration. Grice replied enthusiastically to the idea and sent a circular to his brethren throughout the North requesting their attendance at a convention to discuss the black community's destiny. These events ultimately served as the foundation for a series of meetings that brought black leaders together from across the North for the first time in history; scholars would later refer to these gatherings as the national colored convention movement.

Although Williams never attended the colored conventions himself, he remained committed to the cause of abolition. In 1833, Williams became active in the American Anti-Slavery Society, which ultimately made him a target for a virulent anti-abolition riot. In the blistering heat of July 1834, a mob formed in lower Manhattan, and thousands of rioters descended on the black regions of New York City. Perhaps the most vehement rage was directed against St. Philip's Church and the home of its minister, Peter Williams Jr., who they believed had performed an interracial marriage ceremony. For two hours, the mob devastated the church and his home without any intervention from the police or authorities. Sadly, the 1834 riot marked the end of Peter Williams Jr.'s public career as an abolitionist and agitator for black civil rights. His mentor, Bishop Benjamin T. Onderdonk, demanded that Williams resign from the American Anti-Slavery Society and refrain from future public appearances or statements regarding political matters. Compelled to obey his bishop, Williams retired from the public eye in all political matters, although he continued in his role as the minister of St. Philip's Church. Thus ended Peter Williams Jr.'s political career; after 26 years of service to New York City's black community, one of the community's most articulate and dedicated spokesmen was publicly silenced.

Over the next six years, Williams focused his energies on his church and congregants. However, in October 1840, Peter Williams Jr. caught a cold while standing in the window of his home one evening and never recovered. His death was a devastating blow to the black community, and he was universally mourned. Along with the congregation at St. Phillip's, members of the African Society wore badges of mourning for 30 days.

Williams, Peter Sr.

Peter Williams Sr. (1749–1823) was born into slavery on Beekman Street in New York City, to parents who had been enslaved in Africa and sold into bondage. Little is known about his parents, except that they had survived the horrors of the Middle Passage and were later named George and Diana Williams. In a contemporary account of Peter Williams's life, his parents were described as "genuine Africans." Peter Williams Sr. was one of 10 children born in the barn of his master, Mr. Boorite. As a young man, Williams married a free woman named Mary "Molly" Durham, who was born in 1747 in the West Indies. Little else is known about Molly, except that she was described by a member of her church as a model wife, mother, and Christian, certainly the highest compliments that could be given to a black woman at the time. Even after his marriage, however, Peter Williams Sr.

Peter Williams Sr., founding member of the African Methodist Episcopal Zion Church. (J. B. Wakeley. Lost Chapters Recovered from the Early History of American Methodism. New York: Carlton and Porter, 1858) was still enslaved and worked for a tobacconist, Mr. Aymar. Aymar taught Williams tobacco manufacturing, the trade that ultimately became his livelihood.

During the Revolutionary War, Peter Williams distinguished himself for service to the rebel cause. Although he did not officially fight in the war, he saved the life of an American revolutionary by refusing to disclose his whereabouts. According to contemporary accounts, Williams warned the revolutionary, Parson Chapman, that he was in danger, and even when threatened with death and offered gold in exchange for information, Williams protected Chapman's safety. After the war, Williams's master, who was a Loyalist, was forced to flee the country. For a while, Williams worked for another tobacconist, Mr. Milledollar, until he purchased his freedom. In 1783, Williams sold himself to the John Street Methodist Church as part of an arrangement to free himself. The church purchased Williams for 40 pounds on June 10, 1783, and he agreed to pay them back in installments. By November 4, 1785, Williams had fulfilled his obligation and was legally free. Although unable to read or write, Williams was obsessed with his free papers. According to Reverend Wakeley, one of Williams's biographers, he treasured his emancipation papers and treated them as if they were more valuable than gold or diamonds. In fact, he further remarked that the papers were carefully preserved by his family after his death because they proved that Williams had lived and died as a free man.

Shortly after obtaining his freedom, his son Peter Williams Jr. was born, and a few years later, Molly and Peter Sr. adopted a little girl named Mary. Both of his children went on to become activists in their own right. Peter Williams Sr. opened his own tobacco manufactory and gained notoriety for being the first in the city of New York to use steam power to operate the machines. Located on Liberty Street, his business was extremely successful; he eventually owned his own house and store, as well as other property.

Beyond his personal success, however, Peter Williams Sr. was an activist in the black community. In 1796, he played a key role in the establishment of the autonomous African Methodist Church in New York City. Although this move was a religious matter, it was also deeply political. Despite the fact that this fight for independence took place within a religious institution, the division was not the result of doctrinal discord. It was racism that ultimately drove blacks out of the white-dominated Methodist Church. Refusing to submit to racial indignities, such as segregated pews, Peter Williams Sr., along with James Varick and William Hamilton, demanded equal rights and eventually led an exodus of black members from the John Street Methodist Church. This must have been a powerful moment for Williams because he was forced to turn his back on the people who had allowed him to purchase his freedom. Asserting their racial pride, the newly independent congregants called themselves the African Methodist Church. Within a short time, the African Methodists had raised enough money to buy a sizable plot of land on the corner of Church and Leonard Streets. Peter Williams Sr. was selected as one of the founding trustees, and in September 1800, he laid the cornerstone for the first church built exclusively for the black community in New York. Less than a year later, on February 16, 1801, the State of New York officially extended the African Methodists the right to be legally incorporated.

For the remainder of his life, Peter Williams Sr. remained active within the church, but he otherwise faded from public life. Still, Peter Williams Sr. was remembered as a pillar of New York's black community, and his son soon took up his commitment to advancing the race. His beloved wife, Molly, died on April 29, 1821, at the age of 74 and was buried in the old Methodist burying ground on Forsyth Street. Just two years later, in February 1823, Williams also died at the age of 74. He was buried at St. John's Episcopal Cemetery because the Methodist Church did not have sufficient space; however, there is no tombstone to mark his grave.

Wright, Theodore S.

Theodore Sedgwick Wright (1797–1847) was a Presbyterian minister, writer, orator, and abolitionist from New York City. He was born in Providence, Rhode Island, to free black parents. His father, R. P. G. Wright, advocated for abolition and anticolonization among Northern blacks. The younger Wright inherited these convictions and continued the causes.

Wright attended New York City's African Free School, where he received instruction and mentoring from Samuel E. Cornish. Wright also studied at Princeton Theological Seminary, becoming the first African American to graduate from a theological seminary in the United States in 1828. Shortly after, he accepted the pastorate of First Colored Presbyterian Church in New York City (later called Shiloh Presbyterian). The Albany Presbytery ordained Wright on February 5, 1829. He assumed this pastoral role to replace Cornish, whose ill health limited his work.

From Cornish, Wright inherited various avenues of abolitionist work. While in seminary, Wright worked as an agent for Cornish's Freedom's Journal, the first black newspaper in the United States and a prominent abolitionist periodical. After replacing Cornish as the pastor at Shiloh, Wright was intimately involved in various organizations for the advancement and liberation of blacks in America. Like Cornish, he was an educator, founding the Phoenix Society, a lyceum for black males, in 1833 and becoming president of Phoenix High School in 1836. He also sat on numerous temperance, missionary, and antislavery committees with Cornish, including the American and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society (AFASS) and the New York State Convention of Negroes. He was also an accomplished journalist, having contributed to Freedom's Journal, the Colored American (also edited by Cornish), and the Liberator. In 1840, Wright collaborated with Cornish to publish the popular anticolonization tract The Colonization Scheme Considered. Wright's relationship with Cornish was mutually advantageous for their careers and for the promotion of their cause.

Wright's friendships with white abolitionists such as Arthur and Lewis Tappan, Theodore Weld, and William Lloyd Garrison were also important to Wright's success. He hosted Garrison's orations in Shiloh Church and was one of the presiding clergy in Theodore Weld's marriage to Angelina Grimké in 1838.

Despite close friendships, Wright's convictions steered his course in promoting abolition. He was a member of the executive committee for the American Anti-Slavery Society in the 1830s. However, as tensions between abolitionists strengthened over issues of gradual versus immediate abolition and moral reforms, Wright and others departed into their own camps. When the division between Garrisonians and the Tappans separated the abolitionist cause into factions, Wright sided with the Tappans. In 1840, Wright worked with Lewis Tappan to found the AFASS and was instrumental in founding the Liberty Party in 1844; however, Wright did not believe that party identification was necessary for blacks.

In 1835, he began serving as the chairman of the New York Vigilance Committee, an organization devoted to preventing the kidnapping of freed blacks and fugitive slaves. Wright was also a conductor for the Underground Railroad, and his home and Shiloh Church were stations aiding run-aways. He was elected the treasurer of the Union Missionary Society in 1841. When the society merged with the American Missionary Association (AMA), Wright, Cornish, and other prominent ministers became officers of the AMA. Eventually, Wright was elected vice president of the association.

Wright's greatest contribution to the abolitionist cause in America was his criticism of racial prejudice. He reminded his coworkers that prejudice and slavery were deeply intertwined, and he criticized white abolitionists for neglecting to consider prejudice, even their prejudices that relegated blacks to subordinate roles in the abolitionist movement. On October 20, 1836, Wright stood before an interracial crowd of 450 at Bleecker Street Church in Utica, New York. There he addressed the New York State Anti-Slavery Society (NYSASS). Having been attacked by a white Southerner during a visit to Princeton one month before, Wright knew that racial prejudice and hatred were scourges to American society. Calling all African Americans, enslaved or free, slaves to ubiquitous oppression, Wright beseeched his audience to consider alleviating injustices as a means of legitimizing the abolitionist platform.

Wright's address gave him historic fame. The speech was printed in the Friend of Man a week later, solidifying him as a paragon of racial justice to a larger American audience. Just over 10 years later, Wright died on March 25, 1847, of unknown health complications. A monument was erected in his honor at Union Cemetery. He was survived by his wife, Adaline T. Turpine, whom he had married on May 29, 1837. See also: Abolition, Slavery; American and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society; American Anti-Slavery Society (AASS); Cornish, Samuel; Garrison, William Lloyd; Tappan, Arthur; Tappan, Lewis

Political Activity, Migration, and Urbanization: Reconstruction, Civil Rights, and Modern African America

With the passage of the Thirteenth Amendment on January 31, 1865, came a new era in African American life in the United States. The promise of freedom finally realized, the post-Civil War and Reconstruction Era was a time of simultaneous hope and despair. The chains of bondage forever shattered, many African Americans used their new freedom as an opportunity to reconnect with lost family, gain the rudiments of education, and carve out a space for themselves in American society. Reconstruction was a watershed in the sense that the era represented a complete break from the central paradox in American life—slavery in the land of freedom and savage inequity in a country premised on the equality of all. Reconstruction also paved the way to the African American future as progressive legislation—the Civil Rights Acts of 1866 and 1875, the Fourteenth Amendment, and the Fifteenth Amendment—set important precedents that laid the foundation for the Civil Rights movement of the mid-20th century.

In the period between 1865 and 1877, African Americans in the South enjoyed a brief experiment with democracy, justice, and the protections normally afforded all citizens. With the Reconstruction Act of 1867, which serves as the beginning of Congressional or Radical Reconstruction, the federal government became even more of an active agent in guaranteeing and protecting African American rights. Under martial law, Southern states had to rewrite their constitutions, and through the principle of universal male suffrage, African American men would play an integral role in this process. Creating public schools, eliminating property qualifications for voting and holding political office, and rebuilding the infrastructure of the South were just a few of the many achievements of these new governments and the many Reconstruction-era black politicians who participated in them.<sup>1</sup>

Ultimately, Reconstruction would be a failure because of the reluctance of Congress to support land redistribution. As W. E. B. Du Bois recounts in his 1935 masterpiece, Black Reconstruction in America, Radical Republican Thaddeus Stevens recognized [the need to distribute land] and sought to transform the emancipated freedmen into peasant proprietors. If he had succeeded, he would have changed the economic history of the United States. . . . But to furnish 50,000,000 acres of good land to the Negroes would have cost more money than the North was willing to pay. . . . The whole attempt to furnish land and capital for the freedmen fell through, and no comprehensive economic plan was advanced until the advent of Booker T. Washington.<sup>2</sup>

In the end, freedmen were betrayed and their high hopes in the era immediately after emancipation were dashed. By 1876, the Republican Party had lost interest in waving the “Bloody Shirt” of race and slavery, and with the Compromise of 1877 came the official end of Reconstruction with the withdrawal of federal troops from the South. Between 1877 and 1896, African Americans witnessed a steady erosion of their rights as white redemption and “home rule”—euphemisms for white Southern supremacy—became the counter to the more progressive elements of the postemancipation period.

The 1896, Plessy v. Ferguson Supreme Court ruling gave federally sanctioned form to the substance of Jim Crow segregation and the nearly insurmountable color line that had long been a major component of American society. By establishing the “separate but equal” doctrine, this pivotal decision rendered two previous civil rights acts (1866, 1875) and the Fourteenth Amendment essentially null and void. Southern blacks would be forced to suffer through what Rayford Logan refers to as the “Black Nadir,” as they would have to face the five-headed hydra of sharecropping, political disfranchisement, social segregation, antiblack propaganda, and racial violence during the century after the Civil War. In 1903, when Du Bois prophetically announced that “the problem of the Twentieth Century is the problem of the color line,” he, like many of his contemporaries, saw the 1896 ruling as the pinnacle of the movement by state and federal government officials to make white supremacy the official law of the land.<sup>3</sup>

Undeniably, the most heinous expression of white supremacy in late 19th and early 20th century America was the act of lynching. Defined as the extralegal murder of an individual accused or convicted of a crime or otherwise violating social mores, lynching and other forms of sadistic torture went unchecked by the federal government. Not one American president had the courage to support anti-lynching legislation before the 1960s and three anti-lynching bills were defeated in Congress in the early half of the century. In the 1890s alone, lynching claimed the lives of 104 black men, women, and children each year. As historian Leon Litwack notes: “Between 1882 and 1968, an estimated 4,742 blacks met their deaths at the hands of lynch mobs. As many if not more blacks were victims of legal lynchings (speedy trials and executions), private white violence, and “nigger hunts,” murdered by a variety of means in isolated rural sections and dumped into rivers and creeks.”<sup>4</sup> Lacking the ability to serve on juries, to hold political office, or even to vote, African Americans throughout the South were virtually powerless in the face of violent antiblack repression of this sort.

African Americans in the South responded to these multiple layers of oppression through a variety of means. They left the South, particularly during the 1879 Kansas Exodus and the Great Migration (1910–1940). At first tens of thousands and then millions left for better lives in the North, the Midwest, the Great Plains, and the West. In their eyes, anything had to be better than the constant assaults against their very presence and existence in the South. Although their new hosts were not always accommodating (e.g., Red Summer Race Riots of 1919), the new economic opportunities in urban regions throughout the country meant an end to back-breaking agricultural life and the ability to accumulate wealth and property for the first time for entire African American families.

In addition to leaving the South, African Americans used any means at their disposal to eke out an existence. Resistance to the various forms of oppression; accommodation with Southern whites; back-to-Africa movements; religious conversion to Islam; the creation of positive images of blackness through literary, visual, and expressive art; and embracing radical ideologies (e.g., socialism and communism) as means of breaking the cycle of capitalist exploitation were among the many activities African Americans engaged in during the early- to mid-20th century. Indeed, tracking African American history in the period between 1896 and 1968 is akin to tracking the myriad movements they developed to ameliorate their condition and achieve rights granted to them during the Reconstruction era. The capstone of this would be, of course, the modern Civil Rights movement that gained momentum after the landmark Board v. Brown decision in 1954.

The tumultuous decades encompassing the Civil Rights movement can be described as perhaps one of the most significant movements for social change in the history of the Western Hemisphere. Literally tens of thousands of dedicated individuals sought to create an American reality that truly reflected certain American ideals concerning justice, democracy, and equality, reflecting a continuity of aspirations existing at least since Reconstruction. The successes of the Civil Rights movement were not due entirely to the work of activists; the context of the Cold War provided both a significant hurdle and a facilitating environment in which fundamental change in America could occur.

The Cold War hindered activism because, at least during the 1950s, McCarthyism and red baiting shaped the contours of “acceptable” protest and ensured that radical ideologies would not typify the views held by most pre-1965 civil rights activists. The examples of Paul Robeson and W. E. B. Du Bois are instructive in this regard. Both men, avowed socialists, were sent before the House Un-American Affairs Committee (HUAC), had their passports and ability to travel abroad stripped away, and were, in effect, silenced by the U.S. government. In addition, because of a keen fear of being labeled communists, many civil rights organizations between 1947 and 1955 avoided direct action protest methods.

More important, the reality of racial strife and segregation in the United States meant to the nonwhite world that America was not the standard bearer of liberty and justice, and this reality undermined American efforts to sway third world countries in Latin America, Asia, and Africa away from the orbit of the Soviet Union. Thus one could argue that in the absence of the external pressures exerted from abroad during the Cold War, perhaps the movement would not have been as successful as it eventually was. From Harry Truman through Richard Nixon, every American President—Democratic or Republican—was keenly aware that every time a civil rights worker was murdered or beaten, every time dogs and water hoses were used to assault black children, and every time another American city was set ablaze in the aftermath of a race riot the entire world was watching.

The tremendous impact that the Civil Rights movement had on the course of history in the Western Hemisphere and the world begs a significant question: how did the movement begin? Scholars from a variety of disciplines have dealt with this question of origins, and that will be the dominant theme of the first half of this essay. One of the more popular perspectives on origins deals with the movement as the “second Reconstruction.” This notion has recently been popularized by Manning Marable’s Race, Reform, and Rebellion: The Second Reconstruction in Black America, 1945–1990 (1991); however, one can find this theme resonating in the works of Du Bois, C. Vann Woodward, and Eric Foner among others.

For Du Bois, the first Reconstruction was an idealistic attempt to create an egalitarian, democratic, and interracial society that was thwarted by a counterrevolution in which property triumphed over labor.<sup>5</sup> In 1956, C. Vann Woodward wrote an influential article in which he compared the 1950s with Reconstruction.<sup>6</sup> The idea developed by Du Bois that Reconstruction was a promise unfulfilled can also be found in Eric Foner’s Reconstruction: America’s Unfinished Revolution, 1863–1877. To Foner, property also triumphed over labor, but the main failure of Reconstruction was that land was not distributed to ex-slaves. Land ownership was prerequisite to the self-sufficiency and autonomy that black families sought after abolition, but this would have threatened the goals of Northern capitalists who feared a severe labor shortage and a drop in cash crop production. The point implicitly made by both Du Bois and Foner is that if the first Reconstruction had truly been revolutionary, then there would have been no need for a 20th-century Civil Rights movement and, therefore, a second Reconstruction.

Another work that emphasizes this theme is Jack Bloom’s Class, Race, and the Civil Rights Movement (1987). In his analysis of Reconstruction, Bloom states that the Reconstruction governments “set aside some of the Black Codes, tried to enact a free labor market, established the conditions and to some degree regulated the contracts for labor, and tried to protect black civil rights.”<sup>7</sup> White planters inspired by visions of home rule, however, consolidated their efforts to drive Northern whites out of the South and blacks from both government positions and the political franchise.

For Bloom, Southern Redemption meant the end of democracy in the South and created the need for the second Reconstruction beginning even before the 1954 Brown decision. He concludes by stating:

the term Second Reconstruction [as] applied to the civil rights movement is apt: the first Reconstruction attempted but failed to do away with the power of the Southern landed elite. The Second Reconstruction succeeded where the first failed; it accomplished this change by carrying out what was, in effect, a social revolution.<sup>8</sup>

Referring to the Civil Rights movement as a “social revolution” is problematic at best, but one can generally agree that the societal position of African Americans was relatively better in the post-1960s era compared to the post-1870s era.

The last work of the “second Reconstruction” genre, Manning Marable’s Race, Reform, and Rebellion (1991), contends that “[t]he failure of the federal government to recognize the necessity for massive land redistribution, along the lines of what blacks themselves called ‘forty acres and a mule,’ would be the principal reason for the failure of the First Reconstruction.”<sup>9</sup> White planter intransigence and entrenchment along with Republican acquiescence to Southern Democratic demands of home rule led to the establishment of Jim Crowism and the context against which 20th century activists fought.

Quite obviously there is a certain amount of continuity between the first and second Reconstruction; the failures of one created the problems that made necessary the second. The major flaw in many of these perceptions is the notion that the Civil Rights movement was less a product of human endeavor than of an almost deterministic cycle of history. In fact, one could argue that the “second Reconstruction” notion does not explain the origin of the Civil Rights movement; instead it shows how unresolved problems from one era created problems in a later period. Simply put, the mere existence of major problems does not begin to explain why thousands of activists worked for social change after the 1950s. In sum, the “second Reconstruction” school is ultimately a subtle denial of human agency.

Aldon Morris, in The Origins of the Civil Rights Movement: Black Communities Organizing for Change (1984), promotes the idea that even if the starting point of the movement was the 1953 Baton Rouge boycott, the “modern” movement was related to previous civil rights activities and protest movements. Morris discusses a “protest tradition” that included slave uprisings, the Underground Railroad, protest organizations, the Garvey movement, and A. Philip Randolph’s March on Washington Movement (MOWM).<sup>10</sup> Thus important precedents in activism were being set by African Americans even before the Civil War era, and important lines of continuity exist between protest movements of the past and present.

One can extrapolate from Morris’s views that essentially the Civil Rights movement actually began in 1619, the year when the first enslaved Africans reached North America. This is an overly broad conceptualization, and Morris is careful to avoid this type of conflation. He distinguishes what he refers to as the “modern” Civil Rights movement from other protest movements of the past. To him, “the modern movement was directly linked to the activism of the 1940s via civil rights organizations and activists who played important roles in both periods.”<sup>11</sup>

There is still a major flaw in Morris’s analysis of continuities. Placing protest movements, past and present, under the rubric of “Civil Rights movements” misstates the purpose and goal of certain types of organizational efforts of the past. One of the underlying principles of civil rights advocates is their goal to bring about the inclusion of a formerly marginalized group into mainstream society as citizens whose rights are guaranteed and protected by the federal Constitution. Civil rights advocates of the 1960s sought black political enfranchisement, social equality, justice, and rights within the context of the American system. Slave rebels and Universal Negro Improvement Association (UNIA) members were not seeking further inclusion into American society, but rather and escape from it. The term “civil rights” therefore does not reflect the goals of those individuals in any shape or form. Instead, perhaps, the nascent and embryonic origins of black power can be found within the writings of David Walker, the actions of Nat Turner, and the organization apparatus created by Marcus Garvey.

In terms of Morris’s explanation of the causes of the modern movement, he takes a grass roots approach and identifies the black church (not organizations like the NAACP) as providing the necessary impetus to facilitate change. The church played a decided role in organizing and sustaining the Montgomery bus boycott in 1955–1956.<sup>12</sup> The black church also played a profound role in the event that sparked the activist stage of the modern movement, the Baton Rouge bus boycott of 1953. In this boycott, the church provided the grass roots leadership (Rev. T. J. Jemison), the numerical support for the protest (Mt. Zion Baptist was the largest church in the city with about 3,000 supporters), the experience in organization, the financial backing, and the moral fervor to facilitate a successful protest.

The black church in general also created an organization, the Southern Christian Leadership Conference (SCLC), which replaced the NAACP as the main cog in civil rights activism and which also gave birth to one of the most important protest organizations in the 1960s, the Student Non-violent Coordinating Committee (SNCC). The success of the Baton Rouge movement encouraged similar protests in Montgomery, Tallahassee, and New Orleans in subsequent years.<sup>13</sup>

Morris’s essential argument that African Americans led and created the Civil Rights movement is generally accepted now, but there are other scholarly opinions predating his work that offer different interpretations. A work that epitomizes this is Anthony Oberschall’s 1973 work entitled Social Conflict and Social Movements. Oberschall contends that Southern rural blacks lacked the ability to make massive changes themselves. Although he recognizes human agency on a certain level, Oberschall's perspective is skewed because of a lack of appreciation of grass roots leadership and organizations. He instead sees the movement as the product of an emerging black middle class and also points to the significance of college students as key leaders in the movement.<sup>14</sup>

Also important to his analysis were white allies and the major national level organizations like the NAACP and the Congress of Racial Equality (CORE). In essence, these variegated forces converged to help uplift the basically passive black rural masses who lacked the ability to help themselves. This demonstrates a surprising lack of understanding, especially as his model cannot explain the Baton Rouge boycott, the Montgomery boycott, and the thousands of other grass roots movements throughout the South.

In terms of the issue of the origins of the Civil Rights movement, monocausal explanations are obviously useless. Several factors played a part in stimulating African Americans to initiate this massive movement for social justice and citizenship rights: the pre-World War II northern migration and subsequent urbanization of blacks, the returning World War II veterans who fought the evil of racism abroad, the pre-McCarthy era influence of Communist organizers among rural blacks,<sup>15</sup> the powerful role of the black church, the existence of a continuity of struggle in the urban North and rural South, and the inertia created by local movements and community organizers.<sup>16</sup>

The Civil Rights movement has had lasting impacts and became a shaping influence on other types of movements and organizations, namely black power (and other empowerment movements), the New Left, the free speech movement, and the women's liberation movement. Specifically, both Sara Evans and Clayborne Carson have offered interpretations about the role of SNCC in the Civil Rights movement and how the organization impacted Students for a Democratic Society (SDS), the Economic Research and Action Projects (ERAP), and the New Left in general, as well as the resurgence of feminism in the second half of the 20th century. Sara Evans, a white southern activist/feminist turned scholar, analyzes the reemergence of feminism in the mid-20th century in Personal Politics: The Roots of Women's Liberation in the Civil Rights Movement and the New Left (1979). Feminism itself, according to Evans, had a life of its own. The latest incarnation of the ideology was given birth in the reaction against dominant themes of domesticity during the relatively apolitical 1950s. Important aspects of both feminism and the women's liberation movement, however, were given impetus and shape by the Civil Rights movement.<sup>17</sup>

It is no surprise that according to Evans, SNCC was to be the organization that exerted the most influence on the women's movement; it was the only organization that involved young southern white women; both SCLC and CORE members and leadership tended to be older and male. During the freedom summer campaign in 1964, SNCC enlisted the help of hundreds of white northern students, and once again many of these students were women. Problems soon mounted as Evans states, "self-assertion generated new forms of anxiety; new expectations existed alongside traditional ideas about roles; and ideas like 'freedom' and 'equality' were often subordinated to assumptions about women as mere houseworkers and sexual objects."<sup>18</sup>

Evans notes clearly, however, that SNCC would not have been created nor would it have sustained itself without the tireless and continuous efforts of women. Ella Baker first came up with the idea of an independent student and youth oriented movement organization. She was the one who urged students to maintain an independent existence from SCLC and single handedly fought off attempts by SNCC's parent organization to exert influence and control. Diane Nash was clearly the most charismatic member of the "Nashville group," which gave SNCC its original numerical impetus and moral foundation; in fact, Nash was a popular choice for the first chairperson of SNCC, although she turned down the offer. It must also be remembered that Fannie Lou Hamer's impassioned televised testimony at the Atlantic City Democratic convention gave the Mississippi Freedom Democratic Party (SNCC's political arm) and SNCC national legitimacy. But the women described here were all black women, and the roles inhabited by white women in the movement were much more circumscribed in comparison.

The marginalization that white women experienced in the movement was best expressed by Casey Hayden and Mary King's SNCC position paper presented at the Wave-land Retreat in 1965. Some of the grievances included being referred to as "girls" and the automatic assignment of clerical and secretarial work to women.<sup>19</sup> Despite the validity of these problems, Stokely Carmichael responded derisively to the question of women's positions in SNCC by stating they should be "prone."<sup>20</sup> In spite of this, the sexism white women would face within SNCC ranks would not compare, according to Evans, to what they would face in New Left organizations.

In sum, Evans concludes that feminism grew within the contradiction that an increase in sexism occurred in the same places (e.g., SNCC, SDS, Economic Research and Action Projects, ERAP) where women found new strength, potential, and self-confidence. In response to this contradiction, Hayden and King collaborated again in 1965 to draft a feminist manifesto. Also at the annual national conference for SDS in 1967, a “Women’s Liberation Workshop” was organized to sensitize men in the organization to sexism and sexual oppression. The women were met with the same type of derisiveness that was strikingly reminiscent of Carmichael’s 1965 comment.

The experience of women like Hayden and King in SNCC provided both negative and positive stimulus for feminism and women’s liberation. The black power phase, which is usually seen as the beginning of the end for SNCC, served also as a positive model on which feminism would build. As Evans contends, the type of sexism faced by women in both SNCC and SDS proved that women needed a women’s organization to fight against sexism and for women’s liberation. Taking cues from black power advocates, drafters of the paper titled “To the Women of the Left” presented at the 1967 National Conference for New Politics made the following statement:

Women must not make the same mistake the blacks did at first of allowing others (whites in their case, men in ours) to define our issues, methods and goals. Only we can and must define the terms of our struggle... it is incumbent on us, as women, to organize a movement for women’s liberation.<sup>21</sup>

This statement demonstrated quite explicitly that the move toward racial separation and black power within SNCC ranks had broader implications.

One major problem with Evans’s analysis of the Waveland paper written by Hayden and King emerges with the complaint made by Mary King that Evans simply misinterpreted the meaning of the “Women’s Position” paper. In her massive work entitled Freedom Song: A Personal Story of the 1960s Civil Rights Movement (New York, 1987), King states:

One damaging notion implanted in the literature, even by such pathfinding authors as history professor Sara M. Evans... was that in the years after 1965 the movement became increasingly alienating for women. This was true for me, but not for the reasons given. As this story goes, women in the movement were relegated to typing, running mimeograph machines, preparing and serving coffee, washing dishes, and being available for sex. This is not correct and is not an explanation of Casey’s and my protests.<sup>22</sup>

Essentially King goes on to argue that the contentions she and Hayden were writing about had more to do with the “freedom high” versus the “hierarchical structuralist” debate that, according to both Evans and Carson, convulsed SNCC during the postfreedom summer era.<sup>23</sup> Hayden and King were advocates of the democratic, antihierarchical, and pro-decentralization “freedom high” sect. King states clearly that with centralized hierarchy, the problems she and Hayden wrote about in the women’s position paper would persist. Evans took King’s testimony and twisted it until it fit within the confines of her ideological critique of SNCC and the positive and negative stimulus it provided both feminism and the women’s liberation movement.

Carson’s work entitled In Struggle: SNCC and the Black Awakening of the 1960s demonstrates the impact SNCC had on other organizations of the civil rights era. More specifically, he devotes an entire chapter to SNCC’s role as the model by which New Left groups found a sense of direction and purpose. As Sara Evans also points out, before 1965, SDS was primarily known as an enclave of radical white intellectuals that were initially both hierarchically structured and not involved in active protest. After the summer of 1964 when many northern whites returned home after the freedom summer voter registration drive in Mississippi, SDS and other New Left groups were invigorated by the new energy derived from students who gained invaluable experience working with SNCC.

On the most obvious level, Casey Hayden was married to Tom Hayden who was the chair of SDS in 1964. Also individuals such as Betty Garman, Jim Monsonis, Bob Zellner, and Maria Varela played significant roles in both SNCC and SDS. But direct influences, demonstrated by both Evans and Carson, appear in other forms. Carson notes that “[s]ome observers attributed SNCC’s radicalism to the presence of white leftist in the southern struggle; yet SNCC is more accurately seen as a source of insights and inspiration for the New Left.”<sup>24</sup>

The SNCC-derived notion of participatory democracy and the debate between freedom highs and structuralists

prefigured the anarchists factions of SDS.<sup>25</sup> Also, the launching of SDS's ERAP demonstrates to Carson that SDS was "attempting to apply many of SNCC's techniques developed in the deep South to the problems of the northern urban poor."<sup>26</sup> ERAP ushered in a new era of SDS and New Left activities that went far beyond the relatively passive intellectualism of their pre-1965 past. The open infatuation that SDS leaders showed for SNCC efforts are reflected in the "Port Huron Statement" of 1962, which, according to Carson, applauded the political emphasis of the southern student movement.<sup>27</sup>

The view that SNCC inspired SDS and the New Left in a variety of ways is mirrored in the works of Aldon Morris and Todd Gitlin. And although Carson notes that some "observers" have tended to attribute SNCC's radicalism to the influence of white leftists, these observers remain unnamed and no major historical monograph makes that argument. Hence the consensus is aptly summed up by Morris's comment that "the activist stage of the modern white student movement was generated by the 1960 sit-ins, because they provided these students with a protest model with both a tactical and an organizational blueprint."<sup>28</sup>

The Civil Rights movement was a product of both impersonal and personal forces. The Cold War provided the political backdrop, the failures of the Reconstruction era provided the enemy, while rural and urban southern churches produced the means to bring about momentous changes. Southern churches began the movement in Baton Rouge, and soon boycotts appeared throughout the Jim Crow South. Southern churches (in the guise of the SCLC), and more specifically Ella Baker, helped coalesce the student sit-in movement into an organization (SNCC) that fought for much more than hamburgers and Cokes. SNCC was to eventually fight for voter registration and rights, for black power, against the Vietnam War, and against imperialism. In turn, SNCC affected both the New Left and the women's liberation movement in significant ways, as mentioned earlier. In a very tangible sense, SNCC was also the bridge between Civil Rights and Black Power, especially beginning after 1965.

Looking back from the vantage of the events of November 4, 2008—with the historic election of President Barack Obama—it would be impossible to track a linear historical trajectory from Reconstruction to that date without using words like "miraculous," "surprising," or "extraordinary." In a very real sense African Americans stood at the edge of Armageddon in the 1890s and bore witness to a conscious and concerted campaign to eliminate their rights and to rid the country of their presence. Their survival and, later, their ingenuity in facilitating a Civil Rights movement that overturned centuries of racist legislation, executive orders and actions, and judicial rulings were as monumental an undertaking as any other in human history. Combined, the Civil Rights and Black Power movements created a foundation (e.g., the Civil Rights Act of 1964, the Voting Rights Act of 1965, the creation of the Congressional Black Caucus) from which the election of President Barack Obama was even possible. Perhaps then, when viewed from this particular perspective, the first Reconstruction should be considered a success.

Although the back-of-the-book blurb states that King "led the first successful large-scale application of non-violent resistance in America," King states on page 9 that the boycott is instead "the chronicle of 50,000 Negroes who took to heart the principles of nonviolence, who learned to fight for their rights. . . ." It should also be noted that the boycott began before King became involved, deriving much of its energy from grass roots leaders like Jo Ann Gibson Robinson, the Women's Political Council, E. D. Nixon and the tireless efforts of thousands of black maids and servants who walked miles to work for more than a year. See Robinson, Jo Ann Gibson, and David J. It should be noted that nonviolent direct action did not start with King; this concept resonates in the moral suasionism of the mid-19th century championed by both Frederick Douglass and Sojourner Truth, as well as the tactics espoused by A. Philip Randolph and the 1941 March on Washington Movement. Even if direct lines of continuity cannot be demonstrated, what is important is that the tactic of nonviolent direct action has a history that precedes King by at least a century.

the games altogether. For Germany, the games became an arena to trumpet Aryan supremacy while pacifying the anxieties of the world community. For many Black and Jewish athletes—including African Americans like Jesse Owens and Ralph Metcalf—successful participation in the 1936 Olympics damaged Nazi racial ideology and helped to codify antifascist sentiment in America.

When the International Olympic Committee (IOC) awarded Berlin the games in 1931, few anticipated Adolf Hitler becoming chancellor in 1933 and the subsequent rise of the Nazi party. IOC organizers respected German sports leaders and viewed the Berlin games as a way to reintroduce Germany to the world sports community. The IOC felt that German participation was necessary to revitalize the fledgling Olympic movement. World War I had already forced the cancellation of the 1916 Berlin games, and German teams were not invited to Antwerp in 1920 or Paris in 1924. Furthermore, worldwide economic depression severely limited participation in the 1932 games, as many European teams could not afford the trip to Los Angeles. In awarding Berlin the 1936 games, the IOC was anxious to create a strong Olympic field by centering the games in Europe and drawing participants from Germany.

On seizing power in 1933, Hitler was intent on building a “New Germany.” In public speeches and political pamphlets, the Nazis stressed the importance of Aryan racial purity and the superiority of the “Germanic race.” Hitler launched a widespread campaign of fear and intimidation aimed at Jews, blacks, political dissenters, homosexuals, Gypsies, and even the mentally and physically handicapped. Foreign journalists revealed to the entire world the rapid expansion of Nazi racial policies. In July 1933, a Nazi law sought to cleanse the Aryan gene pool by mandating the sterilization of individuals with certain physical and mental conditions such as epilepsy, blindness, or schizophrenia. In September 1935, the “Nuremberg Laws” prohibited sexual relations between Aryan Germans and those of “alien blood.” Germany's small black population also faced the brunt of Nazi white supremacy. Most blacks in Germany were the teenage descendents of French-African soldiers and German mothers, settled mainly in the Rhineland after World War I. Referred to as the “Rhineland bastards” in Nazi propaganda, these African Germans were also subject to forced sterilization.

Nazi propaganda stressed physical prowess and athletic achievement as hallmarks of Aryan supremacy. Hitler saw

1936 Summer Olympics, Berlin

The 1936 Olympics took place during a politically tense period in which growing disapproval over Nazi aggression and racism prompted many countries to consider boycotting the Olympics as an international forum to showcase German athletic achievement and reinforce the racial ideology of social Darwinism. The Nazis, however, also recognized the need to pacify foreign nations and address the concerns of the world community surrounding Nazi atrocities. Hitler and Minister of Propaganda Joseph Goebbels launched a campaign to deceive foreign journalists, athletes, and visitors by showing only the positive aspects of life in “New Germany.” Immediately before the games, the Nazis censored German newspapers and periodicals from publishing offensive, racial rhetoric. In addition, Hitler ordered that the streets be cleared of anti-Jewish posters and the city of Berlin thoroughly cleaned. While the new and massive Reich Sports Field remained draped with Nazi banners and symbols, police cleared 800 Gypsies from Berlin’s streets and imprisoned them outside the city for the duration of the festivities. The regime even removed anti-Jewish newspapers, such as Der Stürmer, from newsstands. For many foreign visitors to Berlin in 1936, the city’s façade of hospitality successfully shielded the world from the oppression and atrocity of Nazi rule.

Many officials in America, however, remained unconvinced that U.S. athletes should participate in the Berlin games. Spurred by the Nuremberg Laws and reports of Jewish oppression, the president of the Amateur Athletic Foundation (AAU), Jeremiah Mahoney, called for a complete American boycott of the games. Some former Olympians supported such a move, as did a wide spectrum of American society including liberal Catholics, evangelical Protestants, trade union leaders, and a coalition of university presidents. Avery Brundage, head of the American Olympic Committee (AOC), became the leading voice of support for U.S. involvement and helped defeat the boycott movement. Many on the AOC board called for Congress and President Franklin D. Roosevelt to intervene on behalf of a boycott, but Roosevelt remained silent on the issue throughout the entire ordeal. The president even denied requests from the AOC to speak with U.S. athletes upon their departure and did not invite the team to the White House after its return.

Most African American newspapers, such as the Chicago Defender and the Philadelphia Tribune, supported participation in the games and trumpeted the opportunity for America’s black athletes. Sportswriters and editorials agreed that athletic achievement on such a high-profile stage would strike a powerful blow to Nazi racial ideology. Yet many reporters placed even more importance on the opportunity to make significant statements about discrimination and civil rights at home in America. Throughout the 1930s, Jim Crow segregation barred African Americans from numerous jobs and public areas while the country wallowed in economic depression. Segregation remained entrenched on many playing fields as well. At the college and professional level, discrimination limited the opportunities for black participation in nearly every sport. Professional boxing was one of the few exceptions, and beginning in 1935, many African Americans had come to support black fighters like Joe Louis. Louis had even garnered national support from both white and black Americans when he fought a series of bouts against foreign fighters including the Italian Primo Carnera in 1935 and the German Max Schmeling in 1936 and 1938. Louis, however, had suffered a bitter defeat at the hands of Schmeling in June 1936, just months before the Berlin games in August. While Germany’s ministry of propaganda had lauded Schmeling’s victory as an affirmation of Aryan supremacy, many African Americans immediately turned their attention to a group of young, amateur Olympians whom they hoped could defeat Nazi ideology on its home turf.

A large number of African Americans contended for the 1936 team, most of them from northern universities. In all, 19 athletes—17 men and 2 women—eventually went to Berlin. Although this was the largest group of African American athletes ever to compete, they were not the first African Americans to make headlines in the Olympics. In Paris, University of Michigan track star William DeHart Hubbard became the first black athlete to win an individual gold medal in track and field, setting a world record in the long jump in 1924. Nevertheless, three times more African American athletes went to Berlin in 1936 than had participated in the 1932 Los Angeles games.

A total of 49 nations chose to attend the Berlin games, sending nearly 4,000 athletes to compete in 148 events. The Americans dominated the popular track and field competition, led by Ohio State track star Jesse Owens. Owens took home four gold medals, equaling the world record in the 100-meter sprint with a time of 10.3 seconds. Owens also broke the world record in the 200-meter run (20.7 seconds) and the running broad jump (26.4 feet). In addition, Owens ran the final segment for the U.S. team in the 4 × 100-meter relay, helping to set another world record (39.8 seconds). On hearing of the Nuremberg Laws in 1935, Owens had publicly declared his intention to withdraw from the competition. Some African American sportswriters supported a black boycott of the games and applauded the star athlete, but Owens's coach Larry Snyder eventually convinced the young star to compete.

Owens was the biggest American star in Berlin, yet many other black athletes contributed to the team's success. Marquette University sprinter Ralph Metcalf finished right behind Owens in the 100-meters, taking the silver medal. As an Olympic veteran, Metcalf took a role as team leader, urging his African American teammates to avoid political confrontations in Europe and make their statements instead on the field of play. Another black athlete, Matthew "Mack" Robinson of the University of Oregon, finished second to Owens in the 200-meters. Robinson's younger brother Jackie became the first African American major league baseball player in 1947. Cornelius Johnson of California and Ohio State graduate David Albritton finished first and second in the high jump competition; two other African Americans—University of California, Berkeley star Archie Williams and James LuValle from UCLA—took gold and bronze, respectively, in the 400-meter run. University of Pittsburgh freshman John Woodruff took gold in the 800-meter run, and Frederick "Fritz" Pollard, from the University of North Dakota, finished third in the 110-meter hurdles. In addition, African American fighter Jack Wilson won the silver medal in bantamweight boxing. Two African American women—Louise Stokes and Tidy Pickett—also competed for the U.S. track squad in Berlin.

The German public treated America's black athletes with approval, inviting African American athletes into their homes and cheering Owens every time he entered the Olympic stadium. The mainstream press in America reported widely on the developing friendship between Owens and the German Carl Ludwig Long, his competitor in the long jump. Germans routinely besieged Owens for his autograph outside the stadium and quickly made him the most popular athlete in the city.

Nazi leaders, however, reacted more tepidly, censoring the German press from demeaning the athletes' race yet criticizing America's "black auxiliaries" in private. Many American newspapers reported that Hitler refused to shake Owens's hand or speak to African American participants, yet the Führer had decided before the competition not to receive any athletes. Nevertheless, Hitler had appeared publicly with athletes throughout the smaller Winter Games, held also in Germany (Garmisch-Partenkirchen) in February 1936. There Hitler frequently spent time with white athletes, such as Norwegian figure skater Sonja Henie, and many Americans viewed Hitler's policy during the Berlin games as a sign of his disdain toward America's black participants.

Many black commentators charged the American public with hypocrisy for echoing concerns over Nazi discrimination abroad while maintaining indifference toward African American struggles at home. Upon the athletes' return, the black press celebrated the success of Owens, Metcalf, and the other African American participants yet lamented the continued social and economic discrimination that existed in the United States. Unlike other Berlin athletes, Owens did not receive the endorsements or Hollywood contracts that many expected. Owens even struggled to make money in the wake of his success, performing as a nightclub entertainer and political campaigner, and participating in athletic exhibitions including races against horses. Some African American stars from Berlin joined heavyweight boxer Joe Louis and served in the armed forces during World War II, including Archie Williams and John Woodruff.

Although many Americans trumpeted the success of black athletes—specifically in track and field—as a blow to Nazi ideology and global fascism, the Berlin Olympics were nevertheless a success for Hitler. The German team dominated many events and captured the most medals of any nation. In addition, foreign journalists and athletes praised the city of Berlin and the reception they received from its citizens. In a calculated plan, Hitler and the ministry of propaganda had temporarily stopped its brutal harassment of Jews and foreign aliens and convinced many observers that a "New Germany" had emerged from the ruins of Versailles, once again ready to join the world stage. The success of African American athletes, however, complicated Nazi ideology and confronted many Americans with a choice between supporting racial discrimination at home and exhibiting antifascist patriotism abroad.

1968 Summer Olympics, Mexico City

On the morning of October 16, 1968, the Black Power movement found expression at the XIX Olympiad in Mexico City. In the aftermath of the assassination of Martin Luther King Jr. and the rise of the Black Panther Party for Self-Defense, Tommie Smith and John Carlos of the U.S. track and field team provided a lasting, if controversial, image for the world stage after the 200-meter race. Teammates at San Jose State University, both men were initially influenced by calls for African American athletes to boycott the 1968 Summer Olympics as a means of bringing attention and focus to the Civil Rights movement in the United States and the movement against South African apartheid. Organized by sociologist Harry Edwards, a professor at San Jose State, this initial call for a boycott led to the establishment of an organization called the Olympic Project for Human Rights (OPHR). Although the call for a boycott was not successful, the OPHR did gain the support of several prominent athletes, intellectuals, and civil rights leaders, including Smith and Carlos.

Influenced by the goal of OPHR and the leadership of Dr. Harry Edwards, Smith and Carlos staged a silent protest to occur during the awards ceremony after the 200-meter race. Although the most discussed aspect of their protest were their black-gloved raised fists and bowed heads during the playing of the national anthem, the men were adorned with symbols of protest. Smith, who won the race in world-record time, wore a black scarf to represent African American pride. Carlos, who placed third, unzipped the top of his track suit to symbolize solidarity with blue collar workers in the United States and wore beads around his neck in protest of the violence of the Middle Passage, slavery, and Jim Crow-era lynchings and race riots. Both men received their medals shoeless, wearing only black socks, to symbolize African American poverty. In solidarity with Smith and Carlos, Australia's Peter Norman, who placed second in the race, wore an OPHR badge and even suggested that Carlos don Smith's left-handed black glove and wear it as a symbol of unity among African Americans. During the course of the protest, the crowd booed the two athletes, and this would only be the beginning of the backlash.

Avery Brundage, president of the International Olympic Committee, responded almost immediately to the protest. Brundage, who had served as the U.S. Olympic Committee president in 1936, raised no objections to the Nazi salutes and symbols, including swastikas, adorned by German athletes during the XI Olympiad, but he was openly appalled by the actions of Smith and Carlos. Because the Nazi salute was considered as the national salute of Germany at the time, it was not seen in the same light as the black power salutes of Smith and Carlos, which indeed were meant as protests against their sponsoring country. Noting that the Olympic Games were to be apolitical and generally devoid of overt political statements, Brundage ordered the two athletes suspended from the U.S. team and prohibited them from entering the Olympic Village. When the U.S. Olympic Committee initially balked, Brundage began maneuvering to ban the entire U.S. track team. With this threat and its implications, Smith and Carlos were formally expelled from the XIX Olympiad. Upon their return home, both men and their families received scores of death threats. Even Australian runner Peter Norman faced a backlash when he returned home after the Olympic Games. Australian Olympic authorities ostracized him and went as far as banning him from participating in the 1972 Summer Olympics despite the fact that he had officially qualified to participate.

The infamous black power salutes became one of the two most lasting images of the Olympic Games; the other, ironically, were the various depictions of Jesse Owens smashing the conceptualization of the superior Aryan athlete during the 1936 Summer Games. Both Smith and Carlos went on to brief stints in the National Football League and have coached track and field teams at various levels. Between 1997 and 2008, both men individually and together received a number of honors in recognition of their courage and commitment to social justice including the Courage of Conscience Award from the Peace Abbey and the Arthur Ashe Award for Courage, and a statue in their honor has been erected on the campus of San Jose State University.

A Negro Nation Within the Nation

When W. E. B. Du Bois wrote "A Negro Nation Within the Nation" in the June 1935 edition of Current History and Forum, he was expressing decades of frustration in his longstanding battle against white supremacy, racism, and imperialism. Lynching and other forms of racial violence, the systematic denial of education to black youth, disfranchisement, various economic distresses, and Jim Crow segregation defined the collective condition of African Americans nationwide and demonstrated to Du Bois that, despite the presence and activism of the NAACP, little had actually changed in America. He became extremely disillusioned with the NAACP and left the movement after taking public stands on some rather controversial issues. In 1934, Du Bois wrote a series of editorials in The Crisis that seemingly advocated segregation and racial separation. These ideas would coalesce more fully by June 1935. In "A Negro Nation Within the Nation," he called for racial separation, which would foster economic cooperation, organize self-defense initiatives against white repression, and build pride and self-confidence among African Americans.

Black economic development was something that Du Bois began to value after Booker T. Washington's death in 1915 and especially after he visited the Soviet Union in 1926. Although it is true that Du Bois officially joined the Socialist Party as early as 1911, his connection with the party was brief, and he would sever his ties within a year. His ambivalence regarding the Socialist Party was primarily due to his fears that they tended to be short-sighted on the issue of race in America. Du Bois did begin to understand the dangers of ignoring the economic side of black life and, through personal experiences, he began to become extremely critical of the talented tenth. Instead of leading the masses in the movement for liberation, the black educated elite and black intellectuals were more interested in distancing themselves from the masses and adopting the norms and values of white American society. The Bolshevik revolution in Russia and Du Bois's earlier interest in socialism played a role in this reorientation, but another factor was that Du Bois likely saw some value in Washington's emphasis on industry, vocational training, and economic development. Both Marcus Garvey and Elijah Muhammad saw in Washington a man who had the tools, although not the inclination, for nation building, and both the UNIA and the Nation of Islam would serve as quite ironic legacies of Washington's approach.

This emphasis on economic dimensions led Du Bois down the path toward his resignation as the editor of Crisis in June 1934. He began to advocate, once again, the need for independence from the white community and reliance on black institutions and organizations. In a series of Crisis editorials in 1934, Du Bois made plain his notion of self-segregation. In the April 1934 edition, he wrote that blacks should organize their collective economic and political strength in order to run and support black institutions. After he left the editorial office of the Crisis, Du Bois gave a number of speeches that advocated self-segregation. These efforts culminated in the publication of "A Negro Nation Within the Nation" in June 1935. It would be the most sustained treatment on the issue offered by Du Bois to date. He begins the article with a discussion of the social, economic, and political problems facing blacks in the Depression-era South and North. According to Du Bois, the inability to garner a sound economic footing was the principal weakness of black communities in the decades after emancipation and Reconstruction. The failure of Radical Reconstruction was ultimately the failure to provide freed people with land on which they could base an independent existence in America. This was the revisionist argument that would serve as the basis for his 1935 work Black Reconstruction in America, 1860–1880. In essence, Du Bois argued in this work the same thing Thaddeus Stevens predicted 70 years earlier—that without land, the newly freed African American masses might as well remain slaves. Sharecropping, debt peonage, tenant farming, and other forms of labor use in the postbellum South relegated African Americans to subordinate and dependent status. The acquisition of land would effectively and permanently break the chains of bondage and would allow for advances in other arenas, namely black suffrage rights.

In later years Du Bois would claim that the key success of the Bolshevik revolution was the massive land reform effort that fundamentally changed the face of Soviet Russia. The failure to redistribute land in the American South in the wake of the Civil War forced blacks into dependent economic relationships with their former masters. By emphasizing vocational and industrial education, Booker T. Washington hoped to break this cycle of dependency. The main flaw Du Bois saw in Washington's program was that it sought to build a new economic foundation for black southerners by incorporating them into white industry. Washington did not heed the various "glass ceilings" that inhibited the growth and advancement of black men in certain trades and that would relegate the mass of black people into a permanent underclass.

Because he saw few available allies and no forthcoming changes in American society, Du Bois concludes this article by stating that the only plausible solution was voluntary racial separation. This call for "self-segregation" closely mirrors the idea of community-control black nationalism espoused by black power advocates in the 1960s and 1970s. Stokely Carmichael (Kwame Ture) and Huey P. Newton would have found a great deal of resonance with Du Bois's suggestion of a set of cooperative relationships within black communities and the need for self-defense.

Abernathy, Ralph David

Ralph David Abernathy (1926–1990) was a leading civil rights activist. He was born on March 21, 1926 in Lindon, Alabama. After serving in the Army in World War II, he became an ordained Baptist minister in 1948. He graduated from Alabama State University in 1950, receiving a BA degree in mathematics. The next year he graduated from Atlanta University with an MA degree in sociology. He married Juanita Jones and they had five children.

In 1951, he became the minister of the First Baptist Church in Montgomery, Alabama. On December 5, 1955, Rosa Parks violated a Montgomery city law when she refused to give up her seat on a municipal bus to a white man. She was promptly arrested. The black community sought to protest her arrest, and they turned to Abernathy for assistance. He met with another local minister, Dr. Martin Luther King Jr., and they formed the Montgomery Improvement Association to organize a boycott of the city’s buses. The boycott lasted for 381 days and resulted in the desegregation of the municipal bus system. This protest is generally considered to have sparked the modern Civil Rights movement.

Abernathy helped to organize a meeting of civil rights groups in Atlanta, Georgia in January 1957. During the meeting, Abernathy’s home and church in Montgomery were bombed. Groups from 10 states attended the meeting, which culminated in the founding of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference (SCLC). Dr. King was elected president of the organization, and Abernathy was elected secretary-treasurer.

Abernathy, working on behalf of SCLC, assisted in organizing 21 meetings in prominent southern cities as part of the “Crusade for Citizenship” in 1958. The goal of the meetings was to vastly increase the number of black voters throughout the South. In 1960, both Abernathy and

Dr. King moved their families to Atlanta, Georgia. The two men worked closely together for the remainder of Dr. King’s career. Abernathy participated in the “Freedom Rides” of 1961, in which civil rights activists challenged segregation on buses and in public accommodations throughout the South. That same year he was elected vice-president of SCLC.

In 1963, Abernathy, along with Dr. King, organized a massive protest in Birmingham, Alabama, which many considered to be the most segregated city in America. Both men were arrested for holding a demonstration without a permit and served eight days in jail. Later in 1963, Abernathy helped organize the “March on Washington for Jobs and Freedom,” which brought an estimated 100,000 demonstrators to the nation’s capital to protest racial discrimination. Abernathy also helped coordinate the “Freedom Summer” of 1964, in which numerous civil rights groups went to Mississippi to increase the number of black registered voters.

In 1965, Abernathy helped organize a large civil rights protest in Selma, Alabama. The protest turned violent when numerous activists were beaten and one was killed. This prompted Abernathy to lobby for passage of the Voting Rights Act to ensure that blacks had equal access to voting polls in the South. Later that year, Congress did pass the Voting Rights Act of 1965. After Dr. King’s assassination in 1968, Ralph Abernathy was elected president of SCLC. In the late 1960s, he led several strikes on behalf of black workers. He resigned in 1977 and returned to Atlanta to serve as a church minister. He died on April 17, 1990. See also: Albany, Georgia Movement; King, Martin Luther Jr.; Montgomery Bus Boycott; Southern Christian Leadership Conference

Abu Jamal, Mumia

Mumia Abu Jamal (1954–) was convicted and sentenced to death in 1981 for the murder of a police officer named Daniel Faulkner. He is currently serving his sentence at the State Correctional Institution Greene near Waynesburg, Pennsylvania. His case has received much national and international attention. Abu Jamal's supporters claim that he is not guilty of murder and that his trial had a number of irregularities.

Abu Jamal was born Wesley Cook in Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, on April 24, 1954. In 1968, he started his career at the Philadelphia branch of the Black Panther Party as an assistant spokesman. He dropped out of Benjamin Franklin High School and joined the Panther Party in 1969. He lived and worked with his colleagues in New York City and Oakland. In October 1970, he quit the Black Panther Party and returned to his old high school, but he was suspended for calling for "black revolutionary student power." He studied briefly at Goddard College in Vermont. Between 1975 and 1980, he had been working for several radio stations, pursuing his vocation as a journalist. He became renowned for giving exposure to the anarchist MOVE commune in Philadelphia's Powelton Village neighborhood. In 1981, he was the president of the Philadelphia Association of Black Journalists. At the time of the killing of Daniel Faulkner, he had quit his job at the WUHY public radio station and started working as a taxicab driver in Philadelphia.

On December 9, 1981, officer Daniel Faulkner of the Philadelphia Police Department was shot during a routine traffic stop. The car belonged to Abu Jamal's younger brother, William Cook. In the altercation Faulkner shot Abu Jamal, who collapsed on the side walk. He was taken to Thomas Jefferson University Hospital where his injuries were treated. Abu Jamal was later charged with the first-degree murder of Officer Faulkner.

Three independent eye-witnesses testified that Abu Jamal appeared right at the moment when Faulkner and his brother started to bicker, and he shot the police officer in the back. Before collapsing, Faulkner shot back once and hit Abu Jamal. Despite being injured, Abu Jamal moved over to Faulkner and shot five bullets into his head. The cartridges of the .38 caliber revolver belonging to Abu Jamal were found at the crime scene. The shell castings and the rifling characteristics of his Charter Arms revolver were consistent with the bullet fragments taken from Faulkner's body.

During the turbulent trial, Abu Jamal was evicted from the court room several times. He insisted in proceeding pro se and requested defense assistance from John Africa of the MOVE organization, but his demands were refused by Judge Albert Sabo, an active member of the Fraternal Order of the Police who, according to the court stenographer in a 2001 interview, had stated that he would help the defense "fry the nigger." On July 3, 1982, the jury delivered a guilty verdict and Abu Jamal was subsequently sentenced to death. During the sentencing phase of the trial, several of Abu Jamal's writings as a member of the Black Panther Party were used to demonstrate his disdain for law enforcement officials.

William Cook did not make any statement at all until 2001, when he claimed that he had not seen who shot the police officer. In May of the same year, Abu Jamal provided a sworn statement, telling for the first time his version of events. He claims that he was sitting in a taxicab across the street when he heard his brother shouting. While running to him, Abu Jamal was shot by a police officer. He does not mention either the gun that was found at the crime scene, nor the gun shoulder holster he was wearing at the time he was arrested.

On December 18, 2001, Judge William H. Yohn Jr. of the U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of Pennsylvania voided Abu Jamal's death sentence as a result of irregularities in the process of sentencing, but he still upheld the conviction. Both the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, who wanted the original sentence to be upheld, and Abu Jamal, who wanted the conviction overturned, appealed. On May 17, 2007, the case was argued in the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit, Philadelphia before a three-judge panel. They affirmed the decision of the District Court on March 27, 2008.

During his imprisonment, Abu Jamal continued his political work. In 1999, he contributed comments for Pacifica Radio Network's "Democracy Now!" He has a weekly column in the German language Marxist daily newspaper Junge Welt in which he shares his anti-imperialistic interpretations of world affairs. Besides his journalistic works, Abu Jamal published several books and pamphlets. In All Things Censored he examines issues of crime and punishment. Life from Death Row describes life in prison. It also includes several commentaries on crime and punishment that should have been broadcast by National Public Radio's "All Things Considered" in May 1994, but were cancelled owing to several complaints. I Write to Live is a collection of essays and reflections on social life and individuality. Death Blossoms: Reflections from a Prisoner of Conscience deals with religious topics, and We Want Freedom: A Life in the Black Panther Party has a strong autobiographical background.

Human Rights Watch, Amnesty International U.S.A., and activist groups criticized his trial for being unfair and not meeting minimum international standards safeguarding the fairness of legal proceedings. Several artists, such as Rage against the Machine, Anti-Flag, or Immortal Technique dedicated songs to Abu Jamal's cause. In April 1999, mass protests were staged in several cities across the United States and the world in opposition to the death penalty and in support of a new trial for Abu Jamal. Since then, Abu Jamal has become an honorary citizen of 25 cities around the world, including Paris, Montreal, and Palermo. In the Parisian suburb St. Denis, a newly paved street was named after him on April 29, 2006. The rue Mumia Abu-Jamal commemorates the 25th anniversary of the abolition of the death penalty in France. In December of the same year, 25 years after the murder, the executive committee of the Republican Party of the 59th Ward of the City of Philadelphia filed two criminal complaints against the City of Paris and the City of St. Denis for glorifying Abu Jamal.

Accommodationism

Accommodationism is a strategy first outlined by formerly enslaved educator and leader Booker Taliaferro Washington in his famous "Atlanta Compromise" speech delivered at the Cotton States and International Exposition in Atlanta, Georgia on September 18, 1895. In exchange for the white promise to trust blacks with some responsibilities that would lead to a solution of the problems surrounding race relations and the poor social and economic conditions blacks endured in the South, Washington pledged that blacks would strive toward an education that would dignify and glorify common labor, begin to reconcile with and forgive the South, and discourage agitation for equal rights and an integrated society.

Born a slave in Virginia in the spring of 1865, Washington attended Hampton Institute, a school founded by Samuel Chapman Armstrong in Virginia. Here young Washington began to perceive success for blacks in America in the shape of cooperation and hard work. Initially well received and widely discussed in newspapers around the country, the philosophical tenet of accommodationism was soon understood by many blacks as the sacrifice of equality for economic progress and acceptance. Quintessentially surrendering the promise of an integrated society, Washington held that social segregation was fine as long as blacks and whites in the South could come together for things essential for mutual progress.

To carry out the compromise, Washington issued several guarantees. First, accommodationism advocated the cooperation and coexistence of the races in a segregated society through “industrial education” of African American youth. Washington had already begun this element of the accommodationist strategy when he became headmaster of a school in Tennessee called the Tuskegee Normal and Industrial Institute in 1881. As a reaction to the southern antipathy to the education of black children and young adults, Washington developed this program, which led whites to believe that his school was meant to keep blacks in subordinate roles such as cooks, printers, bricklayers, housekeepers, mechanics, carpenters, and factory workers. But in fact, Tuskegee students not only learned to read and write, but many also went on to enroll in universities such as Fisk or Atlanta University, and others became teachers themselves. On the other hand, many feared that the accommodationist philosophy would cause the development of a dual standard of education—one for whites leading to advanced studies and curricula, and one for blacks that trained students to work and contribute to society with little hope of upward mobility or advancement.

In addition to the upkeep and contributions of the students enrolled at Tuskegee, Washington was able to operate the school with unprecedented financial success as a result of the second guarantee he professed in his Atlanta speech. By promising to leave the past behind and move forward, Washington was able to attain the financing to operate the school from the pockets of wealthy whites in the Northeast and Southerners attempting to resurrect the impoverished economic and political landscape in the aftermath of the Civil War and Reconstruction. Regrettably, most of these “philanthropists” had less than benevolent motives. They understood how the structure and programming of an industrial education could directly benefit them by keeping blacks “in their place,” not to mention providing a competent labor force for their factories and farms.

The third guarantee the accommodationist philosophy gave whites was the discouragement of protest and agitation for civil rights, including abandoning politics and cooperating with segregation. Washington saw that open protest of Jim Crow laws only further antagonized white Southerners and would exacerbate the condition of blacks living in the South, whether rural or urban.

Ultimately, many blacks saw the compromises of accommodationism as a way of keeping them in a subordinate role in the postemancipation society. In addition, accommodationist thought and action were the ultimate exchange of respect for political power, civil rights, and educational opportunities beyond the industrial type, for all blacks. In fact, the deepest criticisms of Washington’s philosophy of accommodationism came from his contemporaries. Perhaps his most significant opponent was scholar and activist W. E. B. Du Bois. According to Du Bois, an advocate of higher education and the assertion of rights and privileges through protest, implementing the guarantees of accommodationism led to total revocation of voting rights for blacks, reinforcement of Jim Crow laws, and removal of support and funding for black institutions of higher education.

Southern whites interpreted accommodationist thought in one of two ways. According to Du Bois, some who were more extreme saw it as a surrender of civil and political rights for blacks. Others that were more conventional saw it as a charitable means for mutual acceptance of a racially divided society.

In the end, Washington’s accommodationist philosophy failed to improve race relations in the South and a part of the time period in which it was implemented has been termed the “nadir” or low point in African American history. Still, Booker T. Washington’s philosophy of accommodationism and the “Atlanta Compromise” speech still have relevance and remain important to the historical making of America.

Affirmative Action

Affirmative action, one of the most contentious outcomes-oriented civil rights policies of the 20th century, first entered the public lexicon on March 6, 1961, when President John F. Kennedy issued Executive Order 10925. Facing mounting pressures from civil rights activists, Kennedy called on employers to engage in “affirmative action” to address the race issue in America. The policy began with the stroke of the presidential pen. Kennedy’s vision focused on the need for the federal government to foster and promote fairness and equal opportunity in federal employment practices. Given the expansiveness of government involvement with private employers, the initial efforts focused on businesses that received federal support through lucrative governmental contracts.

On September 26, 1965, President Lyndon Johnson strengthened affirmative action policy when he reaffirmed the government’s position in Executive Order 11246. The order prohibited discrimination on the basis of race, creed, color, and national origin, but not sex. At that time, women were not identified as an underrepresented group in need of legislative protection. In 1973, President Richard Nixon amended Executive Order 11246 with 11375 in order to include sex as a protected class. This concluded the presidential initiatives that launched affirmative action policy. Over the next several decades, affirmative action’s evolutionary process was marked by the passage of various legislative and regulatory acts, laws, executive orders, and Supreme Court decisions. Its early supporters argued that the concept of equal opportunity for all of America’s citizens was grounded by legal mandates of the Constitution, the Fourteenth Amendment, and civil rights acts; and, if aggressively applied, affirmative action could become an important aspect of the nation’s civil rights initiative.

In the 1960s, affirmative action was endorsed by many who lauded the government’s efforts to increase minority participation in the workforce. Access to blue-collar positions was the primary target of the federal government’s enforcement efforts. As businesses and unions began organized forms of resistance, they were rebuffed by liberal politicians and scholars who believed that strong governmental enforcement was an essential component of the policy. As the federal initiative expanded to include hiring and admission practices at institutions of higher education, however, strong public opposition to the policy emerged.

Proponents argued that affirmative action was a morally justified approach to redress the nation’s historic practices of racial and sexual discrimination. Opponents advanced the concept of “reverse discrimination,” contending that whites, and more specifically white males, were being victimized by college and university efforts to include members of diverse groups on their campuses. Although many opposing voices acknowledged the devastating impact of past discrimination on African Americans and similarly situated groups, they posited that a “color blind” approach was the only legitimate way to end centuries of social discrimination and social injustice.

Supporters on both sides eagerly waited the 1978 Supreme Court decision in Regents of California v. Bakke. Alan Bakke, a 36-year-old, white male engineer, had been denied admission to the University of California’s Medical School at Davis. He sued on the basis that the institution’s affirmative action program, which used a quota system to guarantee minority inclusion, violated his constitutional rights as an individual. In a split decision, the Supreme Court affirmed that quota systems were a violation of constitutional law; however, the Court also affirmed its support for affirmative action, ruling that race could be used as a factor in the admission and selection process. Thus, the national debate on which criteria would be acceptable under the government’s affirmative action policy began. And repeated legal challenges to affirmative action in both the public and private sectors made it difficult for institutions committed to diversity to continue their efforts.

As popularity for affirmative action waned, many looked to the Office of the President to help clarify the nation’s direction. The Carter Administration (1976–1980) was supportive of affirmative action policy. By the early 1980s, however, the Reagan Administration’s (1980–1988) open opposition to civil rights and race-sensitive solutions to the nation’s social problems helped to usher in a new era of social resistance. The Bush Administration’s (1988–1992) lack of enthusiasm for affirmative action was consistent with that of his predecessor. The Clinton Administration (1992–2000) offered hope that affirmative action initiatives would be strengthened, particularly as it related to the appointment of federal justices who shouldered primary responsibility for interpreting the nation’s policy. Early in his administration, George W. Bush (2000–2008) indicated his opposition to affirmative action as policy, and decision makers continued to muddle through the legal morass. The legal challenge to the University of Michigan’s affirmative action program, which finally made its way to the Supreme Court in 2003, was the most anticipated affirmative action ruling in the 21st century. It was the first opportunity for the Supreme Court to rule on affirmative action policy in nearly 25 years.

In two closely related cases (Grutter v. Bollinger and Gratz v. Bollinger), conservative activists sued the University of Michigan hoping to strike down the school's race-sensitive admission programs at both the undergraduate college and the law school. Support for Michigan's affirmative action program was broad based. Colleges, universities, Fortune 500 companies, and retired military personnel from throughout the nation filed amici briefs (friends of the court) supporting the university. In another split decision (5–4), the Supreme Court affirmed the Bakke ruling, noting that talented and qualified individuals of every race and ethnicity should be given opportunities. Race could be considered. In a related decision, however, the Court invalidated the school's undergraduate policy that used a point system to help diversify its student body, further weakening the institution's diversity efforts.

The debate on the merits of affirmative action continues. For many in the African American community, affirmative action is the unfinished business of the Black Power movement, the Civil Rights movement, Reconstruction, and the Freedmen's Bureau. It is a quest for redistributive justice and will remain a strategic path to equal opportunity until another viable policy option takes its place.

African Blood Brotherhood

African Blood Brotherhood (ABB) was a semi-clandestine, militant liberation organization that merged black nationalism with Marxism. Taking its name from the blood brotherhood ceremony of black African tribes, the organization was established after the race riots during the Red Summer of 1919 by Cyril Briggs, a West Indian immigrant of mixed parentage. ABB represented the first independent Communist organization composed solely of people of African descent. It was a defiant response to the perceived shortcomings of numerous contemporary liberation movements. Briggs disavowed the reformist policies of the NAACP. He believed Du Bois's organization had been compromised by white liberalism. He rejected the capitalist orientation of Garvey's UNIA. He was even critical of the Socialist Party's failure to establish an African American policy.

ABB sought to unite radicals around the themes of anticapitalism, anticolonialism, race patriotism, armed defense against racist assaults, and the establishment of an independent black socialist commonwealth. In 1920, Briggs formalized the aims of the ABB with a nine point program: (1) a liberated race; (2) absolute race equality—political, economic, social; (3) the fostering of racial self-respect; (4) organized and uncompromising opposition to the Ku Klux Klan; (5) a united Negro front; (6) industrial development; (7) higher wages for Negro labor, shorter hours, and better living conditions; (8) education; and (9) cooperation with the other darker peoples and with the class-conscious white workers.

The primary propaganda apparatus of the ABB was The Crusader, a newspaper Briggs launched in 1918 after he resigned from The New Amsterdam News in protest against attempts to censor his editorials that criticized the imperialist foreign policy of the Wilson administration. The readership of The Crusader reached nearly 36,000, but the membership of the ABB peaked at less than 3,000. Most of the organization's activities were centered in Harlem. Briggs suggested that although some regional posts were established throughout the country, ABB made few inroads west of the Rockies: "The Brotherhood was more a regional than a truly national organization" (Briggs). ABB gained notoriety outside of Harlem in 1921, when its Tulsa post was linked to the armed resistance of local blacks during the race riots of that summer. Although the ABB's direct role in the riots was later proved to be tenuous, the events in Tulsa resulted in a substantial increase in national support. This, along with Briggs's participation in the Workers Party of America convention in December 1921, signified ABB's transition from an underground to an aboveground organization.

ABB began as an independent organization. It was not originally an adjunct of the Communist Party. Briggs's interest in communism was inspired by the national policy of the Bolsheviks and the anti-imperial orientation of the postrevolution Soviet state. Yet initially, he claimed he was more interested in national liberation revolution than in the social revolution. When Briggs joined the Communist Party in 1921 (as the organization's third black member), however, ABB began to shift away from its staunch black nationalism to embrace class-conscious interracial solidarity. ABB formally dissolved in 1924, when many of its members joined the Communist Party's American Negro Labor Congress. Nevertheless, Briggs's amalgamation of black liberation and revolutionary socialism continued to influence black activists for decades. The ABB's brand of radical black Marxist political thought later manifested itself in black liberation organizations of the 1960s and 1970s, such as the Black Panthers and the Black Liberation Army.

African Imperialism

The end of the 19th century heralded the new imperialist scramble for European dominance of Africa, which resulted in the gross economic exploitation of the continent. The stagnant European economy encouraged entrepreneurs and adventures to seek new markets to further Western industrialization and profits. As a result, Europe added almost one-fifth of the land area of the globe to its overseas colonial possessions. European nationalism and racism resulted in numerous atrocities and ethnocentricities on the part of the colonists, such as forced slave labor, mutilations of the native population, and the notion that Africans were uncivilized.

Imperialism was a longstanding practice in Africa, dating from ancient times. In North Africa, Phoenician colonists founded Carthage in modern Tunisia. The city became a Mediterranean power by the fourth century BCE. After the Third Punic War, Carthage fell to the Romans, who made it the capital of their African province. The Vandals established a North African kingdom in the fifth century before its conquest by the Byzantine (Eastern Roman) Empire. The Egyptian empire fell to the Greeks, later passing to the Romans. During the seventh century, Arab invaders conquered North Africa, spreading the Islamic religion and Arabic language. Arab trade with sub-Saharan Africa led to the colonization of East Africa, particularly around Zanzibar.

Early European expeditions established trade bases along the African coastline and colonized previously uninhabited islands such as Cape Verde and Sao Tome. Trade bases later served as the nucleus for slave trading operations. The interior of the continent, however, remained free from European penetration until the 19th century.

Africa became increasingly open to Western exploration during the 19th century. By mid-century, Europeans had mapped most of northwestern Africa. By the end of the century, explorers had charted the source of the Nile and the courses of the Niger, Congo, and Zambezi Rivers. The findings of such expeditions made Europeans aware of Africa's economic potential and vast amount of raw materials necessary for industrialization unavailable in Europe.

From 1876 to 1914, European powers, including Britain, France, Portugal, Belgium, Germany, and Italy, scrambled for control of the African continent with the self-proclaimed goals of spreading civilization, Christianity, and commerce to the "uncivilized" indigenous population. Technological advances in Europe facilitated the new imperialistic onslaught. Industrialization brought advances in transportation and communication in the form of railroads, telegraphs, and steam navigation. Medical advancements allowed Europeans to effectively combat tropical diseases, enabling penetration of the African interior.

Europeans targeted sub-Saharan Africa for several reasons. European governments had not entered into any formal agreements or treaties with the governments of sub-Saharan Africa, which could be argued as giving legal recognition to a particular African government. Absent a legal position acceptable to Europeans, Western nations considered the area available for occupation. In their minds, sub-Saharan Africa was undeveloped and required more capital for industrialization than it could provide by itself. Economic stagnation and protective tariffs in Europe prompted those countries to seek an open market that would garner a trade surplus. Overseas investment became popular as a means of obtaining profit owing to the availability of cheap labor, limited competition, and an abundance of raw materials.

The British occupation of Egypt in 1882 and the acquisition of the Congo by King Leopold II of Belgium were the first major initiatives to launch the European scramble for African territory. From November 1884 to February 1885, the Berlin Conference, initiated by Otto von Bismarck, chancellor of Germany, met to discuss the Africa problem. The conference was concerned with formulating understandings on the freedom of commerce in the Congo basin, the application to the Congo and Niger Rivers of the principles adopted by the Congress of Vienna concerning the preservation of freedom of navigation on international rivers, and the establishment of effective procedures for the occupation of new territory along the coasts of Africa.

Britain was concerned with controlling the African interior to dominate the flow of overseas trade. Securing the Suez Canal in Egypt was essential for security for lucrative British markets. In the 1890s and early 1900s, Britain seized Sudan, Nigeria, Kenya, and Uganda. It used Cape Colony in southern Africa as a base for the subjugation of adjacent African states and the Dutch Afrikaner settlers. Britain desired to construct a railway connecting its southern base at Cape Colony to Cairo. The French penetrated the African interior from its colonies in West Africa eastward in an attempt to establish a link between the Niger and Nile Rivers, and thereby control trade. Increased pressure from investors led colonizers to inflict forced labor conditions on the indigenous population to lower costs of production and increase profits. European manufacturing plants extracted raw materials, developed by an indigenous labor force under European management.

European capitalism revolutionized the economies of Africa, inducing radical social and political changes that forever altered African societies. European efforts to maximize production and minimize costs conflicted with traditional, seasonal patterns of agricultural production, shifting African subsistence-based economies to ones of specialization and surplus accumulation.

The period of European imperialism heightened tensions between the European powers, ultimately paving the way to World War I. Some Europeans perceived the dangers that imperialism posed to Europe and questioned the morality of colonialism.

John Hobson, a British reformer, studied economics in an attempt to solve the problem of poverty.

African National Congress

Since the establishment of majority rule in May 1994, the African National Congress (ANC), which won 63 percent of the vote, has been South Africa's ruling party. Founded in 1912 by John Dube, Pixley Ka Isaka Seme, and Sol Plaatje, along with African chiefs, the body answered a call by Seme to unite. Seme believed that Africans were essentially one people. Formed at a time when the South African economy blossomed because of the discovery of diamonds and gold, respectfully, in 1867 and 1886, the ANC faced problems concerning the prohibition on Africans from buying land except in the reserves, places marked expressly for African occupation. Citizenship, the economy, and the franchise also emerged as other key issues that the ANC lobbied for change. Dube also used his newspaper, Ilanga laseNatal, as a forum to discuss and debate the aforementioned concerns in isiZulu. Not until 1944, when many people migrated to the cities, and squatter and bus boycotts abounded, did Nelson Mandela, Walter Sisulu, Oliver Tambo, and others create the ANC Youth League (ANCYL) and advocated for mass mobilization, did the ANC begin to change its strategies for confronting racial and economic discrimination. With the belief that Africans would be liberated by their concerted efforts, the ANCYL militarized the parent body, causing it to reform by the 1950s.

In the 1950s, the mass movement took off. Initiated by the 1952 Defiance Campaign, when participants publicly burned their passes, the ANC, under the leadership of Dr. James F. Moroka, united disparate political groups as result of its endorsement and involvement. Closer relations developed with the ANC and the South African Indian Congress (SAIC), the South African Coloured People's Organisation (SACPO), and the Congress of Democrats (COD). This merging of political bodies led to the formation of the Congress Alliance, an umbrella organization organizing different political bodies into one unit. Besides unification, the Congress Alliance advocated for better housing, equal pay, better working conditions, and equity in education. The Freedom Charter, a document detailing these demands, was presented at a meeting held in Kliptown in Soweto on June 26, 1955. As an adoption by the four aforementioned political parties, the Freedom Charter documented the political parties' commitment to nonracialism. The document proclaims that South Africa belongs to all who live in it, black and white, and that no government can justly claim authority unless it is based on the will of all the people. The Freedom Charter sought to end oppression orchestrated by either blacks or whites. The document also calls for a government, equality for all national groups, equal distribution of the country's wealth, land equity, equality before the law, the right to human decency, houses for all, end to adult illiteracy, and a government that represents the people.

In calling for democracy, human rights, land reform, nationalization, and labor rights, the Freedom Charter was a radical document for its time. This blueprint for a democratic South Africa aroused suspicion by the government. Officials labeled the Freedom Charter as Communist inspired, resulting in the arrests of ANC and Congress leaders. Arrested leaders faced legal ramifications in the Treason Trial, where 156 people (105 blacks, 21 Indians, 23 whites and 7 coloreds) were indicted, because the state believed that they planned to overthrow the government. The state also concluded that the accused had adopted a policy of violent direct action. They all faced the death penalty. A legal counsel consisting of Bram Fischer, Vernon Berrange, Sydney Kentridge, and Israel Maisels represented the accused, who were supported by a Treason Trial Fund. Two stages delineated the trial. The first was the preparatory examination in a magistrate's court, which determined the sufficiency of evidence to support a trial. If evidence existed then the accused faced trial by the Supreme Court and would be at the state's mercy. It took more than a year for the preparatory examination to conclude; at the end, 61 of the accused were acquitted and the remaining 95, which included people such as Nelson Mandela, Oliver Tambo, and Ahmed Kathrada, still faced trial.

In 1961, all the defendants were found not guilty. Oliver Tambo, who left the country during the trial, faced exile. Other trialists would eventually be arrested at a Rivonia farmhouse and later convicted. Some, like Nelson Mandela, were sentenced to life imprisonment or a specified time period on Robben Island, an Alcatraz-like prison in Cape Town. While the Treason Trial occurred, protests around the country erupted even in the rural areas, and the government forced women to carry passes, resulting in women forming a march in Pretoria where they stormed the Parliament steps and demanded justice. Little did any one know at the time, but the 1960s would usher in a new period of resistance and successful government repression of opposition for 16 years until the 1976 student uprising against the imposition of Afrikaans.

Clamping down against opposition groups began after the Sharpeville Massacre. Organized by the Pan-Africanist Congress (PAC), a splinter ANC group, which opposed nonracialism and called for an "Africa for Africans," the Sharpeville protest originally began as a demonstration against the pass books. Bedlam would soon ensue. Police officials shot running participants in the back and killed 69 people and injured 186. Newspapers captured the carnage. Bodies lay strewn in the positions that they fell. After this violence, government officials banned political organizations. The PAC and the ANC could no longer operate as legal political bodies. A state of emergency also followed, as well as the arrests of Congress and PAC activists. Neither political body lay idle. Both the ANC and the PAC created military wings and engaged in an underground movement. The ANC created Umkhonto we Sizwe (Spear of the Nation) and the PAC established POQO, which means alone in Xhosa. Formed on December 16, 1961, Umkhonto we Sizwe launched attacks against government installations. This tactic raised the government's ire. While operating from its base at Rivonia, a Johannesburg suburb, Umkhonto weSizwe was labeled a terrorist organization by both the government and the media.

Afrocentricity

Afrocentricity is an intellectual concept and theoretical approach that argues for an understanding and study of world phenomenon from the perspective of people of Africa and the African Diaspora. The approach situates black people as subjects and agents of history, as opposed to objects or props in other people's history.

Although the term was used by Du Bois in the 1960s and by black intellectuals in the 1970s, Molefi Asante, professor of African American Studies at Temple University, is widely credited for coining the term. Asante's book Afrocentricity: A Theory of Social Change (1980) represents the first full-fledged attempt to clearly define the term and explore its implications for the study of African people. In the book, Asante outlined a tradition of black intellectuals and activists that he built on in order to construct the idea; the list included Booker T. Washington, Marcus Garvey, Martin Luther King Jr., Elijah Muhammad, Malcolm X, and Maulana Karenga. Along with these figures, Afrocentricity also built on the intellectual work of the Senegalese historian Cheikh Anta Diop and the black arts movement theorists and historians of Africa such as George James, John Henrik Clarke, Yosef Ben Jochannan, Ivan Van Sertima, and Chancellor Williams.

In the late 1980s and early 1990s, afrocentricity garnered mainstream media attention with its challenge to classical European history. Great controversy was caused by two arguments emerging from the Afrocentric school of thought. The first asserted that Egypt was the foundation of black world culture and history, just as Greece was the foundation of Western civilization. The second argument, and the one that caused more controversy, asserted that Egypt was a black civilization that served as the major philosophical, intellectual, and cultural foundation and inspiration for Greece. Black Athena: Afroasiatic Roots of Classical Civilizations, Volume 1: the Fabrication of Ancient Greece, 1785–1985 (1987) and Volume II: the Archeological and Documentary Evidence (1991) by Martin Bernal, the Cambridge trained Orientalist, and Molefi Asante's KMT, Afrocentricity and Knowledge (1997) stood at the center of this debate. Although Bernal did not declare himself to be an Afrocentrist, his work gave credence to the group of African historians named here that had largely been excluded from mainstream historical canon.

Afrocentricity became a central aspect of the “culture wars” and debates over “multiculturalism” that raged in all areas of American life, especially education, in the 1980s and 1990s. At the height of the debate, Newsweek magazine featured a stone image of Cleopatra wearing a red, black, and green African earring, and the cover read: “Afrocentrism: Was Cleopatra Black? Facts or Fantasies—A Debate Rages Over What to Teach Our Kids About Their Roots” (1991). The leading intellectuals that supported and developed the Afrocentric position through writing, speaking and program development were Molefi Asante; Malauna Karenga, Cal State University Long Beach Black Studies professor and creator of Kwanzaa, the pan-African holiday; Leonard Jeffries, Black Studies professor at City College in New York; Asa Hilliard, black psychologist; Theophile Obenga, African historian and student of Diop; Wade Nobles, black psychologist and professor of Africana Studies at San Francisco State University; Naim Akbar, black psychologist; and Jacob Caruthers, the founding director of the Association for the Study of Classical African Civilizations (ASCAC). Although several women championed Afrocentricity, four key women produced landmark texts in Afrocentric thought: Vivian Gordan, former professor of Black Studies and author of Black Women: Feminism and Black Liberation (1987); Clenora Hudson-Weems, professor of English at the University of Missouri Columbia and author of Africana Womanism: Reclaiming Ourselves (1993); Marimba Ani, former SNCC field organizer, professor of Black Studies, and author of Yurugu: An African-Centered Critique of European Cultural Thought and Behavior (1994); and Ama Mazama, professor of African American Studies at Temple University and editor of The Afrocentric Paradigm (2003).

The major critics of Afrocentricity included Mary Lefkowitz, professor of Classical Studies at Wellesly College and author of Not Out of Africa: How Afrocentricism Became an Excuse to Teach Myth as History (1996) and Black Athena Revisited (1996); American historian and former Kennedy advisor, Arthur Schlesinger; Stephen Howe, author of Afrocentricism: Mythical Past and Imagined Homes (1998); Clarence Walker, author of We Can't Go Home: An Argument about Afrocentrism (2000); world-renown professor of African Studies, Ali Mazrui; Henry Louis Gates Jr., professor of Afro American Studies at Harvard University; Paul Gilroy, author of the Black Atlantic (1993) and Against Race (2000); Kwame Anthony Appiah, Harvard professor and author of In My Father's House (1992); and Tunde Adeleke, professor of African American Studies at Iowa State University. Although each of the critics challenged Afrocentricity for different reasons, their collective work represents the major oppositional voices.

Regardless of the strength of its intellectual adversaries, Afrocentricity made a major impact on black popular culture and American institutions in general. During the height of the debate, several Afrocentric schools emerged in Philadelphia, Chicago, New York, Los Angeles, and other major American cities, providing education for children from elementary to high school. Some public schools adopted Afrocentric themes or incorporated black history into the state curriculum, as was the case in Philadelphia and New Jersey. Colleges were impacted the most, as hundreds of Black Studies programs across the country designed their curriculum to adhere to an Afrocentric approach. In fact,

Temple University established the first doctoral program in Black Studies in 1987; under the leadership of Asante the program championed an Afrocentric approach to Africana Studies. In the political sphere, Afrocentricity rode the wave of the anti-apartheid movement and gained currency with the development of Kwanzaa and the Million Man March, led by the Nation of Islam in 1995. The idea also influenced hip-hop music, as Afrocentric themes emerged in the lyrics of Boogie Down Productions, Public Enemy, the Poor Righteous Teachers, Queen Latifah, Ice Cube, Brand Nubain, Arrested Development, and others.

Although the intensity of the intellectual debate has abated since the 1990s, Afrocentricity remains a lasting ideological fixture in African American thought and culture. Black graduations are still celebrated every year on college campuses, Afrocentric conferences are still held, Kwanzaa themes have become standard for greeting cards, Temple's Department of African American Studies continues to produce graduates, and mud cloth has become a conventional signifier of African American and African Diasporic culture in fashion and interior home decorating.

Al-Amin, Jamil Abdullah (H. Rap Brown)

Jamil Abdullah Al-Amin (1943–), also known as Hubert Gerold Brown and H. Rap Brown, was a civil rights activist and proponent of black power who served as the chair of the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee (SNCC) and the justice minister of the Black Panther Party. He is, perhaps, best known for his statement that “violence is as American as cherry pie.” Born on October 4, 1943, in Baton Rouge, Louisiana, Al-Amin attended Southern University from 1960 until 1964 before becoming an active member of the Non-Violent Action Group (NAG) and SNCC. He became known as H. Rap Brown because of his mastery over playing the dozens and signifying. Al-Amin's quick wit and oratorical skills made him a legendary dozens player, and he often set his verbal jabs to rhymes, earning him the nickname “Rap.” While Al-Amin was at Southern, his brother Ed encouraged him to read W. E. B. Du Bois, Frederick Douglass, Marcus Garvey, and Richard Wright; in many ways, this was the beginning of his political education. After joining NAG and then later SNCC, Al-Amin became involved in a series of protest activities including sit-ins, voting rights campaigns, and marches.

In 1965, Al-Amin's transformation into an advocate of black power began when he, along with several other African American leaders, were called to the White House to meet with President Lyndon Baines Johnson. As Al-Amin would later reflect in his book Die Nigger Die!, Johnson's impatient arrogance coupled with the passivity of the group of African American leaders meeting with him led Al-Amin to personally engage President Johnson in his typically brash manner. It was after this exchange that Al-Amin would claim that he became a marked man. In rapid succession after this meeting, he would be called up for the draft, he was involved in a shootout with police in Cambridge, Maryland, and he was arrested twice in Virginia. Al-Amin was certainly one of many targets in the FBI's COINTELPRO campaign, particularly after he ascended to the chair of SNCC in 1967. Shortly thereafter, he joined the Black Panther Party to serve as their justice minister in 1968. The potential coalition of two of the most prominent black power organizations—SNCC and the Black Panthers—was actively disrupted by the FBI, and both Al-Amin and his close friend and associate, Stokely Carmichael (Kwame Ture), found themselves in a precarious situation.

In 1970, Al-Amin went underground for 18 months during the course of a trial in Maryland on the charges of inciting riot and carrying a gun across state lines. As a direct result, he appeared on the FBI's Ten Most Wanted List. By 1972, Al-Amin resurfaced and was arrested for attempted robbery of a bar in New York City. Released from prison in 1976, Al-Amin moved to Atlanta, Georgia to open a grocery store. Having converted to Islam in prison, he became leader of the National Ummah and worked to eradicate drugs, gambling, and prostitution in Atlanta's West End. On March 16, 2000, when two sheriff's deputies attempted to serve an arrest warrant, both men were shot and one died the next day from his wounds. The surviving deputy identified Al-Amin as the shooter and, on March 9, 2002, he was convicted of 13 criminal charges including murder. Al-Amin is currently serving a life sentence at the ADX Super Maximum Security Prison in Florence, Colorado.

Albany, Georgia Movement

The Albany, Georgia movement refers to both the campaigns to end racial segregation and the organization founded to achieve this goal. The Albany movement began in 1960, as an umbrella group composed of various civil rights organizations in Albany, a town in southwest Georgia. Some of the community groups involved included the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee (SNCC), the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP), the Federation of Women's Clubs, the Negro Voters League, and various churches. Led by Dr. William G. Andrews and Slater King, the Albany movement sought to dismantle the system of racial segregation that excluded African Americans from full participation in the political, social, and business affairs of their city.

Undaunted by the arrest of some its members, the Albany movement held mass meetings in churches to plan strategies. During the meetings, members sang freedom songs that became a common feature of civil rights marches in the 1960s. These songs demonstrated the spirit and resolve of the protestors while also providing a cultural link between the present day and hundreds of years of African American suffering. SNCC members also instructed Albany residents nightly on nonviolent tactics.

Although the Albany movement had existed for almost a year, it was a demonstration at the city bus depot by five students on November 1, 1961, that served as a catalyst for the acceleration of protests. The Interstate Commerce Commission (ICC) had found racial segregation in interstate transportation facilities unconstitutional with the order to take effect on November 1. As the African American students attempted to enter the waiting room reserved for white Americans, Albany police blocked their way. Threatened with arrest, the students left the bus terminal but vowed to return another day.

Impressed by the demonstrations, the Reverend Dr. Martin Luther King Jr., accepted a one-day invitation to speak at a mass meeting. On December 15, 1961, Dr. King spoke at Shiloh Baptist Church, urging Albany residents to continue their struggle. King eventually decided to stay and participate in a protest march at City Hall planned for the next day, where Albany police arrested him along with more than 250 others. Initially claiming he would remain in jail over Christmas to highlight the treatment of African Americans in the South, Dr. King left jail on bail when city officials announced they had reached an agreement with the Albany movement. The city was to drop the charges levied against the 250 demonstrators and comply with the ICC ruling. It was soon apparent that the city did not plan to keep its part of the bargain.

The decision to leave jail helped Albany Police Chief Laurie Pritchett devise a strategy to defeat the demonstrations. Whenever Dr. King was arrested, Pritchett would now find someone to bail him out, thus preventing King from publicizing the arrests. In addition, Pritchett, who had read King's book on nonviolent direct action campaigns, reserved jail space in surrounding counties so the media in Albany would not see African Americans jailed in overcrowded conditions. Also, he ordered the police force to remain peaceful while arresting demonstrators. In this regard, Pritchett downplayed the violence that lay at the root of racial segregation and appeared somewhat reasonable to the national media. While Pritchett continued to outmaneuver African American leaders, the Albany city government remained committed to racial segregation. In essence, the Albany campaign seemed a stalemate. African Americans would continue to protest, Chief Pritchett would quietly arrest them, and the city government would maintain racial segregation.

The lack of progress led to problems within the campaign. Racial violence erupted on a number of occasions in July 1962 when African American protestors threw stones, bottles, and other items at police. Upset by this turn of events, Dr. King called for a temporary halt in the marches and a day of penance to atone for the violent outbreaks.

There was also dissension between SCLC, led by Dr. King and other nationally prominent leaders, and the other civil rights groups involved in Albany. Some had perceived of the desegregation campaign as a local initiative, only inviting Dr. King and the SCLC to help publicize the situation. Once joining the Albany movement, however, SCLC leaders became assertive in a way that angered the sensibilities of those who thought the Albany movement should remain in the hands of Albany citizens.

In the end, beset with internal problems and a strategy that seemed ineffective against Chief Pritchett, the campaign did not achieve the tangible goal of desegregating city facilities. Nevertheless, the Albany movement did become a sustained effort by local African Americans to end racial inequality. When the SCLC and Dr. King left the area in 1962, the Albany movement continued protesting against discrimination. Before this period, as was common in many communities, the various civil rights groups competed against each other for the allegiances of local African Americans. Under the Albany movement umbrella, there was unity among elites, professionals, and workers that had not existed previously. See also: Abernathy, Ralph David; King, Martin Luther Jr.; National Association for the Advancement of Colored People; Southern Christian Leadership Conference; Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee

Ali, Muhammad

Muhammad Ali (1942–), the three-time heavyweight champion of the world, became an important symbol of black nationalism as a member of the Nation of Islam who refused to serve in the Vietnam War. Born Cassius Marcellus Clay and raised in Louisville's mostly black West End, his family was working-poor. Clay lived in a small house with his brother and parents. His mother worked as a maid and his father was a sign painter. His father was an early influence on the fighter's racial consciousness. Clay Sr. had been influenced by Marcus Garvey's Universal Negro Improvement Association as a young man and believed that racism had kept him from achieving greater heights as an artist. His father also had several run-ins with Louisville's police department and felt that blacks in the city were unfairly targeted by law enforcement. Young Cassius's understanding of race grew when he learned of Emmett Till's murder. In his autobiography, the fighter claimed to be deeply affected by the lynching.

Clay became interested in boxing after his bicycle was stolen. He cried to police officer Joe Martin that he wanted to beat up the offender. Martin, who trained amateur boxers, offered his services to Clay, who accepted them. Clay progressed rapidly, appearing often on a local television show called Tomorrow's Champions. Twice he captured the national Golden Gloves title. In 1960, Clay represented the United States in the Rome Olympics, where he won a gold medal in the light-heavyweight division. Clay showed little inclination for political controversy at the time. During interviews, he downplayed America's race problems. He called the United States the greatest country in the world. He told reporters that America's race problems would soon be solved. Clay also favorably compared the living conditions of black Americans to those of Africans, who he characterized as living in mud huts. He would express regret about these comments in later years.

After the Olympics, Clay decided to become a professional boxer. His emerging race consciousness affected his choices when selecting advisors and managers. Clay's first suitor was Billy Reynolds, the Louisville metals magnate. Although Reynolds made a lucrative offer, Clay felt that he would not be treated fairly by someone he considered to be a racist. Clay based his conclusion on experiences he had while working at the Reynolds estate shortly before the Olympics. Members of the Reynolds family treated him poorly, and Clay believed that the abuse was racially motivated. Reynolds also insisted that Joe Martin be Clay's trainer. Clay was against this for two reasons. First, he felt that Martin was not capable of taking him to the top as a professional. Second, he was influenced by his father's distrust of white policemen. These factors led to the rejection of Reynolds's offer to become his manager. While deciding on a team to guide his career, Ali employed blacks in key positions whenever possible. For his first bout, he named as his manager of record former amateur opponent George King. For his professional debut, Clay's trainer was Fred Stoner, who guided many of Louisville's black fighters, professional and amateur. He also hired Alberta Jones, the first black woman to become a member of the Kentucky Bar Association, as his attorney. Jones was the sole negotiator of Ali's first professional contract.

In October 1960, Clay signed a six-year contract with the Louisville Sponsoring Group, a syndicate of 11 white men from his hometown. Almost all of the partners were millionaires. The terms of the arrangement were fair and generous, giving Ali a large signing bonus and an annual salary, which would grow according to his ring earnings. The partnership also paid all of his living and training expenses. In exchange they received a share of the purses from Clay's fights. It was an excellent arrangement for Clay because the group's wealth ensured him first-class accommodations and allowed him to be brought along without being rushed into profitable but dangerous matches. Local newspapers lauded the fighter's sensibility and praised his choice.

The one problem that many people had with the young fighter was his demeanor. Ali talked loudly, downgraded his opponents, predicted the rounds in which he would win fights, and refused to be silenced by reporters and fans who believed that he needed to be more reserved. Clay's persona sometimes affected his professional relationships. He clashed with Archie Moore, the former light-heavyweight champion who had become his trainer. Angelo Dundee replaced Moore in that role and was with Clay for the remainder of his career. There were also people who enjoyed Clay's bombast. Some found him entertaining and funny. Others saw his defiance as something political. His insistence that he was "pretty," for example, anticipated the Black Power movement mantra "black is beautiful."

Because he evoked strong feelings, Clay's fights did very well at the box office and rejuvenated a sport that had been racked by scandal and government crackdowns. The national press took an interest in him. In his first year as a professional, Life, Saturday Evening Post, and Sports Illustrated ran features on the young boxer. Shortly thereafter, he appeared in the Anthony Quinn film Requiem for a Heavyweight. His eighth and ninth professional bouts were televised nationally. When Clay entered major markets like New York and Los Angeles, his fights did amazing business. His 1962 match with former trainer Moore set a California indoor sporting events box office record. His bout the next January against Charlie Powell set a Pittsburgh indoor attendance record, despite being held on one of the coldest days in the city's history. Two months later, despite a newspaper strike in New York that curtailed coverage of the contest, Clay's fight with Doug Jones became the first boxing event in Madison Square Garden's 38-year history to sell out in advance. The bout created the arena's largest gross receipts for any event of the previous 10 years. Clay made the cover of Time magazine. He was more than just a national phenomenon. That summer, his match with British heavyweight Henry Cooper produced England's largest fight crowd since 1935, as 55,000 fans packed Wembley Stadium. Because of his talent and his personality, Clay was an international sensation by the time he landed his chance to fight for the heavyweight championship of the world.

Most people did not know that Clay was already a part of the Nation of Islam. The Nation of Islam was troubling to some people because it espoused the separation of black and white people. According to his longtime best friend Howard Bingham, Clay's membership in the organization went back to 1958. But Clay did not discuss religion or politics with reporters in the first years of his career. He felt that public knowledge of his beliefs would jeopardize his chances to fight for the title. There were some outward signs, however, of his affiliation. Nation of Islam devotees were sprinkled around his early training camps. He wore dark suits, bowties, and white shirts, which was standard Nation garb. He lectured on the evils of pork to a writer who ordered a ham sandwich during a lunchtime interview.

By the time of the Jones bout, Clay was starting to speak more clearly. He told reporters that integration was an ignorant philosophy. He charged that police officers in the South targeted him for harassment. Clay also refused to deny a newspaper report that placed him at a Nation of Islam meeting in Philadelphia. The clearest sign emerged in Miami, where Clay was training for a February 1964 title match with Sonny Liston. There, he spent time with Malcolm X, the Nation of Islam's national spokesman. Clay told the press that he found the organization's meetings to be inspiring.

Opposition to Clay materialized as his relationship with the Nation of Islam came to light and then increased when he defeated Liston. First, the promoter threatened to cancel the fight. But with hundreds of thousands of dollars already invested in the event, it was difficult for him to do so. Eventually, he and Clay's representatives reached a compromise in which Malcolm X would leave town for the remainder of the training period. Most people did not expect Clay to beat Liston, so they did not worry much about his political and religious leanings. In a surprise outcome, however, Liston refused to answer the bell for the seventh round, claiming to have injured his shoulder. Clay was winning the match up to that point. Afterwards, the new champion told reporters that they were wrong to pick against him. He announced that his name was no longer Cassius Clay, but Cassius X. Like Malcolm X, Clay rejected the name given to his family by slave masters. Soon after, Nation of Islam leader Elijah Muhammad renamed the fighter Muhammad Ali. Newspapers often carried articles that cast Ali in a negative light. A rematch with Liston further turned the public against Ali. Ali won the fight by knockout in the first round, and many people felt the bout was fixed. In addition to those who disliked Ali's demeanor and politics were those who felt that he was a sham champion, one whose confidence did not correspond with his ability.

In his second title defense, Ali took on former champion Floyd Patterson in November 1965. The rivalry between the two fighters focused on their contrasting visions of race relations. Patterson was an integrationist and a supporter of the Civil Rights movement. He moved into an all-white neighborhood and was married to a white woman. Although these things were repugnant to the separatist Ali, it was Patterson who escalated the prefight rhetoric beyond boxing. In a series of articles for Sports Illustrated, Patterson wrote that for the good of the country, Ali must be defeated. Patterson referred to him as Cassius Clay, refusing to acknowledge Ali's chosen name. Some sportswriters criticized Patterson's efforts to construct himself as a heroic alternative to Ali, but the majority of the press cast the fighters as Patterson had. Ali responded to this by calling Patterson a white man's champion and promising to punish him. The fight was one-sided, with Ali winning nearly every moment before the referee stopped it in the 12th round.

Muhammad Ali began to phase out the Louisville Sponsoring Group, replacing them with a corporation known as Main Bout, Inc. At a press conference in January 1966, Ali announced that Main Bout would control the ancillary rights to his fights, starting with a bout two months later against contender Ernie Terrell in Chicago. Main Bout's ownership of these ancillary rights gave them access to the vast majority of revenues from Ali's bouts. The major money from big-time boxing matches during this period came from closed-circuit television, which was controlled by the ancillary promoter. Because seating at and revenue from the hundreds of closed-circuit theaters nationwide greatly outnumbered what could be generated at the arena where a given fight took place, such bouts usually had closed-circuit television takes much larger than from other sources.

Main Bout was controlled by the Nation of Islam, which meant that at least some of the revenues from Ali's fights were going to that organization. Main Bout had five stockholders. Herbert Muhammad, son of Nation of Islam leader Elijah Muhammad, was its president. John Ali, the Nation of Islam's national secretary, was Main Bout's treasurer. Together, they shared 50 percent of its stock and half of its board's six votes. The closed-circuit television operator Michael Malitz and his attorney Bob Arum were Main Bout's vice-president and secretary, holding 20 percent of Main Bout's stock and one vote each. Jim Brown, the professional football player and Main Bout's vice-president in charge of publicity, controlled one vote and 10 percent of the company. Malitz and Arum were Main Bout's sole white members. Ali told reporters that he hoped Main Bout would become the linchpin of a larger economic network that would result in the empowerment of large numbers of African Americans.

In February 1966, less than a month after Main Bout's formation, the United States Selective Service reclassified Muhammad Ali as draft-eligible for the Vietnam War. Originally, Ali had failed the mental aptitude portion of the U.S. Army's entrance exam. He had then been retested in front of government psychologists and failed again. Ali had always had trouble with school, and he was not prepared to answer the questions. As a result, he was declared ineligible to serve in the Armed Forces. By this time, however, the government needed more troops to continue the fight in Vietnam. As a result, it lowered the qualifying standard for its mental aptitude exam, and Ali was retroactively declared eligible. Some people saw Ali's drafting as a political act, an attempt to silence an outspoken and militant black man. Others believed it fair, that there should be no reason to prevent a healthy and intelligent person like Ali from serving.

When reporters asked Ali for comment, he declared his opposition to the Vietnam War. Combined with the Nation of Islam's entrance into the promotion of his fights, it caused a major backlash against him. In Chicago, politicians and the press rallied against the upcoming bout with Terrell, and it was driven out of the city. When Main Bout tried to shop the contest around the United States, it found no takers. Nationwide, mayors in more than 100 cities announced that they would not host an Ali fight. Main Bout was forced to move the fight to Canada, where they made very little money. Furthermore, Ali had to have his next three bouts in Europe, where there had not been a world heavyweight title match in more than 30 years. The movement to ban Ali from fighting in the United States grew.

Ali refused to be inducted into the U.S. Army in May 1967 and was indicted on draft evasion charges. Almost immediately, state athletic commissions around the country indicated their refusal to grant Ali a boxing license. The next month, a federal court convicted Ali and sentenced him to five years in prison. He remained out of jail while appealing the case, but he was barred from fighting. No state would allow him to box, and because he was a convicted felon, the government stripped him of his passport, preventing him from fighting abroad. For three-and-a-half years, as his case made its way to the U.S. Supreme Court, Ali was exiled from the sport. During this time Ali made money by speaking on college campuses, commenting on boxing telecasts, and acting.

Ali tried to resurrect his boxing career. He lobbied Indian tribes to hold fights on reservations, which were outside the purview of state athletic commissions. He asked the government to grant him a one-day visa to fight in Tijuana. A breakthrough finally came for Ali when Georgia State Senator Leroy Johnson led a campaign to hold an Ali fight in Atlanta. Because Georgia had no state athletic commission, Johnson, an African American, knew that white supremacist governor Lester Maddox would have no political oversight of the match. Therefore, Johnson worked within Atlanta's city government and used his contacts and leverage to get the bout made over the objections of a number of state-level politicians. In October 1970, Ali returned to the ring, scoring a victory over Jerry Quarry. About a month later, Ali defeated Oscar Bonavena in New York. He then agreed to terms for a fight with Joe Frazier, who had replaced him as heavyweight champion during Ali's exile from the sport.

Ali's rivalry with Joe Frazier was the most important of both fighters' careers, and their first bout was perhaps the biggest event in boxing history. The March 1971 battle between Ali and Frazier became a key backdrop through which people made meaning of larger political and racial conflicts. Frazier became a symbolic representative to many people who despised Ali's draft resistance, although Frazier did nothing to cultivate their allegiance, unlike a number of Ali's previous opponents. Ali seized on this public sentiment in his treatment of Frazier. Because he had become the heavyweight champion during Ali's exile, Ali framed Frazier as a tool of the establishment, calling him an Uncle Tom. Throughout the buildups for their three matches, Ali insulted Frazier, calling him ignorant, ugly, and comparing him to a gorilla. As a result, Frazier's bad feelings for Ali have endured long after their bouts. Each fighter made a record $2,500,000. Frazier won a 15-round decision and retained the championship in a bitterly fought contest.

That summer, the Supreme Court overturned Ali's draft evasion conviction. Although its decision caused all criminal charges against Ali to be dropped, the Court did not officially exonerate him for his draft resistance. The Court reversed Ali's conviction because the fighter's draft board had never indicated to the defendant why his conscientious objector status had been denied. A technicality, rather than Ali's innocence or the government's mistaken refusal to grant him a ministerial deferment, was the court's given explanation for the reversal. This was an important distinction because by ruling in this manner, the Supreme Court did not set a precedent that would alter the draft status of large numbers of people. At the same time, it seems clear that the Supreme Court's decision was motivated by its belief that Ali's draft resistance was legitimate and that the federal court's ruling was incorrect.

In the next couple of years, Ali pursued the championship. He capitalized on his worldwide popularity, fighting in Switzerland, Tokyo, Vancouver, Dublin, and Jakarta. Most observers, however, questioned whether or not Ali still had what it took to regain the title. A pair of matches in 1973 against little-known Ken Norton seemed to signal Ali's decline. In the first, Norton broke Ali's jaw and won a decision. In the second, Ali narrowly escaped with a decision victory. Ali's struggles against Norton were highlighted by the performances of George Foreman, who had knocked out Joe Frazier in two rounds that year to become the champion. When Norton challenged Foreman for the title, Foreman knocked him out in the second round. Although Ali captured a decision victory over Frazier in their 1974 rematch, it looked improbable for him to regain the title. Foreman had steamrolled the two fighters who had beaten Ali.

The 1974 fight between Muhammad Ali and George Foreman happened because boxing promoter Don King was able to convince Zaire's President Mobutu Sese Seko that hosting the bout would increase his country's fortunes. Mobutu paid $10,000,000 for the honor, which gave King the money to get Ali and Foreman to Kinshasa for record purses of $5,000,000 each. It was the first world heavyweight title fight held in Africa, but it was not Ali's first visit to the continent, and he was the popular favorite of the hometown crowd. The bout cemented Ali's reputation as an all-time great fighter. Although it appeared in the early rounds that Ali was losing the fight, he had in fact devised a strategy in which he would stay along the ropes and cover up while Foreman punched himself into exhaustion. The "rope-a-dope" plan worked as Ali absorbed the seemingly invincible Foreman's best blows and came back to win with an eighth-round knockout. Twenty-two years later, When We Were Kings, a film about the Ali/Foreman match, won the Academy Award for outstanding documentary.

With the victory over Foreman came an outpouring of support for the new champion. A number of sportswriters who had always disparaged Ali's boxing skills finally acknowledged his excellence. Later that year, President Gerald Ford invited Ali to visit the White House. TWA Airlines showed films of the Ali-Foreman bout on selected flights. Although Ali still held beliefs about race and religion that many Americans opposed, it was clear that huge numbers of people admired him. Part of this came from the changing public sentiment about the Vietnam War. As the conflict declined in popularity, Ali's position became more acceptable. When Elijah Muhammad died in 1975, Ali chose to align himself with Muhammad's son Wallace, who wanted to take the Nation of Islam in a direction that followed orthodox Islam more closely than his father had. As a result of this move, Ali disassociated himself over the years from the racial separatism he espoused during the 1960s and 1970s. This, too, increased Ali's acceptability to many people.

Ali remained champion until 1978, but his skills declined during this period, and he took a lot of punishment in the ring that would later contribute to serious health problems. A third fight with Joe Frazier in 1975, known as the "Thrilla in Manila," ensured Ali's status as a boxing legend, but also subjected him to severe physical damage. In his final year as champion, Ali lost the title to upstart Leon Spinks, but regained it in a rematch that made Ali the first fighter to hold the heavyweight championship three times. Ali then retired, but came back to challenge Larry Holmes in 1980. Holmes pummeled Ali, who could not answer the bell for the 11th round. Ali fought and lost once more before retiring permanently in 1981. The years immediately following the end of his career were difficult for Ali, as Parkinson's syndrome, probably a result from his years in boxing, depleted him. Although he did not vanish from the public scene throughout the 1980s and early 1990s, his place in American consciousness became somewhat recessed.

During the late 1990s, and into the 21st century, Ali has made a remarkable resurgence into public prominence. There are many causes for this, but three stand out. Ali's 1986 marriage to Yolanda "Lonnie" Williams helped him regain control over his health and finances. Lonnie Ali manages Ali's business decisions and has made their family millions of dollars through her marketing of the fighter's image. Thomas Hauser's best-selling 1991 biography Muhammad Ali: His Life and Times is the most thorough of all books about Ali, and it presents Ali as a great man. Hauser's book institutionalized the idea of Ali as a national treasure. Ali's lighting of the ceremonial torch to open the 1996 Olympics in Atlanta showed the fighter struggling with Parkinson's syndrome and positioned him as an American hero in front of a huge television audience. In 2001 a major motion picture called Ali was released. Despite health problems, Ali still travels for many weeks every year in pursuit of humanitarian and religious service to the world. The 93,000 square foot Muhammad Ali Center, headquartered in Louisville, will preserve Ali's legend for many years to come. At the turn of the 21st century, Ali's popularity seems unmatched as he stands as a symbol of love and tolerance to billions of people. Tracing his journey to this point from his days as a more controversial figure is an exciting pursuit that can tell us a great deal about American society.

Ali, Noble Drew

Noble Drew Ali (1886–1929), born Timothy Drew, ascended from obscurity to become the founder and leader of the Moorish Science movement. Little is known of Ali's early years. According to some reports, he was raised by Cherokee Indians; others claim he wandered with a gypsy tribe. In his adulthood, Ali told various stories to explain his knowledge of Islam and Egyptian mystery cults; for example, he claimed to receive the title of "Ali" from Sultan Abdul Asis Ibn Saud during a visit to Mecca. It is unclear whether he actually traveled abroad or whether he acquired his interest in Islam from American libraries. The first established fact about Ali is that in 1913, he founded the first Moorish Science Temple in Newark, New Jersey.

The temple was organized around Ali's revision of African American history. Ali preached that black people were actually not African, but Asiatic (or Moors). Their true homeland was not West Africa, but Morocco, and their true religion was Islam. Ali's job was to restore African Americans to their rightful status on earth: to restore their true nationality, true religion, and true genealogy. The central text of his movement was a 60-page pamphlet by Ali titled, Holy Koran, that included Christian Bible passages, quotations from Marcus Garvey, anecdotes from the life of Jesus, and Ali's own codes regarding dress, diet, and morality.

The primary theme of the Holy Koran was a retelling of Jesus' life story, focusing on his exploits in India, Europe, and Africa. Although the book glorified Jesus as a genealogical forebear of the Moors, it still insisted that Christianity was a religion for Europeans and that Islam was the religion of the Asiatics. Ali had been sent by Allah, the god of Islam, to tell black Americans that their identity had been stolen by Christian Europeans. Once their nationality and religion were restored, these newly cast Moors could take over society.

To affirm his followers a new identity, Ali issued them identification cards and encouraged the wearing of fezzes and turbans. Combining aspects of Islam, Freemasonry, Theosophy, and 19th-century black nationalist philosophies, Moorish Science appealed to a new generation of urban black Americans seeking to differentiate themselves from their enslaved ancestors. Ali was convinced that he could change the political and economic destiny of African Americans by recasting their ethnic identity and erasing the stigma of slavery. From the outset, Ali had many competitors within his organization, and in 1923 he removed to Chicago to escape his New Jersey rivals. There he set up the permanent headquarters of the Moorish Holy Temple of Science. In 1928, he changed the name to the Moorish Science Temple of America and finally organized all of his temples under the name of the Moorish Divine and National Movement of North America, Inc. With branches in Chicago, Detroit, Milwaukee, Philadelphia, Pittsburgh, New York, and several southern cities, the Moorish Science movement would, at its height, achieve a membership of nearly 30,000.

Under the auspices of the Moorish Manufacturing Corporation, many became rich selling Asiatic charms, herbal preparations, and literature. Some leaders decided to get rid of Ali and take over the increasing fortune of the organization. In 1929, Ali's leadership was challenged by the murder of his business manager, Sheik Claude Green. Although Ali was out of town at the time of Green's death, he was briefly jailed for the crime. Following his release on bail, he, too, died under mysterious circumstances.

Antiapartheid Movement

The African American antiapartheid movement was actually a series of intrarelated and interrelated movements that contested apartheid policies and practices from 1937 to 1994. Apartheid was a political system of separate development that became state policy in South Africa in 1948 and lasted until Nelson Mandela became president in 1994. Based on rigid racial divisions, the purpose of the policy was to privilege the political, cultural, and economic interests of the white minority population in South Africa while maintaining a cheap work force of people of color. The African American antiapartheid movement primarily sought to disrupt the South African economy by appealing to U.S. policymakers and the United Nations to impose sanctions and a trade embargo on South Africa. The movement also consisted of cultural and political sanctions. At the heart of the African American antiapartheid movement was the struggle to end white supremacy both at home and abroad.

The earlier movements against apartheid were part of a larger struggle that aimed to raise awareness about African liberation and help African states gain independence. The earliest organization to address South Africa's racist laws was the Council on African Affairs. Originally organized as the International Committee on African Affairs in 1937, it was renamed the Council on African Affairs by 1943 (CAA). The CAA was composed of internationally renowned African Americans, including W. E. B. Du Bois, singer and activist Paul Robeson, Howard University political scientist Ralph Bunche, Harvard anthropologist Raymond Leslie Buell, and YMCA Baptist missionary Max Yergan. The CAA was a powerful voice for anticolonialism and Pan-Africanism and linked the struggles of African Americans with the struggles of colonized African people. The organization's publications, including Spotlight on Africa, were relied on by activists and scholars for credible information about South Africa.

The first notable action of the CAA with regard to apartheid came in 1946 when the CAA, along with India, launched a campaign for international sanctions against South Africa at the first United Nations General Assembly meeting in London. The CAA would maintain a lobby at the UN. Although this campaign was unsuccessful at achieving sanctions, the CAA's activity and sponsored demonstrations and letter-writing campaign gave rise to global consciousness about the plight of millions of oppressed South Africans. The CAA called for the United States to sever relations with South Africa. Apartheid would become the single most important international issue concerning African Americans.

In 1952, the CAA initiated mass protests that coincided with the Campaign of Defiance of Unjust Laws in South Africa. Black and white leaders from churches, labor unions, and civic and peace organizations from New York, Philadelphia, and Boston initiated the CAA campaign. These leaders pledged to obtain 100,000 signatures on a petition and raise $5,000 to assist in relieving some of the suffering and funding some of the legal costs for those South Africans who were arrested in the defiance campaign.

The antiapartheid movement emerged during a period of Cold War and communist hysteria. Anticommunism sentiment curtailed early efforts and took its toll on organizations like the CAA. The hysteria fragmented antiapartheid and African liberation movements. CAA fell victim after it was labeled a communist organization, and several of its members, including its primary financier, Paul Robeson's passports were revoked. CAA collapsed in 1952.

A new organization called Americans for South African Resistance (AFSAR) emerged in that same year. AFSAR was assembled by African American liberals who had been involved in the antiapartheid movement. The secretary, George Houser, was careful not to conflate AFSAR objectives with communist sentiment. One of the first actions of AFSAR was a rally at Abyssinian Baptist Church in Harlem in April 1952 where 800 members were in attendance and a US$300 check was sent to Walter Sisulu as the first installment in a series of contributions in support of the non-European congresses in South Africa. AFSAR was disbanded in 1953 and transformed into an organization that could relate to the entire anticolonial struggle in Africa. The new organization was named the American Committee on Africa (ACOA) and would include prominent African American activist and leader Martin Luther King Jr.

Martin Luther King Jr. was exposed to South African issues when his father invited Albert Lithuli, the president of the African National Congress, to speak at his church in Atlanta in 1948. As a pastor, King constantly compared South Africa to the Jim Crow South and urged the usage of nonviolent resistance in South Africa. ACOA organized a Declaration of Conscience campaign in 1957 in the United States to protest the unjust arrest of 156 leaders of the liberation movement in South Africa who were being charged with treason. The unveiling of the campaign coincided with Human Rights Day, and Eleanor Roosevelt and Martin Luther King Jr. were cosponsors of the declaration. ACOA organized the South African Defense Fund, which aimed to collect $100,000 to help pay for legal fees for the defendants of the treason trial in South Africa.

During the early 1960s, black nationalism came to prominence, with young leaders like Malcolm X leading the way. Malcolm X visited several heads of states throughout Africa where he laid out a plan to internationalize the black freedom struggle in America by placing it at the level of human rights. His insistence on linking racism in South Africa and the United States and his militancy was a source of contention for some African American antiapartheid leaders.

The independence of many African countries in the 1970s reinvigorated the antiapartheid movement. Many athletes now joined the struggle against apartheid. African American professional athletes became important actors in the antiapartheid struggle. The sports boycotts against South Africa attracted supporters from around the world. World tennis champion, Arthur Ashe was one of the most prominent athletes to oppose apartheid. After being denied a travel visa by the South African government, he used the media to bring focus on the oppressive regime in Pretoria. He became involved with the movement that boycotted South Africa's participation in the 1968 Olympic Games in Mexico City. His further activism resulted in South Africa's expulsion from the governing body of world tennis, the Davis Cup, and from the International Olympics Association. Ashe opposed apartheid and protested the policy throughout the next two decades until his death in 1993.

Besides athletes, African American workers, students, legislators, and activists directed their frustration of proapartheid U.S. foreign policy toward corporations with investments in South Africa. Black workers in Boston led a campaign against the Polaroid Corporation, accusing them of supporting apartheid because the passbook identification cards in South Africa were being manufactured using Polaroid cameras and film. The passbooks were one of the most intrusive components of apartheid because it restricted the movement and residential patterns of South African people of color. The anti-Polaroid activists went to the streets using direct-action techniques. They began informing local shop owners of Polaroid's connection to apartheid and insisting that the shops stop selling Polaroid products. They addressed the United Nations, proposing an international boycott of Polaroid products, and lobbied Congress, where they worked with members of the Congressional Black Caucus who soon met with President Richard Nixon about installing sanctions against South Africa. As a result of the Polaroid campaign, the company lost $4 million in sales and pulled out of South Africa by 1977.

The lobbying group, TransAfrica, was formed in 1977 and would become the most important lobby for Africa and the Caribbean ever created by African Americans. This organization was made possible by the sustained mobilization of African American groups throughout the 1960s and 1970s. TransAfrica, which was led by African American liberals who felt a kinship with Africa based on history and shared experiences of racial discrimination, combined direct-action techniques and educational campaigns to influence foreign policy. One of the most prominent leaders was founder Randall Robinson, who served as the president until 2001. Robinson had previously worked for Congressman Charles Diggs, at which time he was engaged in foreign policy activities. TransAfrica met regularly with Congress, conducted press conferences, obtained grants, and published policy statements, reports, and newsletters on apartheid in South Africa and effectively galvanized worldwide support of the antiapartheid movement. TransAfrica built a mass base of supporters by reaching out to the black church, an institution with a long history of community activism for social justice. TransAfrica's profile was raised when President Jimmy Carter, pressured by the organization, decided to maintain sanctions against Ian Smith's minority government in Rhodesia. Antiapartheid sentiment was widespread in the African American community by 1980. White students and religious groups shared this sentiment and TransAfrica quickly became a multiracial organization. The organization came to international attention when Robinson addressed the Organization of African Unity's Heads of State Summit in Nairobi in 1981. Although Malcolm X had met with the Organization of African Unity (OAU) in 1964, Robinson's address marked the first time since then that an African American had addressed the OAU.

Ronald Reagan administration's constructive engagement policies toward South Africa signaled a sharp contrast from Carter's human rights approach. Many antiapartheid activists considered Reagan to be in full partnership with South Africa's racist regime, and this support became a catalyst for the resurgence of the antiapartheid movement. By 1984, apartheid had become a major issue in African American politics. At this time, Jesse Jackson entered the race for the nomination of the Democratic Party's candidate for president in 1984 and 1988. Jackson, who carried on King's ideas on foreign policy, helped to reshape African American consciousness by providing a link between Africa and the Civil Rights movement of the 1960s and the pan-Africanist movements of the 1980s. His views on apartheid forced the issue onto the national stage of American politics and increased national and worldwide attention on the issue.

TransAfrica's Randall Robinson, Congressman Walter Fauntroy, Civil Rights Commission member Mary Frances Berry, and law professor Eleanor Holmes Norton entered the South African consulate's office on November 21, 1984. They met with the consular and presented their case that all South African political prisoners be released. Afterwards, they occupied the meeting room and refused to leave until their demands were met. They were subsequently arrested. This event led to the formation of the Free South Africa Movement, which brought the issue of apartheid home and declared constructive engagement a failure. There were numerous sit-ins and demonstrations outside the South African embassy, at other federal buildings throughout the country, at businesses with South African interests, and at coin shops that sold the gold Krugerrand. Numerous celebrities and officials participated in these demonstrations and sit-ins including Harry Belafonte, Detroit mayor Coleman Young, Coretta Scott King, Jesse Jackson, Amy Carter, and Gloria Steinem. This movement spread to hundreds of colleges and universities and included a coalition of church, student, civil rights, and women's groups. These actions represented a surge in antiapartheid grassroots activism, and more than 5,000 people were arrested across the country within one year. Time magazine and the Washington Post compared the new antiapartheid activism with the tactics used during the Civil Rights movement of the 1960s. This increased activity influenced Congress to adopt the Comprehensive Anti-Apartheid Act in 1986 over President Reagan's veto. Before passage of this Act, Representative William Gray of Pennsylvania sponsored a similar bill in the House that called for the cessation of all loans and investment in South Africa and imposed hefty fines and jail time for individuals who ignored the law.

The increase in state violence in South Africa was brought into American living rooms on the evening news, further fueling antiapartheid activists. On the 25th anniversary of the Sharpeville massacre, police opened fire on a funeral procession held to bury three black South Africans who had been killed the week before. Nineteen funeral-goers were killed on that day alone and no less than 400 youth had been killed within a 12-month period. The Free South Africa Movement (FSAM) protest continued outside of the South African embassy every weekday for eight months. These protests and high-profile arrest of former first daughter, Amy Carter, two of Robert Kennedy's children, and Coretta Scott King focused the national spotlight on South African repression. Before the FSAM demonstrations, many Americans knew little about apartheid.

During this time, Jesse Jackson traveled around the country addressing colleges and universities about the importance of the antiapartheid movement. While he visited Princeton University, a sit-in was in progress. Jackson attacked the university administration for refusing to divest financial holdings in South Africa. Similar scenes played out at Harvard University and Rutgers University in New Jersey. Jackson further fought apartheid by touring the front-line states, addressing the United Nations, popularizing the issue of sanctions, and raising awareness about the impact of apartheid. Jackson was very outspoken toward the Reagan administration for their failure to abandon constructive engagement and spoke of the deaths, tortures, and imprisonments perpetrated by the apartheid regime. His efforts played an important role in pressuring Congress to pass the Comprehensive Anti-Apartheid Act of 1986. Fourteen years earlier, this act was originally sponsored by California Representative Ronald Dellums, an antiapartheid activist and member of the Congressional Black Caucus. Dellums was at the center of the African American antiapartheid struggle and cleverly used the legislative machinery, finally gaining a victory with the passage of the act. In 1988, the act was modified and included broader new trade restrictions that eventually took its toll on the South African economy, essentially blocking economic growth. As a result, political prisoners were released, including Nelson Mandela who had been imprisoned for over a quarter of a century. Mandela would go on to become the first freely elected president in the new South Africa, closing the chapter on apartheid and the African American antiapartheid movement.

Antilynching Campaign

Between 1882 and 1968, at least 4,743 people, including around 3,450 African Americans, were lynched in America. In the single year of 1892, which marked lynching's peak, at least 230 black people were killed (Brundage, 4). But that year also marked the beginning of the country's first sustained antilynching campaign. Three of the men who died in 1892 were friends of the Memphis-based journalist Ida B. Wells.

Wells began to investigate the lynchings of the previous decade and wrote a controversial editorial challenging the concept that the assault of white women by African American men was at the core of these acts by white mobs. She followed the editorial with a pamphlet, Southern Horrors, which discussed consensual interracial sex, connected lynching to slavery, and advocated black boycotts of white businesses, armed self-protection, migration, and legislative action. In another antilynching pamphlet, she asked readers to support the Blair Bill, a resolution coming before the House of Representatives in August 1894.

She continued her work into the 20th century, and, in 1909, she helped to found the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP), which launched its own antilynching campaign. Led by Walter White, who personally investigated more than 40 lynchings, the association amassed vast amounts of lynching data. From 1916 onward its Anti-Lynching Committee developed legislative and public awareness campaigns, and in 1919 it documented the deaths of 3,224 people in a 30-year period. Throughout the early 1920s, it advertised lynching statistics in national newspapers and lobbied for the passage of the federal Dyer Bill, which proposed to punish anyone who participated in a lynching or who failed to prosecute lynchers.

Introduced in 1918 and passed by the House in January 1922, the bill was halted by a filibuster in the Senate. But one important legacy of the failed bill was the organizational model of the Anti-Lynching Crusaders. Established in 1922, this group of black women within the NAACP raised money to promote the Dyer Bill and attempted to unite black and white women around a renewed antilynching effort. After the death of the bill, the Anti-Lynching Crusaders' model was taken up by Jessie Daniel Ames's Association of Southern Women for the Prevention of Lynching (ASWPL).

On November 1, 1930, Ames held a meeting in Atlanta, Georgia, for southern white women who wanted to help end lynching. This was an important role, she explained, because lynching was frequently justified in their name, as a method of protecting them from rape. Women from seven of the southeastern states attended the meeting and on November 6, another group of women—from

Members of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP) New York City Youth Council picketing for anti-lynching legislation before the Strand Theatre in Times Square in 1937. (Library of Congress)

Louisiana, Arkansas, Oklahoma, and Texas—joined with Ames’s group to create a South-wide movement. The newly formed association launched an informational campaign condemning lynching and disavowing the notion of “protection” for white womanhood. They followed this with outreach efforts, asking sheriffs to protect the rule of law. Within their communities, southern white women congregated wherever a lynching was rumored to take place and tried to prevent it from unfolding.

Jacquelyn Dowd Hall notes that the ASWPL was deeply subversive to the southern social and sexual hierarchy. By speaking out, its members overturned the patriarchal order that had kept white women in their place and in need of white male “protection.” And although results are impossible to quantify with any precision, the ASWPL may have contributed to a 50 percent reduction in the incidence of lynching by 1938. Membership had reached 40,000 by 1939.

Other activism during the 1930s included the campaign to pass the Costigan-Wagner Bill of 1935, led by the NAACP. The bill’s text was the same as the Dyer bill, proposing fines and imprisonment for any governmental body that failed to protect an individual from a mob. Some campaigners felt these proposals did not go far enough, and so a coalition of left-wing organizations, including The League of Struggle for Negro Rights, proposed its own legislation—a “Bill for Negro Rights.” This made lynching punishable by death and outlawed the Ku Klux Klan. It garnered little support and Congress also failed to pass the Costigan-Wagner Bill. The 200 other antilynching bills introduced between 1882 and 1968 met the same fate.

Yet while their lobbying efforts failed, antilynching campaigners did succeed in challenging both the gender dynamics surrounding lynching (including the stereotype of the black male as a sexual beast) and the white supremacist notion of racially redemptive violence. The legacy of antilynching campaigning was further evident in 2005, when the Senate finally passed a resolution related to lynching. Summarizing the long history of antilynching campaigns, the Senate went on to issue an apology to lynching victims for its own failure to enact antilynching legislation. See also: Du Bois, W. E. ## Asante, Molefi Kete

Molefi Kete Asante (1942–), scholar, author, and Afrocentric theorist, was born Arthur Lee Smith Jr. in Valdosta, Georgia. The oldest of 16 children, he is the first born son of Lillie Wilkson and Arthur L. Smith. As a child in the small southern town of Valdosta, Asante witnessed firsthand the social injustices perpetrated against black people under a system of de jure segregation. A racist encounter at the age of 11 left an indelible mark on his childhood memories and was the beginning of his quest to end racism and discrimination.

A precocious and gifted child, Asante showed his academic capabilities early in life. Fully cognizant of the suffering around him and mindful of the stories told to him about the powerful role of family and ancestors, Asante often used his intellectual gifts to aid others. His superior academic achievements earned him acceptance at the Nashville Christian Institute. Located in Nashville, Tennessee, it was one of a handful of black boarding schools in the United States dedicated to developing academic excellence in black children. After graduation in 1960, Asante enrolled in Southwestern Christian College. He remained there for two years before transferring to Oklahoma Christian College where he received his BA in Communication in 1964. He received an MA in Communication in 1965 from Pepperdine University, and, in 1968, the PhD from the University of California at Los Angeles (UCLA).

Asante’s academic career began in 1968 with his first appointment, albeit brief, at Purdue University as an assistant professor of communication. In 1969, he returned to UCLA to accept the position of associate professor of communication and director of the Center for Afro-American Studies. During this period Asante began to re-create himself as an African-centered scholar dedicated to the study of black people. Asante played an instrumental role in the establishment of the masters program in African American Studies at UCLA and served as co-founder of the Journal of Black Studies. In 1976, before his move to Buffalo, New York (SUNY) to accept the position as professor and chair of the Department of Communication, he legally changed his name from Arthur Smith to Molefi, “keeper of the traditions” in Sotho, Kete, lover of music in Akan, and Asante, a general surname among the Akan.

From 1977 to 1979, Asante served as chair of SUNY’s Department of Black Studies, an opportunity that undoubtedly played a role in his decision to switch career focus from communications to African American Studies. He often refers to this decision as indicative of his ability to commit “discipline suicide.” Asante believed that this was a critical and necessary choice. Although many colleges and universities appointed faculty to positions in black studies during the formative years of program development, none possessed the traditional prerequisite of a PhD in the discipline. This contributed to a high level of role confusion, as many faculty members straddled the fence, attempting to generate significant scholarly activity in two separate disciplines. Asante rejected this dichotomous confusion.

With the 1980 publication of Afrocentricity, his transformation was complete. In this critical work he puts forth his theory based on self-conscious cultural awareness of African-ascended people. Asante rejected the Eurocentric hegemony of Western culture and insisted on recognizing the existence of African epistemologies that existed before European dominance. He built on the works of Carter G. Woodson, Cheikh Anta Diop, Maulana Karenga, Mary McLeod Bethune, and Marcus Garvey. Advocating the need for an African-centered approach to knowledge, understanding, and being would be the focus of his life’s work. It was Asante’s appointment as chair of the Department of African American Studies at Temple University in 1984, however, that would alter the face of the discipline and gain him national recognition as a leader in the field.

Under Asante’s leadership, Temple University created the world’s first PhD program in African American Studies in 1988. Its instant popularity was astounding, demonstrating the thirst for knowledge about the African American experience at the most advanced level of study. The program attracted hundreds of students from within the United States and around the world. It also drew heavy criticism from those who challenged its validity as a legitimate field of academic inquiry. Asante’s emergence as the pre-eminent Afrocentric scholar drew praise and controversy. He was seen as a visionary by some and was demonized by others. Asante’s views were also frequently attacked by scholars within the discipline who questioned his advocacy of Africology as the primary foundation for the study of African people. Asante ended his chairmanship in 1997, but he remains on the faculty as professor of African American Studies.

With hundreds of publications in the form of books, articles, essays, and editorials, Asante has gained worldwide recognition. He has lectured on college and university campuses throughout the world. Several of his most important works have been translated into French, Portuguese, and Spanish. One of the highest forms of recognition came in 1993 when he was honored as a traditional king of Ghana, Nana Okru Asante Peasah, Kyidomhene of Tafo, in a public ceremony in Philadelphia, Pennsylvania.

An activist scholar, Asante remains committed to the empowerment and liberation of African people. He has distinguished himself as one of the foremost African-centered scholars and intellectuals of the 20th and 21st centuries. See also: Afrocentricity; National Council for Black Studies

Ashe, Arthur

Arthur Robert Ashe Jr. (1943–1993) was a tennis champion, author, and activist known equally for his accomplishments off the court as on. Ashe was born in Richmond, Virginia, and grew up next to the city’s largest playground for the black community and ultimately learned to play tennis there. His tennis playing began to attract attention and his tennis coach Ronald Charity arranged for Ashe to spend the summer with Dr. Walter Johnson, tennis champion Althea Gibson’s coach.

After attending segregated schools and competing in segregated tournaments, Ashe transferred to an integrated high school in St. Louis during his senior year. An "A" student who graduated first in his class, Ashe accepted a tennis scholarship to UCLA in 1962. At 20, Ashe was selected to the U.S. Davis Cup team, becoming the first African American on the team. Ashe stayed with the team until 1970 but returned in 1975, 1976, and 1978. He won 27 of 32 cup matches, more than any other American to that point.

In 1965, Ashe helped the Bruins capture the NCAA title by winning the singles tournament. One year later, Ashe graduated from UCLA with a BS in business administration. He then went to West Point to serve a two-year Army commitment as an officer, eventually attaining the rank of second lieutenant. In 1968, while still an amateur, Ashe defeated Tom Okker of the Netherlands to win the U.S. Open men's singles title. The victory made Ashe the first American to win the title since 1955, as well as the first African American to win a men's title at a Grand Slam. Because he was still an amateur, however, he could not collect the prize money totaling $14,000.

One year later, Ashe, along with Charlie Pasarell and Sheridan Synder, established the United State Tennis Association's National Junior Tennis League to introduce tennis to and help develop inner-city tennis players. Ashe won his second Grand Slam, the Australian Open, by defeating Australian Dick Crealy in 1970. At that time Ashe, who was the top-ranked American in the world, applied for a visa to play in the South African Open, but his visa application was denied because he was black. Ashe called for South Africa's expulsion from the tennis tour to protest the country's system of apartheid. The call gained widespread support from both inside and outside the tennis world. Three years later, Ashe was granted a visa and became the first black professional player in South Africa's national championships.

In 1975, Ashe won his last Grand Slam single's title when he upset defending champion Jimmy Connors at Wimbledon, making him the first African American male to win that title. Partially because of the win, Ashe became the No. 1 ranked tennis player in the world. Two years later, Ashe married Jeanne Moutoussamy, a photographer he had met during a tennis tournament.

Ashe suffered a heart attack in July 1979 and underwent quadruple bypass surgery five months later. He retired the next year with a professional record of 818–260 and 51 titles.

Despite the retirement, Ashe continued to stay involved with professional tennis, serving as the Davis Cup captain in 1980. He coached the team from 1981–85. His activism also continued; he served as national chairman of the American Heart Association in 1981. One year later Ashe underwent a double bypass surgery.

In 1985, Ashe was inducted into the Tennis Hall of Fame just months after being arrested outside the South African embassy in Washington during an antiapartheid protest. In 1988, Ashe authored and published the three-volume A Hard Road to Glory, which chronicles the history of African American athletes in the United States. That same year, Ashe was hospitalized and learned that he was HIV-positive. His exposure was traced to a blood transfusion received after his double bypass surgery.

In April 1992, believing USA Today was about to report that he was HIV-positive, Ashe called a press conference and made the announcement himself. Five months later while protesting the U.S. crackdown on Haitian refugees, Ashe was arrested outside the White House. On World AIDS Day, Ashe addressed the United Nations General Assembly and pled with the delegates to boost funding for AIDS research and to increase knowledge of the disease and its effects. He was later named Sports Illustrated's Sportsman of the Year.

On February 6, 1993, Ashe died of AIDS-related pneumonia in New York at the age of 49. His body lay in state in Richmond where it was viewed by more than 5,000 people. Ashe is the first person to lie in state at the governor's mansion since Confederate General Stonewall Jackson in 1863. In 1996, on what would have been his 53rd birthday, a statue of Ashe was dedicated on Richmond's Monument Avenue. Ashe is depicted carrying books in one hand and a tennis racket in the other. In 1997, the U.S. Tennis Association announced that its centerpiece tennis center would be named in Ashe's honor. In 2005, the U.S. Postal Service honored Ashe with a postage stamp.

Association for the Study of African American Life and History

The Association for the Study of African American Life and History (ASALH) is one of the oldest African American professional organizations today. Its continued existence is owed to the extraordinary efforts of its founder, Dr. Carter G. Woodson, the second African American to earn a doctorate in history from Harvard University in 1912. The Association's goal is to research, promote, publish, preserve, interpret, and disseminate scholarly information on the history and culture of people of African descent to a global audience. It counts among its members both academic scholars and history buffs. The organization is responsible for founding a scholarly journal, a publication for primary and secondary educators, and a publishing press; but it is probably best known for creating Black History Month, a national celebration of African American history and achievement during the month of February.

Carter G. Woodson, assisted by four others, founded the Association for the Study of Negro Life and History (ASNLH, later known as Association for the Study of Afro-American Life and History or ASALH) on September 9, 1915 in Chicago, but its headquarters were in Washington, D.C. Its mission was to conduct historical research; publish books on African American life and history; promote its work through black colleges, fraternal organizations, public schools, and churches; and collect and preserve historical documents. An executive council governed the organization and George Cleveland Hall, a physician and civic leader, served as the first president. As executive director, Woodson would single handedly guide and direct the organization as it sought to establish the scientific study of the history and culture of people of African descent as a legitimate endeavor at a time when African Americans were denied their citizenship rights.

The association worked to counter the misrepresentations of African Americans by teaching black folks that they had a history to be proud of while demonstrating to whites that people of African descent made major contributions to the history and culture of the United States and the world. Although the ASNLH, with its devotion to an accurate and truthful rendering of the black past, largely through the efforts of Woodson, did not have a specific political agenda, it could be viewed as an organization of social activism, as it worked incessantly to bolster black pride while eroding white prejudice.

To provide an outlet for the research of Woodson and other scholars of African American history, the Association founded the Journal of Negro History on January 1, 1916, with Woodson as editor until his death on April 3, 1950. The journal would be largely responsible for establishing the study of black history and culture as a legitimate field of inquiry, publishing the work of reputable scholars—black and white, male and female, in a range of disciplines—from its inception. Although most of its focus was on African Americans, it did publish articles on Africa, the Caribbean, and Latin America. Starting in 1917, the ASNLH also held annual conferences, usually in October, to bring together scholars to present research papers on various topics to promote both scholarly and popular interest.

One of the association's main goals was to reach a wider audience, particularly young people, and toward that end, it created the event that it is best known for. Taken from the annual celebration of Negro Achievement Week begun in 1924 by Woodson's fraternity, Omega Psi Phi Fraternity, Inc., the Association established Negro History Week in 1926 during the month of February to incorporate the birthdays of Frederick Douglass and Abraham Lincoln, two important figures in African American history, and developed an overall theme for each yearly celebration. The response was tremendous, and branches of the association sprang up across the country to provide history enthusiasts a link to the organization. The association also established the Associated Publishers in 1921 to publish historical materials and in 1937 created the Negro History Bulletin as a tool of instruction for primary and secondary teachers.

After Woodson's death, the association continued to grow. Owing to increased black consciousness, the organization changed its name to the Association for the Study of Afro-American Life and History (ASALH) in 1972 and Negro History Week became Black History Month in 1976.

Later on, the name was further changed to the Association for the Study of African American Life and History, the Journal of Negro History became the Journal of African American History in 2002, and the Negro History Bulletin renamed the Black History Bulletin. Several prominent African Americans held important positions in the organization during Woodson's tenure and after, and helped to establish the association as the premier African American historical organization, including Mary McLeod Bethune, John Hope, Rayford Logan, Charles Wesley, M. Sammye Miller, Robert Harris Jr., and Bettye Gardner.

Today, the association, still headquartered in Washington, D.C., is under the leadership of President Dr. John Fleming and Executive Director Sylvia Cyrus-Albritton. The Journal of African American History is under the editorship of Dr. V. P. Franklin and the Black History Bulletin is co-edited by Dr. Alicia L. Moore and Dr. La Vonne I. Neal. It has published the Woodson Review, a magazine on the National Black History Theme, since 2005.

Atlanta, Georgia, Riot of 1906

The genesis of the Atlanta riot of 1906 lay in the vituperative racist gubernatorial campaign of that year. The two principal candidates, Hoke Smith and Clark Howell, seemed to try to outdo each other in their race-baiting. Already negative white public opinion had been aroused by a series of unconfirmed reports in the city newspapers of physical assaults on white women by black men. Additional racial tensions had surfaced because of increased competition between black and white men for jobs during a period of economic recession.

As tensions grew, both races began to fear an open confrontation. The black mortician, David T. Morgan, for example, smuggled a box of weapons into the city from Chicago in a casket. The actual riot began on the evening of September 22, 1906, in the red-light district of Decatur Street near downtown Atlanta. This was an area frequented by both poor blacks and whites, lured by bars, gambling, prostitution, and other vices. On that evening, a mob of whites paraded through the streets, attacking unsuspecting blacks who were either shopping or traveling through the area. The riot continued for three days, eventually spreading to black residential sections in the southeast, northeast, and southwest quadrants of the city.

When the mob approached the Darktown portion of northeast Atlanta, near the black business district on Auburn Avenue, George White, a black postman and father of future NAACP leader, Walter White, secured weapons and waited in anxious anticipation with his family. As the mob stopped at the White home, the son of a white grocer with whom the black family had done business pointed out where White and his family lived and urged the mob to set fire to the house. George White, then turned to his 13-year-old son, Walter, and told him to shoot the first man to step foot on their lawn. But as the mob moved toward the house, the Whites' neighbors fired and drove them away. The white mob retreated toward downtown.

On their way toward Darktown, the rioters had passed the black First Congregational Church at Houston and Courtland streets. The church's pastor, the Reverend Hugh Proctor, saw the mob as it came into the churchyard. A number of children were sheltered in the parsonage nearby. But the whites scattered when some of the black residents shot out the streetlights.

In southeast Atlanta, in an area called Brownsville, a panic developed as a white mob approached. Several of the residents sought refuge in the Gammon Theological Seminary. On the first night there, many sat up all night praying. The school's president, John W. E. Bowen, later said that he had not been able to sleep for several days in anticipation of the arrival of the mob. On Sunday, he called for police protection, but none was provided. On Monday evening, a squad of county police did arrive, and, even though there had been no trouble reported at the time, they arrested blacks, with the aid of several white citizens, for carrying weapons illegally. During one of these incidents, one white policeman was killed, another was wounded, and several blacks were killed or injured. Although the blacks contended that they had fired on the officers because they mistook them for a mob in the darkness, some were charged with murder. At least two were shot in police custody.

Because of the riot in Brownsville, Clark University delayed its fall opening, which probably served to prevent a dangerous altercation between the mob and black college students. Similarly, on the city's west side, area blacks clustered in refuge with President John Hope at Morehouse College, but the mob was driven away from the campus by neighbors before a melee developed. Nevertheless, President Bowen of Gammon, one of the city's most influential black leaders, was beaten over the head with a rifle-butt by a police officer.

When state and local police, with the aid of a rain-storm and dissipated energies, finally brought turmoil to an end, the best estimates were that at least 25 blacks had been killed, 150 seriously injured, and a thousand had fled the city. At least 2 whites were killed and 10 wounded. W. E. B. Du Bois and others, however, placed the number of black and white casualties much higher and contended that the riot produced at least 5,000 black refugees. The higher white death toll is partially attributed to a statement by the black mortician Howard that no one had an idea of the number of white casualties, as he had been forced to bury an untold number of whites in the black cemetery. This was done to conceal the number of whites being killed by blacks during the course of the riot.

The riot profoundly affected the individual and collective lives of all Atlantans, particularly black Atlantans. Many black families, who were terrified and left unprotected, sold their homes, often at great sacrifices, and fled to the North and West. Labor remained scarce and wages high in Atlanta because of the riot. The roles of such men as Hope at Morehouse and Bowen at Gammon increased their stature in the black communities and fostered closer relations between the colleges and their neighbors. A similar enhancement of influence was accorded to the Reverend Proctor and his First Congregational Church. It became known as the "church that saved a city." But for Walter White, the events produced a transformation of his entire life. For although he had blue eyes and blond hair and only a fraction of African American blood, he came to know, in the wake of the riot, who he really was—a black man who could be marked for indiscriminate murder by whites. And so, despite his white features, he decided in those hours of racial warfare in Atlanta to cast his lot with the Negro race and to do what he could for its elevation and liberation. He became active in the local NAACP, then assistant secretary in the national office of the civil rights organization, and finally executive secretary from 1931 until his death in 1955. During these years he used his pale complexion to infiltrate the ranks of white lynchers and later exposed the perpetrators to law enforcement authorities.

The calamitous events of the early fall of 1906 also had a sobering and beneficial, if only a temporary, effect on white attitudes and race relations, generally, in Atlanta. The Journalist Ray Stannard Baker, who traveled to the city immediately after the riot, found that the most important and far-reaching effect of the tragedy was that it aroused the white men of the city. Some of these men first met at the Piedmont Hotel on the Sunday after the first rioting and then again at the county courthouse Tuesday afternoon following the news from Brownsville. They resolved that the rioting must stop. Among those in attendance was Sam D. Jones, president of the local chamber of commerce, and Charles T. Hopkins, a businessman. Hopkins decried the financial damage that the events had created in the city.

While Hopkins's statements were replete with paternalism, they represented, at the time, a major metamorphosis in prevailing white attitudes and was a foundation on which better racial harmony could be built. Hopkins's extension of the olive branch on behalf of whites was first met by Dr. W. F. Penn, a prominent black physician, who had graduated from Yale College. He told a meeting of concerned whites of his own experience during the riot. A group of white men, some of whose families he had treated professionally, came to his house to search for weapons. His young daughter had run to them and begged them not to shoot her father. Later, however, a mob appeared, threatened the family, and forced them from their home. He credited a white man passing in an automobile for saving their own lives.

The pleading and conciliatory tone of the Penn speech, which was received as profound, inspired the ex-Confederate veteran and real estate man, Colonel A. J. McBride to stand up and vow that Atlanta would protect such "good" black men as Dr. Penn. Colonel McBride stated that he would even defend such men with his own rifle. Amid these warm feelings, exemplified by the words of Hopkins, Penn, and McBride, Hopkins proposed that the white people of the city express their deep regret for the riot and show their sympathy for the blacks who had suffered at the hands of the mob by raising money to assist them. A total of $4,423 was pledged immediately and the city government later added an additional $1,000.

The group then turned its attention to reconstruction and prevention of a recurrence of racial violence in the city. A committee consisting of some of the most influential men in the city was appointed to work with public officials in restoring order and confidence. Among them were Charles Hopkins and Sam Jones; L. Z. Rossen, president of the board of education; J. W. English, a bank president; Forrest Adair, a leading realtor; W. D. Ellis, an attorney; A. B. Steele, a wealthy lumberman; M. L. Collier, a railroad executive; and H. Y. McCord, a wholesale grocer. Shortly after its formation, this group sent for several of the most prominent black leaders in the city, including Reverend Hugh Proctor, Benjamin Davis, and the Reverends E. P. Johnson, E. R. Carter, J. A. Rush, and Lucius Holsey.

The meeting of the representatives of the two races, the first important occasion in the South on which an attempt was made to get blacks and whites together for any serious consideration of their differences, began with the whites asking the blacks: "What shall we do to relieve the irritation?" Blacks replied that they thought that they were treated with unnecessary roughness on the streetcars by the police. The whites admitted that the claim was justified and promised to take the matter up immediately with the streetcar company and the police department.

From this beginning, Hopkins invited 2,000 additional, influential local whites to join the efforts of racial peace; 1,500 accepted immediately, only two refused outright, and those "anonymously." Five hundred more men, who were not initially invited, asked to join and were accepted. The enlarged group became formally known as the Atlanta Civic League. At the same time, Reverend Proctor and the committee of blacks recruited 1,500 for the "Coloured Co-operative Civic League." Small subcommittees from each group were then appointed to meet together to further the cause of racial goodwill and law and order.

There was some fear, however, that the merriment of the Christmas season might lead to a renewal of racial violence. With the encouragement of the leagues, strenuous preventive efforts were instituted. New policemen were hired and municipal judges Broylee and Roan warned against lawlessness. The leagues secured promises from the local press that it would not publish "sensational news," and they asked that saloons be closed at 4 P.M. on Christmas Eve. Black league members made a special effort to keep members of their race off the streets. The success of the leagues influenced and inspired other movements for improved race relations. Several white ministers promoted the effort in letters to the Atlanta Constitution. The newspaper's editor and former gubernatorial candidate, Clark Howell, responded with a conciliatory editorial entitled, "Shall We Blaze the Trail?" Ex-Governor W. J. Northern called a prayer meeting, attended by 20 whites and 20 blacks, at the black Butler Street YMCA and traveled throughout the state speaking in favor of law and order. He condemned mob violence, including lynching, and predicted that racial problems would not be resolved until African Americans had full justice. The belief that saloons, dives, and other places of vice had contributed to the riot helped to inspire the antisaloon campaign, which took place throughout the state in 1907. The success of this movement led to the temporary closing of every saloon in the state of Georgia on the first of January, 1908.

It is clear, then, that the short-range effects of the riot were generally positive, in the sense that white leaders throughout the state, but especially in Atlanta, seemed to cast aside old prejudices to work for racial harmony and for civil peace. Not all segments of white Atlanta and white Georgia were repentant, but the attitudes and actions of Governor Northern, Governor-Elect Hoke Smith, Editor Clark Howell, Charles Hopkins, and Colonel McBride seemed more representative of white opinion than that of the Atlanta Evening News. This newspaper, which had helped ferment the riot, declared in an end-of-the-year editorial that black men who attacked white women will know the vengeance of whites—a not so subtle threat to lynch black men.

As to the lasting consequences of the riot and the reconstruction, it can be said that Atlanta never again witnessed such a distinctive occurrence, even during the racial turmoil of the 1960s. It can also be said, however, that the problems of racial segregation, racial equality, and political rights were barely touched by either the white or black reformers. Most of the whites seemed content with the recent Supreme Court ruling in Plessy v. Ferguson (1896), which upheld segregated public facilities for the races; and among the blacks, there were serious divisions among the leaders as to the wisdom of mounting assaults, vocal or otherwise, against Jim Crow.

Baker, Ella

Ella Baker (1903–1986) was one of the most influential African Americans in the Civil Rights movement of the 20th century. Born in Norfolk, Virginia, on December 13, 1903, Baker worked throughout her 83 years of life to advance the position of African Americans. An African American herself, Baker worked as both an organizer and an activist in well-known civil rights organizations such as the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP), the Southern Christian Leadership Conference (SCLC), the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee (SNCC), and the Mississippi Freedom Democratic Party (MFDP).

Baker moved to North Carolina in 1911. Seven years later, she entered Shaw University in Raleigh. In 1927, she graduated valedictorian of her class. Although Baker wanted to enter graduate school, her financial situation would not allow it. She instead moved to Harlem, New York. While there, Baker became actively involved in organizing and promoting the advancement of African Americans. From 1929 to 1932, she was a member of the editorial staffs of the American West Indian News and the Negro National News. During the Great Depression she accepted a position with the Works Progress Administration (WPA).

In 1938, Baker began working with one of the most renowned civil rights organizations in the country—the NAACP. By 1942, she was named national director of all the NAACP branches. It was in this position that Baker greatly expanded her contacts within the African American community. In 1946, however, she left the national office over a conflict of interests. Baker felt that the NAACP was overly concerned with the opinions and recognition of whites and middle-class blacks. She, on the other hand, thought more attention needed to be given to the lower class black masses.

Although Baker removed herself from the national office, she remained involved on the local level. In 1954, she became president of the New York City branch of the NAACP. As president she aimed to bring the movement back to the masses.

In the mid-1950s, Baker, along with A. Phillip Randolph, Bayard Rustin, and Stanley Levinson, formed In Friendship, a New York-based organization that provided economic assistance for disadvantaged blacks in the South. After the eruption of the Montgomery Bus Boycott, following Rosa Parks' refusal to give up her seat on a Montgomery bus, In Friendship worked to raise funds for the Montgomery efforts. When the boycott ended with the Supreme Court's decision to desegregate transportation, In Friendship united with several other newly created civil rights organizations to form the Southern Christian Leadership Conference (SCLC). Baker became the first full-time executive director of the SCLC. Her involvement in the organization, however, was short lived. As with the NAACP, Baker did not feel she fit in with the SCLC. The organization was primarily composed of clergy. Baker, as a woman, and an older woman at that, knew she had little place within the organization for leadership roles. Furthermore, Baker disliked the leadership style of the SCLC. Baker believed that civil rights organizations should be group centered. The SCLC, like the NAACP, was more individual centered.

Baker's role with the SCLC allowed her to assist in the creation of the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee (SNCC). In the late 1950s, the sit-in movement erupted among black college students throughout the South. Initially many of the sit-ins were disconnected; Baker used the numerous contacts she had made through the NAACP and SCLC to bring the detached demonstrations together. In 1960, Baker convinced the SCLC to sponsor a meeting of student activists at her alma mater, Shaw University. The NAACP, SCLC, and Congress for Racial Equality (CORE) all sent representatives to the meeting. The meeting culminated with the creation of SNCC, with Baker as its primary advisor. Other civil rights organizations, like the NAACP, SCLC, and CORE, all wanted in on the action, but Baker worked to keep the students in SNCC independent of other adult civil rights organizations. By 1961, SNCC had become the organization that Baker had been trying to create for several years. Unlike the SCLC, SNCC allowed for the active participation of women and young people. Unlike the NAACP, SNCC took civil rights back to the masses. Most important, SNCC's leadership, unlike either the SCLC or NAACP, was group centered.

Baker remained actively involved with SNCC over the next few years. In 1964, she helped to organize the Mississippi Freedom Democratic Party (MFDP). The MFDP sought to combat the disenfranchisement of African Americans in the South. The organization forced the Democratic Party to elect many black leaders in Mississippi. Baker remained involved in the Civil Rights movement until her death on December 13, 1986.

Ella Baker will forever be remembered for her contributions to the advancement of African Americans. More than anything else, she believed in the power of the masses to organize and demand change. Throughout her life, Baker was the organizational factor behind many of the civil rights organizations of the 1950s and 1960s. She never wanted to make a name for herself, but rather, wished to enlarge the Civil Rights movement and bring freedom to her fellow African Americans. Baker's contributions to the advancement of African Americans are immeasurable. She worked with the NAACP in the 1940s, the SCLC in the 1950s, and SNCC and the MFDP in the 1960s. With each organization she enlarged the Civil Rights movement and advanced the African American struggle for freedom and equality.

Baldwin, James

Once regarded as the heir to Richard Wright, the preeminent African American novelist, James Baldwin (1924–1987) did not sustain his early achievement. Today, he may be most remembered as an essayist, in particular for several collections of essays published in the 1950s and 1960s that made him one of the most important literary spokespersons for the Civil Rights movement.

Born in Harlem, Baldwin was adopted by his stepfather, a factory worker named David Baldwin, when he was still very young. Although Baldwin would be much influenced by his stepfather's avocation as a street-corner evangelist, they had a very troubled relationship that left scars on Baldwin's sense of self-esteem. His experiences in school had a more salutary effect. From an early age, he had escaped into the local library and into the books that he read voraciously. At Frederick Douglass Junior High School, one of Baldwin's teachers and early mentor's was the poet Countee Cullen, who encouraged the thoughtful reader to become a committed writer. At Frederick Douglass and at DeWitt Clinton High School, Baldwin would publish his first stories and essays in the school newspapers.

During his teens, Baldwin also became a popular preacher at the Fireside Pentecostal Assembly. The leader of this storefront church in Harlem was Mother Horn, whose influence on Baldwin was profound. Whereas his stepfather had stressed the fear of divine retribution, Mother Horn emphasized the beneficent effects of divine love and Christian fellowship. In addition, Baldwin's experience as a preacher would show itself in the biblical cadences in much of his writing, especially his essays.

After high school, Baldwin moved to New Jersey, where he worked on a construction crew and, for the first time, was exposed for sustained periods to virulent racism. His stepfather's death in an asylum coincided with the outbreak of terrible rioting in Harlem, and this combination of family and public traumas compelled Baldwin to commit himself to his writing. He began living in Greenwich Village, where his exposure to the Bohemian lifestyle and radical activism awakened hedonistic and political impulses in him that would be every bit as intense as his earlier religious fervor.

Baldwin's literary career really began with his receiving the Eugene F. Saxton Memorial Trust Award, on the recommendation of Richard Wright. As his first essays and stories began to appear in magazines, he started to work on his first novel. His progress was slowed by personal issues, primarily his struggle to accept his homosexuality after his relationship with a woman had led to their formal engagement. In the wake of the end of that relationship, Baldwin followed Wright to France. There, as he established relationships with all sorts of writers and artists, his relationship with Wright soured, and for much of his subsequent career, Baldwin would be very conscious of trying to step out of Wright's shadow.

Baldwin's first novel, Go Tell It on the Mountain (1953), was a pointedly autobiographical coming-of-age story. Powerfully immediate and intimate, this debut effort is considered by many critics to be Baldwin's most fully realized novel. Set on a single day that provides a microcosm of a family's life together, the novel focuses on the strained relationship between a preacher with a hard temperament and his teenage stepson.

As the Civil Rights movement gathered momentum, Baldwin was inspired to write some of the seminal essays on race in America collected in Notes of a Native Son (1955), Nobody Knows My Name: More Notes of a Native Son (1961), and The Fire Next Time (1963). In these essays, Baldwin managed to combine eloquent and incisive insight with a deep sense of personal and communal rage as he exposed the pernicious causes and effects of the continuing social, economic, political, and cultural oppression of African Americans. He warned white America that the extended quest for equality had very nearly exhausted the patience of African Americans and had pushed them to a revolutionary edge.

In his second novel, Giovanni's Room (1956), Baldwin created a sensation with his unsparing exploration of issues of identity related to both race and sexual orientation. After Knopf refused to publish it, the novel was published first in the United Kingdom and then picked up by Dial in the United States. The novel draws on Baldwin's own complicated personal relationships before he emigrated to France, but it is set among expatriates in France and Spain.

Baldwin's later novels include Tell Me How Long the Train's Been Gone (1968), If Beale Street Could Talk (1974), Just above My Head (1979), and Harlem Quartet (1987). His short stories are collected in Going to Meet the Man (1965), and his best-known plays are The Amen Corner (1955) and Blues for Mister Charlie (1964).

Over the last two decades of his life, Baldwin continued to produce work in a variety of genres. But increasingly he seemed a prematurely anachronistic figure. In the course of the social revolution of the 1960s, the political and sexual radicalism that he had given voice to in the 1950s suddenly seemed quite dated, even tame. Having spent much of his career trying to step out of Richard Wright's shadow, Baldwin now found himself in the uncomfortable position of seeing his later work overshadowed by his earlier work

Baraka, Amiri

Amiri Baraka (1934–) is a writer who is perhaps best known as the founder of the black arts movement. Born as Leroy Jones on October 7, 1934, in a lower middle-class neighborhood of Newark, New Jersey, he attended predominately white public schools, then Rutgers University and Howard University, before beginning military service in the U.S. Air Force in 1954. After his release from the military in 1957, he attended graduate school and moved to New York's Greenwich Village, where he met and married a white woman, Hettie Cohen. The couple went on to have two daughters. Baraka lived in the Village from 1957 to 1965, working as an editor, poet, dramatist, and jazz critic. He befriended numerous beat writers, including Allen Ginsberg and Frank O'Hara, and established a beat magazine called Yugen. As part of the Village's bohemian, avant-garde crowd, he published his first major collection of poetry, Preface to a Twenty Volume Suicide Note (1961). Throughout these poems, Baraka drew on the styles of the beat poets to combine stream of consciousness, projective free verse, and dialect.

By 1962, he was pulling away from Ginsberg and rejecting the otherworldly poetics of beat writers. In his early poetry, Baraka had meditated on the black man's loneliness. Excluded from white America, he was also disconnected from black Africa, and Baraka laid out that racial isolation. His focus on the existential isolation of African Americans would soon translate into the solution of black nationalism, a nation within a nation, and so a home for black people in white America. In 1964 and 1965, he shifted from introspective, semiautobiographical poetry to forge a collective voice in his work. No longer writing out of lyric self-consciousness, he produced poems of lyrical communism.

By 1965, Baraka was celebrating the African heritage of African Americans. Black Americans have African imaginations, are beautiful, and must embrace blackness as he put it in 1966. He offered a shift from dislocated black American to proud African American, declared a hatred for the black middle class (equating its values with Euro-American values), and expressed one of the tenets of black nationalism: the assertion of black Americans' identity as a people of African ancestry.

Baraka began to seek out friendships with black nationalists including Stokely Carmichael. Moving to Harlem in the wake of Malcolm's death, he also married a black poet, Sylvia Robinson, in 1967, and the same year converted to Islam. To express this transformation, he changed his name from Leroy Jones to Imamu ("spiritual leader") Amiri ("warrior") Baraka ("sacrifice"). Becoming more and more engaged with black nationalist politics, Baraka assumed leadership of his own black Muslim organization, Kawaida. From 1968 to 1975, he also chaired the Committee for Unified Newark, a Black United Front organization, and he was a prominent figure in the National Black Political Convention of 1972.

The beat poet had become a black nationalist. Baraka believed that art could create this black "Nation" and he challenged black artists to create a "Black Poem" and a "Black World" in his 1966 poem "Black Art." Explaining that he wanted to go beyond mere poetry to achieve literature as action, he called for art that both described the situation of black people and showed how to change it. He also formulated a theory of the "theater of assault." Laying out his manifesto for a new kind of theater in 1965, Baraka explained that revolutionary theater should force change and be a political weapon. To its shocked audiences and dazzled critics, Baraka's play Dutchman (1964) perhaps seemed just that kind of revolutionary theater. The story of a deathly encounter between a white woman and a black college student, it depicted a seemingly unstoppable race war between black and white Americans. It went on to win an Obie Award, was proclaimed the best play in America by Norman Mailer, and in 2007 it was controversially revived in New York.

In July 1967, Amiri Baraka was arrested for unlawfully carrying a weapon during the Newark Rebellion. The trial judge read Baraka's poem "Black People" (1967) to the all-white jury. "I'm being sentenced for the poem. Is that what you are saying?" responded Baraka. Although not published until after the riots, "Black People" seemed a call to violence: "We must make our own World... and we cannot do this unless the white man is dead. Let's get together and kill him" (The LeRoi Jones/Amiri Baraka Reader, p. 224). The poem was admitted as evidence of a plot to ignite violence and on January 4, 1968, Baraka was sentenced to three years in New Jersey's state penitentiary and fined $1,000 (although the conviction was overturned on appeal).

This incident illustrates the longstanding fusion of politics and art at the center of Baraka's work, a canon that encompasses 14 books of poetry, 24 plays, 5 books of essays, 4 anthologies, and a novel. As he explained in a recent interview, "all art is political" and no literature exists in a vacuum. Any suggestion to the contrary is meant "only to have us look away from the real world so that...all's well in the big house while the great majority—slaves, serfs, the generally exploited—suffer out of sight" (American Protest Literature, p. 375).

In part because of this insistence on the political nature of art, Baraka is a controversial figure in American literature. Even more controversial is his use of art to advocate violence. As with "Black People," his poems often call for violent action. Not only using art to advocate violence, he also imagines art as violent: in numerous poems he demands that writers be warriors, describes language as a weapon, and fashions poems themselves as daggers, fists, and poison gas.

These calls to violence echo the rhetoric of the black militant leader Malcolm X, as do Baraka's repeated critiques of nonviolence as a continuing with the status quo. In fact, Malcolm's influence on Baraka was profound. Malcolm was killed while speaking in Harlem, on February 21, 1965. Responding to the assassination, Baraka wrote "A Poem for Black Hearts" (1965). Here he celebrates and mourns Malcolm X. Also in response to the assassination, Baraka left his white wife, moved uptown to Harlem from his Greenwich Village home, and embraced black nationalism.

Emphasizing his transformation still further, Baraka published a series of black nationalist poems. His hostility toward all white people appears in numerous other poems from this period, and his rejection of any cross-racial collaboration was even more evident during an infamous encounter with a white woman. She stated her desire to help solve racial tensions, and Baraka replied that she can help by dying. As well, several of his poems discuss raping white women as a way to counterbalance the oppression of black men. Leading to further criticism of his gender politics, Baraka went on to demonstrate an apparent hostility to all women, black or white. For example, he controversially stated that the recovery of healthy African identities depended on distinct gender roles and a submissive femininity.

Another new aesthetic that Baraka explored was the jazz avant-garde. Musical freedom as social activism continued the work of Harlem Renaissance poets Langston Hughes and James Weldon Johnson, and, in a recent interview, Baraka observed that the black arts movement (BAM) was on a continuum with the Harlem Renaissance. But Baraka also noted in the same interview that BAM was a version of Mao's Cultural Revolution. Baraka's references to Mao are in fact representative of his worldview after a second major transformation: from a black nationalist to a third world Marxist, in 1974. A trip to Cuba in 1960 had begun to radicalize his thinking about oppression in the third world, and in the mid-1970s, he proclaimed a complete identification with the artists he had met on his trip. Dissatisfied with Kenneth Gibson's black bourgeois leadership of their Newark organization and newly impassioned by theories of African socialism, he reformed the Congress of African People as the Revolutionary Communist League.

This final transformation came with an unexpected shift to humor. His early work, from the late 1950s and early 1960s, had focused on the themes of death and despair, of moral and social corruption, and of self-hatred. His black nationalist poems of 1965–1975 are militant in tone. And his later poems frequently exhibit a comic sensibility. Baraka's life and art therefore falls into these three periods: beat generation, black nationalism, third world Marxism. But the thread that runs throughout is his stated belief that "ethics and aesthetics are one" (American Protest Literature, p. 375).

Bass, Charlotta Amanda Spears

Charlotta Amanda Spears Bass (1879–1966) was a journalist and activist who fought vigorously to end racial discrimination and injustice for African Americans and other groups in the United States. During her 40-year career, she used her power as owner of the California Eagle, at the time the oldest black newspaper on the West Coast, and her affiliation with multiple community and national organizations as vehicles to advance a range of social justice causes. Her grassroots, community-based campaigns galvanized her readers and co-citizens to combat racism, to fight housing and employment discrimination, and to use their vote to empower themselves. In 1952, she made history by becoming the first African American woman to run for vice president of the United States. An independent thinker, her progressive ideas on social justice were sometimes out of step with the black press and African American leaders. Because of her militant activism, she endured character assassinations, lawsuits, a government investigation, and death threats, but she was undeterred in her career-long battle to end racial and social injustice.

Spears was born in Sumpter, South Carolina, in 1874. She was the sixth of 11 children born to Hiram and Kate Spears. After graduating from public schools, Charlotta Spears attended Pembroke College for one semester before moving to Providence, Rhode Island, around the turn of the century. She found employment with the Providence Watchman, a local newspaper, but would later migrate to Los Angeles, California because of a health ailment. In September 1910, she took a job selling subscriptions for a struggling African American newspaper, the Advocate, later renamed the Eagle. Before his death, the owner of the paper, John Neimore, asked Spears to assume editorship of the Eagle. When Neimore died, a benefactor purchased the Eagle for $50 and handed it over to Spears. In later years, Spears would reflect that her belief in the Constitution, in the Bill of Rights, and in the idea that all rights “must be defended” induced her to become a newspaper editor and owner. Spears’s mission of social justice put her in line with the majority of the black press. Because racial advocacy and uplift were more important than financial gain, Spears’s responsibilities at the Eagle included publisher, editor, reporter, business manager, distributor, printer, and janitor.

In 1913, Spears hired Joseph Blackburn “J. B.” Bass, a 50-year-old veteran journalist as a reporter. Spears became managing editor and the two married in 1914. As a team they tackled different forms of discrimination in Los Angeles, always placing the Eagle at the center of any battle. Among their first battles was the campaign to halt the production of D. W. Griffith’s 1915 motion picture The Birth of a Nation. The movie glorified the Ku Klux Klan and depicted black males as buffoons and racists. For weeks on the editorial pages of the Eagle, Bass excoriated the film and the Los Angeles mayor for permitting its production. At the same time she rallied other civic organizations, notably the Los Angeles branch of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP) to stage a “citizen’s protest” against making the film. The campaign met with some initial success when the Los Angeles City Council voted to halt production, but the decision was overturned in court. Nevertheless, this campaign established Bass and her husband as bold community activists.

In her zeal to oppose racism and discrimination in the 1920s, Bass aligned herself with two strong national black organizations that adopted divergent strategies for achieving civil rights for African Americans. In addition to joining her local chapter of the NAACP, which adopted integrationist goals and approaches to fighting black oppression, Bass, her husband, and several other prominent African Americans chartered a chapter of the United Negro Improvement Association (UNIA). Created by black nationalist Marcus Garvey, the UNIA promoted racial separatism. Despite their divergent approaches, these national organizations served as resources for Bass in the local battles she waged against discrimination and injustice.

One such battle in the 1920s was defending herself against a leader of the California Ku Klux Klan who sued Bass and the Eagle after she exposed a plan by white supremacists to burn down a black family’s house. The paper also revealed that the Klan was distributing hate literature in a local neighborhood. The court ruled in favor of Bass and the victory magnified her reputation as a fearless opponent of any form of social injustice.

By the 1930s, Bass’s approach to fighting discrimination had crystallized into three main tactics: wage a rhetorical war against her opponents in the pages of her newspaper, enter into diplomatic negotiations with the opposition, and rally citizens to initiate direct action with boycotts or pickets. These tactics won several victories for causes she and her husband pursued in the 1920s and early 1930s. Bass’s husband died in 1934, but she continued to use the same tactics for the remainder of her career.

Among the most important and longest battles of Bass’s career was her effort to strike down racially restrictive housing covenants designed to bar African Americans and other minorities from living in many areas of Los Angeles. Her first involvement with this issue came early in her career in 1914 when a black woman sought help from the Eagle after being thrown out of her home in a predominantly white neighborhood and threatened with jail if she returned. After Bass mobilized dozens of women to form a picket in front of the woman’s house, the sheriff relented and she moved back into her home.

By the 1940s, the problem of racially and ethnically restrictive housing covenants, a prevalent and longstanding practice in Los Angeles, became more acute as droves of people of color came to the city looking for employment. Bass fought hard against restrictive covenants by denouncing them in her paper and by cofounding the Home Protective Association to support citizens in standing up against unfair housing practices. For example, in 1942, she fought the residents in the white suburb of Maywood over renewal of their racially restrictive covenant. Bass published an “Open Letter to the Citizens of Maywood” calling for an end to the policy, and she tried to galvanize opposition to the restrictions at public meetings. Bass lost this battle when the community voted to renew its restrictive policy.

Bass did not lose all such battles, however. In 1945, she encouraged wealthy black actors, lawyers, and doctors involved in the “Sugar Hill” case to fight the restrictive covenant their white neighbors passed to force them from their affluent neighborhood. On Bass’s advice and with the editorial support she lent through the Eagle, the group united, fought, and won the case. Bass also championed middle and lower income citizens' fight against unfair housing practices. Her support of the Laws family in their seven-year battle to occupy the home they purchased in a white neighborhood demonstrated her commitment to the issue and to the victims of discrimination. Bass placed the rhetorical power of the Eagle behind them to keep their situation before the community throughout their struggle. Significantly, during this time she expanded her agenda on the housing issue by raising awareness among Eagle readers about the struggle of Mexican American families to pressure the city to alleviate slum conditions in their neighborhoods. At the end of World War II, Bass also pushed for desegregated housing for veterans. Bass and other leaders pushed the housing covenant issue through to the California Supreme Court. Finally, in 1948, the United States Supreme Court ruled such covenants to be unconstitutional.

Employment discrimination is another issue that saw the force of Bass's activism. In 1919, when Bass discovered that the Los Angeles County General Hospital refused to hire African Americans, she reported this policy to her readers in the Eagle, but also appealed directly to hospital supervisors, who finally agreed to hire blacks for selected positions. Bass waged a successful but longer campaign in 1933 to persuade the South California Telephone Company to hire blacks. In her typical fashion, she fought the company on the rhetorical front calling on her readers to boycott the utility company and engaged in more strategies through the activities of the Industrial Council, an organization she had created in 1930 to generate more employment and business opportunities for African Americans. The telephone company relented and hired blacks three years later.

Bass's uncompromising opposition to employment discrimination is also evident in her staunch support in the 1930s of the "Don't Buy Where You Can't Work Campaign," a national effort among blacks to end unfair employment practices. On the pages of the Eagle during World War II, Bass exposed discriminatory practices of California's thriving defense industry that systematically kept African Americans out of the industry's well-paying jobs. One successful effort in this campaign compelled the United States Employment Service to change its practice of excluding black women from holding defense jobs. Bass used her affiliation with the Los Angeles Negro Victory Committee and the Eagle to call on African American women to march to the Employment Service in large numbers and consistently insist they be given jobs. The tactic worked and black women were hired.

Although Bass initially represented the grievances only of African American workers like the Brotherhood of Sleeping Car Porters in the mid 1920s, she gradually became a voice for the rights of all industrial workers. In the 1930s, she used her editorial powers to support the strike against the American Tobacco Company, the first interracial strike in American history; in her front-page column, "On the Sidewalk," she informed readers about union and labor movement news including longshoremen strikes and various local CIO campaigns for workers' rights.

Workers' rights and civil rights melded as Bass expanded her advocacy beyond her own racial community. This shift is evident in her board membership on the Civil Rights Congress, a group that advocated on behalf of Mexican Americans and other people of color. This group was largely dedicated to fighting the kind of police brutality witnessed in the "Sleepy Lagoon" case in which several Mexican American youths were beaten, jailed, and charged with murder. Bass and other supporters of the jailed youths charged that the evidence against the youths was based primarily in ethnocentric judgments about the "flamboyant" clothing called "zoot suits" the youths wore. For Bass, the case illuminated the vulnerability to racism all minorities in Los Angeles faced, and she broadened her concern for the rights of all oppressed groups.

Throughout her career, Bass was active in electoral politics. She reported political activities in her newspapers, but she was also a political operative; however, she identified less with parties than with candidates' stance on issues. Although she was a registered member of the Republican Party for most of her career, she would back a Democratic or independent candidate if she felt the candidate demonstrated a stronger commitment to racial justice. This position led her to support Franklin D. Roosevelt in the 1932 presidential elections, as did many African Americans of this period.

Bass ran for public office twice in her career. In 1945, she ran as an independent candidate for the Los Angeles City Council but lost her bid in a run-off election. Frustrated by the failure of both the Democratic and Republican parties to advocate a strong civil rights program, she abandoned them in 1947 for the leftwing Progressive Party and became a vocal critic of U.S. foreign policy. She made her second bid for political office in 1950 when she ran for Congress on the Progressive Party ticket. She lost the election.

Toward the end of the 1940s, Bass's positions on domestic issues and foreign policy were out of step with mainstream local and national African American leadership. The Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI) and some members of the black press leveled charges of communism and subversion against her and, consequently, she lost credibility and readers. Although she publicly denied her support of communism, the financial losses that resulted from the accusations forced her to sell the paper in 1951. After she sold the paper she advanced her social justice agenda by working full-time with the Independent Progressive Party. In 1952, she became the party's vice presidential candidate. She and her white running mate, civil rights attorney, Vincent Hallinan, received less than 1 percent of the vote, but her campaign slogan bespeaks her perspective of the importance the Progressive Party's campaign held for public debate, "Win or Lose, We Win by Raising the Issues," and the issues for her were racism, civil rights, workers' rights, the Korean War, and U.S. imperialism.

After the election, Bass retired to a small community in Los Angeles but continued to support the movement for civil rights that gained momentum in the mid 1950s and extended into the 1960s. She transformed the garage of her home into a community reading room that served as a voter registration site for African Americans. She died of a stroke in 1966.

Bates, Daisy

Daisy Bates (1914–1999) was an African American civil rights activist, journalist, author, and National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP) leader during the Little Rock School crisis of 1957. Bates was president of the Arkansas State NAACP and a publisher of the Arkansas State Press during the crisis. She helped direct negotiations between the Little Rock School Board, state, and federal authorities, while focusing primarily on the nine students' well-being.

Born Daisy Lee Gatson in tiny Huttig of southern Arkansas, she grew up with friends of her original parents after her mother was killed by whites and her father fled town. This pushed Daisy to fight for racial equality throughout her life. At 15, she and L. C. Bates began dating and married three years later. Although L. C. Bates was an insurance salesman when he first met Daisy, he received an education in journalism and worked for several black-owned newspapers.

They leased a struggling church-owned press and began printing the Arkansas State Press. The Little Rock newspaper focused on civil rights issues. Besides journalism, the Bateses spent time working for the NAACP. Daisy was not a member of Little Rock's black upper crust. She never completed college, did not have a significant role in the African American church, or was not wealthy. Yet she still managed to rise in the organization, eventually becoming president of the state's confluence of local NAACP branches in 1952.

After the Brown v. Board case, school desegregation became the Arkansas NAACP's primary focus. Bates and the NAACP Legal Defense Fund brought a lawsuit against the Little Rock School Board in 1956. In Aaron v. Cooper, the Supreme Court established that Central High School would desegregate in the fall of 1957. Thereafter, more students and schools would be integrated. On September 2, the day before school was scheduled to begin, Orville Faubus, Arkansas's segregationist governor, ordered the Arkansas National Guard to surround Central High School in order to keep the peace. Desegregation did not begin on September 3 as scheduled.

After more judicial activity, Faubus removed the National Guard and city police took over on September 20. On September 23, the nine students entered Central High through a side door. With the mob growing larger and more unruly, police removed the students from school. The next day President Eisenhower sent the 101st airborne division to keep peace in Little Rock. The next day, soldiers escorted the students to school.

Throughout this period and during the school year, Daisy would serve as a liaison between the students, NAACP lawyers, public officials, and the media. The NAACP's local lawyer, Wiley Branton, relied on Bates to communicate with the students and their families who did not have legal representation of their own. Likewise, the Bates home became an unofficial meeting place for members of the northern media who descended on Little Rock and had also been attacked by segregationist protesters.

Bates continued to be harassed on a nightly basis, becoming a lightning rod for attack from white supremacists. Several crosses were burned on her lawn, her windows were shot out repeatedly, and threatening phone calls offered her little rest at night from 1956 until she moved to New York in 1960 to work on her memoir of the Little Rock crisis. The Long Shadow of Little Rock was published in 1962 with a foreword by Eleanor Roosevelt. The enduring work won much acclaim and the American Book Award for a version republished by the University of Arkansas Press in 1982.

Bates lived in Washington, D.C. and worked with Lyndon Johnson's War on Poverty initiative until she had a stroke in 1965. She moved back to Arkansas in 1968, but continued working on local poverty issues in Mitchellville. After the death of L. C., she focused on restarting the State Press. The newspaper reappeared in 1984, with Ernest Green (one of the Little Rock Nine) working as its national marketing director. In 1984, she also received an honorary law degree from the University of Arkansas-Fayetteville, where her papers were later deposited.

Daisy Bates will be known for her unwavering devotion to attacking discrimination against African Americans. Her presence also challenged the domination by black male clergyman in the NAACP's leadership roles. She broke the mold of most female civil rights supporters and did not have the deep religious background of other women working in the movement. Unlike Ella Baker, Bates worked in the foreground, becoming a public face of activism. Finally, Daisy and L. C. did not believe in the nonviolent tactics of Martin Luther King Jr.'s Southern Christian Leadership Conference and kept their home heavily armed. Most important, Daisy Bates did not permit the Little Rock Nine to become sacrificial lambs for the Civil Rights movement. The actions by Bates and President Eisenhower's federal intervention ensured that massive resistance never became an accepted practice and pushed the Civil Rights movement in new directions.

Belafonte, Harry

Harold (Harry) George Belafonte Jr. (1927–) was born to West Indian parents in Harlem, New York, on March 1, 1927. After his graduation from high school, he joined the Navy. After his military discharge, he worked at various jobs in New York City. Because of his interest in the performing arts, he studied acting at Stanley Kubrick's Dramatic School. He also studied at the New York School for Social Research. Two of his most recognized classmates were Walter Matthau and Marlon Brando. Neither Brando nor Belafonte recognized, at this time, how their professional careers and involvement in political and social issues would intertwine.

Harry Belafonte became successful in the early 1950s when he gained a great amount of recognition as a folk singer. His performance style was appealing and attracted a large following from across the United States. His signature calypso song was titled "Banana Boat Song." Other calypso songs he made popular include "Jamaica Farewell," "Matilda," "Brown Skin Girl," "Come Back Lisa," "Coconut Woman," and "Hold 'Em Joe."

Even though Harry Belafonte was a fan favorite, he experienced racism on several occasions. Such negative experiences played a significant role in his becoming a political activist. He participated with Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. in the march from Selma to Montgomery in support of the bus boycott and later played a significant role in the march on Washington, D.C.

Belafonte was able to maintain a balance between his involvement in issues related to social injustices and his career throughout the 1950s, 1960s and 1970s. His production of the first integrated musical show on television gained him an Emmy in 1960. He was chastised by the network and corporate sponsors, however, because popular singer Petula Clark touched his arm. In fact, Belafonte was fired because of this particular incident. The firing clearly represented the racial divide in the United States.

There are many achievements and career highlights that establish Harry Belafonte as a significant player in the world of entertainment. He earned a Tony Award in 1953 as a cast member in John Murray Anderson's Almanac. In 1954, he performed in the revised version of Bizet's Opera Carmen Jones. The costar for this production was Dorothy Dandridge. His other film appearances include Bright Road, 1953; David Boyer's Island in the Sun, 1957; The Heart of Show Business, 1957; The World, the Flesh, and the Devil, 1958; Odds Against Tomorrow, 1959; Tonight with Belafonte, 1960; The Angel Levine, 1969; Buck and the Preacher, 1972; Uptown Saturday Night, 1974; Sometimes I Watch My Life, 1982; Say No—Documentary, 1983; Three Songs, 1983; We Shall Overcome—Documentary, 1989; The Payer, 1992; Ready to Wear, 1994; Hank Aaron: Chasing the Dream—Documentary, 1995; White Man's Burden, 1995; Jazz '34—Documentary, 1996; Kansas City, 1996; Scandalize My Name: Stories from the Blacklist—Documentary, 1998; Fidel—Documentary, 2001; and XXI Century—Documentary, 2003.

The performing arts medium truly embraced Harry Belafonte for his artistry within the profession and his marketability. He is the recipient of the Donaldson Award, 1953–1954; U.S. Department of State Award, 1958; an Emmy Award for the 1960 TV Special, Tonight with Harry Belafonte; an Honorary Doctorate of Humanities from Park College in Missouri; Martin Luther King Jr. Nonviolent Peace Prize, 1982; Thurgood Marshall Lifetime Achievement Award, 1993; National Medal of Arts, 1994; and recipient of the Bishop John T. Walker Distinguished Humanitarian Service Award from Africa in 2002. He was inducted into the Black Filmmakers Hall of Fame in 1976.

Belafonte became very active in addressing social issues across the globe in the 1980s. The concept behind the song, "We Are the World" was the brainchild of Belafonte. The performance and sale of recordings of this song generated millions of dollars to assist in fighting famine in Ethiopia (1985). In 1987, he was named UNICEF Goodwill Ambassador and was selected to chair the welcome committee for Nelson Mandela's visit to the United States after his release from prison in South Africa. He also performed in Monte Carlo at the Princess Grace Red Cross Ball in 1987 and became the first entertainer to serve on the Advisory Committee of the Peace Corps in 1989.

The following represents a selective discography of Harry Belafonte's recordings: "Calypso" (RCA), 1956; "Mary's Boy Child," 1956; "Coconut Woman," 1957; "Love Is a Gentle Thing," 1959; "Mark Twain and other Folk Favorites," 1959; and “We Shall Overcome” (video recordings) by Harry Belafonte, 1992.

In addition to his involvement as a social activist, filmmaker, and recording artist, he found time to appear on talk shows as a performer and/or engage in intellectual dialogue related to political and social events. Belafonte appeared on diverse television shows including the Dick Cavett Show, 1972; Mike Douglas Show, 1974; and Paul Robeson (The People), 1976.

Belafonte has also represented the United States on the world stage in speaking of the disenfranchised and those persons or societies whose quality of life does not meet expected standards.

Bensonhurst, New York, Incident of 1989

The Bensonhurst incident of 1989 was sparked by the racially motivated murder of Yusuf Hawkins. On the night of August 23, Hawkins, a 16-year-old African American, and three friends traveled from Bedford-Stuyvesant, their predominately black neighborhood, to Bensonhurst, an Italian-American enclave a few miles away. The four teenagers seldom left their neighborhood, but Claude Stanford was eager to inquire about a used 1983 Pontiac automobile that was for sale in Bensonhurst. As they entered the foreign neighborhood, they were surrounded by 20 to 30 white youths, who wielded baseball bats, golf clubs, and at least one gun. The white youths had been lying in wait to ambush a group of African Americans and Latinos whom they believed were involved with a white neighborhood girl, Gina Feliciano. Throughout the day, rumors had spread that Feliciano arranged for some nonwhite friends to come to Bensonhurst to start trouble. The white youths were resolved to “break out the baseball bats,” and “teach the niggers a lesson.” Despite realizing that Hawkins and his friends were not the group they were looking for, the white mob challenged their right to be in Bensonhurst. Convinced that beating the four African American teenagers was not enough, Joey Fama pulled a gun and fired four shots. Two of the bullets fatally wounded Hawkins.

The murder of Hawkins was New York City’s third killing of a black man by a white mob during the 1980s. In 1982, Willie Turks was beaten to death, without provocation, by 15 to 20 white men in Brooklyn. In December 1986, Michael Griffith was murdered in Queens by a mob of white men armed with baseball bats, tree limbs, and golf clubs. Throughout the 1980s, Bensonhurst earned a reputation for intolerance toward nonwhite minorities; in 1983, three black men were beaten by a group of whites; in 1987, two black men were chased and beaten by a group of whites; also in 1987, anti-Asian fliers were disseminated throughout the neighborhood.

The aftermath of Hawkins’s murder brought to the fore the hatred and ignorance of many Bensonhurst residents. On August 26, Al Sharpton led a group of 400 marchers through Bensonhurst, denouncing the neighborhood’s racial hostility. This predominately black contingent was met by hundreds of counter-demonstrators who held watermelons above their heads and jeered, “niggers go home!” As demonstrations continued throughout the investigation and subsequent trials, the tone of marchers became more bellicose. On August 31, activist Sonny Carson led 7,500 demonstrators through the streets of Brooklyn. When the demonstrators reached the Brooklyn Bridge, they were met with a wall of police officers in riot gear and with batons ready. Frustrated and determined not to submit, the demonstrators picked up sticks and threw bottles. Forty police officers and unnumbered demonstrators were injured. Many in the African American community felt that the months after Hawkins’s murder were more like 1963 than 1989.

Seven Bensonhurst men were eventually charged with crimes related to the murder of Hawkins. All but one was convicted of murder. Joseph Fama, the triggerman, was sentenced to 32 and 2/3 years to life for murder. Keith Mondello, who admitted to rounding up the mob that attacked Hawkins, was acquitted of murder and manslaughter. He was later sentenced to 5 1/3 to 16 years in prison for lesser felonies, including rioting, menacing, unlawful imprisonment, discrimination, and possession of a weapon. John Vento, who was also acquitted of murder, was convicted of unlawful imprisonment and sentenced to 2 to 8 years in prison. Joseph Serrano was convicted of possession of a weapon and sentenced to 300 hours of community service. Three other defendants were acquitted of all charges. The acquittals and light sentences ignited additional protests.

The Bensonhurst incident had profound implications for the upcoming Democratic mayoral primary. Ed Koch, the white incumbent, had long been criticized as being an apologist for racially motivated crimes toward African Americans. Koch was subsequently critical of the demonstrations led by Sharpton. His failure to express sympathy for the marchers compromised the city's stance on racial justice. Koch's opponent, David Dinkins, the only black democratic candidate, defended the demonstrations and chastised the racial hostility of Bensonhurst. Dinkins contended that Koch created a racial climate that allowed such an attack to occur. He defeated Koch in the primary and was elected the first and, to date only black mayor of New York City.

Despite the election of Dinkins and the conviction of several of those involved, the wounds of the Bensonhurst incident never fully healed. When Mondello was paroled after serving only 8 years of his sentence, Sharpton and 200 marchers returned to Bensonhurst to protest his early release. Again, white bystanders shouted racist epithets. This response underscored that after a decade, many of the residents of Bensonhurst continued to harbor the bigotry and hatred that led to Hawkins's death. The response of African Americans evinced their continued frustration with the lack of justice in the city.

Berlin Conference, 1884–1885

The Berlin Conference of 1884–1885 regulated European colonization and trade in Africa. Its outcome, the General Act of the Berlin Conference, is often seen as the formalization of the scramble for Africa. In German it is referred to as Kongokonferenz ("Congo Conference"). Although by the end of the third quarter of the 19th century, France, Britain, Portugal, and Germany had acquired commercial interests and were exercising considerable influence in different parts of Africa, their direct political control there was extremely limited.

These European powers preferred informal control and influence in Africa. But this attitude began to change as a result of three major events that occurred between 1876 and 1880. The first was the new interest the Duke of Brabant, crowned a constitutional king (Leopold I) of the Belgians in 1865, proclaimed in Africa. In September 1876, King Leopold II of Belgium convened the Brussels Geographical Conference for the purpose of founding an international society that should promote the exploration of Central Africa. Forty representatives from Great Britain, Belgium, Austria, France, Germany, Italy, and Russia were present.

The conference resulted in the setting up of an organization called "L'Association Internationale pour l'exploration et la Civilisation de l'Afrique Centrale," better known as the International African Association. Its headquarters were at Brussels under the immediate direction of Leopold, and its national committees were spread in practically all the European countries and in the United States. Its aim was to arouse interest in the movement and to raise funds.

The association secured the employment of Henry Morton Stanley in 1879 to explore the Congo in the name of the association. In August of the same year, he had begun to explore the Congo, to make treaties with the native chiefs, to establish stations along the river for the advancement of trade and the protection of the natives, and to try to end the interior slave trade.

In 1882, the association was transformed into a corporation called the International Association of the Congo, with King Leopold as president. An association flag was adopted and an energetic and systematic attempt was made to develop the trade of the Congo Basin. The International Association of the Congo had not been recognized by the powers and had therefore no assured territorial existence. These moves culminated in the creation of the Congo Free State, whose recognition by all the great European nations Leopold managed to obtain before the Berlin West African conference had ended its deliberations.

The second significant series of events was the activities of Portugal from 1876 onwards. For centuries Portugal had claimed the West Coast of Africa and an indefinite amount inland. No country had explicitly recognized the claim to the important northern strip, which included the mouth of the Congo. France, by the Convention of 1786, agreed not to occupy any of that territory herself. Great Britain, on her part, refused to recognize Portuguese jurisdiction. Portugal had never been able to enforce, with any regularity, her commercial monopoly on the Congo, and a complete freedom of trade had been confirmed to France by the Convention of 1786 and was equally enjoyed by other countries, with or without treaty rights.

The third and final factor that helped to set the partition in motion was the expansionist mood that characterized French colonial policy between 1879 and 1880. This was signified by her participation with Britain in the dual control of Egypt (1879), the dispatch of Savorgnan de Brazza into the Congo and the ratification of his treaties with Chief Makoko of the Bateke, and the revival of French colonial initiative in both Tunisia and Madagascar.

The rapid success of Stanley, the penetration of M. Savorgnan de Brazza to the Upper Congo, and the occurrence of several violent conflicts between natives and traders once more compelled Portugal to open negotiations for the recognition of her sovereignty. Accordingly, early in November 1882, Portugal approached both France and Great Britain. The French government was friendly, but apparently wished to postpone the delimitation until de Brazza had had time to consolidate their holdings along the Congo. In February 1883, he was given the powers of a colonial governor and authorized to make such treaties with the native chiefs as were necessary to advance the French influence.

With Great Britain, Portugal was more successful. Great Britain proposed as bases for a treaty in December 1882 the recognition of the Portuguese boundaries; unrestricted commerce on the Congo and the Zambesi; low tariffs in all the African possessions of Portugal; and the equality of British and Portuguese subjects in matters of land, leases, religion, and taxes. A lively correspondence, lasting until February 1884, led to the signing of a treaty along the lines suggested, but with the rights of foreigners much more thoroughly safeguarded. The equality of treatment was carefully defined, elaborated, and extended to all foreigners; freedom of navigation on the Congo was guaranteed; the duties levied in the Congo territory might not for 10 years exceed those of the Mozambique tariff of 1877, and might then be revised only by consent of Great Britain; and Portuguese sovereignty on the Congo was recognized only to Noki. Almost instantly serious opposition arose to this treaty. France knew the treaty was directed against her, and in Germany a score of chambers of commerce appealed to Bismarck for aid. The Woermann Line had a monthly service to the Congo and, from January 1883 to March 1884, inclusive, had sold there 1,029,924 pounds of powder, 2452 tons of liquor, and 555 tons of weapons and rice. There were also many sailing vessels that visited these regions. Otto von Bismarck, German chancellor, imagined that this trade was threatened.

Great Britain had abandoned the treaty; however, negotiations were to be continued. Portugal proposed the calling of an international conference to sort out the territorial disputes arising from European activities in the Congo region. This idea was later taken up by Bismarck who, after sounding the opinions of the other powers, was encouraged to bring it about. The conference was held at Berlin between November 14, 1884 and February 26, 1885. Representatives to the conference were from the United States, Austria-Hungary, Belgium, Denmark, France, Great Britain, Italy, the Netherlands, Portugal, Russia, Sweden-Norway, and Zanzibar.

Officially, the conference ignored the international association until its last session, at which the Independent State of the Congo, or the Congo Free State, was formally welcomed into the family of nations. Many members of the conference, in behalf of their respective governments, had been busy making treaties that established its position as a state and defined its territory. Bismarck saw in this a means of preventing armed conflict over the Congo Basin, of restricting the Portuguese advance, and of preserving the region to free trade. The association agreed not to levy import duties on goods brought into its territory and to accord to German subjects all rights. On her part, Germany recognized the flag and the boundaries of the independent state to be formed by the association, as given in a map appended to the treaty.

The treaties signed by the other powers were similar, although much European pressure was required to compel Portugal to recognize the north bank of the Congo as belonging to the new state. The south bank as far as Noki was relinquished to Portugal, and the coast province of Kabiinda. The Congo territory on the north bank was only a narrow strip west of Manyanga; to the east of that point, France insisted on the Congo and the Ubangi as boundaries.

The association gave its adhesion to the Act of 1885, and proclaimed the neutralization of its territory. The Belgian legislature granted Leopold II permission to become sovereign of the new state. The transformation of the association into the Independent State of the Congo was officially proclaimed in the summer of 1885.

The primary purpose, both of the international association and of the promoters of the Berlin Conference, was to secure free navigation and free trade on the Congo and its tributaries, and to have the development of the region, as well as the protection of the natives, placed in the hands of some responsible but independent organization. To this end the Congo Independent State was created. The conference marked off for free trade all the territory drained by the Congo and its branches. Navigation of every foot of the Congo and its tributaries was to be free; and an international commission, composed of representatives of states signing the act, was to supervise the navigation of the river, the levying of river tolls and pilotage dues, the surveillance of quarantine stations, and all matters necessary for the upkeep of the river.

Conditions on the Congo were well known to many members of the conference, and Stanley was present to explain both the claims of the Association and the needs of the natives. It was therefore provided in the act that all the powers should cooperate to put an end to the slave trade, and it was understood that all were to support the independent state in its efforts to stop these atrocities and to care for the welfare of the natives. All the promoters of the conference, including King Leopold, seem to have been largely actuated by motives of humanity.

The powers bound themselves to suppress the slave trade, but by far the greater portion of their discussions was devoted to the commercial and political questions involved. In the “General Act” itself, only 2 of 38 articles dealt with the humanitarian interests. In Article VI the powers agreed to protect the natives in their moral and material well-being, to cooperate in the suppression of slavery and the slave trade; to further the education and civilization of the natives; to protect missionaries, scientists, and explorers; and to preserve freedom of religion. Article IX reiterates the intention of the European states to abolish the slave trade.

To prevent conflicts among European states and to provide for the proper and regular extension of colonial possessions in Africa, it was agreed that the marking out of all new protectorates must be preceded by due notification to the powers; that to retain titles to lands the occupation must be effective; and that recourse would be had to arbitration in case of differences.

After the conference, the scramble for Africa sped up. Within a few years, Africa was at least nominally divided up south of the Sahara. By 1895, only the settlements in Liberia, Orange Free State, and Transvaal remained independent. The large part of the Sahara was French; after the quelling of the Mahdi rebellion and the ending of the Fashoda crisis, the Sudan remained under joint British-Egyptian rulership. The Boer states were conquered by Great Britain in the Boer wars from 1899 to 1902. Morocco was divided between the French and Spanish in 1911, and Libya was conquered by Italy in 1912. The official British annexation of Egypt in 1914 ended the colonial division of Africa. By this point, all of Africa, with the exceptions of Liberia and Ethiopia were under European rule.

BET

Black Entertainment Television (BET) began in 1980 by CEO Robert L. Johnson in Washington, D.C. At its inception, BET network proposed to target African American viewers as an untapped media niche—particularly those interested in shows starring black actors—that marketing executives previously ignored as a consumer base. In its earliest broadcast, BET aired a variety of programs including investigative news show BET Nightly News with Jacque Reid, teen-targeted Teen Summit, and syndicated comedy shows like 227, Amen, and Sanford & Son. Although it also featured musical programming like Rap City and other genre-specific video countdown shows for jazz and R&B listeners, such programs did not yet dominate the network’s TV line-up until much later on. Instead, with a Sunday morning line-up of Gospel music and televised Christian church programming, BET set out to be a base for representations of blacks in various mediated context—movies, news, entertainment—and would simultaneously offer advertisers a primary location for reaching African American consumers through commercials.

Since then, during its 28-year history, BET has consistently enjoyed a mixed bag of supporters and detractors on the basis of its original commitments to its founding concepts, as they have shifted within the evolving media landscape. Those who have supported the network have done so primarily from a business perspective, hailing it as an entrepreneurial success, brilliant for its ability to make a black-targeted brand marketable to more mainstream audiences. Alternatively, much of the reception and critique of BET has also been derogatory. Critics of the network cite its subscription-based nature as evidence that capital is its primary motivation, not proper representation. Moreover, many argue that because BET is mostly interested in generating revenue, it does so at the expense of reaching more African American people because, as a cable network, BET fails to reach a larger swath of viewers interested in seeing more images of blacks on television.

Most commonly, BET is critiqued for the representations of African Americans propagated through its programming decisions. In general its content most drastically changed in 2000 when Robert Johnson sold the company to Viacom Incorporated for a reported $3 billion to add to Viacom's media empire along with MTV, Nickelodeon, and Comedy Central. The bureaucratic changes that accompanied the acquisition drastically changed BET's program content, as well as the commercials featured in-between its new shows. The post-Viacom BET features a disproportionate number of ads for liquor and lower priced commodities compared to ads in other networks like ABC or NBC.

The most appreciable difference in BET as a network is manifested through its content, which shifted to solely focus on music programming. Producers developed new shows like 106 & Park (a music video countdown show that also features live performances and interviews) for younger viewers and moved away from accommodating older audience members. Concomitantly, the additional programming also propagated a greater number of negative images of black men and women featured in music videos as violent and hypersexual. Thus through its change, BET became responsible for the mass dissemination of misogynist and damaging images of African Americans, rather than offering a remedy to the damning images of blackness found elsewhere on television. Of the more hellacious shows was "BET: Uncut" featuring pornographic-like videos reserved for mature audiences viewing television even after late-night viewing slots. As BET has become a bastion of negative portrayals, it has been subject to public outcries for change, ranging from protestors congregating at the homes of BET executives to the cartooned critiques of Boondocks creator Aaron McGruder. These opponents argue that the network offers too small a view of African Americans to others and in consequence creates social problems for blacks who do not identify with the images BET offers.

By changing its imagistic investments, BET fails to offer African American viewers any variety in representation and thus mimics (or enhances) the negativity found on other networks. As the power shifted out of the hands of African American executives at BET to instead offer more control and financial interests to media companies, BET's content has been more demeaning to black Americans and renders the network as a chief disseminator of damaging images. In an effort to mitigate these claims the (once) predominantly music channel MTV became a model for BET's new content. In addition to music-centered shows, BET's new line-up mimics programs found on MTV by recreating them with exclusively black casts in order to achieve more socioeconomic variety in black representations. Thus whereas MTV airs Laguna Beach, a reality program about wealthy white teens living in California, BET now airs Baldwin Hills; showing wealthy black teen personal dramas through the same reality-TV show format. Similarly BET offers shows such as College Hill (a Black rendition of MTV's groundbreaking The Real World) and How I'm Living (a version of MTV's Cribs) in an attempt to quench complaints.

As BET's content has changed, it remains vibrant, reaching over 85 million households nationwide. It no longer dominates the network landscape for black representations with the emergence of network competitors like Radio One Inc.'s TVOne, which offers many of the syndicated shows previously found on BET; it also airs lost classics like Roots and the political Sharp Talk with Al Sharpton. BET, however, does remain a salient location for types of black images on television, and it has branched out to include other venues such as BETjazz network, which features less youth- and urban-oriented programming.

Bethune, Mary McLeod

Mary McLeod Bethune (1875-1955), an educator, civil rights activist, and founder of an historically black college was one of the most important black leaders of the early 20th century. She played an important role in promoting education for blacks, led numerous African American organizations, and also worked as a member of the “black cabinet” in Franklin Delano Roosevelt’s presidential administration. Although Bethune played such a significant role in high-level politics, she argued that she wanted to help ordinary African Americans. She fought for racial integration as a means for blacks to gain civil rights.

Mary McLeod was born in Maynesville, South Carolina in 1875, the 15th of 17 children of former slaves. She was born and grew up in the South during the era of Jim Crow segregation and violence. Mary McLeod distinguished herself by her academic ability at a young age and attended a local school run by black educator, Emma J. Wilson. In 1887, she won a scholarship to a boarding school—Scotia Seminary for Negro Girls—in Concord, North Carolina. Mary McLeod would go on to play a prominent role in black education, in large part owing to her early experiences with schools. She believed that education was the key to advancement of African Americans and spent much of her career promoting schools for blacks.

In 1898, Mary McLeod married Albertus Bethune, a clothing salesman. The couple gave birth to their son, Albert, the next year. The family moved to Florida shortly thereafter and opened a school. In 1904, Mary McLeod Bethune founded the Daytona Literary and Industrial Training School for Negro Girls. Like Booker T. Washington at the Tuskegee Institute, Bethune promoted industrial education. In 1907, Albertus left and went back to South Carolina. The couple never divorced, however, and Albertus died in 1918. Mary McLeod Bethune struggled to raise funds to keep the school afloat, and the student population increased tremendously over the next two decades. The school was later renamed the Daytona Normal and Industrial School and, in 1923, it merged with the Cookman Institute of Jacksonville, Florida. The school ultimately became a four-year college, Bethune-Cookman College. Mary McLeod Bethune served as the president of the college from 1923 to 1942 and again from 1946–1947.

Bethune also played a central role in women’s political activities in the early 20th century where she focused on her goal of improving the lives of black women. She served as the head of the Florida Federation of Colored Women’s Clubs from 1917 to 1925. In this capacity, she founded a home for delinquent black girls in Ocala, Florida. Bethune served as the president of the Southeastern Federation of Colored Women’s Clubs from 1920 to 1925 and headed up the National Association of Teachers in Colored Schools from 1923 to 1924. Bethune was elected president of the National Association of Colored Women (NACW) from 1924 to 1928 after defeating Ida B. Wells-Barnett for the position. She served as the NACW president for two terms.

Bethune was recognized nationally for her work promoting education and political upliftment of African Americans. In 1930, President Herbert Hoover invited her to a conference at the White House to reward her active work within the Republican Party. When Franklin Delano Roosevelt was elected president on the Democratic ticket in 1932, however, Bethune aligned herself with the Democrats. In 1935, Bethune wanted to promote a more radical political agenda, so she formed the National Council of Negro Women (NCNW). Bethune sought to create an organization that would promote the interests of all black women and also make the entire nation recognize the struggles and triumphs of African American women.

Bethune moved to Washington, D.C. in 1936 when she joined the National Youth Administration (NYA), an agency within the Works Progress Administration. The NYA was founded to spread democratic ideas to American youth and to provide vocational training for youth struggling with the economic ramifications of the Great Depression. In 1939, Bethune's unit of the NYA was moved to the Division of Negro Affairs in the Federal Security Agency, making Bethune the highest ranking African American woman in the federal government. In her role, she promoted college education for black students, as well as training in skills necessary for the war effort.

Mary McLeod Bethune fought fiercely to achieve social, economic, and educational opportunities for African Americans, and particularly for African American women. (Library of Congress)

In 1936, Bethune began to serve on the Federal Council on Negro Affairs, also known as the "black cabinet." The cabinet promoted civil rights for all blacks. In 1937, Bethune helped to organize the National Conference on the Problems of the Negro, a widely publicized conference. Attendees included Eleanor Roosevelt along with other important political figures. The conference promoted the goal of integration and publicized the struggles of African Americans.

After the attack on Pearl Harbor and the entrance of the United States into World War II, Bethune encouraged black Americans to support the war effort. She viewed the war as an opportunity for blacks to fight for their civil rights. She promoted war bonds and also worked to recruit black women to the army through the Women's Army Auxiliary Corps (WAC). She also agitated for equal treatment of black soldiers and protested against unfair treatment for black women in the (WAC). As World War II drew to a close, Bethune assumed a role on the international stage. In 1945, the State Department reluctantly named her an associate consultant to the U.S. delegation to draft the UN Charter in San Francisco. She was the only black woman on the delegation. She also continued to play a prominent role in American politics. From 1936 to 1952, Bethune served as president of the Association for the Study of Negro Life and History, an organization founded by Carter G. Woodson.

Bethune left Washington, D.C. and returned to Florida in 1949, where she continued her work. In addition to taking trips to Haiti and Liberia, she also continued to promote equality for African Americans. She worked with black businessmen to develop beaches that blacks could use under the Bethune-Volusia Project. She also founded the McLeod Bethune Foundation, a charitable organization to house her papers and promote black education. In 1955, Bethune attended the World Assembly for Moral Re-Armament (MRA) conference in Switzerland. The MRA promoted honesty, purity, unselfishness, and love, all traits that appealed to Bethune and her political philosophy. Mary McLeod Bethune suffered a heart attack on May 18, 1955, and died at her home in Florida.

Born on December 18, 1946, Steven Bantu Biko (1946–1977) would emerge as one of South Africa's most revered leaders. Biko grew up in King Williams Town in the Eastern Cape. There, his father worked as a government-employed clerk while his mother performed domestic work in surrounding white homes. Early on Biko learned the value of education from his parents who ensured that their youngest child understood its significance. In 1952, at the age of six, Biko began his formal schooling. Later on in 1963, when he matriculated at Lovedale High School, Biko faced expulsion because of his political affiliation with the fledgling Black Consciousness Movement (BCM). Biko became not only a major proponent of the BCM but also one of its chief theorists and practitioners. Despite the banning order that made it unlawful for Biko to speak with more than one person at a time, which was legislated in 1973, he managed to speak publicly and write proficiently. His I Write What I Like, for example, details his thoughts on apartheid, his adherence to "black is beautiful," and his ideas on the meaning of black. In Biko's opinion, any oppressed person, whether he represented Asian, European, or African persuasion, represented a black.

By adhering to this philosophy, Biko united disparate groups under a common theme. His public pronouncements against apartheid made Biko a government target. Biko died in September 1977 while in police custody from massive head wounds, not from a self-imposed hunger strike as the state had proclaimed. Biko left behind a wife and four children; two of the children he had by Dr. Mamphela Ramphele. His death led to his martyrdom.

Before Biko met this fate, he attended medical school at the University of Natal in 1966. When Biko realized that his education would not help to bring about integration between black and white, he stopped his studies and began fervently participating in several political organizations to hone his skills as a thinker of repute. Biko was also influenced by other intellectuals such as Frantz Fanon, Aime Cesaire, and Leopold Senghor; Mahatma Gandhi and Martin Luther King Jr. also impacted on Biko's intellectual development. In calling for the restoration of African consciousness, Biko argued that black South Africans had to undergo psychological liberation and physical liberation. With the first stage, Biko advocated that blacks gain a better appreciation of their beauty, intellect, and verve, rather than adhering to inferiority. Blacks, Biko believed, lacked confidence as a result of the system of apartheid and its degrading impact on the black psyche. In order for blacks to evolve, Biko believed that they had to throw off the psychological shackles that imprisoned them. Once they attained this goal, then physical liberation would follow. In analyzing the psychological effects of apartheid, Biko chose to verbalize what everyday South Africans felt. This was seen as incendiary by the South African government, which instituted a banning order against the freedom fighter.

When Biko was banned, the government restricted his movements to the Eastern Cape. Although he lived under such orders, Biko refused to allow the banning order against his physical mobility to limit his freedom. He traveled to soccer games, and Biko even gave a speech during one of these athletic events, where he first hid from view and then appeared. His trip to Cape Town led to his detainment. On August 18, 1977, police arrested Biko at a roadblock. He had according to officials contravened the Terrorism Act No. 83 of 1967. During his prison tenure, Biko faced torture. For one day, police officials chained Biko to a window grille; they also transported him nude in a Land Rover and drove 1,200 kilometers to Pretoria. Shortly after his arrival in Pretoria, Biko died. The cause of death was massive head wounds, which white South African journalist Donald Woods captured on film. In 1997, the perpetrators who killed Biko, all five of them, admitted their crime before the Truth and Reconciliation Commission for which they were exonerated. Finally, the family could receive some closure. Closure also came when the country and others around the world honored Biko. For example, the main student union building on the University of Manchester's Oxford campus carries his name. In 2004, in a poll conducted in South Africa by SABC3, Biko was named the 13th Greatest South African.

Black Arts Movement

In 1965, the passage of the Voting Rights Bill ended one phase of the Civil Rights movement and, by October 1966, the emergent doctrine of Black Power had concrete political form in the Black Panther Party for Self-Defense. Black power also had an artistic extension in the form of the black arts movement (BAM). Positioning themselves as an alternative to the mainstream Civil Rights movement, BAM poets and black power activists replaced the ideal of integration with that of black cultural particularism.

BAM was led by Amiri Baraka, Ed Bullins, Addison Gayle Jr., Hoyt Fuller, Larry Neal, Ishmael Reed, and James Stewart. It emerged out of Philadelphia, New York, and Oakland during the early 1960s, and by 1964 it had a literary center in the arts journal Liberator, founded by Neal and Askai Touré. In 1968, the publication of the Black Fire anthology, edited by Baraka and Neal, marked one of the major events in BAM's print culture. BAM reached the peak of its cultural influence in the late 1960s and early 1970s.

Central to the movement was a belief that political action would come through artistic expression. Art had a social value and the artist had a role in political transformation. Black nationalist cultural politics would help answer problems like poverty, police brutality, and substandard education, because imaginative culture could alter the reality of oppressed peoples.

The movement also stressed cultural heritage, the beauty of blackness, and a black aesthetic. It asked that black people no longer see through white eyes, and BAM poets therefore subverted traditional forms and accepted values. If "white" and "black" were signifiers for "good" and "bad," then BAM poets would use the terms differently, celebrating what Baraka frequently termed "black magic." In 1968, Neal described BAM as a cultural revolution, adding that a whole new system of ideas was needed. Neal's poem "Black Boogaloo" (1969) went on to instruct black poets, painters, and musicians: "Take care of business. All get together.... Combine energy.... Calling all Black People" (42).

As part of this revolution, BAM artists embraced the jazz avant-garde. They believed that music articulated an authentic black expression: "Negro music alone, because it drew its strengths and beauties out of the depth of the black man's soul, and because to a large extent its traditions could be carried on by the lowest classes of Negroes, has been able to survive the constant and wilful dilutions of the black middle class," wrote Baraka in 1966 (Within the Circle, p. 165). Musical freedom constituted another form of social activism, and BAM poets used the rhythms of black music in their verse. We were "drenched in black music and wanted our poetry to be black music... its rhythms, its language, its history and struggle," remembered Baraka of BAM. "It was meant to be a poetry we copped from the people and gave them right back, open and direct and moving" (The Autobiography, p. 237).

Alongside this interest in music as a language of the people, BAM poets stressed the orality of poetry, focused on vernacular speech as a communicative medium, and tried to make art accessible to the whole Harlem community. In 1965, Baraka founded the Black Arts Repertory Theatre/School (BART/S) in Harlem to assist the creation of a black culture. Focused on community art, BART/S produced plays that questioned core American values and provided African Americans with new meanings to their lives. BAM saw the artist-audience relationship as localized and collaborative, and when BART/S closed in 1966, Baraka opened Spirit House in Newark, New Jersey, guided by the same founding principles as BART/S.

Yet for all their efforts, BAM writers failed to resonate beyond a limited group of black urbanites. Nearly all of the movement's theater groups and journals were short-lived, and Gayle began preserving BAM for posterity as early as 1971. In an anthology titled The Black Aesthetic, he juxtaposed BAM writers with other major 20th-century theorists of the black aesthetic (including W. E. B. Du Bois and Langston Hughes), as though to ensure BAM's place in the annals of literary history. Then in 1973, Bullins's book The Theme is Blackness offered a closing statement of BAM and also expressed admiration for the accomplishments of the mainstream Civil Rights movement. Increasingly criticized for its anti-Semitism and chauvinism, as well as its exclusion of liberal whites and its strident form of nationalism, BAM faded from public view by the mid-1970s.

Black Athletes

Black athletes have contributed significantly to many sports—most notably basketball, baseball, football, track and field, and boxing—while facing many challenges, including formal segregation policies and/or personal prejudices that often denied them the opportunity to compete against nonblack athletes of their caliber and to make comparable wages. Countless black athletes have nevertheless found creative ways to participate in the sports in which they excelled, oftentimes redefining the game.

Perhaps the sport of basketball most effectively illustrates how black athletes have revolutionized a sport. Invented in 1891, basketball was almost entirely segregated by color, but the Renaissance Big Five—an all-black team formed in 1922 in Harlem, New York—consisted of premiere players who barnstormed across the country for about two decades, challenging teams of white players, thereby providing opportunities for quality racially integrated play.

Talented as the Renaissance team was, it was their contemporaries who founded a team that spread basketball around the world, adding elements of playfulness and showmanship to their athleticism. This all-black team formed in 1926 and first played on January 7, 1927 in Hinckley, Illinois; because of their traveling, originally in the Model T Ford of their promoter, they eventually became known as the Harlem Globetrotters.

They reached their 1,000-game mark in 1934, and played their first professional tournament in 1939. That same year, players began "clowning around" during the games to entertain their audiences and, although they continued to boast a talented roster, the Harlem Globetrotters became known for their skillfully orchestrated slapstick routines.

In 1950, the New York Knicks purchased Nathaniel "Sweetwater" Clifton from the Harlem Globetrotters; the Boston Celtics signed Chuck Cooper; and the Washington

Capitols signed Earl Lloyd. These three men were the first black players to cross the color line and play in the National Basketball League (NBA). Over the next two years, the players who remained with the Harlem Globetrotters—and there were many of quality—toured Portugal, Switzerland, England, Belgium, France, Germany, Italy, Morocco, Algeria, and South America, spreading the game of basketball to those countries. They also traveled to Germany; track star Jesse Owens accompanied them.

In 1954, Meadowlark Lemon became one of the Globetrotters' star attractions; he participated on the team for 24 years. That same year, the NBA instituted many rule changes, including the 24-second clock and a revised policy on fouls, that favored the quick athleticism that many black athletes would bring to the game.

In 1959, the Globetrotters toured the Soviet Union and Eastern Europe. "Curly" Neal joined the team in 1963, staying with them for 22 years and demonstrating intricate dribbling patterns to international audiences.

By 1966, the Globetrotters had played 8,945 games, with only 330 losses; they had also traveled to 82 countries. In 1985, they hired their first female player, Olympic gold medalist Lynette Woodard. In 2004, more than 1.3 million people watched Globetrotter games as the team toured Ireland, the United Kingdom, Belgium, Holland, France, and Spain.

Meanwhile, from 1967 until 1976, the American Basketball Association (ABA) challenged the NBA for basketball predominance. The ABA was known for its "outlaw" style of play, and players such as Julius "Dr J" Erving added a new level of excitement to the sport. When this league merged with the more traditional NBA, its players contributed to the level of showmanship and skill in modern professional basketball, and elements such as the sky hook, slam dunk, and extended hang time, owe much to the black players who brought this "showtime" to their fans.

Black basketball players have set many records. Kareem Abdul-Jabbar scored the most career points (38,387), and he blocked 3,189 shots, a record surpassed by Nigerian-born Hakeem Olajuwon, with 3,830; Abdul-Jabbar was also voted the Most Valuable Player a record-breaking six times. Wilt "The Stilt" Chamberlain started his career as a Harlem Globetrotter in 1958, and then switched to the NBA one year later. In the NBA, he set the record for career rebounds (23,924) and served as the leading scorer for seven consecutive seasons. Perhaps most astonishing is his performance on March 2, 1962, when he scored 100 points in one game. Another record is Earvin “Magic” Johnson’s 11.2 assists per game.

Other athletes who deserve mention are Bill Russell, who was part of 11 championship NBA teams, and Karl “The Mailman” Malone, the second highest all-time scorer, with 36,374 points. Michael Jordan, perhaps the most successful basketball player in the history of the sport, won the NBA’s Most Valuable Player award five times, and he led the Chicago Bulls to six championships. Furthermore, he shares—with Wilt Chamberlain—the record for being the leading scorer during seven consecutive seasons.

Black athletes currently contributing much to the sport include Shaquille O’Neal and LeBron James. Women who have excelled in basketball include Cheryl Miller, Teresa Weatherspoon, Sheryl Swoopes, Lisa Leslie, and Cynthia Cooper.

In the sport of baseball, black athletes began forming their own teams shortly after the inception of the game, in the 1840s, but they had to wait a full century to join the ranks of the most prestigious professional leagues. On occasion during the 19th century, exceptionally determined men, such as John “Bud” Fowler and Moses Fleetwood “Fleet” Walker, played on professional teams otherwise consisting of white players, but they were the exception; in 1887, after National League star Cap Anson refused to play against George Stovey, a black man, players of color were officially banned from participation in the professional leagues populated by white players.

The first all-black professional baseball team, the Cuban Giants, formed in 1885, and other teams of quality followed. These men played scheduled games and also barnstormed across the country in search of opportunities to play baseball. Team owners often lacked funding, so players’ wages were uncertain, and prejudices often prevented these men from participating against other players of their ability.

In 1920, Andrew “Rube” Foster created the National Negro League, the most stable all-black baseball league. It collapsed in 1930, however, four years after Foster’s death. Revived in 1932, the league lasted into the early 1950s. Men who played their entire careers in the Negro leagues, but who had the skill to play in the all-white major leagues, include “Smokey” Joe Williams, Josh Gibson, “Buck” O’Neil, “Mule” Settles, Oscar Charleston, “Bullet” Joe Rogan, and “Cool Papa” Bell.

Desegregation began in the sport in 1947 when John Roosevelt “Jackie” Robinson began playing for Branch Rickey’s Brooklyn Dodgers; that year, Robinson won the Rookie of the Year Award. Also in 1947, Bill Veeck of the Cleveland Indians signed Larry Doby, thereby breaking the color barrier in the American League. Doby participated in All-Star games from 1949–1954.

Other players who successfully transitioned from the Negro leagues into major league baseball include Leroy “Satchel” Paige who, after pitching for black teams for 22 years, joined the Cleveland Indians in 1948 and pitched well into his fifties. Another was catcher Roy Campanella, who also played for Branch Rickey’s Dodgers. Hank Aaron signed with the Milwaukee Braves in 1954 and went on to break Babe Ruth’s major league home run record (755) and the record for runs batted in (2,297).

Other black baseball players of note include Rickey Henderson, who is the all-time leader in walks, steals, and runs scored, and who successfully hit for the 3,000th time in 2001; Willie Mays, who hit 660 home runs during his 22-year career; and Reggie “Mr. October” Jackson, the first player to hit 100 or more home runs for three different teams. Tony Gwynn successfully hit 3,141 times in his baseball career. Also worthy of mention are Bo Jackson and Deion Sanders, who have succeeded in both professional baseball and football.

In the sport of football, segregation was total until 1946, when Kenny Washington and Woody Strode began playing for the Los Angeles Rams, and the Cleveland Browns’ All-America Football Conference team signed Marion Motley and Bill Willis, two future hall-of-fame players. Several black football players hold records of significance. Walter “Sweetness” Payton had the most yards rushing (16,726) until Emmitt Smith broke the record with 18,355; Payton also rushed 100 yards or more in 77 games. In 1997, Barry Sanders rushed for over 100 yards in 14 consecutive games for a total of 2,053 yards; in 1984, Eric Dickerson rushed over 100 yards 12 times for a total of 2,105, which is the most yards gained in a single season. Jerry Rice caught the most touchdown passes (197), with 22 of them in a single season, another record. Jim Marshall played in 282 consecutive games.

Other black athletes worthy of mention include Orenthal James (O. J.) Simpson, Roosevelt “Rosey” Grier, Franco Harris, Lawrence Taylor, “Mean” Joe Green, Gale Sayers, Donovan McNab, and Jim Brown who, at retirement, held 20 NFL records. Doug Williams, the first black quarterback to play in a Super Bowl, led the Washington Redskins to victory in 1988 and was awarded the MVP award.

Besides the skill, power, and speed that these athletes have brought to the game, several black players have been known to increase excitement by end zone celebrations and other sensational and attention-getting moves.

Seldom, however, has an athlete received the type of attention as did Jesse Owens. He was the first American track-and-field athlete to win four gold medals in one single Olympic competition and, in three events, he also set records. Yet, he is best remembered as the black athlete who triumphed in Berlin in 1936, while Nazi Chancellor Adolf Hitler, who believed in the superiority of the white race, watched.

Other black track-and-field athletes of note include Leroy Burrell (100 meters in 9.85 seconds), Butch Reynolds (400 meters in 43.29 seconds), Roger Kingdom (100 meter hurdles in 12.92 seconds), Edwin Moses (400 meter hurdles in 47.02 seconds), Bob Beamon (long jump of 29 feet, 2½ inches), and Willie Banks (triple jump span of 58 feet, 11½ inches). Charles Dumas was the first athlete to jump over seven feet, and Carl Lewis won four Olympic gold medals in 1984, in the same events that Jesse Owens won in 1936.

Female track stars of note include Alice Coachman, the first black woman to receive an Olympic gold medal for the high jump (1948); Wilma Rudolph, who won three Olympic gold medals in one single Olympiad (100- and 200-meter dash, and the 400-meter relay in 1960); and Florence Griffith Joyner who holds the world record for 100-meter dash (10.40 seconds) and for the 200-meter (21.34). Jackie Joyner-Kersey has held the heptathlon world record since 1986, besting her own point totals. Furthermore, Evelyn Ashford won four Olympic gold medals, and Gail Devers won Olympic gold medals in the 100-meter event in 1992 and 1996, besides other accomplishments.

In boxing, Jack Johnson—the first black American to hold the heavyweight title, which he won in 1908 and held until 1915—was a figure of controversy, in part because of his outspokenness, flashy lifestyle, and fondness for white women; and in part because of a bout he fought against Jim Jeffries—the “Great White Hope”—on July 4, 1910. Billed as the “Fight of the Century,” Johnson beat the former heavyweight champion, thereby cementing his reputation as a powerful fighter.

Fifty years later, another flamboyant boxer caught the attention of audiences. Muhammad Ali, who won an Olympic gold medal in 1960, combined speed and athletic prowess with a boastfully humorous persona that helped transform boxing into the popular sport that it is today. Other 20th-century black boxers of note include Joe Louis, George Foreman, Floyd Patterson, Evander Holyfield, Sugar Ray Leonard, Joe Frazier, Thomas Hearns, and Mike Tyson. Don King, another controversial figure, deserves credit for promoting the sport of boxing to the masses.

Although the five aforementioned sports—basketball, baseball, football, track and field, and boxing—are the ones in which black athletes have made the most contributions, there are also black athletes of note in soccer, hockey, tennis, golf, and skating, as well as other sports.

Skater Debi Thomas was the first black athlete to win a medal during the winter Olympics. In tennis, women of note include Althea Gibson; in 1957 and 1958, she won both the singles and doubles titles at Wimbledon. Other female tennis stars include Zina Garrison-Jackson, and Serena and Venus Williams. In men’s tennis, Arthur Ashe, the first black man to win at the U.S. Open and Wimbledon, deserves particular mention. Ashe once discussed the sports performances of whites, which he labeled “method acting,” lacking spontaneity, creativity, and innovation; it was his belief that black athletes brought those elements to various sports.

Edson Arantes Do Nascimento, known simply as Pelé, is perhaps one of the greatest soccer players ever, blessed with extraordinary ball-controlling ability, speed, and balance. Pelé played in four World Cups with Brazil’s National Team.

The first black to join the National Hockey League (NHL) was Willie O’Ree, who joined the Boston Bruins in 1958, despite being legally blind in his right eye. O’Ree recalls significant racial taunting, noting that it was worse in the United States than in Canada. It was not until 1974 that another black athlete—Mike Marson—joined the league.

Overall, only 18 players participated in the National Hockey League (NHL) in the years between 1958 and 1991; this was, in large part, because Canadians comprised more than 95 percent of the NHL in 1971, and only .02 percent of the Canadian population at that time was black; that figure is now 2 percent. Moreover, about 15 percent of the NHL players are now from the United States, whereas Canadians make up 60 percent. This partially explains why, in 2003 alone, the number of black hockey players had increased to 13.

Perhaps the most notable black hockey player so far has been goaltender Grant Fuhr, who played with Wayne Gretzky on the Edmonton Oilers team in the 1980s. Fuhr has the sixth most all-time wins for goalies. Another black hockey player of note is Anson Carter, who was the second-leading scorer for the Boston Bruins in the 1999–2000 season; other players include Fred Brathwaite of the Columbus Blue Jackets and Kevin Weekes of the Carolina Hurricanes.

Black golfers began participating in the sport in the late 19th century, and it was a black man, Dr. George F. Grant, who invented the golf tee in 1899. In 1896, John M. Shippen Jr., a laborer who helped build Shinnecock Hills, played in the second U.S. Open Championship at the golf course he helped construct. He placed fifth, seven strokes behind the winner.

That was an exception, though, in the then-segregated sport of golf. During the summer of 1925, a group of black men formed the Colored Golfers Association of America (or, as some report, the United States Colored Golfers Association), in which they sponsored their own tournaments and offered their own awards and prizes. They faced challenges; by 1939, fewer than 20 golf facilities, nationwide, were said to be available for black players. Black players were not admitted to the Professional Golf Association of America (PGA) until 1959, and that was in response to a lawsuit filed as far back as 1943.

Golfers of significance include Charlie Sifford, Calvin Peete, and Lee Elder; the most famous black golfer is unquestionably Eldrick “Tiger” Woods. Among other accomplishments, Woods won the Masters Tournament in 1997, 2001, and 2002; the PGA Championship in 1999 and 2000; the U.S. Open Championship in 2000 and 2002; and the British Open Championship in 2000. In 2001, Woods became the first golfer to hold all four major championships during the same year.

It would be impossible to mention all black athletes, or to list all of their accomplishments. It is fair to say, however, that this group of athletes has contributed much to the sports that they have played, combating racism and other challenges, and that they have made each of their sports richer by their presence.

Besides combating segregation, black athletes have had to contend with an evolving series of stereotypes. In the 19th century and much of the 20th century, a significant percentage of people believed that black athletes succeeded because their relatively lower intelligence was compensated by a stronger physical ability. The race of the athlete was nearly always part of any media reporting; for example, Jesse Owens was labeled as “saddle colored” or a “streak of ebony.” When Joe Louis won a boxing match against a white man in 1935, it was suggested that someone “not quite human, came out of the jungle last night.”

Although fewer people today would say that black athletes succeed more often because of their lower intelligence but greater physical capacities, a more subtle stereotype is displayed whenever it is stated that blacks are more naturally athletic, implying that they do not possess the same intelligence or dedication that white athletes need to perform at the same capacity.

Black athletes who either broke the color line or were one of the first to participate in a particular professional sport faced a dual challenge: while their athletic efforts were under intense scrutiny, so were their personal lives and levels of conduct. Some, such as Jack Johnson, flaunted conventions, but most groundbreakers did not.

Because as many as three-fourths of current NBA and NFL players are black, and as many track-and-field events are dominated by black participants, it is therefore expected that the contributions of these athletes to the world of sports will only continue to increase.

Black Cabinet

Black cabinet, black brain trust, or Federal Council of Negro Affairs refers to the various men and women appointed to administrative positions in Washington as part of President Franklin Delano Roosevelt's New Deal shift toward more equitable treatment of African Americans.

Despite its expansive uplift and improvement aims, initially the New Deal with all its promise and promises was marked by an overwhelming indifference and even enmity in regards to issues concerning African Americans. For example, The National Recovery Administration or NRA, which African Americans began to refer to by the negative soubriquet "Negro Run Around," was one of the associations that implemented inauspicious policies concerning African Americans. Under The National Recovery Administration, various codes forced African American workers to become displaced from entrepreneurial endeavors and higher wage jobs in favor of their white counterparts and larger modernized business ventures. The Civilian Conservation Corp (CCC), which employed racial exclusionary and discriminatory practices regarding African Americans in the organization's units and ultimately ill-effected their ability to advance, was another New Deal program that negatively affected blacks. The Agricultural Adjustment Administration (AAA) allowed whites superior representation in county committees and disallowed approximately 400,000 African American sharecroppers and 300,000 black tenant farmers from receiving proportionate distributions of crop reduction payments to which they were entitled while simultaneously consenting to the widespread eviction of tenants whose labor was deemed no longer valuable.

Despite the inequitable treatment that was a mark of early New Deal implementations, after 1934 countervailing forces began to succeed in gradually shifting President Roosevelt in the direction of more just treatment for blacks. Dissatisfaction felt by blacks with the state of race relations throughout the nation at the time began to manifest itself in the form of fervent protests and an immense upsurge in voting registration among African Americans. The active response among African Americans to address the racial ills of the moment was supplemented by calls for policy reform both outside from southern liberals, leftists groups, labor movements, and within the Roosevelt Administration from various persons, including the First Lady Eleanor Roosevelt, Will Alexander, Harry Hopkins, Harold Ickes, and Aubrey Williams, all of which helped to foment and expedite the creation and implementation of policy that was beneficial for African Americans.

As a loosely constituted, unofficial governmental organization, the daily happenings of the black cabinet varied greatly, but it is an accepted fact that all of the cabinet's work was aimed at uplift of African American people. The black cabinet served both a material and a symbolic function in regard to improving the collective lot of African Americans. The mere existence of such a large constituency of blacks in influential political and governmental positions indicated to the wider African American community that perhaps a needed shift in terms of racial equality was taking place, while materially the presence of African Americans in government as racial advisors allowed the needed space to voice the myriad of concerns of the modal black population to the larger administration. Because of the Federal Council of Negro Affairs loose construction and some of the black cabinet's more logistical aspects, such as specific information about the everyday occurrences, as well as information regarding its members, remain unclear.

Despite a paucity of information regarding all of the inner workings as well as official information on the number of members exact members because of the dynamic influx and outflow of the black cabinet, some of the black brain trust's initiatives and endeavors are revealed through the work of some of its most prominent members such as Robert Weaver, William Hastie (who worked for the Department of Interior as an assistant solicitor), and Mary McCloud Bethune.

Mary McCloud Bethune was perhaps one of the black cabinet's foundational and most visible members, and certainly its most prominent female member. During her work in the club movement, she developed a close friendship with Eleanor Roosevelt, a relationship that would eventually allow her to move into governmental positions. Regarding her role in the Federal Council of Negro Affairs, Bethune was involved in the development of the Fair Employment Practices Commission. Bethune also worked on the Civilian Pilot Training Program, which was focused on training black pilots, and the Women's Army Corp (WAC) and its admittance of black women. Mary McCloud Bethune's work is indicative of the type of projects for African American improvement that the black cabinet was created for and committed to carrying out.

In many ways the black cabinet reflected a material shift in things such as political party affiliation, as African Americans had previously been overwhelmingly Republican began to align themselves more with Democratic politics. The cabinet also indicated perhaps the nascent stage of a national collective ideological shift that would eventually recognize not just inclusion and amelioration, but uplift and equality for African Americans.

Black Codes

Black Codes, laws enacted in Southern states during Reconstruction, discriminated against blacks and restricted their newly acquired freedom. The laws, which appeared to be neutral and fair to both whites and blacks, were not neutral. The codes became known as Jim Crow laws because they were as deceptive as the minstrel show character, Jim Crow, was deceptive. Crow, a white character, disguised himself with a painted black face and the Black Codes, like the minstrel character, were thought to be based on racial disguise.

Mississippi and South Carolina were the first states to enact Black Codes. South Carolina's newly adopted post-war constitution prohibited African Americans from voting and continued to impose racial qualifications on those who desired to become state legislators. Its legislative enactments prohibited black men from earning a living as artisans, mechanics, or shopkeepers unless they were licensed. Black laborers could be employed under yearly contracts of labor, but if they were terminated from employment, either voluntarily or by the employer, they were required to forfeit all wages earned within the year to any date of the termination.

Mississippi's Black Codes were the most stringent. Freedmen, free negroes, and mulattoes could only own land in cities, were limited in their ability to testify in court proceedings, were punished for leaving employment, and were defined as vagrants if they had no lawful employment or business, were found congregating together at any time of the day of night, or failed to pay any tax levied upon them. Other Southern states had similar legislation and, although the language of the enactments varied from state to state, the Black Codes placed controls on blacks' property ownership, employment, sexual behavior, and voting rights. The laws also limited the rights of blacks to sit on juries, testify at trials, and to own or carry weapons. All states imposed poll taxes on blacks. Unemployment was considered a crime in most states, and most codes defined vagrants as freedmen who were unemployed. The Black Codes were supplemented by additional legislation in some states. States provided separate public transportation for blacks and denied them the use of public education funding.

Louisiana required all freed peoples to obtain comfortable housing and have visible means of support within 20 days of the passage of the legislation or be subject to arrest. Alabama's Black Codes required all Civil War officers to report to the county all the names of black minors whose parents were unable or unwilling to support them. Once the minors' names had been reported, they were subject to fines, arrest, and a sentence that included working for the highest bidder for their services in order to work off the fine. Florida laws prohibited negroes and mulattos from keeping any weapon, firearm, or ammunition without a license. Penalties for noncompliance included whipping the offender's bare back.

Effects of the Black Codes had wide ramifications beyond the everyday lives of the freed blacks. Northern Republicans were successful in getting Congress to pass the Civil Rights Act of 1866 over President Andrew Johnson's veto, and the Fourteenth Amendment was added to the United States Constitution. The federal government also imposed military rule to ensure compliance with Reconstruction measures.

Black Conservatives

All politics is involved with promoting the practical means of obtaining the good life. For black conservatives, this means an embracing of such values as hard work and individual responsibility. They reject the current liberal approach that argues for collective action and that states that the prime source for black failure is still institutionalized racism. They are a diverse group who are sometimes called neo-Washingtonians. The history of black conservatism begins in the 1800s, but like all political movements it has changed over the years and has found a resurgence beginning in the 1970s.

In the late 19th century and early 20th century, two opposing political philosophies—liberal and conservative—began to take shape for black Americans. After the Civil War, African Americans supported Republicans, the party of Lincoln and of emancipation. Even after Lincoln's assassination, Republicans continued to support civil rights for blacks. At this time, Booker T. Washington (1856–1915) shaped the conservative views of black Americans.

Washington, a former slave from Franklin County, Virginia, attended Hampton Institute and Wayland Seminary. He then helped to develop the Tuskegee Institute, recruiting its first students and raising money for its first buildings. Two important events happened in his life during these years. First, while he was a student at Wayland, he became convinced that black students who opted for a classical education forgot their roots and became estranged from the experience of black poverty. Second, as the head of the Tuskegee Institute, he encountered strong antipathy from Southern whites who feared that educated blacks would not be willing to enter the agricultural economy that dominated the South. To overcome this, Washington emphasized that the Tuskegee Institute would emphasize “industrial” education, meaning farming, carpentry, etc. These, he believed, would be the most likely avenues of employment for the majority of African Americans.

The basis of his political philosophy was that being productive was a more powerful antidiscrimination tool than protesting or hoping for intervention from the federal government. He argued that no race will ever be marginalized if they can contribute to the economy of the world. In 1895 he gave his famous “Atlanta Compromise” speech in which he further argued against “artificial forcing” of rights and emphasized that white society needed African Americans and that any attempt to stifle the growth of blacks by white society would be counterproductive. His compromise was for there to be a symbiotic relationship between the two races. In 1900, he founded the National Negro Business League. He strongly believed in self-help and hard work as the keys to success.

One of the biggest critics of Washington's approach was W. E. B. Du Bois (1868–1963). Du Bois's ideas have been influential in the shaping of modern-day black liberalism. He was brilliant, well educated, and talented. He was a writer, a teacher, a sociologist, an editor, and an activist. His major complaints against Washington were that Washington believed in a subordinate position for African Americans, that Washington denigrated higher education for blacks, and that he was too conciliatory toward the South. Du Bois was a socialist and believed that government had to become involved in order for equality to become a reality and that social protest and agitation were also necessary. As a socialist, he was skeptical of capitalism and toward the end of his life became a member of the Communist Party.

Both black conservatism and black liberalism have changed over time, and neither is an exact replica of the ideas of either Washington or Du Bois. But certain principles have survived. For modern black liberals, protest, agitation, and federal intervention in the lives of African Americans are still important. For modern black conservatives, self-help, entrepreneurship, and a dislike of the welfare state are still important.

This is best understood in the context of the changes in party affiliations of African Americans during the last century. Black Americans generally continued to support the Republican Party until the Great Depression, when Franklin Roosevelt's left-leaning administration undertook to intervene in the lives of poverty-stricken people, both black and white. As a result, Roosevelt's Democrats won the loyalty of many Americans who now saw the federal government as good and big business as evil.

The 1960s further strengthened black Americans' loyalty to the more liberal Democratic Party. This was the era of active civil rights and school desegregation, and liberals were more clearly identified with this group approach than were conservatives. In addition, Democrat Lyndon Baines Johnson's Great Society legislation offered even more federal intervention in people's lives.

But beginning as early as the 1970s (even earlier, if George S. Schuyler, who lived between 1895 and 1977, is considered), conservative voices in the black community began to assert themselves. Early on, most black conservatives worked for the media. Soon they would create organizations and interest groups and eventually they would move into politics—one even to the U.S. Supreme Court. Taken together, they demonstrate the essence, as well as the diversity, of contemporary black conservative thought.

In the media, newspapers, like The Chicago Independent Bulletin, published by Hurley Green Sr., carried important black conservative columnists. Magazines, like National Minority Politics, published by Willie and Gwen Richardson; Issues and Views, edited by Elizabeth Wright; and The Lincoln Review, edited by J. A. Parker began to promote conservative thought. Important black columnists include men like Thomas Sowell, Walter Williams, and Shelby Steele. In general, they argue that the key to success for African Americans is individual effort rather than government intervention.

Thomas Sowell, born in North Carolina but raised in Harlem, never finished high school. He joined the Marine Corp and eventually graduated (magna cum laude) with an economics degree from Harvard and a PhD in economics from the University of Chicago. He is now a nationally syndicated columnist. He has argued against the idolization of ghetto culture by liberals, Hollywood, and the media. He believes that economic lags by African Americans are not entirely due to racial discrimination, and therefore fixable by government intervention, including the intervention of affirmative action. In short, he does not believe that the government—or judicial activism by judges—can solve racial problems. One of his major concerns is education for blacks, but he does not limit his ideas about education, as did Washington. For him, education, including higher education, is the key to success. He is also for education reforms like vouchers.

Walter Williams, also an economist, was born in Philadelphia. He has a PhD in economics from UCLA. He, too, is a believer that education is the key to success for all people.

He is also a believer in the power of such middle class values as stable families and hard work. He is not against the civil rights battles of the past that guaranteed constitutional guarantees, but he is against people forever thinking that they are victims and that the only way to not be a victim is for someone else to do something for them. And he dislikes the paternalistic attitude of white liberals that feeds this victim attitude.

Shelby Steele, with a PhD in English and a master's degree in sociology, was born in Chicago. In 1991, he won the National Book Critics Circle Award for his book The Content of Our Character. In this book, he calls for African Americans to work as individuals within the mainstream rather than attempt to reach their goals through collective action that attacks the mainstream. That, he argues, is the way to advance. In A Dream Deferred: The Second Betrayal of Black Freedom in America, he defines a black conservative as one who does not accept that victimization is the sole—or the major—reason for black failure.

Black conservatives have also made an impact on radio. A good example is Larry Elder who has a popular radio program in Los Angeles. Elder went to Brown University and received a law degree from the University of Michigan. He appears frequently on television. He is the author of several books, including the best-selling The Ten Things You Can't Say in America. He, too, thinks that the belief in victimization is crippling to black progress. He has even coined a word, "victicrat," to describe people who use victimization. He is a strong believer in personal responsibility.

Besides black conservative voices in the media, there are also organizations that promote conservative ideas in the African American community. The National Center for Neighborhood Enterprise is an example. It helps lower income blacks by promoting "self-sufficiency and financial independence." There is also The Brotherhood Organization of a New Destiny that believes in self-help and focuses on the lives of young black men. There are others.

There are also a number of black organizations that promote conservative ideas through political means. One of the most influential is Project 21, located in Washington, D.C. This organization states on its Web site that it is promoting "entrepreneurial spirit, sense of family and commitment to individual responsibility." One of its leaders, Edmund Peterson, has said that Project 21 attempts to fulfill the ideals of the Civil Rights movement by promoting basic middle class values, which he calls the “civil-behavior movement.” Petersen believes that the breakup of the family is a major contributor to individual failure, thus his belief in strong family values.

One of the most powerful men in the United States is a black conservative, Supreme Court Justice Clarence Thomas. He was born in Pin Point, Georgia, in 1948, and attended Conception Seminary for a year. He then received his undergraduate degree from Holy Cross College and his law degree from Yale. He practiced law in Missouri before working for the U.S. Department of Education as Assistant Secretary for Civil Rights. He was the chairman of the U.S. Equal Employment Opportunity Commission from 1982 until 1990. He was appointed to the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia in 1990. He became a United States Supreme Court Justice in 1991.

In 1980, Thomas, at the invitation of Thomas Sowell, attended a historically important conference, the Fairmont Conference in San Francisco. The sponsors titled it a Black Alternatives Conference and focused on conservative ideas. They discussed education and black priorities, the problems of government interference in the destiny of citizens, and legal barriers to economic success.

Thomas has written since then, in an article titled “No Room at the Inn: The Loneliness of the Black Conservative,” about the values that he considers conservative and about how the Fairmont Conference and its aftereffects helped him to clarify them. The values come from his family, especially his grandparents; they are his road map to success in this country. For him, the basis of conservatism lies in the principle of natural Law, which underpins the Constitution. First, there must be respect for each person’s freedom. Second, we should never be governed by anyone except with our consent. Third, the individual must take responsibility for his life. He saw this abstraction first in the concrete life of his grandparents who taught him that each person must fend for herself. They could give him values to make this work—God, education, discipline, and a belief in the efficacy of hard work—but it was up to him to make it happen. The government could never be a substitute for personal responsibility. Conservatives, he concluded, must actively protect the rights of individuals while at the same time demand individual responsibility.

Black conservatives may not always agree on every point, but they all share a belief in the American system. For them, the good life is possible, but no amount of government intervention will bring it; only individual effort can do that.

Black Nadir

The black nadir traditionally references to the worst period in the African American experience, a period dating from 1877 to 1918. Historian Rayford Logan coined the term in his book The Negro in American Life and Thought (1954). This groundbreaking text was important for expanding the discourse of black history in that critical period between Reconstruction and World War I to include a narrative of how blacks were systematically oppressed and stereotyped, while also linking talented tenth activism to the modern civil rights movement.

In the nadir construct, Reconstruction was an era of hope for Southern blacks following centuries of enslavement. They had hoped for freedom and equality through land ownership, socioeconomic independence, re forging the ties within families and communities, and acquiring the ballot and first-class citizenship. This hope was systematically undermined by the reality that they were only quasi-free. Crucial to this narrative was that blacks represented a major threat in tipping the political-economic balance of power in the South to their own (and white liberal) favor. White conservatism curtailed these advances by forming white terrorist groups like the Ku Klux Klan, restricting most freedmen to back-breaking manual labor and domestic work, and restricting them from voting, racial intermingling, serving on juries, and land ownership. Finally, white liberal indifference led to the systematic collapse of the Radical Republican political structure in the South after the economic Panic of 1873. Reconstruction officially ended following the Hayes-Tilden Compromise of 1877, which called for the withdrawal of Union troops from the South, depriving Southern blacks and white liberals of the protection of the federal government.

The failure of Reconstruction set a pattern of Southern white supremacy, which expanded nationwide until it was finally brought to a halt in large part by the Civil Rights movement during the 1960s. From 1877 to 1968, black freedom was opposed by customary and legal discrimination in the forms of Black Codes and states' rights, which nationally extended as Jim Crow (legal) segregation after the Plessy v. Ferguson U.S. Supreme Court verdict in 1896. During this period, African Americans were systematically beaten, lynched, raped, disenfranchised, and made to appear stereotypically pathological, immoral, and inferior to whites in entertainment (i.e., minstrel shows) and "science" (i.e., eugenics). Moreover, civil rights legislation established during Reconstruction as well as the Fourteenth Amendment (that guaranteed citizenship and due process) and the Fifteenth Amendment (that conferred the right to vote) were rarely used to protect people of color. Couple this with the federal government's obsession with promoting industry and territorial expansion, and the end result was the loss of hope through socially constructed oppression for people not considered to be U.S. citizens.

The nadir construct marginally addresses how blacks confronted white supremacy using a wide range of strategies that blossomed into a freedom movement after 1945. Central to black self-determination was the formation of black institutions such as churches and schools that fostered leadership, community, and literacy. Blacks also elected their own political leaders, served in the military, and infused politics into art. Moreover, blacks quested after freedom in search of promised lands in the West, North, and abroad such as Nicodemus (Kansas), Pittsburgh, and Liberia. In the early 20th century, freedom strategies increased in intensity over time from the work of Booker T. Washington, who found black salvation in agricultural and domestic industrial pursuits while accommodating the "color-line," to the articulate critique of W. E. B. Du Bois, who opposed racism through his political activism and intellect.

The black nadir reactively centers black oppression without balancing the discourse with a strong understanding of black agency and resistance. In addition, it should reflect the lowest point of the black experience by era, not year. For example, after World War I (1919), severe restrictions on black freedom nationally continued in race rioting, voting, public accommodations, employment, housing, education, and entertainment, which maintained unadulterated white supremacy from 1874 to at least the passing and enforcement of civil rights legislation in the 1960s.

Black Nationalism

Black nationalism did not emerge as a coherent movement focused on racial solidarity until the early 20th century. But its origins lie in the philosophies of black abolitionists—namely Martin Delany, who advocated emigration to Africa. Explaining that black Americans were culturally and politically homeless, Delany proposed that they needed to build their own nation in Sierra Leone and Liberia. He also believed that this nation building would raise the social status of those who remained behind in America. Trying to move his plan forward, he led an emigration commission to West Africa in 1859 and explored potential sites for a black nation. While these ideas did not become a reality, later black nationalists, including Huey Newton, found inspiration and historical precedent in his work. They also looked back to Frederick Douglass's more radical speeches (such as his 1857 "West Indian Emancipation" speech) and the plans of the militant white abolitionist John Brown to build a slave-free nation in the Adirondacks.

By the 1920s, the Jamaican immigrant Marcus Garvey had developed radical abolitionist theories into a full-fledged black nationalist movement. In 1914, Garvey founded the Jamaica-based Universal Negro Improvement Association (UNIA), and, in 1917, he opened a first branch in the United States. Tapping into urban discontent after the Great Migration, the UNIA advocated black unity and self-improvement. It sponsored several educational institutions, convened international conventions, and opened more than 1,000 branches. It had 11 million members at its peak, mainly northern working class black people. Garvey's UNIA-affiliated newspaper, Negro World, first appeared in 1918 and fast became one of the country's most widely circulated black newspapers. Then, going beyond black self-improvement, Garvey echoed Delany's call for black national independence and emigration from the United States to Africa. In 1919, he established the Black Star Line, a transportation company focused on moving people and property to Africa. The venture failed and Garvey was deported after a mail fraud conviction in 1923. Nonetheless, he had turned the ideas of abolitionists into a movement and developed the first major strand of black nationalism: black separatism through a Back-to-Africa ideology.

His movement also inspired a new black nationalist effort: Farrad Muhammad's Nation of Islam (NOI). Founded and developed during the early 1930s, and with many former Garveyites among its early members, the NOI represented a second major strand in black nationalism: black separatism within the United States (rather a separate nation in Africa). To prepare for this separate black nation, the NOI preached black racial superiority and focused on developing economic self-sufficiency within black communities. Led by Elijah Muhammad after 1934, it entirely rejected white society and demanded several American states—a nation within a nation—as compensation for slavery.

By the late 1950s, Malcolm X had become its most prominent spokesperson. Born Malcolm Little, he had converted to the Black Muslim religion while in prison for armed robbery and changed his name to "X." He later explained that his parents were followers of Garvey and members of the UNIA, thereby giving him an early exposure to black nationalism. As a minister for the NOI, he defined land as the basis of freedom and equality, called for racial independence and a separate black identity, and advocated black self-defense. He also termed American history a white history, famously noting that blacks were no more than a sack of potatoes to the Founding Fathers. He aimed these black nationalist philosophies at a primary audience of young, urban blacks, who were frustrated by what they saw as Martin Luther King Jr.'s embrace of white protest traditions (including civil disobedience) and futile gradualism.

In 1964, Malcolm declared independence from the NOI and formed Muslim Mosque, Inc. He soon expanded his vision of black nationalism to include Africans and made two trips to Africa in 1964 in an effort to solicit support from African leaders. On June 28, 1964, he called a press conference to announce his new project, the Organization of Afro-American Unity (OAAU). Rather than promoting a Back-to-Africa movement, like Garvey's, this would be an organization that sought to achieve a global African community, promote the interests of black people worldwide, fight white supremacy, and link black Americans with Africa.

Malcolm was killed on February 21, 1965, before he could develop the OAAU program any further. But his ideas soon inspired a new black nationalist vision in the form of the Black Panther Party for Self-Defense (BPP). Bobby Seale and Huey Newton founded the BPP at a community center in North Oakland, California, in October 1966, and acknowledged it was a living testament to Malcolm's work. Long frustrated with mainstream civil rights efforts, they were also galvanized by the defeat of the Mississippi Freedom Democratic Party in 1964, the Watts uprising, and the Voting Rights Act of 1965. They believed that King and his supporters paid scant attention to the situation of urban African Americans, including the ongoing problems of high unemployment, substandard housing, and poor education. Now they aimed their new group at a post Civil Rights era.

Adopting Malcolm X's model of armed self-defense, they quickly formed a system of police patrols, aimed at countering police brutality against Oakland's black community. Their new members began to monitor and confront law enforcement officials and to advise Oakland residents of their rights. They began to use the term "black power" as a theory to explain their practices. This represented a new spin on black nationalism. Richard Wright had first used this phrase in his 1954 book of the same title, but it was Stokely Carmichael, the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee (SNCC) chairman and eventually the BPP's honorary prime minister, who first developed the idea into a full movement ideology. In 1966, he laid out a philosophy of black power that Newton and Seale adopted for their newly formed organization: black people needed to achieve racial pride and reclaim a black history, as well as building separate black communities, developing economic self-sufficiency, and collectivizing their resources. Black nationalism now meant not only political and economic control but also psychic and historical control. Another part of this black power philosophy was to prohibit whites from joining the liberation movement. Carmichael explained that whites could not relate to the black experience and that an all-black project was needed in order for black people to achieve freedom. He rejected racial reconciliation, nonviolent civil disobedience, and any notion of the American dream as defined by white people.

Newton and Seale translated this philosophy of absolute self-determination into the formation of community programs, rather than attempts to achieve an independent black colony. The BPP therefore represented a third major strand in black nationalism: the development of black community control over political and economic resources, or community nationalism. The BPP “survival programs” tried to combat the institutional racism at the heart of substandard housing, bad diets, poor health care services, and poor education for African Americans. They eventually offered breakfasts for schoolchildren, medical care, pest control, busing to prisons for the families of inmates, sickle cell anemia testing, clothing and shoes, community political education classes, and “liberation schools.” In part because of this smaller-scale, practical application of black nationalist philosophy—improving existing black communities rather than reaching for a separate black nation—the BPP’s membership had grown to around 5,000 by the end of 1968, with chapters in India, Israel, Australia, and England, as well as 40 chapters in the United States.

But the organization was under attack. In August 1967, the FBI under J. Edgar Hoover had instructed its covert action program—COINTELPRO—to disrupt and neutralize “Black Nationalist Hate Groups,” and by July 1969 the Panthers were COINTELPRO’s primary focus (although it also targeted the Southern Christian Leadership Conference, SNCC, the Revolutionary Action Movement, and the Nation of Islam). The program attempted to weaken BPP leaders, discredit the organization, and prevent the unification of black nationalist groups. They set other groups against the BPP and created rifts and factions within the BPP itself. A series of FBI raids and prosecutions, including the 1969 indictment and conviction of Seale for protesting during the Democratic National Convention of August 1968, weakened the BPP’s national and regional leadership and diminished its local membership.

By the early 1970s, its leadership was also engaged in a series of internal conflicts over the primary focus of black nationalist activism. Newton wanted to emphasize community service, but another BPP leader, Eldridge Cleaver, believed armed confrontation was more important. Cleaver publicly criticized the BPP as “reformist” rather than “revolutionary,” and Seale countered that the survival programs were “revolutionary” (412). In early 1971, Newton expelled Cleaver from the Central Committee and stated that his focus on violence alienated the black community and inhibited his potential role in the black nationalist transformation of society.

Before long the BPP was entirely crippled. Internal disputes, infiltration by covert government operations, and the deaths of party members during violent clashes with the police had diminished its energy and support. In March 1978, the membership of the BPP had declined to around 20. But the party’s platform did offer a blueprint for other 1960s protest manifestos, including those by the Brown Berets, the Young Lords, the White Panther Party, the Red Guards, and the Gray Panthers.

The BPP represents the last truly influential black nationalist movement in the United States. But elements of black nationalism do persist. As late as 1995, the NOI attracted between 650,000 and 1.5 million people to its “Million Man March” in Washington, D.C. The black nationalism emphasis on racial pride and black history also influenced the emergence of hip-hop as a protest medium. For example, Tupac Shakur embraced the doctrines of black nationalism in songs like “Panther Power” (1989). As well, elements of the “Back to Africa” movement influenced the development of pan-Africanism. Several former Panthers, including Carmichael, shifted direction to embrace pan-African pride, explaining that the only way forward for black nationalism was a socialist pan-African revolution.

As for the strand of black nationalism focused on community development, this persists in two new groups. In the early 1990s, activists inspired by the BPP pointed to new and continuing crises in black America: poverty, AIDS, infant mortality, drugs, high unemployment, and institutionalized racism. They announced the return of black nationalism and in 1994 former members of the original BPP launched The Black Panther Collective. They began to document police brutality in New York and to raise public awareness about political prisoners. The New African American Vanguard Movement was also founded in 1994, with B. Kwaku Duren as its chair. It became the New Panther Vanguard Movement in 1997. The group develops community-based social and cultural institutions, also demanding sentencing reviews and reductions for black prisoners.

But the separatist strand of black nationalism was also taken up by a more high-profile contemporary black nationalist group: the New Black Panther Party (NBPP), founded in 1991. The party's literature references Garvey's separatist movement and calls for independent African-centered schools, more trade with Africa, black tax exemption, and its own provisional government. The NBPP's ultimate aim is black national liberation and a black "liberated zone." But its strong anti-Zionist tendencies have led to accusations of anti-Semitism, and several members of the original BPP have condemned the NBPP, observing that the BPP had operated with love for blacks, not hatred of whites.

Black Panther Party

Originally called the Black Panther Party for Self-Defense, the Black Panther Party (BPP) was a radical African American political organization established in 1966 in Oakland, California, by Huey P. Newton (1942–1989), minister of self-defense, and Bobby Seale (1936–), chairman. Although the group's organizational beginnings can be traced to October 1966, with the creation of the "Black Panther Party Platform and Program," a manifesto outlining the group's ideological and political perspectives and goals with respect to housing issues, educational and economic opportunities, police violence, and African American disenfranchisement, the BPP is a continuation of black freedom struggles that began with the first rebellions against slavery and captivity in the barracoons, holding cells for enslaved Africans, centuries ago. Black Panther Party members perceived themselves as a vanguard party who mobilized the black lumpenproletariat, those unemployed members of the black working classes without political consciousness, and gave voice to the needs and desires of poor, segregated, urban communities that had not benefited from the legal victories of the Civil Rights movement. Throughout their 16-year existence, from 1966–1982, the party's political perspective and activity marked by ideological flexibility, adaptability, and hybridization—a fusion of ideas from post-World War II black liberation struggles in the United States and anticolonial struggles throughout the third world. Their most ostensible influences were Malcolm X, Frantz Fanon, Mao Zedong, Robert F. Williams, Kwame Nkrumah, Fidel Castro, V. I. Lenin, and Karl Marx.

Violent police brutality, hallmarks of many black, urban communities of the late 1960s, determined the party's initial black nationalist perspective and its political activity. Newton, as the party's theoretician, saw black urban neighborhoods as colonies occupied by the police force whose brutal surveillance were geared toward maintaining black exploitation. This approach led the small group of activists to focus on armed community patrols of the police. Equipped with pistols, shotguns, and law books, Newton, Seale, and Bobby Hutton, the first member and treasurer of the organization, traversed the streets of Oakland to ensure that police officers did not violate residents' rights. During patrols, Panthers, with weapons in plain sight, observed police officers carrying out their duty and questioned the detained resident to see if abuse had taken place. If the suspect was arrested, the patrol would pursue the arresting vehicle to the precinct station and post bail for the individual. Newton observed that patrols had a threefold effect: they taught the community how to protect themselves from the police, they decreased the incidents of police brutality, and they increased the membership of the BPP. As the membership increased so did police patrols of other black neighborhoods in the San Francisco Bay area including Berkeley, Richmond, and San Francisco.

In 1967, the party gained recognition among San Francisco Bay Area communities after it investigated and publicized the fatal police shooting of Denzil Dowell, a Richmond, California resident. During the same year, after providing protection for Betty Shabazz, the widow of the slain leader Malcolm X, the party attracted new members. Perhaps the most prominent person to join that year was Eldridge Cleaver, the renowned ex-convict and writer for the leftist magazine Ramparts, who became the organization's minister of information. His writing ability and connections with leftist activists were instrumental in attracting new members and helping the party create the Black Community News Service and The Black Panther, a weekly newspaper. The paper was indicative of the BPP's political dexterity in their attempts to empower black communities.

The Black Panther provided a medium through which party leadership and members could connect to the communities they served and raise reader consciousness. By 1970, the paper had a weekly circulation of over 100,000.

In the spring of 1967, the BPP gained national attention. On May 2, 1967, Bobby Seale and a contingent of 30 armed Black Panthers orchestrated a political demonstration when they delivered a public announcement called "Executive Mandate Number One" on the stairs of the Capitol Building in Sacramento, California. "Executive Mandate Number One" was a written response to the Mulford Gun Bill, legislation that would make carrying weapons illegal. As a result of their political demonstration, Bobby Seale and several other Panthers were arrested and accused of conspiracy. Despite its portrayal of the BPP as a black supremacist group and motley crew of thugs, the mainstream media coverage unknowingly acted as a recruiting mechanism for the organization. After the Sacramento incident, requests poured in from across the country for assistance in creating local chapters of the Black Panther Party. By the end of the decade, the BPP had grown to be a national organization with 40 chapters, more than 5,000 members, and tens of thousands of supporters. By 1969, the Black Panther Party comprised individual chapters unified under one central committee.

Members of the Black Panther Party (BPP) march in Manhattan on July 22, 1968, to protest the murder trial of leader and cofounder, Huey P. Newton. (Bettmann/Corbis)

The Party Goes National

By 1968, the BPP grew to be larger than its founders had imagined. To connect the work being done in the southern states by the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee (SNCC) with BPP work in western and northern urban areas, the two organizations attempted a merger. SNCC's Stokely Carmichael was named BPP prime minister; James Forman, minister of foreign affairs; and H. Rap Brown, minister of justice. The merger was short-lived and the appointments were largely symbolic, as the union was destroyed by organizational mistrust, exacerbated by well-placed counter-intelligence by the FBI, and differing leadership styles. With Huey Newton as the BPP leader, authority was centralized. SNCC was best known for its decentralized structure and a belief in the leadership ability of all its members. Further, SNCC was moving closer to a black nationalist perspective and was unwilling to work with white groups. The BPP was moving away from its previous black nationalist perspective toward socialism and was willing to work with any organization that held the best interest of black communities to heart, especially the Peace and Freedom Party.

With the merger between the BPP and SNCC undermined, the BPP Central Committee set out to maintain a cohesive national unit. This proved difficult for the young revolutionaries. From 1967 to 1970, Huey P. Newton was imprisoned for allegedly shooting Patrolman John Frey, assaulting Patrolman Herbert Heanes, and kidnapping Dell Ross, a black motorist. Concurrently, Eldridge Cleaver and Bobby Seale were trying to gain popular support to "Free Huey" and were involved in their own court cases. But all chapters, from the most popular in Chicago, New York City, and Los Angeles, to the more obscure in Wilmington, Delaware, Omaha, and Denver, were unified around the survival programs, a willingness to re-envision the party platform and revolutionary activity, and government repression.

Survival programs were instituted with the primary objective of transforming social and economic relations within the United States. The party's survival programs indicate not a "deradicalization" of the BPP or the substitution of a radical approach for a reformist one, but rather a willingness to supplement ostensibly radical political activities (mainly armed protection of black communities, rallying for self-determination, running political candidates, building interracial coalitions, and critiquing the intersection of racism and capitalism) with radical work that ensured the survival of black communities nationwide. From 1967 to 1974, BPP chapters throughout the country instituted survival programs addressing the multifaceted needs of urban communities. Some of the most popular include the Free Breakfast for School Children, Free Busing to Prisons Program, Sickle Cell Anemia Research Program, Seniors Against Fearful Environment, Free School Program, Free Pest Control Program, Free Food Program, Free Ambulance Program, Free Plumbing and Maintenance Program, and Liberation Schools. The survival programs were also indicative of the ways BPP members were willing to consistently expand the boundaries of their work and the limits of their perspective.

The 16-year lifespan of the BPP, especially the first five years, was marked by ideological expansion for the central committee, as well as the chapters. From 1966 to 1968, the party line was one of black nationalism, in which the primary vehicle for black liberation was understood to be black community control of community resources and institutions. In time, black nationalism as an ideology was too limiting, as it did not consider class issues and was replaced by revolutionary socialism from 1969 to 1970. From this perspective, capitalism did not provide adequate opportunities for the practice of self-determination, even with black community control. Only socialism provided the political and economic spaces for black self-determination and the potential for eradicating racism. By 1970, the party began to understand its freedom struggle as part of a larger global movement against imperialism and exploitation. With internationalism the ascendant philosophy from 1970–1971, as Judson Jeffries purports in Huey P. Newton: The Radical Theorist (2002), "the Panthers saw their struggle in the United States as not only necessary for the liberation of blacks and other oppressed people in America but as a struggle whose success was critical for the liberation of nations worldwide (74)." Intercommunalism developed from Internationalism and was the BPP dominant line from 1971 until the party's demise in 1982 and posits the notion that the growth of transnational corporations and economic globalization erased national borders, creating scattered communities loosely connected through commodity exchanges. The intellectual progression from black nationalism to intercommunalism represents the Black Panther Party's attempts to understand and explain forms of subordination and manipulation situated in political and economic realms. In fact, the BPP was one of the first organizations to openly criticize homophobic and sexist tendencies within black political movements.

Repression and Decline of the Black Panther Party

The Black Panther Party's zenith was short lived. As early as August 1967, it was targeted by the FBI's Counter-Intelligence Program (COINTELPRO) for neutralization. The BPP may have posed a political threat to the established mainstream arena by acting as a nucleus around which many New Left organizations could ally themselves, but it did not pose an offensive physical threat to the country. Despite this, in September 1969, J. Edgar Hoover, the director of the Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI), declared that the BPP was a major threat to the domestic security of the United States. The FBI's repression of BPP chapters was nationwide in scope and used a variety of tactics including, but not limited to, manipulating media coverage of the BPP, interrupting the circulation of the Black Panther, disrupting survival programs (especially the Free Breakfast for School Children program), obstructing the creation of political alliances, harassing BPP supporters, creating and intensifying internal BPP conflicts, exacerbating tensions with other political groups, infiltrating chapters, raiding chapter headquarters, preventing due process in the judicial system, and assassinating party members. Moreover, of the 295 counterintelligence operations in 1969, 233 were directed toward crippling the Black Panther Party.

The counterintelligence operations affected chapters throughout the country. In 1969, in San Francisco, California, the FBI office gave fraudulent articles to local Jewish organizations declaring David Hilliard, the National Committee chief of staff, an anti-Semite, causing the organizations to cancel his lecture. On December 4, 1969, using a floor plan created by William O'Neal, an FBI infiltrator and informant, the Chicago police raided Black Panther leader Fred Hampton's home. Although Hampton was unarmed, police killed him with two close range shots to the head.

Throughout the country, FBI operatives convinced grocery stores and supermarkets to stop supporting the Panther's breakfast program, informing managers and owners that the party used the program to disseminate antipolice propaganda to children. Also, parents were told that the party's breakfast food was contaminated and infected with diseases. Further, to create dissension among the chapters, the FBI office in Philadelphia sent a letter to Huey Newton, allegedly from the Philadelphia BPP chapter, questioning his leadership ability. In his published doctoral dissertation, War Against the Panthers (1996), Huey P. Newton noted that COINTELPRO programs "anonymously advised the national headquarters that food, clothing, and drugs collected for BPP community programs were being stolen by [Philadelphia] BPP members (58)." Consequently, the national office transferred and expelled members and considered closing the Philadelphia office.

Besides government-sponsored repression, the party's centralized leadership may have contributed to its demise. After his release from prison in 1970, Huey Newton became the sole authority in party matters from 1970 to 1974. Manipulated by government misinformation, Newton publicly censured and dismissed individuals key to the party's history and political activity including Eldridge Cleaver and the International Section of the Party, members of the Los Angeles chapter, and the entire New York chapter. In 1973, at the behest of Huey Newton, the Black Panther Party moved into the political arena with its attempt to get Bobby Seale elected mayor of Oakland. To ensure his victory, Newton proposed that all state offices close and move to Oakland. With members refusing to submit to his decision, chapters across the country closed in protest and individuals resigned from the party. Some, however, moved to Oakland in 1972 and 1973 to assist in Seale's campaign. When Seale lost the election, many of the transplants lost hope and resigned. With state chapters closed and a failed political election, the party's membership fell to 500. In the summer of 1974, after a vehement disagreement with Huey Newton, Bobby Seale resigned followed by other key members of the deteriorating organization, including Audrea Jones.

From 1974 to 1977 with Huey Newton in exile, Elaine Brown assumed the party's leadership, decentralized power, appointed more women to leadership positions, obtained government funding to operate a school—the Oakland Community School—and ran for public office. Upon Newton's return in 1977 with less than 200 members, Newton again took the mantle of leadership until the party's demise in 1982. With Newton's behavior becoming more erratic, perhaps as a result of substance abuse, survival programs were discontinued, funds were mismanaged, and the party's relationship with the community deteriorated. In 1980, The Black Panther was discontinued and in 1982, the school was closed, marking the end of the exciting and often turbulent organization.

That the Black Panther Party existed demonstrates that the immediate post Civil Rights era was fraught with problems. Despite the passage of civil rights legislation and face-saving rhetoric of politicians, urban black neighborhoods in the late 1960s and early 1970s were facing the conundrum of being politically and economically ignored by policymakers. As young, black revolutionaries, party members and leaders organized to bring about change and provide services refused by city and state governments. Their militancy provided vivid examples for other communities of color and oppressed groups in the United States and throughout the world. From 1968 to 1987, groups inspired by the names, militancy, and program of the BPP were formed. In 1968 the Black Panther movement was organized in England. One year later, black Bermudans formed the Black Beret Cadre. The White Panther Party was organized in England in 1970, the Black Panther Party of Israel in 1971, the Black Panther Party of Australia in 1972, and the Dalit Panthers of India in 1987.

In the late 1990s, there was also an emergence of militant stylized-Panther groups in the United States. The opening decade of the 21st century finds several former Panthers in exile or imprisoned for the political beliefs. A host of biographies of former Panthers have appeared and historical research has been published about the Panthers, but more needs to be done. By studying the Black Panther Party and other New Left militant organizations, not only does one recover dimensions of working class, radical, and African American history that has been elided from historical texts, but one may also ascertain lessons to more effectively organize the growing impoverished masses who inhabit urban communities.

Black Power

Black power refers to a phase or extension of the Civil Rights movement beginning in the period after 1966 when individual activists and organizations began to articulate the need for black political empowerment and self-defense as a means of achieving a variety of goals. In most historical accounts, black power began as a slogan during the James Meredith March Against Fear in June 1966. After Meredith's shooting in Jackson, Mississippi, two activists in the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee (SNCC), Stokely Carmichael (Kwame Ture) and Willie Ricks (Mukasa Dada), used the slogan as an alternative to "We Shall Overcome," which had been an unofficial anthem of the Civil Rights movement. Although this may have been the genesis of the slogan as it became associated with the Civil Rights movement, it was not the first time that African American leaders or activists articulated a need for black empowerment. On the eve of Ghanaian independence, Richard Wright penned his 1954 book entitled Black Power as a reflection on the possibilities of empowerment on the African continent. Both Paul Robeson and Adam Clayton Powell Jr. had articulated the specific need for black power, whereas others, including W. E. B. Du Bois, Malcolm X, Ida B. Wells-Barnett, and Robert F. Williams, epitomized its meaning and ultimate potential in earlier decades.

Pressed for a definition of black power, Kwame Ture, along with political scientist Charles V. Hamilton, published

Black Power: The Politics of Liberation in 1967 as an answer to the many critics of the concept. In essence, Ture defined black power as mobilizing African Americans to use their newfound political voice—as a result of the passage of the 1965 Voting Rights Act—to create semiautonomous communities in which black police officers patrolled black people, black businesses provided jobs, black elected officials and black-controlled political parties articulated the aspirations of African Americans, and African Americans used armed self-defense to protect their lives. Thus, black power can be seen as a "community-control" form of black nationalism. In many ways, this definition of black power was shaped largely by Ture's organizing activities in Lowndes County, Alabama in 1965 where he and other SNCC organizers had helped create the Lowndes County Freedom Organization (LCFO). In a region that was 97 percent African American, voter registration, the creation of an all-black political party (the LCFO), and mass mobilization could potentially lead to a complete take over of the county and, hence, real black empowerment. Using the Black Panther as the symbol of their political party, the LCFO had several candidates vying for political office in the election season of November 1966. Hoping to elect candidates for sheriff, coroner, tax assessor, and in the board of education, all of the LCFO's candidates lost in the general election. Despite this defeat, the idea of community-control black nationalism and the symbol of the Black Panther spread to black communities across the United States.

The example and potential of Lowndes County spread and were articulated by an ever-widening group of individuals and organizations after 1966. Among the many organizations espousing black power that grew between 1967 and 1974 were the Black Panther Party for Self-Defense, SNCC, CORE, the Republic of New Afrika, the Congress of African Peoples, the Deacons for Defense and Justice, and Us. Although these organizations and their leadership differed vastly in goals and tactics, practically all of them were heirs of Malcolm X. In this sense, armed self-defense, as opposed to the nonviolent tactics of Martin Luther King Jr., were generally embraced. Malcolm's life, his many speeches, and his 1965 posthumous autobiography became canonical "texts" for many black power advocates. In addition, Robert F. Williams's Negroes with Guns (1962) and Frantz Fanon's Wretched of the Earth (1961) were quite influential in giving definition and shape to black power. Although the Black Power movement was eventually split between cultural nationalist and socialist factions, the goal of achieving some semblance of black empowerment and autonomy were concepts that all black power activists continued to embrace.

Black Radical Congress

Black Radical Congress (BRC, pronounced "brick") is a progressive grassroots organization that formed in June 1998 at the University of Illinois–Chicago. The BRC was established to revitalize the black freedom movement, which organizers felt had been compromised by liberal integrationists, elitist leaders, and conservative black nationalists. According to its mission statement, the BRC is resolved to build dialogue and alliances, "bringing diverse radical traditions to bear on contemporary realities." At a critical juncture in African American history, the BRC's organizers were determined to forge a liberation agenda for the new millennium. With deteriorating economic conditions, the erosion of civil rights legislation, and an increase in racial violence, the period between the mid-1970s and mid-1990s represented a "new nadir" for black Americans. Yet, although the BRC was a response to the conditions of a specific epoch, it was never intended to be a singular event. In its 11 years of existence, it has served as a national network of radical grassroots activists and organizations. From its inception, it represented a united front determined to construct a new humanity.

The BRC was not meant to replace existing organizations; it was formed to mobilize activists around common concerns. Drawing on the rich tradition of black Marxism, organizers were committed to the creation of an organization that represented the aspirations and interests of the masses. They did not seek to establish a vanguard party run by elites. Organizers also were not interested in creating another reactionary and polemic gathering such as the Million Man March. They did recognize, however, the need for black nationalists, socialists, communists, and feminists to work together to resuscitate the liberation movement. For the BRC's founders, this required the recognition of the interdependence of race-based, class-based, and gender-based oppression. The interconnectedness of these oppressive forces had been long ignored by those leading the liberation movement. This comprehensive approach to liberation was represented by the diverse backgrounds of the more than 100 individuals who endorsed the creation of the BRC. They included Larry Adams (Mailhandlers Local 300), General Baker (auto worker), Amina Baraka (Communist Party, USA), Adolph Reed (Labor Party, Chicago), Yicki Smith (Feminist Action Network), and Makungu Akinyela and Efia Nwangaza (Malcolm X Grassroots Movement). These radical activists were joined by prominent black scholars including Angela Davis, Dwight Hopkins, Robin D. J. Kelly, Manning Marable, and Cornel West.

A year after the BRC convened, its national council ratified a 15-point "Freedom Agenda for the Twenty-First Century." This document stipulated:

- I. We will fight for the human rights of Black people and all people;
- II. We will fight for political democracy;
- III. We will fight to advance beyond capitalism, which has demonstrated its structural incapacity to address basic human needs worldwide and, in particular, the needs of black people;
- IV. We will fight to end the super-exploitation of southern workers;
- V. We will struggle to ensure that all people in society receive free public education;
- VI. We will struggle against state terrorism;
- VII. We will struggle for a clean and healthy environment;
- VIII. We will fight to abolish police brutality, unwarranted incarceration, and the death penalty;
- IX. We will fight for gender equality, for women's liberation, and for women's rights to be recognized as human rights in all areas of personal, social, economic, and political life;
- X. We recognize lesbian, gay, bisexual, and transgender people as full and equal members of society and of our communities;
- XI. We support affirmative action;
- XII. We will fight for reparations;
- XIII. We will struggle to build multicultural solidarity and alliances among all people of color;
- XIV. We will uphold the right of the African American people to self-determination;
- XV. We support the liberation struggles of all oppressed people.

In 2003, the BRC celebrated its fifth anniversary with a conference at Seton Hall University. The objectives of the conference were to build a movement for peace and justice and to resist repressive domestic policies such as the PATRIOT Act. Chaired by activist Bill Sales, this conference included presenters from Africa, the Middle East, the Caribbean, and Latin America. In June 2008, the BRC convened a 10th Anniversary National Conference. Michael Eric Dyson opened the conference with a presentation on "Electoral Politics in the Struggle for Black Political Power." Continuing the commitment to a comprehensive approach to liberation, workshops included "Black People and the Iraq War," "In Search of a Black Gay Agenda," "Radicalizing the Hip-Hop Political Movement," "Gettin' the Vote Out: The Radical Approach," and "Black Liberation and Student Organizing." Plenary sessions assessed the BRC's past 10 years and developed a direction and strategy for the next 10 years. Despite changes in its programmatic structure and leadership, as outcomes of the plenary discussions, the BRC remains steadfast in its commitment to organizing a critical mass of black radicals to effect meaningful economic, political, and social change.

Black Self-Defense

Black self-defense against racist violence has played a significant role throughout the history of the African American freedom struggle. Those who attempted to protect themselves or their communities against white aggression, however, generally faced overwhelming odds. In the antebellum South, rigid Slave Codes forbade black bondsmen to carry weapons, and confronting white masters was mortally dangerous. The end of slavery in 1865 and subsequent Constitutional Amendments finally granted all African Americans the right to bear arms, and a large number of former slaves used their newly acquired guns to fight terrorist groups such as the Ku Klux Klan. But black self-defense, which conjured up deep-seated fears of armed insurrection among white southerners, remained a dangerous venture. When armed blacks confronted exploitative employers, white lynch mobs, or abusive police officers in the 1880s and 1890s, their militancy tended to result in swift retaliation against individuals or entire black communities.

In the 1910s and 1920s, a number of militant black activists practiced and publicly advocated self-defense against racist terrorism. In the aftermath of World War I, for example, when numerous race riots rocked American cities, some black veterans used their army training to repel white invaders. Black nationalist leaders Marcus Garvey and Cecil Briggs applauded such examples of black militancy and urged their followers to confront white aggression. World War II further politicized and radicalized African American activists. Between 1942 and 1943, hundreds of racial clashes erupted in cities across the United States. Especially black veterans frequently resorted to armed actions when confronted with racist attackers upon their return to the United States. Still, armed resistance to white violence remained risky, especially in the Deep South, where white supremacy continued to reign supreme.

That changed during the civil rights struggle of the 1950s and 1960s, when organized black self-defense sparked less brutal repercussions and frequently complemented civil rights campaigns in the region. NAACP activist Robert F. Williams emerged as an early proponent of "armed self-reliance." In 1957, the black military veteran founded a black self-defense organization in Monroe, North Carolina to protect the local freedom movement against the revived Ku Klux Klan. Around the same time, a group called the "The Civil Rights Guards" prevented dynamite attacks against the church of local civil rights leader Rev. Fred Shuttlesworth in Birmingham, Alabama, and armed men in Little Rock, Arkansas formed a "volunteer guard committee" to protect the home of NAACP officer Daisy Bates.

When civil rights activists launched massive nonviolent protest campaigns and voter registration drives in the Deep South in the 1960s, the federal government's reluctance to provide protection led to the formation of several black protection agencies. Their armed actions helped local freedom movements survive in the face of white violence, bolstered the morale of civil rights activists, instilled pride in black protectors, and sometimes served as an additional means of coercion in the fight against Jim Crow. In the summer of 1964, for example, black military veterans in Tuscaloosa, Alabama, organized a highly sophisticated defense squad that guarded nonviolent activists and their white allies. During the Freedom Summer project of 1964, some black Mississippians formed similar groups to repel segregationist attacks on their communities.

That same year, blacks in Jonesboro, Louisiana formed the Deacons for Defense and Justice (DDJ). The armed unit patrolled black neighborhoods, provided armed escorts for white and black activists, and guarded the offices of the Congress of Racial Equality (CORE). In 1965, African American activists formed another DDJ group in Bogalusa, Louisiana, achieving nationwide notoriety after shootouts with the Ku Klux Klan. Although such protective efforts generated frequent debates about their legitimacy among nonviolent activists, many civil rights organizers of CORE and the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee (SNCC) came to accept black self-defense as a matter of course.

Southern self-defense groups had disbanded by the end of the 1960s, but black self-defense remained a vital part of the Black Power movement, but it played a fundamentally different role and underwent a process of radical reinterpretation. In contrast to their southern peers, black power militants rarely engaged in armed confrontations with segregationist attackers. Rather black self-defense became a militant symbol of black defiance, which served primarily as a means to affirm and nurture black manhood. As early as 1961, black nationalist leader Malcolm X had denounced Martin Luther King's nonviolent philosophy as unmanly, urging African Americans to repel white attacks. In the aftermath of the James Meredith March of 1966, during which SNCC activist Stokely Carmichael first voiced the slogan black power, an increasing number of black activists heeded his advice.

The most prominent example of this new type of armed militancy was the Black Panther Party (BPP). Founded in Oakland, California in 1966, the BPP initially regarded its armed patrols in urban black communities as a way to confront police brutality. Ultimately, however, the Panthers and other black nationalist groups such as US or the Republic of New Africa reinterpreted traditional concepts of self-defense, arguing that race riots and revolutionary violence constituted a legitimate form of self-defense to confront white supremacy. Despite the largely symbolic nature of black power militancy, the Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI) considered black power militants a threat to the nation's security, launching a massive counterintelligence program to disrupt their activities. By the mid-1970s, militant groups such as the Panthers had either succumbed to the FBI's destructive tactics or toned down their violent rhetoric.

Black Star Line

Incorporated by Marcus Garvey in 1919, the Black Star Line of Delaware was a steamship company founded as an economic venture supported by the Universal Negro Improvement Association (UNIA). The company owned three ships at its height and was working on purchasing a fourth. Despite an enthusiastic response among people of color throughout several countries, the shipping line failed as a result of poor financial management, internal subversion, and the eventual arrest of Garvey on charges of mail fraud.

Garvey believed economic development among African Americans was critical for overcoming white oppression. He saw the Black Star line as an opportunity for African Americans to manage their own business venture, employ and serve persons of color, and offer financial investment opportunities. Shares of the company's stock originally sold for $5 apiece and could not be purchased by whites. Garvey assured investors they would see near boundless returns.

In September 1919, the company purchased its first ship, the Yarmouth, for $165,000. Garvey initially hired an African American as captain, although he would later be dismissed for dishonesty and replaced by a white captain. On its voyages the Yarmouth, unofficially dubbed the Frederick Douglass, was received with large displays of enthusiasm both in American ports and in places like Cuba, Jamaica, and Panama. It hauled several loads of cargo, including cement, fertilizer, logwood, a botched cargo of coconuts, and a hasty shipment of whisky before the enactment of Prohibition laws. In all the Yarmouth made three voyages to the West Indies before being sold by the U.S. government in November 1921 for $1,625 to repay several of Garvey's creditors.

The second addition to the Black Star Line was a passenger excursion boat, planned for trips along the Hudson River, called the Shadyside. Garvey purchased the boat in April 1920 for $35,000. After completing the summer excursion season, the Shadyside docked for the winter at which time it sprang a leak and sank during an ice storm.

In May 1920, the Kanawha, a converted yacht unofficially dubbed the Antonio Maceo, was purchased for $65,000. When it set sail up the Hudson in June 1920, it blew a boiler, killing one employee. Because of continued mechanical problems, the ship would not leave for the West Indies until March 1921. This voyage was plagued by continual mechanical failures, some only hours apart. The crew, through either neglect, incompetence, or sabotage, had a hand in the continued breakdowns. The ship was abandoned in Antilla, Cuba, where it remained for many years, being stripped of anything of value and sinking into the ocean.

The Black Star Line entered negotiations to purchase a fourth ship, to be dubbed the Phyllis Wheatley, intended for passage and trade to Africa. Several ships were pursued to this end, but negotiations stalled out on each. A down payment was made on the Hong Kheng, but the ship was never delivered. Offers were also made to the U.S. Shipping Board for the Porto Rico and the Orion, the latter of which was to be sold to Garvey's company for $200,000. Once the terms of purchase were arranged, Garvey proceeded to place advertisements for the ship's maiden voyage and collect $8,900 in fares from prospective passengers. Unfortunately, the agent handling the purchase, as well as others, misappropriated the organization's funds and the down payment for the ship was not met in full. Ultimately, the shipping board decided not to sell the ship to the Black Star Line based on its inability to pay, Garvey's arrest, and several financial claims against the company. The money offered as a partial down payment was tied up in court claims until March 1929 when the U.S. Senate ruled the court of claims could decide on creditor's claims against the company. The Orion was scrapped in 1930 for less than $28,000.

In April 1922 the initial Black Star Line of Delaware was a financial catastrophe and was suspended. By March 1924, however, Garvey had announced a new Black Cross Navigation and Trading Company. Under new auspices, Garvey purchased the General Goethals, unofficially dubbed the Booker T. Washington, for $100,000. This money was again raised by selling stock, and Garvey claimed that 90 percent of the investors were previous Black Star Line stockholders. The General Goethals made one voyage to Cuba, Panama, and Jamaica, which was plagued by many of the same problems of the Black Star Line's ships. In June 1925, the ship docked in New York where it would later be sold to help repay debts.

There is some debate as to who is responsible for the ultimate demise of the UNIA's steamship line ventures. Garvey purchased ships in seemingly poor repair for inflated amounts. He and his subordinates had little knowledge of the industry, and losses and delays were often related to poor contract negotiations or mishandling of business protocol. Outside sources of decline came from the company's explicit enemies, such as the Chicago Defender and other publications denouncing the shipping line. Government organizations, such as the FBI, may also have had a hand in the demise of the Black Star Line. Yet many believe that the most significant cause of the company's failure was the underhanded practices of its employees. The financial ruin exacted by theft, sabotage, and negligence was defeating.

In spite of commercial interest in the company, Garvey's Black Star Line was never able to achieve its goals of economic development among peoples of color owing to a number of undermining factors.

Bloody Sunday

Bloody Sunday was a brutal attack by members of the Alabama state and local police (using tear gas, nightsticks, and bull whips) on 300 predominantly African American civil rights marchers that took place Sunday, March 7, 1965 in Selma, Alabama.

Bloody Sunday took place within the larger context of the African American freedom struggle that has been ongoing before, during, and since the 1960s. Although African Americans were guaranteed the right to vote long before the 1960s, through the Fifteenth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution ratified March 30, 1870, southern states instituted a series of state and local restrictions abridging African American civil rights as bolstered by the Supreme Court decision in Plessy v. Ferguson (1896). The Plessy decision upheld the doctrine of "separate but equal," as well as the power of state and local agencies to maintain and regulate under the guise of their "police power" segregation policies also called "Jim Crow" laws. In keeping with a longstanding "organizing tradition," African Americans created self-help agencies and civil rights organizations such as the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP) in 1909, the National Urban League (NUL) in 1911, and the Congress of Racial Equality in 1942 to combat restrictions placed on black civil rights. Voting rights were of a particular concern to African Americans because many southern municipalities adopted obstacles that prevented African Americans from voting, such as the grandfather clause, the poll tax, and the literacy test through the turn of the century.

Jim Crow laws were accompanied by regular acts of violence and brutality against African Americans. An estimated 82 percent of the lynchings that took place in the United States between 1890 and 1900 occurred in the American South, with an average of more than 150 lynchings per year. In the first decade of the 20th century (1900–1910), the percentage of lynchings taking place in the South increased by more than 10 percent. Although African Americans were not the only group made subject to lynching, they were certainly the chief victims in overwhelming numbers. In response to continuous violence, disenfranchisement, and segregation in public facilities, African Americans challenged such measures through “sit-down” campaigns in the 1940s to boycotts and marching in the 1950s. The Civil Rights movement expanded and became a mass movement through the 1950s and 1960s to include such organizations as the Southern Christian Leadership Conference created in 1957 and the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee in (SNCC) established by black student activists in 1960. Representatives from the aforementioned civil rights organizations felt it necessary to cross the Edmund Pettus Bridge in Selma, Alabama in 1965 to secure voting rights for African Americans.

Although the collective activism of African Americans secured important gains between 1960 and 1965, such as the Civil Rights Act of 1964, which guaranteed equal access to jobs and public facilities, 26 civil rights workers were killed during this time period, and there was no major voting rights legislation in place to guarantee black voting rights. Martin Luther King Jr. (1929–1968) declared that the first important civil right was the right to vote and actively incorporated voting rights as a central issue into his civil rights campaigns beginning in the period between 1963 and 1965. From 1960 to 1965, SNCC students organized several voter registration projects (including the Freedom Summer of 1964) in places such as Mississippi and Alabama in an effort to increase the number of African American registered voters across the South. Only 1 percent of the black population eligible to vote in Mississippi was registered to vote before 1965; about 2 percent of the black population eligible to vote in Alabama before 1965 was registered to vote. Thus, African American civil rights activists such as John Lewis of SNCC along with Hosea Williams and eventually Martin Luther King Jr. decided to surmount a voter’s rights demonstration in Selma, Alabama in the spring of 1965. These individuals sought to bring attention to the problems of disenfranchisement, segregation, and vigilantism (African American Jimmy Lee Jackson was shot on February 18, 1965 by an Alabama police officer) on the part of whites in Selma by organizing a 54-mile trek on U.S. highway 80 across the Edmund Pettus Bridge toward Montgomery, Alabama to demand redress for their grievances.

Bloody Sunday occurred as John Lewis and Hosea Williams led 300 marchers across the Edmund Pettus Bridge on March 7, 1965. The marchers were charged by 200 state and local police officers wielding clubs in the form of nightsticks. John Lewis was beaten bloody to the ground. Five women marchers were beaten unconscious. Ultimately, several marchers were attacked and bludgeoned senseless. Seventeen marchers were hospitalized including civil rights organizer Amelia Boynton Robinson who was almost gassed to death. That this incident was televised and people around the United States were able to see scenes of defenseless marchers attacked by police officials brought national support to the movement. Martin Luther King Jr. called for a continuation of the march on March 9, but decided instead to hold a short ceremonial march to the Edmund Pettus Bridge then turn around until a court order was secured. A white Unitarian minister, James Reeb from Boston, who came to Alabama to join the second march, was attacked the same day by an angry mob and died on March 11. After Reeb’s death, a federal judge ruled in favor of Martin Luther King Jr. and SCLC. The number of marchers completing the journey on March 25, 1965 eventually increased to an estimated 25,000.

Bloody Sunday led to the signing of the Voting Rights Act of 1965. This act invalidated any test or device to deny voting, including a poll tax, literacy test, and grandfather clause, and allowed federal examiners to enter states to ensure the registration of African Americans in any state with a history of discrimination. “And we shall overcome,” stated President Lyndon Baines Johnson in a speech supporting access to the franchise for African Americans following “Bloody Sunday.”

Bombingham

In 1963, Martin Luther King Jr. referred to Birmingham, Alabama as the most segregated city in the United States. To the city’s African American residents, it was simply “Bombingham,” a place where they had suffered decades of reactionary violence, police brutality, and political emasculation. The city had earned such a sobriquet because of its high frequency of racially motivated bombings—no less than 50 between 1947 and 1965—and because its elected officials did little to impede the carnage. Nearly everyone who lived in or visited Birmingham in the years before the Civil Rights movement noted its oppressive climate and its glaring lack of concern for basic human rights. And it was for these reasons that King and the Southern Christian Leadership Conference (SCLC) targeted the city for their 1963 campaign, thus transforming Birmingham into the main battleground in the postwar struggle for civil rights.

Birmingham was founded in the 1870s, a scion of America's postwar industrial boom. By 1900, thousands of working class whites and blacks called the city home, daily plying their trade in the iron and steel mills that dotted the bleak urban landscape. Few of the business and industrial leaders who controlled the local economy actually resided in Birmingham. Rather, they managed its affairs from New York or Pennsylvania, or they settled in the "over the mountain" communities of Mountain Brook, Homewood, and Vestavia Hills. Hence, the city's political power structure was controlled by working and lower-middle class whites, who composed a majority of the population and who enjoyed all the economic advantages residing with their race. African Americans made up about 40 percent of the population by the late 1950s, yet fewer than 20 percent could cast a vote. A majority of the black populace lived at or below the poverty level, and only a handful worked in trades not classified as unskilled or menial. A strict system of segregation determined the parameters of social interaction between the two races. And if blacks ever endeavored to step beyond the narrow confines of Jim Crow, whites would often react with violence.

After World War II, racial tensions escalated to unprecedented levels in Birmingham. Because of a postwar housing shortage in the city, African American families began moving into residences that either bordered on, or rested in, historically white neighborhoods such as North Smithfield (an area later designated as Dynamite Hill). This not only violated segregated housing ordinances, it drew the ire of working class whites who wanted to maintain the racial integrity of their communities. As a result, there were a number of black residences bombed by night-riding vigilantes in the latter half of the 1940s. The Birmingham Police Department, headed by public safety commissioner Eugene

"Bull" Connor, failed to adequately investigate the attacks, much less arrest those responsible. Consequently, members of the African American community responded to the lack of police protection by posting armed guards in front of their homes and began conducting nightly neighborhood patrols. Their actions probably saved dozens of homes from destruction. But the conflict raged on.

After the 1954 Brown decision, racial animosities heightened all over the city. This time, vigilantes began targeting civil rights activists, like the Reverend Fred Shuttlesworth, who headed the Alabama Christian Movement for Human Rights. Twice, in 1956 and 1962, terrorists bombed Shuttlesworth's church, Bethel Baptist, coming close to killing the fearless minister. Similar bombings targeted the homes of Attorney Arthur Shores, A. G. Gaston, and A. D. King, the brother of Martin Luther King. In September 1957, Shuttlesworth and his wife were attacked by a mob when they attempted to integrate Phillips High School. Shuttlesworth was severely lashed with bicycle chains and brass knuckles in the melee, and his wife received a stab wound to the hip. In May 1961, Klansmen, with Bull Connor's full blessing, savagely assaulted a busload of Freedom Riders in the downtown Trailways station. Photographs of the attack ran in newspapers around the world, shocking the international community and convincing many Birmingham businessmen that the continued maintenance of white supremacy was both impractical and immoral.

In the spring of 1963, King and the SCLC conducted widespread demonstrations in Birmingham, hoping, among other things, to end discriminatory hiring practices in downtown businesses, desegregate public facilities, and integrate the local school system. The campaign was only marginally successful in Birmingham itself, but eventually influenced Congress and the White House to pass the Civil Rights Act of 1964.

The situation in Birmingham, however, seemed as volatile as ever. On September 15, 1963, days after area schools were desegregated, a bomb was detonated outside the Sixteenth Street Baptist Church, resulting in the deaths of four black children. Withdrawing into their familiar roles, local and state police did little to nab those responsible for the blast. In fact, it was not until the late 1970s that one of the bombers, Robert Chambliss, was brought to justice. More than two decades after Chambliss's conviction, two of his accomplices, Bobby Frank Cherry and Thomas Blanton, were tried and found guilty for their roles in the attack.

Finally, and mercifully, Birmingham could begin the process of healing.

BPP, Chicago Branch

Founded in late 1967, the Chicago Illinois Branch of the Black Panther Party (C-BPP) was organized by Bob Brown and Bobby Rush. The C-BPP propagated itself through community service projects, weekly political education classes, and rallies. In November 1968, the C-BPP welcomed Fred Hampton (1948–1969). Hampton, a native Chicagoan, quickly became the C-BPP most recognized member. Following Hampton's lead, the C-BPP became an undeniable regional force. In May 1969, Hampton coordinated a non-aggression pact among Chicago gangs. Hampton termed the multihued and politically diverse groups a "rainbow coalition." The teen-age BPP leader eventually assumed the BPP Illinois chapter chairman position. The chairman's position carried with it an ancillary spot as national-level deputy chairman on the BPP policymaking Central Committee. Hampton's ascension to the Central Committee made him a target of the Federal Bureau of Investigation's (FBI) "Counter Intelligence Program" (COINTELPRO).

Hampton was clearly the most charismatic and intelligent of the BPP leadership cadre. FBI Director J. Edgar Hoover acknowledged Hampton's voluminous abilities in bureau memoranda by vowing to prevent his development into a "Black Messiah" capable of politicizing and unifying divergent revolutionary and gang-affiliated blacks. Ongoing surveillance solidified FBI leaders' belief that drastic measures—wiretaps, fraudulent letters, and agent provocateurs—were needed to subdue Hampton.

Indicative of the importance Hampton held within the late-1960s protest scene was the FBI's creation of a "Racial Matters" squad to coordinate attacks against the C-BPP. Plans began with the introduction of agent provocateurs. Central to bureau plans was William O'Neal. O'Neal came under FBI control as he sought to avoid incarceration for pending charges of interstate car theft and impersonation of a federal officer. Once inside the C-BPP, O'Neal swiftly rose through the ranks. O'Neal, who would become the Bureau's most active agent provocateur, became the C-BPP director of security.

Rationalizing that the C-BPP vulnerability would increase exponentially if it was isolated from its activist peers, FBI agents attacked the "Rainbow Coalition" via myriad activities. For example, "Racial Matters" agents dispensed bogus correspondence to Black Stone Ranger leader Jeff Fort detailing an imminent C-BPP assassination attempt. Agents hoped that Fort would take retaliatory action against the C-BPP; when Fort did not fall for such bait, Bureau agents ordered informant O'Neal to instigate the conflict. O'Neal accomplished this goal on April 2, 1969. As a result of FBI operations, Hampton's "Rainbow Coalition" was decimated.

Amazingly, the Chicago Police Department's (CPD) repression was more blatant than their FBI brethren. Indicative of such aggression was an attack on the C-BPP Monroe Street office. The Monroe Street attack was particularly egregious because of officers' deliberate destruction of C-BPP supplies earmarked for the needy. Incredibly, law enforcement officers set fire to areas storing food and medical supplies, brutally attacked and arrested those present, and as a final insult boarded up the C-BPP office. Toward resisting such blatant attempts of intimidation, Panther Chairman Bobby Seale ordered the office reopened. Impressively, black Chicagoans donated supplies and personnel to the cause. The C-BPP refusal to fold forced "Racial Matters" agents to increase their pursuit of Hampton.

Toward securing a permanent solution to their C-BPP problem, William O'Neal's FBI contacts stepped up communications. O'Neal was ordered to build a criminal case against the C-BPP leader. Despite his best attempts, Hampton was above all criminality. The C-BPP leader, however, did transgress the law on one occasion. Hampton offered opponents a proverbial sword when he stole $72 worth of ice cream as a treat for neighborhood children. Officers pounced on this transgression and arranged for Hampton to be given a two- to five-year prison sentence for the trivial transgression. Hampton, however, was released after several weeks on an appeal bond. Hampton's release solidified opponents' belief that a permanent solution was needed. Toward accomplishing said goals, FBI agents began making specific requests of Agent Provocateur William O'Neal. O'Neal was ordered to provide a detailed map of Hampton's dwelling and provide officers with a legitimate reason to raid the dwelling. O'Neal accomplished both goals with the desired map and information that Hampton's dwelling was used to store the C-BPP weapons caches. Armed with this information, a coalition of FBI agents, state, and local law enforcement officials created a plan to assassinate Hampton. The assassination was set for December 4, 1969, and included myriad elements such as C-BPP head of security William O'Neal who was set to play a critical role in the operation.

After teaching a political education class on the evening of December 3, Hampton retired to his West Monroe Street dwelling. Informant O'Neal had prepared a late dinner for the arriving Panthers. After serving dinner, O'Neal exited the residence. Hampton retired to his bedroom and telephoned his mother. Strangely, an unusually exhausted Hampton drifted into a slumber mid-sentence. At approximately 4:00 A.M. a platoon of 14 officers assembled outside of Hampton's apartment. At 4:45 A.M. officers stormed the building. A slumbering Mark Clark was discovered in a front room. Officer's killed the young Panther instantly; Clark, who was on security detail, had his shotgun discharge after it fell from his lifeless grip. Officers immediately directed their bullets toward the room that O'Neal's map had listed as Hampton's bedroom. Satisfied that no one could have survived their savage attack, officers ceased fire and began their search for what they hoped was Hampton's lifeless body. Hampton, who never stirred from his slumber, was struck in the shoulder. Subsequent coroner reports would indicate that Hampton was drugged with secobarbital, a powerful barbiturate; all indicators point toward William O'Neal as the source of the drugging. A frightened Deborah Johnson, Hampton's visibly pregnant fiancée, was ordered from the room by raiding officers. Johnson alleged overhearing a disturbing discussion among the raiders. He charged that one officer answered fellow officers' inquiries regarding Hampton's status with the comment that "he is barely alive." Moments later, two additional shots were discharged. Autopsy reports detail that Hampton had two shots to the back of his head. Raiding officers cryptically mused that "he is good and dead now." After murdering Hampton, raiding officers sprayed the remaining rooms with bullets and beat surviving Panthers before arresting them for aggravated assault and attempted murder. The arrested Panthers would be held on $100,000 bail.

CPD leaders and public officials initially praised officers for their restraint while simultaneously blaming the Panthers for the horrific incident. Only the rallying of progressive-minded Chicagoans, a congressional investigation, and inquisitive reporters would unearth irrefutable proof that Hampton and Clark had been executed. Ballistics experts proved that of the 100 shots fired, only one came from the C-BPP. That particular salvo was discharged from Mark Clark's shotgun. Despite their obvious culpability in the murders, the raiding officers were never prosecuted. The estates of Fred Hampton and Mark Clark would be given a monetary settlement a decade after the incident. Unfortunately, there was no one capable of replicating Fred Hampton's leadership, charisma, and intelligence within the C-BPP. Consequently, the C-BPP drifted into nonexistence. See also: Black Panther Party; COINTELPRO; Hampton, Fred

BPP, Los Angeles Branch

The Los Angeles branch of the Southern California chapter of the Black Panther Party was founded in February 1968. Eager to expand Panther operations, Eldridge Cleaver authorized Alprentice Bunchy Carter and Earl Anthony to launch a chapter in Los Angeles. Within a month, the two men (mainly Bunchy) had organized 20 men. Most of the recruits came from the Teen Post, an antipoverty program where Bunchy worked as a counselor. Before long the Panthers were the largest militant group in Los Angeles. Aside from Carter and Anthony, others who helped build the chapter were Raymond “Masai” Hewitt, Gwen Goodloe, Elaine Brown, John and Erika Huggins, and Elmer “Geronimo” Pratt. Pratt had been a member of the Army’s 82nd Airborne division and was a decorated Vietnam veteran instrumental in training members of the chapter in combat readiness. Goodloe, Brown, and Erika Huggins were instrumental in putting in place most of the Panthers’ survival programs. Masai Hewitt, the well-read street scholar set up the chapter’s weekly political education classes, an activity mandated by the national headquarters in Oakland.

The Los Angeles outpost had several offices, making it was one of the largest in the organization. Among the people the Panthers attracted were gang members, dropouts, ex-servicemen, runaways, men and women who lived on the streets, and black youth looking to get involved politically for the first time in their lives. The chapter was composed of three groups: the sociopolitical element, the military, and the underground. The sociopolitical element worked closely with the community. This group was primarily responsible for putting the survival programs in place; they did the day-to-day grunt work that was necessary to meet the needs of the people. The military sector consisted of the chapters’ foot soldiers. They acquired weaponry and trained members in warfare in preparation of the impending revolution. The underground, composed of small cell units, were hardened street types that would do whatever needed to be done for the organization in the name of the revolution. The underground consisted of only those men that Bunchy knew and could trust, men that he had seen fight in the mean streets of LA, men who had been tested—some of whom by him. The underground had its own ethics. For example, it did not rob individuals, it robbed institutions. Bunchy kept the identities of the underground members from the general body for obvious and strategic reasons. For instance, if authorities interrogated someone outside of the underground, he or she could only reveal limited information.

It took the Panthers almost two years to set up its community survival programs. The Panthers were able to serve free dinners from time to time, but not with any regularity because they had no access to a proper facility and, more important, because much of their funds were being used for legal fees, medical treatment for those beaten when arrested, parking fines, and impounded vehicles. Although the Panthers were slow in setting up their survival programs, they were still active in the community. One of the Panthers’ more substantive efforts involved ridding the community of drugs. Indeed, the one thing that shop owners and other residents noticed shortly after the party opened its office on Central Avenue was that drug activity waned. Before the Panthers arrived, drug pushers peddled their wares openly. Determined to make the neighborhood safe, the Panthers set out to run the pushers out of the community. Those who ignored the Panthers’ appeals were either shaken down until they left on their own accord or were driven out by force.

By 1969, the Panthers were finally able to launch the first of three free breakfast programs. Garnering support for the program proved more difficult than the Panthers had expected. Hundreds of letters were sent to retail and wholesale stores, requesting supplies; the response was dismal. Undeterred, the Panthers came up with a plan. The convinced officials at UCLA’s dining halls to donate its left-over items instead of discarding them at the end of each day. The first breakfast program was established in early 1969 at the University Seventh Day Adventists Church, much to the chagrin of the congregation. Despite the parishioners’ uneasiness about the Panthers, the Panthers were allowed to use the facility with one stipulation—that no meat be served. Realizing that for many people breakfast is not a complete meal without meat, the Panthers discovered vegeburgers and passed them off as sausages. Dozens of children ranging in age from 3 to 14 were served daily. Among the other Panther offerings included a free clinic, a busing-to-prisons program that catered to black families that did not have the means to visit their loved ones who were often incarcerated in facilities that were hundreds of miles outside the city.

Because of the Panthers’ strong community ties, they were able to expand throughout the state. Over the course of a few years Panther offices were set up in Bakersfield, Riverside, Santa Barbara, Pomona, Pacoima, Pasadena, and San Diego. As the Panther operation grew, so did the attacks on them.

No chapter or branch suffered more casualties than did the LA Panthers. Bunchy and John Huggins were killed by members of a rival black organization. Tommy Lewis,

Steve Bartholomew, and Robert Lawrence were shot and killed by police officers at a local gas station in August 1968. Several other Panthers were murdered, the circumstances of which remain mysterious. Panther offices were frequently raided. Given the assault launched against the LA cohort, it is amazing that more Panthers were not killed. Although in a state of siege, Panthers were able to put in place a set of programs that were designed to increase poor people's lot. Although the chapter was obviously unable to uplift the entire black community, many lives were touched by the Panthers' efforts. Not only were people impacted by the breakfast programs, the free clothing giveaways, and the free tuberculosis testing, but both the black and white communities were affected by the example set by the Panthers. See also: Black Panther Party; Brown, Elaine; Cleaver, Eldridge; Pratt, Geronimo Ji-Jaga; US Organization

BPP, New York Branch

The New York branch of the Black Panther Party (BPP) existed in Albany, Buffalo, Mount Vernon, Peekskill, and New York City (Brooklyn—its birthplace—the Bronx, Corona, Harlem, Jamaica, and Washington Heights). They were involved in the community from its earliest stages. The New York branch called for a school boycott in Harlem if the educational institutions did not teach heritage and provide better education in addition to hiring black principals. They also supported Ocean Hill-Brownsville's quest for neighborhood-controlled schools. The Panthers outlined goals including becoming a political force by 1968, indicating that the BPP in New York existed earlier than that year. Breakfast programs for children and a health clinic operated in a Brooklyn community center, developed by Panthers.

By 1969, the New York branch was responsible for a third of the national weekly circulation of The Black Panther newspaper for a period of time, sending $13,000 to headquarters at one point. The New York Panthers wanted (1) a larger portion of the newspaper profits to benefit the local communities and (2) to continue advocating for better housing and schools. They embraced adopting African names, as many members worked with black nationalists or had backgrounds in such organizations. Their cultural orientation conflicted with the changing ideology of the BPP headquarters. These differences became more evident when headquarters sent reinforcements to the New York branch, after many of their leaders had been arrested. Larry Neal, education director for the New York branch, outlined numerous incidents of police harassment, so the arrests were only a matter of time.

Twenty-one Black Panther members were charged with conspiracy to bomb Penn Station, Morrisania police station, department stores, and the Bronx Botanical Gardens. Because many of the first 16 who were arrested on April 2, 1969 were leaders in the New York branch, this was the beginning of the end. Zayd-Malik Shakur (deputy minister of information), Joan Bird (a nursing student at Bronx Community College), Dr. Curtis Powell (a biochemist at Columbia Presbyterian Medical Center), and Rose-land Bennett, among others, described their arrest in The Black Panther over the subsequent two years. Bail for most of them was set at $100,000 and ads requesting bail money for those arrested ran in The Black Panther in April 1969. Donations were to be sent to Brooklyn. In later months, however, the ads requesting financial support for the Panther 21 included addresses in both Brooklyn and Berkeley, California.

The Panther 21 also included Afeni Shakur (a section leader and the mother of Tupac Shakur), Dhoruba Bin Wahad (section leader), and Sekou Odinga (Bronx section leader). Ms. Shakur had joined the Black Panther Party after hearing Bobby Seale speak. She noted that meeting Odinga and Lumumba Shakur was life-changing, as they were men who respected women. She was released in January 1970; Bin Wahad, Michael (Cetewayo) Tabor, and Joan Bird were released on bail a few months later. By 1971, there were 13 defendants of the original 21 on trial facing 156 charges. All were found not guilty and released in that year.

The New York branch had grown increasingly dispirited with the national headquarters. Not only had they struggled with losses related to the Panther 21, but also other resources such as arson of the Jamaica chapter's building in October 1970. By 1971, the Panther 21 were purged from the BPP, in addition to the New York branch. In February of that year, some East Coast chapters announced in Harlem that Huey Newton and David Hilliard should be expelled from the BPP. They went further by attributing legitimate leadership to Eldridge Cleaver, Kathleen Cleaver, and Donald Cox (all of whom represented the International Section in Algeria), as well as Bobby Seale who was in prison at the time. The FBI forged a letter suggesting that the New York branch and Cleaver were orchestrating Newton's death.

The Newton/Cleaver rift escalated and was played out in New York City. The New York branch demanded accountability after Robert Webb's (former bodyguard for Newton) description of Newton's extravagances and drug use. Webb was killed in Harlem in March 1971; Donald Cox believed that the murder was Newton's revenge for Cox's support of Cleaver. The New York branch received another forged FBI letter intimating the same fate for others affiliated with Cleaver. The next month, The Black Panther office was burned and the body of Sam Napier, circulation manager of the newspaper, was found. Napier's tortured death was seen as retaliation for Webb's death. The New York branch began to publish Right On because The Black Panther was seen as Newton's outlet; publication of Right On ceased in 1974. When police began arresting Cleaver-affiliated Panthers en-masse, the New York branch suspected that Newton had been cooperating with law enforcement. The BPP on the East Coast began looking for other options by which to serve the community.

Many members of the New York branch became involved with the Black Liberation Army (BLA) and/or the Republic of New Africa. The BLA was considered the armed force of the BPP. In the late 1990s, former New York Panthers organized the Black Panther Collective, designed to carry out the mission and purpose of the New York branch of the Black Panther Party.

BPP, Oakland Branch

The Black Panther Party (BPP) was created October 15, 1966, in Oakland, California, by Merritt Junior College students Huey P. Newton and Bobby Seale. The BPP offered a revolutionary alternative to traditional civil rights tactics, strategies, and goals. Inspired by the revolutionary nationalist theory of Malcolm X, the BPP spiritual and intellectual father, Newton and Seale intended to extend his legacy to its next logical step—revolution. Informing the BPP ideological underpinnings was an international base of political theoreticians and revolutionaries: Frantz Fanon, Mao Tse-Tung, Robert F. Williams, Malcolm X, Fidel Castro, and Che Guevara. Such theory enabled the BPP to avoid oversimplified nationalist doctrines in favor of a Marxist-Leninist politic.

Armed with a ten-point platform of largely reformist wants and goals—housing, full employment, relevant education—Newton and Seale attempted to recruit local collegians, but they were unconditionally rebuffed. Undaunted by such refusal, the Panther's turned toward the lumpen proletariat. To the BPP dismay, marginalized African Americans were equally resistant to their recruitment efforts.

The aforementioned failure forced the Panther's to embrace what many derisively term suicidal tactics. Toward reversing their recruiting problems, the BPP decided to implement point #7 (an immediate end to police brutality and murder of black people) of the ten-point platform and program. Newton sought to exploit California's State Constitution, which allowed citizens to carry armaments via the Panther Patrols. The Panther Patrols were composed of BPP members carrying firearms (for protection), law books (to offer appropriate legal aid), and cameras (to preserve evidence) while following Oakland Police Department (OPD) officers as they performed routine patrols. The BPP could not have wished for better publicity.

Despite its relative popularity, the Panther Patrols failed to translate into a significant membership increase. Bay Area African Americans remained leery of affiliating with the BPP. Central to African-Americans' refusal to enlist in the BPP was the OPD record of unpunished abuse of Bay Area blacks. These police abuses led Bay Area African Americans to theorize that the BPP would be quickly destroyed by OPD officers. As predicted, local officers were determined to destroy the BPP "by any means necessary."

The initial campaign to curtail the BPP was a simplistic plan of harassment and intimidation. The petty harassment campaign proved to be little more than a nuisance to the BPP. Realizing the petty harassment campaign's futility, officers altered their strategy. OPD officials requested the assistance of State Legislator Donald Mulford in early 1967. Representative Mulford immediately drafted a bill removing Californians' Constitutional right to carry armaments.

In response, BPP leaders formulated a unique protest. On May 2, 1967, a cadre of 30 Panthers traveled to the state capitol to protest the pending Panther Bill. The capitol protest, which included the BPP carrying guns onto the legislative floor, was broadcast throughout the nation. The BPP gamble at receiving free publicity via reporters covering capitol proceedings was a phenomenal success. Such exposure led to their being inundated with calls regarding BPP expansion throughout the nation. Unfortunately, the BPP exposure via news snippets gave admirers little hint of their repudiation of parochial race-first politics. Ironically, BPP politics often contradicted would-be Panthers' personal political positions and motivations. Such issues intensified exponentially after Huey P. Newton was involved in an early morning shootout that left him wounded, one officer dead, and a second officer wounded.

Newton's arrest on October 28, 1967 for this offense not only moved the BPP to the center of the American protest scene, but also polarized the nation. One's position regarding Newton's guilt or innocence was usually determined by an individual's acceptance or repudiation of 1960s radicalism. With Newton confined, Minister of Information Eldridge Cleaver assumed an influential leadership position. Cleaver, a public relations genius, mobilized progressives behind a catchy slogan of "Free Huey."

The "Free Huey" campaign created a loose coalition of radicals. Most notable of these groups was the Peace & Freedom Party (P&FP). It was the BPP relationship with the white P&FP that ostracized the Panthers from their racially chauvinistic nationalist peers. Compounding matters was the selection of Charles R. Garry, a white attorney, to represent Newton in his capital murder trial. With the Panthers isolated from fellow nationalists, Newton incarcerated, and the BPP in a general state of disarray, the Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI) moved against the BPP in a substantive way.

The FBI's modus operandi was the Counter Intelligence Program (COINTELPRO). COINTELPRO was a covert operation aimed at usurping the powers and authority of national level black religious and political leaders. The BPP ascension was particularly troubling to FBI Director J. Edgar Hoover because the BPP chose to align with white leftist groups and propagated revolution instead of parochial race-first reformist politics. Ironically, the COINTELPRO violated laws in its pursuit of African American leaders. Bureau agents attacked via an intricate campaign of wiretaps, fraudulent letters, informants, agent provocateurs, assassinations, murder, and the assistance of friendly jurists.

Unable to defend against such a blitzkrieg, the BPP countered with a flurry of ineffectual decisions, policies, and counterrevolutionary activities. Indicative of such realities was the BPP battling Ron Karenga's US organization, a 1960s cultural nationalist group, and turning in on itself. Although impossible to identify informants, BPP leaders executed an organizational purge. State and local chapters were summarily closed. Loyal Panthers were ordered to Oakland for an unprecedented attempt at capturing the city's burgeoning Pacific Rim economy. The plan was to elect Bobby Seale to the mayor's position via flooding municipal voting rolls. In the end Bobby Seale and former BPP head Elaine Brown were both unsuccessful in their bids for public office. Despite such failure, the BPP laid the foundation for subsequent electoral success in Oakland. In the wake of its electoral failure, the BPP declined into a former shell of itself. Although the BPP existed into the 1980s with various activities, the organization never reached earlier levels of importance and influence.

Brotherhood of Sleeping Car Porters

The Brotherhood of Sleeping Car Porters was an African American labor union organized in 1925 by A. Philip Randolph. It was the first predominantly African American labor union in the United States to sign a collective bargaining agreement with a major U.S. company and gain charter recognition from the American Federation of Labor (AFL).

Historically, labor opportunities and labor protections for African Americans have been largely exploitative, beginning with slavery and indentured servitude and following with Reconstruction through the early 20th century. African Americans first responded to freedom with migration, moving from one part of the South to another with westward expansion. Those who remained in the South were left bound in a system of debt peonage called the crop lien system as buttressed by the rise of discriminatory laws sanctioned by a series of Supreme Court decisions sanctioning “separate but equal” practices in public facilities, education, and employment. In the mid-19th century and after the Civil War (1861–1865), the process of industrialization and the rise of “big business” dramatically changed the American landscape and the lives of African Americans. The transformation of the American economy from an agrarian to industrial economy redefined the nature of work and society overall as African Americans migrated to northern cities. The development and construction of the railroads (the transcontinental system was built primarily with Chinese immigrant labor) largely after the Civil War became America’s first “big business.” As Americans flocked to the cities for work, demands for worker protections became more prevalent with the rise of trade unions in the late 19th century.

Most of the major labor unions created amid worker unrest in the late 19th century, such as the Knights of Labor (1869), organized by Uriah Stephens under the guise of “universal brotherhood,” and the American Federation of Labor (1886), created by Samuel Gompers (1850–1924), initially made overtures to black workers. The Knights of Labor made efforts to organize workers regardless of race, skill, or nationality. Between 1885 and 1886, the number of African American members swelled to 60,000. Unlike the AFL, the Knights placed less emphasis on worker skills. The AFL focused on coordinating the activities of skilled craft unions throughout the country yet made an overture in the form of a resolution to include African American workers within their ranks in 1893. As both a social and labor movement, the Knights of Columbus declined after the Haymarket Riot (massive rally in support of 8-hour workday that took place in Chicago, 1886) and bombings under the specter of radicalism. Although the AFL made public overtures of inclusion to African Americans, local affiliates customarily barred African Americans from joining; those chapters organized with black membership were segregated. Later attempts to develop unions such as the International Workers of the World (IWW) (1905) were not as successful in terms of numbers in gaining black participation. The IWW never had more than 10,000 members nationwide.

African Americans began to migrate to cities in the North between 1890 and 1930 in a “Great Migration,” in search of work and equality. Many times, such as the case with the Pullman Strike of 1894, without work African American served as “strikebreakers.” George M. Pullman (1831–1897), founder of Pullman Palace Car Company, began to hire African American workers after the Pullman Strike of 1894. This practice continued after Pullman’s death. In fact, African American workers were so pervasive, white passengers who rode in the luxury Pullman railcars often referred to African American male porters who worked the cars as “George.” African Americans working as porters and train personnel reached 20,224 by the 1920s; this was the largest category of black labor at the time.

Although the Pullman Company saw itself as “socially progressive” in the hiring of large numbers of African Americans, working conditions and wages remained substandard through the turn of the century. Porters worked long hours, were reliant on passenger tips for satisfactory pay, and spent time on duties such as setup and cleanup that was unpaid. The porters were also responsible for securing their own food, lodging, and uniforms. These costs often consumed significant portions of their pay. They were also charged whenever items went missing from the rail car. Porters were required to work 400 hours per month or 11,000 miles to receive pay. Porters were also not allowed to be promoted to conductor (this job was customarily reserved for whites). These hardships prompted the porters to attempt several efforts to organize, and on August 25, 1925, they commandeered the support of civil rights activist A. Philip Randolph at a meeting in Harlem. Approximately 500 porters agreed to create a union called the Brotherhood of Sleeping Car Porters and adopted the motto "Fight or Be Slaves." A. Philip Randolph became the union's first president.

It was not until the New Deal under President Franklin D. Roosevelt that the Brotherhood of Sleeping Car Porters was formally recognized by the Pullman Company in 1937. This was as a result of the Wagner Act that was created to formally recognize labor unions in the workforce. The principles of collective work, community involvement, and the organizing tradition propelled the Brotherhood to become involved in civil rights activism. Major civil rights leaders such as E. D. Nixon, who was instrumental in developing the Montgomery Bus Boycott in 1956, were members of the Brotherhood of Sleeping Car Porters.

Brown, Elaine

Elaine Brown (1943–), a former chairperson of the Black Panther Party, redefined leadership roles during the 1970s. In 1974, she became the first woman to hold the party's highest honor. She clarified her intent to maintain a unified organization after the departure of Huey P. Newton for Cuba. Brown was born to Dorothy Clark, a factory worker, in a predominately black, low-income area of North Philadelphia on March 2, 1943. Her father, Horace Scott, was a prominent physician who cheated on his wife to conceive Brown with Clark. Scott refused to accept Brown as his daughter during her youth on York Street in North Philadelphia. As a child, Brown grew up singing in various choirs at the Jones Tabernacle African Methodist Episcopal Church and eventually recorded the Black Panthers National Theme in 1969 called "The Meeting." Brown also recorded albums in the 1970s titled Seize the Time with Vanguard Records and Until We're Free with Black Forum Records, and she also appeared on a 2002 Black Panther record called The Fugitives.

During Brown's youth, Brown's mother often bought her pretty dresses and made her take ballet classes as a means to separate her from all things considered black. As a student at Philadelphia High School for Girls, Brown recalled when her mother stated that light skin and straight hair were better features than dark skin and tightly-curved hair. Brown eventually would internalize bourgeois concepts as a child, particularly during a visit with her Aunt Francine in Los Angeles. Nevertheless, she persevered and briefly attended Temple University as a prelaw student. After leaving in 1965, Brown went to Los Angeles and taught piano at the Jordan Downs housing project. While working at the Pink Pussycat Club in West Hollywood, Brown met Jay Kennedy, her eventual mentor and lover. Kennedy, a screenwriter and wealthy patron who is 30 years her elder, introduced her to critical aspects the Civil Rights movement. With the aid of Kennedy and other friends such as Beverlee and Tommy Jacqueline, Brown furthered her interest in sociopolitical activism. While in Los Angeles, Brown began a Black Student Union newsletter and organized the Southern California College Black Student Alliance while at the University of California at Los Angeles.

In 1967, Brown became acquainted with the Black Panther Party and by April of the next year, she joined the Southern California chapter. By 1969, Brown became the deputy minister of information and was elevated to the minister of information in 1971. As a result of heightened scrutiny by COINTELPRO of the FBI, many leaders in the Black Panther Party were jailed or killed by the early 1970s. Also in 1971, Brown gave birth to her only child Ericka, who she conceived with former party member Mesai Hewit. Similarly to her father, Horace Scott, Hewit left Brown during her fourth month of pregnancy and later remarried. Before Newton escaped murder charges for Cuba, Brown unsuccessfully campaigned for an Oakland City Council position in 1973, and later would try for the same position in 1976. During Brown's tenure as chairperson, she continued the free medical care, expanded the free breakfast program, and created the renowned Oakland Community Learning Center in the city's poorest neighborhood.

Brown also registered nearly 100,000 new voters and endorsed Governor Jerry Brown and Lionel Wilson, who later would become Oakland's first black mayor. Also, Brown provided jobs to thousands of blacks during the Grove-Shafter freeway expansion that revitalized downtown Oakland. In 1976, Brown was chosen as a delegate to the Democratic Party's national convention, and she also was involved in many Oakland-based community and civic organizations. In 1977, Brown was viewed as a pawn and when Newton returned, neither his cocaine habit nor pressures from the majority male party could save Brown's leadership role. In fact, once Brown witnessed the beating of a female counterpart, she fled with her daughter to Los Angeles. Once there, Suzanne de Passe befriended Brown and allowed her to read scripts and write songs for Motown Records.

Through de Passe, Brown met French industrialist Pierre Elby and later moved to France to write her autobiography and first book, A Taste of Power, which she began in 1985 and completed in 1994. In 2002, Brown wrote her second book titled, The Condemnation of Little B, which examines the high incarceration rate for black men in the prison industrial complex. Brown currently maintains an active role in prisoner reform as seen by her work with the Mothers Advocating Juvenile Reform and the National Alliance for Radical Prisoner Reform. Brown also lectures throughout the United States, writes articles, and intends to coauthor a book on the life of Jamil Al-Amin. Also, A Taste of Power is being optioned for film. In November 2005, Brown ran for mayor of Brunswick, Georgia as a member of the Green Party.

Brown, Ron

Ronald Harmon Brown (1941–1996) was born in Washington, D.C. As a young boy, the Brown family moved along the eastern seaboard several times from Washington, D.C., to Boston, Massachusetts, to Harlem, New York. In 1947, Brown's father relocated to New York City as part of his job with the Federal Housing and Home Financing Administration (FHHFA). A short time later, he decided to switch from being a government employee to becoming a civilian employee when he took a job as the manager of the famous Hotel Theresa in Harlem. It was in that context that the younger Brown met several prominent African American hotel guests who had a profound influence on him. Among the notable celebrities he met at the hotel were Joe Louis, world champion boxing legend; Dinah Washington, blues/jazz singer great; and Josephine Baker, U.S.-born French entertainer.

After graduating from high school in New York, Brown attended Middlebury College (Vermont), majored in political science, and graduated in 1962. While at Middlebury, Brown pledged and became a member of a white fraternity. His entrance into the fraternity helped to abolish obstacles for membership in campus groups based on race. Brown's next stop after college was the U.S. Army, where he served from 1962 until 1967 in several leadership capacities commanding troops in the United States, Germany, and South Korea.

After his honorably discharge from the Army in 1967, Brown began studying law at St. John's University (New York) and in 1970, he received his law degree. One year later, he was admitted to the New York bar. While attending law school, Brown worked for the National Urban League as a job developer. Then, in 1973, after several promotions at the National Urban League, he was selected as the director of the organization's Washington, D.C. office. Three years later, in 1976, he was promoted to deputy executive director for programs and governmental affairs. Brown remained at the National Urban League until 1979, when he resigned from his position to work as Massachusetts Senator Edward (Ted) Kennedy's deputy campaign manager to secure the 1980 presidential nomination of the Democratic Party for Kennedy. In that role, Brown served as a political strategist to help secure the "black vote" for Kennedy's bid for the party's presidential nomination.

After his work on the Kennedy campaign ended, Brown decided to remain in Washington, D.C. In 1981, he was hired as an attorney and lobbyist for Patton, Boggs & Blow, one of the capital's most influential law firms. His new position there allowed him to extend his sphere of influence through political networking and to develop some close relationships with elite members of the Democratic Party. Brown was also the first African American to make partner at the powerful law firm.

From 1981 through 1985, Brown served as the deputy chairman of the Democratic Committee. In 1988, he was a convention campaign manager for the Rev. Jesse Jackson who was running for president of the United States. Brown also became a candidate for the position of chairman of the Democratic National Committee (DNC). One year later, in 1989, Brown was elected chairman of the DNC and became the first African American to lead a major political party. From 1989 through 1992, as chairman of the DNC, he led the Democratic Party with distinction.

Brown has been credited with getting Bill Clinton elected as U.S. President in 1992. President Clinton nominated Brown as the United States Commerce Secretary, a cabinet level position, and on January 22, 1993, Brown was sworn in as the 319th commerce secretary. Brown, as secretary of commerce, led one of the largest, complex governmental agencies with a multibillion dollar budget. Like many previous appointments throughout his life, Brown was a trailblazer; not only was he the first African American to serve as a commerce secretary, but he also significantly changed the role of that cabinet position.

Unlike his predecessors, who viewed the position as a formal, ceremonial one, Brown took an active role in reshaping the position. He expanded global business and commerce between the United States and other major international players in economic markets through his worldwide travels with governmental officials and business executives. Brown made multiple visits to several Asian, South American, and Middle Eastern countries that were eager to conduct commercial activities with business in the United States. He received high marks from a bipartisan business community for his efforts.

In office for slightly more than three years, Brown, along with a group of governmental officials and business executives, was killed when their Boeing T-43A military airplane crashed on April 3, 1996, in Dubrovnik, Croatia, during a tour of several countries in the Balkans to communicate his vision about developing possible investment opportunities in the region. Despite the speculation by some conspiracy theorists about the cause of his death, official sources state that Brown, as a result of pilot error resulting from poor weather conditions, was killed when his airplane crashed into the side of a mountain.

Brown's remains are buried at Arlington National Cemetery, Arlington Virginia. He left a wife, Alma Arrington; a son, Michael Brown; and a daughter, Tracey Brown. In December 1996, as a testimony to his memory and life work, the CAP Charitable Foundation, a private philanthropic foundation, established the Ron Brown Scholar Program. The mission of the program is to provide financial scholarships for talented African American high school seniors who may be financially unable to pay for college. In addition to their academic aptitude and desire to attend an institution of higher education, Ron Brown scholars should possess leadership abilities and demonstrate a willingness to engage in various types of community activities. See also: Clinton, William Jefferson; Jackson, Jesse

Brown v. Board of Education

Brown v. Board of Education in Topeka Kansas (1954, 1955) are the landmark Supreme Court decisions that declared segregated educational institutions illegal. Even before the Supreme Court upheld the separate but equal doctrine decree in Plessy v. Ferguson (1896), individual parents challenged separate educational facilities via the courts, mostly because separate schools were rarely equal. Pursuant to their goal of eliminating segregation in all public facilities, the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP) began the process of challenging segregation by laying the groundwork for Brown. To do so, the NAACP tried cases dealing with desegregation in graduate and professional schools. Two of the most significant cases include Sweatt v. Painter (1950), which found that segregated law schools deprived black students of certain intangible qualities, and McLaurin v. Oklahoma State Regents (1950), which mandated that black graduate students be treated the same as white graduate students.

The Kansas segregation statute permitted cities with a population greater than 15,000 to maintain separate elementary schools despite the fact that high schools, except in Kansas City, were desegregated. The Topeka Board of Education decided to operate segregated elementary schools, which provided the NAACP an opportunity to take legal action. The District Court ruled that while segregated schools did have a detrimental effect on African American children, the schools were substantially equal and therefore compliant with Plessy.

The NAACP lawyers, including Thurgood Marshall, Robert L. Carter, and Jack Greenberg, originally argued the case before the Supreme Court in 1952, but a decision was not reached because there were similar cases pending. As a result, the Brown case is actually an amalgam of four class action school segregation cases in Kansas, South Carolina (Briggs v. Elliott), Virginia (Davis v. County School Board of Prince Edward County), and Delaware (Gebhart v. Belton) representing approximately 200 plaintiffs. The NAACP legal team argued that segregated schools violated the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. Using evidence supplied by Kenneth Clark and Mamie Phipps's doll experiments, the legal team also argued that segregated schools deprived them of the opportunity to learn to adjust personally and socially in an integrated setting, lowered black children's level of aspiration, instilled feelings of insecurity and inferiority in them, and retarded their mental and educational development.

The unanimous Brown decision, written by Chief Justice Earl Warren, declared that to separate children from others of similar age and qualifications solely because of their race generates a feeling of inferiority as to their status in the community that may affect their hearts and minds in a way unlikely ever to be undone. Most important, the Court found that maintaining separate educational facilities violated the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment and therefore declared that in the field of public education the doctrine of 'separate but equal' has no place. Separate educational facilities are inherently unequal.

Although the 1954 Brown decision overturned Plessy v. Ferguson, it did not provide guidance as to how the schools should desegregate. The Court decided that because the situations were so diverse, the remedies were best decided at the local level. Brown II (1955) mandated that the district courts should oversee the desegregation process "with all deliberate speed." Without a specific timeline in place, desegregating public schools was a slow-moving process. Only two southern states, Texas and Arkansas, began desegregation in 1954. Some other school districts circumvented the ruling by closing all the public schools. The process was so sluggish that it was 1957 when children attempted to desegregate schools in Little Rock, Arkansas, only to be met by angry mobs and National Guard troops. In other areas of the country, it was more than a decade before schools and school districts began the arduous process of desegregation. The most immediate success of the Brown ruling was that it set the stage for civil rights groups to challenge segregation in other public arenas including public transportation.

Bruce, Blanche K.

Blanche Kelso Bruce (1841–1898) was the first African American senator to serve a full term in the United States Senate. Born March 1, 1841, in Farmville, Virginia, Bruce was born into servitude. He spent his younger years in Virginia, Mississippi, and then Missouri. Although Bruce was a slave, he grew up similar to white Southern children. As a light-skinned biracial man, under a relatively benign master and mistress, Bruce's years in servitude were less harsh than those of other enslaved African Americans. He was both well educated and relatively well treated during his early years.

After the Civil War, Bruce moved to Mississippi where he became a wealthy landowner and heavily involved in the political scene. After just a few months in Mississippi, Bruce gained the attention of the Republican hierarchy. In his first few years in the state, Bruce held important positions including sergeant-at-arms in the state senate and tax assessor of Bolivar County. In 1871, when the first election following the adoption of Mississippi's Reconstruction constitution was held, Bruce was elected to the combined position of sheriff and tax collector. A few weeks later he was awarded the office of county superintendent of education. In 1872, Bruce was awarded a position on the board of levee commissioners. In these various positions Bruce gained popularity and notoriety throughout the state.

There were other notable African American politicians in Mississippi, but Bruce was especially appealing because he had not aligned himself with either faction of the Republican Party. Instead, he had chosen to stay on the good side of both the radicals and moderate factions of the party. In doing so, he furthered his popularity in the organization on both the state and national level. Furthermore, his actions in the various offices he held in the state had pleased many whites. Thus, Bruce was favorable to both whites and blacks in the state.

In 1874, Bruce's popularity awarded him a place in the United States Senate where he served from 1875 to 1881. During this period he strongly advocated for the education and equality for African Americans. In 1881, Bruce was unseated when the Democrats took control of the Mississippi legislature. He was replaced by Democrat James Z. George.

After Bruce left the Senate, President Garfield offered him the position of minister to Brazil or postmaster-general. Bruce turned both positions down and instead asked to be appointed minister of the treasury. Garfield agreed and the Senate, filled with Bruce's former colleagues, confirmed Garfield's selection. In the position of the minister of treasury, Bruce was awarded the highest appointed position that an African American had ever received. Bruce's term ended in 1885 when the Republican Garfield was replaced by newly elected Democrat Grover Cleveland. For the next few years, Bruce lectured and campaigned for the Republicans. In 1888, when the Republicans successfully regained the presidency with Benjamin Harrison, Bruce was again awarded a position of respect, this time as recorder of deeds for the District of Columbia. When Cleveland reclaimed the presidency in 1892, Bruce was again out of office. In 1896, Bruce finally regained his position as minister of the treasury under newly elected President McKinley. Bruce held this position until his death on March 17, 1898.

Blanche Kelso Bruce was an influential African American. He held numerous positions on the local, state, and national level. In these positions he advocated and fought for black equality. While fighting for his African American brothers and sisters, Bruce stayed on the good side of whites as well. This helped to make Bruce the first African American to serve a full term in the United States Senate and forever a part of the history books.

Buffalo Soldiers

After the Civil War, when the massive Union army of about 1 million was disbanded, Congress could not ignore the contributions of the large number of black volunteers to the Union victory. So when the army was reduced and reorganized in 1866, blacks had a place in the regular army for the first time. Congress designated six post-Civil War regiments for black enlisted men in the Reorganization Act of July 28, 1866—the 9th and 10th Cavalry and the 38th, 39th, 40th, and 41st Infantry regiments (consolidated in 1869 into two infantry regiments, the 24th and 25th). The act marked the first inclusion of black men in the regular army. Soldiers who served in these regiments during the period of the frontier wars and the overseas wars at the turn of the 20th century have come to be called "Buffalo Soldiers." Since 1866, African Americans have remained a continuous presence in the armed forces, and their inclusion in the regular force has been considered a positive step toward equal opportunity. The creation of this segregated place for black soldiers, however, anticipated by a generation the spread of segregation as the mode of race relations imposed by whites in the South—usually called “Jim Crow”—and foreshadowed by two generations the formal segregation of civilian employment in the federal government by President Woodrow Wilson.

The officers of the black regiments were white. In the 50 years between the Civil War and World War I, only five African Americans received commissions in the regular army and served with the black regiments. Three were West Point graduates: Henry Flipper was the first in 1877, followed by John Alexander in 1887 and Charles Young in 1889. The other two were former enlisted men, Benjamin O. Davis and John E. Green, commissioned at the turn of the 20th century. Davis ultimately became the first black general officer.

The law of 1866 required that a chaplain be assigned to each new black regiment. This departed from the normal army practice of appointing chaplains to specific posts rather than units. Their responsibilities included the common school education of the men, many of whom were illiterate former slaves who had been denied access to education, as well as their spiritual needs. The first chaplains were white. Henry Vinton Plummer, a Baptist minister who had served in the Navy during the Civil War, became the first black chaplain and served 10 years (1884–1894) before he was dismissed from the service on spurious charges of conduct unbecoming an officer and a gentleman. By 1898, all four regiments had black chaplains: George Prioleau (9th Cavalry), William T. Anderson (10th Cavalry), Allen Allensworth (24th Infantry), and Theophilus Gould Steward (25th Infantry). They were a distinguished group of clergymen and scholars.

Like the white soldiers of their time, Buffalo Soldiers participated in central episodes of the American experience. They made many essential contributions to western settlement, making maps, blazing trails, and improving roads; guarding settlements, roads, and stage stations; and providing the reassuring military presence that helped encourage development. They also fought in some major wars against Indians, from the conflicts against the Cheyenne in Kansas just after the Civil War to the last big campaign on the Pine Ridge against the Sioux in South Dakota during 1890–1891. Most notably they were at the center of the arduous campaign against the Apaches Victorio and Nana in a wide belt of the Southwest covering western Texas, much of New Mexico, and eastern Arizona during 1879–1881.

During the period of the frontier wars, the black regiments made up about 12 percent of the very small Indian fighting army, which sometimes included a mere 25,000 or so soldiers, and participated in about 13 percent of the combat engagements against Indians. The 9th Cavalry, commanded by Colonel Edward Hatch from 1866 to 1887, was organized at New Orleans, Louisiana. It served in Texas through the mid-1870s, then moved west to New Mexico. In the 1880s, the regiment moved first to Kansas, then farther north to stations in Nebraska, Wyoming, and Utah. The 10th Cavalry started at Forts Riley and Leavenworth, Kansas. Colonel Benjamin Grierson, who, like Hatch, had distinguished himself as a leader of mounted troops during the Civil War, remained in command until 1889. His regiment served in Kansas and what later became Oklahoma into the 1870s, then moved to Texas and later to Arizona, where it participated in the campaign against Geronimo in 1886 and remained until 1892. It spent the rest of the 1890s at Montana stations. The 24th Infantry, the product of the merger of the 38th and 41st in 1869, spent many years at remote Texas posts before the war with Spain. The unit's arrival at Fort Douglas, Utah, outside Salt Lake City, in 1896 marked a rare instance of the stationing of a black regiment near a center of population. The 25th Infantry, consolidated from the 39th and 40th, also spent its first decade in isolated parts of Texas before moving to equally remote posts on the northern plains in Minnesota, the Dakotas, and Montana. A total of 37 of the 61 Buffalo Soldiers killed in Indian fighting during the period 1867 to 1890 fell against the Apaches during 1877–1881. Eight of the 18 who received the Medal of Honor during the period of frontier warfare earned recognition for conspicuous bravery in this bitterest of American frontier wars. Sergeant Emanuel Stance of the 9th Cavalry was the first Buffalo Soldier to receive the medal for leadership and bravery in 1870.

Soldiers with the 9th Cavalry, about 1898. The 9th Cavalry was one of six regiments for black enlisted men organized after the Civil War. In time, these regiments became known collectively as the Buffalo Soldiers. (Library of Congress)

All four regiments fought in the two foreign wars of the turn of the 20th century. They achieved prominence in the war against Spain in the summer of 1898, participating in the attack on San Juan Hill Cuba, alongside Theodore Roosevelt and his Rough Riders. They also served in the harsh guerilla struggle in the Philippines against a native independence movement during 1899–1902; 29 were killed in Cuba, 23 in the Philippines. Later, they participated in General John Pershing's 1916 punitive expedition into Mexico. Five black soldiers received the Medal of Honor for valor in Cuba.

Although Buffalo Soldiers and white soldiers carried out the same duties, they did so under different circumstances. Black soldiers often faced discrimination and hostility from the people they were assigned to protect. Through the entire period from the creation of the regiments to World War I, Texas represented the most dangerous racially charged environment, but soldiers lost their lives to racist attacks in a number of places including Fort Concho, Texas (1881), Sturgis, South Dakota (1885), and Suggs, Wyoming (1892). The two most serious racial incidents took place in Texas. A shooting incident at Brownsville, Texas, in 1906 resulted in the dishonorable discharge of an entire battalion of the 25th Infantry, and a riot in Houston, Texas, in 1917 led to the hanging of 14 soldiers of the 24th. Despite the difficulties, black soldiers rarely deserted and were much more likely than white soldiers to reenlist, reflecting the paucity of viable options in an era of increased segregation and lack of respectable mainstream employment. Moreover, black civilians considered the Buffalo Soldiers important and followed their activities avidly in weekly newspapers.

Black regulars from the period of the frontier wars are now widely known as Buffalo Soldiers. It is generally supposed that the Indians, either the Comanche or Cheyenne, first called the troopers “buffalo soldiers,” and the best guesses are that the name reflected a perceived resemblance between the brown skins and nappy hair of some of the men and the color and texture of the fur of the bison. The earliest known user of the phrase was Frances Roe, the wife of an officer who served at a post with the 10th Cavalry in Indian Territory during 1872–1873. Her letters were dated 1872 but not published until 1909. Some historians, including William Leckie in his path-breaking book The Buffalo Soldiers: a Narrative of the Negro Cavalry in the West, claimed that, because the buffalo was so important to these tribes, the term was probably a sign of respect and that the soldiers so comprehended it. The assumption that the term Buffalo Soldier was somehow honorific and that the Indians considered the black troopers to be exceptional has sometimes led to another, that the Buffalo Soldiers and the Indians viewed each other with empathy and respect. This cannot be proved, and the origins, significance, and prevalence of the phrase are not clear. Moreover, evidence that the soldiers themselves used or even referred to this title—in pension affidavits, black newspapers, or other venues—has not turned up, so claims concerning their views of the usage remain unproved suppositions. The 10th Cavalry adopted the buffalo as a central element of its unit crest, but not until 1911.

The improbability of any special bond between Indians and Buffalo Soldiers is underscored by the soldiers' use of the same dismissive epithets—“hostile tribes,” “naked savages,” and “redskins”—used by whites. Overall, the quest of Buffalo Soldiers for recognition as citizens in a racist country and the struggle of Native Americans for cultural and physical survival were not compatible. The strongest modern challenge to the emerging myth came from Indians, who were especially angered over the publicity that attended the issue of a buffalo-soldier postage stamp in 1994 and resented suggestions regarding some special bond between their warrior ancestors and the soldiers.

General awareness of the participation of black soldiers in the westward movement dates from the 1960s, the period of the civil rights revolution. The process started in 1960, with the release of John Ford's “Sergeant Rutledge,” a subtle and insightful film featuring Woody Strode as a black cavalry sergeant accused of rape and murder. The Civil War centennial joined with the Civil Rights movement to provoke reconsideration of the Civil War and a new focus on black soldiers as well as expanded general interest in black history. Leckie's book appeared in 1967. General Colin Powell, a black four-star army general who, as chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, served as the military advisor to the President of the United States between 1989 and 1993, was instrumental in promoting this knowledge, dedicating a larger-than-life statue of a mounted Buffalo Soldier by sculptor Eddie Dixon at Fort Leavenworth Kansas on July 25, 1992. The well-publicized ceremony, the declarations by both houses of Congress that July 28, 1992 was "Buffalo Soldiers Day," and the imposing permanent presence of the statue (the first of at least five at western forts), triggered a flood of commemorations, displays, and publications; stimulated formation of reenactment societies; and created a market for souvenirs and memorabilia. Between 1960 and 1992, the Buffalo Soldier emerged from obscurity in the United States. By the end of the 1990s, he was a well-known, widely recognized cultural icon.

Bunche, Ralph

Ralph (Johnson) Bunche (1904–1971) was born in Detroit, Michigan, the son of a barber. He moved from Detroit to Toledo, Ohio with his parents as his father searched for work. He attended elementary school in Ohio. In 1917, when his mother died, Bunche, then 13 years old, and his sister became orphans. His maternal grandmother, Lucy Taylor Johnson, took charge of the children who went to live with her in Los Angeles, California.

After graduating from a Los Angeles, California, high school with honors in 1922 where he excelled in academics and sports, Bunche attended UCLA. He continued to be an outstanding student. He was both a Phi Beta Kappa and summa cum laude graduate at UCLA. In 1927, he received an undergraduate degree in political science. Based on his academic prowess, he was awarded a fellowship to attend Harvard University to study political science in the department of government.

In 1928, Bunche graduated from Harvard University with a master's degree in political science. He then took a position as an instructor at Howard University in Washington, D.C., where he founded and became chair of its political science department. At Howard, Bunche played a major role as an academic and quasi-university administrator when he served as assistant to the university president. Bunche's work at Howard was rewarding, but he wanted to pursue his terminal degree. He enrolled in a PhD program in political science at Harvard and began working on his doctoral studies during summers from 1929 through 1934. While at Harvard, Bunche met Ruth Harris, whom he married in 1930. One year later, Ruth gave birth to Joan, the first of his three children. The Bunche family would include two additional children: Jane and Ralph Jr. In 1934, five years after he began his formal doctoral studies, Bunche fulfilled all the requirements for his PhD degree in the department of government, when the faculty accepted his dissertation "French Administration in Togoland and Dahomey." He had the unique distinction of receiving the William Toppan Prize, an annual award bestowed on doctoral students who submitted the best dissertation in political science. Bunche was also the first African American to receive a PhD from Harvard, or from any institution of higher education in political science. With his newly minted PhD, Bunche was identified as a rising star in the academic community. He was considered someone who could make a major contribution to the field. But Bunche opted to publish a few short articles from his research instead of turning his dissertation into a major book.

Bunche held some interesting views about poverty and political powerlessness. At the outset of his career, he believed that capitalism was the root of poor political and economic conditions for blacks. He advocated the position that blacks and whites should work together for "economic and political justice," which would ultimately result in the creation of a new, more equal, society. In 1939, Bunche had the unique opportunity to work part-time with Gunnar Myrdal, the noted Swedish economist and sociologist, on the issue of race in the United States. This field of research culminated in the 1944 landmark publication The American Dilemma: The Negro Problem and Modern Democracy.

Bunche left academic life to embark on a new career. In 1941, President Franklin Delano Roosevelt created the Office of Coordination of Information, later renamed the Office of Strategic Service or OSS. Needing a specialist on Africa, Roosevelt reached out to his alma mater Harvard University for a recommendation for the position; Bunche was recommended and Roosevelt accepted him.

Over the next three decades, Bunche would play a significant role in shaping government and international affairs. In 1942, Bunche moved from OSS to the U.S. State Department. In addition, he participated in preparing those chapters of the United Nations Charter that dealt with colonial territories. In 1946, Bunche became the director of the UN Trustee Division to help monitor the progress of autonomy in the UN Trust Territories and thus began his illustrious career at the UN.

In 1948, UN Secretary General Trygve Lie appointed Bunche his representative in Palestine, but he soon became acting mediator for the crisis. His diplomatic skills were instrumental in hammering out an armistice agreement on Palestine between Israel and several Arab countries. For his efforts in defusing the conflict and in brokering a deal in the Middle East, on December 10, 1950, Bunche became the first African American to receive the Nobel Peace Prize.

In the 1950s, the economic plight of African Americans was still very much on his mind. At this time, Bunche changed his political philosophy about capitalism, as he no longer blamed capitalism for economic disparity. He now believed that economic inequities were based on racism. In 1953, UN Secretary General Dag Hammarskjöld appointed Bunche the undersecretary general for Special Political Affairs. For more than a decade, Bunche participated in peacekeeping missions in the Middle East and Africa.

In the 1960s, Bunche believed strongly in civil rights and sought integration and equality for African Americans. He supported Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. and participated in the March on Washington in 1963 and the 1965 march from Selma to Montgomery (Alabama). In 1963, President Lyndon B. Johnson presented Bunche with the Medal of Freedom. The urban unrest of the 1960s, starting with the 1965 Watts riots in particular, solidified his views on the need for integration; as a result, black radicals of the time called him an “Uncle Tom.” Bunche was also vehemently against the Vietnam War. He saw irony in the fact that African American soldiers were fighting for the rights of the South Vietnamese, yet they had limited rights in their own country.

In the later part of the 1960s, Bunche suffered a number of personal tragedies. In October 1966, one of his two daughters committed suicide. In addition to this devastating event, his personal health began to fail. He was diagnosed with diabetes, which had an impact on his eyesight. In early 1967, Bunche wanted to resign from his UN position, but then Secretary General U Thant refused to accept his resignation. His career and his family obligations were at odds: his wife accused him of deserting his family for his career. He resigned from the UN on October 1, 1971 because of ill health.

Slightly two months later, on December 9, 1971, Bunche died in New York Hospital from complications connected with diabetes. As a lasting tribute to Bunche, in 1980, a park facing the United Nations building in New York City was named “The Ralph Bunche Park for Peace” in his honor. See also: Black Cabinet; Vietnam War (Black Participation in)

Busing

Busing, the act of moving students outside of their school district to end de facto segregation of public schools, became a controversial integration strategy ordered by the Supreme Court during the 1960s and 1970s. In 1954, the Court determined in Brown v. Board of Education that de jure segregation violated the Fourteenth Amendment. Despite the Court’s ruling to end segregation, whites resisted desegregation in the North and in the South.

In 1968, the Supreme Court, unsatisfied with the slow pace of desegregation, ruled in Green v. County School Board of New Kent County that open enrollment desegregation programs did not comply with the Brown decision. School districts were required to take affirmative steps to achieve racial balance. Three years later, in Swann v. Charlotte-Mecklenburg, the Court ordered busing as a valid means to reach racial integration.

The public responded in protest. In June 1974, U.S. District Judge W. Arthur Garrity ordered the Boston Public School System to begin busing several thousand students between predominantly white South Boston, Hyde Park, and Dorchester and mostly black Roxbury. White opponents of busing demonstrated to prevent black children from entering white schools and withheld their own children from being bused into black schools. For weeks violence and hostilities ensued.

Integration efforts were damaged further when white parents moved their families to the suburbs, leaving behind overwhelmingly black urban enclaves. A month after Garrity's decision, the Court assessed the consequences of "white flight" on urban schools and overturned a Detroit busing plan in Milliken v. Bradley. In the 1990s, the Supreme Court redefined school desegregation, prohibiting racial discrimination, but relieved school districts of integration requirements.

Carmichael, Stokely (Kwame Ture)

Stokely Carmichael (1941–1998) was a charismatic and controversial leader of the Civil Rights movement in the 1960s and 1970s. He is best known as an activist and chairman of SNCC and a leader in the Black Power movement, which marked a turning away from the nonviolent tactics of leaders like Martin Luther King Jr. in favor of a more militant brand of activism.

Carmichael was born in Port of Spain, Trinidad on July 29, 1941 to Mabel and Adolphus Carmichael. Carmichael's parents moved to New York City when he was three years old, and in 1952, he and his three sisters joined them there. The family first settled in Harlem, a predominantly black part of the city, before relocating to the Bronx, where Adolphus worked as a cab driver and carpenter and Mabel worked as a maid. Carmichael attended the Bronx High School of Science, one of the most prestigious schools in New York City, where he was one of only two black students, and graduated in 1960.

Before graduating from high school, Stokely experimented with political activism by participating in a sit-in sponsored by the New York chapter of the Congress of Racial Equality (CORE). He was beaten up during the sit-in, which only fueled his desire to further participate in the Civil Rights movement. Through CORE, he participated in boycotts of Woolworth stores in New York, which the organization targeted because of the company's policy of segregating their southern locations. Although Carmichael received scholarship offers from a number of universities, including Harvard, he chose to attend Howard University, an all-black institution in Washington, D.C. Because he did not receive a scholarship, Carmichael's parents had to pay his tuition.

While at Howard, he continued to work closely with CORE, as well as the Nonviolent Action Group (NAG), a local organization that planned demonstrations and sit-ins in the Washington, D.C. area. In 1961, Carmichael expanded his involvement in the Civil Rights movement by joining the Freedom Riders, a group of protesters who traveled to southern cities via bus (with whites riding in the back and African Americans in front), challenging segregation and attempting to integrate public places that upheld the practice. He and his fellow riders were arrested for these actions in Mississippi and spent 53 days in Parchman Penitentiary, a notoriously brutal state prison. During this period of incarceration, the prison guards subjected the prisoners to terrible food, dirty mattresses, and constant harassment. The prisoners sang protest songs as a way of keeping up morale, but their songs only brought more harsh punishment from the guards.

Stokely Carmichael (later Kwame Ture), an effective leader of the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee (SNCC), became an advocate of black power by 1965. He eventually joined the Black Panthers in 1967 and, while in exile, founded the All African People's Revolutionary Party (AAPRP) in Guinea. (Library of Congress)

Carmichael was released from prison in time for his second year at Howard, where he changed his major from pre-med to philosophy. He continued his education while also constantly participating in civil rights demonstrations. Carmichael finally finished his degree in the spring of 1964, and, although he received a scholarship offer from Harvard for graduate school, he passed in favor of joining the Mississippi Freedom Summer Project (MFSP), which aimed to increase black voter registration, organize a legal Democratic party that included blacks, establish schools for teaching basic literacy skills to black children, and open community centers where poor families could receive legal and medical assistance. He headed the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee (SNCC), the organization sponsoring the project, for one of the voting districts in Mississippi. His responsibilities included finding and training staff members, registering people to vote, distributing funds, and holding community meetings. The job was dangerous, and a number of students were injured and even killed because of their involvement with the project.

Stokely left the MFSP at the end of the summer in search of a new project that would allow him to work solely with other African Americans. He did not like that the Mississippi Freedom Summer Project encouraged alliances with whites and felt there needed to be an all-black political party in order to achieve real political power. Carmichael also believed that leaders like Martin Luther King Jr., who advocated peaceful resistance, were too focused on integration and were getting in the way of establishing strong and independent black communities. Carmichael preferred more militant leaders such as Malcolm X, who encouraged African Americans to defend themselves, through violence if necessary, and to learn about and embrace their African heritage. In 1965, Carmichael went to Lowndes County, Alabama, in the hopes creating a strong, all-black resistance movement there. The number of blacks in Lowndes County outnumbered the whites, yet whites held all the positions of power, and the intense racial oppression there left black citizens living in fear. Carmichael felt that this town provided the ideal setting for incubating a black rights movement. Dressed in overalls so that he fit in with his surroundings, the charismatic Carmichael convinced black citizens in the county that they should vote, despite violent resistance from local whites, and managed to register nearly 300 black voters. Once registered, however, these black voters did not know who to vote for. There were no black members of either the Republican or Democratic Parties in Lowndes County, and black voters did not trust any white politicians to protect their interests. Carmichael decided to create a new party, the Lowndes County Freedom Organization, which soon became known as the Black Panthers because of its mascot. Several members of the Black Panthers ran for office in the next election, and although none of them won, the black community in Lowndes felt they had more power and were better organized to protect their rights in the future.

After his success in organizing Lowndes County, Carmichael ran for and won the chairmanship of SNCC in 1966. His election marked the beginning of a new, more militant chapter of the organization's history. Like Carmichael, many members of the SNCC felt that nonviolent protest had not achieved any results and that stronger action was necessary. Shortly after his election, Carmichael found a national platform for his ideas. In June 1966, James Meredith was shot during his solitary “March Against Fear.” While Meredith recuperated from his wounds, Carmichael joined Martin Luther King Jr., NAACP president Roy Wilkins, and other civil rights activists to finish the march. At the end of the march, Carmichael gave a rousing speech in which he invited African Americans to embrace “black power,” meaning that they should be prideful of their race while also striving to achieve socioeconomic independence from the white community. The term became a rallying cry for young blacks across the country, with the most public example being the 1968 Olympics, when two African American track-and-field medalists raised their fists in the black power salute while standing on the award podium. SNCC, which valued a group ethic over individual merit, became displeased with Carmichael’s growing celebrity, and, in response, he stepped down from his position of leadership in 1967. He traveled the country, becoming more closely identified with the Black Panthers and writing a book entitled Black Power (1967).

In 1968, Carmichael married South African singer Miriam Makeba, and the following year, the two moved to Guinea, where he became an aide to Prime Minister Ahmed Sekou Toure and a student of exiled Ghanaian president Kwame Nkrumah. Shortly after his arrival in Guinea, Carmichael published a formal rejection of the Black Panthers, citing their increasing willingness to form alliances with whites. In 1970, he returned to the United States in order to appear before the Subcommittee to Investigate the Administration of the Internal Security Act and Other Internal Security Laws. The subcommittee asked him to provide information on organizations and people that might be trying to overthrow the U.S. government, including the Black Panther Party and SNCC. They also asked Carmichael to provide details of his activities while outside the United States. He pleaded the Fifth Amendment throughout the hearing.

In 1971, Carmichael published another book entitled Stokely Speaks: Black Power Back to Pan-Africanism, which contained many of his speeches during his years with the SNCC and the Black Panthers. In 1978, he divorced his wife and changed his name to Kwame Ture in honor of his two new patrons, although many people continued to refer to him by his birth name. He then married Marlyatou Barry, a doctor whom he divorced several years later. He became a member of the All African Peoples Revolutionary Party (AAPRP), a group that advocated Pan-Africanism, or the uniting of all African peoples inside and outside of Africa to form a single political entity. Ture traveled the world organizing new chapters of AAPRP for nearly a decade.

After the death of Ahmed Sekou Toure in 1984, the military regime that took his place arrested Ture several times on suspicion of trying to overthrow the government, although the reasons behind these allegations remain a mystery. He was jailed for several days for these charges, marking his final encounter with the law. By the mid-1980s, Ture grew disillusioned with the Civil Rights movement. Although there were 255 African American mayors in the United States by 1984, he felt that blacks had never truly organized effectively enough to gain real political power. Even so, he continued to visit the United States several times a year in efforts to promote Pan-Africanism. After receiving treatments for prostate cancer over a period of two years, Kwame Ture died in 1998 in Conakry, Guinea, at the age of 57.

Castro, Fidel

Fidel Alejandro Castro Ruz (1926–) was the leader of the Cuban Revolution, the prime minister of Cuba from February 1959 to December 1976, and the president of the Council of State of Cuba until February 2008 when power was transferred to his brother Raúl Castro. During his 50 years as the head of state of Cuba, Castro worked diligently to support, and gain the support of, civil rights activist in the United States and anticolonial revolutionaries in Africa. As a result, Castro has met with a large number of political activist spanning the African Diaspora and, as such, both Cuba and Castro have become iconic figures in the various struggles led by people of African descent. Castro's role in this regard began in 1960, just a year after the successful coup against the U.S.-backed regime of Fulgencio Batista, when he invited a group of African American intellectuals including John Henrik Clarke, Julian Mayfield, Amiri Baraka (Leroi Jones), and Harold Cruse to see, first hand, Revolutionary Cuba and its progress.

In October 1961, Castro and a delegation of Cuban government representatives came to New York to address the United Nations. When the delegation balked at staying in a plush mid-Manhattan hotel, the Fair Play for Cuba Committee arranged for Castro and his delegation to be moved to the black-owned Hotel Theresa in Harlem. During his stay in Harlem, Castro had a 30-minute conversation with Malcolm X and the picture taken during their meeting may have been the genesis of the positive association between Castro and African American leaders. Between 1960 and 1961, militant civil rights activist Robert F. Williams visited Cuba three times to the dismay of the NAACP. Williams's visits to Cuba and, along with Malcolm X, his October 1960 meeting with Castro in Harlem forged the first links between militant black activists and Cuban revolutionaries. As Cuba spiraled further away from the orbit of the United States, it became even more attractive to a number of radical organizations. Cuba alone stood against the combined might of the most powerful military in the world; Castro successfully repulsed an invasion, avoided several assassination attempts, and effectively became the unmovable object to the unstoppable force of U.S. domination in the Western Hemisphere.

This positive affiliation between African American radicals and Cuban revolutionaries, solidified even further by Castro's efforts in Angola, Namibia, Mozambique, and South Africa, explains why Cuba became a haven for African American activists during the era of political persecution and COINTELPRO operations in the United States. Beginning with Robert F. Williams in August 1961, a long secession of African American activist escaped to Cuba to seek political asylum, including Assata Shakur, Huey Newton, and Nehanda Abiodun (Cheri Dalton), William Lee Brent, and Charlie Hill among many others. While he and his family lived in Cuba, Williams joined the staff of join the staff of Radio Progreso in July 1962, and was given access to a 50,000-watt radio station with enough power to reach Saskatchewan, Canada. Airing three days a week, listeners heard "Radio Free Dixie" broadcasts in Monroe, Harlem, and Detroit. Williams's continued publication of his monthly newsletter, The Crusader-in-Exile, and his "Radio Free Dixie" broadcasts between 1962 and 1965 solidified the notion that Castro was a friend to African Americans in the minds of millions throughout the United States.

In 1995, Castro made a return visit to Harlem during the UN's 50th anniversary celebration, delivering a speech to 1,300 people at Abyssinian Baptist Church. Citing the achievements of the Cuban Revolution, he noted that in terms of infant mortality, access to health care, and literacy, Cuba has quantifiably better statistics than New York City, despite decades of the U.S.-imposed trade embargo. He also reminded the audience of Cuba's longstanding fight against imperialism and neocolonialism in Latin America and Africa and that, specifically, Cuban soldiers had shed blood on behalf of Angola in repulsing the CIA- and apartheid-backed effort led by Jonas Savimbi and the Republic of South Africa to invade and control the former Portuguese colony. More recently, Castro visited the United States again in September 2000 to deliver a four-hour speech at Harlem's Riverside Church. Finally, six members of the Congressional Black Caucus made a trip to Cuba in April 2009 to meet with the Castro brothers, a signal that relations between the United States and Cuba may be thawing under President Barack Obama after a half-century of tension and distrust. Perhaps it is fitting that African American political leaders are playing principal roles in creating new diplomatic relations with Cuba.

Chicago Defender

Characterized as the "world's greatest weekly" by founder Robert S. Abbott, the Chicago Defender emerged as a leading newspaper advocate for black rights in the 20th century. Throughout its—100-year history, the Defender spurred on the Great Migration, fought Jim Crow and lynching, campaigned for equal opportunity, and believed that American racism must be eliminated.

Founded on May 5, 1905 by Robert Sengstacke Abbott, a black entrepreneur and millionaire who was born to former slaves, the Defender began with a budget of 25 cents and was only four pages long. Abbott originally could not afford to hire a staff and therefore managed the entire news reporting, editing, and distribution processes. He would not be dismayed and sold more than 200 copies at two cents a paper in 1905. Unfortunately, times were not always easy and the Defender nearly folded owing to economic hardship. The Defender endured, however, because of the sincerity of patrons such as Henrietta Plummer Lee. It was Lee, Abbott's landlady, who allowed him to use her dining room in her home at 3159 State Street in Chicago, Illinois; and so, the first headquarters of the Defender commenced on June 5, 1905. In fact, Lee, who was moved by Abbott's initiative to champion black-related issues, accepted token payments for rent and food. Later, Abbott would honor her patronage with an eight-room brick house that he bought in 1918. Despite early economic challenges, Abbott instilled confidence into a people whom he referred to as the "Race" rather than "Negro," "Afro-American," or "Black." With World War I looming and thus need of coverage in addition to the aid of people such as J. Hockley Smiley, the managerial editor who used captivating headlines, and Jesse Binga, founder of Binga State Bank and a financial consultant who also helped Abbott manage his bills, the Defender was able to mobilize toward success.

Robert Abbott was born on November 24, 1868, in Frederica, on St. Simons Island, Georgia, to Thomas and Flora Butler Abbott. While Thomas was a butler on the Charles Stevens' plantation, Flora Butler was a hairdresser in the Savannah Theater. When Thomas Abbott died of tuberculosis in 1869, Flora later moved back to Savannah and eventually met John Herman Henry Sengstacke. In 1874, Sengstacke married Flora Butler and they had seven children together. Sengstacke became a key mentor to young Abbott and subsequently paid for his education at Beach Institute, an American missionary school in Savannah, Claflin University, and later Hampton Institute. In fact, Robert Abbott would change his name to Robert Sengstacke and would change it once more by adding Abbott to the end in 1897 before enrolling in the Kent College of Law. Abbott learned that law was not his passion and thus decided to remain in Chicago to begin a newspaper. Nevertheless, Abbott noted that his adopted father, Rev. John H. H. Sengstacke, who indoctrinated him to the craft of printing, told him that to be a newspaperman, he must study not only his own needs, but the needs of those about him.

By 1910, Abbott noted that 25,350 people had read Chicago's only weekly paper. These numbers would steadily rise as a result of the horrors of lynching and Jim Crow, after which southern blacks sought information about the Great Migration to the North. In 1913, the Defender was sold to Daw's Steamship agency in London, England, marking the emergence of an international market. Also, in 1919, the American Newspaper Annual and Directory reported the Defender's circulation as 120,000. The overall readership may have been higher, as a particular family and surrounding community might share a newspaper for financial reasons. Thus, an estimated circulation of the Defender during the early 1920s went as high as 600,000, as Abbott's dream of an influential paper took shape. In 1921, the Defender moved into its 3435 Indiana Avenue address that featured a $100,000 Goss straight-line sextuple press that could turn out 72,000 papers per hour. Nevertheless, all was not well in Chicago during 1919; in that year the infamous riots swept the city. During this tumultuous period, Abbott urged blacks to stay off the streets and allow the police to conduct order. The riot came about as a result of racial and class tensions between southern migrants and immigrants for labor and housing space in Chicago. Although Abbott noted the presence of tension between Irish and blacks in addition to northern racism that transcended the city, he halted attempts to settle the race question so that order could be restored.

Abbott promoted the Defender as a race-pride advocate, of which readers would recognize a black-owned business rooted in professionalism. In 1910, the Defender claimed to be the only weekly that telegraphed Jack Johnson at Reno during his defeat of Jim Jeffries. When Booker T. Washington died in 1915, the Defender claimed that its extra-last Sunday beat the newspaper world by 24 hours in announcing his death. Similarly, on October 2, 1920, the Defender and its headline, "Expose Reign of Terror in Haiti," claimed to beat the daily press by 12 full days. Abbott's articles, headlines, and even cartoons depicted the Defender's role as the guiding light for blacks. While a 1916 cartoon titled "Backbone" depicts a Defender-sponsored doctor injecting a black man with a shot of backbone, Oscar De Priest's nomination for Congress was seen as the race being put back into Congress. During the Progressive Era, the Defender continued its promotion of honesty, persistence, education, and morality so that blacks could equally participate and rise in American society.

Abbott spurred the Defender's Great Migration Northern Drive in order to end the tyranny of lynching and peonage for southern blacks. Although tens of thousands of blacks departed for Chicago, the Defender met challenges from various southern cities that prohibited distribution of the paper. Particularly, as the United States was engaged in World War I and sought complete allegiance to patriotism, the Defender's stances against disfranchisement, segregation, mob violence, and now migration were viewed as threats to national security. Surveillance from the Bureau of Investigation began as early as 1916; national laws such as the Espionage Act of 1917, the Trading with the Enemy Act also of 1917, and the Sedition Act of 1918 allowed government officials to regularly monitor the Defender. Also, the government received complaints from as far west as San Antonio, Texas, Tucson, Arizona, and Columbus, New Mexico, for local whites believed that the Defender made blacks antagonistic toward them. Similar accusations were made in the South, as seen by petitions from residents of Madison County, Mississippi. With an endorsement from their senator, John Sharp Williams, the Defender was charged with instigating lies and causing race trouble. The Defender also was accused of being antipatriotic by Colonel Ralph

Van Deman, head of the Military Intelligence Branch. Thus, Major Joel E. Spingarn, a white chairman of the NAACP board of directors led a cooperative meeting of negotiation among 41 black leaders, of which it was agreed to tone down all race arguments during the war with the exception of lynching. Ironically, governmental suppression of the Defender would once again challenge its existence during World War II, under the leadership of John H. Sengstacke Jr.

Abbott and the Defender also promoted Bronzeville, the center of the Chicago Renaissance during the 1920s, in addition to the Bud Billiken Club for city youth, the Defender's 1930 massed chorus as examples of cordiality that southern blacks could find in Chicago. Also, the Defender promoted religious institutions such as the Olivet and Pilgrim Baptist Churches, as well as the many jazz clubs and labor opportunities, all of which provided alternatives to Southern Jim Crow and lynching. Abbott also donated thousands of Christmas baskets to needy families as an extension of his Chicago Defender Goodfellow club. Most Southern blacks thus could depart for Chicago on an Illinois Central Railroad line.

After Robert Sengstacke Abbott died on February 29, 1940 from tuberculosis and Bright's disease, his nephew John H. Sengstacke Jr. took the helm as editor of the Defender. In fact, Sengstacke Jr. remained editor for 43 years until he retired in 1983 and later died in 1987. The Defender would remain in the Sengstacke family under the leadership of Frederick Sengstacke until 2000. Under Sengstacke Jr., the Defender continued to prosper, as he kicked off their 50-year anniversary by awarding President Dwight D. Eisenhower with the ninth annual Robert S. Abbott award. Sengstacke Jr. continued Abbott's legacy and expanded the Defender during his reign by creating a seven-paper consortium titled the Defender publications. Sengstacke Jr. also made the Defender a daily paper in 1956. Although the Defender did not officially recognize its 50-year anniversary until the August 13, 1955 issue, Sengstacke Jr. spared no expense and published a detailed commemorative edition of the Defender that included articles from distinguished guests such as A. Philip Randolph, Charles Johnson, Langston Hughes, W. C. Handy, and Adlai Stevenson, former governor of Illinois.

Langston Hughes, commonly known as the poet laureate of the black race, joined a distinguished list of past contributors to the Defender including Walter White, executive secretary of the NAACP, and S. I. Hayakawa. For Hughes, who served from 1942 to 1962, the Defender was the “journalistic voice of a largely voiceless people,” as he sought to eradicate racism and examine citizenship in the United States. In addition to outspoken articles and poems related to race, Hughes dedicated one-fourth of his columns to Jesse B. Semple, a fictional character who represented the joy and pain of being African American.

By 1980, during the week of the Defender's 75th anniversary, the State of Illinois Governor James P. Thompson declared May 5 through May 11 as the Chicago Daily Defender Week in hopes that all people of Illinois would honor its journalistic persistence and achievements. Mayor Richard Daley and Governor Rod Blagojevich also honored the Defender in 2005 during its centennial by declaring May 5 as “Chicago Defender Day” in the city and state. While fourth editor of the Defender, Colonel Eugene Scott, continued the tradition and cited the need for increased labor among black men and women in 2000, current leaders Roland Martin, executive editor, and Thomas Picou, CEO of Real Times Inc., noted the Defender's futuristic goals of becoming a versatile multimedia company that will be the leading source for black news.

Chicago Race Riot of 1919

During the first two decades of the 20th century, thousands of African Americans migrated from the cotton fields of South to the cities of the North. This trend accelerated during World War I as African Americans took industrial jobs they had previously been excluded from. The African American population of Chicago doubled between 1910 and 1919. African Americans escaping the racial system of the South sadly discovered segregation existed in Chicago. Residentially, African Americans were confined to a small area of the city referred to as the black belt. Other facilities, such as beaches, were also de facto segregated by color. Conditions inside the black belt steadily deteriorated as more and more people moved in.

Postwar competition for housing and jobs further exacerbated tensions. African American veterans felt they had earned their place as equal citizens and had proven their loyalty to their country. Instead of equality, they met discrimination when they returned. They challenged the confines of the black belt by moving to other areas of Chicago. White resistance led to almost two dozen instances of violence against African Americans and their homes. Competition for jobs was equally as rough. The transition from a wartime to a peacetime economy caused significant dislocation. In the factories, African Americans were let go to make place for returning white veterans. When the unions in the meat packing industry struck, the packers employed desperate African Americans as strikebreakers.

In the summer of 1919, Chicago's racial tensions became enmeshed in the waves of hysteria that swept through the United States in the wake of strikes and fears of Communist terrorists. This volatile powder keg required only a spark to ignite. On June 21, 1919, two African Americans were killed in separate incidents. Failure by the police to make any arrests led to a feeling among African Americans that an injustice had been committed against their community. City and neighborhood leaders worked to keep the peace, but the ratcheting up of racial tensions could not be overcome.

On Sunday July 27, 1919, a group of black teenagers were swimming at a Lake Michigan beach on a hot summer day. They drifted from the black beach to the white side. White youths who had only minutes before chased away other African Americans from the 29th Street Beach responded by throwing rocks at the blacks in the water. They struck Eugene Williams in the head, causing him to drown. The police failed to arrest any of the perpetrators and riots broke out in Chicago. That night, 27 African Americans were assaulted. Among those, seven were stabbed and four were shot. Monday morning was quiet and it appeared that the worst might be over, but violence resumed in the afternoon. A transit strike on Tuesday left many with no quick route home. They had to pass through hostile territory. Rain on Wednesday and Thursday dampened the rioting. Friday passed without significant incident. The final flurry of activity was an arson wave on Saturday that burned down 49 homes, leaving more than 900 Polish and Lithuanian immigrants homeless.

Throughout the five days, local authorities struggled to regain control of the city. Inflammatory newspaper headlines and outrageous rumors further exacerbated animosity. For reinforcements, the overwhelmed city police force belatedly called in the state militia. Most of the violence was perpetrated by gangs who roamed the street committing assault, battery, arson, home invasions, vandalism, and murder. They pulled African Americans off trolley cars and beat them in the middle of the street. Whites sped through black areas shooting from moving cars, and African Americans stationed armed men to ambush the cars. The violence was not continuous or sustained; it was, instead, episodic and often random. The police made almost 400 arrests during the riots, with African Americans being disproportionately among the ranks of the arrested.

In all, 38 people were killed, 25 African Americans and 13 whites, and more than 500 were injured. Chicago had been fortunate to avoid the wave of race riots that struck in 1917, but its racial tensions were not unique. Chicago was the site of one of more than 20 race riots in 1919 in the United States. Significant race riots broke out in Europe and Africa as well.

After the riot, Chicago struggled to understand what had happened. The coroner compiled a report and Illinois Governor Frank Lowden created the Chicago Commission on Race Relations. To ease racial tensions, the commission recommended that the city eliminate segregation and improve services inside the black belt. Throughout the 1920s, however, the situation only got worse. The Chicago Real Estate Board established a system of restrictive covenants in deeds that prevented a homeowner from selling property to an African American. Almost no housing was built inside the black belt over the course of the decade following the riot of 1919 and conditions worsened.

Chisholm, Shirley

Best known as the first African American woman to run for President of the United States, Shirley Chisholm (1924–2005) was also the first African American woman to be elected to the U.S. Congress. She served seven terms as a representative from New York’s 12th district, from 1969 until her retirement in 1982.

Originally named Shirley Anita St. Hill, she was born on November 30, 1924 in Brooklyn, New York, in the notoriously impoverished neighborhood of Bedford-Stuyvesant. Her parents were both immigrants to the United States; her father, Charles Christopher St. Hill, was born in British Guiana and arrived in New York in 1923 in New York City; her mother, Ruby Seale, was born in Barbados and arrived in New York City in 1921. Although young Shirley lived her early life in Brooklyn, she was sent, at age three, to live with her maternal grandmother in Barbados. Her parents, who were struggling to save money for their children’s education, sent Shirley and her three sisters to live in Barbados for nearly eight years. At the age of 11, however, she returned to New York City and was enrolled in an all-girls highschool in Brooklyn.

After graduating from highschool, she won tuition scholarships to Oberlin, Vassar, and Brooklyn College; she ultimately decided to remain at home and attend Brooklyn College, where she pursued a degree in sociology. Young Shirley had been exposed to politics throughout her life, especially since her father was a reputed follower of activist Marcus Garvey, who advocated black pride and unity among blacks to achieve economic and political power. As a result, during her years in college, she became active in many black organizations including the Harriet Tubman Society, the Urban League, the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP), and Delta Sigma Theta Sorority, Inc. As her participation in the black community expanded, she began to attend city meetings, which eventually prompted her to raise questions about the conditions plaguing her predominately black neighborhood. Even so, Shirley did not immediately consider becoming a politician.

Instead, in 1946, she graduated cum laude from Brooklyn College and began working as a teacher. For the next few years, she worked in a nursery school and pursued a graduate degree in elementary education at Columbia University. In 1949, she married Conrad Chisholm, and two years later she earned her master’s degree. Upon graduating from Columbia, Chisholm continued to work in the educational sector; she served as the director of the Friends Day Nursery in Brownsville, New York, and, from 1953 to 1959, as the director of the Hamilton-Madison Child Care Center, in Lower Manhattan. For the next several years, from 1959 to 1964, she worked as an educational consultant in New York City’s Bureau of Child Welfare.

Yet despite her important work in the field of education, Shirley Chisholm never lost her interest in community and political matters. She served on the board of directors of the Brooklyn Home for Aged Colored People and became a prominent member of the Brooklyn branch of the NAACP. She likewise volunteered for various political organizations including the Democratic Women's Workshop, the League of Women Voters, and the Bedford-Stuyvesant Political League, an organization formed to support black candidates.

Congresswoman Shirley Chisholm announces her candidacy as the first African American woman to run for a presidential nomination on January 25, 1972. (Library of Congress)

By 1964, Chisholm had earned a name in Brooklyn's political scene, which inspired her to consider a run for the New York State Assembly. To the surprise of many in the Democratic political machine, Chisholm won the election and served as an assemblywoman from 1964 to 1968. During her time in office, Chisholm sponsored 50 bills, most of which reflected her interest in the cause of blacks and the poor, women's rights, and educational opportunities. Although most of the bills failed to gain sufficient support, at least eight of them became law and made significant changes in her community. One of the successful bills provided an opportunity for poor students, particularly students of color, to gain financial support to pursue higher education. Another provided employment insurance coverage for personal and domestic employees. Still another reversed a law that caused female teachers in New York to lose their tenure while they were out on maternity leave.

In 1968, Chisholm made the bold decision to campaign for a seat in Congress. Ironically, she ran against seasoned civil rights leader James Farmer, but she easily won the election and became the first African American woman to earn a seat in the U.S. Congress. Ultimately, she spent 13 years in the halls of Congress; she was a member of the U.S. House of Representatives from the 91st through the 97th Congress (1969–1982). As she had in the New York State Assembly, Chisholm fought persistently to represent the needs of her community. Perhaps the most famous demonstration of her commitment came when she was assigned to the Forestry Committee, an appointment she strongly opposed on the grounds that she would rather serve on a committee that would allow her to grapple with issues of racism, social justice, and poverty. During her years in Congress, Chisholm served on several House committees including Agriculture, Veterans' Affairs, Rules and Education, and Labor. More specifically, she supported bills that sought to address tangible issues such as housing, education, discrimination, and abortion. She became a particularly outspoken advocate of women's rights, and, in 1971, she joined other feminists such as Gloria Steinem to establish the National Women's Political Caucus.

Perhaps Chisholm's most bold political decision came on January 25, 1972, when she announced her candidacy and became the first African American woman to run for President of the United States. Her platform encompassed a wide variety of issues including civil rights, prison reform, economic justice, gun control, and opposition to police brutality and drug abuse. Even so, the primary issue that drove her campaign was her vehement opposition to the Vietnam War and President Richard M. Nixon's policies nationally and abroad. As a result, Chisholm gained only limited support. Many black leaders were hesitant to endorse her, and although she got significant encouragement from women and young people, Chisholm struggled from insufficient funding. In the end, George McGovern won the presidential nomination at the Democratic National Convention, but Chisholm managed to capture 10 percent of the delegates' votes, particularly after Hubert H. Humphrey released his black delegates to vote for her.

Although Chisholm lost her bid for the presidency, she was reelected to her position in the House of Representatives in 1972 and faithfully served in that role for the next 10 years. In the early 1980s, however, the political climate in the United States changed dramatically. With the election of Ronald Reagan in 1980, liberals and the Democratic Party steadily lost their foothold in Congress. Thus, when Chisholm announced her retirement in February 10, 1982, she openly expressed her frustration with the rise of the Reagan era and President Reagan's domestic and international policies and lamented the decline of progressive politicians. Chisholm's decision to retire, however, was also motivated by personal considerations. After divorcing her first husband in 1977, she married Arthur Hardwick, a businessman from Buffalo, New York. After Hardwick was seriously injured in a car accident, Chisholm wanted to spend more time assisting with his recovery; Hardwick died several years later in 1986.

Even after her retirement from Congress, Chisholm remained publicly active. She joined the faculty at Mount Holyoke College, the oldest women's college in the United States, where she taught courses in political science and women's studies until 1987. She also spent a year as a visiting scholar at Spelman College in 1985 and, in that same year, she became the first president of the newly formed National Political Congress of Black Women. She also campaigned for Jesse Jackson when he sought Democratic Party's presidential nomination in 1984 and 1988.

Even after Chisholm moved to Florida in 1991, she remained outspoken on political matters, particularly her strong opposition to the Persian Gulf War. In 1993, President Bill Clinton nominated Chisholm as Ambassador to Jamaica, but because of declining health, she withdrew her name from further consideration. After suffering many strokes, Chisholm died on January 1, 2005, at the age of 80.

Civil Rights Act of 1866

Despite two presidential vetoes from Andrew Johnson, on April 19, 1866, Congress passed the Civil Rights Act of 1866, which was designed to protect the rights of newly freed slaves. When Congress passed the Thirteenth Amendment to the Constitution, Southern states, such as Mississippi and South Carolina, responded by passing a series of local Black Codes, which restricted the rights of freedmen. Unhappy with such local legislation and President Andrew Johnson's conservative reconstruction policies, Congress drafted a bill designed to protect the freedmen's natural rights, among which included citizenship, the right to secure employment, and the right to receive compensation. Congress drafted two bills designed to give meaning to the Thirteenth Amendment and crush the Black Codes.

In February 1866, Congress passed the Freedman's Bureau Bill and in March it passed the Civil Rights Act of 1866. The Civil Rights Act of 1866 stipulated that all native-born persons (except Native Americans), regardless of race, color, or previous condition (slavery), were U.S. citizens. As citizens, they could enter into contracts, sue and be sued, give evidence in court, and own, as well as sell, private property. If anyone denied such rights to U.S. citizens, then they would be subject to federal prosecution, and if they were found guilty, they faced a fine up to $1,000 and a year in prison.

President Johnson gave the bill's author, Illinois Republican Senator Lyman Trumbull, every indication that he would sign it; however, on February 19, 1866, Johnson issued a presidential veto. Three days later, the president spoke to a group outside the White House and outlined his reasons for issuing the veto. First, because the bill aimed to protect the rights of African Americans, he claimed that it unfairly discriminated against whites. Second, he argued that the bill was unconstitutional because Congress had passed it without consulting the still unseated representatives from Southern states. Third, the federal government, at the expense of individual states, was presuming too much power. Democrats held mass meetings and celebrated the president's veto, while the Republicans chided the president and revised the bill.

The revised version of the Civil Rights bill resembled the previous version. It granted citizenship to African Americans, as well as to all native-born persons (still Native Americans were excluded). It granted property ownership, as well as the right to sue and be sued in court, to African Americans and, most important, it nullified the Black Codes. The bill stopped short of allowing all citizens to vote, however; nor did it allow all citizens to sit on juries. Similarly, the bill did not desegregate schools or public facilities. On March 13, 1866, the bill overwhelmingly passed both Republican-controlled houses of Congress and was submitted to the president.

On March 27, 1866, Johnson again vetoed the bill. Like the first veto, Johnson cited his reasons. The president repeated his previous criticisms, but added that the Civil Rights Act was not fair to immigrants because it granted immediate citizenship to newly born freedmen, but newly arrived immigrants had to wait five years to become citizens.

Johnson's veto carried significant consequences. First, Republicans vowed to pass the bill despite the president's veto. They worked through the spring and on April 9, 1866, Congress passed the Civil Rights Act of 1866 with a two-thirds majority, successfully overriding the presidential veto. Second, Senator Trumbull never forgave Johnson for his actions concerning the Civil Rights bill. Because he was the chair of the Senate Judiciary Committee, Trumbull was certainly not a good enemy to have. Trumbull and the Republicans took the lead in Reconstruction from 1867 onward and, by 1868, they impeached the president, who survived removal by only one vote. Third, in June 1867, Congress incorporated many of the provisions of the Civil Rights Act of 1866 into the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution, which was designed to protect the rights of freedmen from state legislatures, federal courts, and future presidential vetoes. By June, Congress passed the amendment and submitted it to the president. When the Fourteenth Amendment became law, the constitutionality of the Civil Rights Act of 1866 was upheld, and it was reenacted in 1870. Fourth, the Civil Rights Act of 1866 marked the beginning of a trend in American constitutional history. Congress strengthened the power of the federal government at the expense of traditionally powerful state governments by granting national citizenship to the very people whose rights the state governments were trying to limit via the Black Codes.

The Civil Rights Act of 1866 was revolutionary because it gave meaning to the Thirteenth Amendment, it worked against the Black Codes, it expanded the power of the federal government at the expense of the state governments, and it provided the basis for the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution. Yet conservative Southern governments found ways around it. Because it protected against public, rather than private abuses, it was difficult to enforce, and organizations like the Ku Klux Klan successfully intimidated not only African Americans but also local officials. As a result, Congress passed a series of Civil Rights Acts throughout the 1870s and into the 19th century that reinforced and built on the successes of the Civil Rights Act of 1866.

Civil Rights Act of 1875

The Civil Rights Act of 1875 was adopted by the 43rd Congress in February 1875 and signed into law the following month by Ulysses S. Grant, the 18th president and commanding general of Union armies. The chief legislative sponsors were the Senate's staunchest abolitionist, Charles Sumner (R-MA), and Representative Benjamin F. Butler (R-MA), a controversial major general of the Civil War.

The act represented a final effort by Reconstruction Republicans to reinforce civil rights legislation (1866, 1870, and 1871) that asserted Congress' statutory authority to enforce provisions of the Thirteenth (1865), Fourteenth (1868), and Fifteenth (1870) Amendments. These constitutional and statutory expansions of federal authority secured the civil and political rights of African Americans and challenged efforts by defeated Southern states to reinstitute white supremacy through racial violence and Black Codes.

The law's most controversial feature was the provision for criminal and civil penalties for denying, or abetting the denial of, access to public accommodations (including inns, public transportation, and entertainment venues) on the basis of race. Violators could be imprisoned for 30–365 days and fined $550–$1,000 for each offense.

The act's significance was undermined by Congress's failure to enact prohibitions against racial segregation in public education, weak federal enforcement, and the difficulty of pursuing private litigation in federal courts. In an 1883 landmark decision, the Supreme Court ruled that the Fourteenth Amendment's prohibition against race-based discrimination by state governments does not authorize Congress to statutorily regulate similar action by private individuals.

Civil Rights Act of 1957

President Dwight D. Eisenhower's signature of the Civil Rights Act of 1957 marked the first time since the end of Reconstruction that Congress successfully enacted, albeit in limited form, federal protections for the voting rights of African Americans. As originally formulated, the act also prohibited discrimination and segregation in education and public accommodations on the basis of race, nationality, or religion. Segregationist Democrats in Congress, however, successfully pressured the act's proponents, including major civil rights organizations, to endorse a version of the legislation that eliminated these prohibitions and substantially limited the federal government's authority to enforce voting rights. Senate Majority Leader Lyndon B. Johnson successfully maintained a fragile coalition to ensure passage of the act and thereby enhanced his national profile for the 1960 presidential election.

The act's three main features are the creation of the Commission on Civil Rights to investigate voting rights violations in federal elections (Part I), the establishment of an Assistant Attorney General for Civil Rights and the formation of the Civil Rights Division of the Department of Justice (Part II), and the provision for injunctive relief and contempt proceedings against violators of federal voting rights (Part IV & V). Notwithstanding concerns that the Civil Rights Act of 1957 lacked substantive enforcement authority, it represented an important departure from the decades-long intransigence of southern Democrats to accept even symbolic civil rights legislation for African Americans. The act laid the groundwork for significant civil rights legislation throughout the 1960s.

Civil Rights Act of 1960

The Civil Rights Act of 1960 advanced the struggle for African American freedom by responding, albeit in limited form, to the "massive resistance" of southern segregationists. The legislation criminalized the obstruction of federal [desegregation] court orders (Title I) and the crossing of state lines to engage in racially motivated violence against religious and civic institutions (Title II). For the children of military personnel living on federal property, the act provided for their education if public schools closed to avoid racial integration (Title V). The legislation also mandated the preservation of registration and voting records in federal elections (Title III), the judicial appointment of “voting referees” to compile evidence of voting rights violations (Title VI), and the authority for the Commission on Civil Rights to take sworn testimony.

The legislation had symbolic and strategic implications for subsequent, landmark legislation (the Civil Rights Act of 1964 and the Voting Rights Act of 1965). President Dwight Eisenhower’s enactment of the legislation symbolized a critical juncture in American federalism. Henceforth, the national government’s authority would be deployed against efforts by states to deny citizenship rights to racial minorities.

The strategic acumen developed by (congressional) civil rights proponents during the act’s passage neutralized southern obstructionism in subsequent civil rights legislation. Congress also invoked its authority to regulate interstate commerce as the constitutional basis for prohibiting racial violence by private individuals (Title II), thereby insulating the act from the sort of constitutional challenge that invalidated the Civil Rights Act of 1875. The legislation therefore prefigured a significant broadening of Congress’s authority to ban racial discrimination in public accommodations in 1964.

The Civil Rights Act of 1964 ushered in a relatively brief period (1964–1968) of progressive legislation that rectified the post-Reconstruction evisceration of statutory and constitutional protections for African Americans. The act (and subsequent amendments), the Voting Rights Act of 1965, the Immigration Act of 1965, and the Fair Housing Act of 1968 established the statutory and bureaucratic enforcement mechanisms that substantially expanded the national government’s authority to protect the civil rights of African Americans and other groups who endured historical patterns of discrimination on the basis of race, national origin, language, religion, disability, age, or sex. This era of landmark legislation is often characterized as the Second Reconstruction because it dismantled the (Jim Crow) system of racial hierarchy and privilege and produced unprecedented levels of federal intervention into areas of social relations traditionally within the jurisdiction of state governments.

President Lyndon B. Johnson demonstrated extraordinary political courage and prescience for understanding that his signature on the act (July 2, 1964) would exacerbate the fracturing of the New Deal coalition. The act also marked the nadir of legislative obstructionism by southern Democrats on proposed civil rights legislation. For the first time in the Senate’s history, a successful cloture vote by a coalition of northern Democrats and Republicans defeated a civil rights filibuster by southern Democrats. In the subsequent presidential elections of 1968 and 1972, the Democratic nominee won the electoral votes of only one of the former states of the Confederacy (Texas in 1968).

Although President Johnson demonstrated exceptional leadership and moral conviction in championing the act (and voting rights legislation a year later), the Johnson Administration was also responding to an emerging national consensus that meaningful civil rights legislation was an urgent national priority. A “window of opportunity” for a major breakthrough in civil rights legislation was precipitated by several factors: the paroxysms of racial violence against African American churches, civic organizations, and civil rights activists; the moral urgency President John F. Kennedy attached to civil rights legislation before his assassination; urban unrest in northern cities often triggered by incidents of police brutality; and the increasing unease in the national security establishment that the international status of the United States was severely undermined by government repression of nonviolent civil rights protesters.

The act also indirectly corrected a longstanding Supreme Court precedent that invalidated congressional authority to prohibit racial discrimination in public accommodations. In the Civil Rights Cases (1883), the Court ruled that the Fourteenth Amendment was limited to prohibitions against racial discrimination by state governments (the state action doctrine). Congress anticipated similar challenges and instead anchored the act’s constitutional authority on the Interstate Commerce Clause. That approach was affirmed by the Supreme Court in two companion cases decided just five months after the passage of the act (on December 14, 1964). In a concurring opinion for both cases, Justice William O' Douglas signaled a potential willingness by the Court to revisit Congress's 14th Amendment authority to protect civil rights through enabling legislation.

In its initial formulation, and subsequent amendments, the Civil Rights Act of 1964 constituted a substantial expansion of federal authority in protecting civil rights by prohibiting differential standards for voter eligibility in federal elections (Title I); prohibiting discrimination in public accommodations (Title II); empowering the attorney general to bring lawsuits against states that maintained racially segregated public school systems (Title III); outlawing discrimination in federally funded programs (Title VI); prohibiting employment discrimination on the basis of race, color, national origin, language, religion, age, sex, and disability (Title VII); establishing the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission to investigate employment discrimination and mandate the collection of workforce demographic data (also Title VII); and ban gender-based discrimination in educational programs that receive federal funding (Title IX).

Enactment of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 contained several far-reaching implications for the development of civil rights policy in American society. The act underscored the necessity for congressional legislation and executive branch action (enforcement mechanisms) to fully implement landmark judicial opinions such as Brown v. Board of Education. It established the legislative and bureaucratic framework for the subsequent promulgation of Affirmative Action policies and programs in federal contracting, public sector employment, and higher education. The act's inclusion of prohibitions against discrimination on the basis of sex, age, language, and disability suggests that the national government's responsiveness to civil rights claims is not exclusively predicated on mass mobilization by historically marginalized groups. For instance, key policy entrepreneurs within government contributed significantly to the adoption of Section 504 of the Rehabilitation Act of 1973 and the Americans With Disabilities Act, two major achievements of the disability rights movement. Perhaps the most enduring legacy of the act is the proposition that the full legislative, administrative, and judicial authority of the national government can be deployed to dismantle longstanding patterns and practices of discrimination in civil society and state and local governments.

Civil Rights Act of 1968

The Civil Rights Act of 1968, often referred to as the Fair Housing Act, was designed to prohibit discrimination in the sale, rental, advertising, and financing of housing. President Lyndon B. Johnson signed it into law on April 11, 1968, but the bill was delayed for several years before it was eventually passed in Congress. The original legislation was intended to extend federal government protection to civil rights workers, many of whom had been injured or killed in the struggle to obtain basic civil rights, but it was later amended to provide for fair housing throughout the United States regardless of one's race, color, religion, or national origin. It stands as one of the last major civil rights statutes passed in America during the 1960s.

The act came in the wake of other key civil rights legislation, the most widely known of which is the Civil Rights Act of 1964. Of its many provisions, this act created an equal employment commission, required businesses that wanted federal business to have a procivil rights charter, enforced the constitutional right to vote, and barred discrimination in federally assisted programs. It was evident, however, that housing was an issue that had otherwise been insufficiently addressed by prior legislation, despite provisions outlawing discrimination in public places and venues. The segregation existing in many parts of the country, the failure of banks to provide loans to African Americans, and the refusal of landlords to rent to individuals and families on the basis of race helped create a hostile housing climate that severely limited most African Americans' fair access to housing.

It is argued that the Civil Rights Act of 1968 had its roots in President John F. Kennedy's Executive Order 11063, which he set out in 1962. This order directed all departments and agencies of the U.S. government to take necessary action to prevent discrimination on the basis of one's race, creed, or national origin in the sale, rental, or leasing of federally owned or operated residential property. It also prohibited racial discrimination in public housing built with federal funds and in new housing built with loans from federal agencies. Kennedy's order notwithstanding, it remained clear that the legislation needed to be strengthened and broadened in its chief aims if it was to substantially alter the lack of parity African Americans faced when trying to purchase real estate and secure housing.

Clarence Mitchell Jr., the Washington director of the NAACP, is credited with spearheading the effort to secure the 1968 bill. Mitchell, dubbed by some as the "101st Senator," was a leading force in the battle to obtain civil rights legislation, and his efforts to ensure that this particular bill would become law were critical. A conservative legislative branch used several procedural tactics to delay the passage of the bill for a number of years, but it gained increasing support when Senate Republican minority leader Everett Dirksen strongly backed its enactment. Senator Dirksen generally had a conservative position on domestic legislation and held weekly broadcast news conferences to voice Republican opposition to Kennedy's administration. Yet he had previously been a designer and supporter of civil rights bills and firmly backed the 1968 fair housing bill. After Dirksen announced his support, the Senate voted to pass the bill by a tight 65 to 32 margin on March 4, 1968, but it was thought to be impassable in the House unless it was amended, and likely weakened, in committee.

The assassination of Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. on April 4, 1968, just one month after the bill was voted on in the Senate, contributed to mounting pressure to pass the bill in its entirety. The riots, burnings, and looting occurring in the wake of his assassination in more than 100 cities across the United States marked 1968 as a particularly tumultuous year and served as a powerful indication that advocates of racial justice would continue to resist social, judicial, economic, and political inequalities under the law. The House Rules Committee voted to send the fair housing bill straight to the House floor, permitted only one hour of debate without any further amendments, and the bill went on to pass swiftly the day after Dr. King's funeral. President Johnson signed it into law the next day as the nation continued to mourn the loss of a renowned civil rights leader.

The act was amended in 1974 to include sex as a protected class in fair housing, and, in 1988, disability and familial status were added to make it more comprehensive in its aims and scope. The U.S. Department of Housing and Urban Development, state and local governmental agencies, and nonprofit fair housing advocacy organizations now exist throughout the country to assist those who feel they have been subjected to housing discrimination. This network of agencies and organizations also exists to help ensure that housing does in fact remain fair to African Americans and all those who seek to establish a residence. See also: Civil Rights Act of 1964; Disfranchisement; Fourteenth Amendment; Jim Crow; Johnson, Lyndon Baines; Kennedy, John Fitzgerald; King, Martin Luther Jr.; National Association for the Advancement of Colored People

Clark, Septima

Septima Poinsette Clark (1898–1987), educator and civil rights activist, was born in 1898 in Charleston, South Carolina. Her father, Peter Porcher Poinsette, was a caterer, and her mother, Victoria Warren Anderson, was a washer-woman. In 1920, she married Nerie Clark, a sailor from Hickory, North Carolina, with whom she had one surviving son, Nerie Clark Jr. Her husband died as a result of kidney failure five years later, and her son spent much of his youth living with her in-laws in Hickory while she worked in South Carolina.

Septima Poinsette attended private and public schools for African Americans in Charleston, including Avery Normal Institute. She claimed that she always wanted to be a teacher, a desire nurtured by her parents' strong emphasis on education. After graduation from 12th grade with a teaching certificate in 1916, Poinsette took her first job teaching on St. John's Island, near Charleston. There she earned $30 monthly teaching 132 children with only one other teacher, while in comparison, white teachers on the island averaged $85 for teaching approximately 10 students. Clark then taught at various schools in North and South Carolina, eventually moving to Columbia, where she taught for 18 years.

Clark first contributed to organized civil rights activism when she participated in a movement demanding that black teachers be allowed to teach in black public schools in Charleston. Clark argued that the white teachers assigned to black schools were of poor quality and were not interested in African American achievement. She helped gather more than 10,000 signatures for the victorious NAACP petition drive. In Columbia, she continued her activism by participating in a successful legal challenge to force the school system to equalize salaries between similarly qualified black and white teachers. Clark also resumed her education, earning her BA from Benedict College in Columbia and her MA from Hampton Institute in Virginia. She returned to Charleston to teach from 1947 to 1956, when her teaching contract in the public schools was not renewed because of her membership in the NAACP.

Through the encouragement of Anna Kelly, executive secretary of the Charleston African American YWCA, Septima Clark attended a workshop on desegregation at the Highlander School, in Monteagle, Tennessee, in 1954. Highlander School, founded by Miles Horton in the 1930s, initially trained southern labor organizers and then turned its attention to civil rights, holding a series of workshops in 1953 and 1954 on strategies for peaceful school desegregation. Clark then took Esau Jenkins and other community members from St. Johns Island to Highlander, ultimately resulting in the establishment of the first citizenship school on the island in January, 1957. Clark and the first citizenship school teacher, Bernice Robinson, designed the curriculum and materials based on what participants asked to learn on the first day. They taught students how to sign their names, fill out money orders, and how to read and write using lessons on citizenship and democracy. This model for citizenship schools quickly expanded, and Clark assisted other communities in designing their own citizenship schools.

When Septima Clark's teaching contract was not renewed, Horton asked her to become director of education at Highlander school, where, in addition to her work establishing citizenship schools, she ran workshops designed to help community leaders address illiteracy, desegregation, and other issues. When the Tennessee General Assembly tried to revoke the schools tax-free charter on trumped-up charges of alcohol possession, the Southern Christian Leadership Conference (SCLC), the civil rights organization founded by Dr. Martin Luther King Jr., took over the citizenship school program, and Clark moved to Atlanta. As supervisor of teacher training, Clark traveled around the South recruiting teachers to attend a five-day workshop at the Dorchester Cooperative Community Center in McInstosh, Georgia, 300 miles outside Atlanta. Clark also spent time in various communities assisting local volunteers setting up citizenship schools, forming 897 schools between 1957 and 1970. In 1962, SCLC joined with the NAACP, Congress of Racial Equality (CORE), Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee (SNCC), and the Urban League to form the Voter Education Project. Between 1962 and 1965, this project trained about 10,000 teachers for citizenship schools, resulting in about 700,000 black voters registering in the South. After passage of the Voting Rights Act of 1965, more than 1 million black voters registered before 1970. Andrew Young credited the citizenship schools as being the base on which the entire Civil Rights movement was built.

Septima Clark's activism was driven by her belief that one had to empower local leaders to organize their own communities. She wrote to Dr. King, suggesting that he allow more local activists to lead marches in order to facilitate grassroots leadership. Clark later recalled that the executive staff laughed at her suggestion because it came from a woman. As the first woman on the executive staff of SCLC, she and Ella Baker faced opposition from the mostly male ministers who dominated SCLC and did not respect the contributions of women according to Clark. In 1958, at the invitation of white civil rights activist Virginia Foster Durr, she attended the organizational meeting of the National Organization for Women. Clark argued that both black and white southern women were constrained by the authority of their husbands. Notwithstanding her differences with Dr. King regarding women's roles, Clark respected and admired him deeply and strongly believed in his philosophy of nonviolence. Despite the dangers of arrest, violence, harassment, and threats to her ability to earn a living, Clark always insisted that she was not afraid because she understood the importance of the work she did.

In addition to her work in the NAACP and SCLC, Clark was also involved in the South Carolina Federation of Colored Women's Clubs, the Charleston Tuberculosis Association, the YWCA, and her sorority, Alpha Kappa Alpha, with whom she worked on a health campaign for St. Johns Island. After retiring from SCLC in 1970, she volunteered for the American Field Service, helped organize day care facilities, and was elected a member of the Charleston school board, the same board that had fired her for her political beliefs years earlier. In 1979, President Jimmy Carter presented her with a Living the Legacy Award for her dedication to civil rights and to the nation. She died on December 15, 1987.

Cleaver, Eldridge

Leroy Eldridge Cleaver (1935–1998) was a writer, an advocate of black power, and a member of the Black Panther Party for Self-Defense, serving in the capacity of minister of information in the organization for several years. Cleaver, the son of a nightclub piano player, was born on August 31, 1935, in Wabbaseka, Arkansas and moved with his family to Phoenix and, by 1946, Los Angeles. While in California, Cleaver began to have early encounters with law enforcement as a teenager with arrests for stealing a bicycle and selling marijuana. After a brief stint in a reform school, he was arrested again for selling marijuana and was sentenced to 30 months in Soledad Prison. After his release in 1957, Cleaver again turned to a life of crime, committing a series of rapes, and, by 1958, he was convicted of assault and attempted murder and was sentenced to serve an indeterminate sentence of 2 to 14 years in San Quentin Prison. Before leaving prison in 1966, Cleaver read a number of books on African American history and the civil rights struggle. He became an ardent supporter of the late Malcolm X, and he wrote a series of articles for Ramparts magazine.

Eldridge Cleaver led a life of transformations: early years of crime and imprisonment; a decade as a radical African American activist and writer; a period of exile; and his later years as an outspoken Republican and conservative Christian. (Library of Congress)

Upon his release from San Quentin, Cleaver did a number of things in rapid succession. He published his Ramparts magazine articles as a book entitled Soul on Ice; he married Kathleen Neal in December 1967; he joined the newly formed Black Panther Party for Self-Defense and was appointed as the minister of information; and, in 1968, Cleaver was a presidential candidate for the Peace and Freedom Party. He is most famous for his actions after the assassination of Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. On April 6, 1968, Cleaver, along with Bobby Hutton and David Hilliard, were involved in an altercation with Oakland, California police that left Hutton dead and Cleaver injured. Apparently, Cleaver led this small group in a purposeful attempt to initiate a violent altercation with police. He was subsequently arrested and charged with attempted murder. Fearing a lengthy stay in prison, Cleaver skipped bail and fled the country. His escape route took him through Mexico to Cuba, although he also spent time in exile in Algeria and France.

While in exile, Cleaver continued to write for Ramparts, The Black Scholar, and other publications. Because of a series of disagreements between him and Huey P. Newton, Cleaver was expelled from the Black Panther Party in 1971. After seven years in exile, he returned to the United States, immediately renouncing the Black Panther Party and experiencing a profound religious and political transformation. Not only did Cleaver renounce the Panthers and their philosophy, he rejected socialism, communism, and radicalism. He became an evangelical Christian, and later a Mormon, and even endorsed Ronald Reagan, a former arch enemy of the Panthers, as president in 1980 and 1984. In 1986, Cleaver even made an unsuccessful run for the Republican Party Senate seat in California. Throughout the 1980s and early 1990s, Cleaver was an ardent and dedicated conservative Republican and evangelical Christian, in diametric opposition to his prior activities as a Black Panther. He was also addicted to crack cocaine during this period and was arrested on at least two occasions for burglary and cocaine possession. At the time of his death in 1998, Cleaver was a diversity consultant for the University of La Verne in southern California.

Cleaver, Kathleen Neal

Kathleen Neal Cleaver (1945–) was born May 13, 1945, in Dallas, Texas, and in 1967 became the first woman member of the Black Panther Party's Central Committee. As the party's communication secretary, Kathleen Cleaver was a central figure in the early development of the Black Panther Party and a significant figure in the black liberation struggle since the mid-1960s.

Cleaver's father, Ernest Neal, was a professor of sociology at Wuley College in Marshall, Texas, when Kathleen was born. In 1948, the Neals moved to Tuskegee, Alabama, where Cleaver's father taught sociology and served as director of the Rural Life Council at Tuskegee Institute. In 1954, Cleaver's father joined the Foreign Service, which took the family to India, Liberia, Sierra Leone, and the Philippines. In 1958, Kathleen began attending high school in the United States. After high school, she attended Oberlin College, transferred to Barnard College, and in 1966 left Barnard to join the New York office of the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee (SNCC). In January 1967, Cleaver began working at the SNCC headquarters in Atlanta, Georgia.

While organizing a student conference at Fisk University in Nashville, Tennessee in April 1967, Kathleen met Eldridge Cleaver, minister of information for the Black Panther Party. The Black Panther Party was cofounded in Oakland, California in 1966 by Huey Newton and Bobby Seale. The party advocated a comprehensive agenda for black liberation detailed in their ten point program, "What We Want, What We Believe." Eldridge Cleaver had just recently been paroled from Soledad Prison where he had written the bestselling book Soul on Ice. In November 1967, Kathleen left SNCC and moved to California to join the Black Panther Party. In December 1967, Eldridge and Kathleen were married.

Kathleen Cleaver was the first woman member of the Black Panther Party's Central Committee where she served as the Party's communication secretary. Serving in this position from 1967 to 1971, Cleaver provided press releases, delivered public speeches, wrote articles about the party, and was the assistant editor of the party newspaper, The Black Panther. With the imprisonment of the party's minister of defense, Huey Newton, in 1968, on charges of killing an Oakland police officer, Kathleen Cleaver crusaded for Newton's release through the "Free Huey Campaign." In late 1967, the Black Panther Party formed a coalition with the Peace and Freedom Party to run alternative candidates to the Democrats and Republicans in California. In 1968, Cleaver ran for the 18th District seat in the California State Assembly as a Peace and Freedom Party candidate on a ticket that included other prominent Black Panther Party members and peace activists.

In 1968, Eldridge Cleaver was wounded by San Francisco police, was arrested and charged with parole violation, and was to subsequently return to prison. In November 1968, however, Eldridge Cleaver fled to Cuba and then Algeria. In the summer of 1969, Kathleen Cleaver and Black Panther Party Minister of Culture Emory Douglas joined Eldridge Cleaver in Algeria, where they organized and led the International Section of the Black Panther Party. In July 1969, Kathleen Cleaver gave birth to her son, Maceo, in Algeria; in 1970 her daughter Joju was born in North Korea while Kathleen and Eldridge Cleaver served on the American Peoples Anti-Imperialism Delegation to the International Conference of Revolutionary Journalists.

In 1971, as a result of a dispute between Huey Newton and Eldridge Cleaver, the International Section of the Black Panther Party was expelled from the Party. Following their expulsion from the Party, the International Section members reorganized to form the Revolutionary Peoples Communications Network (RPCN). In 1971, Kathleen Cleaver established the organization's headquarters in New York and traveled throughout the United States building support for the RPCN.

In January 1973, the Cleavers left Algeria and moved to Paris. From Paris, Kathleen Cleaver returned to the United States to arrange for the safe return of her husband and to coordinate his legal defense. In November 1975, Eldridge Cleaver returned to the United States, surrendered to authorities, and served eight months in prison before being released on bail.

In 1981, Kathleen Cleaver separated from her husband and moved with her children to New Haven, Connecticut, where she attended Yale University. She graduated Phi Beta Kappa and summa cum laude with a degree in history in 1984 and entered Yale Law School. In 1987, the Cleavers were divorced; the next year Kathleen Cleaver earned her law degree.

Kathleen Cleaver became an associate at the law firm Cravath, Swaine, and Moore in New York City and, in 1991, was a law clerk in the United States Third Circuit Court of Appeals in Philadelphia. Cleaver also served on the Georgia Supreme Court Commission on Racial and Ethnic Bias in the Courts and as a board member of the Southern Center for Human Rights. She has taught at several universities including Emory University and Yale University and has received numerous fellowships at leading institutions including the Bunting Institute of Radcliffe College, the W. E. B. Du Bois Institute of Harvard University, and the Schomburg Center for Research in Black Culture in New York. In addition to teaching, Cleaver continues her activism for human rights and justice, and for the release of political prisoners.

Clinton, William Jefferson

William Jefferson Clinton (1946–), the 42nd President of the United States from 1993 to 2001, was born in 1946 in Hope, Arkansas. Before his presidency, Clinton served five terms as the governor of Arkansas. As a young man, he attended University of Oxford on a Rhodes scholarship and later attended Yale Law School. Clinton taught constitutional law at the University of Arkansas and served as the attorney general of Arkansas before becoming governor. Clinton already had a wonderful relationship with the African American community in Arkansas when he served as governor. Clinton had more African Americans working for him in his cabinet and state boards than any other governor in Arkansas history.

Bill Clinton has had a relationship with the African American community that has never been experienced by any other president in U.S. history until the recent election of President Barack Obama—so much so that writer Toni Morrison and others have said that Clinton was “the first black president.” Their reasoning partially lies in the fact that his humble beginnings are likened to the experiences felt by many African Americans. In August 1998, an African American owned survey group found that Clinton’s approval rating among African Americans was 93 percent while his approval rating with whites was only 70. In January 2001, Clinton left office with a 93 percent approval rating among African Americans and a 62 percent approval rating with whites.

Clinton’s policies as president also reflect sensitivity to African American causes. Clinton appointed more African Americans to the federal bench than any other president in history. Taken as a whole, his cabinet, agencies, and staff contained more African Americans than any other presidential administration in the history of the United States. Clinton promoted peace in international relations. Many African Americans have indicated their admiration for Clinton’s increased concern and several visits to the continent of Africa. Clinton attended more celebrations for leading African American figures and addressed the needs of minorities and race relations more than any other president in the history of the United States.

Clinton’s administration saw one of the longest periods of economic growth and expansion in history. During his tenure as president, Clinton’s domestic triumphs included policies to upgrade education, a restriction of handgun accessibility, stricter environmental laws, and protection of the jobs of parents who must care for sick children. Characteristics of his presidency include lower interest rates, lower inflation, lower unemployment, and high rates of economic growth. Clinton pushed for additional funds to be allocated for public education and allocated more money for young adults to go to college, all of which benefited the vast majority of African Americans. Clinton continued to promote and defend affirmative action programs while he was attorney general, governor, and president.

Clinton made improving race relations a major theme of his presidency. As president, Clinton was characterized as being a much more “hands on” president than most of the previous presidents. His management style allowed him to get in touch with many African Americans where previous Presidents failed to make the connections. This benefited Clinton in two ways. First, it projected the image to African Americans that he was sensitive to their concerns and needs. Second, it gave him real life experience and perhaps more sensitivity to the needs of the African American community. Bush and Reagan had management styles more suited for bureaucracy. Internationally, his priorities included opening up trade and world peace. Clinton sought to bring peace to various regions and especially Africa, which a great deal of African Americans regard as important.

Clinton’s presidency is characterized by most scholars as open and perhaps a little more sensitive to working cooperatively with foreign governments than previous or later administrations. Several prominent African Americans have indicated their approval and admiration for Clinton’s focus and philosophy in foreign relations. At times his approval rating was very low, setting a record low in his first year, but on leaving office, it was the highest for a retiring president in modern U.S. history. Paradoxically, the majority of Americans were happy he was leaving office, and even less thought he was trustworthy and honest. Ironically, many African Americans felt the opposite and were very sad by his departure. It retrospect, the African American community was better off when Clinton left office than they had been when he took office. African Americans had better access to health care, employment rates were up, additional educational opportunities were provided, and even more important, crime rates were down. Clinton was most instrumental in reducing racial profiling and relieved some of the discriminatory policies of previous administrations that were disadvantageous to African Americans. Throughout the 1980s, many more black men and women were placed behind bars in greater percentages than whites. Clinton pushed to have the laws changed that would administer the same amount of punishment for the possession of an ounce of cocaine or crack. He was elected twice with the highest percentage of the popular vote among his opponents, but never more than 50 percent.

Clinton made several appearances on The Tonight Show before, during, and after leaving the White House. This measure enabled him to be more in touch with common people including African Americans. His relationship with African Americans continued to grow after he left office and opened his office in Harlem. Clinton assisted his wife Hillary Clinton in her campaign for the U.S. Senate where concerns of the African American community were continued to be addressed. It is still somewhat too early to place Clinton’s presidency in historical perspective. Some believe it is a half-century or more before a president may be viewed in their true historical context.

COINTELPRO

Between 1956 and 1971, the Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI) conducted a series of domestic covert action programs, COINTELPROs, which discredited, disrupted, and neutralized leaders, members, and supporters of social movements that threatened the social, political, and economic status quo. Launched in 1961, COINTELPRO-Socialist Worker's Party (SWP) singled out black SWP political campaigns for disruption and attempted to block a developing political alliance with Malcolm X's Organization of Afro-American Unity. Launched on August 25, 1967, the COINTELPRO-Black Nationalist Hate Group operation formally institutionalized previously ad hoc covert operations that had targeted groups such as the Nation of Islam (NOI) and the Southern Christian Leadership Conference (SCLC). These operations had aggravated factionalism in the NOI, exposed "links" between SCLC activists and the Communist Party, and attempted to expose Martin Luther King Jr.'s sexual affairs to induce him to commit suicide. Consisting of 360 documented operations, COINTELPRO-BNHG targeted groups that engaged in civil disobedience, picketing, or antiwar activity; advocated separatism, self-defense, or revolution; or associated with other COINTELPRO targets. This included the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee (SNCC), the Revolutionary Action Movement (RAM), the Junta of Militant Organizations, the Black Liberators, the Invaders, Black Student Unions, and the US Organization; 79 percent of all operations targeted the Black Panther Party (BPP).

FBI agents used surreptitious entry, electronic surveillance, and informants to acquire and covertly distribute material to police, Congress, the media, elected officials, landlords, college presidents and the Internal Revenue Service. By covertly distributing intelligence information and mailing derogatory and scurrilous communications, agents prevented activists from gaining respectability among white liberals, moderate blacks, and other movement people. To discredit activists and organizations, agents alerted local police forces to targets' plans and activities so that they could arrest activists on pretext. To disrupt personal lives, agents sent anonymous communications to spouses alleging infidelity with traveling companions and co-workers. These operations thwarted fund raising, recruiting, organizing, and favorable publicity; prevented coalition building; and harassed movement leaders.

To capitalize on ideological, organizational, and personal conflicts; create factionalism; and provoke conflict between organizations, FBI agents made anonymous telephone calls and created counterfeit movement literature, cartoons, and other notional communications. Alleging misconduct, provoking ridicule, snitch-jacketing activists as informants, and alleging the existence of assassination plots, such communications framed effective movement leaders as embezzlers, charlatans, informants, and provocateurs. Such tactics exacerbated divisions among white leftists and black revolutionaries, between moderates and radicals, and between advocates of public positions on non-violence versus self-defense. COINTELPRO operations also exacerbated and provoked violent conflicts such as those between the Huey Newton and Eldridge Cleaver factions of the BPP, and between the BPP and Jeff Fort's Chicago-based Blackstone Rangers. Similar operations provoked interethnic violence in the streets of New York and San Diego. COINTELPRO operations even helped to provoke members of Ron Karenga's Los Angeles-based US organization to kill four Panthers.

FBI informants raised controversial issues, led factional fights, embezzled funds, provoked violence, and supplied information to justify police raids. A provocateur set up a black man named Larry Ward, offering him money to commit a bombing, and Seattle police killed him in an ambush. William O'Neal facilitated the police killings of Chicago Panthers Fred Hampton and Mark Clark, and George Sams engineered the torture-murder of Alex Rackley by labeling him an informant. FBI and police operations are to blame for perhaps 25 other killings. Informants also committed perjury, even as the FBI suppressed exculpatory evidence, enabling convictions and incarcerations on trumped-up charges. Some black activists fled overseas or went underground; BPP members Dhoruba bin Wahad and Geronimo Pratt were incarcerated for decades before their lawyers exposed the police and FBI misconduct that underlay their convictions. COINTELPRO's legacy includes the devolution of some black power organizations into terrorist cells in the 1970s, as well as a sense of political disempowerment, personal disillusionment, antisocial behavior, and nihilistic violence that has plagued America's urban ghettos ever since. See also: Black Panther Party; Black Power; Carmichael, Stokely (Kwame Ture); Hoover, J. ## Cold War and Civil Rights

The Cold War greatly influenced American race politics and the African American quest for civil rights. On one hand, the struggle with the Soviet Union brought questions of racial equality to the forefront and improved the government's civil rights record. It provided the Civil Rights movement with leverage with the government. On the other hand, it restrained the Civil Rights movement in its activities. The Cold War made civil rights an international issue.

With the victory in World War II, the alliance between the United States and the Soviet Union ended and developed into a stalemate between the two new superpowers. They both longed to fill the new power vacuum. Europe was weakened. The colonial empires of Europe in Asia and Africa disintegrated and new nations evolved. The Soviet Union and the United States struggled for zones of influence throughout the world. Their views of and plans for the world and its future were seemingly irreconcilable. The Soviet Union aspired to expand communism and combat capitalism. The United States feared this expansion and sought instead to spread democratic capitalism in the world. Within the contest for allegiance against communism, the question for civil rights and racial equality became of great importance to the U.S. government. During the Cold War, the world audience became a great factor in shaping American domestic race relations and politics.

The war and the disclosure of the horrors of the Holocaust had discredited ideas of racial superiority. Racism in any form grew to be less acceptable around the world. The assurance of equal human rights for all that was included in the United Nations charter turned into a major principle of world and domestic politics. In the escalating struggle for world leadership and allegiance in the destabilized or newly evolving nations, propaganda and image played an ever-growing role.

To influence emerging nations in Asia and Africa, the Soviet Union attempted to spread distrust of the United States and its claim of world leadership of freedom and democracy. Because of their colonial past, these contested nations were already distrustful of the West. The Soviet Union disseminated America's persistent human rights violations. According to the State Department, in the early 1950s, half of the Soviet propaganda pieces were on racist practices in the United States. The spread of racial violence and the mounting numbers of lynchings after the war were living proof of the American disregard for people of color within and outside the United States.

Not only did the Soviet Union tout the appalling position of African Americans, but newspapers all over the world reported on racial violence in the United States. Foreign countries were appalled by the cruelty and the American government's reluctance to intervene. American racist practices became a worldwide embarrassment for the United States and called into question its legitimacy as a world leader. In late 1947, the report "To Secure These Rights" by the President's Committee on Civil Rights pinpointed the negative influence of American racial inequality on American diplomatic endeavors and image in foreign countries. It underscored the international significance of ending domestic segregation and racism. The Cold War and growing international interest in American domestic policy pressured the United States to adapt its aspired image as the paradigm and bearer of democracy and equality.

As a result of these developments, the White House, the State Department and the Justice Department turned to pro-civil rights and desegregation policy reform to improve its standing in the world and prove its superiority to the Soviet Union. From President Truman through President Johnson's term, the link between the Cold War and international interest in American equal rights and civil rights is most visible. With the Vietnam War, the attention shifted away from the image of domestic racial equality. Although not downplaying the essential importance of the Civil Rights movement and the black vote, foreign policy considerations also undeniably influenced the government's civil rights agenda during the Cold War. Despite the protest of southern whites, the United States began to advance its record on civil rights regulations and launched an image campaign in an effort to counter Soviet propaganda.

The White House, pressed for governmental action on civil rights. The State Department, in particular, was aware of the importance of international opinion in the success of American Cold War foreign policy. Its officials all over the world in their meetings with international audiences, especially at the United Nations, called increased attention to the precarious standing of the United States in the world with respect to race relations. They sought to change the record. The responsible forces, however, also knew that a majority in Congress would not be willing to embrace these plans. Southern Congressmen, who had enormous power in Congress, used the Cold War as a reason for opposing equal rights for minorities. Explaining their opposition to civil rights reform, Southerners primarily argued that a change of race relations was a threat to national security and a hindrance to the aims of American foreign policy. Civil rights reform had to be accomplished mainly without the help of Congress.

Beginning with President Harry S Truman, the civil rights record of the federal government improved. Truman issued executive orders restricting segregation in America. The integration of the American military, accelerated by the Korean War, was internationally one of his most visible civil rights reforms. Truman began to increase the number of African Americans in the State Department and foreign service, a development continued by all subsequent presidents. The State Department also regularly financed trips of African American activists to spread a positive outlook on American race relations and politics.

During Dwight D. Eisenhower's presidency, the decision in Brown v. Board of Education officially ended school desegregation. Brown and the following Little Rock crisis were international issues and stories that highly affected the American image of race relations. Before Brown, the Justice Department had already decided in some cases that racial segregation violated the United Nations Charter and seriously hurt American foreign policy. Its amicus curiae briefs displayed concern for the global implications of the American race problem. The racial integration of Washington, D.C., as representative of the nation, took on a special role and would soon be implemented.

The civil rights reforms undertaken during the Cold War, especially early on, contained a considerable amount of tokenism and window dressing. Although the civil rights reforms were issued and celebrated as a proof of change, their implementation lagged. The government claimed their success in improving civil rights and used it as proof of continuous racial progress, but did not force implementation. Political civil rights advocacy and activism was often designed more for impressing the international audience than for revolutionizing domestic race relations.

Propaganda and communication were key elements in the international endeavor to gain supporters for the United States in the Cold War struggle. The propaganda was intended to influence the world audience. It was to counter Soviet propaganda that constantly played on the chasm between the American claim of freedom and the situation of African Americans. American propaganda constructed a story of constant racial progress. The government argued that only in a democracy could these changes come about. The newly founded United States Information Agency (USIA) had primary responsibility for spreading information of American racial progress internationally. Civil rights progress was also examined for its propaganda value. The continued existence of segregation and the recurring protest and violence against African American civil rights, particularly in the South, created problems with the constructed image of racial change and progress. These incidents, however, were incorporated into the image of America's constant change to the better. It was argued that these were individual cases in restricted areas that proved racial progress was only possible in a democracy.

Although the world audience was the main aim of American propaganda, the domestic audience was also to be convinced of the necessity of civil rights reforms and improvements with the Cold War discourse. Civil rights advocates argued that civil rights were essential to a successful fight against communism, although individual states and people were often not too interested in the claim that civil rights advocacy could support the anticommunist struggle.

As much as segregationists used the Cold War as a tool to protest civil rights reform, the African American Civil Rights movement also attempted to use the Cold War and the international attention as leverage for racial progress. Many African Americans believed that supporting the American anticommunist foreign policy would result in the government fighting domestic discrimination. In their civil rights activism, the African American community felt connected to the emerging third world nations' struggle against colonialism that simultaneously took place. The African American Civil Rights movement was well aware of the international interest in and importance of American race relations. The creation of the United Nations was of service to the African American Civil Rights movements. Although the United Nations would not interfere in U.S. domestic affairs, and the U.S. government did not intend to justify its domestic race relations in front of the UN, the Civil Rights movement used it as a multiplier of information on the African American situation. Petitions on American segregation and racial discrimination to the UN furthered the internationalization of racial issues in the United States. The documents were widely published and discussed in the world press, augmenting the pressure on the American government to improve its standing on racial issues.

In its activism, the Civil Rights movement attempted to make use of the Cold War discourse to pressure for civil rights actions of the government. From Walter White and the NAACP to Martin Luther King, major civil rights leaders made use of the Cold War discourse to influence the domestic audience on issues of civil rights. They argued for the necessity of racial reform if the United States wanted to win the support of the international community, the newly emerging nations of Asia and Africa in particular, and effectively contain the international and national spread of communism.

As much as the Cold War might have informed the Civil Rights movement and its goals, it also seriously restricted it. Anticommunist hysteria, fear of Communist conspiracy, and McCarthyism constrained the leeway for civil rights activism. The infringement of constitutional rights during the Cold War seriously affected the African American Civil Rights movement in particular. Suspecting a Communist threat, the Federal Bureau of Investigation put all civil rights organizations under close scrutiny. As a result of these political and societal pressures, the successful use of mass movement activism and any cooperation with left-leaning organizations were suspicious and nearly impossible. The Civil Rights movement had to spend considerable effort and money to fight any public association with communism assigned to them, a serious allegation that slowed down, seriously weakened, and divided the Civil Rights movements. Only with the decline of the Cold War in the late 1960s could the Civil Rights movement radicalize and step up its activism.

Coleman, Bessie

Elizabeth “Bessie” Coleman (1896–1926) was the first African American licensed pilot. Her early life prepared her for the struggle she would face with race. When she was two, the family moved to the cotton capital of the West, Waxahachie, Texas. Her father built a three-room house in the black area of town, Mustang Creek, where family life revolved around school, the Baptist Church, and the cotton fields. The racial barriers in this city led to her father’s move in 1901 to Indian Territory (Oklahoma) seeking better opportunities as a man and as a provider. Susan Coleman remained behind finding work as a cook and housekeeper for a white family. To ease the burden on their mother, Bessie’s older brothers moved away, leaving Bessie and her sisters at home.

Her intelligence and tenacity appeared early. At age six, she walked four miles to a one-room segregated schoolhouse. Her abilities in math led to her becoming the family’s bookkeeper. Nightly Bible reading sharpened her reading skills. At age 12, Bessie was baptized into the Missionary Baptist Church. By age 14, she used her savings to attend the Colored Agricultural and Normal University in the black town of Langston, Oklahoma. She was unable to continue her education because of lack of money so she returned to her mother's home the next year and worked as a laundress.

World War I opened opportunities and employment in the cities of the North, leading to the Great Migration. Coleman left for Chicago in 1915 to join her brother, Walter. She found employment as a manager of a chili parlor and as a manicurist in a barbershop, where she heard soldiers relate stories of their exploits flying in Europe. Despite taunts from her brother about superior French women who flew airplanes, she continued to save money for flight training.

Coleman proceeded to find aviation schools. Only a few wealthy, white women held a license to fly in 1918. Race was another barrier. As one after another flying school rejected her applications, she turned to Robert Abbott, owner/editor of the Chicago Defender. Impressed with her tenacity and opposed to barriers of race, gender, and class, Abbott and his friend, Jesse Binga, founder/president of Binga State Bank, helped finance her dream of going to France for her training. She studied French at Chicago's Berlitz School, withdrew her savings, and left the United States on November 20, 1920 for Paris. For seven months, she trained at the Federation Aeronautique Internationale on a 27-foot biplane. On June 15, 1921, she received her international pilot's license, making her the first of her race to be licensed.

When she returned to the United States in September, she was a curiosity to the media. Reporters met her plane in New York City. The black press told the tale of her undaunted quest to fly. The Air Service News reported that she had achieved the first license for her race. Black leaders celebrated her achievement. As the guest of honor at the all-black musical, Shuffle Along, Bessie Coleman received a standing ovation from both blacks and whites in attendance.

Coleman started her career as a barnstormer, performing aerial stunts in the Midwest and North. Film of her performances regularly appeared in the black theaters of the North and South. In the South, she performed on the Theatre Owners and Booking Association (TOBA) at circuses, carnivals, and fairs. To change segregation practices, she refused to perform until her audiences were desegregated. This refusal led to desegregated audiences in her hometown and at a major event in Orlando, Florida.

Bessie Coleman encouraged others to pursue flying. She lectured at churches, schools, and clubs to encourage young people to follow her lead and to raise money for her aviation school. The Negro Welfare League invited her to perform at their Field Day on May 1, 1926. Plane owners in Jacksonville, Florida refused to rent, sell, or loan her an airplane, so she had a mechanic fly in her Jenny biplane for the performance. She and the mechanic took a test flight. Aloft, the plane malfunctioned, throwing her out of the plane to her death on April 30, 1926. The mechanic also died in the crash.

Her death brought a tremendous amount of recognition. Her funeral in Chicago drew 10,000 mourners and Ida B. Wells-Barnett led the service. In 1929, an aviation school for blacks opened when William J. Powell established the Bessie Coleman Aero Club in Los Angeles. In 1931, Chicago's black Challenger Pilots' Association started the annual tradition of flying over her grave at Lincoln Cemetery. African American female pilots honored her in 1977 by establishing the Bessie Coleman Aviators Club. The United States Postal Service issued a commemorative stamp in her honor in 1995.

Colored Farmers Alliance

The Colored Farmers Alliance was an organization of African American farmers that promoted agrarian economic advancement through cooperative ventures, agricultural wage scales, and electoral political action across the U.S. South in the late 19th century. First organized in 1886 in Houston County, Texas, the Colored Farmers National Alliance and Cooperative Union was the strongest of three rival organizations that emerged around this time in eastern Texas. Officially chartered in 1888, the alliance elected J. J. Schufer as its first president, although R. M. Humphrey, a white preacher and landowner, served as the order's national spokesman. The alliance had deep roots in black agrarian movements that developed in the early 1880s in Texas, Arkansas, and North Carolina. These earlier organizations, such as the Arkansas-based Sons of the Agricultural Star, relied on ties to the benevolent, church, and political associations that shaped rural black life in the postemancipation South.

The Colored Farmers Alliance shared the concerns and ideas of its organizational ally, the white Farmers Alliance. Members of the order advocated cooperative exchanges where independent agricultural producers could buy goods and market their crops without becoming indebted by crop liens, furnishing merchants, and railroads. In 1890, the Alliance endorsed Henry George's Single Tax, as well as the subtreasury plan put forward by the Farmers Alliance that called for federal intervention to protect the independence of small farm producers. The Colored Alliance differed with its white counterpart on many issues, particularly over the public role of blacks and the wages paid to seasonal cotton workers.

Organizers for the Colored Alliance, most of whom were African American, gathered support from thousands of farmers throughout the Southeast soon after the formation of the order. Racial hostility forced these organizers to work covertly. Instead of holding public meetings, black organizers introduced the idea of the Alliance to community leaders, such as preachers, and then used their trusted networks to build grassroots support. Many women joined the order and in some areas assumed leadership positions in local meetings. By 1890, the alliance claimed more than 250,000 members in 16 states, including 90,000 in Texas, 55,000 in North Carolina, 50,000 in Alabama, 50,000 in Louisiana, 30,000 in South Carolina, and 20,000 in Arkansas, although these figures may be exaggerated. Farmers from plantation belts, small farming areas, and near small towns joined. In the Carolinas and the Mississippi Valley, many Alliance members also belonged to the Knight of Labor. The alliance formed cooperative exchanges in New Orleans, Mobile, Charleston, Norfolk, and Houston. White members of the Farmers Alliance controlled the exchanges, at least publicly.

The rise of Jim Crow in the 1890s complicated the activities of the Colored Alliance and its relationship with the Farmers Alliance. In Mississippi and Arkansas, white elites directed violent attacks on Colored Alliance members who had made public attempts to exert their collective strength. These assaults killed more than 40 African Americans. Pessimistic about mainstream politics, the Colored Alliance, along with the Knights of Labor, led the call for a third-party political challenge in 1891. Where and when the Farmers Alliance decided to support reform candidates, Colored Alliance members voted to support them, despite the opposition of many black Republicans and white Democrats. Little is known about what happened to the Colored Alliance after 1892, although disfranchisement and rising white violence hastened its demise.

Compromise of 1877

The Compromise of 1877 was a behind-the-scenes deal made between Republicans and Democrats following the disputed presidential election of 1876. This deal allowed the Republican nominee, Rutherford B. Hayes, to win the election over his Democratic rival, Samuel J. Tilden, in exchange for numerous concessions to Tilden's main backers, white Democrats from the South. This compromise is traditionally viewed as the end of Reconstruction in the South. As such, it meant the completion of the return of "home rule" to native white Southerners and the abandonment, by most northerners and the federal government, of a policy of defending African American rights in the region.

After the South's defeat in the U.S. Civil War (1861–1865), Republicans, especially Radical Republicans in Congress, pushed for full rights of citizenship to be given to the newly freed slaves. Republicans in Congress passed the Thirteenth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution, which abolished slavery, in 1865. Within another five years, there were two more monumental amendments to the Constitution: the Fourteenth Amendment in 1868 gave full citizenship rights and equal protection under the law to freedmen, and the Fifteenth Amendment in 1870 gave black males the right to vote. Beginning in 1867, Radical Republicans in Congress took charge of the postwar South and a 10-year period of Congressional Reconstruction of the Southern states began. Federal troops were stationed in the defeated states and Republicans, mostly white Northerners and black Southerners, headed Southern state governments. Southern states were given a list of requirements for their readmittance to the Union, and several Southern states were in fact readmitted to the Union by the early 1870s.

Being ruled by their former slaves and their former enemies was anathema to most white Southerners. After native whites regained control of the state government in Mississippi in 1875 through the use of force, only three Southern states remained under Republican rule: Florida, Louisiana, and South Carolina. By 1876, the year of the nation's centennial, an important presidential election would occur, as for the first time since the Civil War it seemed that a Democrat might be elected to the White House.

The election of 1876 hinged on the issue of reform. Democrats painted Republicans, especially the scandal-prone Ulysses Grant administration, as corrupt and connected this image of national corruption to their image of corrupt "Negro rule" in Republican-run state governments in the South during Reconstruction. For Republicans in the North, the Democratic Party was still the party of traitors, as memories of secession and the Civil War still lingered; many Republicans believed it was also the party that would roll back the work of Reconstruction by ignoring black civil rights.

Both major parties chose "safe" candidates for the election. Republicans chose Rutherford B. Hayes, a Cincinnati lawyer, Ohio governor, and a Union general during the Civil War. Democrats chose Samuel J. Tilden, the New York governor who had been instrumental in bringing in many reforms in his home state. Both candidates promised reforms, including more honest government. Tilden publicly called for an end to Reconstruction and the return of "home rule" in the South. Although he did not say so publicly, privately Hayes also believed that "bayonet rule" was a failing policy and that federal troops should no longer prop up Republican governments in the South.

In November 1876, as the election returns came in, it seemed clear to most observers that Tilden had won the election. In order to do so, he needed the "solid South" to remain solidly in the Democratic camp and to win a few northern states as well. After winning New York, Connecticut, New Jersey, Indiana, and apparently all of the former slave states, it seemed that Tilden would be the nation's next president, the first Democrat in the White House since the Civil War. But Hayes's Republican backers contested the election results in the three Southern states still under Republican rule: Florida, Louisiana, and South Carolina. In all other Southern states Democrats controlled the election machinery, but in those three states, Republicans still had some power and, at least in Louisiana and South Carolina, were backed by federal troops at the statehouse. Republicans claimed that white Southerners intimidated blacks at the polls or coerced them into staying away in voting districts in the three contested states. Without counting the three contested states, Tilden led in the Electoral College 184 to 165; he needed only one more electoral vote to win the election. Hayes needed to win all 19 electoral votes from the three contested Southern states (as well as the one contested electoral vote from Oregon) in order to win.

After a couple of months of bickering, Congress took charge in January 1877 by establishing an electoral commission made up of five U.S. senators, five U.S. representatives, and five justices from the U.S. Supreme Court. There were supposed to be seven Republicans, seven Democrats, and one independent on the commission, but the independent voted with the Republicans and Hayes was handed the presidency. Both houses of Congress were then supposed to certify the election results, but the Democratic-controlled House stalled until about a week before the inauguration, scheduled for March 4, 1877. Hayes's Republican backers met secretly with Democratic leaders from the South to broker a deal that would lead to Hayes's ascension to the presidency. In exchange for accepting Hayes as president, Southern Democrats were promised, among other things, more federal money for economic development in the region, a cabinet post for a Southerner, and most important "home rule" in all of the former Confederate states. The last would have the most far-reaching consequences, especially for African Americans in the South. In return for accepting Hayes's election, white supremacist governments run by native Southern "redeemers" became a reality in all former Confederate states.

Congressional Black Caucus

Founded in January 1969, the Congressional Black Caucus (CBC) is a nonpartisan organization of black Congressional representatives. Although it is ostensibly nonpartisan, the CBC has, in reality, functioned as part of the left wing of the Democratic Party since its inception. Initially formed as a "Democratic Select Committee" in January 1969, the organization was renamed the Congressional Black Caucus in February 1971. Among the founders of the CBC were Representatives John Conyers and Charles Diggs of Michigan, Ron Dellums and Gus Hawkins of California, Charlie Rangel and Shirley Chisholm of New York, Louis Stokes of Ohio, Ralph Metcalf and George Collins of Illinois, Parren Mitchell of Maryland, Robert Nix of Pennsylvania, William Clay of Missouri, and Walter Fauntroy, the delegate from Washington, D.C. Since 1969, only African American members of Congress have been part of the CBC.

From its beginning in 1969 through 1994, the CBC was considered an official office of Congress and had its own offices, staff, and budget. When Republicans became the majority party in the House of Representatives in 1994, these privileges were ended and, since that time, the CBC claims as its official address the office of the member serving as chair. The principal goals of the CBC are to close achievement and opportunity gaps in education, to help provide quality and universal health care, to achieve equity for African Americans in all areas of American life, to establish retirement security and welfare funding, and to create foreign policy equity, particularly as it relates to the African Diaspora. In addition to these goals, members of the caucus have endorsed and taken part in the antiapartheid movement, the 1995 Million Man March in Washington, D.C., and the 2009 "Fast for Life" campaign to bring attention to the Darfur crisis.

Most recently, in April 2009, seven members of the CBC traveled to Cuba to meet with former Cuban president Fidel Castro as part of an effort to facilitate more positive and normalized relationships with the new Cuban government. Praising Castro as a courteous and hospitable host,

Illinois state representative Bobby Rush speaks during a news conference in Havana on April 7, 2009. this delegation called for an end to the travel ban and the longstanding trade embargo imposed on Cuba during the visit and upon their return to the United States. The CBC delegation also noted that Castro was seemingly receptive to the current president—and former CBC member—Barack Obama's overtures to the people and government of Cuba, as well as to Cuban Americans. These moves toward reconciliation may have been a factor in the June 3, 2009 decision by the Organization of American States to lift its suspension of Cuba, which barred the Communist nation from sending representatives for the last 47 years.

Currently, the CBC has 44 members—1 senator and 43 representatives—including two nonvoting members of the House representing Washington, D.C. (Eleanor Holmes Norton) and the U.S. Virgin Islands (Donna Christian-Chistensen). In the 111th Congress, Representative Barbara Lee of California serves as its chair. On a host of issues, the CBC joins with the Progressive Caucus (with whom it shares many members), the Congressional Hispanic Caucus, and the Congressional Asian Pacific American Caucus.

Congressional Reconstruction

Congressional or Radical Reconstruction refers to the period beginning in 1867 when Radical Republicans successfully gained control over Reconstruction from President

Andrew Johnson. In the aftermath of President Abraham Lincoln's assassination, Johnson, Lincoln's vice president and a slave-owning Southerner, initially directed Reconstruction efforts without sufficient checks and balances. This was due to the fact that Congress was in recess from April to December 1865. In the Presidential Reconstruction plan, Johnson offered amnesty to any ex-Confederate who took an oath of loyalty; he did not support African American suffrage; and he insisted that each Confederate state accept the Thirteenth Amendment. His plan did not punish Confederates. In issuing 7,000 pardons by January 1866, Johnson allowed high-ranking Confederate officials to reassume their previous political and economic domination over the South. In turn, these officials helped erect the so-called Black Codes, which were blanket denials of civil rights and citizenship for African Americans in the South. In sum, those who were in power before the Civil War were back in power under Johnson's plan for Reconstruction. Likewise, those who were enslaved before the war were still to be oppressed and denied the basic rights of citizenship guaranteed by the U.S. Constitution.

When Congress reconvened in December 1865, they moved to immediately address Johnson's conciliatory policies. The Republican sweep during the 1866 congressional elections, in which they won two-thirds majorities in both the House of Representatives and the Senate, granted them ability to override any of Johnson's presidential vetoes. With this immense power and driven by the zeal of the Radical Republicans, Congress passed the first of three Reconstruction Acts in March 1867. Under the terms of this act, all of the Confederate states, with the exception of Tennessee, were to be divided into five military districts and placed under the authority of a Union general. Martial law would be strictly enforced in these districts and military personnel would protect African Americans and others. In addition, each state had to draft new constitutions and submit them to voters for approval. In the process of electing delegates to draft new constitutions and having each state vote to approve them, the Reconstruction Act granted universal male suffrage. For the first time in Southern history, African American men were granted the right to vote and participate in politics. Finally, every Southern state had to accept the Fourteenth Amendment, which granted African Americans citizenship rights and stripped away the right to vote and hold political office from high-ranking Confederates.

As a result of Congressional Reconstruction, the South experienced some semblance of democracy for the first time in its history. Despite the claims of "Negro domination" and "black supremacy," the work of the biracial delegations that rewrote Southern constitutions resulted in state governments that created and passed progressive legislation throughout the South. For example, these state governments created the first public schools in Southern history; expanded the political franchise by eliminating property qualifications for voting; and rebuilt railroads, bridges, and roads destroyed throughout the South during the Civil War. Unfortunately, Radical Reconstruction lasted for only a decade. With the Election of 1876, Rutherford B. Hayes ended Reconstruction by withdrawing federal troops from the South. With the return of home rule, much of the gains African Americans witnessed during Reconstruction were reversed. After 1877, Southern states moved aggressively to undercut the rights African Americans had enjoyed for just over a decade. By the 1890s, Jim Crow segregation, political disfranchisement, lynching, race riots, and general lawlessness characterized white redemption and white Democratic control of the South.

Cooper, Anna Julia

Anna Julia Cooper's (1858-1964) life spanned the antebellum period to the Civil Rights movement, and from her early childhood to her death she was committed to the causes of women's and racial equality. She was a teacher, principal, feminist, clubwoman, community activist, scholar, social theorist, and mother. Anna Julia Cooper was born Anna Julia Haywood, the daughter of an enslaved woman, Hannah Stanley Haywood, and her white master, George Washington Haywood, in Raleigh, North Carolina, on August 10, 1858. She was raised by her mother and later credited many of her successes to her mother's devotion. Like most antebellum mulatto children, Cooper had very little contact with her father. Growing up during the era of Reconstruction, however, meant that Cooper was among the first generation of educated freed black children. The schoolhouse and the church were the two primary institutions Cooper interacted with throughout her life. In 1865, just after the Civil War's conclusion, and at the age of nine, she was admitted on scholarship to St. Augustine's Normal School and Collegiate Institute, an Episcopalian institution for freedpersons. Cooper remembered St. Augustine's as embodying the perfect balance between intellectual rigor and spiritual guidance. Like many of her free and newly freed contemporaries, Cooper was raised to believe that education was essential to racial progress. Just three years after enrolling in St. Augustine's College, she was already tutoring older students. From 1871 to 1881, she also taught Latin, Greek, and mathematics.

At St. Augustine's College, Anna Julia Haywood met an aspiring young Protestant Episcopal minister George Cooper. In 1877, at nineteen years of age, she married him and became Anna Julia Cooper. But just two years later, she was widowed, and it was this misfortune that enabled her to seriously pursue a career in education—a field closed to most married women. While marriage and family were the major hallmarks of most 19th-century women's lives, for Cooper the former was buried with her husband and the latter did not arrive until mid-life, when she became the primary caregiver to two foster youth and five orphaned children.

Completing her education at St. Augustine's in 1881, she applied to Oberlin College. In her mid-twenties, she moved to Ohio to attend Oberlin where she received both a bachelor's degree in math (1884) and later a master's degree in college teaching (1887). Between receiving her degrees from Oberlin she taught first at Wilberforce, in Ohio, and again at St. Augustine's. Her distinction as one of Oberlin's few black graduates—only five black women earned degrees from Oberlin by 1899—in conjunction with her years of classroom experience, made her a particularly attractive teaching candidate. The superintendent of Colored Schools in Washington, D.C., invited her to teach at the Colored Preparatory School in 1887. Cooper served her school in numerous capacities during her tenure, first, as a math and science teacher, eventually as principal, and later as a Latin teacher.

Her teaching responsibilities, however, did not stifle her scholarly instinct or prohibit her from examining and contesting the racial and gender constraints of Southern Jim Crow. Cooper was an active participant in the women's and Civil Rights movements of the late-19th century. She delivered numerous addresses and speeches before diverse audiences, ranging from the colored clergy of the Protestant Episcopal Church, to educators, and feminists. At 34 she published A Voice from the South (1892), a series of lectures and essays delivered and written between 1886 and 1892. The first set of essays in A Voice from the South—"Womanhood: A Vital Element in the Regeneration and Progress of a Race," "The Higher Education of Women," "Woman versus the Indian," and "The Status of Woman in America"—examining the historical status and contemporary significance of womanhood, have garnered the most scholarly attention. While emphasizing women's domestic responsibilities and the need for a womanly influence in a masculine world, Cooper simultaneously asserted men's and women's moral equality and advocated women's self-development and broad entrance and incorporation into society. While arguing that all racial progress lay on the shoulders of women, she appeared most comfortable with women shouldering that burden at home. Highly critical of southern white women and the women's movement on account of their racism, she pushed all women to embrace their public responsibilities as racial intermediaries and peacemakers. Higher education would be central to women's new role. In the same breath that she advocated higher education, however, she deflected the new public possibilities this education might offer women. Yet recalling and praising her feminist foremothers—Sojourner Truth, Sarah Woodson Early, Charlotte Forté Grimké, Hallie Quinn Brown, and Frances Watkins Harper—Cooper argued that the domestic realm was no longer women's only sphere; rather every area was open to women in the new era.

Although the 1890s witnessed southern black male disenfranchisement, rampant labor discrimination, and the proliferation of public and private segregation, Cooper and her black feminist contemporaries were hopeful that the new spaces created by and for women would benefit all African Americans. Rather than seeing the nadir of African American civil rights as a separate phenomenon from what she and her contemporaries called the “woman’s era,” Cooper envisioned the woman’s era as opening the door to rapid racial progress for both sexes. Her conception of womanhood echoed the sentiments of a growing cadre of women who stood with her in the African American club women’s movement. These women reclaimed the word “womanly,” extending its meaning beyond the hollow platitudes of soft, fragile, shallow, and submissive to denote rationality, ambition, education, and leadership.

The second set of essays in A Voice from the South—“Has America a Race Problem? If so, How Can It Best Be Solved?,” “The Negro as Presented in American Literature,” “What Are We Worth?” and “The Gain from a Belief”—are directed less toward the woman question and more toward the race question, although Cooper clearly saw the two as interdependent and inextricably connected. In these essays, she asserted that racial diversity was not a weakness, but the nation’s greatest strength. She challenged negative literary portrayals of African Americans, arguing that cruel stereotypes revealed more about white racism than about African Americans. Contesting Henry Ward Beecher’s claim that the world would not be poorer if the African continent sank, she argued that African Americans had a heritage deserving of respect and that Christian manhood and womanhood, the true measures of one’s worth, were not limited by race or class.

As much as Cooper was a scholar, she was equally an activist. Her scholarship was nearly always in service to social activism and dedicated to the causes of women’s and racial equality. Shortly after the publication of A Voice from the South, Anna Julia Cooper, Mary Church Terrell, and Mary Jane Patterson founded the Colored Women’s League of Washington, D.C. She was also active in the National Association of Colored Women when the Colored Women’s League became one of its first affiliates, in 1894. Black clubwomen, like Cooper, advocated a racial uplift philosophy premised on self-help; were active proponents and defenders of black womanhood and of women as racial redeemers; and offered critical appraisals of both Jim Crow and patriarchal policies. As much as Cooper’s essays can be read as scholarly articles, they were equally declarations of a black Christian feminist worldview and movement. Cooper was also an active participant in local and international conferences such as the Pan-African Conference held in London in 1900. She was a YWCA Life Member, serving on their board of directors for a decade. She also worked with the Colored Social Settlement, 1901–1907, 1911–1918, and was a Guardian for the Camp Fire Girls.

In 1901, Cooper was appointed principal of M Street High School in Washington, D.C. A fervent advocate of both industrial and higher education, she encouraged her students to be true to themselves whether it was as craftsmen or professionals. Her students were very successful; several were granted admission to prestigious universities. Cooper’s efforts to have her school accredited, in a time when African American advances were being rolled back, proved to be her undoing. Racism, sexism, sexual innuendoes, and the hostile force of Booker T. Washington’s Tuskegee machine contributed to her eventual dismissal. Around 1906, she was removed from her position as principal. That same year, she moved to Missouri and began teaching at Lincoln Institute. This painful setback, however, did not squelch Cooper’s fire or commitment to education. In 1911, she returned to Washington, D.C., taking a teaching position at the school she once presided over.

In her mid-fifties, Cooper embarked on several new and significant adventures. She began two doctoral programs, one at Columbia University, in 1914, and the other at the Sorbonne, in 1924. Between teaching and studying, she took on the added responsibility of becoming the legal guardian to five small children in 1915. Caring for five children, teaching at M Street School, and taking only one short and highly contested sabbatical leave, Cooper managed to defend her doctoral thesis at the Sorbonne, in 1925 at 66 years of age. That same year, she received a doctoral degree from Howard University.

Five years later, in 1930, she retired from her M Street teaching position and began another career as president of Frelinghuysen University for adult education in Washington, D.C. She moved the school to her home and spent most of her seventies presiding over it. In her eighties, she resigned from the presidency, but continued to teach at the school, and published two works of great personal importance. First, around 1945, Cooper published The Third Step, an autobiographical essay. Then, in 1951, she published her Personal Recollections of the Grimké Family. Cooper lived not only to celebrate her 100th birthday, but to the age of 105. She died peacefully in her home and was buried in her birthplace, Raleigh, North Carolina on March 4, 1964.

CORE

The Congress of Racial Equality (CORE) was an early pioneer of nonviolent direct-action campaigns that took place during the Civil Rights movement during the 1950s and 1960s. The organization grew out of the Christian pacifist student organization, the Fellowship of Reconciliation (FOR), which was started in 1942. At the outset, the group's goal was to foster improvement in race relations. CORE's nonviolent, direct-action ideology was used a number of times within urban African American communities during the era in their struggle against racial discrimination. These protests developed out of a long-established protest tradition that ranged from the "Don't Buy Where You Can't Work" campaigns in Chicago and New York City during the 1930s, A. Philip Randolph's March on Washington movement of the 1940s, and the more militant mood among African Americans over the obvious contradictions between American's democratic war propaganda and its violation of democratic principles at home. Each of these campaigns came in response to inadequate housing opportunities, job segregation, and discrimination in public accommodations and public spaces that resulted from white resistance to the growing number of black migrants moving north in search of better economic and social opportunities in the World War II and postwar periods.

The first CORE chapter, the Chicago Committee of Racial Equality, was formed in 1942 at the University of Chicago. The leaders of this new, interracial organization, which included future national directors James Farmer and James A. Robinson, were skeptical and critical of conservative actions of older civil rights groups like the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP) and the National Urban League, which often insisted on lengthy legal battles to fight Jim Crow. They instead embarked on campaigns that directly confronted discrimination in housing, employment, and public accommodations. In March 1942, for instance, the group chose the White City Roller Rink as its first site to test Illinois's civil rights law. Here, 24 CORE members sought entry into the facility. When the African Americans in the group were denied entry, the group negotiated with the manager to end segregation at the location. Later that same year, the group targeted discrimination in housing at the University of Chicago Hospital and Medical School and at the university barbershop.

After changing its name to the Congress of Racial Equality in 1943, CORE expanded its operations and affiliated with other civil rights groups across the country. This proved difficult because CORE affiliates resisted centralized leadership out of the belief that a central structure would deprive local chapters of valuable, and often limited, financial resources. Moreover, problems in northern urbanized areas transcended mere segregation and encompassed a myriad of other issues, in particular, residential and employment discrimination. Many chapter leaders believed that creating a bureaucracy unfamiliar with local issues would severely limit the type of activism that could be used.

Despite this resistance, throughout the late 1940s and early 1950s, local CORE groups managed some substantial victories. In 1949, St. Louis CORE, operating in a locale whose African American populace had increased during wartime migration, launched a successful campaign to desegregate Woolworth lunch counters through sit-ins and picketing. In another example, CORE operations in Omaha, Nebraska, successfully pressured a local Coca-Cola plant to agree to more equitable hiring practices. Unfortunately, the successes of these campaigns were not enough to maintain morale and activism among CORE affiliates across the nation. By 1954, while the NAACP was enjoying success as a result of the Brown v. Board of Education case, and 1955, when Martin Luther King Jr., and the Montgomery bus boycott gained national attention, CORE suffered from organizational disarray and growing anti-Communist investigations.

In 1961, CORE reached an important point in its organizational history when James Farmer, after a brief time working for the NAACP, became its national director. Farmer's influence on CORE's activism developed after he attended Howard University's Divinity School. Farmer refused ordination as a Methodist minister, citing that he could not preach in a church that practiced discrimination. Subsequently he began work for a number of pacifist and socialist groups, applied for conscientious objector status, and was deferred from the draft during World War II because of his divinity degree. During his early career as an activist, Farmer worked for two Chicago organizations, a pacifist group, the Fellowship of Reconciliation (FOR), in 1941, and later CORE from 1942 to 1945. With FOR, Farmer helped draft responses to such social ills as war, violence, bigotry, and poverty. With CORE, where he served as the group's first chair, Farmer proposed a new strategy based less on religious pacifism and more on the principle of nonviolent direct action that was used in northern urban areas during the Great Migration and World War II eras as African Americans increasingly questioned the contradictions between American racism and the nation's war for democracy.

Before Farmer, whose charisma proved invaluable in strengthening CORE's ability to increase its profile within the African American community, CORE had begun to develop a reputation as being a predominately white organization. With Farmer as its leader, the group moved into a more influential position among African American protest organizations because of its willingness to directly confront racial inequality.

On May 4, 1961, CORE brought its confrontational style to the Deep South when 13 CORE members departed via bus from Washington, D.C., in two interracial groups as part of the Freedom Rides. The endeavor was modeled after the 1946 Journey of Reconciliation, which tested the limits of a Supreme Court ruling banning discrimination in interstate travel sponsored by CORE and FOR. The Freedom Rides, a demonstration that Farmer had long pushed the NAACP to undertake, was aimed at challenging southern segregation in interstate travel and testing a recent Supreme Court ruling, Boydton v. Virginia, that extended nondiscrimination in interstate travel to bus terminal accommodations. On May 13, outside Birmingham, Alabama, an armed mob attacked the buses carrying a group of Freedom Riders and firebombed one of the buses. These incidents prompted CORE activists to abandon the remainder of their trip, and the riders were transported to New Orleans under the protection of the Justice Department. These actions, although initially disappointing, stimulated other freedom rides throughout the South and demonstrated how a protest strategy, tested and proven in northern states, could be implemented in the South. In the end, the Freedom Rides and voter registration drives in the South succeeded in moving CORE into a better position to fight racism throughout the North and South.

The visceral hatred demonstrated by southern whites and the extreme racial violence aimed against the Freedom Riders made national news and thrust CORE into the national spotlight. The events surrounding the Freedom Rides transformed the national profile of the group in civil rights circles. During Farmer's tenure, CORE soon developed a reputation of being one of the "Big Four" in the Civil Rights movement, along with Roy Wilkins of the NAACP, Whitney Young, of the National Urban League, and Martin Luther King Jr. of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference, and was considered by most to be the spiritual leader of the movement.

In 1962, CORE, the Student Nonviolence Coordinating Committee (SNCC), and the NAACP organized its Freedom Summer campaign. The primary objective was to attempt to end the political disenfranchisement of African Americans in the Deep South. Volunteers from these three groups concentrated efforts in Mississippi where, in 1962, only 6.7 percent of African Americans in the state were registered to vote, the lowest percentage in the country. This activism included the formation of the Mississippi Freedom Democratic Party (MFDP). CORE, along with SNCC and NAACP, also established 30 Freedom Schools in towns throughout Mississippi. Volunteers taught in the schools and the curriculum now included black history and the philosophy of the Civil Rights movement. During the summer of 1964, more than 3,000 students attended these schools and the experiment provided a model for future educational programs such as Head Start.

White mobs frequently targeted the Freedom Schools but also attacked the homes of local African Americans involved in the campaign. During the summer months 30 black homes and 37 black churches were bombed, and more than 80 volunteers were beaten by white mobs or racist police officers. Also, there was the murder of three men, James Chaney, Andrew Goodman, and Michael Schwerner by the Ku Klux Klan on June 21, 1964. These deaths created nationwide publicity for the campaign.

The year 1963 ushered in a new philosophy in the Civil Rights movement—"Freedom Now!" For many activists within CORE, the achievements won between 1960 and 1963 brought only token success. This new philosophy brought organizations like CORE into more substantial debates with the NAACP and Urban League, which were devoting much of their resources to ending segregation in the public space and less attention to economic freedom. Nowhere was this more important than in the 1963 March on Washington. In the initial planning of the 1963 march, CORE was approached by A. Philip Randolph to cosponsor the event. As the event grew and more organizations agreed to participate, however, the original impetus of the march—jobs—became a secondary focus behind the passage of the 1964 Civil Rights Act. Moreover, the NAACP, the Urban League, and the Southern Christian Leadership Conference (SLC) openly argued against militant direct action or sit-ins in exchange for CORE's participation. This conflict accentuated an already contentious relationship between CORE and these other groups over such issues as membership, funding, and prestige.

By 1964, civil rights activists found it increasingly difficult to coordinate activities with other groups. For CORE, this cooperation was made more difficult, as the organization developed a more militant critique of the Vietnam War and American society began to publicly distance itself from an integrationist platform and membership such as those in more moderate organizations like the NAACP and SCLC. This conflict gained growing momentum within CORE when Floyd McKissack succeeded James Farmer in 1966. McKissack's ascension marked a shift from an adherence to Gandhian principles of nonviolent direct action to a philosophy of black nationalism.

This nationalist shift of CORE modeled that of other groups of the period, particularly, SNCC. For CORE this position was not only a marked departure from the group's origins but also alienated white members and financial support. Although during McKissack's tenure whites were not expelled from the organization, during the 1967 CORE convention, McKissack's opponents within the group demanded the dismissal of all white members from the organization. In 1968, Roy Innis became national director, and the transition of CORE into a black nationalist body was complete. White financial support virtually disappeared, and CORE found itself at the brink of bankruptcy.

After 1968, political developments within the organization caused CORE to create a more politically conservative platform. For example, CORE supported the presidential candidacy of Richard Nixon in 1968 and 1972. More recently, CORE commented on same sex marriage and black health, calling the issue not something that is a civil right but a human one. Moreover, COREcares, an HIV/AIDS advocacy, education, and prevention program for black women, was dismantled; and Innis is on the board of Project 21, a conservative public policy group that provides broadcasters and the print media with prominent African American conservative commentators as columnists and guests. The organization refers to itself as "The National Leadership Network of Black Conservatives."

Cosby, Bill

William Henry Cosby Jr. (1937–), comic, actor, and social commentator, was born in Philadelphia, Pennsylvania. His mother, Annie "Anna" Pearl Cosby, worked as a housekeeper. His father, William Cosby Sr., worked as a welder and then became a mess steward in the U.S. Navy. Cosby shined at Channing Wister Elementary School and became captain of the baseball and track teams and class president. He continued his dedication to sports at Fitz-Simmons Junior High and Central High School. While in high school, Cosby also helped his family financially by shining shoes and delivering groceries. With so many pursuits, his grades suffered and Cosby transferred to Germantown High School in 1956. After failing the 10th grade, Cosby left school and joined the Navy. While in the Navy, Cosby ran track and completed high school. He was honorably discharged in 1960 and went to Temple University on an athletic scholarship.

To have supplemental money in college, Cosby worked as a bartender in a café called The Underground. When the local comedian failed to perform his acts at the café, Cosby stood in and gained a quick following. Using material from the popular comedians Nipsey Russell and Flip Wilson, Cosby also added his amusing tales of life experiences. His first major performance quickly followed in 1962 at the Gaslight Café, a popular coffeehouse. Cosby left Temple to pursue comedy full time and performed throughout the United States. He was later awarded his bachelor's degree by Temple in 1971 and received his master's degree in 1972 and doctorate degree in 1977 from the University of Massachusetts.

While performing in a local club in Maryland in 1963, he met Camille Olivia Hanks. Hanks and Cosby soon dated and were married on January 25, 1964, in Olney, Maryland. Soon after the wedding, Cosby completed his first comedy album called Bill Cosby Is a Very Funny Fellow... Right! The album won a Grammy Award and was followed by a host of other Grammy Award-winning albums: I Started Out as a Child, 1965; Why Is There Air?, 1966; Wonderfulness, 1967; Revenge, 1967; and Russell, My Brother, Whom I Slept With, 1969.

Cosby parlayed his stage and recording success into acting. In 1965, he accepted a role on the television show I Spy and was the first African American in a national prime-time drama. Because of his talent in the series, Cosby garnered Emmy Awards in 1966, 1967, and 1968. He left I Spy to work on The Bill Cosby Show, which ran from 1969 to 1971. Cosby then turned to animation and used his childhood experiences to create the successful children's series named Fat Albert and the Cosby Kids. Critics praised the show's promotion of morals and ethics. After airing from 1972 to 1979, the show was renamed The New Fat Albert and the Cosby Kids. Cosby won another Emmy Award in 1981 for outstanding achievement in children's programming.

In 1984, Cosby started his next television series The Cosby Show, which boosted his appeal worldwide. He also demonstrated his talent as the lead actor, co-producer, and executive consultant of the show. The show's positive images of African Americans, encouragement of attending black colleges, and universal life scenarios generated millions of viewers. The series won three Emmy Awards, and Cosby won a NAACP Spingarn Medal in 1985. After The Cosby Show ended in 1992, Cosby starred in You Bet Your Life (1992–1993) and The Cosby Mysteries (1994). In 1996, he returned to a comedic sitcom called Cosby and teamed again with Phylicia Rashad from The Cosby Show. The show ran until 2000.

In addition to television, Cosby also earned some prestige in movies. He co-starred with Sidney Poitier in Uptown Saturday Night in 1974 and A Piece of Action in 1977. His later works, though, were not so well received. Critics had mixed reviews of his work in California Suite (1978), The Devil and Max Devlin (1981), Leonard Part VI (1987), Ghost Dad (1990), The Meteor Man (1993), and Jack (1996).

Cosby returned to the spotlight with his 1994 induction into the Academy of Television Arts and Sciences Hall of Fame and lifetime achievement award at the prestigious Kennedy Center Honors in 1998. A year later, he created a children's book series called "Little Bill." Cosby dedicated the books to his son Ennis, who was killed in 1997. The book series was soon turned into a television program on Nickelodeon. Cosby also wrote the humorous guide for college graduates titled Congratulations! Now What?: A Book For Graduates in 1999. As they did with his previous successful texts Fatherhood (1986), Time Flies (1987), Love and Marriage (1989), and Childhood (1991), readers enjoyed Cosby's entertaining stories and amusing insights. His next text Cosbyology (2001) featured his comical opinions about life. Cosby also shared his thoughts about healthy eating in I Am What I Ate... And I'm Frightened in 2003.

Cosby continues to be recognized for his contributions to the arts. He received the notable Presidential Medal of Freedom in 2002 and the Lifetime Achievement Emmy Award in 2003. He is also active in the film industry and oversaw the movie production of Fat Albert in 2004. Cosby also speaks at college graduation ceremonies and donates money to several African American colleges.

Cotton States Exposition

In 1894, civic leaders in Atlanta, Georgia, inspired by the 1893 Chicago Worlds Fair, decided to highlight the progress made in the South in a grand affair called the Cotton States Exposition. Two previous expositions were held in 1881 and 1887. The 1895 event is the most well known.

Realizing they needed additional funding for this event, white leaders took a contingent of black leaders to Washington, D.C., to lobby Congress for funds. The three black men, Bishop W. J. Gaines, Bishop Abram L. Grant, and Booker T. Washington, explained the benefits such a fair would be to black Americans. The group mentioned that blacks were unable to participate fully in the Chicago Worlds Fair. In contrast, they said, the 1895 Atlanta Cotton States Exposition would allow blacks to prove their worth to the world. The exposition would be the first to feature blacks prominently in displays, thus proving to Congress that the event could help improve southern race relations.

Booker T. Washington, the founder and head of the Tuskegee Institution in Alabama, soon found himself thrust into the national spotlight. White leaders decided to have Washington offer a speech during the inaugural ceremony of the Atlanta Exposition. Washington had delivered speeches to audiences of blacks, northern whites, and southern whites before. In fact, southern conservative whites chose him to speak at the exposition partly because they had heard him speak on two previous occasions. In Atlanta, he would have to speak to all of these groups simultaneously.

In what scholars have labeled the “Atlanta Compromise Speech,” Washington addressed the issues facing the South entering the 20th century. He called for blacks to forego politics, traditionally the domain of white males, in favor of economic advancement. But as his critics would mention, for a people with little resources, doing so would entail working for others with the mere hope of one day accumulating enough money to open a business. Washington, however, perceived of the South as home and thought blacks needed to stay put in the region they knew best.

The “Atlanta Compromise Speech” also addressed white Southerners. Conjuring up images of friendly race relations during slavery and black loyalty during the Civil War, Washington implied that the extra-legal violence against blacks advocated by some southern whites was unprovoked. Instead, he thought blacks and southern whites knew each other intimately and should be the best of friends. To rich, conservative whites, those who owned the businesses that employed blacks, Washington promised blacks would continue to be nonparticipants in strikes and labor disputes. Given the rising number of European immigrants who would compete with blacks for jobs, it is clear Washington meant to compare blacks favorably against the perception of these immigrants as labor radicals. This five-minute speech met widespread approval among most Americans.

After the Atlanta Cotton States Exposition, Booker T. Washington became the unquestioned “leader” of black America. Fredrick Douglass had died earlier in the year, and there seemed to be no black American poised to speak for the race in an era of increasing racial discrimination. Washington served as the nonthreatening spokesperson for blacks, whom whites in the North and the South could accept. Since 1877, the apparent end of Reconstruction, the North had allowed southern whites to decide how best to handle the race situation. As a result, southern blacks gradually lost most of the social and political gains made since emancipation. It was with this reality in mind that Washington delivered this speech.

Within the black community, Washington gained enemies among those who thought his public acceptance of the status quo in race relations further harmed African American attempts to end discrimination; W. E. B. Du Bois and William Monroe Trotter were the most focal this group. Washington possessed the power to dispense political appointments and award financial backing for projects via his friendship with rich, industrial philanthropists. To enemies, Washington was a charlatan who traded black political rights for personal gain. To friends, Washington was a sensible leader in a time of racial discord.

It has become clear that despite the rhetoric of the Atlanta Compromise Speech, Washington secretly funded court cases aimed at challenging Jim Crow segregation laws in the South. Southern civic leaders proposed the Atlanta Cotton States Exposition as a means to highlight their perception of progress in the New South. Part of this progress was the continued racial subjugation of African Americans. The Atlanta Compromise Speech by Booker T. Washington acknowledged this attempt by elite whites to include African Americans in the southern social system, albeit in a subordinate position. Perceiving the continued disfranchising of black citizens in the South, Washington chose to accept the system in his public speeches while privately working to some extent to eradicate racial segregation. See also: Accommodationism; Du Bois, W. ## Daddy Grace

Charles Manuel “Sweet Daddy” Grace (1881–1960) was the founder of the United House of Prayer for all People of the Church on the Rock of the Apostolic Faith (shortened as United House of Prayer or UHOP), an ecumenical and racially integrated Christian group with deep roots in Pentecostalism. Daddy Grace was born Marceline Manuel DaGraca in the Portuguese territory of Brava, Cape Verde. His family immigrated to America when he was 22 and settled in Bedford, Massachusetts, where Marceline DaGraca changed his name to Charles Grace. In Massachusetts, Grace was drawn to Protestantism (although he was baptized Catholic in Brava) and quickly became conscious of racial divisions in the churches he attended. In the face of this religious crisis, Grace called for a revival that would erase all divisions within Christianity, specifically divisions among the denominations and races. By 1919, Grace had gathered a number of followers and opened the first United House of Prayer in Wareham, Massachusetts. In 1926, the United House of Prayer for all People of the Church on the Rock of the Apostolic Faith was incorporated in Washington, D.C. with the mission of maintaining places of worship open to all people regardless of denominational affiliation or race.

During the 1920s and 1930s, the United House of Prayer grew dramatically under Grace’s charismatic leadership. Grace regularly preached to integrated congregations, and his message was especially well received in urban areas. As an evangelical Christian, Grace believed that human beings were living in the end times and taught that miracles and other supernatural events occurred regularly. Grace performed healings and encouraged his followers to heal themselves by faith. Worship in the United House of Prayer was, and still is, charismatic, characterized by tongues speaking, ecstatic praise, shouting, dancing, and lively music performed by choirs, bands, and congregants. Members were encouraged to invest their time in church activities and attend daily religious services.

Under Grace, UHOP facilities operated as community centers and offered congregants access to economic opportunities. One of the greatest successes and attractions of the United House of Prayer was its economic stability. Grace invested money from his congregants in a diversity of businesses and real estate ventures. Members bought and sold community manufactured products like Daddy Grace toothpaste, Daddy Grace cold cream, and Daddy Grace hair straightener. The ministry also published Grace Magazine. The wealth generated from these projects allowed the church to offer pension plans and insurance to its preachers and the elderly. During the Great Depression, United House of Prayer churches helped to stabilize black communities and provided jobs, food, and resources.

A flamboyant and extravagant personality, Grace portrayed himself as a man of means, traveling with an extensive entourage of assistants, bodyguards, and a chauffeur. With a thin mustache, long hair, and nails painted red, white, and blue, Daddy Grace was always seen wearing new bright suits and expensive jewelry. Frequent UHOP celebrations, baptisms, festivals, and parades thrust the group further into the public eye. Grace’s persona both attracted and repulsed onlookers. Skeptics viewed Grace as a cult leader and portrayed his followers as naive victims of economic and religious exploitation. Others saw Grace’s displays of wealth and power as evidence of divine blessing from God. For many people, especially African Americans, Grace’s success attracted attention and offered hope that social mobility and economic prosperity were possible. Moreover, Grace’s community was a social utopia where people of all backgrounds could worship together freely and equitably. In a world where outside forces limited individual freedoms and prohibited equal access to resources, Grace’s interpretation of Christianity challenged the social order through supernatural and real-world activities.

Like his contemporary, Father Divine, Daddy Grace offered believers structure, community, and economic support during uncertain times. During the Great Depression, Divine and Grace were able to provide for their members and secure wealth, an accomplishment that particularly incensed struggling whites. During their lives, Grace and Divine faced public controversy and legal challenges that were, at least in part, instigated by white fear. Paving the way for the Civil Rights movement, both Grace and Divine disrupted the status quo and carved out religious and cultural space for challenging racial stratification.

At the time of Daddy Grace's death in 1960, there were nearly 100 United Houses of Prayer in America. Having built UHOP through his charismatic leadership, Grace's death resulted in a religious crisis. Concerns over who would take over leadership led to a small schism. Eventually the community recognized Walter McCollough as its new leader, and under his direction, UHOP turned its financial and community efforts toward civil rights and social justice. Church funds were invested in social assistance programs, subsidized housing, and scholarships. Without the drama that surrounded Grace and his controversial public persona, the United House of Prayer became more accepted as a part of mainstream Christianity. At his death in 1991, McCollough was replaced by S. C. Madison and, in 2008, Madison was succeeded by Bishop C. M. Bailey. Today UHOP boasts 131 American churches with approximately 1.5 million members. The church continues to invest in progressive social programs, providing homes for the elderly, scholarship funds, and community shelters.

Davis, Angela

Angela Yvonne Davis (1944–) is a well-known lecturer and writer, a member of the central committee of the American Communist Party, a philosophy professor who was appointed to a presidential chair, and a political activist who consistently advocates the elimination of the whole panoply of oppressions that damage people in the prison systems. In the late 1960s, Davis became entangled in controversy as a result of her political affiliations and commitment to prison reform. This controversy was reminiscent of the second red scare of the McCarthy era during the mid-to late 1950s after World War II.

The lessons of the McCarthy era indicate that the guarantees of the Bill of Rights are highly context dependent. Under the guise of preventing communist subversion, U.S. Senator Joseph McCarthy (R, Wisconsin) and other politicians encroached on the freedoms of speech, assembly, and self-incrimination with little or no evidence. These endeavors ultimately cost an estimated 10,000 American citizens their jobs. During Chief Justice Earl Warren's tenure, the Supreme Court eventually made a distinction between mere advocacy and incitement, ruling that citizens can be punished for inflammatory rhetoric only if it urges immediate action to violate any laws.

Davis was indicted for crimes she did not commit and consequently became the third woman to be placed on the FBI's "Ten Most Wanted List." She emerged from this controversy as an international symbol of courage and political repression. A jury of 1 Mexican-American and 11 whites acquitted her in 1972. Throughout the whole tragedy, the media did not succinctly explain that Davis was influenced by a history of "uplifting the race." Her political development was a product of the social and political reality in which she lived.

She was born on January 26, 1944 to her proud parents B. Frank and Sallye E. Davis, in Birmingham, the oldest of four children. Her parents were schools teachers. Because of his meager salary, her father left the teaching profession, became an automobile mechanic, and bought his own gas station. His actions empowered him to provide a financially comfortable lifestyle for his family in a middle-income neighborhood, initially zoned for whites, and eventually referred to as Dynamite Hill because the Ku Klux Klan frequently bombed it.

Angela's mother taught her to read, write, and do arithmetic before she started the first grade. She was regarded highly in her Girl Scout troop and was able to have dance, piano, and clarinet lessons. While she was a child, she became conscious of racism and social differences between the poor and rich. Her maternal grandmother instilled in her a sense of outrage over the peculiar institution of slavery. Davis had ample opportunity to observe the interplay and impact of classism, sexism, and racism in Birmingham, Alabama. Therefore she developed a lift-up-the-race mentality because her parents were activists well before she was born; they instilled in her an appreciation for human beings and a desire for a more humane society.

During their college days, Angela's parents were members of the Southern Negro Youth Congress, which was concerned with public issues and addressing unjust activity. In 1931, they participated in the campaign to free the Scottsboro boys who were wrongly sentenced to the electric chair for the rape of two white girls. In elementary school, she attended civil rights demonstrations with her mother. In high school, Angela helped to organize interracial study groups that were disbanded by the police.

Davis often spent summers in Manhattan with her mother while she worked toward a master's degree at New York University. When Davis was 15, she earned a scholarship from the American Friends Service Committee to attend the Elizabeth Irwin High School, a progressive private school in Greenwich Village. Many of this school's teachers were banned from working in the public schools because of their radical political ideology. During this time, Davis was introduced to socialist ideology and joined the Marxist-Leninist group, Advance.

This school was more challenging than Parker High School in Birmingham where Davis made straight "As." She had to struggle at Elizabeth Irwin High School to achieve the same grade point average. During this time, she lived with the family of William Howard Melish, a winner of the 1956 Stockholm Peace Prize and an Episcopalian minister. In 1961, she graduated and enrolled in Brandeis University in Waltham, Massachusetts on a scholarship.

Davis was an excellent student, majoring in French literature at Brandeis. Her junior year was spent at the Sorbonne where she met and talked with students from Algeria, who were involved in the struggle against French colonialism. Their interpretations of discrimination in their homeland and the 1963 Birmingham church bombing killing of four girls Davis knew personally enhanced her commitment to social change.

In her senior year, she studied under the philosopher Herbert Marcuse. She was impressed with his analysis of modern industrial society of the West and with his suggestion that it was the individual's responsibility to resist and rebel against the oppression of capitalism. Davis wrote in her autobiography that she was particularly impressed with the idea that emancipation of the proletariat would set the foundation for the freedom of all oppressed groups in society.

The next year, 1965, Davis graduated magna cum laude from Brandeis with Phi Beta Kappa membership. From 1965 to 1967, she attended graduate school at the Institute for Social Research at the Johan Wolfgang von Goethe University in Frankfurt, West Germany. This graduate school was the most prestigious center in the world for the study of Marxism and German idealism. Professors Oskar Negt and Theodore Adorno were impressed with her scholarship. At this point, Davis spoke both French and German. In Frankfurt, she became a member of a socialist student group, which was opposed to the Vietnam War.

In 1967, Davis returned to the United States of America to complete the requirements for her master's degree and study again under Marcuse who was now at the University of California at San Diego. She joined several organizations, among them Dr. Maulana Karenga's group "US," the Black Panthers, and Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee (SNCC), and resumed her participation in the Civil Rights movement. That same year, she attended an "Economics and the Community" workshop sponsored by SNCC. At the work she met Franklin Alexander and his wife Kendra who were active in SNCC, the Black Panthers, and the Communist Party.

Franklin's sister Charlene was the leader of the Che-Lumumba All Black Collective of the Communist Party of Southern California. This organization was focused on the third world and away from the Soviet Union. In 1969, Davis moved to Los Angeles and joined Che-Lumumba because she was disappointed with the sexism in SNCC, the Black Panthers, and US.

Davis earned her masters degree, made her pilgrimage to Cuba in 1969, and completed her PhD comprehensive exams in 1970. She was hired by the University of California at Los Angeles as an assistant professor of philosophy in 1969. Davis taught courses in literature, philosophy, and political theory. William Tulio Divale, a graduate student in anthropology and a paid FBI informer, published a letter in the UCLA Daily Bruin announcing that there was a communist on the faculty. Eight days later, on July 9, 1969, Ed Montgomery published an article in the San Francisco Examiner naming Angela Davis as the person Divale alleged was a communist in the Bruin. At the insistence of Governor Ronald Reagan, the university regents dismissed Angela Davis from her post. This firing was done in spite of the fact that the students, faculty, President of the University Charles Hitch, and the UCLA Chancellor Charles Young supported her and academic freedom.

She challenged the dismissal in court and was reinstated because the dismissal violated her constitutional right to teach regardless of political affiliation. The UCLA administration continued to monitor her courses; students rated the instruction as excellent and unbiased. When the 1969–1970 academic year came to an end, the board refused to renew her contract because of her inflammatory speeches in the community and the fact that she had not completed the requirements for her doctorate.

Davis had become actively involved in the cause of the Soledad Brothers, George Jackson, John Clutchette, and Fleeta Drumgo, who had been treated harshly because they organized a Marxist group among the prisoners. She delivered speeches and led demonstrations calling for their parole.

On January 13, 1970, a mixture of 15 militant black and racist white inmates started fighting on the exercise yard at the Soledad Prison in Salinas, California. Prison guard O. G. Miller killed one white and three black convicts in order to stop the fight. The district attorney of Monterey County ruled Miller's action justifiable homicide and the grand jury confirmed this verdict. On that same day, prison guard John Mills was beaten and thrown over the jail's third tier railing, falling to his death. All 137 convicts in Y Wing where the murder occurred were confined to their cells. The prison authorities assumed that only the militants could have organized the revenge and blamed the Soledad Brothers.

Davis's public comments in defense of the Soledad Brothers drew anonymous threats on her life by mail and telephone. Therefore, she purchased several weapons and secured them in the Che-Lumumba Club headquarters. George's teenage brother Jonathan Jackson decided to be her bodyguard.

On August 7, 1970, Jonathan used these weapons to rescue James McClain who was on trial for assaulting a San Quentin guard from California's Marian County Courthouse. Jackson, McClain, two inmate witnesses (Russell Moore and William Christmas) took hostages: three jurors, Assistant District Attorney Gary Thomas, and Judge Harold Harley. Jonathan intended to trade the hostages for the Soledad Brothers. The effort was stymied by a barrage of shooting by the San Quentin guards, in defiance of the sheriff and his instructions not to shoot, which killed the judge, two prisoners, and Jonathan. A federal warrant was issued for Davis, because the weapons were registered in her name. She fled into hiding rather than surrender to the authorities.

The State of California charged her with kidnapping, conspiracy, and murder; the FBI placed her on the 10 most wanted fugitive list and undertook a massive two-month search for her. She was arrested in New York, extradited to California, and placed in jail without bail. An international "Free Angela" movement ensued. On February 23, 1972, a judge released Davis on $102,000 bail, which was paid by singer Aretha Franklin. This position of separating Davis from her politics was taken by many middle- to upper-income African Americans. The subsequent trial received worldwide attention; Davis was acquitted of all charges.

Acting as co-counsel, Angela explained that she had been involved in the liberation struggle of minority groups, in the opposition to the Vietnam War, in the fight to raise the status of women, and in the defense of academic freedom. She went underground because of fear. Her chief counsel Howard Moore, an Atlantan who defended the black power leaders Rap Brown and Stokely Carmichael, argued that there was insufficient evidence to prove Angela Davis was part of the murder plans, as she was not at the scene of the murders.

Her defense committee was renamed the National Alliance against Racism and Political Repression. It has provided help in the defense of political cases, the majority of which have involved blacks and Hispanics. Davis has remained politically active. She has delivered speeches on behalf of the organization and led demonstration on numerous issues since 1972. In 1980 and 1984, she ran for vice president of the United States on the Communist Party ticket. Ronald Reagan and the California State Board of Regents voted in 1972 that she would never teach at a state-supported university because of her militant activities. The American Association of University Professor censured UCLA for lack of due process when it failed to renew her contract. Davis has taught at a number of California universities including UCLA, despite Ronald Reagan's admonitions. Today, Davis continues to write, give speeches and lectures, and is still an advocate of penal reform and an opponent of racism and classism in the criminal justice system. She is currently a professor of historical consciousness at UC Santa Cruz.

Deacons for Defense and Justice

Founded in 1964 in Louisiana, the Deacons for Defense and Justice (DDJ) was an African American self-defense organization that protected civil rights activists against racist terrorism. The history of the Deacons began in the small town of Jonesboro, Louisiana. In June 1964, organizers of the Congress of Racial Equality (CORE) and local black activists launched nonviolent protest campaigns and voter registration drives to challenge the town's tradition of white supremacy. When white residents and the area's Ku Klux Klan responded with a wave of violence and intimidation, a group of armed black men began to guard the CORE office against white attacks. Although Jonesboro's police department deputized five black men, ostensibly to provide more security, the new police officers could do little to stop white violence. When Klansmen staged a nightly parade through Jonesboro's black neighborhood in late July 1964, members of the informal protective squad decided to establish an official defense unit to halt the Klan's reign of terror. This organization came to be known as the DDJ.

In the following months, the DDJ evolved into a highly sophisticated and disciplined protection agency. The Deacons consisted mostly of working-class military veterans who had to conform to strict membership criteria. The organization's president, a stockroom worker named Percy Lee Bradford, and co-founder Earnest Thomas, a mill worker and handyman, accepted only American citizens who were at least 21 years old. They preferred married men and registered voters. Applicants who had a reputation for being hot-tempered were quickly rejected. In this strictly defensive spirit, the new organization continued to guard the CORE headquarters and began to patrol the black neighborhood with rifles and shotguns. Armed men also guarded civil rights meetings and provided escorts for white and black activists who were canvassing in the dangerous areas of the surrounding Jackson parish. Walkie-talkies facilitated the coordination of guard duties. When Jonesboro's police department disbanded the group of black deputies in October 1964, the Deacons remained the only protection against white violence. Ultimately, the DDJ's activities put an end to Klan intimidation in Jonesboro and effectively stemmed the tide of white harassment.

The formation of another Deacons chapter in Bogalusa, Louisiana marked the beginning of the defense unit's rise to national fame and notoriety. Located 60 miles north of New Orleans, the city was a stronghold of the Ku Klux Klan. As in Jonesboro, segregationists resorted to violent terror when, in January 1965, local blacks sought the assistance of CORE to challenge Jim Crow. In February, the necessity of protecting the black community and CORE's field workers from the Klan's wrath prompted several men to organize a DDJ branch in Bogalusa. The Jonesboro Deacons assisted in the formation and, after receiving a charter from the state of Louisiana in March 1965, granted the new branch an official certificate of affiliation. Although protection was the key rationale behind its activities, the defense group also became an enormous source of pride among black activists. Defying the Southern myth of the submissive and contented Negro, the Deacons powerfully asserted blacks' dignity and their legitimate claim to the rights of American citizenship. Its members considered their armed actions an important affirmation of black manhood.

In April 1965, when a new round of nonviolent demonstrations exacerbated racial tensions in Bogalusa, a shootout between Klansmen and a group of Deacons catapulted the defense squad into the national spotlight. By that time, the Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI) had launched a large-scale investigation into the activities of the defense squad. Although FBI agents and white journalists tended to regard the militant group as the harbinger of racial warfare, the Bogalusa Deacons worked side by side with CORE, complementing its nonviolent protest campaigns and ultimately enhancing its effectiveness in Bogalusa. In part, white concerns stemmed from the defense unit's strategy to exaggerate its actual strength to deter white terrorists. Media accounts put the Deacons' membership at several thousand in 59 chapters across the South, but the real number of members was never larger than several hundred, and the Deacons established only three official chapters in Louisiana. Despite its hyperbole, the Deacons did have expansionist ambitions and inspired the formation of loosely affiliated groups in 14 southern and 4 northern cities. Amidst the media frenzy about the defense unit, CORE was hard pressed to justify its alliance with the Deacons. CORE's leadership accepted self-defense but reassured the concerned media of the organization's unwavering commitment to nonviolence.

By 1968, however, as segregation and disfranchisement were on the wane and state and local authorities in the South finally appeared to take seriously their responsibility to protect civil rights protest, black self-defense groups such as the Deacons had outlived their usefulness. Until the summer of 1967, the Bogalusa Deacons continued to patrol the city's black neighborhood and guarded a last round of nonviolent demonstrations. By November 1967, the Bogalusa Deacons no longer held official meetings. Four months later, the FBI ascertained that the Deacons and affiliated chapters had ceased their activities.

Destination, Chicago, Illinois

Chicago, Illinois, has played a central role in attracting African American migrants from the South. In 1910, before the onset of the first wave of the Great Migration, fewer than 50,000 blacks lived in Chicago, roughly 2 percent of the city's population. Sixty years later a million blacks, the majority born in the South, resided there, nearly one-third of the total population. By 1970, more blacks called Chicago home than the state of Mississippi, a fact that dramatically illustrates its importance to the southern exodus.

In the late-19th and early-20th century, Chicago was a transportation, commercial, and manufacturing giant. As a result, heavy factories and other industries had an insatiable need for a cheap and reliable labor force. When World War I began in 1914 and halted the influx of immigrant laborers, Chicago's industrialists actively recruited southern black workers. This employment draw made the city a primary destination for black migrants racial repression and declining prospects in agriculture in the Jim Crow South. During World War I, an estimated 50,000 to 70,000 black migrants lived in Chicago. Of this total, the majority came from Louisiana, Tennessee, Alabama, and, above all, Mississippi. The Illinois Central Railroad Line ran directly from Chicago to New Orleans, helping connect the city to the South, and the Chicago Defender, a vigorous advocate of the southern exodus and widely circulated in the South, helped link the image of Chicago with “the land of hope” in the psyche of many black southerners.

Life in Chicago was far from ideal. Newcomers were generally restricted to the least desirable work in processing and manufacturing jobs. Moreover, because of housing discrimination, they were concentrated in areas not located near the city’s plants and factories. They faced high rents and overcrowding, as apartments and tenements were subdivided into smaller units, many of which were known as kitchenettes. Established black residents could not ignore the changing composition of their community. Some were alarmed by the appearance and manners of the southern migrants, and they did not keep their opinions to themselves. Most black Chicagoans, however, followed the lead of the Chicago Defender and lent a supportive hand to the newcomers.

The migration triggered more competition between blacks and whites for housing, jobs, and access to public accommodations. Whites in neighborhoods adjacent to the growing Black Belt sought to stymie neighborhood integration through restrictive covenants and intimidation. At work, whites viewed blacks as rivals for jobs and as enemies of unions. These tensions culminated in July 1919 with the Chicago race riot when a black teenager drowned in Lake Michigan after whites had thrown rocks at him and four friends while their raft drifted near a beach claimed by whites. For five days, blacks and whites battled one another leaving 23 blacks and 15 whites dead and millions of dollars in property damage.

The downturn in Chicago’s economy in the post-World War I era slowed, but did not stop, the influx of black southerners. By 1921, the migration had resumed with great velocity. Nearly 100,000 newcomers arrived in Chicago over the next decade, and, by 1930, more than 225,000 African Americans lived in the city. Even as northern factories shed jobs and long lines formed at soup kitchens during the Great Depression, the population of black Chicago grew slightly. Between 1940 and 1970, growing mechanization of cotton production displaced hundreds of thousands of black workers in the South. Moreover, World War II labor shortages brought roughly 60,000 black migrants to the city. These newcomers had the advantage of established kinship networks in the city.

Many newcomers settled on the South Side; others moved into the growing West Side ghetto. The West Side had been home to roughly 25,000 blacks until 1940, but as Jews and other ethnic groups left settlements for better housing elsewhere, black migrants packed into the available housing in East Garfield Park, North Lawndale, and Near West Side. By 1960, the West Side was home to more than 200,000 African Americans.

Chicago turned into an intensely segregated city in the early 20th century as ghettos maintained by white racism and local, state, and federal policies. Black newcomers as well as native black Chicagoans were excluded from the proliferating postwar suburban housing, and many found themselves living in high-rise public housing projects stacked within the confines of the ghetto. If blacks sought to live in white neighborhoods in the city or suburbs, they often faced white violence. By the early 1960s, big public housing projects like the Robert Taylor Homes, hailed by its first residents, had become increasingly warehouses of human misery. The low-skill and semiskilled manufacturing jobs that had done much to lure migrants and raise their standards of living were no longer available.

Destination, Cuba

The Republic of Cuba is an archipelago of islands in the Caribbean Sea, located approximately 90 miles south of the U.S. state of Florida. The only socialist republic in the Americas since the success of the 1959 revolution, Cuba also has the largest population of any Caribbean nation.

The history of Cuba cannot be separated from the development of the sugar plantation industry in the Americas. On October 7, 1886, Cuba became one of the last nations to formally abolish slavery. The late termination of the importation of slaves to the island is considered to be a key determinant of the strong African legacy in the country's cultural and national development. Prized by generations of U.S. leaders as "the Pearl of the Antilles" for both strategic and ideological reasons, Cuba has faced a long and complicated history of American overinvolvement in its national affairs.

The entangled issues of slavery and colonialism for centuries overshadowed all aspects of Cuban life. The island was quickly occupied and settled by Spaniards in 1511; it was used as a base for military conquest of the American mainland. It was only when Cuba developed from a naval way station and small-scale coffee producer into a sugar plantation colony, that the importation of African slaves in great number commenced, after the brutal decimation of the indigenous Indians. Furthermore, with the shipment of African slaves to Cuba continuing until long after slavery had been abolished in British and French colonies, cultural links between Cuba and Africa were maintained to a degree unparalleled in the region.

The Spanish system of slavery was heavily influenced by metropolitan norms and culture. Inasmuch as provenance was celebrated by the colonizers within associations known as cabildos, African slaves were given leave to form similar groups according to social custom and ancestral ties. This practice allowed the flourishing of African religious cult activity (such as santería, palo, and lucumí) that continues to enjoy widespread popularity to this day. Ties to individual ethnic and tribal origins were likewise conserved by the white slaveowners' custom of identifying and characterizing their captives according to place-of origin.

When Cuban-born Spaniards, known as Creoles, began to press for independence from Spain, their efforts at times intersected with slaves' struggles against bondage. Some Creoles saw independence and the abolition of slavery as desirable, but the authorities kept many of them loyal by warning of the "Africanization" of Cuba that would result.

The outstanding military career of Antonio Maceo, a Cuban of mixed race, known as El Bronce Titan (the Bronze Titan), began with the outbreak of the War of Independence in 1868. Carlos Manuel de Céspedes emancipated the slave population, and soon black soldiers outnumbered white troops in the revolutionary armies. Before long, the real objectives of Maceo, then second-in command of the independence army, became the subject of suspicion. He was charged with harboring designs for black rule, rumors that persisted until his death in battle in 1896. In fact, Maceo refused to recognize the Pact of Zanjón, which ended the first revolutionary war, also called the Ten Years War. He and other mambi (independence) officers vowed to continue fighting until complete independence for Cuba and the universal abolition of slavery had been achieved. The pact meanwhile offered liberty only for slaves who had fought in the independence armies. This event is known as La Protesta de Baraguá (the Protest of Baraguá).

During the era of the independence struggles against Spain, the concept of "racelessness" was constructed by Cuban intellectuals who sought to transmute the inherent violence of a socially stratified plantation society into the all-embracing concept of Cubanness (cubanidad). White and nonwhite intellectual elites asserted that the struggle against Spain had produced a new kind of individual and a new kind of collectivity. The experience of war, it was claimed, had united black and white into nothing more or less than Cuban. Jose Martí, often described as the "Apostle" of Cuban independence, went even further by denying the existence of races. Popular nationalist readings of Martí's ideals of racial fraternity and social unity have inspired all Cuban independence struggles since this time. Accordingly, independent black Cuban mobilization has without exception been strongly condemned, beginning with the brutal crushing of the Partido Independiente de Color (PIC) rebellion in 1912.

After independence from Spain, U.S. dominance was predicated on the belief that racial inferiority rendered Cubans incapable of self-government. Americans considered Cuba to be a black nation not only because of the skin color of a large percentage of its population, but also because of the strong African influence in its culture, and the island's history as a colonial possession. Thus, beginning in the 1890s, the movement to form a new Cuban identity simultaneously responded to the need to challenge U.S. racist stereotypes that associated blackness with debasement.

By 1930, this new national paradigm celebrated black Cubans' cultural contributions and claimed mestizaje (racial mixing) as the very essence of Cubanness. In the image of similar movements in the United States (the Harlem Renaissance) and France (Négritude), black culture in Cuba was celebrated by artists and intellectuals responding to the rallying call of “Afrocubanismo.” Nicolas Guillen first made mention of “Cuban color” in the prologue to his 1931 collection of poems Sóngoro Cosongo. Later, in a speech given at the University of Havana on November 28, 1939, white Cuban anthropologist, Fernando Ortiz, one of the guiding lights of Afrocubanismo, elucidated the distinct quality of Cubanness, which he likened to the national dish—el ajíaco—a simmering stew that reduces separate ingredients until each becomes indistinguishable from the other.

As the dictatorship of Gerardo Machado collapsed in September 1933, a wave of mass protests took hold across the island. In the countryside of the eastern provinces, one sugar mill after another was seized by laborers demanding an improvement to appalling working conditions. Many were migrants from Jamaica and Haiti, often employed by American-owned companies. These African-Caribbean workers would soon become the first victims of the newly installed anti-imperialist government of Dr. Ramón Grau San Martín. As one of a series of nationalization measures, the short-lived revolutionary administration made it illegal for a business to employ more foreign nationals than Cubans; at least 50 percent of the workforce had to be native-born. Soon tens of thousands of Haitians were cruelly deported, while Jamaicans, enjoying a slightly higher social status and more vigorous diplomatic representation, more successfully withstood the tide of discrimination and economic adversity.

Until this period, the Communist Party of Cuba (PCC) had no prior experience with the rural populations and very little contact with black labor. The strikes that threatened to cripple the sugar industry between 1930 and 1933, however, focused the class struggle in the countryside, and soon the PCC were striving to organize and unite the plantation workforce. Most of the success the communists enjoyed was among skilled workers in the ingenios (mills), where blacks and whites were organized across racial and ethnic lines. In December 1932, the organization of labor in the rural districts culminated in the formation of the National Union of Sugar Workers (SNOIA), initiating the link in Cuban politics between the struggle for racial equality and proletarian ideology. Alone among Cuba’s political parties the PCC fought against segregation and racial discrimination. Cuban communists also mounted campaigns against racism in the United States, including raising awareness of the Scottsboro Boys case. The party also offered black Cubans their first experience of political leadership.

On January 1, 1959 Fidel Castro’s July 26th Movement triumphantly heralded a new chapter in Cuban history, a day after the harsh reign of General Fulgencio Batista concluded with his hasty flight from the island. The revolution was ushered in on a nationalistic wave of hope for an end to the ills of hegemonic domination: corruption, poverty, illiteracy, bad housing, and discrimination.

Before the revolution black and mestizo (mixed-race) Cubans were among the most economically-disadvantaged, typically receiving lower wages than whites. The first and second Agrarian Reform Laws improved the lot of black farmers and agricultural workers, and the Urban Reform Law guaranteed the right to decent housing for black Cubans who lived in the cities. However, a twin assault from the literacy campaign and educational reform policies dealt the most deadly blows to the institutionalized racism that had impoverished so many. Antiracism was instrumental in strengthening the revolutionary government and discrediting the opposition. As early as September 1959, a U.S. State Department report considered support from black Cubans crucial to the survival of the revolutionary government.

From the early days of the revolution Fidel Castro reached out to black America for support against the common enemy of U.S. imperialism. If Cuba had succeeded in liberating itself from U.S. hegemonic control then it could obviously serve as a powerful role model for black emancipation in the North. Joe Louis was engaged to spearhead a public relations campaign to encourage black tourism to ‘racism-free’ Cuba, which was met with mild interest. Reverend Adam Clayton Powell Jr., an ardent early supporter of the revolution, remained loyal until signs of the revolution’s commitment to socialism proved hard to ignore. Poet Amiri Baraka (at the time Leroi Jones) credits his 1960 visit to Cuba for an increased racial and third-world consciousness.

Indeed, African American support for the Cuban Revolution has a long and intricate history. For if it is true that in North America blacks comprise the only group consistently to identify with the revolution’s anti-imperialist goals, some of the most scathing denunciations of Cuba’s racial policies came from black nationalists such as Stokely Carmichael and Eldridge Cleaver. Harlem residents may still in some quarters cherish the memory of Fidel Castro and the Cuban delegation to the United Nations during their week-long stay at the Hotel Theresa in September 1960, when Malcolm X, Robert F. Williams, Egyptian president Gamal Nasser, and Russia's Nikita Khrushchev paid court to the revolutionaries. While Assata Shakur and other members of the Black Panther Party found refuge from U.S. judicial persecution on the island. However African Americans have at times been challenged to reconcile their own socially-alienated experience of race, with the culturally integrated racial attitudes of black and white Cubans.

Links between black Cubans and African Americans are of long-standing, and have particularly flourished in the areas of music and sport. Cuban teams competed against the segregated teams of the American Black baseball league, and fans were well informed about Cuban players through the sports columns of black newspapers. Poets, musicians and other artists routinely collaborated, and mutually supported each others' work. The Afro-Cuban style of jazz grew out of the musical partnership of Mario Bauzá and Dizzy Gillespie, which, under the influence of Charlie Parker, branched out into the Cubop movement.

Despite the austerities imposed by the continuing U.S. blockade, and the absence of Soviet support since 1990, Havana continues to pursue an active internationalist foreign policy. The revolutionary government's early interest in Africa was spearheaded by Ernesto "Che" Guevara, who made an extended tour of the continent between December 1964 and March 1965. Guevara made contact with potential allies in, among other nations, Algeria, Ghana, Guinea, Mali, and Congo-Brazzaville. Fidel Castro embarked upon his own African tour in the early 1970s, and in April 1976 he declared Cuba a "Latin-African" nation.

From the 1960s Cuba sent military advisers to support African revolutionary movements and governments in Sierra Leone, Guinea, Mozambique and South Yemen. In the 1970s Cuban troops served in Angola and in the Horn of Africa.

After the Organisation of American States (OAS) lifted its ban on member states' interaction with Cuba in 1975, Cuba established diplomatic relations with several newly independent countries in the Caribbean, and developed close relations with Barbados, Guyana, Jamaica, and Trinidad and Tobago. In recent times Cuba has forged closer ties with CARICOM countries. Cuban doctors, educators and engineers have served in the Caribbean and Africa.

Destination, Detroit, Michigan

During the phase of African American history, typically referred to as the Great Migration, the black population of Detroit, Michigan increased from less than 6,000 in 1910 to more than 40,000 a decade later in 1920, a percentage increase of 600 percent. During World War I and the decades that followed, Detroit was an extremely popular destination for refugees from the South. Beginning in 1915, approximately 1,000 African Americans arrived monthly from Georgia, Alabama, Mississippi, Arkansas, and other Southern states. The influx in 1915 was largely due to the decision by Henry Ford to pay employees, including African Americans, of Ford Motor Company in Detroit the unprecedented amount of $5 per day. By 1916, the rapidly expanding defense industries created more demand for labor and served as additional inducement for African Americans looking for better lives in the North.

A brief recession in 1920–1921 served as a slight discouragement to the numerous migrants in the city as some struggled to find gainful employment. With a reduction in the amount of foreign immigration, however, the need for African American migrants from the South grew even during the recession. In 1923 alone, about 14,000 African Americans arrived in Detroit. By 1930, at the onset of the Great Depression, Detroit had a black population of 120,066, an astounding increase from the 1910 total of less than 6,000.

In addition to the “pull” factors of jobs in the automobile and defense industries, the Great Migration was also a product of a number of forces that actively pushed African Americans from the South. The suffocating combination of sharecropping, Jim Crow, disfranchisement, and lynching—the various dimensions of the Black Nadir—provided more than enough incentive for millions of African Americans to relocate to the North in the period between 1910 and 1940. Far from the “Promised Land” of their collective hopes and dreams, however, the North was rife with significant problems as epitomized by the 1919 Chicago race riot. Although Detroit did not witness a large-scale race riot until 1943, the massive influx of African Americans led to occasional violent interactions with other emigrant and native-born groups vying for jobs.

Segregated living patterns was the principal problem faced by early African American migrants. Like practically all northern cities, Detroit had a long tradition of segregated housing. Restrictive covenants, redlining, and other mechanisms were used to maintain segregated communities. During the World War I era, only 20 percent of all African Americans purchased homes in Detroit. The majority of the migrants were limited to dilapidated tenements in areas customarily set aside for African Americans. Despite poor housing, high unemployment, and social marginalization, many African Americans originating from the South would still view Detroit and other northern cities as far superior to the daily hostilities they faced in southern states. In this instance, African Americans voted with their feet and the influx of southerners into Detroit continued throughout much of the 20th century. In the aftermath of the 1967 Detroit riot, whites fled to the suburbs in large numbers, leaving behind a black numerical majority in Detroit and making it one of many so-called Chocolate Cities.

Destination, Harlem, New York

Located in Upper Manhattan, Harlem has been a destination for non-native Americans since 1658. Named Nieuw Haarlem by the Dutch in honor of the Dutch city of Haarlem, Harlem has been variously a magnet for farmers, aristocrats, immigrants, and African Americans. During the 1920s, it was the site of a great blossoming of African American culture—the Harlem Renaissance. It has been the home to many African American luminaries such as W. E. B. Du Bois, Walter White, Roy Wilkins, Thurgood Marshall, and Zora Neale Hurston, as well as many other artists, musicians, and writers.

The Dutch, the English, and post-Revolutionary Americans farmed the land on the eastern side of Harlem and built country estates. Then around 1830, when the rich farmland became depleted, the area became a haven for those seeking cheap housing, including immigrants who built shantytowns. But as transportation to Harlem improved (an elevated railroad was built between 1878 and 1881; the subway was soon to come), developers began to meet the growing demand for housing in Manhattan by building row houses, tenements, and luxury apartments in Harlem. In fact, many of the buildings in Harlem today were built between 1870 and 1910.

Development led to speculation and by 1904, prices became seriously inflated. Owners were finding it difficult to find tenants able to pay the high rent required to make a profit. As a result, banks were foreclosing on property owners. In the midst of this situation, black real estate manager Philip Payton Jr. saw an opportunity. He was able to lease buildings from white owners and then rent them at 10 percent above the deflated price to African Americans. Experiencing immediate success, he soon created the African-American Realty Company. Other black entrepreneurs, such as John E. Nail and Henry C. Parker, as well as black churches (like St. Philip's Church), were also able to capitalize on property in Harlem, and in doing so they met a growing demand by African Americans for decent housing.

Initially, this demand for new housing came from African Americans living in other parts of Manhattan. In 1900, most of the black population in Manhattan was located in the midtown neighborhoods known as Hell's Kitchen, the Tenderloin, and San Juan Hill. But many of the residents in these areas were displaced by the building of Pennsylvania Station and by the expansion of commercial enterprises in the area. Beginning in about 1904, Harlem offered even better housing than they had had. Soon, though, this demand came from outside Manhattan as well.

Of prime importance was the black migration from the South. Usually associated with World War I, this migration had, in fact, already begun before the war, as blacks moved to the North to avoid violence, oppression, and lack of opportunity. By 1910, 61 percent of blacks in Manhattan were from the South. Added to this were migrations from the British West Indies, Latin America, French West Indies, and the American Virgin Islands (in 1925, the foreign-born blacks in Harlem were estimated to number 35,000).

This was a cultural migration as well. Many black churches from other parts of Manhattan, such as the Abyssinian Baptist Church, moved there as well as the local offices of the NAACP and the Urban League. In addition, black writers, intellectuals, musicians, painters, sculptors, poets, and novelists were drawn to Harlem, especially during the 1920s. Writers like James Weldon Johnson, Langston Hughes, Countee Cullen, and Claude McKay, as well as painters like Aaron Douglass and sculptors like Sargent Johnson made Harlem their home. And jazz flourished in Harlem at such clubs as the Savoy, where Duke Ellington played and Ella Fitzgerald sang, and Minton's Playhouse, which is often considered the birthplace of Bebop and the meeting place for musicians like Thelonius Monk, Dizzy Gillespie, and Charlie Parker. It was from Harlem that the Silent March of 1917—in protest for the murders of African Americans during the East St. Louis race riot—emanated. Social activist W. E. B. Du Bois, who helped to found the NAACP and who founded and edited Crisis magazine—the official magazine of the NAACP—lived and wrote in Harlem.

Writing in 1925, James Weldon Johnson called Harlem the “greatest Negro city in the world.” It has had its ups and downs since then (it has been a famous black neighborhood for nearly a century), and the hopes of many were not always realized. The Great Depression had its effect on Harlem as it did on other parts of the country. And Alain Locke, a professor of philosophy at Howard University, also writing in 1925, prematurely called Harlem “another statue of liberty.” In truth, there were many more social battles yet to be fought in the Civil Rights movement before liberty could be considered. Nevertheless, Harlem famously exemplifies the shift from a rural to an urban way of life, and it remains a historic symbol of cultural excellence.

Detroit, Michigan, Riot of 1943

The Detroit Riot of 1943 was one of the biggest and bloodiest race riots in the history of the United States. It was a culminating event in the early Civil Rights movement, as it raised the American consciousness about the explosive nature of growing racial tensions fueled by racial inequalities in this thriving northern metropolis. In the 1940s Detroit experienced a growth spurge burgeoned by the need for workers in the defense industry. The growing economic base attracted both black and white workers, leading to a rapid increase in the population and putting a strain on housing, transportation, education, recreation facilities, and most portentously, race relations.

By 1943, the number of blacks in Detroit had doubled, and racial tensions in the city increased accordingly. On June 20, more than 1,000 Detroiters gathered on Belle Isle, one of Detroit's largest parks. Two young black men who had become angry as a result of their expulsion from Eastwood Park five days previously, traveled to Belle Isle to try to even the score. Their anger grew as police conducted searches of the cars of blacks crossing to Belle Isle but did not search cars driven by whites. In Harper's Magazine, a record of the riot states that Leo Tipton, a black man, announced in a nightclub that whites had thrown a black woman and her baby off the Belle Isle Park Bridge. Tipton urged the nightclub customers to assist in the fighting.

A number of sources report that another rumor simultaneously circulated in the white community that blacks had murdered and raped a white woman on the Belle Isle Park Bridge. Fights broke out between blacks and whites and some erupted on the bridge connecting Belle Isle to Southeast Detroit. Rumors of a race war roused whites and blacks, who both took to the streets near Belle Isle and in the downtown area. The mixed race mob attacked passersby, streetcars, and property. Blacks in Paradise Valley, also known as the Black Bottom, looted white-owned shops; whites overturned and burned cars of black drivers on Woodward Avenue. Breaking and entering occurred involving both black and white merchants. Differing opinions arose regarding the Detroit police and their handling of the rioters. Blacks saw it as police brutality and racist attacks, whereas whites characterized it as justifiable.

The riot came to an end once Mayor Edward Jeffries Jr. and Governor Harry Kelly asked President Roosevelt for help. In response, federal troops in armored cars and jeeps with automatic weapons drove down Woodward Avenue. The appearance of the troops with their overwhelming firepower succeeded in dispersing the mobs. The aftermath of the Detroit Riots that lasted for three days included the following statistics: 34 persons were killed (25 blacks and 9 whites), 765 suffered injuries that required hospital treatment, 1,893 persons were arrested, an estimated $2 million in property damage was due to vandalism, looting, and fire; a million hours of labor was lost totaling $115,000 a day for federal and state troops.

Depending on the vantage point, a number of theories emerged regarding those who held the greatest responsibility for the riots. The media espoused the belief, through photos, nightly news reports, and news articles, that those most responsible were angry black males. Many of the locals blamed southern newcomers, ethnic groups, communists, and hate groups. The federal government endorsed a fact-finding committee that produced an 8,500-word, fact-finding committee appraisal, known as the Dowling Report. The Dowling Report placed the blame on black hoodlums and identified whites as victims who reacted with violence only as a reaction to black bloodshed.

In reality those who rioted included the following groups:

1. Black men: The majority were married, stable, older, and acted out during the riots to protect themselves and their families. They acted as individuals rather than groups within the ghetto. Most were not Detroit natives but had lived there for five years or more before the riot and worked in the unskilled positions of industrial labor.
2. Black women: Many were single, unemployed or holding low-paying servile jobs. The offense they were most often convicted of was looting.
3. Black youth: They were mainly male, younger than white juveniles, and engaged more in felonies involving theft, breaking and entering, looting, carrying concealed weapons, assaulting someone, or destroying property inside their own neighborhoods.
4. White men: These men held skilled and semiskilled jobs in the factories, traveled far from home to riot, were younger than their black counterparts, were from Michigan, rioted in groups rather than as individuals, represented various class, ethnic, and religious communities, and battled for white dominance in the city.
5. White youth: They were older than their black counterparts and, along with black youth, were largely responsible for igniting the riot on Belle Isle and spreading it through Paradise Valley and beyond.

Detroit, Michigan, Riot of 1967

In what became the deadliest urban disturbance during the 1960s, the Detroit riot of July 23–27, 1967, resulted in 43 deaths, 1,200 injuries, more than 7,000 arrests, and in excess of $300 million in damaged property. Ongoing violence, looting, arson, and gun battles convulsed the city and, for the first time in a quarter-century, the U.S. Army had to be used to contain civil strife.

The precipitating event leading to the violence occurred before 4 A.M. on July 23 when Detroit police raided an after-hours and illegal drinking club, referred to locally as a "blind pig," on 12th Street. A blind pig operated in open violation of city ordinances, which prohibited the sale of alcohol at bars after midnight. When the police arrived, they expected to encounter a small crowd. To their surprise, this particular blind pig had close to 80 people who were attending the celebration of two returning African American soldiers from the Vietnam War. Typically in raids on blind pigs, Detroit police would have simply arrested the proprietors and a handful of customers caught with illicit drugs. In this instance, they arrested all 73 African American patrons and the bartender. Rumors quickly spread that some of those arrested had been beaten by police officers. Given the number of individuals arrested, it took about a half-hour before police vans arrived and, in the interim, a small crowd of local residents began to gather outside the blind pig.

Rumors of police brutality, coupled with the political volatility of the times and the depressed local economy, explains, in part, the events that followed. As the police vans departed with the arrested partygoers, the crowd that formed outside the bar began throwing rocks and bricks into store windows, and about 50 people began looting a clothing store. With no police in sight, the looting spread to other nearby stores and, within an hour, dozens of stores in a 16-block radius were looted and set on fire. Within the next 24 hours, African Americans and whites in the thousands were roaming the streets, moving from Detroit's West Side to the East Side neighborhoods and into downtown. The rioters moved quickly along large sections of Grand River and Woodward Avenues and 12th Street in the downtown area of Detroit and ranged as far as seven miles toward the outer edge of the city.

In an attempt to prevent the riot from spreading further, Governor Hugh Romney and Detroit Mayor Jerome Cavanagh acted quickly to call up 600 Detroit police, 800 state troopers, and 1,200 National Guardsmen to seal off large areas of the city and to disperse the rioters. These actions were not sufficient and the violence of the riot intensified. By Monday, July 24, the first three fatalities of the riot occurred. All three were white. One was beaten to death by a group of African American youths while protecting his store. Another was killed by a stray bullet. The third was a rioter killed by a storeowner. Ironically, the vast majority of those killed during the five full days of rioting were African American, and many of their deaths are attributed to the police and National Guard.

When it became clear that local and state law enforcement resources were insufficient, Governor Romney requested federal assistance from U.S. Attorney General Ramsey Clark. Clark informed Romney that before federal troops could be sent, the governor had to declare that a civil insurrection was taking place. Romney balked at this, fearing that insurance companies would not compensate residents of Detroit for their property losses if the cause was insurrection. When the situation in the city became progressively worse, President Lyndon Baines Johnson stepped in and sent Army paratroopers from the 101st Airborne.

While the paratroopers assisted in restoring order to the city, a number of disturbing incidents occurred that further enraged African American residents in Detroit. In one incident, National Guardsmen fired .50-caliber machine gun rounds into an apartment building, killing a four-year-old girl. In a more publicized case, three unarmed African American teenagers—Aubrey Pollard, Fred Temple, and Carl Cooper—were shot and killed at Algiers Motel by three Detroit police officers. The three officers were later exonerated by an all-white jury, and two of them returned to the police force by 1971.

By Thursday, July 27, the riot was effectively over and federal paratroopers were withdrawn. President Johnson appointed a Special Advisor Commission on Civil Disorders on July 27, 1967 to help discern the origins of the Detroit riot and other civil disturbances occurring during the so-called long, hot summer of 1967. Pointing to economic disparities and despair in urban “ghettoes,” the commission headed by Illinois Governor Otto Kerner concluded that America was sharply divided into two societies—one white, one black—which were separate and increasingly unequal. In the aftermath of the riot, white flight to the suburbs of Detroit accelerated at an alarming rate to the point that the city had a majority African American population by the early 1970s. The removal of whites to Detroit's suburbs and the creation of an impoverished and black urban core provided additional proof of the Kerner Commission's assessments of the growing economic and even spatial divides in the United States. See also: Johnson, Lyndon Baines; Kerner Commission Report; League of Revolutionary Black Workers; Long Hot Summer Riots, 1965–1967; Vietnam War (Black Participation in)

Diallo, Amadou

Amadou Bailo Diallo (1975–1999) was a 23-year-old immigrant from Guinea living in the Bronx. On the evening of February 4, 1999, on his way home from dinner, Diallo was shot and killed by four New York City police officers. The shooting took place at Diallo's apartment at 1157 Wheeler Avenue. Diallo was allegedly unarmed and innocent of committing any crime. Nonetheless, he was pursued by officers dressed in civilian clothing—Sean Carroll, Richard Murphy, Edward McMellon and Kenneth Boss—when they mistook him for a rapist who the police were looking for at the time. Afraid of the men, Diallo ran to the door of his apartment and reached into his coat to grab his wallet. The officers, who believed him to be reaching for a gun, opened fire. A total of 41 rounds were fired by the four officers, 19 of which were lodged in Diallo's body.

Diallo's mother, Kadiatou Diallo, and his stepfather, Sankarella Diallo, filed a $61,000,000 ($20 million plus $1 million for each shot fired) lawsuit against the City of New York and the four officers, claiming negligence, wrongful death, racial profiling, and myriad other violations of Amadou Diallo's civil rights. After years battling in court, they accepted a $3,000,000 settlement. Kadiatou Diallo has since published a novel entitled: My Heart Will Cross This Ocean: My Story, My Son, Amadou with the collaboration of Craig Wolff.

Amadou Diallo was born in 1975 in Sinoe, Liberia. As a youth, Amadou traveled and lived with his family in many parts of the world, including Togo, Guinea, Bangkok, and Singapore. Diallo was a devout Muslim and a talented student. By the time he arrived in the United States in 1996, with the intention of studying computer science, he had already attended The French International School, London's Cambridge University, and The British Consulate College in Thailand. Trying to establish himself in New York, he worked as a delivery person and also sold videotapes, gloves, and socks on a street corner in Manhattan. After the shooting, Diallo's body was returned to Guinea where he was laid to rest in the village of Hollande Bourou, located in the Fouta Djallon region.

Diallo's death and subsequent trial caused a large amount of controversy throughout the nation. These events sparked discussions of racial profiling and discrimination, as well as a series of protests. Diallo's death also revealed the substantial presence of West African immigrants in New York City (in 1999, there were approximately 50,000). Shortly after Amadou's death in 1999, his father, Sakou A. Diallo, founded The Amadou Diallo Educational, Humanitarian & Charity Foundation. The foundation aims to memorialize Diallo's life by aiding educational and humanitarian organizations that meant a great deal to Amadou. The foundation also supports organizations dedicated to putting a stop to police beatings and racial profiling.

Disfranchisement

The term “disfranchisement” may refer to any systematic removal and denial of the right to vote; here it refers to the aggressive movement by southern states to eliminate African American political participation accompanied the rise of segregation between the late 1880s and the beginning of the 20th century. Legislatures throughout the region enacted statutory measures and reformed state constitutions with provisions designed to circumvent the Fifteenth Amendment guarantee of universal manhood suffrage. The sum of these measures, from poll taxes to literacy tests and property requirements, amounted to a near complete purge of African Americans and a substantial number of poor whites from voting rolls, inaugurating a new era in southern political history marked by one-party domination and social conservatism that lasted into the 1940s.

Early accounts have suggested that these restrictive laws and provisions merely legalized what had already been accomplished through fraud, intimidation, and coercion immediately after the end of Republican rule in 1877. But “legal disfranchisement” actually constituted a significant departure from an era of dynamic African American electoral participation after Reconstruction. Throughout the South, blacks had used a variety of strategies to win office and gain local influence. Ranging from fusion with local Democrats to continual support for Republican and aggressive third-party movements, this well-organized black political activity provoked concerns among southern whites over what the latter called “Negro domination.” The return to Republican control of the White House and Congress by 1888, along with the rise of the Populist movement of agrarian reformers—African American and white—against planter elites and industrialist classes, further incited fears that white Democratic leaders could no longer control the black vote by either courting it or suppressing it through extralegal or statutory means. The only answer, they believed, was a constitutional reform movement that took blacks “out of politics” altogether.

Beginning in the 1880s, several southern states had passed laws that tightened registration regulations and/or reformed the ballot system. Justified as mainly “electoral reforms” to prevent fraud, such regulations disproportionately affected the poor, illiterate working classes that usually threatened Democratic dominance. The “secret ballot,” for instance, while cutting down on intimidation and corruption, also effectively disfranchised those unable to read the new ballots, which usually contained a lengthy list of candidates from all parties. Combined with regulations calling for greater accuracy in age, place of birth, and occupation on registration forms, such statutory measures in Tennessee, North Carolina, and other states effectively restricted the ballot to a shrinking number of “desirable” voters.

But in 1890, Mississippi set the standard of “legal disfranchisement” when it convened a new constitutional convention to remove this last vestige of Reconstruction. Although white support was far from unanimous, delegates ratified a new constitution that placed the power to enfranchise entirely in the hands of state-appointed officials. Such a move forestalled potential voters’ ability to seek registration through local or federal channels. In addition to property and educational requirements, the constitution also contained several supposedly “color blind” provisions. Potential voters had to live in the state for two years and the election district for one year. They also had to prove payment of a $2 poll tax for the previous two years. To these regulations, the convention added a so-called “understanding clause,” in which a registrant had to either read a section of the state constitution or to understand what was read to him by offering a “reasonable interpretation thereof.”

Reducing the number of eligible black voters from 190,000 to 8,615 by 1892, the “Mississippi Plan” became the model for disfranchisement throughout the South. South Carolina followed suit in 1895 with a similar constitution. Other states, facing more substantial populist revolts that undermined white unity until the end of the decade, eventually passed their own measures once this agrarian challenge dissipated. Between 1898 and 1908, Louisiana, Alabama, and Virginia also rewrote constitutions while North Carolina, Texas, and Georgia amended existing ones. All southern states followed a general pattern, but some variations did exist depending on the intended targets of disfranchisement. Louisiana, for instance, enacted a “grandfather clause” that maintained the franchise for anyone who was either an eligible voter or was the son or grandson of one on January 1, 1867. Like the “understanding clause” test that could be applied with varying degrees of rigor at the registrar’s discretion, such measures offered a loophole for poor, illiterate whites. Even if African Americans managed to meet these requirements, the white primary became a final obstacle. Since disfranchisement decimated support for Republican and third-party movements by the 1900s, local regulations limiting the Democratic primary to whites effectively excluded even registered voters from participating in what had become the only true election.

Despite such deliberate efforts to target the black vote, resistance to the movement was scarce. Northern Republicans, long since abandoning the “equal rights” ideals of Radical Reconstruction to embrace a gospel of economic prosperity and political efficiency, largely ignored the measures. Throughout the 1890s, Congress defeated attempts to establish federal control over elections and repealed existing regulations. Yet nothing seemed to demonstrate a rising national mistrust of government by “the masses” more than the 1898 Williams v. Mississippi decision, in which the Supreme Court upheld the state constitution’s franchise restrictions.

Poor white farmers, who had previously benefited from black support, also largely acquiesced to disfranchisement. White populist ties to African American agrarian activists were often tenuous, and, as some historians have argued, poor whites essentially bought into Democratic elites’ rhetoric of racial antagonism. As the latter—representing the Black Belt region of influential planters—and their allies moved to solidify their political power, they often targeted white farmers for disfranchisement as well. This would suggest that the movement was often a partisan endeavor rather than one motivated by race. Other historians, however, have suggested that poor whites themselves actually propelled the movement through their belief that the black vote bred the corruption that ensured elite Democrats’ dominance. Populist leaders like Tom Watson of Georgia, for instance, not only converted to the necessities of disfranchisement, but also became one of the most ardent propagators of “Negrophobia” by the 1900s. Thus, disfranchisement is often seen as part of a larger wave of white supremacy, marked by the rise of Jim Crow and the increase of violence against African Americans, throughout the South in the 1890s.

Whatever the identity and motivation of the disfranchisers, response by the movement's victims also varied. Some African Americans sought to mobilize against ratification of the new constitutions. But, given the climate of intimidation in the late 19th century South, most hoped to simply mitigate the results of these provisions by calling for equal application of franchise restriction to blacks and whites alike. The most famous moment of accommodation to the new political order, however, came in 1895 when Booker T. Washington, in a speech to the Cotton States Exposition in Atlanta, argued that African Americans could trade their political aspirations and social integration for an equal share in the economic progress of the South. Although many black leaders excoriated what became known as the "Atlanta Compromise," the realities of disfranchisement and the rise of segregation effectively transformed the political and social world that southern blacks inhabited. It also gave rise to the emergence of new forms of political participation. For instance, African American women, through their rising participation in social agencies established during the Progressive Era, ensured that black protest would not fall silent in the early decades of the 20th century.

Double V Campaign

In February 1942, the African American newspaper the Pittsburgh Courier began the "Double V" campaign to promote victory against the Axis abroad and victory against racism and discrimination at home. In the months preceding the outbreak of war, and particularly after the United States entered World War II, the black press had been repeatedly criticized for its lack of sufficient patriotism—sometimes outright disloyalty—and African Americans had demonstrated a noticeable apathy toward the war effort. To counter this, the Courier's Double V campaign encouraged African Americans to support the war effort but not to abandon their struggle for greater civil rights. To this end, the Double V campaign succeeded: it rallied African American support for national defense, and it kept the idea of civil rights front and center. Yet the Courier's campaign, in the end, did not change the reality of the discrimination against, and exclusion of, blacks in American society.

The Pittsburgh Courier drew its inspiration for the Double V campaign from a letter by James G. Thompson of Wichita, Kansas, published in the issue of January 31, 1942. Thompson, in his letter titled "Should I Sacrifice to Live 'Half American?,'" advocated for a "double VV" for a dual victory over enemies to the country and enemies—opposed to equality, justice, and democracy—at home. In its next issue, on February 7, the Courier displayed Double V drawings emphasizing the theme "Democracy, At Home, Abroad." The paper announced the Double V campaign the next week, declaring its support for the defeat of totalitarianism abroad and inequality at home.

African Americans faced discrimination in every aspect of society, but their exclusion from the war effort, particularly from national defense industries, particularly stung, especially since the United States government promoted the war as being for the preservation of democracy. President Franklin D. Roosevelt's stated goals of the war, the Four Freedoms, did nothing to alleviate the racism and discrimination that African Americans faced. The disjunction between the rhetoric and the practice of liberty and democracy in the United States only fostered black apathy toward the war effort. Indeed, only a couple of weeks before the Thompson letter appeared in print, the Courier reported on the lukewarm support for the war among African Americans. Although many African Americans, and certainly those in the black press, accepted the premise that the war should be vigorously prosecuted abroad, they also believed that the same should apply for the struggle for black civil rights. The Courier's Double V campaign captured that belief in bold print.

Among all of the black weekly newspapers in the United States during World War II, the Pittsburgh Courier had the largest circulation at 350,000, far outpacing the Chicago Defender whose circulation reached 230,000. The influence and circulation of the black press reached greater proportions during the war than at anytime in its history, and other black newspapers across the United States—the Chicago Defender and Amsterdam Star-News among others—embraced the Double V, making the Courier's campaign a national effort. The Double V became a ubiquitous symbol in the pages of many black newspapers, and Double V clubs formed across the nation. African American celebrities of the time, such as Marian Anderson, Adam Clayton Powell Jr., and the NAACP's Roy Wilkins all appeared in photographs supporting the campaign. The Courier also offered integrated images of whites along side African Americans, promoting at once racial unity and the idea that the struggle for democracy was not just a black concern. The Double V resonated with the African American public, and its popularity helped to increase the circulation of black newspapers.

Yet, not everyone viewed the Double V campaign as a unifying force. Many white newspapers, especially those in the South, characterized the Courier's crusade as an attempt to foment revolution. Although southern whites had long condemned the black press as a radical, destabilizing force in race relations, the U.S. government viewed the Double V as actually causing disunity and harm to black morale. Governmental surveillance and pressure on the black press to cease the agitation for greater rights, at least during wartime, proved unsuccessful, as black editors stood their ground and maintained their demands for equality and civil rights.

The Pittsburgh Courier promoted the Double V campaign throughout 1942. By early 1943, the campaign had died down significantly, as the paper gradually ceased emphasizing it. In its place, the Courier published numerous articles demonstrating the gains that African Americans had made because of the Double V campaign. There is no question that the Double V campaign energized many African Americans who sought greater rights and greater opportunities, but by war's end, the campaign had not achieved its desired goal: a double victory abroad and at home. The United States had won the war abroad, but racism and discrimination at home continued. In September 1945, the Courier removed the Double V from its masthead but left a single V to signify the war still to be waged. It was removed in 1946, the war at home still unfinished.

Du Bois, W. E. B.

Dr. William Edward Burghardt Du Bois (1868–1963) was a scholar, civil rights activist, editor, and novelist. Born February 23, 1868 to Alfred Du Bois and Mary Silvina Burghardt, Du Bois grew up in Great Barrington, Massachusetts, where less than 1 percent of the predominately Dutch and English population was of African descent. After graduating from high school, Du Bois earned an AB from Fisk University and a BA in philosophy and an MA in history from Harvard University. In 1892, he continued graduate studies at the University of Berlin, Germany, as a Slater Fund Fellow. He returned to the United States in 1894 and taught classes at Wilberforce University. In 1895, Du Bois became the first African American to receive a doctorate from Harvard. During the next 65 years, he was a professor of history, economics, and sociology at the University of Pennsylvania and Atlanta University, a leader of the NAACP, and an advocate of peace and civil rights. He also wrote two novels, edited several periodicals, and received numerous awards and honorary degrees. He died in 1963 as a citizen of Ghana.

Analyses of race and racism were prominent themes throughout Du Bois's career and were shaped by his education, worldwide travels, and experiences of the effects on African Americans of race riots, lynching, war, imperialism, and capitalism. His evolving racial consciousness impacted the scholarship he produced and the professional and political activities in which he participated. Du Bois made significant contributions to African American and American history, culture, politics, and scholarship. He developed ways to understand African Americans' racial identity, established the field of sociology, elucidated the historical significance of race, and fought internationally for freedom, equality, and peace.

Du Bois's most famous scholarly contributions were his interpretations of African American racial identity. In The Souls of Black Folk, published in 1903, Du Bois described African Americans' spirituality and history from 1861 to the early 20th century to explain the peculiar character of their identity as a race. He identified this race identity as "double consciousness," or the simultaneous presence in African Americans' minds of two conflicting "souls"—a longing to be a part of mainstream American society coupled with an equally strong feeling of kinship with African and African American culture. In this book, he discussed how double consciousness colored African Americans' contributions to American labor, music, economics, and religion. As a continuation of The Souls of Black Folk, Darkwater—a mixture of poetry, autobiography, and prose published in 1920—he described the effects of racism, imperialism, economic greed, sexism, and war on African Americans' racial identity.

Du Bois also contributed to academic research through pioneer sociological studies. In The Philadelphia Negro, he examined the economic and health statistics, education, and social experiences of black Americans in Philadelphia in the late 1890s. From 1897 to 1911, Du Bois directed the Atlanta University Studies of the Negro Problem, the only scientific social studies of aspects of African American life and culture in the world during the late 19th and early 20th centuries. During the 1940s, he founded and edited Phylon, a journal published by Atlanta University that interpreted racial and cultural issues from the perspectives of the social sciences.

Du Bois made major contributions to historiography by interpreting American history through the lens of race relations, particularly as pertained to Africans and African Americans. Du Bois's historiography challenged historians' refusal to acknowledge facts regarding the significance of Africans' achievements and struggles in America and the world. The Suppression of the African Slave-Trade, published in 1896, and Black Reconstruction in America, 1860–1880, published in 1935, clarified and scrutinized two misconstrued and overlooked epochs in American history. The World and Africa, published in 1947, expanded the work of the aforementioned publications to a global scale, emphasizing Africans' crucial roles in the history of humankind from prehistoric times through modernity.

By editing mass-circulated publications, Du Bois extended his scholarship into African American communities. He created the NAACP's official monthly news magazine, The Crisis, and edited it from 1910 to 1934. In the early 1920s, Du Bois founded and edited Brownie's Book, a magazine for African American children containing visual images and literature.

Civil rights activism was integral to Du Bois's life. In 1905, he established the Niagara Movement to organize black intellectuals committed to black freedom. In 1909, he helped found the NAACP, a civil rights organization consisting of black and white liberals of various professions. On behalf of the NAACP, Du Bois investigated black American troops' experiences of racism in Europe during World War I and presented to the United Nations An Appeal to the World denouncing American segregation.

Ultimately, Du Bois epitomized his idea of the "talented tenth" and was one of the earliest practitioners of American Studies and Africana Studies. As a member of the talented tenth, or the top 10 percent of African Americans responsible for training and serving the masses of black communities, Du Bois devoted his professional career, scholarship, and political activism to the causes of racial uplift and equality. Decades before the establishment of an American Studies discipline, Du Bois conducted interdisciplinary research to illuminate various aspects of American culture. He incorporated physiology, psychology, sociology, economics, history, and philosophy into analyses of the significance of race in America. Du Bois's interpretations of the experiences of members of the African Diaspora created ways to understand black American identity and culture that remain among the premier scholarship of Africana Studies. See also: African Diaspora; Double Consciousness; National Association for the Advancement of Colored People; Niagara Movement; Pan-Africanism; Pan-African Congresses

East St. Louis, Illinois, Riot of 1917

From 1910 and the U.S. entry into World War I in April 1917, East St. Louis, Illinois, grew rapidly. It developed as an important center of food processing, as well as manufacturing. The population similarly expanded. It had only 59,000 residents according to the 1910 census; approximately 10 percent were African American. By the time of the 1920 census, there were 66,000, of whom 7,200 were African American.

The rapid increase in population led, naturally, to increased contact between African Americans, native-born whites, and immigrants. That conflict was exacerbated by the competition over jobs. Several of the leading manufacturing companies in East St. Louis were believed to be encouraging African American migration from the South as a way of driving down labor costs. There was widespread talk that companies like the American Ore Company had sent recruiters to Mississippi and Alabama promising employment to African Americans who would relocate to East St. Louis.

Violence first appeared on May 28 when a rumor circulated among white workers that an African American man had robbed a white man. Throughout the night, whites randomly attacked African Americans on the streets. Those tensions boiled over again on the evening of July 1, 1917, when a car road through the African American section of East St. Louis and indiscriminately fired into homes. The African American community quickly assembled. The next time a car was spotted with armed men inside, those community members fired on it. Unfortunately, the occupants were police officers and a newspaper reporter.

A congressional committee convened to investigate the riot reporting the extent of the damage; many black workers were killed, thousands driven from their homes, and dozens of railroad cars destroyed. The committee laid the blame on the bitter feelings between the races. The Aluminum Ore Company had used the new immigrants as strike-breakers, which led to particular animosity.

On the morning of July 2, as news of the deaths of the two police officers spread, riot swept East St. Louis. The bullet-riddled police car was left on display outside police headquarters, stirring anger. During the morning of July 2, there was confusion about what was happening. The congressional committee implied that blacks instigated violence without provocation and, in response, white residents formed into mobs to retaliate. Yet, even the committee acknowledged that the violence turned on East St. Louis blacks, and with a vengeance. The city police stood by while helpless blacks were mobbed. Sometimes they joined in the terror.

The congressional committee saw the city government as corrupt. They took bribes to protect bars, prostitution businesses, and gambling businesses. The committee's report, which was based on volumes of testimony taken in East St. Louis, aimed to lay blame on business and to clean up the city. But even as the committee blamed industry, white rioters, and the local authorities, as well as some African Americans, the local prosecutor was placing much blame on African Americans. A number of community leaders were charged with conspiracy to arm themselves and attack any white men who came into the African American section of East St. Louis. The prosecution turned the community's self-defense into a crime.

East St. Louis stands as an important reminder that African Americans faced enormous hurdles in trying to obtain economic success. Even in places where they worked hard and began to succeed, their communities might be destroyed.

Ebony Magazine

Ebony first appeared on November 1, 1945, at a cost of 25 cents. That original issue sold 50,000 copies. The magazine served as a "black" counterpart to the largely "white" photographic magazines of Life, founded in 1936, and Look, founded in 1937, and originally retained the over-size format of those publications. From its inception, it depicted the accomplishments of African Americans in business and their celebrity in the entertainment industry, demonstrating success stories that met the standards of the white middle class, a policy later criticized by some as creating false goals.

John Harold Johnson created Ebony in Chicago, Illinois, the second publication of his Johnson Publishing Company. Born in the small Mississippi delta community of Arkansas City, Arkansas on January 19, 1918, Johnson and his mother moved to Chicago in 1933 to experience the World's Fair and to give the teenager an opportunity to attend high school. While attending DuSable High School, Johnson met Harry Pace of the Supreme Life Insurance Company, who employed the graduate as he continued his education at the University of Chicago. Johnson excelled in his work with Supreme's company magazine and eventually became its editor. The small publication carried information about the African American populace in a style similar to that of Reader's Digest. Believing there was a commercial market for such a publication, Johnson gained a $500 loan using his mother's furniture as collateral in November 1942. With that initial investment, Johnson created Negro Digest and the Johnson Publishing Company. Negro Digest began a consistent trend throughout the history of the company of mimicking successful periodical models of the mainstream "white" press and reformulating them with stories and photographs of interest to the black community. The new publishing company's first office was on the second floor of the Supreme Life Insurance Company building.

Within a year of Negro Digest's inception, its sales reached $50,000. That success, coupled with Johnson's concern with the popular portrayal of African Americans, led him to believe that a new publication was in order. Johnson saw black achievement in business, and in entertainment in the returning African American veterans after the close of World War II. Perhaps more important, he saw such achievement underrepresented by mainstream "white" periodicals. The growth of photojournalism in the late 1930s and early 1940s prompted Johnson to create Ebony, a publication saturated with photographs to portray the successes of African Americans and their contributions to American culture.

Johnson announced that he would not seek advertising revenue until the magazine's circulation grew to 100,000 copies, which took seven months to accomplish. When he did reach his advertising threshold, he found that many black businesses were either unable to afford national advertising space or reluctant to devote such substantial portions of their advertising budgets to Ebony full-page ads. Johnson responded by writing letters to the presidents of large corporations in an attempt to convince them of the benefits of advertising in the African American press. His argument swayed Eugene McDonald, president of the Zenith Corporation. McDonald was a former military commander and Arctic explorer who had known the African American polar explorer Matthew Henson. Johnson gave Zenith's president an autographed copy of a Henson biography, began a friendship of his own with the leader, and secured an advertising contract. The Zenith account stabilized Ebony's finances and gave entrée into the boardrooms of other "white" companies.

Ebony early avoided "the race question," choosing instead to present a portrait of black success that others in the community could strive toward. Hard work would breed success, argued the Johnson Publishing Company, and the success of some would breed the success of others. Ebony revived the Booker T. Washington model of social progress. To boost sales in the late 1940s and early 1950s, the magazine included sexier, more sensational photographs, but recession slowed sales and returned the publication to a more moderate position. By using a white middle class model for success, Johnson and Ebony alienated some, but the tone of the magazine changed as the Civil Rights movement's militancy increased. Ebony included news on the fight for integration, often praising the activism of African American college students. Along with its profiles of black celebrities, the periodical featured profiles of government officials, legislators, and visiting dignitaries. As the movement's issues changed, so did Ebony's coverage, moving in the 1960s to cover impoverished inner-city living conditions, the racial inequity in educational and hiring practices, and the misapplication of drug laws to entrap African Americans. From the first presidential election of the magazine's tenure, the 1948 Harry Truman victory over Thomas Dewey, Ebony's publisher used the magazine to endorse Democratic candidates. The moves did not exonerate the periodical from further criticism, however, as editorials denouncing militant violence and continued success-story profiles alienated the more radical among the black nationalist and black power communities.

Despite the criticism, Ebony featured the writing of many leading African Americans from the liberal intellectual community. Carl T. Rowan and Kenneth Clark contributed articles. Martin Luther King Jr., wrote a column for the periodical called "Advice for Living By." Through the close of the Civil Rights movement proper, and its continuing reverberations in the 1980s, 1990s, and 2000s, Ebony has maintained its attempt to represent the black middle class and the successes that lifestyle creates. Negro Digest came and went, but Ebony remained the backbone of the Johnson Publishing Company. John Johnson parlayed the success of the periodical into a publishing empire, adding magazines such as Jet, Ebony Man, Ebony Jr!, Ebony International, and others. Today, the magazine carries a readership of more than 6 million, with almost 2 million subscribers, and remains the pinnacle in its genre. In 1969, Moneta Sleet Jr., an Ebony photographer, became the first African American male to win the Pulitzer Prize. His photos and those that followed continue to demonstrate the great African American success story.

Elaine, Arkansas, Riot of 1919

During and after World War I, a series of violent confrontations, known as "race riots," erupted across the country. Along with Houston, East St. Louis, Chicago, Washington, D.C., Omaha, Knoxville, Charleston, Indianapolis, and other cities, Elaine, Arkansas captured national headlines, as racial violence exploded in this rural Mississippi Delta community. More accurately termed a massacre than a riot, whites overwhelmingly perpetrated the violence against African Americans who died in far greater numbers and who, ironically, were the only ones charged with a crime.

On September 30, 1919, a secret meeting of local African Americans gathered late at a church in Hoop Spur, a rural area in Phillips County located three miles north of the small town of Elaine, Arkansas. Protected by armed guards, those attending were members of the Progressive Farmers and Household Union. This secretly organized union of black farmers wanted a greater share of the profits for cotton tenant farmers and fairer, more open debt terms for sharecroppers. Although African Americans accounted for three-fourths of the population of this south-eastern Arkansas county, situated on the west bank of the Mississippi, the landowners were overwhelmingly whites who leased the land to the county's black majority under exploitive terms that greatly favored the landowners. Frustrated by their long-term economic oppression and emboldened by their recent participation in the war fought to make the world "safe for democracy," African Americans organized the Farmers Union to effect change and improve their lives. Yet their opponents' knowledge of these bold plans influenced law enforcement's intervention. Outside the church that night, a gun fight between union members and two law enforcement officers left one of the white officers dead and sparked the violent retaliation that ensued the next few days.

A law enforcement posse arrived in Hoop Spur from Helena, the county seat, to investigate the shooting. More deaths—white and black—occurred during this confrontation. Shocked that African Americans fought back, the sheriff issued before dawn a panic call for help to whites in surrounding Delta counties in Arkansas and Mississippi. By sunset October 1, 600 to 1,000 whites had arrived armed and ready to kill any African American who moved. For two days whites aggressively hunted and killed African Americans. They also captured, interrogated, and forced false confessions from terrified blacks. Meanwhile Governor Charles Brough requested troops from nearby Fort Pike to quell the violence. After some delay, the troops arrived by train early on October 2. Some accounts credit the soldiers with disarming rampaging whites and restoring order. Other witnesses reported that some soldiers, armed with machine guns, also engaged in indiscriminate killing before disarming white civilians.

Once the violence subsided, official reports acknowledged 25 black and 5 white deaths. Yet widely circulated, unofficial accounts reveal that white mobs killed many more blacks; frequently reported estimates range from scores to hundreds. Local whites and soldiers who perpetrated this retaliatory violence had no interest in securing an accurate death count that reflected large number of black victims. The white power structure immediately began constructing a narrative that blamed African Americans for the riots, alleging that blacks were plotting to kill their white landowners. This explanation, they reasoned, justified whites' violence as a preemptive defense. Although no evidence ever emerged to support this alleged plot, when the killing stopped, the arrests began, but only for the alleged killers of white victims. Within weeks, 122 African Americans were charged with crimes associated with the riots. Arkansas never arrested or charged any whites with a crime, nor did the state seek justice for any of the black victims.

In all, 67 indicted blacks pled guilty to reduced charges and began their prison terms immediately. The grand jury indicted 12 blacks with first-degree murder on October 31, and the trials began on Monday, November 3, one month after the massacre. Court-appointed attorneys never met with defendants, questioned jurors, or called witnesses. Outside the court house a white mob gathered, threatening to lynch any defendants that jurors failed to convict. Each jury deliberated no more than eight minutes before delivering a guilty verdict. By week's end all 12 men had been found guilty and sentenced to death. The white power structure of Arkansas considered the matter closed, but a black attorney from Little Rock and the NAACP, independent of each others' actions, simultaneously challenged this gross injustice.

Scipio Africanus Jones, a successful black attorney from Little Rock, organized the local black community to support an appeal for the Elaine Twelve. Unknown to Jones, the NAACP was also preparing an appeal and had already hired a local white attorney, Colonel George Murphy. The NAACP's involvement began earlier when it sent Walter White to investigate the riot. White, the NAACP's executive secretary who could "pass" for white with his fair skin and blue eyes, posed as a Chicago Daily News reporter interested in a good story. White's investigation garnered candid information from whites that the NAACP used to counter the cover-up interpretation that the white power structure offered the local press. Murphy and Jones partnered their efforts on the appeal process until Murphy died two years later. Jones continued with Murphy's partner and later with Moorefield Storey, president of the NAACP.

After several years of determined effort, close calls, and frustrating results, the case eventually appeared before the United States Supreme Court as Moore v. Dempsey. Jones and Storey argued on appeal that mob intimidation at the trial denied the defendants a fair trial. In February 1923, Oliver Wendell Holmes, speaking for the majority, issued a landmark decision supporting their argument.

All 12 condemned men were released and all others imprisoned from the Elaine riots were set free.

Ellison, Ralph

Born in 1913 in Oklahoma City, Oklahoma, Ralph Waldo Ellison (1913–1994) authored Invisible Man, one of the most read novels of the 20th century. Published in 1952 and hailed as one of the great "protest novels" of American history, Invisible Man depicted the saga of an unnamed protagonist on his journey from his boyhood home to college to New York City. The odyssey allows the protagonist to discover his identity, as a member of a caste and as a human.

Invisible Man opens with the protagonist (known as Invisible Man or IM) living in a garret in New York City, lighting his apartment with 1,369 light bulbs using stolen electricity. Yet, IM seems immune from liability for stealing the electricity and for assaulting a man he meets on the street. This was strange to modern readers, who were so used to seeing African Americans as the objects of intense scrutiny by police and prosecutors. But people visible for some reasons still may not be seen; their humanity may be completely ignored, as Ellison reminds us in his 1981 introduction. Lynching victims, for instance, can be "illuminated by flaming torches and flashbulbs," but they are mere objects, not humans. The Invisible Man understands that principle of remaining invisible to the police. At one point during the novel he is told, "The longer you remain unknown to the police, the longer you'll be effective." (Invisible Man, p. 284)

The novel then narrates how IM arrived in New York. It returns to his home in Greenwood. The name is an allusion to the Greenwood section of Tulsa, Oklahoma, which witnessed a terrible riot in 1921. IM witnesses the last words of his grandfather. The grandfather—who is notorious in the community as an agreeable black man who is complicit with whites—changes temperament on his deathbed. The grandfather tells IM to agree the white man to death. All of that sets up a battle royale of blindfolded, adolescent black boys fighting against each other for the amusement of a white audience. Those who survive the contest of all against all are given the chance to scramble for worthless coins. In essence, there is no way to "win." Shortly after that, IM dreams that there is a letter inside his briefcase with instructions that say "keep this Nigger-boy running."

IM then goes to a black college (believed to be modeled on Tuskegee), where he serves as a chauffeur to a wealthy white donor on the board of trustees. He follows the instructions given him by the donor to show the poor neighborhoods. That angers the college president, who is surprised that IM would be honest with a white man. IM is then sent to New York City by the college president. He is given letters of reference that, in effect, say "keep this nigger boy running."

It is in New York that IM searches for his humanity and individuality. In one important scene, for instance, IM helps an elderly couple who are being evicted from their apartment. IM sees the evidence of their humanity strewn on the sidewalk—emancipation papers, a picture of Lincoln, a souvenir from the World's Fair, a breast pump, a card addressed to grandma—and realizes that the couple represents common humanity. What are they being evicted from, IM asks? For they have little. All they have is the "great constitutional dream book." And even that they could not read. The "laws" failed to protect the community. IM's refrain was "we're a law abiding people." But the elderly couple was being evicted and how could that be consistent with law? Well, it was what was demanded by the police officers:

[L]ook up there in the doorway at that law standing there with his forty-five. Look at him, standing with his blue steel pistol and his serge suit, or one forty-five, you see ten for every one of us, ten guns and ten warm suits and ten fat bellies and ten million laws. Laws, that's what we call them down South! Laws! (Invisible Man, p. 278)

The eviction scene juxtaposes "law" as imposed by white police officers, prosecutors, and judges with justice. It also juxtaposes law with religion. IM asked, "They don't want the world, but only Jesus. They only want Jesus, just fifteen minutes of Jesus on the rug-bare floor . . . How about it, Mr. Law? Do we get our fifteen minutes worth of Jesus? You got the world, can we have our Jesus?" (Invisible Man, p. 279)

In another scene, IM is working in a paint factory, where he mixes a batch of "National Monument White" paint. He makes it whiter by dropping black paint into a vat of white paint. In an almost transparent way, Ellison alludes to the ways that black and white culture are mixed and how some parts of white culture originate (and draw from) black thought.

Another theme is that of insider versus outsider (or power versus individuality). In one scene, for instance, Brother Clifton, who is selling paper dolls on the street, is shot by a police officer. Brother Clifton died "resisting reality in the form of a .38 caliber revolver in the hands of the arresting officer, on Forty-second between the library and the subway" The shooting of Brother Clifton illustrates the conflict between myth and history. Although Ellison believed that Clifton was an innocent victim, others who were not there might not. "[I]t is only the known, the seen, the heard and only those events that the recorder regards as important that are put down, those lies his keepers keep their power by. . . . Where were the historians today? And how would they put it down?" (Invisible Man, p. 439)

That problem of history as written and history as it happened, of myth versus reality, was a critical part of Ellison's thought. He spoke about it in a talk, "Going to the Territory," at Brown University in 1979. There he reminded listeners that myth controls our vision of ourselves and shapes how we behave, but that grim and complex reality of the past also affects us. It was from that interaction of myth and reality—of mixing and interdependence of black and white—that concerned Ellison.

Now that we have passed the 50th anniversary of the publication of Invisible Man, we are gaining the distance that is necessary to evaluate dispassionately the novel and the civil rights revolution that surrounds it. After the initial, warm embrace of the novel, Ralph Ellison was seen as a conservative in the 1960s and early 1970s and consequently, given the political double standard applied to African American intellectuals, was viewed with suspicion. In more recent times, we have been able to view his accomplishments more accurately.

Perhaps part of the explanation for the criticism of Ellison was his faith in the idea of law to overcome inequality. Many others, faced with laughably biased mechanisms of law enforcement, did not share Ellison's optimism in law. At times even Ellison could not share that optimism. As he tells in his meditation on law and literature, "The Perspective of Literature," as a young man he had little respect for law. He recalled of his youth in Oklahoma City that law meant the arbitrary dictates of law enforcement officers. Those men followed their own caprice and left the black community with unequal schools, little protection against violence, and little access to the rights of citizens to participate in democracy. They even participated in lynchings on occasion. Thus, there were two concepts about "law" in the Oklahoma of Ellison's youth: the rule of law as imposed by white society on African Americans and the rule of law as it ought to exist. In his notes on Juneteenth, Ellison further elaborated the distinction. The law defined African Americans in certain ways that were inconsistent with the facts and that was inconsistent with religion:

The law deals with facts, and down here the facts are that we are weak and inferior. But while it looks like we are what the law says we are, don't ever forget that we've been put in this

Ralph Ellison, whose novel Invisible Man has become a classic of modern American fiction, wrote compellingly of the experience of African Americans in a society that has tended to ignore their problems. (National Archives) position by force, by power of numbers, and the readiness of those numbers to use brutality to keep us within the law. Ah, but the truth is something else. We are not what the law, yes and custom, says we are and to protect our truth we have to protect ourselves from the definitions of the law. Because the law's facts have made us outlaws. Yes, that's the truth, but only part of it; . . . we're outlaws in Christ and Christ is the higher truth. (Juneteenth, p. 354)

Ellison looked forward in Invisible Man to a new understanding of multiracial humanity. He wrote of a symbolic poster of a heroic figure:

An American Indian couple, representing the dispossessed past; a blond brother (in overalls) and a leading Irish sister, representing the dispossessed present; and Brother Tod Clifton and a young white couple (it had been felt unwise simply to show Clifton and the girl) surrounded by a group of children of mixed races, representing the future (Invisible Man, p. 385)

In Ellison's Oklahoma, there was segregation in housing and schools and extreme examples of racial violence, particularly the Tulsa Race Riot of 1921. And yet somehow Ellison, like the Oklahoma black community more generally, found an optimism in the idea of justice. Perhaps that optimism came from Roscoe Dunjee, editor of the Oklahoma City Black Dispatch. Dunjee had a faith in the Constitution and the rule of law, if properly administered, to remake American society. Dunjee advanced the idea of equal treatment under law—that people should be able to vote regardless of their race, that everyone had the right to adequate schools, that the police should protect all communities.

We should avoid too much of a temptation to read subsequent history back onto the novel, but it seems that some of Ellison's optimism in the Constitution's possibilities appears in Invisible Man, particularly in its call for a recognition of humanity and individuality. Ellison was working on the novel at the same time that the decisions that brought us to Brown v. Board of Education (several of the most important of which arose in Oklahoma, largely through the efforts of Roscoe Dunjee) were being written. Invisible Man and the Supreme Court drew on the common reservoir of cultural opposition to group identity and racial caste. At long last, the Court awoke to the realities of segregation and allowed African Americans to have a legal status other than that of invisible people. Maybe Ellison's most important contribution comes in his shaping of a humanity that undermined the segregation mentality. Thus, a nonlegal document, concerned about people who are left outside the law, has implications for law. And in that era of the early 1950s, Ellison's optimistic call for seeing through—seeing humanity—was fulfilled in some important ways in the decision of the United States Supreme Court in Brown v. Board of Education.

In Ellison's other work, we see similar themes. In his posthumously published novel, Juneteenth, Ellison explored the life of jazz musician-turned preacher, Alonzo Hickman. Hickman became a preacher after his brother was falsely accused of raping a white woman and then lynched. Hickman raised that woman's baby, Bliss, in the hopes that Bliss (a boy of ambiguous racial identity) might bring African American values to the white community. Bliss, however, grows into a race-baiting politician who is elected senator from a southern state. When Reverend Hickman gets wind of a plot to assassinate Bliss (now Senator Sunraider), he comes to warn the senator. But Hickman is prevented from seeing Senator Sunraider by a "law" (a law enforcement officer) who stands guard outside the Capitol building. And, thus, Sunraider is shot on the Senate floor by an assassin (who is also his black son)!

Through Invisible Man, we can see how African Americans created lives despite segregation, how elegant ideas like equality and humanity remade the law, and how that story is at the center of our continuing American struggle. See also: Wright, Richard

Emancipation Proclamation

When Abraham Lincoln delivered his inaugural address on March 4, 1861, he struck fear into many abolitionists and free blacks when he stated he would not do anything to interfere with the institution of slavery in the states where it already existed; rather he would just prevent the expansion of slavery into the country's territories. Abolitionists were outraged at Lincoln's stance. After the inauguration, leading advocates of immediate emancipation, such as Massachusetts Senator Charles Sumner, tried to convince Lincoln that emancipation needed to be immediate and swift. Lincoln disagreed. He knew that any sudden change in slavery would have dramatic consequences. Initially, Lincoln favored gradual emancipation and financially compensating slave owners. Lincoln also preferred colonization of emancipated slaves—sending them beyond the borders of the United States to live out the rest of their lives.

After the Civil War began on April 12, 1861, with the bombardment of Fort Sumter, Lincoln's primary concern was the preservation of the Union. He did believe, however, that his actions of reuniting the country would ultimately lead to the abolition of slavery throughout the nation, as he recognized slavery to be the root cause of the conflict. Although Lincoln's view of how emancipation would occur was pragmatic, many abolitionists believed that the Civil War provided an opportunity for immediate emancipation. Emancipation, however, was a divisive issue and Lincoln did not want to do anything to alienate the border states—Kentucky, Missouri, Maryland, and Delaware—which still maintained slavery and allegiance to the United States.

Although Lincoln was careful in the war's first year to convey to slave owners that he would not abolish slavery where it existed, some abolitionist Union officers cared little. General John C. Fremont, commanding Union forces in Missouri in 1861, used the Confiscation Act, federal legislation stating that the property of anyone in rebellion could be seized by the United States government, to emancipate slaves. The next year, General David Hunter created more problems for the Lincoln administration on the South Carolina Sea Coast Islands when he armed former slaves and used them as contraband soldiers. Lincoln ordered both of these generals to return the slaves to their masters, fearing these actions might make the border states fearful of Lincoln's intentions to end slavery, thus driving them to secede.

Despite Lincoln's desire to emancipate slaves gradually, pressure for abolishing slavery increased by the end of his first year in office. In November 1861, Lincoln took the first steps toward emancipation when he drafted a plan of gradual, compensated emancipation for Delaware. Lincoln proposed that Delaware free all of its slaves over the age of 35 and when other slaves reached that age, they, too, would be free. In return the federal government would pay Delaware more than $700,000 spread out over a period of 31 years. Lincoln further promised Delaware that, if it would agree to eliminate slavery by 1872, the government would make payments in excess of $70,000 each year for the next decade. Ultimately Lincoln wanted to use money to end slavery. He believed that if the government could compensate slave owners, slave owners would have two choices. They could either accept payment for their slaves or they could leave and go to another slave state. This, however, would drive the supply of slaves in each state up, and therefore the value of slaves as a commodity would decrease. Lincoln surmised that as the price of slaves plummeted, masters would look for a way to rid themselves of their slaves; therefore over the course of time slaves would be freed as an economic necessity.

Lincoln's plan of gradual and compensated emancipation, although in theory might have worked, did not comply with the emancipationist vision of abolitionists and free blacks who demanded immediate action. That swift action began in the summer of 1862 when Lincoln signed the Militia Act. This legislation not only gave the chief executive the authority to call 300,000 state militia troops for a period of nine months, but also gave the president the right to accept the service of African Americans. Even though Lincoln was not yet ready in the summer of 1862 to accept the widespread armed service of African Americans, he was prepared to accept them in limited numbers. Furthermore and most important, the Militia Act empowered the president to emancipate any slaves who enrolled into the service.

The giant step toward emancipation came on July 22, 1862, less than one week after the Militia Act passed both houses of Congress, when Lincoln informed his cabinet that he intended to issue a proclamation to end slavery. Reaction to Lincoln's proposed decree was mixed among his cabinet, but Lincoln explained to them that abolishing slavery was critical to the Union war effort. After all, hundreds of thousands of slaves throughout the Confederacy labored in war industries, built fortifications, and aided in running farms, freeing up a considerable amount of the white male population to enlist and fight for the Confederacy. If these slaves could be freed, it would have a dramatic impact on the Confederate labor supply and ability to support the troops in the field. His cabinet now stood behind him, but his Secretary of State, William Seward, advised Lincoln to not issue the Emancipation Proclamation until the Union Army of the Potomac, operating in the east, won a battle. Despite Union victories in the west in 1861 and 1862, the central focus of the war was in Virginia. If Lincoln issued his proclamation amid Union defeat in Virginia, it would have little weight, as the success of the proclamation depended on whether or not the Union forces could win the war. Lincoln agreed and decided to wait for a Union victory in the East.

The long-awaited victory came on September 17, 1862, at the battle of Antietam (Sharpsburg) in Maryland. Although considered a victory by the Lincoln administration, Antietam was in reality a tactical draw—neither side won. It could be portrayed as a victory, however, because General Robert E. Lee's Army of Northern Virginia retreated south across the Potomac River and into Virginia. On September 22, five days after the battle, Lincoln issued his preliminary Emancipation Proclamation.

The preliminary proclamation announced that on January 1, 1863, Lincoln would declare slaves in areas in rebellion against the United States free; border states would not have their slaves emancipated. Lincoln's Emancipation Proclamation parted drastically with his earlier idea of gradual, compensated emancipation as well as colonization. Nothing in his proclamation said it would be gradual or compensated; rather it would be swift and decisive—if the Union army of course won the Civil War. He also included a provision in the document allowing for the enlistment of African Americans into the army and navy.

When Lincoln's Emancipation Proclamation was announced after Antietam, it met mixed reactions among soldiers in the Union Army. General George B. McClellan, who at the time commanded the Union Army of the Potomac that fought Lee at Antietam, condemned the proclamation and many soldiers were outraged as they claimed to have not enlisted in the Union army to fight for the freedom of the slaves. Internal rage among Union soldiers escalated into near scenes of mutiny in some regiments. Entire units condemned Lincoln's measure and signed petitions to be sent to President Lincoln stating that they refused to fight. Union soldiers vented their frustration in other ways as well. In December 1862, as the Union Army of the Potomac crossed the Rappahannock River and entered Fredericksburg, they destroyed much of the town. Some soldiers explained that one of the reasons they lashed out was that they did not approve of emancipation.

Soldiers aside, many politicians criticized Lincoln's measure. For example a former associate justice of the United States Supreme Court, Benjamin Robbins Curtis, argued in a pamphlet he published in late 1862, Executive Power, that the president did not have the power to issue an executive order eliminating slavery—something that was legally allowed in the states under the Constitution. Other prominent figures such as Joel Parker, a Republican judge from Massachusetts, and former Speaker of the House of Representatives, Robert C. Winthrop, criticized the Emancipation Proclamation and stated that Lincoln had overstepped his powers as chief executive.

Many southern Unionists—those who lived in the Confederacy, but swore allegiance to the United States government—were also outraged at the Emancipation Proclamation. They believed that it contradicted Lincoln's first inaugural address and that the war should not be turned into a war of emancipation. Despite the disapproval of many Unionists, they eventually recognized the importance of slavery as a major resource for the Confederacy and viewed the abolition of slavery as a means to achieve Union victory in the Civil War.

A barrage of antiemancipation editorials appeared throughout the country. Even though these might have concerned Lincoln and served as a good indicator of what many felt about emancipation, Lincoln knew the real test would be the 1862 elections. Republicans who supported emancipation failed the test miserably. The Republicans lost seats in the United States House of Representatives when Democrats won the majority of seats for Pennsylvania and Ohio. In the New York and New Jersey gubernatorial elections, the citizens elected Democrats. In Lincoln's home state of Illinois, 11 of the 14 seats in the House of Representatives would be occupied by Democrats. The Democrats also won a 28-seat majority in the Illinois state legislature. In all, the interim election of 1862 was a dismal failure for Lincoln and the Republicans, as 31 Republican seats were lost in Congress. Many Northerners had sent a clear message to Lincoln—they would not support an administration and party who made emancipation a war aim.

Even though Lincoln had early enemies of emancipation in the North, there were some who supported him and recognized the importance of emancipation as a way to bring the conflict to an end. General Henry Halleck, who at the time served as Lincoln's general-in-chief, believed emancipation was a great weapon in the Union arsenal. Halleck argued that every slave taken from the South and out of the Confederacy's labor supply was the equivalent of one Confederate soldier being taken from the battlefield. Lincoln had other supporters as well. Horace Greeley's New York Tribune praised the Emancipation Proclamation and hailed it as the beginning of the end of the Confederacy.

Despite the criticism of both Republicans and Democrats, Lincoln proceeded with his Emancipation Proclamation and formally issued it on New Year's Day, 1863. On the date the Emancipation Proclamation went into effect, African Americans, both slaves and free blacks, rejoiced. Crowds gathered around the White House and praised Lincoln. African Americans and abolitionists throughout Northern cities celebrated. African American troops already in service as a result of the Militia Act signed in 1862 celebrated as well. For example troops in the First Kansas Colored Volunteer Infantry held a ceremony and celebration at Fort Scott Kansas in honor of the Emancipation Proclamation. Despite the joy that many African Americans felt on January 1, 1863, many understood that the only way their freedom would be guaranteed was that if the Union army won the Civil War.

By the time Lincoln issued the formal declaration, he still had his detractors, but many of the soldiers, initially outraged at the prospect of fighting to free the slaves, had calmed their anger. Regardless of their feelings toward slavery and emancipation, many Union troops began to understand that emancipation was a great weapon to defeat the Confederacy, as it would strip away thousands of workers from the Confederate labor force. Although not all soldiers were eager to enforce emancipation, some of them were. Among those enthusiastic to implement emancipation were the large majority of troops commanded by Union General Robert H. Milroy. On January 1, 1863, Milroy marched his troops into Virginia's northern Shenandoah Valley. Milroy, an Indiana native with abolitionist leanings, established headquarters in Winchester, Virginia, on the date the Emancipation Proclamation took effect. General Milroy issued his own proclamation on January 5—“Freedom to Slaves”—informing the citizens of the northern Shenandoah Valley that he would do everything in his power to enforce emancipation, and those who interfered would be arrested and sent beyond Union lines. Furthermore, and just as Lincoln had explained in his Emancipation Proclamation, Milroy informed the former slaves that he expected them to behave themselves and to occupy themselves with some task. The Indiana general took great pride in enforcing emancipation in a town that boasted as residents Senator James Mason, author of the 1850 Fugitive Slave Law, and Judge Richard Parker, who presided over John Brown’s trial in Charles Town, Virginia, in 1859. Milroy freed hundreds of slaves and put them to work for his command or put those who wanted to go north on trains.

News of Lincoln’s Emancipation Proclamation and the actions of generals such as Milroy, who took an active roll in seeing that emancipation was carried out, created fear among many Confederate officials. Virginia’s Governor John Letcher branded Lincoln and Milroy as war criminals attempting to incite a slave insurrection. It was even ordered that if Milroy were captured, he should be executed without any trial.

Even though Union generals such as Milroy spread the word about emancipation, there were many areas throughout the Confederacy that Union troops were unable to reach, and slave owners withheld news of the Emancipation Proclamation from the slaves. Fearing that slaves would not hear of their liberation, Lincoln called on Frederick Douglass in the summer of 1863 to organize a group of African American scouts to go throughout the South, spread the news of emancipation, and help the slaves to come into Union lines. Douglass thought the measure of carrying off large numbers of slaves, without proper military support, in Confederate territory was too risky. Instead, Douglass suggested that Lincoln use special agents who would go into the South and tell the slaves that the president had issued a proclamation declaring their freedom, but that the slaves should remain where they were and that they should plan their own escape. Lincoln agreed with Douglass’s plan.

Confederate officials became enraged further with Lincoln’s Emancipation Proclamation because it not only freed slaves, but it opened the door for the widespread recruitment of African Americans—many of whom were former slaves—into the Union army. Even though African American troops had been serving in the Union Army as a result of the Militia Act, Confederate officials understood that the Emancipation Proclamation would dramatically swell the ranks of African Americans in the federal army. The thought of armed African Americans struck fear into many white Southerners. The Confederate government aimed to do something about it. To discourage African Americans from enlisting, Confederate President Jefferson Davis and the Confederate Congress ordered that captured African Americans would not be treated as prisoners of war; rather they would be regarded as slaves in armed rebellion in the state where they were captured and would be subject to the punishment of that state for being involved in a slave rebellion. The punishment was always death. Davis also encouraged the execution of captured white officers who commanded African American regiments. Furthermore, Davis recommended that African American sailors captured from the Potomac Flotilla be executed by hanging. These threats did little to deter African Americans from enlisting and fighting for their freedom. Nearly 200,000 African Americans volunteered for service in the U.S. Army and Navy.

As 1863 came to a close and the presidential election year of 1864 approached, Lincoln made every effort to pass the Thirteenth Amendment, formally abolishing slavery. Lincoln understood that the Emancipation Proclamation was a war measure and that to officially outlaw slavery, which was protected under the Constitution, the Constitution needed to be amended. After he won reelection, Lincoln pressured Congress to act. He believed that the passage of a constitutional amendment abolishing slavery would have a tremendously positive impact on the course of the Civil War. Furthermore, Lincoln surmised that if the border states, which still maintained slavery, ratified the amendment, it would break Confederate morale even further. The amendment passed Congress on January 31, 1865, and became law on December 6, 1865, when states ratified the amendment. Unfortunately, Lincoln, who had been assassinated in April 1865, would not live to see the ultimate achievement of his Emancipation Proclamation.

The Emancipation Proclamation marked a major turning point in American history and was perhaps the greatest legacy of the American Civil War. Abraham Lincoln was revered among African Americans as their great emancipator. Even years after the Civil War ended, January 1 held special meaning for African Americans and they celebrated emancipation day in both North and South well into the 20th century.

Ethiopian Peace Movement

The Italo-Ethiopian War (1935–1936) and the Italian occupation of Ethiopia (1936–1941) sparked a support movement among African Americans for Ethiopia that led to variety of actions and reactions. Along with Liberia, Ethiopia was one of only two independent African nations by the early 20th century, and it was the only independent African nation run by indigenous Africans. As such, Ethiopia became a symbol for many in the African Diaspora, including African Americans in the United States. In the imperialist fervor of the 1890s, Italy had sought to conquer Ethiopia, but had lost badly in its attempt to do so, culminating in its loss at the Battle of Adowa (1896). Ethiopia thus remained independent throughout the first third of the 20th century.

When the Fascist leader Benito Mussolini came to power in Italy in the 1920s, he promised a program of nationalist glory, including a more vigorous foreign policy. By the early 1930s, Mussolini began to covet Ethiopia in order to expand the Italian empire in northeastern Africa and to seek revenge for the Italian setbacks of the 1890s. After a brief skirmish along the Ethiopian border with Italian Eritrea in November 1934, the Italian government demanded an apology and an indemnity from Emperor Haile Selassie and the Imperial Ethiopian government. Selassie refused and tensions mounted; the emperor pleaded for help from the League of Nations, of which Ethiopia was a member, but the League did very little to stop Italian aggression. The League was led by the British and French, who feared pushing Mussolini into Adolf Hitler's camp. Hitler, however, learned a lesson from this episode about the use of a policy of appeasement by the British and the French.

Unhampered by the League of Nations, Italy invaded Ethiopia on October 3, 1935, with an army of 120,000 men. The Italians quickly captured Adowa, the site of their humiliating loss in the 1890s. The Ethiopians held out as long as they could, but, unlike in the 1890s, this time Italy had a superior fighting force and superior technology. The Italians used modern weapons such as tanks, airplanes, and even used poison gas on Ethiopian combatants and civilians. In May 1936, Emperor Selassie went into exile, eventually settling in London. During World War II, Italian Ethiopia was invaded by an Allied force of mostly African colonial troops led by the British. In May 1941, Italy was ousted from Ethiopia, and the British reluctantly installed Haile Selassie on the throne of the independent nation of Ethiopia.

African Americans responded vigorously to the Ethiopian crisis of the mid-1930s. As Italy began threatening Ethiopia in 1934, Africans and people of African descent around the world spoke out in support of Ethiopia and against Italian aggression. The Italo-Ethiopian conflict thus led to an outpouring of black nationalism (in Africa and in the Diaspora), pan-Africanism, and a general philosophy of anti-imperialism. In the United States, the conflict led African Americans to organize in support of Ethiopia: sometimes for peace, sometimes for Ethiopian independence, and sometimes to support the Ethiopian military in its war against Italy.

A number of African American, women's, religious, and peace organizations attempted to influence U.S. policymakers, international organizations like the League of Nations, and public opinion in favor of Ethiopian independence. The peak of organizational activity occurred between the opening of hostilities in 1934 and the Italian victory in 1936. For example, in March 1935, the NAACP sent a telegram to the League of Nations and the U.S. State Department outlining its opposition to an Italian takeover of Ethiopia. Between December 1934 and May 1935, the Women's International League for Peace and Freedom (WILPF) sent three telegrams to the League of Nations calling for League action to ensure a peaceful resolution to the Italo-Ethiopian border dispute.

Besides already existing organizations like the NAACP and the WILPF, new organizations were created to support peace initiatives and give any support they could to Ethiopia. Among the many new organizations founded during the Ethiopian crisis of the mid-1930s were the Provisional Committee for the Defense of Ethiopia (Harlem), the Friends of Ethiopia in America (New York), the Committee for Ethiopia (New York), the Joint Committee for the Defense of Ethiopia (Chicago), the Chicago Society for the Aid of Ethiopia, and many others around the country. These organizations were created to give support to Ethiopia, whether moral, monetary, or otherwise. These new organizations, along with the older ones like the NAACP, worked to raise funds to send to Ethiopia, usually for military or aid purposes. Sometimes in lieu of money, specific items were sent: an ambulance, medical supplies, or weapons. Besides fundraising, these organizations worked to raise awareness about Ethiopia as well. Numerous African American individuals contacted these organizations, the federal government, or members of the Ethiopian government to volunteer their services or give money to the Ethiopian cause.

Throughout the Italo-Ethiopian conflict, the U.S. government remained officially neutral, although, like the League of Nations, the U.S. government enacted a partial embargo against the Italians. In 1934 and 1935, many African Americans worked to pressure policymakers in Washington and in Europe into seeking a peaceful resolution to the conflict. Many pointed to the Kellogg-Briand Pact (1928), of which the U.S. was a signatory, which had attempted to outlaw war. The pressure worked to an extent. In August 1935, Secretary of State Cordell Hull asked American diplomats in London and Paris to find out whether or not the United States could help in the peace process. On August 19, 1935, President Roosevelt got involved and sent a message to Italian Premier Benito Mussolini calling for a peaceful resolution to the conflict. The U.S. government gave only minimal rhetorical support to the Ethiopian cause, but support for Ethiopia among African Americans and others continued throughout the war, although it waned by the war's end in 1936. Many African Americans and peace activists continued to oppose the Italian takeover of Ethiopia throughout the late 1930s, and these diehards remained hopeful for the return of the Ethiopian empire, which came about in 1941.

Evers, Medgar

Medgar Evers (1925–1963) was a prominent Mississippi civil rights leader who pushed for black equality without confrontation. Assassinated in June 1963, at the young age of 37, Evers became a national hero for African Americans across the United States.

Medgar Wiley Evers was born on July 2, 1925 in Decatur, Mississippi. He was born into a typical Southern farming family. His father James and his mother Jessie raised him and his six brothers and sisters to be self-sufficient, hard working, and proud. Throughout his younger years, Evers was taught the importance of education. Although most southern farming families took their children out of school during the harvesting season, the Everses did not. In 1942, Evers dropped out of Newton High School to join the army. After spending a few years in the service, he returned to Newton in 1947 to complete his high school degree. In the same year, Evers successfully voted in the local county election. He had attempted to vote the year before, but was unsuccessful because of white opposition.

After completing high school, Evers enrolled in Alcorn State University, one of only two black universities in Mississippi. Although many African Americans chose a path in teaching, Evers decided to take a different and more radical route, as a business major. At Alcorn, Medgar met his future wife Myrlie Beasley. On Christmas Eve 1951 the two married. The next year Evers graduated from Alcorn. He was instantly hired by a newly created black business—Magnolia Mutual Insurance Company.

While employed by the insurance company, Evers spent most of his time visiting poor black sharecroppers and other southern black families in an attempt to sell them insurance. Medgar always defied the white power structure, but it was not until his experience with the poor blacks of Mississippi that Evers became more directly involved in the civil rights struggles of blacks in the South. Seeing the dreadful conditions of many of the poor southern blacks Evers immediately joined the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP). The NAACP, founded in 1909, was one of the most prominent civil rights organizations in the country. The NAACP, however, did not have a Mississippi branch. Evers's efforts changed this. By 1953 the NAACP had 21 branches in Mississippi.

Mississippi was a strongly segregated southern state. Even after the Brown v. Board of Education decision, in which the U.S. Supreme Court ruled school segregation unconstitutional, segregation remained strong in Mississippi. To test the Brown decision, Evers applied to the University of Mississippi Law School but was denied admission on the basis of his race. Evers fought for admission but was unsuccessful, and the university remained segregated. Despite this setback, the NAACP, impressed with Evers's actions, awarded him the newly created position of field secretary for the state of Mississippi. In this position, Evers became the national NAACP's representative for the state of Mississippi.

With the NAACP, Evers worked emphatically to educate blacks and bring them the right to vote. When segregation continued to run rampant in Mississippi, Evers encouraged blacks to patronize only black-owned businesses. This angered many whites throughout the state. In 1962, James Meredith applied to the University of Mississippi Law School. Meredith was originally denied admittance, but he fought, with the support of Evers and the NAACP, and was awarded admission in September,—a privilege denied to Evers eight years earlier.

Evers's high position with the NAACP and support of black equality decreased his standing within the white community. Increasingly whites in Mississippi were becoming more and more hostile to him. In May 1963, Evers's home was firebombed. Evers was at a nearby church when the firebombing occurred, but his wife Myrlie and their three children, Darrell, Rena, and Van, were at home. The firebombing was deemed an assassination attempt on Evers's life. Nevertheless, he continued in his civil rights battles. The next month, on June 12, 1963, Medgar Evers was shot in front of his home after returning home from a civil rights rally. He died within an hour.

More than 4,000 people came to Evers's funeral both to honor and remember the civil rights activist who died for the battle he fought. He was buried at Arlington National Cemetery in Virginia. Eleven days after Evers's assassination, Byron de la Beckwith was arrested and charged with the murder of Medgar Evers. Beckwith was tried twice by all-white juries and both cases ended in mistrial. Despite strong evidence incriminating Beckwith, neither jury could unanimously decide Beckwith's guilt or innocence. The case was dropped and Beckwith was released. In 1989, evidence surfaced that the juries of the first two trials were tampered with. Consequently, in February 1994, a third trial was held with a biracial jury. This time Beckwith was found guilty of the murder of Medgar Evers.

Evers may not have lived to see the civil rights advances he had long fought for, but he played a large role in bringing them about. His untimely death increased the popularity of the Civil Rights movement. Furthermore, as one of the first martyrs of the cause, his death angered many blacks in the South. No longer would blacks be afraid to stand up against their white counterparts. Instead, the majority of blacks decided to stand up against their opposition and demand equality. On July 2, 1964, the Civil Rights Act of 1964 was passed. Similarly, in August 1965, a Voting Rights Act was passed. With these two acts, Evers's battle had been won. Blacks in both Mississippi and across the nation were awarded the civil rights they had long fought for.

Exoduster Movement

---

The push for southern blacks to move to Liberia or the mass migration of blacks to the northern United States, otherwise known as the Great Migration, are the most well-known attempts at mass relocation by blacks. Yet, in 1879–1881, approximately 20,000 blacks from southern states such as Mississippi, Louisiana, and primarily Tennessee, moved to Kansas seeking opportunities and hoping to escape the racial discrimination they experienced in the post-Civil War South. Today, little remains of the dozens of towns that these black migrants founded. These migrating blacks were known as “Exodusters.” This term drew parallels between the experiences of the Hebrews who left Egypt in search of freedom and the Promised Land with that of blacks who fled the South for their own “Promised Land” in Kansas.

Although the Exoduster movement officially began in 1879, it really began when Abraham Lincoln issued the Emancipation Proclamation, which, in essence, freed the slaves. Although most slaves desperately wanted freedom, a vast majority of the former enslaved had no formal education, were illiterate, had no financial resources, and had nowhere to go. As a result, a number of former enslaved negotiated deals with their former masters that allowed them to stay on the land and share in the profits from the crops produced. These deals greatly benefited the southern landowners, many of who were left destitute after the war and were unable to afford to hire employees to work their land. This tenant farming system was also known as a land-tenant system or sharecropping.

It was nearly impossible for sharecroppers to make a profit in this system. Similarly, the option for them to own land and/or open their own business was a difficult venture, if not impossible in many areas. If they owned the land or had their own businesses, whites routinely harassed them. To secure freedom for southern blacks, a number of leaders emerged to ensure that black men were able to exercise their voting rights and not be tormented by whites.

A growing number of black leaders believed that leaving the South would provide blacks with opportunities and a true sense of freedom. Two key leaders that emerged were Henry Adams of Louisiana and Benjamin “Pap” Singleton of Tennessee.

Henry Adams was born a slave in 1843 in Georgia. His initial foray into politics occurred in 1870 when he voted Republican for the first time. At the time, a vast majority of black men voted Republican, as that was the party of Lincoln and the party that gave the most amount of aid to the poor. He did not think of himself as a political activist, yet Adams encouraged blacks not to vote for the Democratic Party, as they would have their rights slowly diminished and would eventually become slaves again.

In 1875, Adams attended a conference in New Orleans with a number of black ministers and leaders. Their goal was to come up with solutions for the increasing debt that black sharecroppers were accumulating, which prevented them from owning their own land. Blacks also faced staunch opposition when exercising their voting rights. This delegation, otherwise known as The Committee, decided that leaving the South for other parts of the United States, U.S. territories, or Liberia was their best option. Adams and other members of The Committee traveled throughout Louisiana, Texas, and other southern states and found a number of blacks who were willing to leave the South if their voices were not heard in the election of 1876.

The Republican defeat in the 1876 Louisiana state elections was the catalyst that encouraged The Committee to begin preparations to emigrate from the South. The Committee became known as The Colonization Council. Almost 100,000 blacks from Arkansas, Texas, Mississippi, and Louisiana agreed to move to either Liberia or an American territory if President Hayes agreed to the petition to have the federal government pay for the relocation.

This was not the first time that blacks sought to emigrate from the United States. In 1817, the American Colonization Society was organized by whites to encourage freed blacks to move to Liberia. Adams began to solicit aid from the American Colonization Society in 1877 after his requests for aid from President Hayes and Congress went ignored. In 1878, The Colonization Council made attempts to travel to Liberia to inspect it; however, they could not raise enough funds to do so. When it became apparent that neither The Colonization Council nor the individuals emigrating would be able to afford the move to Liberia, their travel options became limited to the United States. Henry Adams began to lose popularity and slowly began to fade from the limelight; however, he was able to encourage thousands of blacks to leave the South for more opportunity elsewhere and many moved to Kansas.

Tired of the treatment that blacks were experiencing, Benjamin “Pap” Singleton began encouraging them to leave their homelands. Unlike other black political leaders, such as Henry Adams, however, Singleton did not think that Liberia was a practical option, and he encouraged blacks to move to Kansas instead. Singleton realized that leaving the South was imperative for black liberation.

Pap Singleton, the central figure in the Exoduster movement, was born a slave in 1809 and raised in Nashville, Tennessee. Singleton eventually escaped slavery and fled to Ontario, Canada, and later to Detroit. While in Detroit, he regularly helped fugitive slaves escape to Canada. Longing for Tennessee, however, he moved back to Nashville after the end of the Civil War. Not much is known about his early life; however, in his early seventies, Singleton began the tireless fight to encourage blacks to leave the South to find more opportunities elsewhere. Singleton did not try to politically mobilize the blacks in Tennessee. The state of Tennessee was far more Democratic and had a significantly smaller black population than other southern states where active attempts at political mobilization were made. Instead, Singleton began to encourage blacks to purchase their own farmlands. In 1874, Singleton helped to form the Edgefield Real Estate Association. This would be quite difficult to do in Tennessee, however, where whites routinely overcharged for the land and refused to sell to black farmers. As a result, Singleton saw more opportunity in the prairie lands of the Midwestern states, especially in Kansas.

Singleton was drawn to Kansas because of the 1862 Homestead Act signed by Abraham Lincoln. This act encouraged farmers to begin to settle the western states and decreed that any American citizen could have up to 160 acres. Having visited Kansas earlier in 1873, in what was then Cherokee County, Singleton thought it the perfect place for blacks in Tennessee to move to. Consequently, in 1875, Singleton later renamed his organization, Edgefield Real Estate and Homestead Association (EREHA). Singleton also firmly believed that racial equality would not be achieved in Tennessee until the blacks were removed from the land and whites were forced to live without blacks, then realizing the importance that blacks played in the area.

Singleton and Columbus M. Johnson, a black minister from Nashville and his EREHA co-founder, began by contacting Tennessee politicians to aid in the cost of transportation for the blacks who wanted to leave for Kansas. After no response from these politicians, Singleton and Johnson began to hold meetings open to blacks and whites, explaining the importance of the plan and to raise enough money for those interested in moving. So much money was raised, in fact, that in 1879, the EREHA began to leave Tennessee with black homesteaders for southern Kansas. Once settled, they incorporated a town they called Singleton Colony near the town of Dunlap in Morris County, Kansas. Approximately 2,400 settlers moved to Singleton Colony, and most of them lived in tents and other makeshift housing.

As word of the Exoduster movement spread, blacks from states such as Louisiana, Missouri, Illinois, Texas, Indiana, and Mississippi joined those from Tennessee in Kansas. Although those blacks were not associated with those from Tennessee, Singleton and the Exodusters from Tennessee helped the movers from other states, especially when white settlers emphasized they did not want so many blacks moving to Kansas.

Singleton testified before the United State Senate in 1880. He told of the poor conditions that led to the migration to Kansas and the success of the black colonies in Kansas, making him the most well-known figure in the Exoduster movement or the “father of the Kansas migration.” As much as Singleton wanted to retire and let his colleagues handle the Exodusters, he realized that, although in his seventies, it was his job to remove blacks from Tennessee until the whites there could learn to appreciate them and to then lead them back to Tennessee. Singleton did not retire. Instead, he helped to organize United Colored Links (UCL) in Tennessee Town, a town outside of Topeka named for the large number of blacks who moved from Tennessee. Among the goals of the UCL was racial equality in the United States. After working with the local Republican Party and even Greenback Party presidential candidate James B. Weaver, the UCL was disassembled.

When the UCL failed, Singleton was so discouraged that he decided to encourage blacks to move to Cypress, off the coast of Greece. Later he worked to encourage blacks to move back to Africa. In 1889, Singleton called for Oklahoma to be reserved for blacks; however, soon afterwards, he, too, faded from the limelight and died in 1892.

Throughout the 1870s, blacks began moving to Kansas, but the zeal with which Singleton spoke of migrating to another place certainly inspired blacks to leave states such as Tennessee and Missouri. In fact, more blacks migrated to Kansas during the 1870s than they did during the migration years of 1879–1881. Among the first black colonies, Nicodemus, a black colony founded by colonists from Kentucky in 1877, was thriving when Singleton began the move to Kansas.

In 1878, the Hinds County Gazette in Kansas tried to encourage blacks to move to Kansas. Also, the Colored Citizen, a black publication based in Kansas, reported on the families who had moved to Kansas and described their positive experiences. As more and more blacks came to settle in Kansas, word spread back to their original homelands telling their friends and family about the opportunities in Kansas. Unlike Nebraska and the other Midwestern states, Kansas played an important role in abolitionist John Brown's battle against slavery and slave states. During the 1850s, this struggle, known as "Bleeding Kansas," took the lives of dozens of people, but Kansas became known as a place where people fought for equality and freedom and a place where blacks had opportunity.

For the most part, although blacks moved to Kansas on their own in large numbers beginning in the early 1870s, and a more organized move followed with Singleton's push to Kansas, the Republican Kansas government never officially welcomed them to the state. Kansas extended the same call to black migrants as they did to whites who were planning the move out West. Although blacks were largely settled in Nicodemus and Singleton Colony, they soon spread throughout Kansas to cities such as Dodge City and Topeka.

As more Exodusters moved to Kansas, many were unable to afford the long trip. Many had a difficult time leaving their home state or even making it past St. Louis, Missouri. There was no free transportation or even free land. These migrants were unable to continue the trip into Kansas. As a result, a number of Exodusters were forced to stay in St. Louis, in what became known as "the Red Sea." Nonetheless, many communities in Kansas continue to have thriving black communities as a result of the thousands of blacks who left the South for Kansas.

Fanon, Frantz

Dr. Frantz Fanon (1925–1961) was a psychiatrist, cultural critic, political theorist and diplomat who published on issues of black identity, decolonization, nationalism, and psychology and devoted much of his professional career to fighting for the freedom of Algeria from French colonial rule. Born in Fort-de-France on the island of Martinique in the West Indies in 1925, Fanon was the son of a civil servant and a shopkeeper, whose combined income made them comfortable members of the majority black middle class. Fanon attended French state school where he learned the virtues of the French language, literature, philosophy, and worldview. At the school in Fort-de-France, Fanon studied under Aimé Césaire, who would become a well-known negritude poet and local politician. In 1944, Fanon enlisted in a small battalion of Antillean soldiers and boarded a ship bound for France to fight beside the allies in World War II. He was wounded later that year in France and received a medal for his bravery. Fanon spent his convalescence near Lyon where he would return to study after the war. After completing his formal education in Martinique, Fanon again left for France and, in 1947, entered the school of medicine and pharmacology at the University of Lyon on a government scholarship that granted veterans free tuition and living stipends.

Fanon began work on his first book, Peau noire, masques blancs (Black Skin, White Masks) around the time he entered the university. It characterizes his early development as a thinker and his awakening to the meaning behind the subtle racial categorization he experienced as a marginalized subject at home and even more poignantly in France. First published in 1952, Peau noire, masques blancs combines elements of literary and social criticism, philosophy, and phenomenology with a psychology of race relations, paying particular attention to the situation of Martinique and its black, French middle-class mentality.

Fanon completed his studies in 1951 with a specialization in psychiatry, began clinical work the same year, and married Marie-Joséphine Dublé in 1952. In 1953, Fanon passed the competitive postgraduate qualifying exams that made him a doctor of psychiatry. He took a position in Algeria as the Chef de service at the Blida-Joinville psychiatric clinic. While working on his dissertation and in his clinical practice in Lyon, Fanon had treated many North Africans and this, combined with a brief period of training he spent there while in the army, convinced him that there was much humanitarian work awaiting him in the French colony.

In Algeria, Fanon was confronted by a corrupt, indoctrinated, and malpractice-ridden French medical institution that was at best held highly suspect in the eyes of the Algerian citizens. Nevertheless, Fanon diligently worked at his practice, testing experimental methods of social therapy to determine the specific needs of his Algerian clientele and to develop his own firsthand understanding of the extent of psychological pathology produced by colonialism. A year after Fanon's arrival in Blida, the Algerian revolution officially began, and as early as 1955, Fanon started to aid the Front de Libération Nationale (FLN), one of the Algerian nationalist groups that led the armed insurrection against French colonial rule, by providing services for them at the hospital. In 1956, as the war escalated and Fanon's participation with the FLN became more involved and publicly suspect, it became clear that continuing his psychiatric practice under any semblance of normal operation was out of the question. Later that year, Fanon officially resigned from his post in Blida and entered exile, not only from Algeria, but also from France and any hope of professional involvement in the French medical community.

Fanon settled in Tunis, where the FLN had set up its operations and where Fanon could work as a psychiatrist in top hospitals and lecture at the university. He was also able to openly write for the FLN's paper El Moudjahid, later becoming a spokesman for the party. In 1958, the Provisional Government of the Republic of Algeria (GPRA) formed to lead the nation until independence, and Fanon began to represent the FLN and the GPRA on the international stage, most notably at the All-African People's Congress in Accra. In 1959, on a trip to Morocco to reorganize the FLN's medical services in the west, Fanon suffered a spinal injury in a car accident and subsequently dodged an assassination

*Frantz Fanon was a leading ideologist of the anticolonial and Pan-Africanist movements of the 1950s and 1960s. attempt in an Italian hospital, but he was back in Tunis less than a month later meeting on FLN policy issues.

Fanon published his second book, L'An V de la Révolution algérienne (Year V of the Algerian Revolution) later that year, which contained short studies of five aspects of the war. In 1960, the GPRA sent Fanon to Accra to permanently head a delegation representing them in sub-Saharan Africa, and he traveled all over Francophone Africa in an effort to garner support for the Algerian cause. In late 1960, Fanon was diagnosed with leukemia and underwent treatment in Russia and finally the United States, where he died on December 6, 1961. His body was flown back to Tunis, snuck across the border, and buried on Algerian soil to remain there as a martyr of the revolution.

Fanon's final book, Les Damnés de la terre (The Wretched of the Earth), appeared just before his death and was an impassioned defense of third-world struggle for equality and independence. Much of Fanon's corpus has been published since his death, and his legacy has had a tremendous impact on political thought, cultural criticism, and race theory over the last 45 years. His ideas are still at the forefront of academic debates in various disciplines.

Farrakhan, Louis

Minister Louis Farrakhan (1933–) was the principal architect of the Million Man March and is the current leader of the Nation of Islam. Farrakhan was born Louis Eugene Walcott in 1933 in Bronx, New York. His mother raised him in Roxbury Massachusetts. He adopted the surname, Farrakhan after his conversion to Islam. In his youth, Farrakhan's greatest ambition was to attend New York's Julliard School of Music. Although he was a talented singer, he was denied admission to the prestigious institution. As an alternative, he enrolled at a teachers colleges for African Americans located in Winston-Salem, North Carolina. Within a few years, he withdrew from the college and became a calypso singer in a Boston nightclub. He was nicknamed "The Charmer."

Throughout the earlier part of his life, Farrakhan was a devout member of the Episcopal Church. In 1955, however, having grown disillusioned with the presumed "hatred" that white Christians showed toward black Christians, he severed his church affiliation. Frustrated with the racial inequality that persisted throughout the United States during this period, Farrakhan began seeking an alternative religious and spiritual outlet. During the early 20th century, many African Americans began aligning themselves with the black nationalist movement. The movement in America was chiefly designed to eradicate the "race problem" of the 20th century. Some nationalists, including members of the Nation of Islam (NOI), purported that abolition of white supremacy would include the defrayal of a separate space whereby blacks could control their economic, social, and political fate through "external emigration" to Africa or by disconnecting from the white masses in the United States. Farrakhan's initial reaction to the black nationalist agenda, and specifically the NOI, was one of disinterest.

At first glance, Farrakhan regarded the NOI as a peculiar and undesirable resolve to his animosity for the prejudice and discrimination persistent in the Christian church. On meeting Malcolm X, former NOI spokesperson and influential religious leader, in 1955, however, his feelings permanently changed. Farrakhan was immediately drawn to Malcolm's rhetorical abilities and within a short time, he enlisted in the NOI. Malcolm X began to train minister Farrakhan and, after Malcolm X's assassination in 1965, Farrakhan ascended as the NOI's primary representative and became minister of New York's temple number seven where Malcolm X had been preaching.

After the death of Elijah Muhammad, the original leader of the NOI from 1934–1975, the organization fell to the leadership of his son, Wallace Muhammad. Wallace Muhammad was a Sunni Muslim who sought to integrate the organization with orthodox Islamic values. To revitalize and reform the original precepts of the NOI, and to refurbish the socialization process that the organization was noted for, Farrakhan broke away from Muhammad's "new nation" in 1978. He subsequently began establishing another branch of the NOI modeled after the teachings of Elijah Muhammad and Master Farad Muhammad, the original founder of the NOI. Elijah Muhammad had been trained by Farad Muhammad who believed that African Americans were the original members of the Tribe of Shabazz, wrongfully exploited and enslaved in the United States. Farad is revered by NOI members as a prophet sent by God to teach African Americans a thorough and "true" knowledge of themselves and God.

With the NOI physically and ideologically splintered, Farrakhan assumed the arduous task of attempting to rebuild the NOI as it existed before the break. He successfully secured a large following and gained the interest of members of the African American community, just as his predecessors had attempted to do. Throughout his career, he has enjoyed monumental successes. His newspaper, The Final Call, was established in 1979 and modeled after Elijah Muhammad's Muhammad Speaks. The newspaper has a circulation of more than 500,000 per edition. Farrakhan has participated in numerous political, religious, and civic organizations and has become an international voice to promote peace and enfranchisement for marginalized groups in America and abroad. The building of the Salaam restaurant in Chicago in 1995 and the expansion of Muhammad Farms, a black-owned independent agricultural system, are also included among his successes.

Farrakhan has enjoyed an extensive career and continues to add to his record colossal achievements including the 1995 Million Man March. The march represented one of the largest assemblies of African Americans in U.S. history. It was designed to inspire black men about atonement, reconciliation, hard work, and responsibility, bringing them together to make solemn oaths to be better husbands, fathers, sons, and citizens. The televised event challenged the viewing public to analyze their social and racial perspectives. After the march there was a tremendous increase in voter registration among African Americans, as well as church and mosque memberships.

In 2000, Farrakhan organized the Million Family March to fulfill similar objectives as the Million Man March and to bring African American families together in harmony. Both marches were intended to be different from the civil rights demonstrations of the 1950s. NOI officials purposefully designed the marches to focus on blacks helping themselves without interracial cooperation.

Much like his forbear, Elijah Muhammad, Farrakhan is considered one of the most controversial African American religious leaders to date. Holding fast to the tenets of black nationalism, much of Farrakhan's vision is geared toward racial solidarity, uplift, and self-efficacy. He is often scrutinized for his radical beliefs and charged with being anti-Semitic. Nonetheless, Farrakhan has situated himself in U.S. history as one of its most ardent and influential leaders.

Father Divine

Father Divine (1877?–1965), born George Baker, founded an interracial religious community called Father Divine's International Peace Mission Movement that came to prominence in America in the 1930s. Many of the details of George Baker's life before becoming Father Divine are disputed. Most sources cite his birthplace as Savannah, Georgia in 1877 or Rockville, Maryland in 1879, but legal documents state that he was born in Providence, Rhode Island in 1880. Members of the Peace Mission Movement, however, mark June 6, 1882 as the date of his first marriage to Peninniah. As a child, his mother, Nancy Baker, took him and his siblings to Jerusalem Methodist Church. After his mother died in May 1897, Baker's whereabouts are largely unknown until 1899, when he attended a series of storefront churches in Baltimore and, in 1902, did missionary work in the South.

Divine was influenced by a number of religious thinkers and events including Charles Fillmore's Unity School of Christianity and the Azusa Street Revival in 1906. In 1907, he joined a Baptist storefront in Baltimore, whose leader, Samuel Morris, referred to himself as Father Jehovia. Shortly thereafter, Baker became known as the Messenger. As Baker's oratorical skills grew and his number of followers swelled, he began to assert that he was the only incarnation of the divine. By 1912, Baker had formed his own ministry, leaving Baltimore for Georgia. Baker clashed often with the local ministers and was arrested several times for vagrancy and "lunacy" based on the observations of outsiders that his religious services were too enthusiastic and practiced glossolalia, or speaking in tongues. After traveling around the country, in 1917, Baker settled in New York, specifically a mostly white community, Sayville in Suffolk County, Long Island, and took the name the Reverend Major Jealous Divine. In addition to Divine's teachings and writings, which were considered sacred, members followed the International Modest Code that prohibited tobacco, alcohol, and profanity and established dress codes for men and women. Divine had a diverse following that included both African Americans and whites, and members of the upper and lower class. At the height of the movement, the community had about 50,000 members.

On November 15, 1931, responding to a disturbing the peace complaint, officers arrested 80 members attending Divine's service. Fifty-five members pleaded guilty and paid a $5 fine. Father Divine and others pleaded not guilty and stood trial. Most were found guilty and were forced to pay the fine. Justice Lewis J. Smith sentenced Divine to a year in jail and a $500 fine. Two days later, an apparently healthy Smith died of cardiac arrest. For many of Divine's followers, the event confirmed his divinity. A new trial was ordered, but never took place. After 33 days, Divine was released from jail.

Divine's Peace Mission Movement opened hotels, restaurants, stores, and many other businesses, while providing jobs, housing, and free meals during the dire Depression years. Divine became famous for his elaborate "Love Feasts," communion banquets, and services. In the mid-1930s, Divine moved his community to Harlem. In January 1936, Divine issued his "Righteous Government Platform," which called for the elimination of racial segregation, lynching, and capital punishment and advocated for additional government funds to end unemployment and poverty. In 1940, the movement petitioned for more stringent federal prosecution of lynching. Throughout his ministry, Divine had a number of accusations leveled against him including racketeering charges; however, the movement grew steadily in the 1930s, with more than 150 communities across the country.

After the death of his first wife, Divine married Edna Rose Ritchings, also known as Sweet Angel, on April 29, 1946. After the wedding, she assumed the title of Mother Divine. In 1947, the community moved to Woodmount, a suburb in Philadelphia. While the community held a variety of beliefs and practices, they emphasized racial and gender equality, patriotism to the United States, economic independence, and celibacy. As his health declined, Father Divine put institutional structures in place for the continuation of the movement such as developing new orders with their own codes of conduct such as the "Rosebuds" for young girls, "Lily-buds" for women, and "Crusaders" for men. Despite his death on September 10, 1965, the community was able to continue under the direction of Mother Divine. Mother Divine currently handles the affairs of the community from Woodmont, which still operates several businesses. Their newspaper the New Day, which appeared weekly during the 1930s, suspended publication in 1992; however, Father Divine's teachings and writings remain sacred to his followers. There are currently several hundred members of the Peace Mission Movement, with the largest communities in Philadelphia and Newark, but there are followers across the United States and around the world.

Fifteenth Amendment

Most Americans take voting for granted, but the right to vote was not given to African Americans, women, and American Indians until sustained legislative and legal battles had been fought. The first such victory was the enactment of the Fifteenth Amendment. Passed by Congress on February 26, 1869 and ratified on March 30, 1870, the Fifteenth Amendment prohibited states from denying the right to vote (to African American males) on the basis of race, color, or previous condition of servitude.

The Fifteenth Amendment was a catalyst of suffrage extensions. Tracing the evolution of American voting rights, it took a half-century to extend this same right to women under the Nineteenth Amendment in 1920, with American Indians receiving the right to vote in 1924. Not surprisingly, the Fifteenth Amendment's color-blind language ("race, color, or previous condition of servitude") was acutely color-conscious. Thus, one lingering "badge of slavery" was what one might call "political slavery," in the sense that blacks, prior to the Fifteenth Amendment (and after), were barred from balloting, had no political representation, and perforce followed the laws of the white political establishment. In 1870, African Americans comprised around 10 percent of the nation's population (an estimated 4,000,000 out of 40,000,000). African Americans make up 14 per cent of Americans today, along with an equal number of Hispanic Americans.

Civil rights must first be recognized in principle. Then they must be realized in practice. After slavery was abolished by the Thirteenth Amendment in 1865, the question of the right of blacks to vote had ignited a national controversy. In spite of the adoption of the Fifteenth Amendment five years later, it took nearly a century to effectively enforce it under the Voting Rights Act (1965), which is the most successful civil rights legislation ever passed by Congress. This follows a pattern whereby the Civil War Amendments were not fully implemented until civil rights acts had been passed and enforced by direct federal intervention.

Partisan politics played a major role in establishing universal suffrage among African American men. Three years before ratification of the Fifteenth Amendment, Congress passed the Reconstruction Act of 1867, requiring Southern states to grant blacks suffrage rights. Yet in 1868, 11 of the 21 Northern states denied blacks the right to vote. This was not simply a regional problem. It was national in scope and called for a nationwide solution. Amending the Constitution was the surest way to enact this legislative reform. As the law of the land, the Fifteenth Amendment was binding on all states. Yet they were not bound by it for historical reasons. The Southern states were forced to accept what they had long opposed, for the simple reason that they were obliged to ratify both the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments as a condition to their readmission into the Union after the Civil War.

The Southern states ratified these constitutional reforms grudgingly. While the Confederacy lost the Civil War, Southern states gained national power. The way that they exercised that power was to effectively deconstruct Reconstruction. After Reconstruction, Southern states did not honor the Fifteenth Amendment. Instead, they did all within their power to systematically disenfranchise blacks

*African Americans march in New York City on April 8, 1870, in celebration of the passage of the Fifteenth Amendment. through imposing literacy and character tests (“voter qualifying tests”), registration and poll tax requirements, along with white primaries, grandfather clauses, outright racial gerrymandering, and other restrictive devices, thereby rendering the Fifteenth Amendment a dead letter in a living document. Later, in Smith v. Allwright, 321 U.S. 649 (1944), the Supreme Court found that voting rights discrimination in primaries was unconstitutional on the basis of the Fifteenth Amendment. In South Carolina v. Katzenbach, 383 U.S. 301 (1966), the Supreme Court held that Congress, in enforcing the Fifteenth Amendment through the Voting Rights Act of 1865, may prohibit literacy tests in an effort to eliminate racial discrimination in voting. Notwithstanding such judicial enforcement, a paradox of national-historical proportions is this: Not until the passage of the Voting Rights Act of 1965 could the majority of African Americans in the South register to vote.

Five Percenters

The Nation of Gods and Earths (NGE) is the official name of an organization popularly known as the Five Percenters. Headquartered in Harlem, with members in major cities across the United States, the organization originated as a splinter group that broke away from the Nation of Islam (NOI) circa 1964, under the leadership of Clarence Jowers Smith, who is better known by his NOI alias, Clarence 13 X and his nickname “Puddin.” The latter moniker so-called attested to his legendary powers of persuasion. He was a gifted conversationalist with a hypnotic speaking style. Thus in street parlance his “rap,” or “game” was so sweet and smooth that people would swallow his words like pudding. The organization’s official name stems from the designation of male members as “Gods” and female members as “Earths” (analogous to the familiar gendered constructions “God the Father” and “Mother Earth”). The popular name is derived from the members’ belief that 85 percent of humanity are mentally dead, uncivilized slaves who are unaware of their true identity or the true God; 10 percent are the wealthy enslavers of the poor who use lies to teach that the true and living God is an invisible, ghostlike “spook,” and that they, in contrast, are the 5 percent of humanity who are the poor righteous teachers who do not believe in the teachings of the 10 percent and who know and teach that the Living God is the Asiatic black man.

These beliefs come directly from the Lessons of the NOI, the catechism-like sets of questions and answers (Q & A) that all NOI members must master (e.g., “Who is the Original Man? The Original Man is the Asiatic Black Man, the Maker, the Owner, the Cream of the Planet Earth, the father of Civilization, and God of the Universe.”) The NGE, as an offshoot of the NOI, retains many of the NOI’s teachings and heterodox Islamic beliefs, chief among them the idea that God (Allah) exists in a human form, an anathema to orthodox (Sunni and Shi’a) Muslims for whom shirk (associating partners with God) is the most grievous and unpardonable sin. There are several contrasts between the NOI and NGE, however. Diverging from the NOI’s creed that Allah appeared in the person of Master W. D. Fard (also known as W. D. Farrad and Farrad Muhammad), the mysterious Middle Eastern peddler who was mentor of the Honorable Elijah Muhammad, the NGE holds that it is not Fard Muhammad who is Allah but the black man collectively. While the NOI proclaims that it is a religious organization, and has made attempts to mainstream some of its deviant beliefs and practices so that they are in more in alignment with the orthodox Muslim world, the NGE adamantly states that it is not a religious organization, and the members do not consider themselves Muslims but gods. While a Black Muslim takes on the letter X appended before his or her surname to indicate his “ex-slave name,” as well as his unknown African or Asiatic name, the Gods adopt divine or “righteous” names such as “Universal God Allah,” “Born Islam,” “Allah Supreme,” “Eternal Allah,” or even “Bismillah” (a transliteration of the Qur’anic [Koranic] invocation translated as “In the Name of Allah”). While the NOI has a prominent or highly visible charismatic leader, the Minister Louis Farrakhan, who maintains a tight paramilitary chain of command through the Fruit of Islam (FOI) and has a uniform dress code, the NGE has a very loose organizational structure, with no formal leader and a very relaxed style of dress. Unlike the NOI, which witnessed a struggle for leadership upon the death of “the Messenger,” Elijah Muhammad, since the mysterious, unsolved murder of “the Father,” Clarence Puddin’ 13X, in 1969 there have been no claimants to his mantle of leadership, although the Father’s close comrade Justice and the First Nine Born (first nine followers of the Father) held a place of esteem. In recent years (circa 2000), a position entitled national spokesperson has been created, but a highly centralized leadership is eschewed, as it is not in keeping with the philosophy that each of the (male) members is a god. Absent also are the small business enterprises (restaurants, bakeries, barber-shops, etc) of the NOI; although the NGE stresses the importance of individual entrepreneurship, actual economic development exists primarily at the street vending level. Finally, and perhaps most important, the NGE appeals to a much younger population than the NOI, recruiting many of its new members when they are adolescents. Although many recruits from decades past have remained with the organization for life, celebrating 50th and 60th birthdays as proud members of the NGE, the strength and character of the NGE are that it is a youth-oriented organization. Its social mission is to save the inner-city youth from violence, drug abuse, criminalization, and incarceration. The ranks of the organization are swollen with members who are under the age of 30. This demographic characteristic has a bearing on all the facets of the organization: divine names, loose organizational structure, informal dress code, and vendor-level business operations, as well as the organization’s fascination with mastery of the spoken word or “rap” for which Clarence Puddin’ 13X was famous.

Hip-hop culture has long been intertwined with Five Percenter ideology, and the appeal the NGE exerts on disenfranchised African American youth is the uncanny gift of gab that was the “Father’s” legacy. Unexcelled as masters of the inner-city black idiom, Five Percenters can only be described as eloquent, mesmerizing, and spell-binding in their usage of Ebonics or African American inner city slang. Using the potency and the vitality of the black dialect, they open up new avenues of logic and thinking, or original ways of perceiving the world. As an expression of awe and wonderment at their verbal agility and conceptual ingenuity, NOI members refer to the Five Percenters as “scientists” because “they science out the Lessons,” i.e., because the Five Percenters provide elaborate and insightful commentary on catechism Lessons they inherited from the NOI. The central theme of the Lessons is the allegorical tale of the rise, fall, and eventual resurrection or reascension of a self-created race of black gods. The downfall of their highly advanced divine civilization was due to the machinations of Yakub, a disgruntled evil scientific genius, who, with the aid of his followers, created or “grafted” a genetically mutated race of white devils who were destined to rule over the black man for 6,000 years. While the NOI and the NGE share the same Lessons texts, the NGE’s unique contribution to the understanding of the texts is its extensive and unique brand of word-play commentary, which has its foundations in a numerology known as the Supreme Mathematics and occult science of letters known as the Supreme Alphabet. In the context of the Supreme Alphabet, A is Allah, B is Be or Born, C is See, D is Destroy, E is Equal Equality, etc., on down to Y is Why, X is Unknown, and Z is Zig Zag Zig (representing those who stray from the straight path). Using the Supreme Alphabet—and discretionary poetic license—words can be “scienced out” or “broken down” (i.e., analyzed) such that ISLAM means “I Self-Lord Am Master” or “I Surely Love Allah and Mathematics,” whereas ALLAH may be deciphered as “Arm Leg Leg Arm Head” and MAN may be viewed as an acronym for “My Almighty Name,” the esoteric “etymology” of each of these words indicating the NGE belief in the black man’s divine nature or the anthropomorphic nature of God. The Supreme Mathematics is a corresponding numerological system in which 1 is Knowledge, 2 is Wisdom, 3 is Understanding...9 is Born, and 0 is Cipher. Furthermore, an uncanny streetology or street corner logic is an inherent NGE analytical tool, in which, for instance, “knowledge” connotes “know the ledge” (i.e., know one’s limitations); and “wisdom” means “wise the dome” or “wides the dome” (make the head or brain wise or wide). The Five Percenters use this streetology, along with their esoteric Supreme Mathematics and Supreme Alphabet to “science out the Lessons” (profoundly elaborate on the NOI mythology) and thus “show and prove” that they are “gods.” Each “god” has the opportunity to “show and prove” before an audience of hundreds of gods and earths at their lively monthly Sunday afternoon rallies called Parliaments. Earths, whose modest dress and head-covering often mimic that of orthodox Muslim women, take on names such as “Queen Asia Peace Refinement,” or “Everlasting Star Light,” sell dinners at the Parliaments and generally play a subdued wifely and maternal role, each woman revolving around her mate or “god” “as the earth revolves around the sun.” Five Percenter hip-hop artists (see Aidi, 2004 and Allen, 1996) have included Poor Righteous Teachers, Rakim (of Eric B. and Rakim), Big Daddy Kane, Lakim Shabazz, Busta Rhymes, Mobb Deep, and the Wu Tang Clan. Official organs over the decades have included the two defunct newspapers, Behold The SUN OF MAN and The WORD, and two current newspapers, The Five Percenter and NGE Power. Dumar Allah is the current national spokesman. The headquarters at 126th St. and Adam Clayton Powell Blvd. proclaims the title, The Allah School in Mecca (i.e., Harlem) and is easily recognized by its symbol the numeral 7 (embedded in a stellated circle), which, in the Supreme Mathematics system, stands for Allah.

Fortune, T. Thomas

(Timothy) T. Thomas Fortune (1856–1928) was, arguably, the preeminent African American journalist of the early 20th century. Fortune was born a slave in Marianna, Florida, on October 3, 1856. Aside from the rudimentary education he received from his father who was a Reconstruction politician, Fortune was largely self-taught and acquired early school training in the South in a variety of sectors. He attended an underdeveloped Freedman’s Bureau school in Florida, and when he was 13, Fortune served as a page in the state senate. (Fortune also possessed strong Anglo-American features that helped facilitate experiences that were fairly uncommon for recently emancipated slaves.) At age 19, Fortune would go on to attend Howard University in Washington, D.C., between 1876 and 1877, but more important, he would meet John Wesley Crommel there who would help launch and inspire Fortune’s career in journalism. At the time of their meeting, Crommel was editor of the People’s Advocate; he would go on to assemble the first Colored Press Association convention in 1880 and would become a founding member of Alexander Crummell’s American Negro Academy in 1897. Fortune worked briefly for the versatile Crommel before deciding to move to New York to begin his own storied journalistic career.

When Fortune arrived in New York around 1880, he began working in the printer’s trade for John Dougall’s Weekly Witness, a religious paper. Shortly thereafter, he met African Americans whose intellectual interests were similar to his own. One of these was George Parker who had recently begun a little weekly tabloid entitled The Rumor. Parker’s tabloid quickly came under financial pressures and Fortune, along with Walter Sampson, who helped secure Fortune’s job at the Weekly Witness, worked evenings writing copy and setting type for The Rumor while still working for Dougall’s paper in the day. After about a year, by which time he was clearly recognized as a far superior writer and editor to either Parker or Sampson, Fortune became a partner and insisted on changing the paper’s name from Rumor to New York Globe in July 1881. The New York Globe continued operating under the joint partnership of Fortune and Parker. In a short period, the New York Globe achieved national prominence and Fortune quickly became the most able African American journalist.

The New York Globe was only a four-page weekly and had a staff of able correspondents in many cities in the North and South who reported news of race conditions and political developments related to the race. In keeping with its name, the New York Globe thought its mission to be broad and universal in scope—insofar as African American readership was concerned—and the newspaper sought to provide as much information pertaining to African Americans as possible within its four pages. (Incidentally, the paper was heralded in the white press for Fortune's intelligent editorials and for being remarkably free from the kind of grammatical errors that marked a newly established African American press tradition that was cropping up throughout the nation.) Also, news letters from smaller communities reported local trivia including activities of churches and fraternal organizations. One reporter of such information was the teenager William Edward Burghardt Du Bois. The paper's popularity was singly due to Fortune's editorials. Fortune was vastly admired for his frank expression, intelligent opinion, and, above all else, his sophisticated writing about issues confronting African American life. The ferocity of Fortune's editorials knew no bounds in their denunciation of hindrances facing the African American community.

In spite of his reputation, Fortune never formally secured legal proprietorship, and after the paper was besieged by turmoil, Parker mortgaged the paper without Fortune's knowledge. Shortly thereafter, Fortune was able to reverse his circumstances, and, in 1884, the New York Globe became the New York Freeman under his sole proprietorship until 1887, when the name was changed to New York Age. Fortune left the newspaper briefly to the management of his brother while freelance writing, and upon his brother's death, he resumed as editor. Fred Moore eventually purchased the New York Age from Fortune in 1907.

Fortune's tenure was marked by both successes and controversy. In addition to his reputation as a fiercely eloquent editorial writer, his efforts on behalf of African Americans were just as practical. He assisted Ida B. Wells's crusade against lynching by offering her use of the New York Age and providing her with contacts when he learned that her newspaper had been burned and that her life was in danger. Fortune's efforts to assist African Americans, particularly women, are also signaled by his participation in the first meeting of the National Federation of Afro-American Women, where he was one of three invited male speakers. Fortune would also rise to the presidency of the Colored Press Association that his former mentor Cromwell organized in the late 1890s. From this position, Fortune became widely recognized as an African American leader of national importance, and his opinions on uplift, religion, education, race, and a host of other issues became well known.

Fortune was brought into contact with, arguably, the most influential African American leader of the early twentieth-century, Booker T. Washington. This relationship would lead to many disappointments in an otherwise stellar career. After their meeting, Washington would begin subsidizing Fortune's New York Age, which was viewed by Washington's critics as an endorsement of his accommodationist policies. (Fortune would also serve as Washington's ghost writer on a number of projects.) This relationship would wear on Fortune, for although he agreed with Washington that African Americans were in need of reform, he did not necessarily agree with Washington's unwillingness to fight for social equality. It would prove too difficult to remain ideologically at odds with a benefactor whose money was necessary for his financial security. In choosing the latter, he lost the respect of many of his intellectual cohorts such as Du Bois, and perhaps most important, himself. He withdrew from public life for a period of time, having several bouts with alcoholism. After the unexpected death of Washington, Fortune returned to public life, serving as editor for various newspapers such as the Colored American Review and the Negro World, organ of Marcus Garvey's UNIA, which Fortune edited until his death in 1928. See also: Du Bois, W. ## Forty Acres and a Mule

This phrase refers to the widespread belief that slaves freed after the Civil War were promised by the federal government a parcel of free land (40 acres) and farm animals (a mule) to begin their new lives. The idea is that promise of the government was broken and that African Americans are, therefore, still owed this debt to the present day. While untrue, the myth embodies the historical resentment of black Americans that slaves were never compensated for their labor as bondsmen, but were simply set free and left to their own devices. It also represents an undeveloped demand for present-day reparations for slavery in the United States.

The origins of the myth are unknown. It appeared among freed slaves immediately after the Civil War and persists until today. Shortly after the fall of Richmond in 1865, a freedman named Cyrus explained the meaning of the Northern victory to his former mistress: “Der ain’t goin’ ter be no more Master and Mistress, Miss Emma. All is equal. I done hear it from de cotehouse steps.... All de land belongs to de Yankees now, and dey gwine to divide it out ‘mong de colored people.” (Been in the Storm So Long, p. 399) In November 1865, an official of the Freedmen’s Bureau in Mississippi reported that freed blacks believed that planters’ lands and other properties were to be confiscated and distributed to them by Christmas that same year. Similar rumors circulated at the time among blacks in other parts of the defeated South.

The idea that ex-slaves would receive confiscated lands after the North won the war, although it was advocated by some abolitionists, may have had its origins in Confederate propaganda. The Freedmen’s Bureau blamed such false hopes on precisely that. But in fact, there had been numerous wartime confiscations of Confederate properties, which Union generals and officers had often distributed among freed slaves in numerous states. The most famous of these was “Special Field Order No. 15,” issued January 16, 1865, by which General Sherman, after meeting with a delegation of black ministers, set aside the Carolina Sea Islands; the rice coast south of Charleston, extending 30 miles inland, and the country bordering the St. John’s River, Florida, for the exclusive resettlement of ex-slaves. Each family was to receive 40 acres of land, although there was no mention of animals. The army did in fact assist some settlers with temporary loans of mules. All such ad hoc, wartime grants of land to freedmen were quickly rescinded, however, after the war and after the assassination of Lincoln, by President Andrew Johnson. Johnson issued extensive presidential pardons to white planters that restored to them full rights to all their properties.

The idea that slaves were owed land and mules that were never given to them remains alive in popular culture.

A scene in the film Gone With the Wind (1939) shows a carpetbagger promising 40 acres and a mule to ex-slaves. Spike Lee’s production company is named “Forty Acres and a Mule.” Oscar Brown Jr. produced a song entitled “Forty Acres and a Mule” (1964) that wryly demands this compensation plus interest. In his song, “Letter to the President,” (1999) Tupac Shakur asks about 40 acres and a mule. Kanye West’s song “All Falls Down” (2004) mentions 40 acres.

Fourteenth Amendment

The Fourteenth Amendment is among the most important provisions of the United States Constitution. When Americans think of their rights, provisions of the first eight amendments commonly come to mind. What they do not realize, however, is that it is only the Fourteenth Amendment that has been held to make those provisions applicable by courts against state and local governments.

This is a far cry from the original understanding or purpose of the Fourteenth Amendment. Rather, that amendment owes its genesis to the clash between the Reconstruction Congress and President Andrew Johnson. In the wake of the Civil War, Johnson proved unwilling to ratify the change in the structure of the federal system the majority of Northern politicians favored. Thus, when Congress responded to the Black Codes by passing the Civil Rights Act of 1866, the president vetoed it; the Act was, Johnson said, clearly not consistent with the traditional allocation of powers between the state and federal governments.

Congress then sent out to the states a grab-bag amendment with provisions responding to many of the issues that then concerned the Republican Party. It secured a dubious ratification in 1868. First, in Section I, the amendment makes a citizen of the United States and of the state wherein he resides each person born in the United States—and thus overturns part of the holding in Dred Scott v. Sandford (1857). The section goes on to say that no state may abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States. In its decision in The Slaughterhouse Cases (1873), the Supreme Court would read this provision as protecting only those few rights (the right to travel to the federal capital, for example) that were attributes specifically of federal citizenship, which means that there has been very little litigation of this clause since.

Section I's two other provisions, however, have proven extremely significant. The first of them (the due process clause) says that no state may deprive anyone of life, liberty, or property without due process of law; the second says that no state may deny anyone equal protection of the law. These two clauses have effectively swallowed up the old notion of the reserved powers of the states in the areas of criminal procedure, church-state relations, punishment, contraception, abortion, lewdness, public speech, press freedom, “expressive” conduct, sex discrimination, and others, because it was through the due process clause that the Supreme Court gradually began to apply notions found in the first eight amendments (or, in some cases, in penumbras of emanations of those amendments) against entities of state government.

One might have thought from reading the due process clause that it was intended to guarantee that people would receive a fair hearing before being executed, imprisoned, or fined; and, indeed, there is abundant extratextual evidence to support that reading. In the late 19th century, however, the federal courts began to read substance into the due process clause, just as Chief Justice Taney had read a substantive component into its Fifth Amendment analogue in his opinion in Dred Scott. The first type of substance the federal courts found in that clause is captured by the term “The Lochner Era,” and generally related to the right to contract freely without government restrictions on wages, hours, or working conditions.

With the Supreme Court's 1937 change of heart concerning the New Deal, however, the Court gave up preventing government from adopting wage, hours, working conditions, and other labor regulations; instead, as foreshadowed in footnote 4 of United States v. Carolene Products

Co. (1938), the Court began to apply other limitations on legislative authority related to discrimination against judicially favored minorities and to a different set of individual rights.

The equal protection clause was understood in the 19th century as allowing “separate but equal” accommodations for blacks (Plessy v. Ferguson (1896)). In the 20th century, however, the Supreme Court decided that segregation of the races was inherently unequal, first in public education (Brown v. Board of Education I (1954)), and later in other areas of life. In his opinion for the Court in Brown, Chief Justice Warren tacitly conceded that the Court's opinion that day amounted to an amendment of the Constitution when he said that the understanding of the equal protection clause that existed in the 1860s could not guide the Court in 1954; what he meant was that it would not.

This new pronouncement from the Court spurred the advent of the Civil Rights movement of the 1950s and 1960s; its perceived constitutional illegitimacy also inflamed southern white resistance, which reached its height in the Southern Manifesto and Massive Resistance. The result of the concerted southern political opposition to desegregation was a delay of more than a decade in ending segregation, which only began to be dismantled in earnest across the Gulf South in the wake of the Civil Rights Act of 1964.

Once Congress began to legislate in favor of the rights of blacks and (on their coattails) historically mistreated minorities, it soon moved into the area of granting preferences in contracting, hiring, promotions, licensing, and other areas to members of those groups. This development spawned a new group of equal protection clause cases dealing with the question whether they allowed any racial or ethnic group to be preferred on the basis of past barriers to its advancement. The Supreme Court's decisions in this area have been somewhat inconsistent, as for example in saying that preferences were permissible but quotas were not. The existence of this group of decisions, like that of the Court's decisions respecting sex discrimination, shows how far the equal protection clause has come since the Slaughterhouse majority's statement that it was unlikely any group other than blacks would ever be able to claim its protection.

Franklin, John Hope

John Hope Franklin (1915–2009), American historian, was born in Rentiesville, Oklahoma. His mother, Mollie, a teacher, and his father, Buck, a lawyer, named him after educator and activist John Hope. Franklin moved with his family to Tulsa in 1925, four years after the terrible race riot in that city. In his autobiography, he told of the prejudice and discrimination he and his family faced there and elsewhere.

Franklin graduated from Fisk University (where he met Aurelia Whittington, his future wife) in 1935. After receiving his PhD from Harvard in 1941, Dr. Franklin held teaching positions at North Carolina College at Durham (now North Carolina Central University), Howard University, Brooklyn College (where, in 1956, he became the first African American to chair an academic department in a predominantly white institution), the University of Chicago (where again he served as chair), and Duke University. In addition to these, Franklin has received more than 100 honorary degrees and held a number of temporary and visiting professorships.

Franklin has written widely in American history. His dissertation, “The Free Negro in North Carolina, 1790–1860,” became his first book in 1944. The Militant South, 1800–1861 (1956) described the South’s martial culture, including its ties to slavery and its contribution to secession and the Civil War. Reconstruction after the Civil War (1961), the first comprehensive revisionist history of Reconstruction, gave African Americans a major role in shaping their position in the postwar South. Perhaps the germ of this book was a review Franklin wrote over a decade earlier of E. Merton Coulter’s history of Reconstruction. In the review, Franklin not only criticized Coulter for repeating the racist history of William Archibald Dunning and others, he denounced the white historians who accepted and praised Coulter’s work.

Among his dozen or so other books are A Southern Odyssey: Travelers in the Antebellum North (1976), George Washington Williams (1985), and Runaway Slaves: Rebels on the Plantation (1999; written with Loren Schweninger). This last book put the final nail in the coffin of the image of the happy slave. Most recently, Franklin published In Search of the Promised Land: A Slave Family of the Old South (2006), on the Thomases of Tennessee.

Franklin is perhaps best known for From Slavery to Freedom (1947). There had been general histories of African Americans published before this (such as the one by George Williams, whose story Franklin penned in his prize-winning biography cited previously), but Franklin’s was the first to combine comprehensive coverage, an unquestionably scholarly approach, and a wonderful readability. From Slavery to Freedom became almost the cornerstone of modern African American Studies.

According to Franklin, historians should become scholar activists, using their knowledge and abilities for more than writing books and teaching classes. Franklin filled that role throughout his career, from working with the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People’s Legal Defense Fund in 1953 (tracing the original intent and early understanding of the Fourteenth Amendment, thus helping pave the way for the Supreme Court’s decision in Brown v. Board of Education) to chairing the advisory board for President William Clinton’s Initiative on Race in 1997–1998.

John Hope Franklin is one of the most honored historians the nation has known. He was elected president of the American Studies Association, the Southern Historical Association, Phi Beta Kappa, the Organization of American Historians, and the American Historical Association.

He won the Presidential Medal of Freedom in 1995. In 2000, Duke University established the John Hope Franklin Center for Interdisciplinary and International Studies in his honor. With the historian Yu Ying-shih, Franklin received the million-dollar John W. Kluge Prize for lifetime achievement in the study of humanity in 2006. On March 25, 2009, Franklin died of congestive heart failure at Duke Hospital. See also: Association for the Study of African American Life and History; Tulsa, Oklahoma, Race Riot of 1921

Freedmen's Bureau

The Bureau of Refugees, Freedmen, and Abandoned Lands, commonly known as the Freedmen's Bureau, was created on March 3, 1865. It was supposed to last for only one year after the Civil War's end. As an extension of the War Department, the Freedmen's Bureau was supposed to perform a variety of tasks including distributing food, land, clothing, medicine, creating schools, negotiating contracts, and establishing hospitals for freed people as well as white refugees. Although the task of the bureau was monumental, it was given no resources to operate. The War Department had to use its budget and staff to support the Bureau.

In May 1865, General Oliver O. Howard was chosen to lead the new agency. A native of Maine, Howard believed the Freedmen's Bureau should not show favoritism to either African Americans or whites; rather it should act as a moderator between both parties. Furthermore, Howard did not view the Freedmen's Bureau as an institution that would allow freedmen to be idle and lazy. He wanted to protect their social and political rights, but he also wanted those who were able to work. Despite Howard's view, the Bureau met a tremendous amount of resistance from Southern whites. Even Northern Democrats portrayed the Freedmen's Bureau as an institution that would promote laziness among African Americans.

Southern whites resisted the Freedmen's Bureau because it was attempting to put African Americans on an equal plane with whites. Furthermore, some of the border states, such as Kentucky, resisted the Bureau's presence because they believed that it should have only been established in states that had seceded from the Union. White Southerners also opposed the idea of the bureau educating African Americans.

Some African Americans also had problems with the bureau. Although one of the bureau's primary responsibilities was negotiating contracts between freedmen and their former masters, on many occasions the contracts appeared to be more favorable to the former master. Under most circumstances slaves who worked for their former masters entered into contracts for one year, were paid little for their work, given a food ration, and allowed to live in old slave cabins. African Americans, for example in Louisiana, protested the Freedmen's Bureau because they felt that it was forcing freedmen into contracts to simply put them to work and not allowing them freedom to explore their options.

Other African Americans protested the bureau's inability to provide them with land. According to the law that established the bureau agents, were permitted to set aside no more than 40 acres for freedmen as well as loyal white refugees to rent for three years with the prospect of purchasing the land. This strengthened the myth that every former slave would be given 40 acres and a mule. The amount of land, however, that bureau agents had to draw from was limited dramatically when President Andrew Johnson ordered General Howard to restore all land to former Confederates in August 1865.

Johnson's order to return land to former Confederates was only one way in which he tried to block the Freedmen's Bureau. When Congress tried to extend the bureau's life in February 1866, Johnson vetoed the bill. In July Congress overrode the veto and extended the institution's existence.

Although Johnson, Northern Democrats, white Southerners, and some African Americans had problems with the Freedmen's Bureau, it did perform valuable work, namely in educating African Americans. General Howard believed that the best tool the newly freedmen could have was a proper education. With limited government aid and nearly $800,000 in private contributions from African Americans, approximately 4,000 schools were opened educating in excess of 250,000 students. Teachers, the lion's share of whom came from New England, performed invaluable work, but were lambasted by whites and oftentimes were refused services such as rooms or meals.

The Freedmen's Bureau also played an important role in helping to reunite families—perhaps the item of greatest concern to freedmen. Agents, teachers, and missionaries in the Freedmen's Bureau aided in writing letters and assisted in locating former slaves' loved ones. The bureau also made certain that African Americans met no resistance when they registered to vote. The Freedmen's Bureau also acted as a mediator in family disputes, namely spouse abuse. On numerous occasions of spouse abuse, the Freedmen's Bureau ordered the guilty party to pay child support or a sizable fine.

Even though the bureau had some successes, it had many drawbacks. A portion of the bureau's agents were corrupt. On numerous occasions agents forced freedmen out of towns, made them sign contracts that were unfavorable, and sought sexual favors from African American females who came to the bureau for assistance. It was also viewed negatively by some because its presence created a deeper hatred of African Americans among whites.

Despite the shortcomings of the bureau, many African Americans believed it was important for their own protection. When the Bureau's role became limited in 1868 when certain states were readmitted into the Union, African Americans petitioned government officials to keep the bureau operating as it had since 1865. The pleas did not work. The bureau was formally abolished on June 10, 1872.

Freedom Rides

The Congress of Racial Equality (CORE) organized the Freedom Rides as a bus journey through the South to test President Kennedy's commitment to civil rights in America. These Freedom Riders, an interracial group, decided to specifically test Kennedy's commitment to enforce two Supreme Court decisions banning segregated interstate travel by forcing Kennedy to take a public stand against segregation. To achieve their goal, the Freedom Riders would travel throughout the South, stopping at various stations, with white riders going into “black only” areas and black riders going into “white only” areas. Their route would take them from Washington, D.C. to New Orleans in little less than two weeks. On May 4, 1961, two buses left Washington, D.C. in route to New Orleans.

The Freedom Riders faced little resistance compared to what they would face in the lower South. From Atlanta, Georgia to Birmingham, Alabama the riders were met by violent white mobs. Outside of Anniston, Alabama, with riders still aboard, their bus was firebombed. As riders fled through the back of the bus, they were attacked by a white mob. Many were injured and several were left with permanent injuries, including white riders.

A second bus headed from Atlanta into Birmingham and was also greeted with violence. On their way to Birmingham, riders hoped they would be protected by local police or even the FBI. The riders were unaware that the FBI knew of Ku Klux Klan activity in Birmingham and did nothing to prevent violence. Furthermore, the local police had received the riders’ itinerary ahead of time and passed it on to the Klan, knowing an attack would occur. A white mob was waiting for the riders and attacked them as they got off the bus. Several minutes later the attackers dispersed and police appeared.

To prevent further violent incidents, the U.S. Justice Department flew the riders to New Orleans, as buses proved to be too dangerous. The Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee (SNCC) decided to take over for CORE riders despite the immense risk of violence and even death. According to Stokely Carmichael, one of the Freedom Riders, SNCC felt “if the freedom rides were stopped because of violence, and only because of violence, then the nonviolent movement was over. We might as well disband SNCC. Our movement is over. Give the racist this victory and it sends the clear signal that at the first sign of resistance, all they have to do is mobilize massive violence, the movement will collapse and the government won't do a thing. We can't let that happen" (Ready for Revolution, p. 186).

The new group of Freedom Riders left Nashville and headed to Birmingham where they were arrested. They were then driven to the state line and dropped off, having to fend for themselves. After making their journey back to Nashville, they again decided to head back to Birmingham. United States Attorney General Robert Kennedy wanted assurances from Alabama that they would protect the riders; if Alabama would not make those assurances, the federal government would have to intervene. Robert Kennedy sent in his assistant, John Seigenthaler, to negotiate with state officials. After intense discussion, Alabama decided they would provide protection. Alabama placed state patrol cars every 10–15 miles along the highway toward Montgomery. In addition, a plane followed overhead and two officials from Greyhound were on each bus. Despite the protection, about 40 miles outside of Montgomery, all protection disappeared. As the bus entered the Montgomery bus stations, it was eerily quiet.

Without warning, whites rushed the bus with "sticks and bricks." The first to come off the bus was a white man, Jim Zwerg. The mob took him and severely beat him, allowing other riders to disembark the bus, going unnoticed. Riders and whites sympathetic to the riders were beaten, including Seigenthaler. Later that evening, Dr. Martin Luther King spoke at a local church when a white mob surrounded the church. Federal marshals had been sent in by Robert Kennedy, but Goverson Patterson declared martial law, and National Guardsmen were sent in to control rioters and help federal marshals.

On May 24, the Freedom Riders continued to Jackson, Mississippi with adequate and constant protection. Once in Jackson, the riders were allowed to walk through the white sections of the bus stop but were subsequently arrested for trespassing. The local court was not sympathetic to the Freedom Riders, and they were sentenced to 60 days in a maximum security prison. Hundreds had been arrested and sentenced as more freedom riders came into Jackson. Some riders, including Carmichael, spent more than a month in jail before having their bonds posted. Jail had halted the Freedom Riders, but their goals had been achieved.

Robert Kennedy petitioned the Interstate Commerce Commission to pass a regulation making segregation illegal in interstate travel. In September 1961, the commission complied and the Freedom Riders had their victory. This victory was not only important because it showed what a direct action protest could achieve, but also because it signaled the importance of student organizations in the freedom movement.

Freedom Schools

Freedom schools were created in 1964, during the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee's (SNCC) Mississippi Freedom Summer Project. One of SNCC's goals during this incredibly ambitious civil rights campaign was to create a homegrown movement among African American youths in Mississippi. To achieve this goal, SNCC organized more than 40 Freedom schools throughout the state, which ran from late June through mid-August, and was staffed by hundreds of volunteers who were mostly white, female college students.

A young African American SNCC worker named Charlie Cobb initially proposed the Freedom school idea in November 1963. When observing black Mississippi schools, Cobb noticed that there was a complete absence of academic freedom. African American students in Mississippi were not allowed to openly discuss the situation facing them, despite how poverty-stricken and disenfranchised their parents were. There were multiple instances where black teachers were fired for telling students about the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP) or discussing the nationwide battle for civil rights. Furthermore, it was frowned on to teach black children anything about the functions of the U.S. government or the world outside of Mississippi. During the first days of Freedom schools, many of the volunteer teachers recorded that their students did not know basic things such as the nation's capital, or how many states composed America. This lack of access to education, Cobb observed, created an intellectual vacuum among black students and often fulfilled its goal in rendering them powerless.

After leaders of SNCC accepted Cobb's Freedom school proposal, a conference was held in New York City to discuss the curriculum to be taught in these schools. Veteran civil rights activists such as Myles Horton, Septima Clark, Bayard Rustin, and Ella Baker, combined with young SNCC leaders and academics such as Stoughton Lynd, to create an impressive and comprehensive core curriculum for the schools. The group decided that the Freedom schools should be based on a model of participatory education. This structure called for a great deal of classroom discussion during which students would raise questions and provide answers. Teachers would merely provide background information and facilitate conversations. The conference also called for the development of remedial programs to fill basic educational gaps, and leadership training exercises that taught the students not only how to lead, but how to conduct civil rights protests by writing letters, organizing, and using modern nonviolent tactics.

As the Summer Project began in late June, volunteers noticed an incredible response to Freedom schools. Community members of all ages helped SNCC workers construct the schools, and men stood guard outside their doors at night. When a school would be bombed or burnt by racist local whites, entire communities would turn out to construct another building while school sessions continued under the shade of an old tree or inside someone's house. Within two weeks, Freedom school attendance surpassed all estimations, and by the time the summer was over, Freedom schools had more than 2,000 attendees. The Freedom schools were incredibly successful. Toward the end of the Freedom Summer, Freedom school students had started canvassing potential black voters, conducting nonviolent protests, and forming their own organizations. Freedom school students remained the most important legacy of the Freedom Summer, and they would continue the fight for civil rights in the state long after the SNCC summer project ended.

Garvey, Marcus

Marcus Mosiah Garvey (1887–1940), a black nationalist, was born August 17, 1887 to Marcus and Sarah, the youngest of 11 children. Proud of his racial heritage, Garvey led the largest movement of people of African descent in the world to this day. His movement, Garveyism, generated racial pride, uplift, economic independence, and, most important, a return to Africa. To that end, Garvey was influential in establishing black businesses and the first black international organization for blacks, the United Negro Improvement Association and African Communities League (UNIA), established in 1914. UNIA was formed to draw blacks across the world to promote racial pride, worldwide industry, the development of Africa, and educational opportunities.

Garvey's parents were Jamaicans of unmixed African stock, descendants from the Maroons, a group of slaves who escaped the Jamaican slave regime. The Maroons established independent communities after being rewarded with a treaty of independence from Britain in 1739. Marcus Garvey was raised in St. Ann's Bay on the northern coast of Jamaica. Trained as a printer's apprentice, he attended elementary school but was forced to drop out at the age of 14 to help with his family's finances. His activism started early in life. While working as a foreman printer, the union went on strike and Garvey was elected as their leader. The strike failed and Garvey was blacklisted. It was at this time he became skeptical about the use of labor unions and socialism as a form of government to assist blacks.

After his first opportunity to become active, Garvey traveled extensively to find that black people throughout the world were being treated unfairly. From Costa Rica to Venezuela, everywhere Garvey traveled he was able to observe firsthand the harsh conditions of black people across the world. As a result of this new knowledge and his desire to right the injustices of black people, Garvey used his skills to publish several newspapers. The first newspaper was started in 1910, Garvey's Watchman, with a weekly circulation of 3,000 copies. He founded his second paper in Costa Rica, La Nacion. Garvey used his papers to attack the British consul for their indifference to the conditions of blacks. In Panama, he published La Prensa.

Garvey solicited support from the British, but they were indifferent to his initial concerns; thus he concluded that black people could not rely on whites to provide equality. The lack of support from the British government prompted Garvey to travel to Europe. He settled in London where he met Duse Mohammed Ali, who sparked his interest in pursuing African freedom. The turning point in Garvey's life during this time was his exposure to Booker T. Washington. After reading Washington, Garvey's quest to become a race leader began.

In 1914, Garvey returned to Jamaica where, on August 1, 1914, he established the UNIA whose motto was "One God! One Aim! One Destiny! The UNIA had several objectives. As defined by Garvey these objectives were to unify the race, inspire a spirit of pride and love, attend to the needs of the poor, undermine imperialism on the African continent, and help facilitate commerce and industrial development throughout the African world. The work of Booker T. Washington heavily influenced Garvey. Much like Washington, Garvey argued that although blacks are handicapped by circumstances, they are keeping themselves back, which causes other races to refuse to notice them. In an effort to deal with these handicaps, Garvey sought to begin an industrial and technical school in Jamaica similar to the Tuskegee Institute. In an effort to begin the school, Washington extended an invitation to Garvey to meet with him in Tuskegee, a meeting that never took place because Washington died.

By 1916, at the age of 28, Garvey set up a UNIA chapter in Harlem to recruit members. To keep up with the growing membership of the UNIA throughout the world, Garvey began to publish Negro World, the official newspaper of the UNIA, his greatest publishing venture. It quickly became one of the leading American black weeklies, with a regular circulation around the world of about 200,000. The Negro World refused to accept any advertisement that would degrade the black race, such as hair-straightening or skin-whitening compounds. On the first page of each issue was an editorial by Garvey in which he reminded blacks of their rich history. The remaining parts of the newspaper carried articles on black history and culture, UNIA activities, and racial news. The program of the UNIA was communicated in an eight-point platform in the Negro World.

1. To champion Negro nationhood by redemption of Africa.
2. To make the Negro race conscious.
3. To breathe ideals of manhood and womanhood into every Negro.
4. To advocate self-determination.
5. To make the Negro world-conscious.
6. To print all the news that will be interesting and instructive to the Negro.
7. To instill racial self-help.
8. To inspire racial love and self-respect. (Black Leadership in America, p. 84).

Much to the fascination of whites, Garvey was a force to reckon with. He was a dominant power with a rapidly growing movement. His message of uplift, international solidarity, and support for Irish, Indian, and Egyptian independence was a threat to international order. As such, British and American intelligence agencies began to accuse Garvey of racial strife.

By 1919, there were UNIA chapters chartered in most American cities with large black populations. The headquarters of UNIA was established in Harlem. The organization had saved enough money to purchase an auditorium, which Garvey named Liberty Hall, that was used for various purposes including meetings, dances, and feeding the hungry. The UNIA also established the Negro Factories Corporation (NFC), a black business that produced a variety of commodities and provided jobs to black people, ultimately employing 300 people.

Garvey's business ventures expanded and also included the Black Star Line (BSL), a fleet of black-owned and operated steamships. The BSL was incorporated in Delaware and capitalized at $500,000 with 100,000 shares at $5 a share only to be sold to blacks, with no individual able to purchase more than 200 shares. The BSL was authorized to own, operate, and charter ships and to carry freight, passengers, and mail. The line was different from the NFC. It offered blacks three distinct opportunities: to invest in a black-owned business, to make money, and to make history. Although many laughed at the idea of the BSL, it was able to purchase several ships, the S. S. Yarmouth, S. S. Shadyside, and Kanawha. Blacks everywhere marveled at the accomplishment of Garvey's BSL.

Garvey's rallying call for the UNIA was, "Up, you mighty race, you can accomplish what you will!" (Library of Congress)*

At UNIA's pinnacle, Garvey called for the First International Convention of the Negro Peoples of the World. The delegates attending the convention represented 48 states, 25 countries, and 3 continents. Dignitaries at the convention included an African prince, the mayor of Monrovia, Liberia, and tribal chiefs. The event was a momentous occasion where the various units of the UNIA were amassed together. In a parade through Harlem, the Black Cross Nurses, ready to come to the aid of black people, were dressed in white. The African Legion, which included many World War I veterans dressed in dark blue uniforms with red stripes, were mounted on horseback and marching with precision, indicating to the world that the organization would be prepared to use force to gain black redemption. The white press took notice of the pageantry, which displayed the might and organization of Garvey's group.

Flying high in the midst of the crowd were the crimson, black, and green banners of the delegates that welcomed

Garvey with a five-minute standing ovation. His opening statement preached black nationalism calling for the freedom of Africa. Garvey stated:

We are the descendants of a people determined to suffer no longer. We shall now organize the 400,000,000 Negroes of the world into a vast organization to plant the banner of freedom on the great continent of Africa. . . . We do not desire what has belonged to others, though others have always sought to deprive us of that which belonged to us. . . . If Europe is for the Europeans, then Africa shall be for the black peoples of the world. We say it; we mean it. . . . The other races have countries of their own and it is time for the 400,000,000 Negroes to claim Africa for themselves (Great Lives Observed, p. 65).

The convention designated Garvey as the provisional president of the African Republic, an exile government. Other officers in this government included the titles of supreme potentate, supreme deputy potentate, and an entire cabinet. The Declaration of the Rights of the Negro Peoples of the World, a statement of protest and plan of action for blacks, was also adopted at the convention.

By 1922, Garvey's momentum took an incredible turn downward. The black establishment waged mounting attacks against the business activities of the UNIA because of the large sums of money it had collected from blacks. A few disgruntled stockholders also lodged complaints and accused the BSL of mismanagement. As a result, Garvey and several associates were arrested and charged with 12 counts of mail fraud in promoting the stock of the BSL. Shortly after his arrest, with an operating budget of merely $31.12, Garvey announced BSL's operational activities would desist. The trial was delayed and Garvey was released on bond.

While awaiting trial, Garvey promised to return to the UNIA. Much to the dismay of the America's black elite, Garvey maintained a faithful following; however, disgruntled BSL stockholders and employees sued him. At his trial, Garvey denied overstating the profits of the BSL. He did admit that there were no assets and the corporation had more than $600,000 in operating expenses. The trial also revealed that the BSL never paid dividends to stockholders. The judge stated that Garvey had preyed on his own people. In addition to the business troubles faced by Garvey, there were also domestic troubles that became the center of attention for the black elite in mounting attacks against Garvey.

By 1922, when the third annual convention of the UNIA met in Harlem, his opposition had mobilized and called its own meeting. A group called Friends of Negro Freedom, organized by the editors of Messenger magazine, Chandler Owen, and A. Philip Randolph, adopted the slogan "Garvey must go!" This group also called for his immediate deportation. Another major argument against Garvey were various rumors that he had made an agreement with the Ku Klux Klan. The opposition's most fatal move against Garvey was a letter written to the United States attorney general in 1923 protesting the delay of Garvey's trial.

Although no one knows the influence of the letter, Garvey's trial began within six months after the letter was written. Garvey mounted his own defense by blaming his critics and competitors for BSL's demise. The trial revealed that Garvey had used the BSL for promoting the sale of stock rather than using it as a business enterprise. It also revealed that funds were transferred between the BSL and other UNIA business ventures without proper accounting methods. Garvey was found guilty of promoting the sale of BSL stock knowing the company was in financial trouble. He was sentenced to five years in prison and a $1,000 fine. The codefendants were acquitted. Garvey's attorneys made plans for appeals as he was remanded to Tombs Prison in New York.

Garvey was released on bail in September 1923. While waiting appeal, he pursued another maritime venture, the Black Cross Navigation and Trading Company, which purchased one ship, the General G. W. Goethals. At the 1924 convention, Garvey declared the ship to be named the Booker T. Washington. He hoped it would be the vessel to carry blacks back to Africa. The UNIA sent machinery and technical experts to Liberia to claim the land that had been promised them for colonization only to find that the goods had been confiscated by the shipping company for lack of payment. The experts were also immediately deported amid fears from Liberians that they would be a domestic threat. Garvey's hopes for the Booker T. Washington never came to fruition.

By 1925, Garvey's appeals were rejected and the Supreme Court refused to hear the case. On February 8, 1925, he entered the Atlanta penitentiary to begin serving a five-year prison term. Although efforts were made to continue the work of the UNIA, they fell short because of a lack of a flamboyant leader. Surprisingly during Garvey's time in prison, even those who had never supported him became increasingly aware that he had fallen victim to a contentious America. After supporters urged clemency for Garvey, in 1927, President Coolidge commuted his sentence. As an alien, United States law required nonresidents convicted of a felony to be deported. So on release, without having an opportunity to visit UNIA headquarters in New York, Garvey was taken to New Orleans and put aboard the S. S. Saramacca headed for Panama and the West Indies.

Even in his homeland of Jamaica, Garvey continued the work of the UNIA by visiting local chapters. The Negro World also continued to publish editorials to be sent to his American following. With the support of his wife, in 1928 he traveled to Europe and established new UNIA headquarters in London and Paris. He also presented a petition to the League of Nations at Geneva and urged them to create a "free Negro state in Africa."

By 1929, Garvey issued a call for the Sixth International Convention of Negro Peoples of the World to be held in Kingston, Jamaica. Similar to the first international convention, this was the last major UNIA convention that garnered great attention. Most of the discussion at the conference involved improving the conditions blacks around the world. The delegates established a department of health and public education to improve the health conditions of blacks through the world, and it also sought to establish UNIA consulates in black population centers and to publicize grievances and to protect the rights of blacks. Much to the dismay of critics, even after serving jail time and being deported, Garvey continued to be a force among blacks.

Garvey also seemed to become a dominant force in Jamaican politics by organizing the Jamaican Peoples Political Party. He ran an unsuccessful bid for the Jamaican legislature, which could have been derailed by the lawsuits and complaints by American chapters of the UNIA when he moved the headquarters to Jamaica. By the 1930s, the Garvey movement slowed significantly because the Depression left black Americans in disarray. Just as conditions in America supported Garvey's elevation as a race leader, other conditions in America accompanied his decline.

The seventh convention proved to be a disappointment and Garvey moved the headquarters to London in 1935. Although small meetings of the UNIA were held in the mid-1930s, Garveyism had declined. By the late 1930s, Garvey's health was failing after suffering with pneumonia and a stroke that left him paralyzed. On June 10, 1940, Garvey died. In London, Garvey's death went unnoticed, but in the United States, black and white newspapers paid tribute to him. With mixed reviews on his triumphs and setbacks, they all agreed, it was unlikely that black America would see another Garvey.

Georgia Educational Association

By August 1865, black Georgians helped organize the Georgia Educational Association (GEA) in Augusta. An offshoot of the Georgia Equal Rights Association (GERA), this organization began when a group of African American farmers from Wilkes County attempted to purchase a large plot of land in neighboring Dougherty County in the fall of 1865. Pooling together more than $7,000, this group, led by Lawrence Speed and Wallace Sherman, sought the assistance of the Freedmen's Bureau to facilitate the sale. Although the black farmers had sufficient funds and the power of the federal government behind them, they only managed to rent 500 acres of land on the Whitlock Place Plantation in Dougherty County. This disappointment represented the first of many defeats in the attempt to redistribute land and wealth in the postbellum South.

The Wilkes County farmers sought the creation of an independent African American community, completely removed from the controls and limitations imposed by white Southerners. Movements of this nature were rampant in the South during the 1860s and 1870s. Just four years earlier in Port Royal, South Carolina, General William T. Sherman occupied the region and freed thousands of slaves. Once liberated and granted land, they immediately became yeomen farmers seeking to grow crops and sustain their community. Of importance, they actively distanced themselves from "slave crops," refusing to grow cotton and indigo. Hardworking and eager to maintain their freedom, this community made a collective decision to grow food crops for internal consumption. This decision meant they sought removal from a white-controlled market economy and from white society in general.

The Port Royal example was repeated in the 245-mile tract of land Sherman granted to African Americans in his Special Field Order No. 15. Issued on January 16, 1865, the order mandated that the 400,000 acres of abandoned and confiscated land be divided among former slaves. On receipt of this land, more than 40,000 freed people settled and cultivated this region, which encompassed the South Carolina and Georgia Lowcountry and Sea Islands. Again, they refused to grow cotton, opting instead for the independent existence guaranteed through the cultivation of nonmarket food crops.

While the Wilkes County freed people failed to purchase their own land, they did succeed in creating an organization that continued to seek self-determination for black Georgian communities. In August 1865, they helped organize a statewide convention held in Augusta. Delegates from black communities throughout the state attended to discuss their fate and future. Out of this convention emerged the GERA, which sought to address all of the major issues of the Reconstruction Era—social rights, land reform, and literacy. Moreover the GERA, as historian Lee Formwalt contends, sought to achieve its goals without the aid of the federal government, Northern progressives, or Radical Republicans.

Within a year of its founding, the GERA formed the GEA as its education and literacy wing. One of the primary purposes of the GEA was to create and financially support elementary schools for African Americans in local communities throughout the state. Local auxiliaries held regular meetings and primarily raised funds to pay for school supplies and teacher salaries while the statewide association held a series of conventions to publicize its mission and garner additional financial and political support. By late 1867, 120 black elementary schools were erected by the GEA in 53 counties. Black communities in Georgia purchased 57 school buildings to meet their own education needs. In Augusta, the Wilkes County farmers, who helped found the Dougherty County Educational Association, opened its first elementary school on the Gintown plantation in 1866. Members of the Dougherty County branch of the GEA taught at both of the local black elementary schools and played a determining role in the curriculum. The Albany, Georgia branch of the GEA opened its elementary school in 1866 and freedmen Jack Mallard, an active member of the Association, instructed 23 students in a building constructed and owned by the African American community. In Savannah, 16 of the 28 black elementary schools were established in 1866 by the GEA. Through the Association's publication, the Loyal Georgian, the GEA explicitly voiced its goals and nationalist leanings. In 1866, the paper reported that GEA schools were controlled and taught by African Americans for the benefit of freed people whose donations and drive sustained these schools.

Clearly, then, the GEA rejected paternalist appeals and approaches to the education of African Americans in Georgia and sought to actively define the role of schools within the many black communities throughout the state. They established a model for community-based schools in which the GEA generated funds to purchase or rent land, erected schools, determined the curriculum, and hired teachers. Unlike the situation practiced later under segregation, the locus of control and power in the community-based model was not in the hands of an outside and hostile group. Thus in many ways, the GEA epitomized black self-determination, autonomy, and sovereignty in the post-Civil War South.

Several prominent black leaders and politicians in Georgia played important roles in the association, including James Porter, Jefferson Franklin Long, William Jefferson White, and Tunis George Campbell. Each used their activism in the GERA/GEA to launch impressive political careers. Despite a political platform calling for "Relief, Homesteads and Schools for the People," the Republican party did nothing to directly support the efforts of the GEA and was more interested in gaining political support than supporting the GEA in its continued efforts to establish schools in local communities. Joining this political tug-of-war, the Freedmen's Bureau had long been an obstacle to the goals of the GEA. Although the bureau provided invaluable service in mediating the sale and transfer of land and buildings used by the GEA to erect schools, members of the association voiced significant concerns because some of the local agents of the Freedmen's Bureau in Albany came from slave-holding families.

Even many of the Northern whites in the bureau dealt with freed people in a condescending and abusive manner. As a result, many African Americans in Dougherty County knew that they could not expect any real support from the federal government. On this note, GEA leaders contended that its African American members should be accountable only to people of their own selection, but not to whites. Thus, the GEA fostered a nationalist, race-conscious perspective as a result of the justifiable suspicions its members had of both Northern and Southern whites. As a result, local auxiliaries of the GEA often debated about whether to even hire white Northern teachers even in the absence of other viable options. Although efforts like this were relatively short-lived, they did represent the collective strivings of black communities in the postbellum South as they sought to carve out autonomous spaces in the midst of racial hostility and intolerance.

Grandfather Clause

In 1870, after the Civil War, the United States government added three new amendments to the Constitution. The Thirteenth Amendment outlawed slavery. The Fourteenth Amendment guaranteed due process and equal protection to all citizens, regardless of race or color. The Fifteenth Amendment guaranteed the right to vote to all citizens regardless of “race, color, or previous condition of servitude.” Although many Southern states still held their Civil War mentality of white superiority, these amendments forced the states to accept African Americans as equal—at least under the law.

Many of the Southern states wished to evade the newly instituted amendments, especially the Fifteenth Amendment. To circumvent this amendment, some Southern states implemented new laws that prevented African Americans from voting. Educational and property qualifications were often installed for this purpose. More specifically, literacy tests were implemented, poll taxes were added, and grandfather clauses were administered. A grandfather clause countered the government’s implementation of the Fifteenth Amendment by forbidding any African American from voting unless he was a citizen, or descendant of a citizen, that had the right to vote before 1867. This stipulation eliminated all African Americans from voting because African Americans were not given the right to vote until after 1867. These clauses were adopted into state constitutions so as to legally prevent African Americans from voting.

Grandfather clauses were seen as the most beneficial way to prevent African Americans from voting. Educational and property qualifications often prevented poor whites from voting, but grandfather clauses hampered only African Americans. Furthermore, by the 1890s, a good number of African Americans were able to pass the literacy tests, pay the poll taxes, or circumvent any other regulation Southern governments tried to impose on newly independent African Americans. By implementing grandfather clauses Southern governments were able to prevent all African Americans from voting, even those that could pass the educational, property, or financial qualifications.

Seven Southern states implemented grandfather clauses in the late 1890s to early 1900s. Although many African Americans objected to these clauses, they remained in place until 1915 when the United States Supreme Court declared them to be unconstitutional in Guinn v. United States.

The use of grandfather clauses was part of a larger picture that included Jim Crow laws and Black Codes. Jim Crow laws were passed in the Southern United States at the end of Reconstruction, the period of rebuilding in the South after the Civil War. These laws discriminated against African Americans and restricted them from voting, and other fundamental rights, through constitutional and legal means. Like grandfather clauses, Jim Crow laws were found to be legal until 1915. Similarly, Black Codes were implemented after the conclusion of Reconstruction in the South. These codes sought to return African Americans to a position of bondage or servitude. Although African Americans were free in terms of terminology, the Black Codes returned them to a position of servitude in actuality. Jim Crow laws and Black Codes in general, as well as grandfather clauses in particular, were held to be legal by both the Southern state governments and the national government until 1915 with Guinn v. United States.

Grandfather clauses, Jim Crow laws, and Black Codes all undermined the legislation the national government put in place at the conclusion of the Civil War. By implementing these discriminatory laws, the Southern states were able to successfully continue in their practice of putting down African Americans and restricting their advancement. These acts, therefore, prevented African Americans from receiving the equality they so desired. It would take almost another hundred years, and endless civil rights battles, to bring the legislation and equality that African Americans so desired.

Great Migration

The Great Migration was the mass exodus of more than 1 million African Americans from below the Mason-Dixon Line to the North between 1916 and 1930. This migration produced a massive demographic shift, resulting in significant economic, social, and political changes for the United States. The highest rates of migration occurred from 1916 to 1918, when approximately 400,000 African Americans moved to the North. Between 1910 and 1930, the African American population in the North increased by 20 percent; however, most African Americans did not leave the South. Many moved from rural areas to southern cities and many others did not move at all.

The first blacks to move north were predominantly young, unskilled, and male. Many of these men went with the intention of settling in the North and sending for their families when they could save enough money. Others planned to earn some money and then return to the South. Another surge in migration, beginning in 1920, brought more black intellectuals and professionals to the North. In fact, by the end of the 1920s, Harlem and Chicago became centers for the black intelligentsia and black culture. Most migrants settled in cities like Chicago, New York, Philadelphia, Boston, Detroit, and others because of cheaper, easier transportation via train, as well as numerous job opportunities. Many black women had already traveled north before World War I to work as domestic servants.

Numerous forces compelled African Americans to leave the South during this period. A major factor was the lack of job opportunities in the South, as well as increased opportunities for employment in the North. Because of segregation and the systems of sharecropping and tenant farming in the largely agricultural South, African Americans had few chances to advance in the jobs they did have and barely any chance to break into more prestigious careers reserved for whites. Moreover, this period saw many changes in southern agriculture, among them increased use of machinery to replace human labor, which further limited blacks' likelihood for financial well-being.

Environmental factors contributed to a fiscal downturn in the farming economy. The boll weevil, a beetle that feeds on cotton, infested and destroyed cotton fields throughout the South during the 1910s and 1920s, causing many people to lose their source of income. Ultimately, the South was forced to diversify its agriculture, ending its dependence on cotton as the primary crop. Another significant environmental factor that affected the southern economy was the Great Mississippi flood of 1927, which destroyed many homes and plantations. As a result of substantial rainfall in the summer months of 1926, the Mississippi River overflowed, flooding more than 270,000 square miles in the states of Arkansas, Illinois, Kentucky, Louisiana, Mississippi, and Tennessee. By 1927, migration to the North had begun to slow, but the desperate situation this flood created for many families encouraged more people to go north.

By contrast, more jobs became available in the North during this period, and northern industries actively recruited southern labor. By 1914, many European countries, although not the United States, were involved in World War I. Many Europeans living in the United States returned to their homelands to contribute to the war effort. European immigration to the United States also slowed considerably. In 1900, Europeans entered the United States at a rate of more than 500,000 per year; by 1916, the immigration rate from European countries was less than 300,000 per year. The Selective Service Act of 1917 created even more job opportunities for unskilled laborers in the North. This law, passed the year the United States entered World War I, required that all men 21 to 30 years old register for service in the U.S. military. Ultimately, 4.8 million men served in World War I (more than half were drafted), leaving many jobs open.

By 1917, Congress also began passing legislation to halt immigration. The United States's exclusionary stance on immigration culminated in the Immigration Act of 1924, which limited the number of immigrants from any country to 2 percent of the total number of people from that country already in the United States. This federal law, also known as the Johnson-Reed Act, also excluded the immigration of individuals from Asian countries. The Immigration Act of 1924 was aimed chiefly at limiting the influx of individuals from southern and eastern European countries, the majority of whom were industrial workers and had been immigrating since the 1850s.

The dwindling number of immigrants and loss of many men to the military encouraged northern businesses to recruit African Americans in the South as cheap sources of labor. Northern agents went south and offered African American men jobs and train fare to northern cities. Also, black newspapers advertised jobs and published articles about opportunities for blacks in the North. Ministers often read letters in their churches from African Americans who found better opportunities in the North. So many African Americans headed to the North that many companies eventually stopped recruiting because they did not need to.

African Americans were driven north by more than economic prospects. The end of Reconstruction in 1877 saw the reinstatement of white control of the South, replacing African Americans who held political office after the Civil War with whites and ushering in the period commonly referred to as the nadir of race relations. The post-Reconstruction South was particularly violent and oppressive for blacks. Jim Crow laws, reified by the Supreme Court's Plessy v. Ferguson (1896) decision, segregated public spaces, invoking the "separate but equal" doctrine. African Americans were offered subpar educational resources. Blacks were politically disenfranchised and could not serve on juries. Moreover, the South was rife with racial violence, including lynching. Also, the Ku Klux Klan began a second wave of violence and intimidation in the 1910s and 1920s, which eventually extended to the North. Many blacks went North in hopes of escaping the repressive South.

The Great Migration had significant and longlasting implications for the North and for African Americans. The abrupt arrival of thousands of African Americans in northern cities produced a new kind of white discrimination in the North, as whites attempted to segregate neighborhoods, schools, workplaces, and leisure spaces. To keep blacks out of all-white neighborhoods, whites used violence or collaborated with realtors to create racially restrictive covenants. Moreover, it was nearly impossible for African Americans to secure mortgages in order to purchase homes in black neighborhoods owing to a practice called "redlining," in which neighborhoods deemed least desirable and too risky for mortgages were circled in red on city maps. These neighborhoods tended to be older, inner-city neighborhoods, populated mostly by blacks and ethnic minorities.

In several cities throughout the North (and South as well), ethnic and racial tensions were exacerbated by post-war economic anxieties. During the Red Summer of 1919, 25 cities experienced race riots. The riot in Chicago, which lasted a week, was among the worst; 23 African Americans and 15 whites were killed. In addition, 342 blacks and 195 whites were injured. More than 1,000 people were left homeless from the fires that ravaged the city. The Great Migration also contributed to white flight from the cities into the suburbs as a result of racial tension. Whites were able to move to the suburbs because of highway expansion, as well as mortgages from the Federal Housing Authority and the Veterans Administration. The result of white flight was fewer tax dollars for the city, where blacks remained, and a shift in political power.

African Americans, particularly migrant blacks, tended to get the worst jobs at the lowest rates of pay. Even by the 1960s, unions were still predominantly white: northern plumbers unions were 99.8 percent white, electrical workers unions were 99.4 percent white, and carpenters unions were 98.4 percent white. Still, it seems that African Americans migrating from the South fared better than African Americans born in the North. Migrant blacks in the North made more money overall, were more likely to be married, and had lower rates of nonmarital childbearing than northern-born African Americans. Also, migrant children were more likely to live in two-parent households than nonmigrant children.

The mass migration of African Americans to the North coincided with, and helped produce, a new age of modernity. One of the most significant cultural results of the Great Migration was the Harlem Renaissance. The development of a black middle class in Harlem, as well as the influx of blacks into the city, contributed to this cultural revolution, which occurred during the 1920s and ended with the Great Depression. The Harlem Renaissance spanned many genres, including music, drama, literature, and poetry, and articulated what was unique about the black experience in America. The Great Migration introduced the North to blues and jazz music and southern food as well. The dissemination of southern culture was aided in this period, as it could not have been previously, by the popularity of newspapers and advances in radio and film technologies.

One of the most substantial effects of the Great Migration was the restoration of African Americans' political rights. Blacks did not suffer the same kind of systematic disfranchisement in the North that they had in the South. Because African Americans were able to vote, and did vote, politicians were forced to consider their demands. In the North, African Americans were afforded better economic opportunities, which allowed them to contribute to various organizations that worked for civil rights. Moreover, blacks' shared experiences provided a milieu for alliances, fostered by their proximity to one another. City dwelling encouraged organized protest among African Americans that was highly visible. Thus by using their newfound electoral leverage in the North, African Americans were able to defeat Jim Crow in the South.

Griggs, Sutton

E. Sutton Griggs (1872–1933), an African American preacher and writer, was one of the few outspoken critics of anti-black propaganda in the South who turned to racial accommodation during the early decades of the 20th century. Born in Chatfield, Texas, Griggs was the son of Reverend Allen R. Griggs Sr., a former slave, who rose to prominence as the president of the Baptist National Convention.

Griggs graduated from Richmond Theological Seminary in Virginia in 1893 and served as a pastor of the First Baptist Church in Nashville until 1913. During this time, he was instrumental in establishing the American Baptist Theological Seminary and was its president for one year, from 1925 to 1926. The reverend established the Tabernacle Baptist Church and built an institutional church in Memphis with the intention to provide spiritual help and employment opportunities to the local people.

Griggs was one of the well-published black authors of the Jim Crow South. His novels and treatises informed his theological and sociological perspective on southern race relations. His fictional work, Imperium Imperio, published in 1899, introduced the new and self-respecting African American and defended black Americans' basic rights, including the right to vote. Three years later, he wrote another book, Unfettered, Dorlan's Plan that elaborated his objectives to achieve racial equality and said that this racial parity would eventually tear down racial barriers.

Disappointed with his community's unwillingness to rally behind these works, Griggs temporarily abandoned his writings until the National Baptist Convention came forward to finance his next novel, The Hindered Hand. In this book published in 1905, Griggs strongly denounced the racist writings of Reverend Thomas Dixon Jr., whose works supported white brutality and segregation. Along the same lines he published a pamphlet, The One Great Question: Study of Southern Conditions At Close Range, in 1907. It forecasted a gloomy scenario of human rights violations in the South. In this social and political treatise, he condemned the racist attitudes of the city fathers of Nashville and their policy of encouraging white brutality on African Americans. Frustrated with the lack of response from the city black community, Griggs converted to racial accommodation and directed his message on racial collaboration to the white community.

He published a series of articles in 1911 under the title Wisdom's Call that urged African Americans in the South not to migrate to the North. This work made him popular with the members of the white established Memphis Industrial Committee. It was their support and the backing of the Memphis Chamber of Commerce that facilitated Griggs to spread his ideas. He published a little newspaper, The Neighbor, in 1919 in which he advised his community to maintain good relations with the white community and supported lynching as a means to control violence and crime. This stand contradicted his earlier works that condemned such brutality. The white press appreciated his message but did not publish the criticism from the local black community and the NAACP regarding his position on lynching.

Griggs published his next work, The Science of Social Efficiency, in 1923. The conciliatory tone of Reverend Griggs is evident in this work that advised African Americans to move ahead as a group and adopt Christian virtues and subordinate themselves to the white establishment. To carry this message to black public schools, Griggs sought endorsements of educators, school board presidents, and state teachers associations. He traveled to several southern states where he lectured on the retarding forces that impeded the progress of his community. In a span of four years, from 1925 to 1929, Griggs published The Stepping Stones to Higher Things, The Winning Policy, and the Co-operative Nature and Social Education. Despite his efforts to convey his message of biracial harmony and cooperation, these works were not prescribed in the curriculum.

African Americans did not purchase his books because they believed that these works damaged their racial pride. Lacking financial and moral support from his community and receiving inadequate funding from the white community, Reverend Griggs was caught in a financial squeeze. He could not make the church mortgage payment and was forced to sell his church in a Memphis public auction. He relocated to Denison, Texas, where he spent his last three years as a pastor in the church, which his father established, and died in Houston on January 1933.

Griggs represented a segment of courageous African American intellectuals who adopted different strategies in attacking racism in the South during the period that witnessed lynching, black disenfranchisement, and the ascendancy of the Ku Klux Klan. Whether he succeeded or not in his attempts to grapple with the social evils, he stands as one of the shining stars in the galaxy of black scholars before the 1920s Harlem Renaissance.

Haley, Alex

Alex Haley (1921-1992) was a biographer, novelist, and genealogist who is most noted for the book and miniseries Roots and The Autobiography of Malcolm X. Born in Ithaca,

New York, on August 11, 1921, he moved with his family to Henning, Tennessee, the year he was born and he spent five years there. At the time of Haley's birth, his mother, Bertha George Palmer Haley, was a music teacher and his father, Simon Alexander Haley, was a graduate student at Cornell University. After moving to Tennessee, Haley's father served as a professor of agriculture at a number of black colleges. While they were living in Henning, Haley's maternal grandmother, Cynthia Palmer, told stories about the family's genealogy, which could be traced back to an African named "Kin-tay" who would be Haley's great-great-great-great-grandfather. In 1937, Haley briefly attended Elizabeth City Teachers College in North Carolina, a stint that lasted until 1939. After dropping out of college, Haley enlisted in the Coast Guard as a messboy. This would begin a 20-year association with the Coast Guard.

During World War II, Haley rose in the rank of petty officer third class and began volunteering to write love letters for his fellow sailors, which they sent to girlfriends and wives. By 1949, Haley became the first member of the Coast Guard with a journalist rating, eventually advancing to chief petty officer and chief journalist through his retirement in 1959. Having honed his writing during his years in the Coast Guard, Haley began publishing in the private sector. He became a senior editor for Reader's Digest and wrote articles for a number of other publications. In September 1962, he began a long and lucrative relationship with Playboy magazine, interviewing such notable figures as Miles Davis, Martin Luther King Jr., Muhammad Ali, Jim Brown, and Malcolm X. Haley's work and association with Playboy was literally the genesis of the joke about men reading the magazine just for the interviews. His interview of Malcolm X was the beginning of a project that grew, over time, to the publication of The Autobiography of Malcolm X in 1965. Within a decade, this book had sold more than 6 million copies.

The work for which Haley is best known is the novel Roots: The Saga of an American Family published during the bicentennial of the United States in 1976. Although mostly fictional and only loosely based on Haley's family, this work initiated serious interest in African American genealogy. Moreover, when ABC aired the first Roots miniseries, 130 million people in the United States watched the eight episodes, shattering previous records for television viewers of a U.S. miniseries. Approximately 85 percent of all television homes saw all or part of the miniseries. After winning a National Book Award, the Spingarn Medal, a Pulitzer Prize, and more than 200 other awards for Roots, Haley became the source of controversy, as allegations of plagiarism were raised by Harold Courlander. In 1978, Courlander went to U.S. District Court, claiming that Haley lifted more than 80 passages from his 1967 work entitled The African. Haley's principal defense was that he had never read Courlander's book, but this was proven false when Joseph Bruchac provided an affidavit claiming that he had personally provided Haley a copy of The African five or six years before Roots was published. In the end, Haley settled out of court for $650,000 and issued a public acknowledgment of his wrongdoing.

After Roots, Haley's next major project, Queen, was to be based on a grandmother who was the daughter of an enslaved woman and her white owner. Haley died of a heart attack on February 10, 1992 in Seattle before finishing Queen. Per a prior agreement, David Stevens completed the work, and it was made into a 1993 movie. Haley has earned a number of posthumous awards, including having a U.S. Coast Guard cutter named in his honor in 1999; he was the recipient of the Korean War Service Medal in 2002.

Hamer, Fannie Lou

Fannie Lou (Townsend) Hamer (1917–1977) was born October 6, 1917, in Ruleville, Mississippi. She was the last of 20 children of Lou Ella and James Townsend. Residing in the Mississippi Delta, the Townsend family were descendants of Mississippi's enslaved population. Like most black families of the era, they were sharecroppers. Sharecropping generally bound most workers to the land; workers who were born poor, lived poor, and died poor. Fannie Lou's early life was no exception.

At the age of six, Fannie Lou joined her parents in the cotton fields. By the time she was 12, she was forced to drop out of school and work full time to help support her family. She endured hard labor with few rewards throughout her teens and young adult years. At age 27 she married another sharecropper named Perry “Pap” Hamer and went to work on the plantation that employed her husband. Later, Fannie Lou and Pap adopted two children, Dorothy Jean and Virgie Lee.

In August 1962, Mrs. Hamer attended a meeting of the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee (SNCC) in her hometown of Ruleville, Mississippi. From that moment on, her life’s path was forever altered. Inspired by the youthful enthusiasm of the student organizers, this is where she made the fateful decision to attempt to register to vote. Her earlier attendance at several conferences sponsored by the Regional Council of Negro Leadership had prepared her to move forward in her own personal struggle for civil rights. She had become part of the movement that would later lead to her activism as a civil rights worker and organizer. Upon learning of Mrs. Hamer’s decision to register to vote, her landlord forced her to leave the plantation and denied her further opportunity to work. Mrs. Hamer was not deterred. She traveled to local communities to help spread the word about voter registration. During this period of history, blacks who attempted to vote or who were involved in voter registration efforts were threatened with violence, loss of job, harassment, and murder. In June of the following year, Mrs. Hamer and several SNCC colleagues traveled to Charleston, South Carolina to participate in voter registration and literacy workshop activities. On their return home, they stopped in Winona, Mississippi. Here they were jailed and brutally beaten by law enforcement officers. This beating left her blind in her left eye and her kidneys permanently damaged.

As a leader and organizer of the Mississippi Freedom Democratic Party (MFDP) that was formed in April 1964, Mrs. Hamer was selected as a delegate to attend the 1964 Democratic National Convention in Atlantic City, New Jersey. It was here, during her electrifying testimony before the convention’s credentials committee, that she rose to national prominence as she sought to prohibit the seating of the all-white Mississippi delegation. An attempt at compromise would offer the MFDP two delegate seats. The compromise was rejected by the party. The overall effort to seat the MFDP failed, but the Democratic Party agreed that, in the future, no delegation would be seated from a state where anyone was illegally denied the vote. Mrs. Hamer would forever be remembered as a powerful voice of the civil rights struggle who so precisely articulated the pain and frustration of millions of African American citizens. The Democratic Party and the nation took note. Roughly a year later, the 1965 Voting Rights Act was passed.

After her memorable experience in Atlantic City, Mrs. Hamer turned her attention to building strong institutions for addressing problems at the local level. She continued her work in Mississippi, ran for Congress in 1964 and 1965, and was seated as a member of Mississippi’s legitimate delegation to the Democratic National Convention in 1968 in Chicago, Illinois. She played an active role in antipoverty programs, especially Head Start, and in 1969 founded the Freedom Farms Corporation, designed to help poor farming families—black and white—become economically self-sufficient. In addition, she was a local leader in Dr. King's Poor Peoples Campaign. In 1971 she sought, unsuccessfully, to become a Mississippi state senator as an independent.

The last six years of Mrs. Hamer's life were marked by severe health and financial problems, but during this times she received numerous honors and awards that recognized a lifelong role in the Civil Rights movement. She died on March 14, 1977. The official cause of death was breast cancer. Her funeral in Ruleville drew a cross section of national dignitaries who came to sing her praises. And rightfully so: Mrs. Hamer was one of the most significant participants in the struggle to achieve freedom and social justice for African Americans in the 20th century. In July, 2008, a coalition of local civil rights activists, lead by Alderwoman Hattie Jordan and Patricia Thompson, national scholars, and concerned citizens dedicated the Fannie Lou Hamer Memorial Garden, in Ruleville, Mississippi, marking the final resting place of Mrs. Hamer and her beloved husband, Pap.

Hampton, Fred

Fred Hampton (1948–1969) was one of the greatest young political activists to emerge during the Black Power movement. Hampton, chairman of the Illinois Black Panther Party for Self-Defense (BPP), was brutally murdered in his prime by the Chicago police and the FBI.

Hampton was born in Blue Island, Illinois, on August 30, 1948. He started his political career while he was a student at Proviso East High School. He helped found the Maywood NAACP and was admired by both blacks and whites as an influential youth leader. He attended Triton Junior College in 1966, and, by the fall of 1967, Hampton attended Crane Junior College on Chicago's west side. Crane Junior College, later known as Malcolm X College, was a central meeting place for black activists.

In 1968, Fred Hampton founded the Illinois and Chicago Chapters of the BPP. The BPP was a national organization dedicated to the liberation of black people. He was a gifted leader that made the Chicago BPP one of the most prominent branches in the country. Hampton strove to alleviate the oppression of black people and improve their living conditions. He established several community service programs that included free breakfasts for children, a free medical clinic, and political education classes.

Hampton was a charismatic public speaker who instilled hope and pride in many Chicagoans throughout the city. He spoke out against police brutality and advocated that members of the community defend themselves. Hampton created coalitions with other socially active groups such as the Students for a Democratic Society (SDS). He also reached across racial boundaries to build coalitions between black, white, and Latino street gangs.

Hampton and other BPP members gained national attention because they publicly advocated the use of weapons for self-defense and patrolled the community in an effort to prevent abuse by the police. J. Edgar Hoover, director of the FBI, stated that the Black Panther Party was "the greatest threat to the internal security of the country." The FBI's COINTELPRO (counterintelligence program) was established to neutralize black political activists and destroy their organizations. Many activists were killed or unjustly incarcerated as a result of COINTELPRO. Hampton was sent to Menard Prison for an alleged theft charge but was released on appeal after only a few months.

As a result of COINTELPRO, the Chicago BPP headquarters, located at 2350 W. Madison, was ransacked several times by the police. On December 4, 1969, Chicago police raided a nearby apartment at 2337 W. Monroe where many BPP members slept. The police fired shots into the apartment to deliberately kill BPP leaders. Mark Clark, BPP defense captain of the Peoria, Illinois branch, was killed first with a single shot to the heart. Fred Hampton was killed next. Fellow BPP members heard two shots immediately before the police confirmed that Hampton was dead. There were seven survivors of the raid including Hampton's beloved Deborah Johnson who was pregnant with their son.

Johnson was uninjured, but four other members sustained gunshot wounds. All of them were arrested and charged with attempted murder.

Thousands of community members visited the crime scene and were appalled by the apparent slaughter of these young leaders. Many concerned citizens demanded an investigation. The initial investigation, however, exonerated the police. Although no law enforcement officials were ever convicted of the crimes, subsequent investigations established that the raid was in fact a successful assassination attempt that was approved and sanctioned by the FBI. Eventually, 25,000 pages emerged that confirmed that FBI involvement had been suppressed from the evidence.

The investigations also proved that FBI informant William O'Neal was paid handsomely for his efforts and avoided incarceration for prior criminal activity. O'Neal infiltrated the Chicago BPP and served as the chapter chief of security and Hampton's bodyguard. O'Neal supplied the FBI with a floor plan of the apartment that was critical in the assassination plot because it indicated where members slept. Many BPP members believed that O'Neal drugged Hampton so that he would be unable to defend himself during the raid.

Ballistics evidence proved that the police shot at least 200 bullets into the apartment. BPP members were ambushed and therefore unable to successfully defend themselves. As a result of the findings, the murder charges against the BPP members were dismissed. The Clark and Hampton families filed a multimillion dollar lawsuit that was eventually settled for $1.85 million.

Deborah Johnson, now known as Akua Njeri, and Fred Hampton Jr. work together with the December 4th committee to keep Fred Hampton's legacy alive.

Harlem Renaissance

For all its failings, the Harlem Renaissance (1917–1934) (originally called the “Negro Renaissance”), was a spectacular success—spectacular because it was, in fact, a spectacle, a public exhibition of African American poetry, prose, drama, art, and music. This was not just “art for art’s sake,” but art to redraw the public image of “colored” people in America. Enjoying a “double audience” of black and white, the Harlem Renaissance was the fairest fruit of the New Negro movement, whose mission it was to bring about racial renewal through cultural diplomacy. The Harlem Renaissance was not only a golden age of African American arts but a valiant effort to remove the masks of racial stereotypes in order to put a new face on African Americans. To a certain degree, it not only improved race relations somewhat (a nearly impossible task, given the entrenched racial prejudices of the day), but instilled a racial pride and nobility among African Americans whose lives the Harlem Renaissance touched.

The chief strategist and “voice” of this cultural movement was philosopher Alain Locke (1885–1954), who edited the premiere and pivotal anthology of the Harlem Renaissance, The New Negro: An Interpretation (1925), which is described later. As the first African American Rhodes Scholar in 1907, Locke studied abroad in Oxford (1907–1910) and the University of Berlin and the Collège de France (1910–1911), before receiving his PhD in philosophy from Harvard in 1918. Locke figures prominently in the Harlem Renaissance and served as its principal art critic, promoter, and power broker.

One can say that Alain Locke further democratized American democracy in paving the way for the Civil Rights movement. During the Jim Crow era of American apartheid, when civil rights were white rights (under Plessy v. Ferguson's “separate-but-equal” doctrine), Locke was the real genius behind the Harlem Renaissance, which David Levering Lewis (Pulitzer Prize-winning biographer of W. E. B. Du Bois) aptly characterized as a movement that sought to achieve “Civil Rights by Copyright.” As the acknowledged “dean” of the Harlem Renaissance, Locke may well be regarded as the Martin Luther King of African American culture. Locke’s anthology, The New Negro, has been hailed as the first “national book” of African Americans. He ingeniously used culture as a strategy for ameliorating racism and for winning the respect of powerful white elites as potential agents for social and political transformation.

The arc of the rise and fall of the Harlem Renaissance is imprecise. Coexisting with the Jazz Age, the Harlem Renaissance was made possible in part by powerful social forces that effected sweeping changes in America at this time, beginning with the end of World War I in 1918. Foremost among these forces was the Great Migration, a massive exodus of an estimated 13 million African Americans from the rural South to the urban North in the period between 1910 and 1930. These shifts in American demography resulted in the rise of a black middle class in major American cities, particularly in the Northeast. In the midst of this status revolution, one place stood out in particular: Harlem. With this sudden influx of blacks and capital, Harlem became the race capital of black America.

Harlem is a large sector of upper Manhattan in New York City. What was taking place in Harlem was the formation of a distinct racial consciousness. Locke characterized this psychic event in that “American Negroes have been a race more in name than in fact” or “more in sentiment than in experience,” reflecting a “common condition rather than a common consciousness.” In response to this “problem in common rather than a life in common,” the Harlem Renaissance offered African Americans their “first chances for group expression and self-determination” (The Critical Temper of Alain Locke, p. 6). The Harlem Renaissance succeeded in the first objective, but failed in the latter.

Parties played a major role both in Harlem night life and in the Renaissance itself, whose official inaugural began with a formal banquet. On March 21, 1924, Opportunity editor and sociologist Charles S. Johnson had invited a group of young writers and artists to a dinner party of the Writers Guild held in the Civic Club, a restaurant on 14 West Twelfth Street near Fifth Avenue in Harlem. The Civic Club was the only “upper crust” New York nightclub free of color or sex restrictions. The party was called to celebrate Jessie Redmon Fauset’s first novel, There is Confusion, and to recognize a newer school of writers that included Eric Walrond, Countee Cullen, Langston Hughes, and Gwendolyn Bennett.

Evidence suggests that it was Alain Locke himself who originally used the term “Renaissance” to characterize the Harlem cultural movement. In 1928, Locke revealed that, in 1924–1925, “the present writer [Locke] articulated these trends as a movement toward racial self-expression and cultural autonomy, styling it as the New Negro movement” (The Critical Temper of Alain Locke, p. 446). Published in 1925, Harlem: Mecca of the New Negro was an instant success. It sold an estimated 42,000 copies in two printings.

Capitalizing on this success, Locke expanded the special issue and recast it as an anthology in book form. The New Negro: An Interpretation (1925) was the inaugural and the epochal centerpiece of the New Negro movement. The New Negro featured 34 contributors, 4 of whom were white. The volume showcased most of the stellar figures of the Harlem Renaissance who went on to pursue independent literary and artistic careers in their own right. W. E. B. Du Bois contributed the final essay. Locke proclaimed The New Negro to be “our spiritual Declaration of Independence” (The Critical Temper of Alain Locke, p. 43).

The prime movers of the Harlem Renaissance believed that art held more promise than politics in bringing about a sea change in American race relations. Although their philosophies of art had shades of differences, their overlap intensified their commonality. As the chief proponent of the “talented tenth,” W. E. B. Du Bois was staunch in his conviction that art should serve the interests of the race. In “Criteria of Negro Art” (1926), Du Bois bluntly demands that art should be used explicitly for propaganda. In Locke’s view, the problem with propaganda is that it “harangues, cajoles, threatens, or supplicates” (The Critical Temper of Alain Locke, p. 27). It operates from a defensive posture. In his classic essay, “The Legacy of the Ancestral Arts,” in The New Negro, Locke proclaims what the function of art must be: “Art must discover and reveal the beauty which prejudice and caricature have overlaid. And all vital art discovers beauty and opens our eyes to that which previously we could not see” (The Critical Temper of Alain Locke, p. 258). Although it was true that the Harlem Renaissance enjoyed a “double audience,” the primary audience was white. In its purest form, beauty will be the vehicle of truth: “After Beauty, let Truth come into the Renaissance picture” (The Critical Temper of Alain Locke, p. 28).

In 1926, Langston Hughes published his manifesto, "The Negro Artist and the Racial Mountain," in the Nation, cited as a sacred text by the Black Arts Movement of the 1960s. Hughes takes a diffident, almost devil-may-care approach: "We younger Negro artists who create now intend to express our individual dark-skinned selves without fear or shame. If white people are pleased we are glad. If they are not, it doesn't matter. We know we are beautiful. And ugly too." Locke praised the essay as a "declaration of cultural independence" (The Critical Temper of Alain Locke, p. 446). In his preface to The Book of American Negro Poetry (1931), editor James Weldon Johnson wrote that each people is judged by the standard of its own culture. In his November 1928 Harper's Magazine essay, "Race Prejudice and the Negro Artist," Johnson argues that, while racism was being fought on educational, economic, political and sociological fronts, it is the African American artist who was charged with undermining racial prejudice. Johnson's philosophy of art accords with and synthesizes those of Du Bois and Locke in that producing "great" black art is a key to gaining a reciprocity of respect.

Art is a surplus of creative energy. Art requires support. Thus much of the creative work of black artists and writers was dependent on white patrons and persons of influence, who were key protagonists of the Harlem Renaissance. This is a remarkable fact. Legally barred from congregating socially, it was practically illegal for blacks and whites to have social relationships beyond the most impersonal kinds of interactions. White patrons played a key role in publishing for and marketing black arts to white consumers for their mutual enrichment. Carl Van Vechten was probably the pivotal white promoter of the Harlem Renaissance. In 1926, he published Nigger Heaven, a controversial novel about black life in Harlem. Van Vechten was often excoriated for the title. Nigger Heaven was partly a collaborative black-white effort: James Weldon Johnson and Walter White read the galley proofs, and poet Langston Hughes wrote verses to replace song lyrics that Van Vechten had used without permission, which prompted a lawsuit.

A patron of Alain Locke, Langston Hughes, Zora Neale Hurston, and others, Charlotte Osgood Mason was a secret benefactor of major Harlem Renaissance artists and writers. She eschewed publicity and forbade the very mention of her name. Instructing her patrons to refer to her affectionately as "Godmother," her purse had strings attached. This fact has jaundiced Harlem Renaissance art in the eyes of its critics, for Mason's obsession with African primitivism had to be satisfied. Nonetheless, Mason's patronage was the lifeblood of some of the key Renaissance figures.

"Negro poets and Negro poetry are two quite different things," Locke wrote in 1926. "Of the one, since Phyllis Wheatley, we have had a century and a half; of the other, since Dunbar, scarcely a generation" (The Critical Temper of Alain Locke, p. 43). The advent of a self-conscious "Negro poetry" by "Negro poets" helped cultivate the group consciousness that Locke found to be singularly lacking among African Americans historically yet developing rather suddenly in his generation. As Locke predicted, the Harlem Renaissance poets have entered into the canon of mainstream American literature.

A West Indian and British citizen, Claude McKay contributed the poem, "White House," to The New Negro anthology. Because of its politically sensitive nature, Locke changed the title to "White Houses." In his social protest poem, "To America," McKay personifies the United States as a tiger, racially terrible yet magnificent in its awesome power. McKay's greatest claim to fame is his military sonnet, "If We Must Die," which appeared in the July issue of the Liberator during the Red Summer of 1919, when race riots swept across 25 of the nation's inner cities like a firestorm. The poem, McKay says, "exploded out of me" and is now considered to be the inaugural address of the Harlem Renaissance. This poem took on the power of an anthem: it was reprinted by virtually every leading African American magazine and newspaper. McKay's sonnet surpassed his race when Winston Churchill used "If We Must Die" to rally British soldiers in battles against the Nazis in World War II.

Disinclined to identify himself as a Negro poet, Countee Cullen could not ignore the pain of the black experience. With Keats as his poetic idol, Cullen used white poetic forms, such as the sonnet, to solemnify that angst. Harper and Brothers published his first volume of poems, Colors, in 1925, which won the first Harmon Foundation Award in Literature in 1926. In Harvard Graduate School in 1926, Cullen took a course in versification from Robert Hillyer, who paid tribute to Cullen as the first American poet to publish a poem in rime royal. In 1926, Countee Cullen became assistant editor of Opportunity magazine, and began to write a regular column, "The Dark Tower." On April 9, 1928, Cullen married Nina Yolande, daughter of

W. E. B. Du Bois, in an event hailed as the social event of the decade. But the marriage was short-lived.

Acclaimed by many as the poet-laureate of the Harlem Renaissance, Langston Hughes was “discovered” in 1924 by poet Vachel Lindsay, who was Hughes’s literary idol. Hughes was a busboy at the time and had seized the opportunity to give Lindsay some poems when the latter dined at the Washington, D.C. hotel where Hughes worked. At a formal banquet hosted by Opportunity: A Journal of Negro Life (organ of the National Urban League) to present awards for its annual poetry contest, Langston Hughes won second prize for “The Weary Blues,” which became the title of the collection of poems published by Knopf in 1926 on the recommendation of Van Vechten, who personally hand-delivered the manuscript to the publisher and wrote the foreword as well. Locke credits Hughes with bringing about, for the first time, a “revelation of the emotional color of Negro life, and his brilliant discovery of the flow and rhythm of the modern and especially the city Negro, substituting the jazz figure and personality for the older plantation stereotype” (The Critical Temper of Alain Locke, p. 53).

Locke recognized the contribution of visual artists to the Harlem Renaissance: “The Negro artist thus found his place beside the poets and writers of the ‘New Negro’ movement, which in the late Twenties and through the Thirties galvanized Negro talent to strong and freshly creative expression” (The Critical Temper of Alain Locke, p. 192). Harlem Renaissance artists helped develop a visual vocabulary and grammar of images representing African Americans. In the 1925 Harlem issue of the Survey Graphic, Locke published seven portraits of Harlem folk, sketched by Winold Reiss. Son of Fritz Reiss, a landscape painter, Winold studied under Franz von Stuck of Munich. “Winold Reiss has achieved,” Locke claims, “what amounts to a revealing discovery of the significance, human and artistic, of one of the great dialects of human physiognomy, of some of the little understood but powerful idioms of nature’s speech” (The Critical Temper of Alain Locke, p. 17). Locke praises Reiss for achieving, through painting locally in Harlem, a “universality” of the human experience.

Acknowledged by some as the father of Black American visual art, Aaron Douglas was recognized by Locke as “the pioneer of the African Style among the American Negro artists” (The Critical Temper of Alain Locke, p. 177). In addition to being an illustrator, whose work first appeared in the Harlem issue and then in The New Negro, Douglas was a muralist, whose work appeared in Club Ebony in New York, in the Sherman Hotel in Chicago, and in Fisk University. In developing his distinctive style, Douglas contributed the illustrations to God’s Trombones (1927), by James Weldon Johnson, which features cycles of sermon-poems. Douglas drew on Egyptian and African art and was influenced by cubism, art deco, and art nouveau as well. These illustrations are considered to be Douglas’s finest work.

A bodybuilder as well as a writer, Jean Toomer was a biracial man, who could pass for white and ultimately did. In 1923, he published Cane, a novel set in Georgia, which Langston Hughes praised as the best prose ever written by an African American, and which Locke hailed as “a brilliant performance” (The Critical Temper of Alain Locke, p. 447). Toomer was a one-book author, whose career was abortive for personal reasons. In spiritual pursuit of the “four-conscinal” and “illuminant” Absolute, Toomer subsequently became a follower of the mystic Gurdjieff and married a wealthy white woman, Margery Latimer. When James Weldon Johnson invited Toomer to contribute to a revised edition of The Book of American Negro Poetry (1931), Toomer refused, no longer wishing to identify himself as a Negro.

Born of a Danish mother and a West Indian father, Nella Larsen won the Harmon Foundation’s Bronze Medal for Literature in 1929 for her novel Quicksand (1928), which W. E. B. Du Bois acclaimed as comparable in quality to the fictional works of Charles Chesnutt. Although legally black, she had loyalties to both races, a theme of racial fusion and confusion explored in Quicksand, in which the main character, Helga Crane, is a full projection of Larsen herself. Locke describes Quicksand as a “study of the cultural conflict of mixed ancestry” and hails it as a “truly social document of importance” illuminating “the problem of divided social loyalties and... the conflict of cultures” (The Critical Temper of Alain Locke, p. 202–3). In 1930, she became the first black woman to win a Guggenheim Fellowship.

There are more than 130 published plays by 37 Harlem Renaissance authors. On May 22, 1921, Shuffle Along opened on Broadway’s David Belasco Theater. With lyrics written by Noble Sissle and music by Eubie Blake, Shuffle Along became the first musical revue scored and performed by African Americans. It launched the careers of Josephine Baker and Florence Mills. Locke distinguished three plays as “outstanding”: Eugene O’Neill’s Emperor Jones, Paul Green’s Pulitzer Prize-winning In Abraham's Bosom, and DuBose Heyward's Charleston folk-drama, Porgy.

The year 1929 was a big one for Harlem renaissance drama: the Negro Experimental Theatre founded in February, the Negro Art Theatre formed in June, and the National Colored Players was created in September. That same year, Wallace Thurman collaborated with white journalist and playwright, William Jourdan Rapp to write a murder melodrama, Harlem. Produced with an all-black cast (except for a white policeman), the Broadway performances of Harlem proved a significant milestone in the development of black drama. It opened at the Apollo Theater on Broadway and was a huge success.

The Harlem Renaissance arose during the period of American progressivism, with its faith in the reform of democracy. Ultimately, the Harlem Renaissance crashed along with the stock market in the early years of the Great Depression, and its failure to effect any real social change was dramatically underscored by the Harlem riot of 1935. Without a unifying ideology, it was given over to exoticism and exhibitionism and failed in its stated mission to solve the racial crisis through cultural diplomacy. It was not so much that the Harlem Renaissance failed; rather it was America that failed the Harlem Renaissance. This failed impact was the fate of modernist movements in general, which sought to create a social conscience for the age of modernity. Yet Houston A. Baker sees the publication of Locke's The New Negro (1925) as a success in its own right. The Harlem Renaissance created a place in the national literary tradition, officially recognized in the March 13, 2002 "White House Salute to America's Authors" event, which paid tribute to writers of the Harlem Renaissance who created rich art and became agents of social change. Its cultural diplomacy became a cultural legacy.

Hayes, Rutherford B.

Rutherford Birchard Hayes (1822–1893) was the 19th president of the United States from 1877–1881. He was born in Delaware County, Ohio, on October 4, 1822. Hayes graduated from Kenyon College and Harvard Law in 1842 and 1845, respectively. He began practicing law in Lower Sandusky, Ohio in 1845. In 1849, Hayes moved to Cincinnati where he built a lucrative law practice and worked in city government.

Once the civil war began, Hayes became commander of the Ohio Volunteer Army on the side of the Union. He fought on the side of the North throughout the entire Civil War conflict. Hayes served in the U.S. House as a Republican representative from 1865 to 1867. He had a reputation throughout his entire life for honesty. He had refused to leave his command in the Civil War in order to campaign for Congress. While Hayes served in the U.S. Congress, he openly supported the Fourteenth Amendment that extended civil rights to African Americans and the passage of Freedman's Bureau Bill. He also supported the amendment to override President Andrew Johnson who Hayes felt had succumbed to the pressures of former confederates.

Hayes served two nonconsecutive terms as governor of Ohio from 1868 to 1872 and from 1876 to 1877. He campaigned and fought hard against tremendous opposition as governor for universal suffrage of African American males and for their fair treatment. As governor of Ohio, Hayes supported President Ulysses S. Grant's sympathetic policies toward minorities, such as the use of the army to break up the Ku Klux Klan. Hayes attempted to generate support in the U.S. Congress for Grant's attempt to peaceably acquire Santo Domingo as a voluntary place of refuge for African Americans to escape the racism of the South.

Hayes became President of the United States in 1877, largely because of the votes of African Americans; however, most predicted that Democrat Samuel J. Tilden would win the presidential election of 1876. Tilden actually won the popular vote by about 250,000 votes. The Electoral College votes were contested in the states of South Carolina, Louisiana, Florida, and Oregon, which were states with large numbers of African American voters. Either candidate had to have at least 185 Electoral College votes to win. Initially, Tilden had 184; Hayes had 165. A total of 20 Electoral College votes were from the contested states. After several weeks of negotiations, Hayes won the election after he agreed to remove Union troops from the South, appoint at least one Southerner to a cabinet post, and to construct a transcontinental railroad through the South to rebuild its economy. This agreement is known as the Compromise of 1877 and it brought about an end to Civil War Reconstruction.

After the Compromise of 1877, the South, with the exception of African Americans, almost entirely voted Democratic until the Presidency of Lyndon B. Johnson. The compromise proved to be a step backward for African Americans. Contrary to Hayes's approval, many of the reforms instituted since the Civil War were rescinded. Jim Crow laws were instituted and upheld as constitutional under a "separate but equal" jurisprudence. Hayes continued throughout his entire presidency to fight against the suppression of the rights of African Americans. He was successful during his presidency in getting legislation passed in 1879 that allowed female attorneys, regardless of race, to argue cases before the Supreme Court. He did not seek reelection in 1880, keeping his pledge that he would not run for a second term. Hayes left office on March 4, 1881. He died on Tuesday January 17, 1893.

Hill, Anita

Anita Faye Hill (1956–), currently a professor in the Heller School for Social Policy and Management at Brandeis University, was a former colleague of Supreme Court Justice Clarence Thomas who courageously accused him of sexual harassment and gave testimony in this regard during Thomas's 1991 Senate confirmation hearing. Born on a farm in Murriss, Oklahoma, on July 30, 1956, Hill earned an undergraduate degree in psychology from Oklahoma State University in 1977. During her matriculation at Oklahoma State, Hill had served as an intern for a local judge, and this experience spawned her interest in law. In 1980, she earned her JD degree from Yale University and, in the same year, Hill was admitted to the DC Bar. She became a practicing lawyer with the firm of Ward, Hardraker, and Ross in Washington, D.C. By 1981, Hill was special counsel to the assistant secretary of the Department of Education's Office for Civil Rights where she began working, for the first time, with Clarence Thomas. According to her sworn testimony 10 years later, Thomas began making repeated sexual advances and lewd remarks to her.

When Thomas became chair of the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission, Hill served as his adviser and, according to her testimony, his sexual harassment of her intensified. The lewd and vulgar remarks Hill recalled during the Senate confirmation hearing including vivid descriptions of pornographic movie scenes and an infamous joke about a pubic hair Thomas claimed to have found on a Coke can. Hill served as Thomas's assistant from 1982 to 1983 before accepting a faculty position at Oral Roberts University in Tulsa, where she served as an assistant professor of civil rights from 1983 to 1986. In 1986, Hill accepted a position as a professor specializing in contract law at the University of Oklahoma. By 1991, she quickly became a household name when President George H. W. Bush nominated Clarence Thomas to replace Thurgood Marshall on the U.S. Supreme Court. On September 3, 1991, Hill was approached by the Senate Judiciary Committee to provide background information on Clarence Thomas. Although she initially did not divulge details, when prompted by investigators to discuss rumors of sexual harassment and improper conduct on the part of Thomas, Hill cooperated with the Senate Judiciary Committee on September 9. She was later interviewed by the FBI in the midst of the confirmation hearings. Thomas denied all allegations made by Hill and claimed that he was the victim of a "high-tech lynching." After extensive investigation and debate, the Senate confirmed Thomas by the narrow margin of 52–48.

In March 1992, American Spectator published an article by David Brock that claimed Hill had lied and exaggerated during the hearings and infamously stated she might be "a bit nutty and a bit slutty." In 1993, Brock expanded these claims into a book-length diatribe entitled, The Real Anita Hill. After repudiating his own book and personally apologizing to Hill, Brock published a book-length commentary on the entire affair entitled Blinded by the Right: The Conscience of an Ex-Conservative (2002). Hill's own book, Speaking Truth to Power (1997), offers an insightful view of the events surrounding the Thomas confirmation and the experiences Hill had with sexual harassment. Most recently, Hill serves as a professor of Social Policy, Law, and Women's Studies at Brandeis University in Massachusetts and, in 2008, she was awarded the Louis P. and Evelyn Smith First Amendment Award by the Ford Hall Forum. See also: Thomas, Clarence

Hip-Hop

When someone mentions the term "hip-hop," it either garners interest, disdain, or indifference. Many people are curious about what it is, what it does, and how it functions. People often mistake hip-hop as a music form, but it is not. Hip-hop is a culture, with its own lexicon, ideology, and aesthetic. Simply put, hip-hop includes a dance style (breaking and pop locking, among others), graffiti and tagging, and rap music. Founded in New York City's area of the South Bronx in the 1970s, rap music was the cultural backlash to disco's prominence in the national and urban music scene. Before rap music emerged onto the music scene of New York City's Harlem and South Bronx streets, there was already a counterculture—a subculture—that was percolating. Urban art was in full expression, whether it was dance, music, poetry, or painting. Amidst the ugliness and the decay of New York City that existed as a result of several failed economic policies and the many aftereffects of the Vietnam War, many already marginalized black, Asian and Latino youths found beauty in their new meaning for existence, their new voice. It was performed with passion and pursued with a vision for having something to call their own, something no one could take from them, something different and unique. This energy is what contributed to the creation of a new culture: hip-hop.

Considered the founding father of rap music and hip-hop culture, DJ Kool Herc had no initial intentions of creating a musical and cultural phenomenon. What was supposed to be a commonplace back-to-school party turned into the beginning of a cultural revolution. What Kool Herc created in the park of Sedgwick and Cedar Streets in the South Bronx simply evolved out of innovation and invention. His crew, the Herculords, included his famous sound system, MCs and dancers, while he managed the turntables. During intermissions, Kool Herc would maintain the crowd's interest by keeping them on the dance floor. Breakdancing, called B-Boying (and B-Girling), was an opportunity for dance crews to battle and flaunt new moves and styles. Herc's use of the break beat, the instrumental break in a song, was a highlight at his parties and shows. Another of Kool Herc's highlights was his ability to rap to the crowd. "Rap" is the slang term for "talk," and Herc's West Indian (Jamaican) cultural roots influenced the way he deejayed. In the Caribbean tradition of "toasting," the deejay raps over a break beat to keep the crowd motivated. In addition, the important aspect of toasting is the call-and-response element, which connects the deejay to his audience and vice versa. Herc's rival deejay was Flash, who also excelled in using break beats. Flash's advantage was that he could mix and scratch faster than anyone else, hence his name. His prowess earned him the title grandmaster, which indicates that he is the best at his skill. Grandmaster Flash and his crew, The Furious Five, were the stuff of legend. With Flash and his crew making history in Harlem and Herc's crew controlling the Bronx, interested people from every corner of New York City's five boroughs (Manhattan, Bronx, Brooklyn, Queens, Staten Island) would flock to sold-out, thereby spreading the culture and its elements.

Hip-hop is an organic culture that is steeped in the art of improvisation and innovation, creative intelligence, and artistic flair. Deemed as a culture by Afrika Bambaataa of the Zulu Nation, hip-hop exists as a cultural entity that requires active participation and involvement in order for it to thrive. Similar to the theological tenets of Christian and Muslim faiths, hip-hop culture also had its tenets, termed the five elements. It was determined that there are five elements of the culture, which are requisite for its existence: the deejay, the MC, the B-Boy (or B-Girl) breaker, the graffiti artist, and the knowledge of self. The five elements were not instantaneously identified and labeled until after the establishment of hip-hop as a culture. Afrika Bambaataa and the Zulu Nation were supporters of the Five Percent Nation of Islam, which was an offshoot of the Nation of Islam. The religion was founded by Clarence 13X, a former disciple of the Nation of Islam. It is also noted that the Zulu Nation is the world's oldest and largest grassroots hip-hop organization; its primary purpose is to promote knowledge, peace, and understanding among those within the hip-hop community.

Deejays (DJ = disk jockey) are the focal point of the culture, because without them, there is no music. Interestingly, it was the famed DJ Luvbug Starski who coined the term "hip-hop." There were many aspiring MCs and dancers, but they needed the deejay's permission to perform for the crowd. If the deejay thought a person's skills were lacking, s/he was instantly dismissed. Therefore, the deejay functioned as a filter, controlling who was going to be heard and who was not. By the time hip-hop gained enough attention to be on the radio, New York City deejays such as Red Alert and Mister Magic used their positions on rival radio stations to promote their respective crews, Boogie Down Productions (BDP) and the Juice Crew. Another important element of deejaying is being able to perform on the turntables. Grand Wizzard Theodore invented the scratch entirely by accident. While in his room practicing, his mother called him and he simply scratched the record by stopping it from spinning—hence the beginning of what DJ Babu of the Dilated Peoples later termed as "turntablism," or turntable arts.

Turntable arts have progressed significantly since the advent of Grandmaster Flash. Other than the ones already mentioned, notable DJs are Jam Master Jay of RUN-DMC, DJ Scratch of EPMD, Master Don, DJ Bobcat, Spinderella of Salt-n-Pepa, Q-Bert, the X-ecutioners, DJ Jazzy Jeff, DJ Steve Dee, and Cocoa Chanelle. A quality hip-hop deejay must also be able to function as the catalyst at parties. If the deejay was in a rap group, s/he often had the responsibility of producing the songs. Because of this overlap, several of the aforementioned producers are also deejays; however, some producers are better recognized for their music production, such as DJ Premier, Dr. Dre, DJ Marley Marl, Da Beatminerz, and DJ Quik. The DJ and production duo the Awesome 2 are also recognized by the Paley Center for Media (Museum of Television and Radio) for having the longest running hip-hop radio program in radio history.

If the deejay is the focal point, the MC is the second in command. The abbreviation MC has been said to stand for master of ceremony, microphone controller, microphone checka', move the crowd, and microphone commander. Whatever the case, anyone who considers himself or herself an MC has to prove lyrical prowess and deftness. Because of the fierce competition, it was common to witness a battle between aspiring MCs. The title MC had to be earned, not simply applied. Unbeknownst to them, the historic battle between MC Busy Bee and Kool Moe Dee of the Treacherous Three determined which standard and criteria aspiring MCs were going to follow. Moe Dee's aggressive, witty, and rapid-fire lyrics set the precedent for future MCs to this day. Similar to playing the dozens, MC battles required lyrical skill and wit in the form of signifying; they were unscripted and unrehearsed lyrical contests in which the crowd decided the winner. There are many rappers who are not MCs, but every MC is a rapper. In current times, the MC garners so much attention that the DJ's visibility has fallen by the wayside.

In the 1990s, it became common to see rap groups sans a DJ; however, some groups still adhere to the tradition. Some notable MCs are Pebble Poo, Melle Mel, MC Lyte, Rakim, KRS-ONE, Queen Latifah, LL Cool J, Ice Cube, Scarface, Lauryn Hill, Big L, Buckshot of Black Moon, Too $hort, Nas, Big Daddy Kane, Common, Ludacris, Roxanne Shante, Mos Def, Wu-Tang Clan, Jay-Z, Ice-T, T. I., Big Punisher, Tupac, Bahamdia, Notorious B.I.G, Da Brat, the LOX, Grandmaster Caz, and Black Thought of the Roots. Being a quality MC means that one has to be original and authentic and possess a style atypical of the mainstream. There is a difference between being unique and being odd or strange; if an MC's style is too farfetched, it will not be readily accepted, but if it is intriguing, it will be a signature style. For example, Wu-Tang Clan's late member Old Dirty Bastard named himself as such because there was no father to his style. The MC has been made synonymous with the West African griot or storyteller, and, like the griot, s/he has the responsibility of properly representing his/her people and their history. MCs that appropriate or misuse their talents are harshly criticized as sellouts and are demoted to being considered as mere rappers.

Much like the generational and controversial dances of years past, such as the jitterbug and the twist, breaking itself became a cultural phenomenon. Breaking in its current form involves many sophisticated movements and techniques that emphasize finesse and acrobatics. Moves such as top rocking, down rocking, power moves, and freezes are standard basics of the dance form. The term “B-Boy” stands for Bronx boy, break boy or beat boy, but because dancers waited for the break beat in a song play to showcase their moves, the term break dancing became synonymous with B-noying. It is debatable whether there is an historical, concrete location of place for the history of breaking; however, it has always been considered a manifestation of African dance. Its modern form was first noticed in the late 1960s and early 1970s in California and New York. After gaining much visibility performing in public places, such as sidewalks, public parks, subway platforms, breaking New York City was almost commonplace. The interest in breaking, which the mainstream considered a new dance craze, quickly caught the attention of corporate America and Hollywood.

In 1983, the films Flashdance, Style Wars, and Wild Style were released nationwide. The 1984 film Beat Street was also released with much success. The West Coast style of breaking was also on the scene and was made more popular in the 1984 Hollywood films Breakin’ and Breakin’ 2: The Electric Boogaloo. Before the films, breaking was already gaining national attention. The 1976 television series What’s Happening! also brought the early forms of breaking into America’s homes, with the character Rerun, who was a breaker that specialized in popping and locking. The actual character, Fred Berry, was a member of a breaking crew. James Brown was also credited with inspiring breaking with his 1969 hit, “The Good Foot,” which many breakers danced to. James Brown himself also danced with a remarkable flair, which laid the foundation for classic footwork moves.

It is important to note that the history of African American dance was steeped in the inventive and creative spirit. Whether it was a classic jitterbug or softshoe step, African American dance embodied a unique spirit and essence, which many have linked to the history of slavery and oppression. Breaking’s ethnic origins have been linked to Brazilian capoeira, a traditional martial arts dance that was performed by African slaves. The spirit and inventiveness of breaking, however, has an apparent connection to that of African American tap dancing. The tap dance challenges and routines made famous by notable figures like the Nicholas Brothers and Howard “Sandman” Sims were equally inventive and uncharacteristic, and they were constantly evolving and developing new movements. Breaking is an ever-evolving dance form, but it remains true to its roots and traditional structure. Offshoots of breaking that have gained popularity are clown dancing and krumping. Similar to B-Boy culture, their crews are called fam (short for family), and they are predominantly based on battling and street/public performance. All of these dance forms have gained an international audience, and there are films and performers that hail from many nations and continents. One B-Boy crew that arguably has the most recognition worldwide is the Rock Steady Crew, which was founded in 1977 in the Bronx. They have members nationwide and in several international locations, such as Japan, Italy, and the United Kingdom.

Graffiti became tied to hip-hop culture, but it is not exclusive to it. The meaning of graffiti is simply illicit writing on public property. Examples of graffiti have also been found in ancient sites in Turkey, Egypt, Syria, and Greece. Some art historians, anthropologists, and archeologists have classified historical artifacts and places such as cave paintings, tomb writings, and the landmark El Morro National Monument as representations of historic graffiti forms; however, in its modern form, it was considered a cultural nuisance. As urban graffiti became more popular, artists looked for ways to make their work more technologically advanced and noticeable. In New York City, the trains became mobile canvases for graffiti artists; some painted entire sides of subway cars (called bombing) with their trademark designs and signatures (known as tags).

Two graffiti artists who are credited with starting the New York City graffiti movement are Julio 204 and TAKI 183, whose scrawlings were visible throughout parts of the city. In addition to featuring legendary MCs and breakers, the film Wild Style also featured legendary graffiti artists such as Dondi (Donald White), Lady Pink (Sandra Fabara), and Lee Quiñones. These artists have since gained prominence and recognition for their talent and have had their works displayed in some of the most notable museums and art galleries, such as the Metropolitan Museum of Art, the Whitney Museum, and the Brooklyn Museum of Art. Dondi was incredibly prolific before his untimely death in 1998. Fabara and Quiñones also have a wealth of material that remains on display in permanent collections. Lady Pink was considered a trailblazer for women graffiti artists, which, like other hip-hop elements, tends to be predominantly male. Her presence paved the way for current graffiti artists of fame and infamy such as Los Angeles’s graffiti queen Tribe. Because it is illegal and considered a form of vandalism, many graffiti artists work under an alias.

In the August 2008 arrest of Danielle Bremner (aka “Dani” and “Utah”) and her husband Jim Clay Harper (aka “Ether”) for graffiti vandalism, they were listed as wanted criminals in the cities of New York, Boston, Pittsburgh, Chicago, London, Madrid, Frankfurt, and Hamburg. Graffiti culture is its own subculture, and it will likely never be accepted as art in mainstream society. It has been termed street art and guerilla art, but neither term has further legitimized it. Because hip-hop is a culture that is lived and not performed, it is not uncommon for deejays and breakers to also be graffiti artists; when people engage with the culture, they often explore its various facets and components. For example, Rock Steady Crew DJ JS-1 was well known as a graffiti artist under the alias “Jerms,” and the rap group the Artifacts were known taggers and bombers. The 2007 documentary film Bomb It! features many notable and legendary graffiti artists who talk about graffiti’s history from ancient eras to contemporary times.

Hip-hop culture has often been criticized for its commercial value, but it also has plenty of substance. Brand Nubian’s 1998 album Foundation featured in its liner notes the phrase “Do the Knowledge.” Similar to the beliefs espoused by African American intellectuals such as W. E. B. Du Bois and Mary Church Terrell, many figures in hip-hop culture also espouse the values of pursuing an education. Furthermore, emphasis is placed on learning African American history and culture, which was considered necessary for understanding one’s place in American society.

During the politically volatile 1980s and 1990s, ideologies from the black arts movement and the Black Power movement were particularly celebrated and acknowledged as important beliefs. Groups such as Public Enemy, Boogie Down Productions, and X-Clan were vocal about the miseducation in the nation’s school systems, where European history and values were taught, almost exclusively. RUN-DMC was known for their crossover hit “Walk This Way” on the 1986 album Raising Hell. The album’s final track, however, is “Proud to Be Black,” which celebrates the successes and triumphs of key African American such as George Washington Carver, Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King, Benjamin Banneker, Malcolm X, Harriet Tubman, Jesse Owens, and Muhammad Ali. Boogie Down Productions’ frontman, KRS-ONE, often promoted black empowerment in his lyrics. His song “You Must Learn” on his 1989 Ghetto

Music album also talks about African American inventors not taught in schools such as Eli Whitney, Madame CJ Walker, Garrett Morgan, and Charles Drew. On this album KRS vehemently attacks the education system posing rhetorical questions in songs “Why Is That?” and “Who Protects Us from You?”; the former song discusses the history of blacks being intentionally omitted from Western history, including the Bible, and the latter was inspired by the ever-present police brutality and Tiananmen Square incident in China. In both songs, KRS encourages his audience to ask important questions to those persons who are considered to have authority, and he asserts that blacks have to take responsibility for their education and safety.

During the 1980s and 1990s, there were concerted efforts to organize hip-hop political movements. Two successful movements were the Stop the Violence Movement, which was the proponent of ending street violence and the gold boycott, which was to force the jewelry industry to divest from Apartheid South Africa. Instead, many sported African medallions, Kente cloth clothing, and also made music about worldwide racial discrimination. The energy of the teens and young adults in the hip-hop community was fueled by their affinity for rebellion and resistance. Some rappers, like Paris, endorsed the Black Panther Party’s ideologies. X-Clan showed photos of Patrice Lumumba, an armed Harriet Tubman, and Fidel Castro in their video “Heed the Word of the Brother.” In this song, they also accuse Aristotle, Plato, and Socrates of stealing their knowledge from Africans and are told to “step off” at the song’s conclusion. Queen Latifah’s 1989 album All Hail the Queen has an insignia of Africa, colored in black, with red and green lettering encircling it. Her music video for the song “Ladies First” shows footage of antiapartheid protests in South Africa and features a slideshow of African American civil rights leaders, such as Harriet Tubman and Angela Davis. The fervor of Nelson Mandela’s 1990 release also encouraged many in the hip-hop community to struggle for civil rights. Ice Cube’s monumental 1990 album AmeriKKK’s Most Wanted champions Maoist ideologies for political resistance. Education was considered a civil right, and in addition to the aforementioned groups, others such as Dead Prez, Black Star, A Tribe Called Quest, The Roots, LL Cool J, Nas, GangStarr, Dilated Peoples, Arrested Development, Chamillionaire, Master-P, Eve, and Native Tongues have released material that focuses on pertinent issues in the African American community (violence, education, racism and discrimination, the HIV/AIDS epidemic, etc.). Recent political topics have included the 2005 Hurricane Katrina devastation, the 2006 Shawn Bell shooting in New York City, and Barack Obama's 2008 presidential campaign and election win.

Although it was once deemed a fad, hip-hop has proven to be a viable cultural institution. More than three decades have passed since its inception and it is likely to persevere for generations to come. Representations of hip-hop culture can be seen throughout the world, whether DJ Honda from Japan or the Cookie Crew from London, the first international female MCs. There is also a strong hip-hop presence in Germany and other parts of Eastern Europe where graffiti artists and B-Boys are everpresent at parties and showcases. India's Panjabi MC has had two major U.S. hits with MCs Sha Stimuli ("Stop What You Doin," 2004) and Jay-Z ("Beware the Boys," 2005). British singer M.I.A., who is of Sri Lankan Tamil descent, creates music that has obvious connections and ties to hip-hop culture. There is a Hispanic hip-hop presence throughout most of the Americas and the Caribbean, which has allowed for the success of the hip-hop-infused Reggaeton, a Rap-Reggae-Spanish hybrid form of music. MCs such as Ivy Queen, Tego Calderón, Don Omar, and Daddy Yankee have established themselves as iconic figures; however, it was Panama's El General who pioneered the genre in the early 1990s. In the United States, there have been creative attempts to fuse rap with jazz (American classical music), techno, country music, gospel, blues, and European classical music.

Just as jazz music was controversial in its beginnings, hip-hop has also encountered naysayers and critics. As a form of African American artistic expression, hip-hop culture continues to thrive and excel beyond people's expectations. It is a multibillion dollar industry; however, it is still marginalized as a culture by the mainstream. Furthermore, there are more concerted attempts for black artists to have legal ownership of their art and to have more creative control than black artists had in the past. Still, there is a significant gap between hip-hop as product and hip-hop as culture. Those who consume hip-hop as product are likely disconnected from the culture and the people who live it. Although the product is important and allows for creative exposure, it has too often been the target of criticism for celebrating misogyny, violence, materialism, and use of the word "nigger" or "nigga." Many producers' sample music also leaves distaste in musical purists' mouths. Hip-hop culture has a different focus, in which the culture is not defined by acts of social deviancy and self-denigration. Because of the financial incentive, there are irreconcilable differences between those who wish to preserve the integrity of the culture and those who continue to exploit it for personal gain. Whatever hip-hop culture's future, it will certainly remain a viable and influential form of black artistic expression.

Historically Black Colleges and Universities

These institutions were created under the laws of segregation and before 1964 with the express purpose of educating African Americans. From their arrival on the shores of the United States, black people have thirsted for knowledge and viewed education as the key to their freedom. These enslaved people pursued various forms of education despite rules, in all Southern states, barring them from learning to read and write. A few black colleges appeared immediately before the Civil War, such as Lincoln and Cheyney Universities in Pennsylvania and Wilberforce in Ohio. With the end of the Civil War, the daunting task of providing education to more than 4 million formerly enslaved people was shouldered by both the federal government, through the Freedman's Bureau, and many northern church missionaries. As early as 1865, the Freedmen's Bureau began establishing black colleges, resulting in staff and teachers with primarily military backgrounds. During the postbellum period, most black colleges were so in name only; these institutions generally provided primary and secondary education, a feature that was true of most historically white colleges—starting with Harvard—during the first decades of their existence.

As noted, religious missionary organizations—some affiliated with northern white denominations such as the Baptists and Congregationalists and some with black churches such as the African Methodist Episcopal and the African Methodist Episcopal Zion—were actively working with the Freedmen's Bureau. Two of the most prominent white organizations were the American Baptist Home Mission Society and the American Missionary Association, but there were many others as well. White northern missionary societies founded black colleges such as Fisk University in Nashville, Tennessee, and Spelman College in Atlanta, Georgia. The benevolence of the missionaries was tinged with self-interest and sometimes racism. Their goals in establishing these colleges were to Christianize the freedmen (i.e., convert former enslaved people to their brand of Christianity) and to rid the country of the “menace” of uneducated African Americans. Among the colleges founded by black denominations were Morris Brown in Georgia, Paul Quinn in Texas, and Allen University in South Carolina. Unique among American colleges, these institutions were founded by African Americans for African Americans. Because these institutions relied on less support from whites, they were able to design their own curricula; however, they also were more vulnerable to economic instability.

With the passage of the second Morrill Act in 1890, the federal government again took an interest in black education, establishing public black colleges. This act stipulated that those states practicing segregation in their public colleges and universities would forfeit federal funding unless they established agricultural and mechanical institutions for the black population. Despite the wording of the Morrill Act, which called for the equitable division of federal funds, these newly founded institutions received less funding than their white counterparts and thus had inferior facilities. Among the 17 new “land grant” colleges were institutions such as Florida Agricultural and Technical University and Alabama Agricultural and Mechanical University.

At the end of the 19th century, private black colleges had exhausted funding from missionary sources. Simultaneously, a new form of support emerged, that of white northern industrial philanthropy. Among the leaders of industry who initiated this type of support were John D. Rockefeller, Andrew Carnegie, Julius Rosenwald, and John Slater. These industry captains were motivated by both Christian benevolence and a desire to control all forms of industry. The organization making the largest contribution to black education was the General Education Board (GEB), a conglomeration of northern white philanthropists, established by John D. Rockefeller Sr. but spearheaded by John D. Rockefeller Jr. Between 1903 and 1964, the GEB gave more than $63,000,000 to black colleges, an impressive figure, but nonetheless only a fraction of what they gave to white institutions. Regardless of their personal motivations, the funding system that these industrial moguls created showed a strong tendency to control black education for their benefit—to produce graduates who were skilled in the trades that served their own enterprises (commonly known as industrial education). Above all, the educational institutions they supported were extremely careful not to upset the segregationist power structure that ruled the South by the 1890s. Black colleges such as Tuskegee and Hampton were showcases of industrial education. It was here that students learned how to shoe horses, make dresses, cook, and clean under the leadership of individuals like Samuel Chapman Armstrong (Hampton) and Booker T. Washington (Tuskegee).

The philanthropists' support of industrial education was in direct conflict with many black intellectuals who favored a liberal arts curriculum. Institutions such as Fisk, Dillard, Howard, Spelman, and Morehouse were more focused on the liberal arts curriculum favored by W. E. B. Du Bois than on Booker T. Washington's emphasis on advancement through labor and self-sufficiency. Whatever the philosophical disagreements may have been between Washington and Du Bois, the two educational giants did share a goal of educating African Americans and uplifting their race. Their differing approaches might be summarized as follows: Washington favored educating blacks in the industrial arts so they might become self-sufficient as individuals, whereas Du Bois wanted to create an intellectual elite in the top ten percent of the black population (the “talented tenth”) to lead the race as a whole toward self-determination.

Beginning around 1915, there was a shift in the attitude of the industrial philanthropists, who started to turn their attention to those black colleges that emphasized the liberal arts. Realizing that industrial education could exist side by side with a more academic curriculum, the philanthropists opted to spread their money (and therefore their influence) throughout the educational system. The pervasive influence of industrial philanthropy in the early 20th century created a conservative environment on many black college campuses—one that would seemingly tolerate only those administrators (typically white men) who accommodated segregation. But attention from the industrial philanthropists was not necessarily welcomed by institutions like Fisk University, where rebellions ensued against autocratic presidents who were assumed by students to be puppets of the philanthropists. In spite of these conflicts, industrial philanthropists provided major support for private black colleges up until the late 1930s.

At this time, the industrial philanthropists turned their attention elsewhere. In response, Frederick D. Patterson, then president of the Tuskegee Institute, suggested that the nation's private black colleges join together in their fundraising efforts. As a result, in 1944, the presidents of 29 black colleges created the United Negro College Fund (UNCF). The UNCF began solely as a fundraising organization but eventually took on an advocacy role as well.

Until the Brown v. Board of Education decision in 1954, both public and private black colleges in the South remained segregated by law and were the only educational option for African Americans. Although most colleges and universities did not experience the same violent fallout from the Brown decision as southern public schools, they were greatly affected by the decision. The Supreme Court's landmark ruling meant that black colleges would be placed in competition with white institutions in their efforts to recruit black students. With the triumph of the idea of integration, many began to call black colleges into question and label them vestiges of segregation. Desegregation proved slow, however, with public black colleges maintaining their racial makeup well into the current day. In the state of Mississippi, for example, the Fordice case was mired in the court system for almost 25 years, with a final decision rendered in 2004. The case, which reached the United States Supreme Court, asked whether Mississippi had met its affirmative duty under the Fourteenth Amendment's Equal Protection Clause to dismantle its prior dual university system. Despite ample evidence to the contrary, the high court decided that the answer was yes. Although the Fordice case applied only to those public institutions within the 5th District, it had a rippling effect within most southern states, resulting in stagnant funding levels for public black colleges and limited inroads by African Americans into predominantly white institutions.

After the Brown decision, private black colleges, which have always been willing to accept students from all backgrounds if the law would allow, struggled to defend issues of quality in an atmosphere that labeled anything all black as inferior. Many black colleges also suffered from "brain drain," as predominately white institutions in the North and some in the South made efforts to attract the top 10 percent of their students to their institutions once racial diversity became valued within higher education.

The black college of the 1960s was a much different place than that of the 1920s. The leadership switched from white to black and, because blacks had more control over funding, there was greater tolerance for dissent and black self-determination. On many public and private black college campuses throughout the South, students were staging sit-ins and protesting against segregation and its manifestations throughout the region. Most prominent were the four black college students from North Carolina A & T who refused to leave a segregated Woolworth lunch counter in 1960.

During the 1960s, the federal government took a greater interest in black colleges. In an attempt to provide clarity, the 1965 Higher Education Act defined a black college as an institution whose primary mission was the education of African Americans. The recognition of the uniqueness of black colleges implied in this definition has led to increased federal funding for these institutions.

Another federal intervention on behalf of black colleges took place in 1980 when President Jimmy Carter signed Executive Order 12232, which established a national program to alleviate the effects of discriminatory treatment and to strengthen and expand black colleges to provide quality education. Since this time, every U.S. president has provided funding to black colleges through this program. President George H. W. Bush followed up on Carter's initiative in 1989, signing Executive Order 12677, which created the Presidential Advisory Board on Historically Black Colleges and Universities to advise the president and the secretary of education on the future of these institutions.

Currently, more than 300,000 students attend the nation's 105 historically black colleges (40 public four-year, 11 public two-year, 49 private four-year, and 5 private 2-year institutions). This amounts to 28 percent of all African American college students. Overall, the parents of black students at black colleges have much lower incomes than those of parents of black students at predominantly white institutions. Many researchers who study black colleges, however, have found that African Americans who attend black colleges have higher levels of self-esteem and find their educational experience more nurturing. Moreover, graduates of black colleges are more likely to continue their education and pursue graduate degrees than their counterparts at predominantly white institutions. Despite the fact that only 28 percent of African American college students attend black colleges, these institutions produce the majority of our nation's African American judges, lawyers, doctors, and teachers.

Black colleges in the 21st century are remarkably diverse and serve varied populations. Although most of these institutions maintain their historically black traditions, on average 13 percent of their students are white. Because of their common mission (that of racial uplift), they are often lumped together and treated as a monolithic entity, causing them to be unfairly judged by researchers, the media, and policymakers. Just as predominantly white institutions are varied in their mission and quality, so are the nation's black colleges. Today, the leading black colleges cater to those students who could excel at any top tier institution regardless of racial makeup. Other institutions operate with the needs of black students in the surrounding region in mind. And some maintain an open enrollment policy, reaching out to those students who would have few options elsewhere in the higher education system.

Hoover, J. Edgar

The longest serving bureaucrat in history, Federal Bureau of Investigation Director J. Edgar Hoover (1895–1972) presided over the erection of a domestic security state in the United States between 1919 and 1972. Born into the respectable racism of segregated Victorian society, Hoover was obsessed by fear of racial miscegenation and consistently responded to African American demands for justice and equality as threats to moral propriety and social order. Ignoring the pervasive violations of federal civil rights laws that characterized the American South, Hoover exploited moral panics to repress African American political movements.

During World War I, as Hoover rounded up enemy aliens, the Bureau of Investigation (BI) had launched a large-scale investigation into the activities of black civilians and soldiers, and equal rights organizations and publications. Federal bureaucrats were most alarmed by the radical syndicalists of the International Workers of the World (IWW), an industrial union that engaged in general strikes, attempting to organize all workers irrespective of race or nationality, on the basis of economic radicalism and opposition to the war. In 1918, BI investigations facilitated the incarceration of Benjamin Harrison, the IWW's most prominent black activist.

During the 1919–1920 Red Scare, Hoover was appointed to head the antiradical General Intelligence Division (GID) of the BI and launched investigations into political associations among African Americans. His agents reached entirely erroneous conclusions regarding relationships between the IWW and African American publications like the socialist Messenger, the procommunist Crusader, and the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People's Crisis. BI agents even investigated anticommunist groups such as the African Blood Brotherhood and Marcus Garvey's Universal Negro Improvement Association. Finding no evidence for tax-violation or white slavery charges against Garvey, Hoover obtained a conviction on mail fraud in 1922 and, after five years of incarceration, secured his deportation from the United States.

Dragnet raids, alliances with vigilantes, agent provocateur activities, and partisan use of BI agents brought about the abolishment of the GID in 1924, when Hoover rose to the position of director. His agents secretly continued to monitor outspoken black organizations such as the NAACP and the Moorish Science Temple. When Hoover gained authority to investigate subversive activities among Communists and Fifth Columnists in the years before World War II, the FBI investigated and reported to the White House on organizations such as the Southern Conference for Human Welfare and A. Philip Randolph's March on Washington movement.

The FBI launched a systematic investigation of African American life during WWII, monitoring all black-owned newspapers, recruiting paid black informants, and conducting electronic surveillance against groups ranging from the National Negro Congress to the NAACP. Attempting to stem a tide of racial protest, Hoover even ordered his agents to find out if black female domestic servants were demanding a voice in their working conditions. As the Justice Department was drawn into minimal enforcement of black civil rights for the first time, Attorney General Nicholas Biddle ordered Hoover to investigate lynching and pogroms against black defense workers. Hoover resisted. FBI reports tried to deflect responsibility for racial conflict to agitation by pro-Axis subversives.

During the Cold War, the FBI investigated any group that adopted positions on peace, civil liberties, racism, or economics that paralleled the Communist Party line. Hoover viewed the Civil Rights movement as a target for Communist infiltration, so FBI agents and informants penetrated liberal groups such as the NAACP, American Friends Services Committee, Southern Christian Leadership Conference, Congress for Racial Equality, and Students for a Democratic Society. They collected and disseminated information on political opinions, plans, and activities of sympathetic university professors, student groups, civil rights activists, and labor unions. Racist police departments and citizens councils received scant attention.

As the Brown decision and nonviolent direct action campaigns provoked racial backlash, Hoover was forced to investigate anti-civil rights bombings and killings. Between 1960 and 1964, FBI agents merely took notes as police brutalized civil rights demonstrators, and an FBI informant even led the Klan beating of the Freedom Riders in Birmingham, but the Civil Rights Act and the Voting Rights Act forced change. After 1964, agents helped local police prevent Klan terrorism and launched a successful covert operation against the Klan. At the same time, however, the bureau also provided political intelligence to President Johnson on the Mississippi Freedom Democratic Party challenge, launched covert action against nonviolent groups such as the Poor People's Campaign, and systematically repressed militant groups such as the Black Panther Party, committing some of the grossest violations of civil liberties that have ever occurred in the United States.

Houston, Charles Hamilton

Attorney and educator Charles Hamilton Houston (1895-1950) was born in the District of Columbia, to William LePre Houston, a lawyer and part-time professor, and Mary Ethel Hamilton, an accomplished hairdresser and former school teacher. A bright youngster, Houston enjoyed a middle-class upbringing and had great pride in his heritage. He attended the racially segregated Washington, D.C. public school system, where he graduated from M Street

High School at the age of 15, before enrolling at Amherst College in Massachusetts in 1911.

Houston graduated with a BA degree, magna cum laude, as one of Amherst's six valedictorians. He was the only black student in the Amherst class of 1915 and was elected to Phi Beta Kappa. After briefly teaching English at Howard University, Houston enlisted in the army in 1917 and was sent to Camp Fort Des Moines in Iowa in June 1917. While there, he sought training in the artillery corps, but black officers were trained to serve only in the infantry. Thus, Houston was commissioned first lieutenant of infantry, a position he resigned in June 1918 to attend artillery school. Later he reported to Camp Meade, Maryland, where he won his commission as a second lieutenant of artillery. Houston and other black officers were sent to France where they encountered racism and segregation in the army.

After being honorably discharged from the army in 1919, Houston returned to Washington, D.C. Disturbed by the discrimination he and other black officers encountered and experienced in the army, he decided to follow in the footsteps of his father who was then a leading member of the Bar of the District of Columbia. Houston entered Harvard Law School in the fall of 1919, and, after his first year, distinguished himself among his fellow students and was honored by becoming the first black to serve as editor of the Harvard Law Review. Houston earned a bachelor of law degree (cum laude) in 1922, and made history again in 1923, when he became the first black person to be awarded a Doctor of Juridical Science at Harvard.

Houston was then awarded a one-year fellowship to study law in Europe at the University of Madrid in Spain, from which he earned a Doctor of Civil Law degree (1924), before returning to Washington, and was admitted to practice law in the District of Columbia that same year. After a short period, he began a lifelong law partnership with his father in Washington, D.C., while also teaching at Howard University Law School. During his distinguished legal career, Houston answered numerous calls, but he remained closely associated with his father. On August 23, 1924, he married his first wife, Margaret Gladys Moran, but they were divorced in 1937. He married his second wife, Henrietta Williams, in August of that same year, with whom he had one child.

In 1929, Houston was appointed vice dean of Howard University Law School, where he also served as a professor of law. He directed the work of the law school as the chief administrative officer until 1935, and, during his administration, Howard Law School trained most of the nation's blacks who entered the legal profession. The law school, however, lacked national recognition, and Houston worked tirelessly and provided leadership that helped transform Howard into a nationally distinguished legal training ground with a mission of racial advancement. His hard work paid off by 1931, when Howard University Law School was fully accredited by the American Bar Association and had gained membership in the Association of American Law Schools. During his tenure, Howard University Law School graduated and trained almost three-fourths of the nation's black law students. Many of the lawyers Houston mentored and trained carried on the struggle for equal justice and won numerous important cases after his death. Thurgood Marshall, the first black Supreme Court Justice, Oliver Hill, and William Bryant, all of whom were distinguished civil rights litigators and later federal jurists, are examples of the national litigators that Howard Law School produced.

Charles Hamilton Houston was the special counsel for the NAACP who led the judicial fight for civil rights from 1929 until his death just four years before the historic Brown v. Board of Education decision in 1954. (Library of Congress)

In 1935, Houston left Washington, D.C., to become the first full-time paid special counsel for the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP), headquartered in New York City. As head of the legal department, Houston launched a campaign against racial segregation in public schools that would later help to dismantle segregation. Houston handled and won numerous important cases during the 1930s and 1940s, some of which helped to lay the groundwork for the landmark cases of the 1950s. For example in 1938, Houston won his first case for equality in educational opportunity, Missouri ex rel. Gaines v. Canada (1938). To protect the rights of persons accused of crimes, Houston litigated Hollins v. Oklahoma (1935) and Hale v. Kentucky (1938), in which the U.S. Supreme Court overturned the convictions and death sentences of African Americans who had been tried by juries from which African Americans were excluded on the basis of their race. As the major architect and the dominating force behind the NAACP's legal program, Houston aimed high and made heavy inroads. In 1940, he left the organization and returned to private practice in Washington, D.C., but he remained involved in the fight for the rights and welfare of African Americans including discrimination in education, labor, and housing. He was succeeded as NAACP special counsel by his former student, Thurgood Marshall.

Thereafter, he rejoined his father and formed the firm of Houston & Houston, later known as Houston, Houston, Hastie, & Bryant. His work in the firm covered many areas including discrimination in employment, housing, the rights of the accused, and other aspects of discrimination. Houston also won victories as a civil rights litigator in private practice, successfully arguing and winning cases before the United States Supreme Court, including Steel v. Louisville & Nashville Railroad Co., and Tunstall v. Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and Enginemen (1944), when he challenged discriminatory actions by government negotiators and contractors with regard to fair representation regardless of race or union affiliation. In 1948, Houston assisted the NAACP in preparation for a housing discrimination case, Shelley v. Kraemer, and was the chief counsel before the Supreme Court in Hurd v. Hodge (1948), in which the Supreme Court ruled against judicial enforcement of racially restrictive covenants in the District of Columbia. Throughout his career, Houston was involved in numerous civic duties including National Legal Aid Committee (1940–1950); he was vice president for the American Council of Race Relations (1944–1950), vice president of the National Lawyer Guild, a member of the National Board of Directors and chairman of the national Legal Committee of the NAACP, two years a member of the Board of Education in the District of Columbia, and a member of the President's Committee on Fair Employment Practices (1944), before resigning the next year. An active participant in the civil rights struggle beyond academia, Houston was also engaged in political activism during his lifetime, including marching in the 1930s for the freedom of the Scottsboro boys and testifying before congress against lynching and other forms of racial inequality. An incredibly high-energy educator and lawyer, Houston inspired faculty and students with his philosophy of social engineering.

Historically, Charles Houston's most important impact was his strengthening of Howard University Law School, as well as his tireless work as a civil rights litigator for the NAACP. Houston's extensive work and dedication to improving legal education at Howard is notable, and achieving accreditation for the law school was one of the greatest accomplishments for Houston and those who shared his vision. During his administration, Houston commanded and encouraged the legal army to fight and seek equality for African Americans, and many of the cases that Houston argued were instrumental in setting precedents that were later used in the Supreme Court's landmark decisions of Brown v. Board of Education (1954) and Bolling v. Sharpe, which declared racial segregation in public schools unconstitutional.

Charles Hamilton Houston muddled through the forests of oppression and discrimination seeking equal protection and justice for those who could not fight for themselves. Among the early builders of the road to freedom that later activists such as Martin Luther King Jr. significantly expanded and strengthened, no one played as major a role as Charles Hamilton Houston. He was the chief engineer and the dominant force on the civil rights legal scene. One of the greatest civil rights activist in American history, Houston was the primary force behind the ultimate success of the long struggle that led to an end of the legalized discrimination and in particular, the notion of "separate but equal."

Houston was instrumental in training a generation of fearless civil rights lawyers throughout the country, who carried on the struggle and remained an inspiration to those dedicated to social justice today. Aside from training the great Thurgood Marshall, he was also a close advisor to Marshall. The magnitude of Houston's contributions toward the quality of justice in American society today is tremendous. This civil rights icon was a giant of a man who dedicated his life to the cause of freedom that all Americans enjoy today. Houston made marked contributions to the Civil Rights movement and the struggle against oppression of African Americans, for which he was posthumously awarded the coveted Spingarn Medal by the NAACP. In 1958, Howard University renamed its law school building in honor of Charles Hamilton Houston.

Throughout his legal career Houston was a pillar for African Americans. For three decades, Charles Houston's civil rights advocacy focused on achieving recognition of equal rights and opportunities, legal guarantees, and elimination of legalized racial discrimination. In spite of the increasing prominence of black scholars, legal academia does not recognize the Houstonian intellectual heritage. This deeply committed strategist, legal counsel, educator, mentor, and adviser in the struggle against racial discrimination remains a model for activists in the cause for justice and equality.

Charles Houston's fast pace in the struggle for racial justice and equality was eventually cut short by a heart ailment. He was first hospitalized for exhaustion and suffered a severe heart attack in 1948, but he never recovered. Houston died on April 20, 1950, in Washington, D.C., four years before fully realizing his struggle against "separate but equal." He left behind his second wife, Henrietta Williams Houston, and their only child, Charles Hamilton Houston Jr. The death of this civil rights icon brought an irreparable loss to the black community and to America. Houston was buried in Lincoln Memorial Cemetery in Suitland, Maryland.

Houston, Texas, Mutiny, 1917

On the night of August 23, 1917, more than 100 African American soldiers from the 24th Infantry, in defiance of their white officers, marched from Camp Logan to nearby Houston armed and angry. In a frenzied state fueled by mounting frustrations and fear, these men believed Corporal Charles Baltimore, a military police officer and model soldier, had been killed that afternoon by local police, and they wanted answers. At the conclusion of their two-hour march on Houston, 16 whites, which included five police officers, and 4 black soldiers had been killed. Serious consequences awaited those perceived to be responsible for the Houston riot. This racial violence occurred in the early months of the U.S. mobilization for World War I and weeks after the East St. Louis massacre where white mobs invaded black neighborhoods without law enforcement protection, killing nearly 40 African Americans.

In late July, 654 career black soldiers who made up the 3rd Battalion of the 24th Infantry traveled from New Mexico to their new assignment at Camp Logan, a newly created military training camp located three-and-one-half miles from downtown Houston, Texas. Washington assigned these soldiers the responsibility of guarding construction of the military camp. Immediately, these African American soldiers of the 24th Infantry experienced racial hostility and discrimination. White construction workers on the camp site they guarded resented the black soldiers' authority and regularly harassed them and hurled racial slurs. White Houstonians, strongly committed to white supremacy, refused the newly arrived black soldiers the same respect they accorded white soldiers. Local whites reasoned that respecting these soldiers would imply equality and would raise the expectations of local blacks for similar consideration. Also, Houston's police force had a notorious reputation for brutality to its black population, the largest of any city in Texas. During the soldiers' off-duty visits to town in the weeks that preceded the riot, Houston police regularly insulted, beat, and arrested black soldiers for minor infraction of local customs. Members of the 24th Infantry resented the disrespectful behavior, the police brutality, and fastidious enforcement of Houston's segregation statutes. As proud and self-confident men who had spent the last few years in western states, the soldiers were not accustomed to the South's Jim Crow mores and regularly defied the injustice.

Whether the soldiers reacted spontaneously to mounting frustrations, anger with repeated police abuse, and fear of white mob violence or secretly plotted revenge is disputed, but on the evening of August 23, emotions exploded. That day two police officers beat and arrested an enlisted man, Alonzo Edwards, who tried to protect a local black woman from police harassment. Unlike local whites, Houston's black residents welcomed and revered the soldiers. Viewed as heroes and leaders, black Texans expected the soldiers to protect them. These expectations intensified the soldiers' humiliation, for recent incidents revealed they had been unable to protect even themselves from police brutality. To quell escalating tensions between soldiers and the police, a negotiated agreement assigned 12 black, non-commission officers as military police to monitor soldiers' behavior in town. Consistent with the agreement, Corporal Baltimore inquired about Edwards's arrest to a police officer who asserted that he did not answer to "niggers." The police officer struck Baltimore in the face with his pistol and shot at him three times as he chased him into a vacant building. Although Baltimore escaped with his life, word reached camp that this highly respected MP had been killed.

Cooler heads did not prevail in this difficult situation. Experienced leadership from the 3rd Battalion—black and white—had recently been transferred, and their replacements, especially the white commissioned officers, had not earned the men's trust and proved inadequate for this challenge. Anger, confusion, and fear prevailed in the camp that evening. Rumors of pending trouble led white officers to plead for calm, but shouts that the white mob was coming transformed the chaos into action. More than 100 soldiers, following Sergeant Vida Henry's lead, scrambled for weapons and ammunition and marched to Houston, targeting the police station in the Fourth Ward as their destination. The next two hours altered many lives and Henry killed himself before dawn.

After the Houston riot of 1917 the army launched an extensive and hasty investigation that led to the largest court-martial in American military history—the prosecution of 118 soldiers. The first of three court-martials found 54 men guilty of mutiny and murder. In all, 13 men, perceived as the leaders, were sentenced to death, and 41 others to life in prison. The army quickly carried out the mass execution of these 13 soldiers before Secretary of War Newton Baker or President Woodrow Wilson could review the sentences. Two subsequent court-martials convicted 52 more soldiers; 6 of these men were ultimately executed and 22 more received life sentences. White officers were not prosecuted nor were any white civilians tried. News of the Houston riot traveled rapidly across the South, fueling existing racial animosity. Southern governors, who did not want black soldiers training in their states' new military camps, used the Houston riot to support racist contentions that integrated military training would never work, especially in the South. The NAACP petitioned for many years to have the life sentences of convicted soldiers reduced. As a result of these petitions, most of the men facing life sentences were released throughout the 1920s. The last prisoner was paroled in 1938.

Howard Beach Incident, 1986

In the 1980s, several racially motivated attacks dominated the headlines of New York City newspapers. The city had a legacy of race bias murders. On September 15, 1983, artist and model Michael Stewart died on a lower Manhattan subway platform from a chokehold and beating he received from several police officers. A year later, on October 29, an elderly grandmother, Eleanor Bumpers, was murdered by a police officer in her Bronx apartment as he and other officers tried to evict her. Later that year, on December 22, a white man, Bernhard Goetz, shot and seriously wounded four black teenagers he thought were going to rob him on a subway train in Manhattan. The Howard Beach racial incident in late 1986 propelled the predominantly Italian and Jewish community into the national spotlight, exposing racial hatred in New York City.

On the early morning of December 20, 1986, a white mob attacked three stranded African Americans in Howard Beach, an insular community in the borough of Queens. On that night, four African American men—Cedric Sandiford, 36; Timothy Grimes, 20; Michael Griffith, 23; and the car's owner, Curtis Sylvester, 20—were traveling from their home base in Brooklyn to Queens to pick up Griffith's paycheck. On the northbound trip back home, the 1976 Buick they were traveling in stalled on Cross Bay Boulevard, near Howard Beach. Griffith, Sandiford, and Grimes decided to walk to Howard Beach, a few miles away, to locate a pay phone.

At midnight, after entering Howard Beach, the three were initially confronted by a small group of white pedestrians, who yelled racial slurs and told them to get out of their neighborhood. By then hungry and tired, the men decided to dine and rest at the New Park Pizzeria on Cross Bay Boulevard. When Sandiford, Grimes, and Griffith left the restaurant at 12:40 A.M., a mob of 12 white youths were awaiting them with baseball bats, tire irons, and tree limbs. The gang, led by Jon Lester 17, included Salvatore DeSimone, 19; William Bollander, 17; James Povinelli, 16; Michael Pirone, 17; John Saggese, 19; Jason Ladone, 16; Thomas Gucciardo, 17; Harry Bunocore, 18; Scott Kern, 18; Thomas Farino, 16; and Robert Riley, 19.

The white youths began harassing the African Americans. Ladone, another of the ringleaders, yelled taunts and racist epithets. The mob then attacked Griffith and Sandiford, but Grimes brandished a knife on the angry mob and he escaped with minor injuries. Sandiford begged them not to kill him before Lester knocked him down with a baseball bat. With the mob in hot pursuit, the severely beaten Griffith managed to run. He ran several blocks to the nearby Belt Parkway, where he jumped through a small hole in a fence adjacent to the highway. As he staggered across the busy six-lane expressway, trying to escape his attackers, he was hit and instantly killed by a car driven by Dominic Blum, a court officer and son of a New York police officer.

At 1:00 A.M. when the police arrived at the scene, they encountered a bloody and dazed Sandiford nearby, walking west on the parkway. The officers brought him back to Griffith's lifeless body on the parkway. They treated him like a suspect, ripping off his jacket and subjecting him to a spread-eagle search. After being interrogated, a badly bloody and bruised Sandiford was placed in a squad car.

The officers refused him medical attention and forced him to tell his version of the assault several times until dawn.

That morning, an incensed New York Mayor Edward Koch and African American police Chief Benjamin Ward condemned the crime in the media. Koch compared the incident to a lynching, and Ward scolded the Queens commanding officer for his officers' insensitivity toward Sandiford, who by then was receiving legal representation from experienced civil rights attorneys C. Vernon Mason and Alton Maddox.

The incident sparked immediate outrage in the African American community, prompting black civil rights activist Reverend Al Sharpton to organize several protests in Howard Beach, as well as the Carnarsie and Bath Bay sections of Brooklyn. Groups of mostly African Americans marched through the streets with signs comparing the racial climate in Howard Beach to apartheid in South Africa. White residents greeted them with signs that read, "Niggers Go Home," "White Power," and "Bring Back Slavery."

In addition to the leadership of Sharpton, Reverend Floyd Flake, who had just been elected to Congress, Sonny Carson of Black Men Against Crack, and Reverend Herbert Daughtry of the Black United Front publicly criticized the racially motivated incident and the law officials handling of the case. They issued calls for boycotts on all white-owned Howard Beach businesses and New York City pizzerias. Because of the racial sensitivity of the case, New York Governor Mario Cuomo assigned Special Prosecutor Charles J. Hynes. Four of the white youths—Kern, Lester, Ladone, and Pirone—were brought to trial on manslaughter, second-degree murder, and first-degree assault charges. The others were charged with lesser offenses.

During the trial, which began on October 7, 1987, State Supreme Court Justice Thomas Demakos and the jury listened to Lester's attorney deny that his client was a racist. He stressed that Lester had a cordial relationship with African Americans. Lester's mother insisted that he was not racist because he once dated a black female. Attorneys for the other defendants tried the same strategy, portraying their clients as compassionate individuals. The defense team said one of the stranded motorists was a drug addict who instigated the entire incident.

On December 21, 1987, after lengthy deliberation, the jury found three of the four principal defendants guilty of second-degree manslaughter and first-degree assault, but innocent on attempted murder and riot charges. The jury acquitted Michael Pirone of all charges. The other participants received lighter sentences and, in most cases, received community service.

During Lester's sentencing on January 22, 1988, Judge Demakos said that the teenager and his community failed to display remorse or a sense of guilt for his role in the crime, and sentenced him to 10 to 30 years in prison. The following month, Ladone received a 5- to 15-year sentence, and Kern was sentenced to 6 to 18 years in prison.

The verdict upset the defendants' families and friends, but the decision satisfied most of those who supported the victims. Jon Lester was freed from prison on May 29, 2001, and moved to London. Ladone was released in spring of the same year and Kern was set free the next year. After the Howard Beach incident, race-related crimes continued to plague New York City. Howard Beach was followed in 1989 by the brutal killing of an African American teenager, Yusuf Hawkins, by a gang of white youths in the Bensonhurst section of Brooklyn.

Hughes, Langston

Known as the "poet laureate of Harlem," Langston Hughes (1902–1967) was an African American poet, playwright, short-story writer, novelist, and columnist. Largely associated with the Harlem Renaissance of the late 1920s and early 1930s, he continued to write prolifically well beyond this period. His engagement with ideas of racial consciousness was influential on poets such as Aimé Césaire and Léon Damas and the development of the French Negritude movement of which they were part. Hughes's literature focused on the social uplift of poor African Americans, combated against racial stereotypes, and celebrated black identity, even as it acknowledged its seemingly insurmountable problems.

Langston Hughes was born in Joplin, Missouri, on February 1, 1902, the son of James Nathaniel Hughes, a lawyer, and his wife Carrie Langston Hughes. A year after Hughes's birth, his father, faced with the problems of American racism, unrelenting poverty, and an 18-month-old child to support, moved to Mexico. He subsequently prospered and thus was able to send money back to the United States for the support of his son. Hughes went to live with his grandmother Mary Leary Langston in Lawrence, Kansas, whose first husband had been killed during John Brown's slave rebellion at Harpers Ferry in 1859. Her second husband, Hughes's maternal grandfather, was an abolitionist. Mary Langston instilled a great deal of this racial pride in her grandson. Although he lived briefly with his mother in Topeka, Kansas and Colorado and visited his father in Mexico with her in 1908, she had to move around, seeking work in several different states, and Hughes spent the majority of his first nine years with his grandmother.

Hughes cultivated his love for books and reading after a visit with his mother to the library in Topeka in 1907. As a teenager his passion and talent for writing developed. He contributed to his high school literary magazine the Belfry Owl and was elected class poet in his senior year. From 1915 until he graduated high school in 1920, Hughes lived with his mother, first in Lincoln, Illinois, and then in Cleveland, Ohio, cultivating his poetic ability and reading the works of Paul Lawrence Dunbar and Carl Sandburg who would heavily influence his own work. It was also during his high school years that his fellow students introduced him to the socialist ideas that would shape his political leanings and inspire the commitment to the poor that he demonstrated throughout his life.

Hughes had a strained relationship with his father, who did not support his son's decision to become a writer. During the summer of 1919, Hughes had lived with his father in Mexico, but while there he became depressed and had suicidal thoughts. After graduating from high school in 1920, Hughes spent a year in Mexico with his father, writing one of his most well-known poems, "The Negro Speaks of Rivers" on the train ride there. The poem was subsequently accepted for publication in 1921 by Crisis, the magazine of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP). Hughes gained further publishing success that year in the Crisis affiliated publication The

For more than five decades, from the 1920s through the 1960s, Langston Hughes wrote poetry, fiction, and plays that were meant to capture the essence of the black experience in America. (Library of Congress)

Brownies Book with two poems, a children's one act play, and the essay "In a Mexico City."

Although his father wanted to him to attend a European university, Hughes enrolled at Columbia University in 1921 to follow a course of study in engineering. He soon became disillusioned, however, with both the college program and his fellow students, preferring instead to spend his time at Broadway shows and in uptown Manhattan's Harlem district. After only a year he dropped out, owing to a combination of his own disinterest and the racism he experienced at the institution. He took up odd jobs, including one as a crew member of a merchant freighter, the S. S. Malone, sailing along the west coast of Africa. Hughes continued to write poetry as he traveled. In 1923, he penned "The Weary Blues," which would eventually give its name to the first collection of his poetry. He continued to publish work in Crisis and in the National Urban League's Opportunity: A Journal of Negro Life. In 1924, he sailed to Europe, where he lived in Paris, working in a restaurant and listening to jazz. While he was there, Alain Locke, professor of philosophy at Howard University, invited him to Venice to procure poems from him for the special edition of Survey Graphic magazine that would, in 1925, become The New Negro, the written manifesto of the Harlem Renaissance.

By this time, Hughes was becoming an integral part of the group of artists, writers, and thinkers that made up this cultural movement. After returning home from Paris, Hughes returned to New York where he met the poet and children's book author Arna Bontemps with whom he was to collaborate on a number of projects. At this time he also met many of the major players in the Harlem scene including Wallace Thurman, Zora Neale Hurston, and James Weldon Johnson, and he renewed his acquaintances with Countee Cullen and Carl Van Vechten. He enjoyed more literary success as his poem "The Weary Blues" won Opportunity magazine's first prize for poetry. The year 1926 saw the publication of his anthology of the same name, a collection filled with a mixture of jazz, blues, and traditional verse that celebrated African American experience and creativity. Although Hughes often garnered criticism from black middle class reviewers because of his refusal to comply with what he viewed as an excessive reliance on an ideology devoted to the assimilation and accommodation of Eurocentric values and racial integration, both this text and his subsequent publication Fine Clothes to the Jew (1927) established Hughes as a major name in the Harlem Renaissance community.

Hughes enrolled at Lincoln University, Pennsylvania, in February 1926, becoming a member of the first black fraternity Omega Psi Phi. That summer he stayed in New York joining with Wallace Thurman, Zora Neale Hurston, Aaron Douglas, Claude McKay, Countee Cullen, and Richard Bruce Nugent to found Fire!!, a black periodical for young African American artists. Only one issue was published. In 1927, Hughes met Charlotte Mason, popularly known as the "Godmother." Mason, a wealthy white woman, became Hughes's literary patron, a relationship that became troublesome for Hughes. Mason desired Hughes to align himself and his work with her ideas of the primitive, a view of his work that Hughes did not share. After graduating from Lincoln University in 1929, however, Hughes proceeded to complete the manuscript for his first novel, Not Without Laughter, a book influenced by, but not entirely based on, Hughes's childhood growing up in the Midwest, with the financial support of Mason. The book was published in 1930, but shortly thereafter Mason and Hughes quarreled, causing Hughes to sever his connection with his benefactress. His relationship with Zora Neale Hurston (also under Mason's patronage) also suffered, as they argued over the financial details and authorship of their collaborative play Mule Bone. This disagreement ended their friendship, the play was abandoned, and Hughes sunk into another period of intense depression and disillusionment.

After his breakups with Mason and Hurston, Hughes traveled to the American South and to Haiti. After receiving a grant in 1931 for $1,000 from the Rosenwald Fund, Hughes embarked on a poetry reading tour of southern black colleges. During his trip he visited the Scottsborough boys, who had been unjustly incarcerated in an Alabama jail for the alleged rape of two white women. Dear Lovely Death and The Negro Mother were published in this year, as was his highly controversial poem "Christ in Alabama," which attacked black colleges for failing to speak out against the Scottsborough boys situation. It was published without his consent in Contempo, a Chapel Hill college magazine, and drew an angry crowd to his subsequent reading at that college. This did not deter Hughes, however, and he was met at many other colleges in the South with admiration and enthusiasm.

In 1932, Hughes traveled to the Union of Socialist Soviet Republics (USSR) as part of an African American group, with the aim of participating in a film project entitled Black and White. Although the project was unsuccessful, Hughes stayed in the Soviet Union for a time where his leftist engagement was reinvigorated and he wrote some of his most political poetry. At this time another of Hughes's highly controversial poems, "Goodbye Christ," was published in the communist journal Negro Worker and was met with public indignation. Upon his return to the United States in 1933, Hughes, as well as suffering from illness, became depressed at the public reaction to "Goodbye Christ." Instead of returning to New York, he stayed in Carmel, California, where he wrote his first volume of short stories The Ways of White Folks (1934), a negative take on race relations. On October 22, 1934, Hughes's father died in Mexico. Hughes found out too late to attend the funeral, but he traveled to Mexico in January 1935 to organize his father's affairs.

In 1937, Hughes traveled to Spain as a correspondent for the Baltimore Afro-American, reporting on the Spanish Civil War and socializing with writers and critics such as Ernest Hemingway, Nancy Cunard, and Pablo Neruda. Upon his return in 1938, the International Workers Order published his most politically charged and socially engaged work to date, A New Song. Sadly, Hughes's mother died from cancer this same year.

The second half of the 1930s brought great literary success for Hughes as he penned a number of well-received plays. Mulatto, written several years earlier, was produced at the Vanderbilt Theatre in New York City in 1935 and enjoyed an extensive run on Broadway; the Karamu Theatre in Cleveland produced Little Ham and Troubled Island in 1936, Joy to My Soul in 1937, and Front Porch in 1938; and the Harlem Suitcase Theatre produced Don't You Want to Be Free? (1938). In 1939, Hughes extended his literary repertoire to screenplays, collaborating with Clarence Muse on the script for the film Way Down South. After having met Richard Wright in 1938, the pair collaborated on a poem titled "Red Clay Blues," which was published in 1939 in New Masses magazine.

The 1940s began for Hughes with the publication of his autobiography, The Big Sea (1940), which documents the story of his childhood, as well as providing an extensive commentary on the Harlem Renaissance and his involvement in it. He founded a play company in 1942 called the Skyloft Players and continued his success as a playwright with the Chicago production of The Sun Do Move. His seventh volume of poetry, Shakespeare to Harlem, also appeared in this year, but received mixed reviews. Some critics accused Hughes of producing a poetry that was superficial and old fashioned and that failed to respond to the social context of World War II, whereas others praised him for his artistic subtlety. At the end of this year, Hughes began writing what would become a weekly column for the Chicago Defender. In 1943, he introduced his now famous Jesse B. Semple (later known as "Simple") character to the column. A comic figure, representative of the black "everyman" in America, Simple had moved from Virginia to Harlem, and each week, despite his lack of formal education, he would philosophize on the important issues of the day.

In 1946, the American Academy of Arts and Letters bestowed Hughes with a prize for $1,000, illustrating his importance as an American writer. Throughout the remainder of the 1940s, Hughes continued to publish work of a mixed variety. In 1947, he wrote the lyrics for a Broadway production entitled Street Scene, a commission that finally enabled him to become financially solvent and purchase the house in Harlem in which he would live until his death in 1967. Another collection of poetry, Fields of Wonder, appeared in 1947. One-Way Ticket (1949), a collection of verse that was typical of Hughes's tragic-comic style, but that disappointed critics by being far from groundbreaking, followed two years later. The year 1949 proved to be a busy one for Hughes. Aside from his own poetry, he co-edited The Poetry of the Negro 1746–1949 with Arna Bontemps, an important poetic anthology and an endeavor that showed his continuing commitment to demonstrating the richness of black poetry. In addition, his translation of Cuba Libre: Poems by Nicolás Guillén was published, and his 1936 play, Troubled Island, was converted into an opera by William Grant Still. The following year he had more musical success when another of his plays, Mulatto, became the basis for the opera The Barrier, performed at Columbia University and written by Jan Meyerowitz who Hughes met in 1947.

By the 1950s, Hughes's Jesse B. Simple column in the Chicago Defender had proved so successful that Hughes brought out his first collection of Simple stories: Simple Speaks His Mind. During the rest of his life, Hughes produced four more Simple books featuring his "everyman" protagonist, including Simple Takes a Wife (1952) and The Best of Simple (1961), and an off-Broadway play, Simply Heavenly (1957). During the first half of the 1950s, Hughes published consistently in various artistic forms. Montage for a Dream Deferred (1951), his first book-length poem, used the rhythms of bebop jazz and demonstrated his ability to break new ground in poetry. A translation of Garcia Lorca's Gypsy Ballads (1952); Laughing to Keep from Crying (1952), a short story collection; three children's books; and Five Foolish Virgins (1954), an oratorio with Jan Meyerowitz demonstrated Hughes's continued literary output and wide artistic range, despite the personal difficulties he was facing at this time as a result of his previous engagements with leftist politics. Although Hughes associated himself with the Left, published in communist magazines, and participated in communist protests run by organizations such as the John Reed Club, he never joined the Communist Party. In 1953, however, he was called on to testify before Senator Joseph McCarthy's Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations in Washington, D.C. The charges did little to upset his career, however.

A year after the landmark Brown v. Board of Education (1954) decision, which outlawed segregation in schools, The Sweet Flypaper of Life was published, featuring photographs by African American photographer Roy DeCarava and an accompanying text by Hughes. Hughes's text and DeCarava's beautifully intimate photographic portraits captured the essence of everyday African American life in Harlem. Published by Simon and Schuster, it was incredibly well received and firmly established the reputations of both men to adeptly explicate the intricacies of black life in America.

The second volume of Hughes's autobiography was published in 1956. Entitled I Wonder as I Wander, it moves beyond Hughes's experiences in the Harlem Renaissance and discusses his experiences with leftist politics and his travels in the Soviet Union. He finished off the decade with the production of another opera with Jan Meyerowitz, Esther; The Book of Negro Folklore (1958), co-edited with Arna Bon-temps; and The Selected Poems of Langston Hughes (1959), which received harsh criticism in the New York Times from James Baldwin. Hughes remained productive throughout the 1960s. The book-length poem, Ask Your Mama (1961), a fusion of jazz rhythms, myth, and history, mused on issues including humanism, pan-Africanism and free speech. Deeply invested in ideas central to the black arts movement, it received mixed responses from critics, suggesting that Hughes's universal literary appeal was waning.

The final years of Hughes life saw no letup in his literary output. A commissioned history of the NAACP in 1962, three more plays, another collection of short stories, and an edited collection of stories by African American writers were among his final artistic endeavors. The final Simple story appeared in the Chicago Defender in 1966. On May 22, 1967, Hughes died in a New York City hospital from postsurgical complications and a diseased prostate gland. His ashes were placed under the floor of the foyer of the Schomburg Center for Research in Black Culture in Harlem, demonstrating his lasting centrality in the African American cultural imagination. His final poetic collection, The Panther and the Lash, an exploration of the Black Power and Civil Rights movements, was posthumously published in 1967. Hughes's work enjoyed a literary renaissance in the 1980s with a series of conferences and programs dedicated to his work and legacy.

Langston Hughes was one of the most influential and inspirational African American writers of the 20th century. Able to capture the intricacies and nuances of the lives of everyday African Americans and dedicated to a view of the world that was inclusive of the most impoverished and unfortunate, Hughes's work and life reflect commitment to art that supports racial, social, and personal uplift.

“If We Must Die”

Claude McKay wrote “If We Must Die” in 1919. It was his most famous sonnet and, according to many, it inaugurated the Harlem Renaissance. McKay was born in Jamaica in 1890 and immigrated to the United States in 1912. He was a well known Harlem Renaissance author and wrote many novels, short stories, and poems.

“If We Must Die” first appeared in the July 1919 issue of the Liberator. It was hugely popular and was reprinted dozens of times. McKay wrote this sonnet in the midst of the Red Scare and the Red Summer of 1919. Shortly after World War I, tensions flared between American employers and laborers, and race riots broke out in a number U.S. cities. McKay was working as a waiter for the Pennsylvania Railway Company during this time, and he and his co-workers were acutely aware of the growing racial tension and violence. They were particularly anxious because they traveled from one city to the next with no way to gauge the racial tensions they would encounter in unfamiliar towns. McKay wrote “If We Must Die” in this context. He read it to the other men working in his dining car, and their enthusiastic and emotional response encouraged him to take the poem to Max Eastman for publication in the Liberator. Shortly after the initial publication, the sonnet was reprinted in the Crusader. It appeared in the September 1919 issue, and the editors hoped the republication would encourage members of the African American community to engage in the fight for racial empowerment and equality.

While confronting the political climate of the time, McKay presented a model of African American masculinity in "If We Must Die." It called for black men to battle courageously against racial oppression, and it developed out of the difficulty that McKay encountered when attempting to create a masculine identity while experiencing degrading racial oppression. In this work, the role that women should play in the battle for racial uplift was noticeably absent, reaffirming the importance that McKay and his publishers placed on reestablishing a masculine racial identity. The author's use of a communal voice was also notable. In this work he attempted to speak to and for the entire African American community and presented a collective African American voice. The work stressed the importance of camaraderie and the willingness to die an honorable death for the cause of racial uplift. McKay also emphasized African American humanity by referencing animals. Rather than dying like "hogs," McKay said African Americans would die "like men." While calling African Americans to fight bravely, this imagery also illustrated the degree to which McKay understood and experienced the dehumanizing effects of racism.

Although race was at the center of "If We Must Die," explicit reference to race was notably absent. McKay did not disclose the racial makeup of the "kinsmen" or the "common foe." This did not keep Americans from recognizing that the poem was about race, but it did allow other groups to appropriate the sonnet. For example, Winston Churchill used "If We Must Die" to call British troops to fight against the Nazis in World War II. Although the sonnet was written in response to racial tension and violence in the United States and was directed to the African American community, it was well known outside the African American community and gained McKay international prestige.

Jackson, Jesse

The Reverend Jesse Louis Jackson Sr. (1941–) emerged as a leader during the Civil Rights movement. In a long career alternately marked by success and controversy, Jackson founded economic justice organizations, ran for president twice, and negotiated with a host of foreign leaders. Jackson's distinctive and powerful speaking style is characterized by wordplay, rhyming couplets, and the phrase "I am somebody," a refrain aimed at cultivating the self-worth of dispossessed youth.

Jackson was born Jesse Louis Burns in Greenville, South Carolina, on October 8, 1941. His mother, Helen Burns, was an unwed 16-year-old. Her pregnancy dashed the hope of her mother, Matilda "Tibby" Burns, that Helen, born when she herself was only 13, would attend college on a singing scholarship. Jesse's biological father, Noah Robinson, was a married man who lived next door with his wife and stepchildren. In 1943, Jesse's mother married Charles Jackson, who later adopted Jesse when he was about 15. They had one child, Charles Jackson Jr.

Robinson, a former boxer and a well-known figure in Greenville's black community, acknowledged his paternity. He had little contact with Jesse, however, who has since said that as a child he would stand staring at the Robinsons' house hoping for a glimpse of his father. Subsequently, Robinson's wife gave birth to three sons, the eldest of whom, Noah Robinson Jr., went on to earn an MBA and become a young standout in the business world but was imprisoned for defrauding the IRS and being an accessory to attempted murder. Questions about these convictions dogged his half-brother on the 1988 campaign trail.

Jackson graduated from Sterling High School in Greenville in 1959. A distinguished student leader and athlete, he chose a football scholarship to the University of Illinois at Champaign-Urbana over a professional baseball contract. Jackson traced his first integration protest to his attempt to take books out of the Greenville library over winter break. He left Illinois after one year and transferred to the historically black North Carolina Agricultural and Technical College in Greensboro. Jackson maintained he was not allowed to quarterback at Illinois because he was black. This comment caused controversy when it came to light that the school's starting quarterback that year was also black. At his new school, Jackson became student body president and met Jacqueline (Jackie) Lavinia Brown, who became his wife. The two participated in sit-in movements to integrate public facilities in Greensboro. Jackson graduated with a sociology degree in 1964.

Jackson has five children with his wife, Jackie: Santita, Jesse Jr., Jonathan, Yusef DuBois, and Jacqueline Lavinia. Santita attended Howard University and sang in a backup group for Roberta Flack. Jesse Jr. attended his parents' alma mater, as did Jonathan and Jacqueline, and in 1995 was elected to the United States Congress representing the second district of Illinois. Yusef attended the University of Virginia on a football scholarship and became a lawyer. In 2001, it came to light that Jackson had fathered a sixth child, Ashley Laverne Jackson, in an affair with Karin Stanford, a former staffer who was being paid through Jackson's organizations.

After a stint with the Congress of Racial Equality (CORE), Jackson moved his growing family north to attend Chicago Theological Seminary. He became increasingly interested in the Civil Rights movement, participating in the 1965 march on Selma, Alabama, and dropped out of seminary in 1966 six months shy of graduating to become a member of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference (SCLC) staff under Martin Luther King Jr. He was later ordained a Baptist minister by Clay Evans and C. L. Franklin, Aretha's father. Chicago Theological Seminary awarded him a Master of Divinity degree in 2000 based on credits plus experience.

In 1966, King named him the head of SCLC's Chicago branch of Operation Breadbasket, an organization founded to persuade businesses such as grocery stores and bakeries to hire more blacks and carry more products from black businesses. Under Jackson's leadership, the organization struck deals with several businesses that resulted in hundreds of jobs for blacks.

In April 1968, Jackson was traveling with King's retinue in Memphis to support a garbage workers' strike when King was gunned down outside his hotel room. There seems little dispute that Jackson was at the hotel when the shooting happened, but some of the tales told about the event were contested. Other civil rights leaders present became angry when Jackson claimed he cradled the dying leader's head in his arms and when he appeared on television the next day in a blood-spattered sweater. To many, Jackson's attempt to emerge as a major black leader after King's death was an insensitive grab for power. Jackson stayed with SCLC for three-and-a-half years but left after a suspension resulting from his independent incorporation of the first Black Expo, which was meant as an SCLC fundraiser.

In the early 1970s, Jackson founded his own organization, Operation PUSH, or People United to Save Humanity ("Save" later became "Serve"). He also began speaking at high schools to African American youth to promote hard work, education, and responsibility. Jimmy Carter's administration rewarded Jackson's school ministry, named PUSH for Excellence, with grants that later dried up under Ronald Reagan's presidency. Jackson also began to travel abroad, developing a vision that incorporated all the world's oppressed poor. In 1972, he initiated such travel with a trip to Liberia. In 1979, he spoke in South Africa against apartheid. The same year, he traveled to the Middle East and compared the conditions of the Palestinians to African Americans' plight in the United States. A picture of him hugging PLO leader Yasser Arafat caused a major controversy and became for many American Jews a lingering source of distrust of Jackson. During that visit the Israeli government refused to see him, but he made several return trips in which he met with both governments and attempted to spread the Civil Rights movement's concepts of nonviolent resistance and radical love as a political weapon to the Palestinian-Israeli conflict.

Although he had never held public office, Jackson made two noteworthy bids for the Democratic nomination for president in the 1980s. In 1967, King had proposed the Poor People's Campaign, a movement that would bring together the country's economically dispossessed regardless of ethnicity. The idea foundered after King's assassination but later found new life as Jackson's Rainbow Coalition, an organization he later merged with PUSH. Jackson's economic populism made substantial inroads with white farmers and factory workers. He also toured the country promoting voter registration and likely can be credited with the registration of millions of new voters in the 1980s. These new voters provided the margin that elected a contingent of black congresspeople and mayors in that decade.

Jackson's first presidential bid got a boost from his negotiation to release Robert O. Goodman Jr., a black lieutenant shot down and captured by Syria. Jackson accused the government of working less assiduously for Goodman's release than they would have if he were white. The Reagan administration decried his trip as reckless, but Jackson succeeded in obtaining the release.

Nation of Islam leader Louis Farrakhan traveled with Jackson to Syria, where his status as an American Muslim impressed the Syrians. Before Jackson received Secret Service protection as a presidential candidate, Farrakhan supplied him with Fruit of Islam guards from his organization. Not long after the Syria trip, Jackson's close relationship with Farrakhan fed into the black-versus-Jew controversy that seemed to haunt Jackson's career. Jackson's growing support and appeal following Goodman's release came to an abrupt halt when he referred to Jews as Hymies and called New York Hymietown in an off-the-record conversation with Washington Post reporter Milton Coleman, creating possibly the most intractable controversy of Jackson's entire career. Farrakhan, already an unpopular associate given his organization's association with a theology of the intrinsic evilness of the white race, threatened to have the black journalist who reported on the conversation killed. Setting aside Farrakhan's militance and black-supremacist theology, however, he and Jackson shared a platform of economic justice, self-reliance, and education, and both surprised white observers in the 1980s with their ability to draw large black crowds. Jackson only reluctantly distanced himself from Farrakhan after Farrakhan called Judaism a "dirty" religion.

Jackson tried to bounce back from the Hymietown affair with a trip to Cuba and South America. The highlight was an eight-hour session with Fidel Castro in which he persuaded the Cuban leader to release 22 Americans held on drug charges and 27 Cubans held for political activities. Jackson finished third in the 1984 primary season behind eventual nominee Walter Mondale and Gary Hart. He garnered just over 3 million votes.

Gary Hart's 1988 bid met an early demise after an affair came to light. Jackson, often rumored to have a series of amorous relationships, risked a similar disclosure but nevertheless entered the race with polls showing him to be a leading prospect for the nomination. The crowds he drew wherever he went seemed to indicate the same. When 800 townspeople in Greenfield, Iowa, forewent the Super Bowl to hear Jackson speak, he made Greenfield his Iowa headquarters and soon was running second only to Richard Gephardt in the 97 percent white state. He won about 10 percent of the caucus share in that state and 10 percent of the votes in the New Hampshire primary. Jackson did better than expected on Super Tuesday, ending the day with more of the popular vote than any other Democrat. He followed that performance by claiming 55 percent of the vote in Michigan and briefly looked like the frontrunner. Ahead of the New York primary, New York City Mayor Ed Koch resurrected the Hymietown comments and the Arafat hug, which hurt Jackson in that state even though he had spent the previous four years repairing relationships with the Jewish community. Jackson eventually lost the nomination to Michael Dukakis, but along the way, he finished second with almost 7 million primary votes, about 2 million of them from whites. Jackson was disappointed not to be offered the vice presidential slot. Nevertheless, he threw himself into the Democratic campaign, logging more miles on Dukakis's behalf during the general election campaign than the candidate did.

Jackson declined to run in subsequent elections and was often critical of Democratic candidates. In March 2007, he endorsed Barack Obama, who went on to be the first African American to become a major party's nominee. Despite the endorsement, Jackson made headlines for grumbling that Obama did not give enough attention to racial issues, and in a particularly fraught incident, he was caught wearing an open mike and making a vulgar comment about Obama because of the way he talked about African Americans.

Jackson's commitment to global diplomacy long outlasted his official political career. In 1990, Jackson traveled to meet with Iraqi President Saddam Hussein after his invasion of Kuwait and negotiated the release of hundreds of captives during the runup to war between Iraq and a U.S.-led coalition. In 1999, he negotiated the release of three U.S. military personnel captured by Slobodan Milosevic's regime. In 2004, he traveled to Libya and Sudan in an effort to end the Sudanese civil war. In 2005, Jackson met with the president of Venezuela, Hugo Chavez, and condemned evangelist Pat Robertson's comment that Chavez should be assassinated.

From 1991 to 1997, Jackson served in his only elected office, as one of two District of Columbia statehood senators, often known as "shadow senators," a position created to lobby for the district's statehood. In 1997, President Bill Clinton and Secretary of State Madeleine Albright gave Jackson the title Special Envoy for the President and Secretary of State for the Promotion of Democracy in Africa. In 2000, Clinton honored Jackson with the Presidential Medal of Freedom, the country's highest civilian honor, for his lifetime of work on behalf of the poor and minority communities.

Jackson, Maynard

Maynard Jackson (1938–2003) served as the first African American mayor of a major southern city. Elected mayor of Atlanta, Georgia, in 1973, Jackson held this position for the maximum of eight consecutive years after being re-elected in 1977. In 1989, he won a third term as Atlanta mayor working with community leaders to bring the 1996 Summer Olympic Games to the city. Jackson was born on March 23, 1938, in Dallas, Texas, to Maynard H. Jackson Sr., a local minister, and Irene Dobbs, who hailed from a socially prominent black family in Atlanta. John Wesley Dobbs, the Dobbs family patriarch, was one of the major political figures in the Atlanta black community. At the age of seven, Maynard Jackson Jr. and his family moved to Atlanta where his father had accepted the pastorship of Friendship Baptist Church.

As did most southern blacks in this era, Jackson attended racially segregated schools. In this environment, Jackson bonded with friends he would maintain for a lifetime. At the age of 14, Jackson entered Morehouse College, graduating in 1956 with academic honors. A Ford Fellow while at Morehouse, he graduated at 18 years of age and decided to become a lawyer rather than a minister like his father. Living outside the South for the first time, Jackson attended Boston University Law School. Although successful in all of his previous educational endeavors, Jackson could not manage to keep up in his studies at Boston. The family had placed pressure on the teenager to become a legal giant and Jackson thought he failed them. Years later, he still found it difficult to discuss the problems he faced in Boston. In 1961, still embarrassed about his problems in law school, Jackson transferred to North Carolina Central Law School in Durham, North Carolina, determined to make amends for the earlier disappointment. Jackson worked hard at Central Law School, graduating in 1964.

Jackson began his family a year after law school when he married Burnella "Bunnie" Hayes Burke. The couple raised three children: Elizabeth, Brooke, and Maynard III. Given the energy required to complete law school and start a family, Jackson did not find the time to participate in formal civil rights demonstrations. Moreover, doing so might have compromised his standing in the legal profession, especially in the Deep South where he planned to practice. Instead, Jackson worked within the system to effect change, beginning his career at the National Labor Relations Board. He also offered his services to the poor through a legal clinic.

Politics was the next major hurdle for Jackson. Believing that it was time for African Americans to think big when it came to Southern politics, Jackson entered the race for the United States Senate in 1968. In this election he ran against incumbent senator Herman Talmadge, the segregationist former governor of Georgia. Lacking adequate funding, Jackson lost the election handily, but there were positive signs in this defeat. A certain anti-Atlanta sentiment had long characterized Georgia politics, a fact reflected in the less than one-third of the total vote that went to Jackson in the election. Losing statewide contests in Georgia did not always speak to how one might perform in a city election. In fact, Jackson did win the popular vote in Atlanta that year, something that encouraged him to consider entering city politics. In 1969, Jackson won the elected position of vice mayor of Atlanta, beginning his political career.

Although white mayors in Atlanta had at times attempted to serve the needs of the black community, there remained in the 1970s a lingering belief that only a black mayor could adequately address the desperate situation black people faced after decades of Jim Crow racial discrimination. In 1969, the city elected Sam Massell as mayor. Jackson soon found the vice mayoral job weakened by amendments to the city charter. In 1973, he decided to run for mayor against the incumbent. Massell had received the support of black community leaders in the last election and expected the same when he ran for a second term, forcing blacks to choose between him and Jackson. Initially black business leaders asked Jackson to wait another four years before running for mayor, but Jackson convinced them that now was the time. Eventually, prominent black business executives, such as Jesse Hill of Atlanta Life Insurance Company, decided to back Jackson against Massell. Fearing he would lose the election if blacks stood by Jackson while whites split their votes, Massell resorted to negative advertising to increase his appeal to some voters. In these ads, entitled, "Atlanta, too Young to Die," Massell depicted an Atlanta overrun with trash and desolate of life. The implication, despite later protestations by Massell, was that a black mayor would ruin the city. The 1973 mayoral campaign highlighted two problems Maynard Jackson experienced as mayor: exaggerated black expectations of a black mayor and exaggerated white anxiety over a black mayor. In the end, Jackson won the 1973 race with 95 percent of the black vote and 17.5 percent of the white vote.

In its first two terms, the Jackson administration changed the racial complexion of City Hall, increased the number of black businesses receiving municipal contracts, and proved that Atlanta would not suffer dire consequences under black leadership. The same policies that resulted in these changes, however, also brought Jackson the ire of the Atlanta business establishment that had traditionally controlled City Hall. In Atlanta, a major city without a seaport, commerce had always taken a leading role in city affairs. Economic conservatism seemed a natural outgrowth in a city continuously facing challenges from other southern metropolitan areas to its role as leader of the New South, a name given to the region to emphasize the progress southerners had made since the Civil War. During the Civil Rights movement, while Birmingham, Alabama, and other southern cities received negative publicity after outbreaks of violence toward blacks, Atlantans reveled in the knowledge that their city remained peaceful, or as former Mayor William Hartsfield had proclaimed, Atlanta was a city “too busy to hate.”

To increase the number of black businesses involved in city ventures such as the expansion of the Metropolitan Atlanta Rapid Transit (MARTA) system and construction of the new Hartsfield Atlanta Airport terminal (subsequently to become the busiest airport in the world), Jackson founded the Atlanta Minority Business Enterprise (MBE) program. MBE mandated that from 25 to 35 percent of city contracts awarded had to go to minority-owned firms. Joint ventures between white firms and those owned by minorities also qualified under the program to ensure that all could directly benefit from MBE. When the mainstream business community expressed outrage that MBE rules applied to the construction of the international airport, a project deemed crucial to the future of the city, Jackson remained committed to his stated goals. In a standoff between Jackson and white business leaders, Jackson refused to issue any contracts until black firms received the same type of consideration historically given to white firms. Jackson halted all construction for a year until white business elites agreed to work along with black firms. By the end of Jackson’s second term, MBE had succeeded in awarding 34 percent of all city contracts to firms with significant minority involvement.

Although Jackson would see MBE as a success, in the early years the white business community often thought of him as a reverse racist. Long used to controlling city projects, mainstream white leaders had usually considered blacks only when there was an apparent effect on the city as a whole. Otherwise, black neighborhoods remained ignored. Jackson changed things by acknowledging that the black community was an integral part of Atlanta that required some special attention to address decades of neglect. To some white leaders, however, the affirmative action plans proposed by Jackson were proof that Atlanta would soon reach the “death” that Sam Massell had preached during the 1973 campaign. In the end, Atlanta continued to prosper economically as the majority of Atlantans supported Jackson Administration policies.

When elected Atlanta mayor in 1973, Jackson proclaimed he would never “sellout” his city. Blacks believed that Jackson had to improve their everyday lives. But it became apparent that major changes were difficult, if not impossible, to implement on a local level. For example, Jackson had limited control over the allocation of funds by the federal government for low-income housing. And with the movement of white businesses from the inner city to the suburbs in the 1970s, a process known as “white flight,” the urban tax base declined. In 1977, when city sanitation workers went on strike, demanding a pay raise, Jackson realized he had no choice but to stop the attempt by the mostly black workers to force him to submit to their demands. Jackson fired 1,000 sanitation workers, ultimately concluding the strike was a manifestation of the belief by some blacks that a black mayor was in office primarily to offer redress for the inequality they suffered. Jackson knew that the city faced financial constraints that prevented the pay increase at the time and chose to break the strike.

In 1982, Jackson left the political arena to work as a municipal bond attorney. He also served on various corporate boards. Back in 1976, Jackson and Bunnie had divorced. The next year, Jackson married Valerie Richardson, a New York business executive. The two had two children, Valerie and Alexandra. Before leaving office, Jackson persuaded Andrew Young to succeed him as mayor. Young continued Jackson administration policies for two consecutive terms. Still interested in politics and now more seasoned in the corporate boardroom, Jackson ran for a third term in 1989. In this election, he managed to receive the support of the mainstream Atlanta business community in his win against civil rights leader Hosea Williams. Jackson suffered from heart problems and in 1992 he underwent surgery. The next year, deciding he needed to spend more time with his family and recuperate from his surgery, Jackson announced he would not seek a fourth term as Atlanta mayor despite his popularity.

After leaving office, Jackson remained involved in the Atlanta business community via Jackson Securities, the firm he founded in 1994. He also continued to work for the Democratic Party, serving as a vice-chair and almost becoming Democratic Party chair in 2001. Jackson died in Washington, D.C., on June 23, 2003 of a heart attack.

Jet Magazine

Jet first appeared on November 1, 1951, at a cost of 15 cents. The magazine served as a black version of the largely white Quick, a small news publication founded in 1949 by Gardner Cowles, the creator of Look magazine. Jet, like its white counterpart, was approximately four inches by six inches and featured brief encapsulations of the pertinent news of the day. In 1970, its dimensions were broadened to approximately five inches by eight inches. According to John Johnson, its creator, Jet was designed to summarize “the week’s biggest Negro news in a well-organized, easy-to-read format.”

John Harold Johnson created Jet in Chicago, Illinois, the third publication of his Johnson Publishing Company. Born in the small Mississippi delta community of Arkansas City, Arkansas on January 19, 1918, Johnson and his mother moved to Chicago in 1933. While attending DuSable High School, Johnson met Harry Pace of the Supreme Life Insurance Company, who employed the graduate as he continued his education at the University of Chicago. Johnson excelled in his work with Supreme’s company magazine and eventually became its editor. The small publication carried information about the African American populace in a style similar to that of Reader’s Digest. Believing there was a commercial market for such a publication, Johnson gained a $500 loan using his mother’s furniture as collateral in November 1942. With that initial investment, Johnson created Negro Digest and the Johnson Publishing Company. Negro Digest began a consistent trend throughout the history of the company of mimicking successful periodical models of the mainstream white press and reformulating them with stories and photographs of interest to the black community.

Within a year of Negro Digest’s inception, its sales reached $50,000. Johnson parlayed that success into his creation of Ebony, a photography-heavy periodical in the tradition of Life and Look that celebrated the successes of African Americans. Ebony’s growth prompted Johnson to create a convenient, succinct publication to give readers easy access to the news of African Americans in politics, society, and entertainment. The first known black news-magazine, Heebie Jeebies, appeared in Chicago in 1925 under the leadership of P. L. Prattis. The publication was short-lived, and the next national attempt was Johnson’s Jet. The magazine’s scope was broad and its news coverage brief and readable, allowing it to give a sweeping portrait of the state of the national African American community. In 1951, Ebony’s executive editor, Ben Burns, took on the additional duties of serving as executive editor for Jet. Ebony’s associate editor, Edward Clayton, became Jet’s managing editor.

From its inception, Jet presented interesting logistical problems. The small size of the magazine’s white predecessor, Quick, led to difficulty in retaining advertisers who were forced to produce separate, smaller advertising copy for presentation in the magazine. The periodical discontinued publication in 1953, four years after its creation, primarily because of lack of advertising revenue. Johnson anticipated the problem, diverting the profits from the successful Ebony to the new publishing venture until advertisers realized the benefits of advertising in a small magazine. Although initially successful, Jet, like Ebony and most periodicals of the decade, suffered from a mid-1950s recession that hurt both subscription and newsstand sales. The Johnson Publishing Company, however, gave Jet more exposure than Negro Digest or any of its other publications, save Ebony, and the small magazine recovered. Jet quickly gained a reputation for accurate, accessible coverage, which kept it viable through economic downturns.

That reputation only grew with Jet’s coverage of the events of 1955. In August of that year, 14-year-old Chicago native Emmett Till was accused of whistling at a white woman in Money, Mississippi. He was subsequently lynched, his body mangled and mutilated after his death. Once the boy’s corpse was returned to Chicago, photographers documented the wounds, and in the September 15, 1955 issue of Jet, the pictures appeared. The issue sold out.

Johnson Publication Company reporters covered the resulting trial of Till's accused murderers, and Jet's photos and subsequent coverage alerted the African American public and the national news media to the poor state of race relations in the South. As the Civil Rights movement grew, Jet maintained its coverage, offering descriptions of the Montgomery bus boycott and resulting civil rights activism without editorial comment.

Jet, in fact, never offered editorial comment, but it did use the draw of sensational headlines to attract readers. Among its coverage of civil rights injustices in the South, Jet interposed articles with titles such as "One of the Sexiest Men Alive, Says Miles Davis' New Bride" and "Ten Ways to a Mink Coat." Although editorials remain absent from Jet's pages, the magazine's tone remains celebratory and positive. Like its fellow Johnson publication Ebony, the smaller newsmagazine reflected its owner's conservative devotion to the possibilities of free market capitalism to grow the infrastructure of the African American community, but never as overtly as its sister periodical.

Jet's resources allowed it to cover the national happenings of African Americans, and its effectiveness led to the shift in focus of black newspapers away from national coverage. Although Jet's coverage was often cursory, its scope pushed city publications to focus on state and local issues. Its staying power was also manifest within the Johnson Publishing Company, as Jet has outlived other Johnson publications such as Tan, Black Stars, Black World, and the original Negro Digest. The success of Jet led Johnson to attempt another periodical of similarly small dimensions, a monthly called Hue. Although Hue was initially successful, the advertising problems that felled Quick and threatened Jet soon combined with the recession of the mid- and late 1950s to end the life of Hue. The circulation of its predecessor, however, has remained strong. Jet's circulation was close to 800,000 by the close of the 1980s, and today that number is almost 1 million. The modern incarnation of Jet features a compendium of notable births and deaths, sections on black history, celebrity gossip, and sports, along with music and television listings and the "Jet Beauty of the Week." The brief and accessible news coverage that made the periodical relevant, of course, still forms the core of Jet's copy.

Jim Crow

"Jim Crow" was the American social practice of racial segregation, most prevalent from the 1880s to the 1960s, that robbed African Americans of their basic civil and civic rights and assaulted black people's humanity. This method of segregation allowed African Americans and whites to live within the same cities and towns, while still maintaining white economic, political, and social superiority. Through a series of social customs and state and federal laws, white Americans created "white only" public spaces designed to link free African Americans to their previously enslaved status. For example, the practice of "Jim Crow" required that newly freed African Americans ride in separate sections of public transportation vehicles and sit in separate sections of church, and that black children attend different schools from their white counterparts. By 1896, a racist Louisiana state law, requiring that white and black people sit in separate compartments on trains was upheld by the United States Supreme Court in the case of Plessy v. Ferguson, which institutionalized the doctrine of "separate but equal" accommodations and embedded "Jim Crow" segregation into southern culture and law for the next 60 years.

Although the term "Jim Crow" is most frequently associated with racial segregation in the 20th century, it was first harnessed as a racial and spatial epithet in 1830s antebellum Massachusetts. A white actor, Thomas Dartmouth Rice, performing with black cork make-up on his face, made "Jim Crow"—the likeable yet derogatory African American slave he played on northern stages—a national and international sensation. The cultural impact of the show was so great that by 1834, Northerners from all classes—from street urchins to congressional politicians to newspaper editors—alluded to "Jim Crow's" oft quoted refrain: "Weel about and turn about and do jis so, Eb'ry time I weel about and jump Jim Crow." The popularity of both the tune and the character prompted Massachusetts's railroad conductors, when segregating black travelers on the newly minted trains, to name the dirty, drafty, and unkempt compartments reserved for drunken men, poor whites, and African Americans as the “Jim Crow car.” The first record of this usage is 1838.

As early as the 1820s, free people of color vigorously protested segregation on public transportation in newspaper editorials. They further organized their protest strategies against the “Jim Crow car” and launched a concerted battle against the Massachusetts railroads from 1838 to 1843. African American abolitionists such as Charles Lenox Remond, Frederick Douglass, and David Ruggles refused to move from first-class seats, prompting violent confrontations between themselves and the railroads’ cronies. These abolitionists and their white advocates demanded equal accommodations and argued that receiving equal treatment on public transportation was a right of citizenship.

Furthermore, black activists developed a sophisticated analysis of such racial segregation. They debunked the notion that African American travelers were set apart from whites because they smelled or were disrespectful to white women. Pointedly, black abolitionists highlighted the fact that during the antebellum period, white American men and women traveled alongside enslaved African Americans frequently and never made complaints. Instead activists argued that what whites found so odious about black travelers in the antebellum North was not their skin color or their mere presence, but the social implications of their freedom. They argued that whites feared black political and economic success and imagined that black men sought sexual liaisons with white women because for so long, white men had exploited enslaved African American women in the South. Black freedom threatened social order. Segregation in public spaces such as the “Jim Crow car” was a way for Anglo-Americans to minimize the impact of African American freedom and to cripple black citizenship.

After 4 million African American slaves were freed in the South in 1865, it took just decades for the Southern states to produce laws that echoed the customs of the antebellum North. In the decades after enslavement, and throughout the 20th century, a new generation of black activists, emboldened by a legacy of African American activism against “Jim Crow,” believed that segregation threatened the meaning of freedom and citizenship and fought to overturn Plessy v. Ferguson through multiple protest strategies, including the courts.

In 1954, through a series of protracted legal battles, the legal arm of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP) successfully overturned Plessy in the public schools. The famous U.S. Supreme Court case, Brown v. Board of Education of Topeka, Kansas, is largely considered the first victory of the modern Civil Rights movement. Soon after, a grassroots movement to desegregate public transportation in Montgomery, Alabama culminated in the successful Montgomery bus boycotts of 1956. Even as white supremacists in the South resisted “Jim Crow’s” demise through deadly violence against African American and other activists, President Lyndon B. Johnson signed the Civil Rights Act of 1964 into law, which outlawed racial segregation and gender discrimination in public schools, public places, and employment. These laws profoundly changed the face of “Jim Crow” in the United States, but many argue that the process of racial equality and integration is not yet complete. “Jim Crow” may no longer be an explicitly legal practice of racial exclusion, but socioeconomic factors that relegate African Americans and other Americans of color to poorer neighborhoods with less well-equipped schools and less chance for economic opportunity have fostered a reincarnation of “Jim Crow” into the 21st century.

Johnson, Andrew

Andrew Johnson (1808–1875), the 17th president and regarded as no ally of African Americans during Reconstruction, was born in North Carolina. Growing up in an extremely poor family, Johnson became an indentured servant to a tailor at age 14. By the time he was 17, his family had settled in Tennessee. His early experience in poverty and as an indentured servant later shaped his policies toward African Americans during Reconstruction.

A successful politician before the Civil War, Johnson was viewed during the conflict as a champion of freedom for slaves in Tennessee. When President Abraham Lincoln appointed Johnson military governor of Tennessee in 1862, Johnson did all he could to abolish slavery in the state. Abolitionists and African Americans applauded Johnson's efforts. His fame continued to rise and, in October 1864, he endeared himself to all who believed in the abolition of slavery when he delivered his "Moses" speech in Nashville. In it he proclaimed that he would lead the slaves of Tennessee out of bondage. What the African Americans and abolitionists did not realize was that his motivations for eliminating slavery in Tennessee were not fueled by sympathy for slaves, but rather were energized by hatred of large slave owners. Johnson, who had grown up in poverty and owned five slaves before the Civil War, held a hatred for slave owners common among poor Southern farmers.

In the presidential election of 1864, Johnson became Lincoln's choice for vice president. When Johnson became president on April 15, 1865, after Lincoln's death, many abolitionists and African Americans felt confident that he would carry the same attitude toward slavery as president as he had as military governor of Tennessee. During the early weeks of his administration, however, Johnson made it clear that, although he would recognize the freedom of former slaves, he did not believe they should play any important part in the rebuilding of the nation. Johnson's proclamations of amnesty and reconstruction for the former Confederate states were lenient and excluded African American involvement. Johnson's reconstruction policy opened the door for the creation of Black Codes, restrictive measures created by states to take away the few rights of African Americans.

Furthermore, Johnson blocked every congressional effort to extend political suffrage to the newly freed men. Johnson firmly believed that the majority of former slaves did not have the mental capacity to be involved in the political process. Johnson also believed that political suffrage for former slaves would create extremely hostile racial tensions throughout the South. Although he felt the majority of former slaves did not have the ability to assume the responsibility of citizens, he did believe that a limited number of African Americans could vote—if they served in the army, if they were literate, or if they owned property.

Radical Republicans in Congress did not approve of Johnson's plan of limited suffrage. Johnson, however, informed them that he did not believe it was within the boundaries of his constitutional power to impose universal African American suffrage on the states. He stated that he could merely advise states of what to do, but not actually order them to do it. Johnson argued further that an extension of universal suffrage to African Americans would hurt the status of poor whites in the South. Johnson concluded that if all former slaves were allowed to vote, they would be heavily influenced by their former masters and therefore the wealthiest individuals in the South would control politics. Ultimately Johnson believed this problem could be solved with the removal of African Americans from the South.

In 1866, Johnson hampered conditions for African Americans more when he restored much of the land confiscated by the U.S. government to its white owners. This was a major blow to the Freedmen's Bureau, as it was supposed to use that land to help promote African American land ownership. Johnson defended his position by stating that much of the land seized by the government belonged to poor farmers and it was not them, rather the rich, large slave owning planters who ought to be punished by having their land seized, as they were the ones responsible for the Civil War.

Johnson alienated himself further from the Radical Republicans when he blocked legislation for a civil rights act and an extension of the Freedmen's Bureau. Johnson vetoed both measures claiming that they would promote laziness among African Americans. Furthermore, Johnson felt that it was improper to vote on such important legislation when the 11 former Confederate states had no representation in Congress.

Johnson's anti-African American policies during Reconstruction came partially from his experiences as a poor child and undoubtedly ruined his presidency. Many allies of African American suffrage demanded Johnson's removal. Less than a year after Johnson became president, Republicans in Congress began to override his vetoes and made him powerless. His presidential control became further depleted in 1868 when he missed being removed from office by one vote for violation of the Tenure of Office Act. He died in 1875, the same year he reentered politics as a U.S. Senator from Tennessee.

Johnson, Lyndon Baines

Lyndon Baines Johnson (1908–1973), was the 36th president of the United States. He ascended to the presidency on November 22, 1963, when President John Fitzgerald Kennedy (1917–1963) was assassinated while on a political trip in Dallas, Texas. Johnson completed Kennedy's term and, in 1964, was elected to a term in his own right in a landslide.

Little about his early life suggested that Johnson would become known as one of the most powerful politicians in American history and the civil rights president. Johnson was born one of five children in Stonewall, Texas, to Samuel Ealy Johnson Jr. and Rebekah Baines in a farmhouse located on a poor part of the Pedernales River. His father served in the Texas legislature, and young Lyndon was steeped in politics from the time he was a small boy. The family was poor, however, and by the time Lyndon was a teenager, his father was trapped in debt and lost the family home. The elder Johnson struggled financially for the rest of his life. Family, friends, and biographers agree that this is when Johnson developed his affinity for the poor and disadvantaged, regardless of race.

Johnson did poorly in school and was unable to get into college. He worked odd jobs for a few years after high school and was finally admitted to Southwest Texas State Teachers College, now Texas State University, San Marcos, in 1927. Miserable there, he left college and went to Welhausen School, where he taught fifth through seventh grades and served as the principal to a student body made up of poor Mexicans and blacks. He returned to college and graduated in 1930. He later took a job at Pearsall High School, where he taught public speaking and advised the district championship debate team.

A gregarious person, Johnson gained the attention of United States Congressman Richard Kleberg who asked him to be the secretary in his Washington office. It was here Johnson blossomed; he learned the arcane rules of Congress and was elected speaker of an organization of congressional workers known as the Little Congress. Johnson also caught the eye of his political idol, President Franklin Delano Roosevelt, who appointed him as the Texas director of the National Youth Administration (NYA). Johnson was a most energetic NYA director and was very helpful to African Americans caught in the vice grip of the Depression. He was described as “warmly disposed to giving disadvantaged blacks opportunity for education and work” so that they could help themselves. While he blocked the representation of African Americans to the Texas NYA, he did appoint a black advisory board and enjoyed great success in the black community. He resigned from the NYA in 1937 to run in a special election for the Tenth Congressional District to the House of Representatives.

After the bombing of Pearl Harbor, FDR helped him obtain a commission to the United States Naval Reserve, where he won a Silver Star. He left the military after FDR ordered members of Congress to leave the active service and won a second run for the United States Senate in 1948 by a mere 87 votes. There were allegations of voter fraud, and for the rest of his life he could not shake the ironic nickname “Landslide Lyndon.”

Johnson eventually became one of the most powerful Senate majority leaders in history. He did this by prodigious hard work, developing powerful alliances, mastering the byzantine rules of the Senate, and knowing his colleagues as well as they knew themselves. He understood their ambitions, remembered their families, and kept track of their strengths, weaknesses, and peccadillos. He used this information to develop what came to be called the Johnson treatment. Through the use of flattery, cajolery, intimidation, doublespeak, humility, and the sheer force of his personality, Johnson so overwhelmed people he was almost always able to enlist them to further his goals.

While in Congress, he was an ardent supporter of FDR and typically voted, as did his Southern colleagues, against the federal antilynching bill, eliminating the poll tax, denying federal funds for lunch programs at black schools, and denying the federal government the right to send absentee ballots directly to soldiers stationed overseas, effectively disfranchising thousands of African American servicemen and servicewomen. He explained that his votes were not based on racial prejudice, but on upholding states' rights.

Johnson held the conventional views of his time as they applied to blacks. He was not above repeating racist jokes, and he routinely called blacks, including those who worked for him "nigger," especially when he was in the company of other Southerners. On the other hand, he often helped his black constituents or individual blacks he happened to meet. For example, he hired Zephyr Wright, a college graduate who could not find a job, as the Johnson family cook and spoke sorrowfully about how difficult it was for her to travel with the Johnsons when there were virtually no public accommodations available to blacks.

Privately, he often supported the concept of equal opportunity. Although he refused to support a federal antilynching bill, on occasion he publicly expressed his horror of the crime. He opposed the poll tax, seeing it not as a racial issue, but something that hurt all those who were disadvantaged, regardless of race. LBJ also supported the civil rights plank in the 1948 Democratic platform, and he refused to ally himself with the Dixiecrats, white segregationists who bolted the Democratic party and formed the States' Rights Party. Nevertheless, he repeatedly made the distinction between passing civil rights laws and attacking poverty, which he thought more helpful to minorities.

Events of the 1950s, however, forced civil rights matters to the forefront of American politics. In the case of Brown v. Board of Education of Topeka, Kansas (1954), the United States Supreme Court declared segregated schools unconstitutional. In 1955, Emmett Till, a black teenager from Chicago, was murdered for allegedly whistling at a white woman when he was visiting relatives in Money, Mississippi, sparking an international outcry. In 1955, blacks in Montgomery, Alabama, led by a young minister named Dr. Martin Luther King Jr., protested against segregated seating on city buses by boycotting the bus company for more than a year, and the Supreme Court supported their position by declaring segregation in public transportation unconstitutional.

Johnson also recognized earlier than most of his Southern colleagues that there was a shift in the public perception regarding racial equality; he knew that the South as a region would never prosper if it continued to focus on the old bugaboo of race. Furthermore, by the late 1950s, his own political ambitions were such that he began to think of running for the presidency, and he knew it would require him to prove that he was not just a southern leader, but a national one. To this end, he determined that his political fortunes would be advanced by helping to pass a civil rights bill.

In 1956, the administration of President Dwight D. Eisenhower sent a sweeping civil rights bill to Congress. It provided for creation of a bipartisan United States Commission on Civil Rights that would be empowered to investigate racial discrimination and recommend remedies for its eradication; aimed to turn the small civil rights section of the Department of Justice into a full-fledged division led by an assistant attorney general; proposed that the United States attorney general be given the power to obtain injunctions in civil rights cases and that those cases be moved from state courts to federal courts; and sought to expand the power of the Justice Department to ask for injunctions against those who threatened or interfered with the right to vote.

After some pruning by congressmen, a weaker bill passed in the House and moved over to the Senate, where it faced a buzz saw of criticism in the chamber long dominated by segregationist Democrats. As majority leader, Johnson knew that the bill could tear apart the Democratic party for years to come as it pitted anti- and pro-civil rights supporters against each other. Flexing his parliamentary muscles, he sent the bill to the Judiciary Committee, where Democrat and segregationist Senator James O. Eastland of Mississippi eviscerated and then buried it in committee. Legislators who supported civil rights eventually agreed to drop their request for moving cases from state to federal courts, and enough southern senators grudgingly agreed to support it. Still, Senator Strom Thurmond, an ardent segregationist, conducted what was then the longest filibuster ever when he spoke for more than 24 hours straight against the bill. Greatly weakened and watered-down, the bill finally passed both chambers on August 29 and was signed into law by President Eisenhower on September 9. Through it all, Johnson proved he could rise above partisan, sectional interests and think of the nation as a whole.

In 1959, Eisenhower sent another civil rights bill to Congress. This bill aimed to allow the federal government to inspect local and state voter registration polls and levy penalties against anyone who interfered with the right to register or vote. Once again LBJ aimed for a bill that was narrowly focused so as to protect the rights of African American voters but would not alienate his southern colleagues. This bill aimed to allow the federal government to inspect local and state voter registration polls and levy penalties against anyone who interfered with the right to register or vote. LBJ again aimed for a bill that was narrowly focused so as to protect the rights of African American voters but not alienate his southern colleagues.

The bill passed the House and moved to the Senate. The Senate began debate on February 29, 1960; however, a group of 18 southern Democrats split into three teams of six each so as to create a continuous filibuster. By using this method, each senator would be required to speak for only four hours every three days. To blunt the impact of the filibuster, Johnson began requiring the Senate to meet in 24-hour sessions. A 15-minute break was allowed before the Senate sat for another 82 hours on March 2. The filibuster was then broken, and Congress passed the bill. President Eisenhower signed the bill into law on May 6, 1960. Both bills had been so weakened in the process that they were more symbolic than substantive. They did, however, prove that Congress could deal with such a volatile issue as civil rights without tearing the nation asunder, and Johnson again demonstrated his prowess as a national leader.

Emboldened by his success, Johnson began actively seeking the 1960 Democratic nomination for the presidency. He was outmaneuvered, however, by Senator John F. Kennedy, the junior senator from Massachusetts and a man Johnson felt to be unqualified for the presidency, particularly in the field of civil rights. In a somewhat surprising move, Kennedy offered Johnson the post of vice-presidential running mate, and even more surprisingly to some, Johnson accepted. It is certain that Kennedy could not have won the presidency without Johnson; his presence on the ticket ensured that several southern states that had gone over to the Republican party during the Eisenhower years returned to the Democratic fold.

Civil rights activity bubbled to the surface from the beginning of the Kennedy administration. The president had raised expectations during the campaign by implying that civil rights reform could be achieved in part through vigorous activity by the executive branch. Thousands of demonstrations in favor of racial equality took place across the country. In 1961, the Freedom Rides tested compliance with the Interstate Commerce Commission's directive against segregation in interstate travel. The violence unleashed against the riders drew the personal intervention of Robert F. Kennedy, the United States attorney general. In 1962, the administration sought to enforce a federal court order requiring the University of Mississippi to admit James Meredith as its first African American student. When it was clear that the local and state police would not maintain order, Kennedy federalized the Mississippi National Guard. A riot ensued and two people were killed. On June 11, Alabama governor George C. Wallace fulfilled a campaign promise to stand in the schoolhouse door to prevent the admittance of two black students, Vivian Malone and James Hood, to the University of Alabama. President Kennedy federalized the Alabama Guard, and both students were admitted without violence or bloodshed. On June 12, Medgar Evers, field secretary for the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP), was assassinated in the driveway of his home. On August 28, 1963, the March on Washington, which focused on civil rights and economic justice, brought 200,000 people to the nation's capital. These events appear to have been tailor-made for a man with the ambition and legislative skills of Lyndon Johnson. Yet Kennedy rarely sought the advice of his vice president on civil rights.

Kennedy did recognize, however, that his administration could no longer rely on ad hoc solutions to individual civil rights crisis. On June 19, he sent a far-reaching civil rights bill to Congress. The Kennedy civil rights bill was a multiprong attack on racial discrimination designed to outlaw discrimination in public accommodations, expand and protect the right to vote, and bar employment discrimination. It also contained a provision to cut off government funding to institutions who engaged in racial discrimination. In a nationwide television address, he labeled civil rights a moral issue and urged Congress and the American people to act to ensure equal rights for all Americans.

After President Kennedy was assassinated, several months later, Johnson told a joint session of Congress that passage of the Kennedy civil rights bill would be the most fitting memorial to the slain president. As president, he placed his reputation on the line and worked tirelessly to get the Civil Rights Act passed. The success of his career in Congress was of great benefit in this area, and he relished using the Johnson treatment at the presidential level.

In the House the bill had been bottled up in the Rules Committee by segregationist chairman Howard W. Smith, who refused to release it. Over the course of the winter recess, public opinion moved toward support of the bill, and Smith finally released it from the Rules Committee. On February 10, 1964, the House passed the bill 290 to 130 and sent it to the Senate. Parliamentary maneuvers on the part of Democratic Majority Leader Mike Mansfield sent the bill to the full Senate for debate, bypassing the Judiciary Committee where it was sure to be stalled by southern segregationists. Southern Democrats launched a 54-day filibuster, but the liberal Democratic Whip Hubert Humphrey led the movement to invoke, breaking the filibuster. The bill passed the Senate by a vote of 73 to 27, and Johnson signed the bill on July 2, 1964. He was said to have predicted that the Democratic party had lost the southern vote for years to come. The impact of the bill was such that racial discrimination in public accommodations was virtually wiped out.

The right to vote, however, was still in question. Several civil rights organizations had been leading voter registration activities in Alabama since 1963. Demonstrators and activists were met with violence perpetrated by law enforcement officials and citizens. In response to the situation, the Johnson administration sent a voting rights bill prohibiting states from interfering with or denying the right to vote to Congress in mid-March 1965. The act also proposed to outlaw literacy tests and extend federal oversight of elections.

On February 18, an Alabama state trooper shot a young black man named Jimmie Lee Jackson who was trying to protect his mother and grandfather from the police. Jackson died on February 24, and civil rights worker James Bevel suggested a march from Selma to Montgomery to confront Governor George Wallace about Jackson's death. Instead, the march became an outlet for black anger and a memorial to Jackson. Wallace declared the march a threat to public safety and vowed to prevent it. On March 7, about 600 marchers made their way across the Edmund Pettus Bridge where they were met by law enforcement officials who charged into the crowd on foot and horseback, beating demonstrators. The scene, referred to as Bloody Sunday, was captured by the media and beamed throughout the world.

King organized a second march, but federal district judge Frank M. Johnson issued a restraining order until additional hearings could be held. On March 9, King led a ceremonial march to the Edmund Pettus Bridge, stopped to pray and then turned back. That same evening, three white ministers who had traveled to Selma for the march found themselves in front of the Silver Moon Café, a gathering point for segregationist whites. The three were brutally attacked by several whites, and James Reeb, a Unitarian minister, died of his injuries.

Judge Johnson lifted the restraining shortly thereafter, and a third march was planned for March 21–24. Citizens, college students, civil rights activists, religious leaders, and celebrities joined the three-day effort. On March 25, King dazzled the crowd of 25,000 with a speech beside the state capital. Later that night, Viola Liuzzo, a white Chicago wife and mother of five, was murdered by Ku Klux Klansman as she transported volunteers to their homes. Her passenger, a young black man named Leroy Moton, was not hurt, and played dead while Klansman searched the car.

It is widely believed that the murders of Rev. Reeb and Mrs. Liuzzo, both of whom were white, forced Congress to act quickly on the voting rights legislation. After a Senate filibuster, cloture was invoked, and the bill passed on May 11; the House passed the bill on July 10. Conference committees resolved the differences in the two bills and sent it to President Johnson, who signed the act on August 6, 1965. The impact of the law was immediate; the number of black registered voters in the 11 states of the Old Confederacy soared.

The Civil Rights Act of 1964 and the Voting Rights Act of 1965 did not resolve the persistent poverty, police brutality, overcrowding, poor health care, and a lack of public transportation for millions of African Americans, especially in the urban North. Beginning in the summer of 1965, a series of rebellions broke out in inner cities across America. The first major riot was in the East Los Angeles neighborhood of Watts in August, 1965. That rebellion lasted almost a week, and Governor Pat Brown was forced to call out the National Guard. Thirty-four people were killed, and property damage was estimated at more than $30 million. Major disturbances also happened in Newark, New Jersey, and Detroit, Michigan, and 57 other cities in 1967. President Johnson ordered about 5,000 troops from the 82nd and 101st Airborne units into Detroit when Governor George Romney reported that the Michigan Guard was unable to restore civil order.

In the wake of the rebellions, Johnson formed the National Advisory Commission on Civil Disorders, chaired by Illinois governor Otto Kerner. The so-called Kerner Commission issued a bleak report on American race relations, stating the root causes of the rebellions were poverty, discrimination and injustice, and recommending that the federal government mount a vigorous attack on those fronts. The Commission also famously reported that America was splintering into two societies, one black and one white.

The racial rebellions that occurred in the latter part of the 1960s caused a severe backlash among white Americans who thought that Johnson had moved too quickly on racial equality, and endangered his most important program, the War on Poverty, the foundation of what he called the Great Society. Johnson had signed the Economic Opportunity Act in 1964. The Act created the Office of Economic Opportunity, which was the administrative arm of several programs. Head Start was designed to help disadvantaged preschoolers, Volunteers in Service to America (VISTA) was a domestic Peace Corps whose purpose was to help the poor across America, and Upward Bound sought to prepare poor teenagers for college. The Education Act funneled more federal money to colleges and universities and provided low-interest loans to financially strapped students. Funding for the first stage of the act was a modest $1 billion.

The War on Poverty was the first government program to involve poor communities in planning and implementing the programs that served them. In this respect, it taught leadership and organizing skills and gave meaningful paid work to hundreds of thousands of poor Americans. Increasingly, however, it was buffeted by disagreements among politicians, anger from white Americans who thought that the program rewarded shiftless and lazy blacks, and ever rising expectations by African Americans. The biggest obstacle to the program, however, was increased spending on the war in Vietnam, where 25 percent of the frontline troops were African American.

In 1968, a presidential election year, it was assumed that President Johnson would run for a second term. The United States, however, was mired in an increasingly unpopular war in Vietnam; thousands of young people took to the streets in demonstrations—some of them outside the White House—and burned their draft cards in protest. The Tet offensive in January of that year showed that the administration had not been truthful about the war, and for the first time, it seemed to be admitting that the war was unwinnable. Urban rebellions continued, and many young people seemed to be inhabitants of a counterculture that was a maze of sex, drugs, and rock ‘n roll.

Senator Eugene McCarthy, the liberal Democrat from Minnesota, had come out against the war and entered the presidential race, and hundreds of college student volunteers cut their hair, shaved their beards, and became “Clean for Gene.” Although he lost the New Hampshire primary to LBJ by 42 to 49 percent, he was able to show how vulnerable the sitting president was. After McCarthy’s strong showing, Robert Kennedy, the junior U.S. senator from New York and brother of the slain president, announced his candidacy, a move LBJ had always feared. On March 31, in a televised news conference, Johnson announced that he would not run for, nor accept, the nomination of the Democratic party for a second presidential term.

On April 4, civil rights leader and Nobel Prize winner Martin Luther King Jr. was assassinated in Memphis, Tennessee, where he had gone to support sanitation workers in their fight for better wages and working conditions. Riots broke out in dozens of cities as angry and frustrated blacks sought to avenge King’s death. On June 4, Robert Kennedy was assassinated after he had claimed victory in the California primary. Kennedy had been one of the few whites in public life who understood the plight of minorities and the underclass. The country was spinning out of control.

The death of King heightened a sense of urgency in Congress as it debated a third piece of civil rights legislation. On April 11, Johnson signed the Civil Rights Act of 1968, which prohibited racial discrimination in the advertisement, sale, or rental of housing. It was the last piece of civil rights legislation he would sign. When Johnson turned the White House over to Republican Richard M. Nixon on January 20, 1969, he was one of the most unpopular presidents in history. He had, however, done what he sought to do; he had built on the work of his longtime idol, Franklin D. Roosevelt, and gone so much further. He had created the Great Society—a society that made racial equality not merely a dream, but a reality.

Joint Committee of Fifteen

When the Thirty-ninth Congress convened in December 1865, it faced the monumental task of opposing the Presidential Reconstruction plan crafted by Andrew Johnson. After preventing senators and representatives from the 11 Southern ex-confederate states from taking their seats in Congress, radical and moderate congressmen formed the Joint Committee on Reconstruction to investigate conditions in the South and to report whether any of the ex-confederate states should be entitled to congressional representation. This committee of 15 congressmen, was composed of six senators and nine representatives, of which 12 were Republicans and the remaining 3 were Unionist Democrats. These 15 members of Congress oversaw a massive investigation that called 144 witnesses and generated more than 700 pages of testimony. The committee concentrated its efforts primarily on the treatment of African Americans and Northern whites in Southern states, the continued necessity of the Freedmen’s Bureau and federal troops in the South, and the lasting hostilities of former Confederates toward the U.S. government.

On April 28, 1866, the Joint Committee submitted its findings. Their report claimed that the South was still in disarray in the aftermath of the Civil War and that the former confederate states should not actively participate in the federal government until civil rights of all their citizens were guaranteed and high-ranking confederate officials were barred from political office. These recommendations led directly to a bill that extended the life and enlarged the functions of the Freedmen's Bureau and a proposal that would grant civil rights to African Americans in the South. The two measures were vetoed by President Johnson, but Congress eventually overrode both vetoes. The extension of the Freedmen's Bureau and the passage of the Civil Rights Act in 1866 signaled the beginning of radical Republican ascension and the end of Johnson's absolute control over Reconstruction. The most lasting legacy of the Joint Committee's efforts was a set of resolutions drafted on April 30, 1866 that became the Fourteenth Amendment. Passed by Congress on June 16, 1866, this amendment made African American citizenship a Constitutional fact, but every Southern state, with the exception of Tennessee, refused to ratify the measure. Preparing for a protracted political fight, Radical Republicans called for a convention to be held in Philadelphia of Unionists from the South to denounce the doctrine of state sovereignty and support the ratification of the Fourteenth Amendment. Among the Northern representatives at this convention was Frederick Douglass who successfully persuaded the convention to also support granting the right to vote to South African American men. The Fourteenth Amendment was eventually ratified and Douglass's appeal for black suffrage became the basis for the Fifteenth Amendment passed by Congress on February 27, 1869. See also: Civil Rights Act of 1866; Douglass, Frederick; Fifteenth Amendment; Fourteenth Amendment; Freedmen's Bureau; Radical Republicans

Karenga, Maulana

Dr. Maulana Karenga (1941–), professor, activist-scholar, ethical philosopher, author, and leading Afrocentric cultural theorist, was born in Parsonsburg, Maryland. The youngest of 14 children, he migrated to California in the late 1950s to attend the University of California at Los Angeles. He first attended Los Angeles City College before transferring to UCLA where he received a BA (cum laude) and a masters degree in political science and African studies. Dr. Karenga holds two PhD's; the first in political science from the United States International University, and the second in social ethics from the University of Southern California. He also holds an honorary doctorate of philosophy from the University of Durban-Westville, South Africa. Best known as the creator of Kwanzaa, Karenga has distinguished himself as one of the leading African-centered scholars and activist-intellectuals in the 20th and 21st centuries.

The framework for Karenga's intellectual and practical work is Kawaida, a philosophy of culture and struggle that he began to develop early in his career. As a student in the early 1960s, Karenga's meetings and discussions with Malcolm X had a tremendous impact on his developing social consciousness. Building on Malcolm's teaching, he defined the goals of the Black Power movement and his organization, US, as self-determination, self-respect, and self-defense. He also drew on the works of Sekou Toure, Marcus Garvey, Frantz Fanon, Julius Nyerere, and others to develop Kawaida, a Swahili term he defines as meaning a synthesis of tradition and reason. Central to Kawaida philosophy is the Nguzo Saba, the Seven Principles. They are Umoja (Unity), Kujichagulia (Self-Determination), Ujima (Collective Work and Responsibility), Ujamaa (Cooperative Economics), Nia (Purpose), Kuumba (Creativity), and Imani (Faith). The Nguzo Saba is also the value system on which the pan-African holiday Kwanzaa is based. Created by Karenga and first celebrated by US in 1966, today Kwanzaa is widely celebrated by millions throughout the African community on every continent in the world. Moreover, the Seven Principles are used by thousands of organizations and institutions as value orientations for their projects.

During the height of the Black Power movement, Karenga interrupted his studies to become an active participant. After the Watts rebellion in 1965, he formed US in Los Angeles and began to establish himself as an activist-scholar and movement leader. Eventually, US would also become a leading cultural and social change organization.

Grounded in the philosophy of Kawaida and dedicated to the liberation and empowerment of black people, US and its supporters often found themselves at odds and/or competing with the Black Panther Party, who had also committed themselves to the right of self-defense, self-determination, and the liberation of African people. Both groups were targets under the FBI's COINTELPRO infiltration program, which consciously provoked conflict between them. Conflict between the two groups spilled over from the community to the UCLA campus where a personal confrontation between members of both groups led to a shootout in 1969 that resulted in the death of two members of the Black Panther Party, the wounding of an US member, and charges being brought against several members of US. Marred by attempts to discredit him and US, Karenga, still a target of law enforcement officials, endured a period of incarceration from 1971–1975 after he was convicted of felonious assault, a case he maintains was a political prosecution. This led to US's temporarily going underground, but strengthened Karenga's resolve to remain committed to the black liberation movement. He wrote extensively during his captivity. In his essays, he laid out the essential tenets of his philosophy, including developmental changes on issues of race, class, and gender. After his release, he returned to rebuild his organization and became active again in the movement.

For more than four decades, Karenga has played a key role in national united front efforts in the black community. In the late 1960s, he was a founding member of the executive committee of the Black Power conferences and later, in the 1980s and 1990s, assumed leadership roles in the National Black United Front, the National African American Leadership Summit, and the African American Leadership Family Retreat. In 1984, US held the first annual Ancient Egyptian Studies Conference in Los Angeles and Karenga invited the late scholar, Jacob Carruthers, to cohost it with him. Out of this conference grew the Association for the Study of Classical African Civilizations. Karenga also serves as Chairman of the National Association of Kawaida Organizations (NAKO), which was established in 1987, and as director of the Kawaida Institute of Pan-African Studies in Los Angeles. In 1995, he served on the national organizing committee of the Million Man March/Day of Absence and authored the Mission Statement for the project.

Dr. Karenga has had a profound and far-reaching effect on black intellectual and political culture. Through his organization US and his philosophy, Kawaida, he has played a vanguard role in shaping the Black Power movement, the black studies movement, the black arts movement, the black student union movement, and the black independent school movement. Moreover, he has been instrumental in the development of Afrocentricity, rites of passage programs, African life-cycle ceremonies and the Simba Wachanga Youth Movement.

Professor and former chairman of the Department of Black Studies at California State University, Long Beach, Karenga serves on the board of the National Council for Black Studies and the Cheikh Anta Diop International Conference. His publications are extensive. The recipient of numerous awards and honors, Karenga has gained national and international recognition. He has lectured on the life and struggle of African peoples on the major campuses in the United States, Africa, the Caribbean, the People's Republic of China, Britain, and Canada. He is credited with having a profound impact on the development of black cultural and political consciousness throughout the African world. See also: Afrocentricity; Asante, Molefi Kete; Black Power; Kwanzaa; National Council for Black Studies; US Organization

Kennedy, John Fitzgerald

John Fitzgerald "Jack" Kennedy (1917–1963), served as the 35th President of the United States from 1961 until his assassination in 1963. Kennedy was a tremendous figure in U.S. history as it related to the experience of African Americans during the crucial years of the Civil Rights movement. Indeed, the struggle over civil liberties was perhaps the most pressing domestic issues of the Kennedy administration. As a strong advocate of the movement, Kennedy helped push civil rights legislation through Congress, supported the integration of schools and universities throughout the South, and collaborated extensively with leaders of the Civil Rights movement.

In 1954, the U.S. Supreme Court ruled that racial segregation in public schools was unconstitutional in a federal court case called Brown v. Board of Education. However, this ruling was widely ignored throughout the South and schools as well as restaurants, theatres, bathrooms, and many other public facilities remained segregated. As a result, the struggle for civil rights and social justice became an issue that necessitated action. Led by individuals such as Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. and by organizations such as the Southern Christian Leadership Conference (SCLC), the Civil Rights movement began to take action in the form of a series of sit-ins and non-violent protests. As early as 1957, astute congressional leaders began to recognize that civil rights legislation would eventually become inevitability.

In 1956 and 1957, as the Junior Senator from Massachusetts, Kennedy designed a strategy for how to accommodate African Americans as well as a wide variety of Democrats in regards to civil liberties. However, this strategy was hardly the position of a staunch civil rights advocate. Instead, it was a political maneuver and calculated with thoughts of a campaign for the presidency in 1960. Kennedy engaged in debates on the Senate floor regarding Titles III and IV of a bill, which would give the U.S. Attorney General the power to intervene in school desegregations with military force. He was able to support this bill without upsetting northern liberals or southern conservatives, both constituencies that he would need in his bid for the presidency in 1960. Indeed, Kennedy walked a very thin line, which brought criticism from several staunch civil rights advocates.

This legislation culminated in the Civil Rights Act of 1957, which created a commission to monitor violations of civil liberties, especially as it applied to voting. It also upgraded the Civil Rights office to the Justice Department and gave that office the power to commence civil measures against states that discriminated based on race. Further, many saw Kennedy's support of a bill carrying an amendment guaranteeing the right of all Americans to serve on federal juries as a fake bill with no real substantive power to change the status quo. However, the Civil Rights Act of 1957 was the first time since Reconstruction that the United States Congress had acted in any way to protect the civil liberties of African Americans. Thus, Kennedy's journey down the path of civil rights began, and public sentiment held that he was trying to press forward with equal treatment of African Americans, but that he was most concerned with securing national unity through a legality course.

In Kennedy's bid for the White House in 1960, against Richard Nixon, he chose the tenuous position to advance civil rights. This position was politically expedient as it secured the African American vote as well as consolidated the votes of northern liberals whom were antisegregation. However, Kennedy was taking a political gamble in losing the support of southern Democrats such as A. Willis Robertson and Harry F. Byrd of Virginia who were pro-segregation. Kennedy began to add many leaders of the Civil Rights movement to his staff including Marjorie Lawson, William Dawson, and Frank Reeves who advised him on how to espouse an aggressive civil rights agenda. The Kennedy campaign also encouraged the creation of a national organization to create a nationwide voter registration drive within African American communities.

Throughout the campaign, Kennedy applauded the peaceful non-violent strategies of civil rights activists; he spoke at several engagements at predominantly African American conferences, and criticized the inaction of previous presidents whom failed to bring integration sooner. Further, he promised to support civil rights legislation including a pledge to see more African Americans hired in the highest levels of the federal government. Kennedy also cultivated favor amongst African Americans when he telephoned Coretta Scott King in regards to the jailing of her husband, Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. Indeed, not only did Kennedy sympathize with Mrs. King, but also his phone calls, as well as those of his brother Bobby, convinced Georgia's governor, Ernest Vandiver, to set Dr. King free. This multifaceted strategy landed Kennedy the support of African Americans in his bid for the presidency in 1960. Given the slim margin of victory (about 100,000 votes), African American voters played a significant role in sealing the victory for Kennedy. Richard Nixon's attempt to strengthen his support among southern voters, as well as his silence about issues surrounding civil liberties caused many African American voters to reconsider their old ties to the Republican Party, which went back to the party's pro-civil rights record during Reconstruction in the mid to late 1860's.

Upon winning the presidency, which was one of the closest elections in U.S. history, Kennedy grew increasingly concerned about the violence surrounding the Civil Rights movement, and particularly the Freedom Rides. His interests in civil liberties continued to display this concern as his policies addressed the prevention of further disorder and violence. Because of his stance during the election, Kennedy was in a fixed position amongst southern democrats.

However, it actually freed him to aid the Civil Rights movement in several ways. His first act as president towards support of the movement was the issuance of Executive Order Number 11063. This order obliged government agencies to discontinue discriminatory practices in federal housing. Kennedy also named Vice President Lyndon Johnson to be the chair of a newly appointed Committee on Equal Employment. Further, nominating African Americans to a number of posts including Thurgood Marshall to the Second Circuit Court of Appeals, Carl Rowan to Deputy Assistant of the Secretary of State, and George L. P. Weaver to Assistant Secretary of Labor further ingratiated Kennedy to African Americans.

One of the defining moments of the Kennedy Administration in regards to civil rights was on June 25, 1962. James Meredith had applied to the University of Mississippi, had been rejected based on his race, and thus filed a complaint for racial discrimination in the U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals. The Fifth circuit ruled that the University should admit Meredith, but the Governor of Mississippi (Ross Barnett) stated that he would physically stand in the way of integration. As a result, Kennedy sent 300 federal marshals to enforce the court's decision. There were riots on campus that yielded the deaths of 2 individuals, over 200 arrests, and many federal marshals sustained serious injuries. Kennedy then put the Mississippi National Guard under federal jurisdiction and made sure that Meredith was admitted. Indeed, Kennedy did not back down or succumb to the stubborn challenge from southern governors. Later, in June of 1963, Kennedy took the same action against George Wallace in the desegregation of the University of Alabama.

In August of 1963, Kennedy proposed to Congress the strongest civil rights bill yet seen in U.S. History. However, the strong bloc of southern voters in the House and Senate were able to keep the bill from passing. In support of Kennedy's bold new legislation a coalition was formed between several civil rights organizations including the SCLC, NAACP, CORE, and SNCC, which organized a massive march in Washington. Later that August, about 250,000 marchers gathered near the Lincoln Memorial in support of equality in the job market, freedom, and civil justice through the passage of Kennedy's legislation. This is the context for Dr. Martin Luther King Jr.'s famous "I Have a Dream" speech and the march was a visual and palpable representation of that dream. African Americans and whites, young and old, men and women gathered in the hopes that their children could one day live in a nation where they will not be "judged by the color of their skin but by the content of their character." Using television images, many Americans witnessed this important protest of racial discrimination and there was no doubt that the March on Washington helped pave the way towards the passage of the Civil Rights Act of 1964. However, in an act that became a double-edged sword for the Civil Rights movement, the assassination of John F. Kennedy in November of 1963 proved to be a tremendous loss, but also perhaps a tremendous gain for the movement.

The legacy of John F. Kennedy as it related to the Civil Rights movement was fully realized by the passage of the Civil Rights Act of 1964. After the death of Kennedy, Vice-President Lyndon B. Johnson was inaugurated the 36th president of the United States. Johnson, having only taken the oath of office four days prior, disclosed to the nation that he planned to support Kennedy's civil rights bill as a testament to Kennedy's work towards civil justice. A southerner from Texas, many leaders of the Civil Rights movement feared that Johnson would only buttress the southern voting bloc in the legislature that had kept such a bill from previous passage. However, with years of legislative experience at work, Johnson was able to push the bill through Congress despite massive resistance in the form of southern filibusters. It is safe to say that the Civil Rights Act of 1964 was the zenith of decades and even centuries of work on behalf of the African American in U.S. history. The act banned segregation and racial discrimination in public facilities such as restaurants, hotels, schools, libraries, and swimming pools.

The Civil Rights Act of 1964 also called for a ban of racial discrimination in the American workforce. No longer could employers discriminate based on race, religion, ethnicity, or sex when considering a hire, promotion, or termination. To enforce these positions, the federal government was granted the power to withhold federal funding to any organization that was discriminating in any way. Finally, the Civil Rights Act of 1964 led to the desegregation of many public schools, it created the Employment Opportunity Commission to oversee practices of racial prejudice in employment, and it gave the attorney general the power to initiate prosecution on behalf of those who had been the victims of unfair injustice. This is perhaps one of the greatest legacies of the Kennedy administration as it related to the Civil Rights movement. Unfortunately, it was not until after Kennedy's premature death that the dream was fully realized.

In August of 1965, Congress passed another act that augmented the 1964 legislation. The Voting Rights Act of 1965, although signed into law by Lyndon Johnson was also a part of the Kennedy civil rights legacy. This act outlawed the educational requirements throughout many states in the South that called for the reciting of the constitution or for the “proper” interpretations of various sections of the constitution in order to vote. Many of these requirements had kept African Americans from voting and therefore had a tremendous affect on the racial bias of state and local elections. The Voting Rights Act of 1965 also gave the attorney general the power to assign federal voter registrars to record African American voters. This had a tremendous influence on the numbers of the African American electorate. For instance, in Mississippi alone, the number of enrolled African American voters grew from 28,000 in 1964 to over 250,000 in 1968.

Many have called John F. Kennedy a reluctant participant in the Civil Rights movement, but he was an essential participant nonetheless. To be sure, he was a politician with a calculated agenda. However, Kennedy had also accomplished more for the civil rights of African Americans than any other president in U.S. history, perhaps with the exception of Abraham Lincoln. Further, his extra-legislative support such as phone calls, meetings, and words of encouragement given to the leaders of the Civil Rights movement lent moral support from the highest office in the land. There have been very few Presidents in the U.S. history who risked so much for the freedoms and liberties of African Americans. Indeed, Kennedy was advocating a position that almost half of the country disagreed with. Indeed, he realized that the African American deserved equal rights, and that they lived in a country where all men were created equal and were endowed with certain inalienable rights. John F. Kennedy was the first American president to interpret that statement of the constitution quite literally.

Kennedy, Robert F.

Robert “Bobby” Francis Kennedy (1925–1968), or “RFK,” was a leading and influential political figure during the struggles for racial and economic equality of the 1960s. Formally trained as a lawyer and experientially as a politician, RFK served as attorney general to the United States from 1961 to 1964, during some of the most pivotal years of the Civil Rights movement. From 1965 until his assassination in 1968, he served as the United States Senator from New York, using his position and his political expertise to champion for racial, social, and economic equality.

Born the seventh of nine children into the prominent, powerful, and wealthy Kennedy family, Robert Kennedy graduated from Harvard University in 1948 with a degree in government and earned a law degree from The University of Virginia Law School in 1951. Throughout the 1950s, RFK worked as a lawyer for the United States Department of Justice and for various Senate Committees. In 1952, he served as campaign manager for his brother, John Fitzgerald Kennedy Jr., vying to become the U.S. Senator from Massachusetts. And in 1959, he managed another JFK campaign: his bid to become the 35th President of the United States.

Elected to the presidency in 1960, JFK appointed Robert Kennedy as his attorney general. Robert Kennedy’s job was to ensure the constitutional rights of the American people, and nowhere was he called to do so more than in the southern struggles for racial equality. Initially, Robert Kennedy believed that the most necessary gain in these struggles would be unhindered access to the ballot box. African American citizens in the South often faced harassment for exercising their right to vote, so RFK dispatched federal marshals into these southern states to investigate and begin prosecuting counties that condoned voter intimidation.

While RFK tried to contain the Justice Department’s policies to legislation, students, and civil rights leaders opted for a different strategy. Lunch counter sit-ins, freedom rides, protest marches, school integration, and many other varieties of nonviolent direct action proliferated across the South. Robert Kennedy provided Justice Department support wherever possible. He dispatched federal marshals to pacify angry mobs during the first Freedom Rides of May 1961. He encouraged President Kennedy to provide armed protection for endangered persons, such as for James Meredith, who in September 1962 integrated the University of Mississippi in Oxford. And RFK negotiated with segregationist southern leaders—such as Alabama governor John Patterson, who opposed the integration of the University of Alabama at Tuscaloosa—to enforce federal law.

By this time, Robert Kennedy understood that although enfranchisement was certainly important, only a more comprehensive guarantee of civil liberties could ensure the rights of U.S. citizens. He urged his brother to draft a comprehensive civil rights bill to send to Congress, and he insisted that President Kennedy publicly address the civil rights issue. Thus, on June 11, 1963, President Kennedy became the first president to publicly declare the struggle for racial equality a moral issue. Immediately thereafter, civil rights leaders began planning a national March on Washington for Freedom, Jobs, and Justice to advocate for quick passage of this legislation. Robert Kennedy's Justice Department guaranteed the marchers federal protection.

The March on Washington took place on August 1963, but JFK did not live to see the passage of the civil rights legislation. He was assassinated on November 22, 1963. His vice president, Lyndon Baines Johnson, assumed the presidency and asked Robert Kennedy to remain attorney general. In July 1964, RFK witnessed the signing of his brother's civil rights bill into law as the Civil Rights Act of 1964. The next month, RFK resigned his post as attorney general in order to campaign in New York for an U.S. Senate seat.

As a U.S. senator, Robert Kennedy continued to fight for racial equality, as well as for economic and social equality. In the latter half of the 1960s, nonviolent protest gave way to more confrontational methods. Riots erupted in urban centers around the country, but rather than condemn the rioters, Robert Kennedy encouraged people to consider the conditions that might engender such actions. He called attention to inequities in education, housing, employment, and living wages. He took steps to mitigate against such injustices, supporting, for example, the United Farm Workers and forming the Senate Subcommittee on Indian Education. He visited the impoverished Mississippi Delta in 1967 and afterwards, actively pursued food assistance for the area.

Such community rehabilitation endeavors, the most famous of which revitalized the Bedford-Stuyvesant community in Brooklyn, occupied his Senate career. He implemented community development corporations, programs that combined residents' needs and energies with federal grants and private sector investment in community improvement.

In March 1968, Robert Kennedy announced that he would challenge Lyndon Johnson for the presidency. Over the next few months, RFK stormed the primary race, bolstered by the overwhelming support of those to whom he reached out most African Americans, Hispanics, student protestors, the poor, the dispossessed, and the suffering. On June 4, 1968, celebrating an important primary win in California, Robert Kennedy was shot at the Ambassador Hotel. He died two days later. Much like Dr. Martin Luther King Jr., assassinated only two months earlier, Robert Kennedy believed in the principles of equality and progress on which the United States was founded so deeply that he struggled and sacrificed to preserve them.

Kenyatta, Jomo

Jomo Kenyatta (1889–1978) was the figurehead of the Kenyan independence movement and Kenya's first freely elected prime minister. Kenyatta was born a part of Kenya's largest cultural group, the Kikuyu, who were a sedentary, agricultural people inhabiting a stretch of land extending northeast from Nairobi, around the base of Mount Kenya and onward north. At the age of 10, Kenyatta wandered away from home and into a Scottish mission, which took him in and gave him a Christian education. Kenyatta eventually ran away to Nairobi, which was nearly a westernized, European city by the turn of the century, and he found employment there as a clerk. In Nairobi in the early 1920s, Kenyatta began participating in the Young Kikuyu Association (later the Kikuyu Central Association, KCA), a group of Kenyan youth with mission educations who spoke out against governmental inequities toward Kenyan workers and farmers. In 1925, Kenyatta took up full-time political work and published a monthly newspaper, Mwigwithanla, with the aim of uniting the Kikuyu to regain control of their land.

In 1929, Kenyatta traveled to London as a representative of the KCA to voice the Kikuyu grievances to the British government. The colonial office ignored Kenyatta's protestations, but he remained in Europe and spent nearly two years traveling and meeting with liberal politicians. In 1931, Kenyatta returned to London to argue for Kikuyu rights, and this time Kenyatta's platform in favor of returning seized land and ceding equal representation to Kenyans was entertained by various committees, although only marginally and unofficially. Kenyatta briefly moved to Birmingham and attended classes at a Quaker college called Woodbrooke, before returning to London. From 1933 to 1936, Kenyatta worked in the Department of African Phonetics at University College, as well as teaching Kikuyu at the School of Oriental and African Languages. In 1936, Kenyatta attended the London School of Economics and earned a degree in anthropology. Expanding the anthropological work he had done on the Kikuyu, Kenyatta published it in the form a book, Facing Mount Kenya, in 1938.

Kenyatta began lecturing in anthropology in 1939, but with the outbreak of World War II, he moved to Sussex where he farmed, spoke to local groups about Kenya, and lived a quiet country life. The trials of war and suppression of the KCA resulted in the governmental effective silencing of the situation in Kenya for more than five years. In 1945, Kenyatta assisted in the organization of a pan-African congress in Manchester on which he sat as the representative of the KCA. The congress resulted in the formation of the Pan-African Federation that aspired to coordinate the independence movements that were ripening in the colonies. Realizing that his own power to effect change in London was limited and placing hope in a unified African petition for human rights, Kenyatta returned to Kenya in 1946.

On his return to Kenya, Kenyatta worked with the Kikuyu Independent Schools Association, and, in 1947, he was elected president of the Kenya African Union (KAU), a group that united the various splintering factions of contemporary Kenyan politics. The political climate had grown dark by the time Kenyatta arrived home, with multiple special interest organizations acting on their own and isolating themselves from a larger community. Accommodating the incongruous demands of these parties was impossible, and Kenyatta submitted to maintaining partiality while trying to encourage positive social protest. In the end, Kenyatta was able to do little to persuade the masses, whose backgrounds and beliefs differed greatly, to adopt unified, non-violent, and democratic resistance.

As conditions worsened in Kenya, gangs resorted to vandalism, acts of terrorism against Europeans, and the murder of Africans who refused to take part or allegedly sympathized with the government. Kenyatta became an easy target for blame, as he was widely revered and still regarded as the leader of the Kikuyu. The rebellion came to a bloody climax in 1952 and on October 20, by decree of the governor, Kenyatta and close to 200 Kenyans were arrested under suspicion of their participation in the ongoing uprising known as Mau Mau. In 1953, Kenyatta was charged with organizing Mau Mau and, in a questionable trial, he and five Kikuyu leaders were sentenced to seven years in prison. Despite the arrests, Mau Mau continued in Kenya and the four years of conflict (1950–1954) resulted in more than 13,000 deaths, less than 1 percent of them European.

In 1961, Kenyatta was released from prison and quickly rose to the head of the Kenya African Nationalist Union (KANU). Kenya obtained official independence from Great Britain in 1963, at which time Kenyatta was elected prime minister in the country's first free general elections. Selecting ministers who would represent the multiple cultures couched within Kenya's borders, as well as the interests of the settlers who remained, Kenyatta focused on the unification of Kenya fractured populace in the first years of independence. He initially took many positive steps toward economic recovery and land reform, but he could not prevent the political dissidence that divided the KANU into two parties in 1966 and led to further divisions between people of different cultures. When violence broke out in 1969 along party lines, Kenyatta banned the opposition party and imprisoned a number of its leaders, although this did not stop the feuding that would continue to shake the balance of Kenyan politics throughout Kenyatta's tenure. During the 1970s, Kenyatta promoted industrialization and foreign investments that led Kenya to rapidly expand and develop into a westernized nation. Kenyatta led Kenya until his death in 1978 and despite the turmoil that shrouded his term as prime minister, he is remembered as a great leader, a powerful orator, and an enduring voice for human rights. See also: African Imperialism; Du Bois, W. ## Kerner Commission Report

In the aftermath of the so-called long hot summer of 1967, the nation was convulsed by major outbreaks of racial violence in Newark, Detroit, Cleveland, and numerous smaller cities. The official response to the riots was President Lyndon Baines Johnson's Executive Order 11365, issued on July 29, 1967, which established a National Advisory Commission on Civil Disorders. Two days earlier, Johnson appointed the 11-member commission during a presidential address to the country. In essence, the commission would investigate civil disorders and would make recommendations to the president, Congress, governors, and mayors for implementing measures to help contain race riots in the future. After seven months of investigation, the commission completed and submitted a report on February 29, 1968 named after its chairman, Illinois governor and later federal judge Otto Kerner Jr. Kerner was, in many ways, a prototypical member of the commission. Like New York Mayor John Lindsay, vice chair of the commission, Senator Edward Brooke of Massachusetts, and Roy Wilkins of the NAACP, Kerner was a political moderate.

The Kerner Commission Report was issued as a 426-page book, which, ironically, became a national bestseller, with more than 2 million copies in print. Charged by Johnson to investigate what happened, why it happened, and what could be done to prevent it from happening again, the commission issued findings that were surprisingly progressive given the embrace of moderate political ideology of most the its 11 members. According to the commission white racism was the cause of race riots between 1965 and 1967, and the country was becoming “two societies, one black, one white—separate and unequal.” The Kerner Commission Report dispelled a number of myths embraced by President Johnson and Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI) Director J. Edgar Hoover. The principal misconception corrected by the Kerner Commission Report was that race riots were not the product of black extremists or white radicals. Instead, they were the result of a suffocating mix of high unemployment (and underemployment), chronic poverty, poor housing conditions, poor schools, lack of access to affordable health care, police brutality, and harassment faced by millions of African Americans living in inner cities. The formation of the racial ghetto, the Kerner Commission Report claimed, was the fault of white America and, as white America was a factor in its creation, whites were also responsible for the conditions that made race riots possible.

The Kerner Commission Report recommended fundamental changes in federal policy to ameliorate the oppressive conditions faced by African Americans. Specifically, the Commission called for federal initiatives directed at improving public services, schools, employment opportunities, and housing in predominantly African American inner-city neighborhoods. In addition, it called for a complete restructuring of the welfare system and for a national system of income supplementation that would address underemployment and single-parent households. By 1968, the political winds had shifted considerably. With the election of President Richard M. Nixon, many of the Kerner Commission Report's recommendations would be ignored or greatly delayed.

King, Coretta Scott

Coretta Scott King (1927–2006) was the wife of civil rights leader Martin Luther King Jr., an author, and a civil rights leader in her own right. Born on April 27, 1927, in Heiberger, Alabama, she was raised on a farm owned by her parents, Bernice McMurry Scott and Obadiah Scott. The second of three siblings, King's family was not wealthy despite her father's entrepreneurial spirit. Obadiah Scott owned a truck, ran a barbershop, owned a lumber mill, all while growing cotton on the family's own land. In the midst of the Great Depression, she and her siblings picked cotton to supplement the meager family income. As a school-age child, King walked five miles each day to attend the Cross-road School, a segregated, one-room school in neighboring Marion, Alabama. Owing to her parents' emphasis on education and King's own innate academic skills, she excelled in her studies, graduating from Lincoln High School as class valedictorian in 1945. She entered Antioch College in Yellow Springs, Ohio the following autumn on an academic scholarship. During her time as an undergraduate, she joined the Antioch chapter of the NAACP and the Race Relations and Civil Liberties Committees. After receiving word that the Yellow Springs school board would not allow her to do required practice teaching, she continued her education at the New England Conservatory of Music in Boston with a scholarship to study concert singing.

Shortly after transferring to the New England Conservatory, King met Martin Luther King Jr. who, after his graduation from Morehouse College, was enrolled as a divinity student at Boston University. A year after their first meeting, the two were married on June 18, 1953. She completed her degree in voice and violin and moved with her husband in September 1954 to Montgomery, Alabama. Within a few short months of becoming pastor of the Dexter Avenue Baptist Church, King and his wife became involved in the Montgomery bus boycott. Between 1955 and 1968, King would often be with her husband at the front lines of various struggles against segregation and injustice. The couple would have four children: Yolanda (b. 1955), Martin Luther III (b. 1957), Dexter (b. 1961), and Bernice (b. 1963). After her husband's assassination on April 4, 1968, King was involved in organizing a commemorative service at Ebenezer Baptist Church in Atlanta every January 15 to mark his birth and honor his life. This commemoration was expanded to serve as the basis for calls for a national holiday. By Act of Congress, national observances of the holiday began in 1986. King also played a pivotal role in establishing the King Center for Nonviolent Social Change in Atlanta, which opened its doors to the public in 1981.

Between the 1970s and 1990s, King was actively involved in a number of movements seeking equality, justice, and civil rights. She had been an ardent opponent of the apartheid regimes of South Africa, working tirelessly with Winnie Mandela and the African National Congress (ANC) as well as politicians in the United States, including President Ronald Reagan, to combat the racist policies and denial of liberties to the black majority in the beleaguered nation. In addition to her opposition to apartheid, King was actively involved in addressing capital punishment; HIV/AIDS prevention; and lesbian, gay, bisexual, and transgender rights, and has been a staunch critic of the 2003 invasion of Iraq and various policies of President George W. Bush, including the push to propose a marriage amendment. In honor of her continuing role as a voice for justice, she was awarded the Gandhi Peace Prize in 2004 by the government of India. After a lifetime of struggle, King's health began to fail in 2005 when she suffered a stroke and a mild heart attack. On January 30, 2006, King died at the age of 78 in Rosarito Beach, Mexico of complications from ovarian cancer. On November 20, 2006, her remains were laid to rest next to her husband's at the King Center in Atlanta.

King, Martin Luther Jr.

More than a civil rights leader, Martin Luther King Jr. (1929–1965) was the human symbol of the quest for racial integration in the United States. His emergence, notoriety, evolution, and demise paralleled that of the Civil Rights movement itself. He became the nation's preeminent spokesman for the strategy of nonviolent direct action, the dismantling of Jim Crow laws in the South, and the creation of a larger "beloved community." He negotiated between the push of political expediency and the pull of militant black activists, all the while combating enemies who perceived him as a dangerous radical. A complex man burdened by political responsibility and torn by personal temptation, he forged an evolving vision of social justice that transformed the American political landscape.

Born in Atlanta, Georgia, on January 15, 1929, King was raised in relative privilege. His father was pastor at the Ebenezer Baptist Church, which served a middle-class clientele. The second of three children, Martin enjoyed a comfortable home life, material security, and the attention of a loving family. Of course, he periodically endured the indignities of segregation. He mostly thrived, however, within the institutions of the black bourgeoisie, especially the church. A serious and moody child, Martin possessed erratic work habits but precocious intelligence. He graduated high school at 15 and attended Morehouse College, a training ground for Atlanta's young, elite African American men. Here he developed not only his mind, but also his taste for dandy clothes and pretty women. Before his senior year, less out of spiritual fire than professional resolve, he decided to follow his father's footsteps and enter the ministry.

King attended Crozer Theological Seminary in Chester, Pennsylvania from 1948 to 1951. At this tiny, liberal, predominantly white institution, he laid the deep and wide intellectual foundation that later informed his crusades for justice. He read the classics of Western philosophy, the key texts of Hinduism and Islam, and the writings of Mohandas Gandhi, whose campaign of nonviolent resistance fascinated King. He also questioned the liberal, optimistic belief in progress; influenced by Reinhold Neibuhr, he interpreted human nature as inherently sinful, and he believed that social change demanded not just reason but the stirring of passionate faith. From 1951 to 1953, King attended Boston University, from which he received his doctorate in theology in 1955. In Boston he met and romanced Coretta Scott, a student at the New England Conservatory of Music. They married in 1953. King also developed enthusiasm for Georg Hegel's notion of the dialectic, a theory of history that resonated with his capacity for absorbing and amalgamating opposing ideas into a useful whole. His intellectual talents, however, did not include original scholarship; his dissertation is rife with unattributed passages from other scholars' work.

In 1954, King took the pastorship at Dexter Avenue Baptist Church in Montgomery, Alabama, the site of his unlikely surge to national prominence. Dexter catered to a small congregation of black professionals, and King's early sermons had little political bent. But in December 1955, the Montgomery police arrested Rosa Parks, a dignified seamstress and National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP) secretary, for refusing to vacate her seat on the segregated city buses. The black leadership recognized the political opportunity, declared a bus boycott, and formed the Montgomery Improvement Association; they elected the 26-year-old King president only because he had avoided the rivalries among the older ministers. King soon displayed his oratorical gifts, stirring a mass meeting to a fever pitch with an impassioned fusion of American democracy and Christian righteousness. He urged nonviolent protest, which not only placed the protestors on higher moral ground, but also engendered support from white liberals. For more than a year, Montgomery's black citizens walked and established carpools, and King endured unjustified arrests and a bombing of his home. The national media paid King and the boycott significant attention. In November 1956, the Supreme Court ruled Montgomery's bus segregation unconstitutional, and the next month King and his aides triumphantly boarded a bus and sat in front.

In the public mind, King had become the preeminent African American leader. His appearances inspired crowds of joyous hope. He met with President Dwight Eisenhower, sidestepped attacks by an insane black woman and a hateful member of the American Nazi Party, traveled to Ghana for its 1957 independence celebration, and toured India for a month to further absorb Gandhi's lessons. He founded and led the Southern Christian Leadership Conference (SCLC), a political network for civil rights activism.

With Roy Wilkins and A. Philip Randolph he led a 1957 mass meeting in Washington, D.C., known as the prayer pilgrimage, but it failed to attract much attention from the media or the federal government. King was struggling to give direction to this nascent movement. In 1959, he resigned from Dexter and based himself at SCLC headquarters in Atlanta. He had so far failed to inspire wide-scale grass roots activism or a political victory on par with Montgomery.

The student sit-in campaigns of 1960, starting in Greensboro, North Carolina, and spreading through much of the South, energized the Civil Rights movement. These protests of segregated public facilities awakened a generation of young black activists. They both needed King, because he already reigned as the spokesman of racial justice, and resented him, for they regarded nonviolent direct action as a temporary tactic rather than a bedrock element of faith. In April 1960, King spoke at the organizing meeting of the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee (SNCC). During the next year's Freedom Rides, when activists from the Congress of Racial Equality (CORE) and SNCC encountered violence while desegregating bus terminals in the South, King again offered encouragement and political clout, but he declined to place himself on the dangerous frontlines of the Freedom Rides. "Where is your body?" asked the young activists. They wanted less moral support and more aggressive leadership.

King did face harassment, violence, and jail. In October 1960, he began a four-month sentence in an Atlanta prison on a trumped-up traffic violation. Here King's national stature proved critical. Republican Vice President Richard Nixon had been Dwight Eisenhower's point man on civil rights, and he had worked behind the scenes to get King released. But Democratic presidential candidate John F. Kennedy, distant from black protestors and quiet on King's arrest, placed a concerned telephone call to Coretta. The Kennedy campaign publicized the gesture in black newspapers and in pamphlets distributed to black churches, helping deliver a close election over Nixon.

Yet the Kennedy administration resisted any alliance with King. Kennedy feared King's capacity to stir up disorder, and he first invited to the White House more established black leaders such as the NAACP's Roy Wilkins. Attorney general Robert Kennedy also sanctioned FBI surveillance of King and his associates. FBI director J. Edgar Hoover, a Puritanical man with little sympathy for blacks, considered King a disloyal radical. King's trusted white adviser, Stanley Levison, moreover, once had financially supported the Communist Party. So Hoover's agents, who offered little protection to the civil rights demonstrators in the South, tapped the telephones of King and Levison. Hoover's obsessive hatred aside, the FBI tapes reveal nothing politically incriminating about King.

Dr. Martin Luther King Jr., president of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference and Mathew Ahmann, executive director of the National Catholic Conference for Interracial Justice, in the Civil Rights March on Washington, D.C., on August 28, 1963. (National Archives)

What the tapes (and other sources) do reveal is that King had his own flaws and weaknesses. He could be vain and pompous. In private, he offered the occasional crude comment. He enjoyed bawdy late-night drinking sessions and smoked cigarettes, although never in public. King also indulged in pleasures of the flesh. Sexual temptation followed him throughout his constant travels, and King did not resist. His sexual romps were not public knowledge, although friends warned him of the dangers to his image, and elements of the black community whispered rumors. J. Edgar Hoover regarded him a moral degenerate and maintained the FBI surveillance. Such behavior should reinforce that King was not a god but a human being. His transgressions, moreover, reinforced his own view of human nature. His private guilt over his sins may even have informed his public calls for self-discipline among African Americans by using nonviolent protest in the civil rights struggle.

In December 1961, King arrived in Albany, Georgia, at the behest of the Albany movement, a coalition of community civil rights groups. His involvement gradually escalated from a speech, to a protest march, to an arrest, and finally to a longer commitment for the city's desegregation. King brought media attention and SCLC resources to this civil rights campaign, but the Albany movement faltered. The NAACP fretted about militant SNCC tactics; local leaders resented the condescension of SCLC deputies; SNCC feared that King would leave Albany with a symbolic victory but little change to the substance of racial patterns. Police chief Laurie Pritchett also defused the demonstrators' tactics of moral theater by avoiding crude violence before television cameras and by arranging to jail demonstrators outside the city. King was arrested twice, but city leaders paid his fine and suspended his sentence, so that he could not become a media martyr. King left Albany in 1962 with his prestige bruised and with few public facilities desegregated.

The lessons of Albany, however, did inform the triumphant 1963 SCLC campaign in Birmingham, Alabama. The city's poisonous race relations were personified by the notorious commissioner of public safety, "Bull" Connor. Unlike in Albany, King and SCLC gave direction to the entire series of protests, and "Project C" began with specific targets: the desegregation of three downtown department stores, leading to broader desegregation, the hiring of blacks for city jobs, and the formation of a biracial council. They trained volunteers in nonviolent resistance and raised reserves of money. Through early April, SCLC held sit-ins, marches, and mass meetings. After a state court injunction barring further protests, King led another march and was arrested. His admirers noted that it was Good Friday.

While in prison, he read that liberal white clergymen had condemned his campaign for "extremism" from "outsiders." King's response, scribbled on scraps of paper with a smuggled-in pen and referred to as "Letter from Birmingham Jail," powerfully outlined King's basic philosophies. He defied state law, he wrote, because of a higher moral law. He rejected the plea that African Americans must be patient, arguing that freedom for the oppressed arrives only when the oppressed demand freedom. Nonviolent direct action, moreover, did not promote racial ill will so much as bring it to the surface. Finally, he cited history's great "extremists": exponents of Christian love such as Jesus Christ and Martin Luther, and symbols of American democracy such as Thomas Jefferson and Abraham Lincoln. His disquisition slowly filtered into the American consciousness, but when King emerged from jail on Easter Sunday, Project C was floundering.

In May, SCLC began using children for their protest marches. Thousands poured from the 16th Street Baptist Church, singing freedom songs and clapping their hands. This sublime street theater invigorated Project C. Now, too, Bull Connor responded with violence, unleashing policemen on black demonstrators with billy clubs, electric cattle prods, attack dogs, and high-pressure fire hoses—images that circulated throughout the nation. The protesters maintained the demonstrations, pressuring the city's business community and gaining a settlement that met SCLC's original demands. Birmingham's violence continued, but a corner had been turned. Civil rights protests again spread throughout the South, and national attention focused on the plight of black southerners. President Kennedy now proposed a civil rights bill desegregating public accommodations, calling it a “moral issue... as old as the Scriptures and as clear as the American Constitution.” King had pricked the nation’s conscience.

The momentum continued in late August with the March on Washington. An interracial throng of 250,000 congregated at the Lincoln Memorial to hear speeches from assorted civil rights, labor, and religious leaders on live television. King supplied the climax. He began his speech solemnly, with a measured pace, using the metaphor of a promissory note to recall the American government’s unfulfilled commitment to protect the constitutional rights of its black citizens. Then he summoned the preaching rhythms of his sermons at mass meetings. “I have a dream,” he declared, providing poetic examples of racial brotherhood. “Let freedom ring,” he intoned, not just in the South but throughout the nation. Only upon transcending the barriers of race and religion and region could the nation achieve true freedom. The “I Have a Dream” speech, beamed into America’s living rooms, proved an iconic moment in the nation’s history.

After Birmingham and the March on Washington, the nation’s racial fissure seemed to fill with a high tide of liberal goodwill, particularly washing over King. Time named him Man of the Year in 1963. In 1964, he won the Nobel Peace Prize. In June 1964, Congress also passed the Civil Rights Act, prohibiting the segregation of public facilities and backing it with significant enforcement mechanisms. Passage of the act depended not only on the political skills of new President Lyndon Johnson, but also on the climate of moral justice embodied by King.

Nevertheless, the barriers to racial peace stayed high, liberal optimism started to fizzle, and King could no longer embody any consensus of black political thought. SCLC’s 1964 campaign in St. Augustine, Florida, featured white mobs so vicious that any progress was impossible; only a King oration kept the city’s blacks from responding with violence in kind. For some activists, King had become too moderate. SNCC members mocked him as “De Lawd” for his preachy ego. When the interracial Mississippi Freedom Democratic Party tried to obtain delegate seats at the 1964 Democratic Convention, King urged acceptance of a compromise proposal, alienating him from militants. The ultimate converse to King, of course, was Malcolm X, both before and after his 1964 exile from the Nation of Islam. The fiery leader countered King’s values of nonviolence and integration with calls for eye-for-an-eye justice and black nationalism.

In 1965, King and SCLC came to Selma, Alabama. The campaign illustrated the forces buffeting King. President Johnson urged patience as the Civil Rights Act went into effect. Not wishing to antagonize Johnson, King left for Atlanta in early March, before a planned march to the state capital of Montgomery. The march began without him, and television cameras captured the brutal violence on the Edmund Pettus Bridge, as the Selma police turned back the marchers with clubs and tear gas. King returned to Selma. By accepting Johnson’s compromise to halt a second march upon reaching the bridge, he angered SNCC and other civil rights supporters.

The Selma campaign nevertheless succeeded. The violent police response led Johnson to propose a voting rights bill on national television, capped by the phrase “We shall overcome.” The march to Montgomery was accomplished with the protection of federal marshals. And in August Congress passed the Voting Rights Act, eliminating the procedures that had long disfranchised most southern blacks. Along with the Civil Rights Act, the Voting Rights Act transformed the South, finally allowing African Americans access to the rights guaranteed by the Constitution.

As King realized, however, the road to racial equality only began with these basic rights. In ghetto neighborhoods outside the South, African Americans faced police harassment, possessed little political power, lived in substandard public housing, and suffered the economic and social dislocations of poverty. So King expanded his vision, visiting Chicago in 1965 and launching a campaign for open housing in 1966. Leading protest marches and lobbying city leaders for the elimination of de facto housing segregation, King faced resistance as stiff as that in the South. The ills of the ghetto also demanded more radical solutions than King could muster. He had developed a reputation as a black messiah, generating unfair expectations. When he failed, as in Chicago, his followers were disillusioned. Meanwhile, the political winds of African American protest drifted from King’s core values of nonviolence and integration. During a June 1966 march from Memphis, Tennessee, to Jackson, Mississippi, King remained a folk hero, revered by the black masses. But when Stokely Carmichael of SNCC called for “black power,” black activists cheered the messages of self-defense and rejection of white liberal support.

King’s own call for social justice evolved and broadened. By 1967, he was an outspoken critic of the Vietnam War. He called for a “revolution of values” in the United States that transcended the greed governing American involvement in Vietnam. His stance alienated many liberals and infuriated Lyndon Johnson, but King, sailing beyond the political mainstream, upheld his Christian principles. In 1967, King also announced an interracial crusade called the Poor People's Campaign. The movement would be highlighted by an encampment on the Washington Mall, designed to force the federal government to more deeply address the concerns of the American poor. Some of the SCLC staff doubted the political wisdom of such a radical call, but again King forged beyond the boundaries of liberal reform.

In March 1968, in the midst of planning the Poor People's Campaign and again guided by his swelling cry for economic justice, King arrived in Memphis to lend support to striking sanitation workers. During an April 3 speech, King predicted that he might not arrive at the "Promised Land" with everyone else. Typically, he suggested his own impending martyrdom. This time he was right. The next day, stepping onto his motel balcony, King was struck by an assassin's bullet and died. A political era seemed to perish with him. His death sparked 130 separate instances of racial violence, leading to the deaths of 46 people. That summer's Poor People's Campaign, led by King lieutenant Ralph Abernathy, suffered from disorganization and ended in failure. His vision of a beloved community seemed a distant memory.

Martin Luther King's spirit, however, still courses through the veins of the nation. Within his own time, King had become the public face for an entire movement, and he represented the ideals of racial brotherhood and Christian love. His leadership was integral to generating the federal legislation that reconfigured the South. His icon proved important for injecting African Americans into the larger national consciousness. His conscience prodded political complacency as the movement's goals changed. And his legacy continues to inform how we view the Civil Rights era, both its triumphs and its tragedies. In 1986, King's birthday became a federal holiday. That gesture recognizes not only the man, but the ideals that he embodied.

Korean War (Black Participation in)

The Korean War was the catalyst for the racial integration of the United States Armed Forces. Whereas the African American community openly protested racism and pressed for civil rights during World War II, it was more reluctant to criticize American foreign policy and race politics during the Korean War.

On July 26, 1948, President Harry S Truman issued Executive Order 9981 with the intent to establish equal treatment and opportunity in the armed services for peoples of any race, color, religion, or national origin. The Committee on the Equality of Treatment and Opportunity in the Armed Forces, established by this order, reviewed the racial situation within the armed forces and pushed for the implementation of racial integration with the secretary of defense and the service secretaries. The upcoming presidential election, pressure from civil rights groups, and international attention compelled Truman to act. Truman hoped to gain the support of blacks, both in the election and in the struggle against communism. He also wanted the promise of equality in the military to improve America's international civil rights record, which played a vital role in the cold war conflict.

The navy and the air force were initially more open to integration than the army, which argued that integration threatened national security. The advent of the Korean War in June 1950, however, revealed the urgent necessity of racial integration of the military and accelerated its implementation. As a result of the growing need for combat troops, the military, in particular the army, soon realized that segregation endangered combat readiness and the war's ultimate success. It proved inefficient and ineffective to continue training and using soldiers in segregated units and on segregated posts. The numbers of African Americans entering the army increased rapidly, so that the all-black units could no longer absorb all black enlistees. The white units, however, especially on the front line, were in dire need of new recruits. The military eventually began to integrate African Americans on posts and in combat units. Military integration increased morale for black and white soldiers alike. Military performance improved and the troops became more effective.

During the three-year war, at least 600,000 African Americans served and about 3,200 died in action. The African American community welcomed the integration of the armed forces in the Korean War, observing its progress and criticizing its flaws. As in preceding wars, many African Americans believed that black military service and participation in the war would help improve the status of their race and propel them toward full equality. The majority of the black press celebrated the performance of African Americans in the war and showcased it as proof of the patriotic dedication of the black community and the untenability of the argument of white racial superiority.

In 1954, the military declared that the armed forces were officially desegregated. This was certainly not the case on all levels. Furthermore, this assertion did not solve the problem of continuing racism within the military. Race still played an important role in assessing, sometimes unfairly, the performance of African Americans. Nevertheless, with military desegregation and the Korean War, a microcosm and rather conservative force of American society was fundamentally altered.

On the home front, the Korean War amplified the anticommunist hysteria and McCarthyism. Critics, whether affiliated with communism or not, were monitored, restricted, and chastised. The fear of McCarthyism and the pressure of Cold War conformity were omnipresent. These developments negatively affected the African American quest for civil rights by reducing Truman's civil rights activism and by stifling more radical forms of activism that had proved so powerful during the World War II. The Civil Rights movement felt pressured to limit its more radical mass movement activism and its affiliation to left-wing groups.

The majority of the African American Civil Rights movement backed the government's anticommunist quest and initially the Korean War effort. It often relied on Cold War rhetoric to solicit civil rights and assess the events in Southeast Asia. The integration of the armed forces furthered their support for the war. Many viewed the war as a necessary and appropriate tool against the spread of communism and, as such, believed that African Americans should participate.

The African American attitude toward the Korean War shifted between support for and criticism of the American "police action" because of its latent racist underpinnings. Only a minority of African Americans, however, dared openly oppose the seemingly pervasive anticommunist consensus. Black dissenters were enraged by being denied equal rights at home while being recruited to fight for democracy that did not exist for them in the United States. Those who dared to speak up were assigned the devastating label of "communist sympathizers" and were thereby discredited and silenced. Leading antiwar African American activists, like Paul Robeson and W. E. B. Du Bois, were chastised for their open protest of the war.

Ku Klux Klan

During Reconstruction (1866–1877), agents of the Democratic Party revived the tradition of pre-Civil War regulators and slave patrols to create paramilitary vigilante groups. These secretive ritual fraternities, quickly subsumed under the label Ku Klux Klan, endeavored to counter the Freedman's Bureau, destroy the Republican Party infrastructure, reestablish control over black labor, and restore racial subordination in all aspects of Southern political, economic, and social life. Klansmen murdered thousands and terrorized tens of thousands of prominent Republicans, merchants who bought from and sold to freedmen, landowners who rented land to freemen, independent black farmers and railway workers, and indeed, any black person who breached the code of social deference.

Conflating sexual fear and partisan politics, Klansmen posed as chivalrous avengers of victimized white womanhood, their chosen symbol of the white South. They asserted their own racial privileges by forcing Republicans to engage in sexual acts, raping black women, and sexually mutilating black men. Although localized and lacking synchronization, Klan violence, including uncounted whippings, beatings and rapes, murders, and massacres played a major role in disarming black militia and preventing black voting in at least eight states.

Republican parties were destroyed at the local level and in many cities, while Georgia and Louisiana succumbed to white supremacy. The Republican-controlled Congress responded with a series of Enforcement Acts that broke the Klan in 1872, but by that time the terrorists had served their purpose. After 1873, when Congress defeated the anti-Klan Enforcement Act and the Supreme Court ruled that the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments did not protect violations of civil rights by private parties, remaining Reconstruction governments steadily collapsed before white paramilitaries and mob intimidation. Although other paramilitary groups such as Mississippi's "whitecappers" sprung up in the mid-1890s and mid-1900s, lynching and the legal system maintained a rigid caste system in the South for the next four decades.

During this period, American history textbooks lauded Klansmen as heroes who had redeemed the South from a corrupt regime. Thomas Dixon's 1905 novel The Klansmen popularized this view, portraying Klansmen as latter-day Galahads who had resorted to violence only under extreme provocation. Using revolutionary cinematic techniques, D. W. Griffith adapted the novel for his 1915 epic film The Birth of a Nation. The film portrayed freedmen as beasts who dragged Southern society into anarchy. In the climactic scene, mounted Klansmen rode in to save the white heroine from rape, to castrate and lynch her African American assailant, and to redeem the South by ending fratricide among white men and reuniting the nation.

The film inspired circuit-riding minister and fraternal organizer Col. William Simmons to revive the Klan and combat modern sexuality, slackers, and aliens. The Second Klan was confined to Georgia and Alabama until 1920, when Simmons employed anti-Saloon League veteran and tenement activist Elizabeth Tyler and her companion in the Southern Publicity Association, Edward Clarke. The two agents used modern advertising and mass marketing techniques to study local communities, identify the political and social concerns of conservative Protestants, and employ recruiters to offer membership in the Knights of the Ku Klux Klan. Although strongest in the upper Midwest and West, the secret fraternal order quickly spread across the nation. By the mid-1920s, the Second Klan had become a predominantly urban, mainstream social movement of 4 million members that represented a cross section of white Protestant denominations and social classes. In the context of the time, these Klansmen were no more reactionary, racist, ethnocentric, religiously bigoted, or socially alienated than the general white Protestant population. Klansmen propounded anti-Catholic and anti-Semitic nativism, especially in the North and West, but black migration to urban areas also created small-business, employment, and housing competition, posing a direct challenge to conservative conceptions of America as an Anglo Saxon Protestant nation.

Racist ideology was central for the smaller Klan units that engaged in vigilante violence against blacks in the South. Here Klansmen also assaulted whites for a variety of moral offenses, but terrorized blacks for voting, owning property, or defending themselves against white violence. Armed supporters of Mary McLeod Bethune stood down a squad of Klansmen in Daytona, Florida during the 1920 election, but six blacks and two whites were killed in the central Florida town of Ocee during a mob attack on black voters. Three years later, Klansmen joined a mob of 250 whites that destroyed Rosewood, a mostly black town in Levy County and, according to survivors, killed 40 black residents. Sexual scandals and the failure to enforce Prohibition led to decline after 1925, but Klan activity never disappeared in parts of the South. Where racist rhetoric remained apocalyptic, Klansmen used extralegal coercion, lynching, flogging with rawhide straps, and other forms of vigilante violence to terrorize and murder African Americans. As economic destitution, unionization, and New Deal programs combined to undermine white supremacy during the 1930s, Klansmen fused racism with anticommunism to prevent black men from entering the skilled trades. In Alabama and Georgia, urban police, rural sheriffs, and Klansmen worked together to terrorize labor organizers in the steel plants and cotton fields. In Florida, the Tampa seaman's union and the United Citrus workers were attacked. Klan vigilantes also flogged and murdered union organizers in cities such as Dallas and Atlanta.

World War II provided a new context, as black veterans spearheaded the Double Victory campaign. The largest Klan was concentrated in Georgia, but Klans also grew in Alabama, Florida, and North Carolina. Despite the tireless efforts of anti-Klan activists such as Stetson Kennedy to mobilize the Justice Department against them, Klan terrorists responded to African American activism with arson and dynamite, targeting black businesses, homes, and churches in the 1940s and early 1950s. Florida Klansmen dynamited integrated housing projects and murdered two black men in 1951. On Christmas Eve, Klansmen and police assassinated Florida NAACP activist Harry Moore and his wife, detonating a bomb they had planted in their bedsprings. Federal authorities managed to convict only three Klansmen on perjury counts, and Moore's murderers walked free. Klansmen terrorized Dade County landowner Mamie Clay and flogged a group of her friends whom police had arrested and turned over to them; however, federal authorities convicted a sheriff on civil rights violations. Federal and state prosecutions were also very successful in the Carolinas in 1953, where scores of Klansmen, including a police chief, had engaged in a two-year campaign of cross-border terror.

Implementation of the 1954 Supreme Court decision in Brown v. Board of Education in the border states led to the organization of Citizens' Councils by middle-class whites throughout the South. The ultimate failure of massive resistance, however, turned people toward the Klan. Alabama Klansmen bombed black homes and churches in Montgomery and abducted and castrated black handyman Edward Aaron near Birmingham. During a 15-month period in 1957–1958, 46 bombs exploded at black and Jewish institutions in Miami, Jacksonville, Nashville, and Atlanta. In the Deep South, the politics of massive resistance retreated in the face of accelerating direct action protests after 1960. The beginning of token school desegregation, combined with federal enforcement of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 and the Voting Rights Act, spurred tens of thousands of lower-middle class and working class whites to join Klans in the urban and Piedmont South. Vigilantes were often sponsored by local police: Birmingham police gave Klansmen full license to beat the Freedom Riders in 1961, a sheriff deputized the Klansmen who led violent counter-demonstrations in St. Augustine Florida during 1963–1964, and the city government sponsored the Bogalusa, Louisiana Klan, which harassed demonstrators in 1965.

Klan violence also grew more lethal in the 1960s. In September 1963, Klansmen planted a massive bomb beneath the 16th Street Baptist Church in Birmingham Alabama. It exploded during Sunday church services, killing three little girls. In 1964, Georgia Klansmen killed black serviceman Lemuel Penn. In Mississippi 35 shootings, 30 bombings, 35 church burnings, 80 beatings, and at least 6 racially motivated murders took place during the first eight months of 1964. Fourteen died in civil rights-related killings that year and four more murders were perpetrated in 1965. Victims included two black teenagers and three civil rights workers who were murdered by police and Klansmen near Meridian during Freedom Summer. In 1967, Mississippi Klansmen killed Vernon Dahmer with a firebomb, the same method that had been used against Frank Morris in Ferriday Louisiana three years earlier. In rural Louisiana, a black self-defense force called the Deacons for Defense and Justice protected civil rights workers from white mobs and engaged in gun battles on nightriders, but Louisiana Klansmen killed pioneer Sheriff's Deputy O'Neal Moore. During the Selma to Montgomery march, Alabama Klansmen shot and killed civil rights worker Viola Liuzzo as an FBI informant made mental notes. The Klansmen who killed Penn, Dahmer, Liuzzo, and the three civil rights workers near Meridian were all convicted in federal court during the 1960s. One Klansmen was convicted of murder in the Birmingham church bombing in 1977, and a handful of others have been convicted between the 1990s and the opening decade of the 21st century. Yet the killers of Morris, Moore, and a number of other victims may never see a court of law.

Between 1964 and 1971, media -exposure, selective enforcement of local law, tax audits, and a FBI covert action program finally neutralized Klan violence. Klan membership declined to a few thousand, as white supremacy slowly changed from being an integral part of Southern life into an extremist ideology. Klans revived in the rural South during the late 1970s and attacked civil rights activists with weapons on a number of occasions. On November 3, 1979, a group of Klansmen and neo-Nazis, led by a police informant, fired on an interracial group of anti-Klan protesters in North Carolina, killing five. Despite television footage of the methodical killings, all were acquitted. In 1987, the Southern Poverty Law Center won a multimillion-dollar suit on behalf of the mother of Michael Donald, murdered by members of the United Klans of America, destroying the largest Klan organization in the country. By then, racists were joining neo-Nazi, skinhead, or Christian Identity groupings, and the Klans had splintered into a myriad of tiny groups. In general, however, as society changed around it, white supremacists lost touch with the mainstream. Although racists continue to commit racist murders, such as the brutal lynching of James Byrd Jr., in Jasper Texas in 1998, they are prosecuted and convicted by outraged jurors. The overwhelming majority of Americans today roundly condemn both white supremacist ideology and racist violence. See also: Fifteenth Amendment; Fourteenth Amendment; Lynching; The Birth of a Nation; White Citizens' Council; White Mob Violence; White Supremacy

Lawson, James

A founder of the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee (SNCC), James Morris Lawson Jr. (1921–) participated in many of the significant civil rights initiatives of the 1960s including the Nashville sit-ins, the Freedom Rides, and the Memphis sanitation strike. Born on September 22, 1928, in Uniontown, Pennsylvania to the Reverend James M. Lawson Sr. and Philane Cover, Lawson grew up in Massillon, Ohio, where his father was pastor of a Methodist church. After graduating high school, Lawson studied sociology at Baldwin Wallace College in Berea, Ohio. While at Baldwin Wallace, he received notice to report for military service. Because he was a committed pacifist, Lawson refused to serve. As a result he was convicted of draft evasion and sentenced to two years in prison. Lawson returned to Baldwin Wallace after serving 13 months of his sentence to finish his sociology degree.

After graduation, Lawson traveled to India as a missionary for the Methodist Church. While in India he was exposed to the nonviolent teachings of Mohandas K. Gandhi. As Lawson studied nonviolence, the philosophy was being applied in the American South by Martin Luther King Jr. in the Montgomery bus boycott. When he returned to the United States, Lawson met with King while he was a student at Oberlin College's school of theology. Profoundly moved by the struggle to dismantle segregation in the South, Lawson was determined to play a role in it. He was appointed southern regional director for the Fellowship of Reconciliation (FOR), an organization devoted to nonviolence.

After one year of study at Oberlin College, he enrolled in Nashville's Vanderbilt Divinity School. While in Nashville, Lawson married Dorothy Wood and they had three sons: John, Morris, and Seth. In addition to his position with the Fellowship of Reconciliation, Lawson was also appointed projects director for the Nashville chapter of Martin Luther King's Southern Christian Leadership Conference (SCLC). In these roles he conducted workshops on Christian nonviolence for students from Nashville's African American colleges: American Baptist, Fisk, Meharry Medical, and Tennessee A&I.

Several of Lawson's students, inspired by his commitment to nonviolence, launched sit-in demonstrations at several downtown Nashville lunch counters on February 13, 1960. The demonstrations continued until May 10, when government and businesses leaders agreed to desegregate downtown stores. Lawson's leadership during the Nashville sit-ins made him one of the leading civil rights figures in the American South. But there was a cost. Angered over Lawson's leadership of the sit-ins, Vanderbilt Chancellor Harvie Branscomb expelled him in March 1960. Undeterred, Lawson completed his divinity degree at Boston University and continued to spread the gospel of Christian nonviolence.

As the Nashville sit-ins reached their climax, Lawson traveled to Raleigh, North Carolina's Shaw University in April 1960 to attend a gathering of students committed to the civil rights struggle. At this meeting SNCC was formed to expand civil disobedience throughout the South. In May 1961 the Congress of Racial Equality (CORE) adopted nonviolence with its Freedom Ride demonstrations. The rides were designed to pressure President John F. Kennedy and the Interstate Commerce Commission to enforce a 1960 Supreme Court declaring segregated bus terminals unconstitutional. When demonstrators were attacked by an angry white mob in Montgomery, Alabama, Lawson joined the effort. Boarding a bus at Montgomery, Lawson and several other Nashville sit-in veterans journeyed to Jackson, Mississippi where they were arrested and sentenced to 30 days in the state penitentiary at Parchman. When Lawson was released from prison, he returned to divinity school in Boston.

After graduation from Boston University, Lawson was appointed pastor of Scott Church in Shelbyville, Tennessee, and in 1962 he was assigned to Centenary Methodist in Memphis. Although the elimination of racism and segregation was Lawson's primary focus, he did look beyond the struggle in the South. The Memphis pastor also expanded his promotion of Christian nonviolence to include the controversial war in Vietnam. In 1965, he traveled to Southeast Asia as a representative of the Fellowship of Reconciliation's Clergymen's Emergency Committee on Vietnam. While in Southeast Asia the committee met with a cross section of people including students, U.S. and South Vietnamese government leaders, North Vietnamese soldiers, and labor leaders. Upon their return Lawson and the other committee members issued a report calling on the United Nations to intervene in the conflict to bring peace to the region. Although Lawson remained concerned about the war in Vietnam, events in Memphis led him to again confront American racism.

In February 1968, sanitation workers, poorly paid and forced to endure unsafe conditions, spontaneously walked off the job. When Memphis Mayor Henry Loeb refused to negotiate, the strike became much more than a labor dispute. Because workers were predominately African American and desperately poor, Lawson joined their struggle and emerged as the most eloquent civil rights leader in Memphis. Drawing on his involvement in SNCC, Lawson and other leaders formed the Committee on the Move to Equality (COME). Lawson extended an invitation to Dr. King to speak in Memphis, which led to King's death in April 1968. Lawson continued to agitate for social change in Memphis until he moved to Los Angeles in 1974 to pastor Holman United Methodist Church. In 1982, he chaired the Peace Sunday Movement, which staged a large demonstration at the Rose Bowl. Lawson retired from the pulpit in 1999 but remains one of America's most eloquent leaders in the ongoing struggle to achieve social progress by just and peaceful means.

League of Revolutionary Black Workers

The League of Revolutionary Black Workers was officially launched in Detroit, Michigan in October 1967 after the Detroit Rebellion of that same year. It was the final outcome of a combination of independent black industrial labor-related movements in the Detroit metropolitan area. The league grew as a result of the United Auto Workers (UAW) failure to address the racist and inhumane working conditions of black people employed in Detroit's manufacturing sector. It consisted of radical, prolific blue-collar black workers with strong organizational skills. Historic and heroic struggles of black people provided the movement's strengths, inspiration was garnered by the revolutionary struggles of the developing world, and their convictions were guided by a Marxist-Leninist ideology. The league's goal was to unify black workers across Detroit.

In the 1960s, the UAW began to lose touch with minority members whose weekly organizational fees were deducted from their wages, although they had little representation on the organization's board of directors. Black workers held the view that the UAW was racist, oppressive, and not representative of their needs. The league developed out of the frustration of black workers who grew weary of the UAW's failure to meet their demands about improving their working conditions. Their demands were not unfounded, as the historical record reveals factory owner's productivity strategies that center on forced labor of black workers to work harder and faster in unsafe and unhealthy conditions. Throughout the late 1960s and early 1970s, conditions at the plants continued to deteriorate. Management hid these problems from outsiders, projecting plant life as harmonious and well paid. Unions were often loosely organized and too polarized to project to outsider a real picture of what was actually happening in the plants. The league arose in response to these conditions.

The League of Revolutionary Black Workers united radical black organizing activists in Detroit's factories, neighborhoods, high schools, and colleges and university campuses against the horrendous racially charged circumstances that dominated life for black workers in the 1960s and 1970s. Revolutionary Union Movements (RUMs), built by ordinary black workers from Detroit's auto factories were at the heart of the league. The RUMs effectively organized black workers to resist the racist and exploitive conditions in these factories and within the white-dominated UAW that officially represented the workers.

General Gordon Baker, John Watson, John Williams, Luke Tripp, Kenneth Cockrel, Mike Hamlin, and Chuck Wooten sat on the league's seven-man executive committee. Hamlin, Watson, and Cockrel held leadership positions and provided different but equal strengths to the mission of the organization. Hamlin embodied the stance that favored community building and student support, which enabled the league to carry out demonstrations when court injunctions stopped workers from protesting. Watson advocated the power of and need for an independent newspaper that would educate the public and challenge the ruling elite's power structure. In 1967, he actualized his vision through his editorial position on Wayne State University's student paper the South End. Watson used the paper as a political arm for all
