radical revolutionary groups throughout the Detroit metropolitan area. He supported the equal publication of all views, and the paper was widely distributed to segments outside the university, including automobile factories. Cockrel provided legal expertise; he served the league by filing for a nonprofit status and keeping league activities within the law to avoid convictions from criminal and civil actions. The league's awareness of the reality of this aspect of organizing is how they differed from the Black Panther Party.

In 1971, the league began to take a different form and merged with the Black Workers Congress whose manifesto centered on worker's rights, worker's demands, the elimination of racism, the liberation of women, and foreign policy questions. The Black Workers Congress had a strong beginning but petered out, as it was unable to put its ideology into practice and spent the majority of its time in meetings and setting up, but not applying, potential agendas. Eventually, the former members of the league dropped out and formed the Communist League, which advocated a multi-racial communist party based on the writings of Lenin and Marx. It accepted whites and all people from the developing world and emphasized the role of industrial workers and professional revolutionaries.

The legacy of the League of Revolutionary Workers is extensive. Despite repression from the joined forces of Chrysler, Ford, General Motors, the UAW, and Detroit and suburban police departments, it distributed mass circulation newspapers and plant bulletins, organized pickets and rallies, formed community and student groups, ran opposition union candidates, and led wildcat strikes that successfully shut down production. In these ways the league is responsible for building the last sustained mass revolutionary unions in the United States.

See also: Detroit, Michigan, Riot of 1967

Jill E. Rowe-Adjibogoun

Bibliography

- Boggs, James. The American Revolution: Pages from a Negro Worker's Notebook. New York: Monthly Review Press, 1963.
- Boyd, Herb, and Robert Allen. Brotherman: The Odyssey of Black Men in America. New York: One World, 1995.
- Georgakas, Dan, and Marvin Surkin. Detroit: I Do Mind Dying. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1975.
- Geschwender, James A. Class, Race and Worker Insurgency: The League of Revolutionary Black Workers. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1977.
- Gould, William. Black Workers in White Unions. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press, 1977.

Mast, Robert, ed., Detroit Lives. Philadelphia: Temple University Press, 1994.

Meier, August, and Elliot Rudwick. Black Detroit and the Rise of the UAW. New York: Oxford University Press, 1979.

Lee, Spike

Shelton Jackson Lee (1957–), or “Spike” Lee, is best known for his popular black films like Do the Right Thing, Jungle Fever, and Mo' Better Blues. Affectionately terming his films “Spike Lee Joints,” much of Lee's work primarily consists of race films like his Bamboozled and Get on the Bus that have been produced by Lee's own company, 40 Acres & a Mule Filmworks. In addition to these, Lee's impressive filmography includes more than 45 film credits as director, and more than 70 film credits overall, serving as producer or writer in other films such as Drop Squad and Tales from the 'Hood. Moreover, in addition to his specifically black films, Lee's filmography also include mainstream motion pictures like 25th Hour and Inside Man as well as a host of documentaries exploring sports figures like Jim Brown: All American and historical figures such as A Huey P. Newton Story.

As a director, Spike Lee is best known for his unique stylistic elements, which include signature close-up shots, repetition, and montage just to name a few. Spike Lee joints are typically identified by the number of scenes with the actor and camera both placed on a dolly, such as Pierre Delacroix's circular motion that introduces the plot of Bamboozled or his use of montage to advance the story of “Indigo” and “Clark” confronting a cheating “Bleak Gil- liam” in Mo' Better Blues. Also, the small cadre of black actors including Denzel Washington, his sister Joie Lee, and Delroy Lindo help to distinguish a Spike Lee film when they are all cast together. And last, the regular practice of casting his own part in the film is another Spike Lee feature that began with his first film. Much of Lee's unique style and critical acclaim began with She's Gotta Have It, which was noted both for the film itself, as well as for Lee's part as “Mars Blackmon.” Shot at one location in black and white, and edited in Lee's own apartment, She's Gotta Have It was made with only $175,000 and in 12 days but went on to gross over $7 million in box office receipts. Many of the elements first attempted in She's Gotta Have It have since been refined and now continue to punctuate Lee's larger body of work.

Film director Spike Lee. (Onestepbeyond70/Dreamstime)

Over the course of Lee's career, the reception of his brand of filmmaking has oscillated between controversial and celebratory, garnering much debate for his depiction of women (in films like Girl 6) while also hailed for its ability to represent communities of African Americans through popular cinema. His heavy-handed artistic touch makes films like Malcolm X an important piece for scholars of black film because of its mixed reception—critiqued by some for its historical inaccuracy, but also applauded as an artistic endeavor heavily supported by black celebrities like Janet Jackson and Michael Jordan who funded its completion. Lee's style and politics almost force a commitment to his vision that not only congeals his films into a single body of work across film genres, but also compel his fervor to finance his own films.

Viewers of Lee's work will also find pieces of the director's own biography dispersed throughout the films, and across characters in a single film. So Spike Lee's life story beginning with his birth in Atlanta Georgia on March 20, 1957 to Bill Lee, a jazz musician, and Jacquelyn Lee, a schoolteacher, is signaled in the parents of "Bleek Gilliam" in Mo' Better Blues. And although Lee moved to Brooklyn, New York, during adolescence to complete his secondary education before returning to Atlanta for college, the significance of Brooklyn as a backdrop is iterated across his entire body of work. Lee even found a fictional place for the actual loss of his mother on screen, by interspersing the story of migration between New York and Atlanta with the story of a family losing its matriarch in Crooklyn. Lee's filmic portrayal of the historically black college experience retold through School Daze also speaks to his own choice to follow in the footsteps of his father and grandfather and attend Morehouse College in Atlanta, Georgia.

Developing his film interests in college, Lee quickly gained recognition for his talent. Upon completing a bachelor degree, he went on to New York University film school where he made award-winning films "the Answer" to D. W. Griffith's The Birth of a Nation and Joe's Bed-Stuy Barber-shop: We Cut Heads as a graduate student. Since then Lee has firmly established himself as a noted black filmmaker. Although he has yet to receive an Academy Award, he has been recognized with a nomination for best documentary for his film Four Little Girls, while his When the Levees Broke: A Requiem in Four Acts went on to win the Human Rights Film Award and the Venice Horizons Documentary Award at the 2006 Venice Film Festival.

See also: Bombingham; Million Man March; The Birth of a Nation; X, Malcolm

Jasmine Nichole Cobb

Bibliography

- Arnold, David. Pocket Essential: Spike Lee. London: Herts, 2003.
- Bogle, Donald. Toms, Coons, Mulattoes, Mammies, and Bucks: An Interpretive History of Blacks in American Films, 3rd ed. New York: Continuum, 1994.
- Cobb, Jasmine Nichole, and John L. Jackson Jr. "They Hate Me: Spike Lee, Documentary Filmmaking, and Hollywood's 'Savage Slot.'" In Fight the Power! The Spike Lee Reader, Janice D. Hamlet and Robin Means Coleman, eds., 251–72. New York: Peter Lang Publishers, 2008.

Lewis, John

John Lewis (1940–) was a student leader in the Civil Rights movement, serving as chair of the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee (SNCC) from 1963 to 1966. Lewis was born on February 21, 1940, in rural Alabama, one of 10 children. His parents were poor sharecroppers who managed to buy their own small farm when Lewis was four. As a boy, he made his playmates listen to impromptu sermons he gave, and he imagined becoming a pastor. As he grew older, he heard Martin Luther King's radio preaching, and at 16, Lewis's pastor allowed him to give his first sermon. He was in high school when the Montgomery bus boycott started.

In 1957, he went to American Baptist Theology (ABT) Seminary in Nashville, Tennessee, a school that allowed students to work in exchange for tuition. He met James Bevel at ABT, another man who would emerge as a leader. The next year Lewis met James Lawson and began studying the principles of nonviolence with him. Nashville students began having regular workshops in preparation for non-violent actions protesting segregation in the future, which included role-playing sessions in which some students would pretend to be segregationists while others acted as protestors.

On February 1, 1960, four African American students sat at a whites-only lunch counter in Greensboro, North Carolina. Lewis and his peers had been preparing for a moment like this, and the Nashville sit-ins began February 13. Within a couple of weeks, protestors were being attacked and arrested. This movement was eventually successful, and Nashville's lunch counters were integrated. Following the spread of the sit-in movement throughout the South, students formed SNCC in April, and Lewis was a major organizer. In the wake of the sit-ins, northern universities began inviting Lewis and other leaders to speak about the movement.

In 1961, Lewis took part in the Freedom Rides, designed to test a Supreme Court ruling banning segregation on interstate buses. The interracial group of riders planned to board buses in Washington, D.C. and ride them to New Orleans. Lewis had to leave the original group early because of an obligation, but he returned to Nashville to organize additional riders to keep the rides going in light of the violence the original riders endured. Lewis left with a group from Nashville and faced a violent mob at Birmingham's terminal. When Lewis disembarked in Montgomery, he faced a worse situation, and mobs beat Lewis and other riders severely. Police arrested riders in Jackson, Mississippi; they were eventually sent to Parchman Prison. Hundreds of other students, witnessing these events, began following Lewis's path on buses throughout the South.

Lewis and his peers next turned their efforts to discrimination against African Americans in employment.

The Nashville Student Movement (NSM) picketed and boycotted Nashville stores that took African Americans' money but would not employ them. In the fall, Lewis enrolled at Fisk University and became chair of the NSM.

In June 1963, Lewis was elected as SNCC's Chair, and he moved to Atlanta to fulfill his duties. He thus was one of the "Big Six" civil rights leaders at the August 1963 March on Washington. Lewis also gave one of the speeches at the March, although other leaders pressured him to revise his speech because they thought it too inflammatory. He and his SNCC colleagues did so moments before the speech was to begin.

Lewis continued working on a variety of civil rights projects. Major ones included the Mississippi Freedom Democratic Party (MFDP), which would run a slate of African American candidates in that state, and Freedom Summer in 1964, which would bring hundreds of white volunteers from the North into Mississippi, well known as the most dangerous southern state for civil rights workers. In fact, on June 21, the day the first wave of volunteers began their journey South, three civil rights workers were murdered, one African American and two whites. The results of Lewis's and his colleagues' efforts in Mississippi were mixed: many African Americans registered to vote, but the Democratic Party refused to seat the MFDP's delegation at its August convention.

After Freedom Summer, SNCC faced increasing organizational problems. Because of its growth, it was becoming difficult for committee members to continue making decisions by consensus. In addition, more and more SNCC workers were becoming less attached to nonviolence as a tactic, whereas others, like Lewis, remained deeply committed to it as a philosophy. SNCC had projects in operation all over the South, and although Lewis tried to keep abreast of all of them, in January 1965, he turned his attention to voter registration in Selma, Alabama. This action involved potential voters marching to the courthouse and attempting to register, where they were refused entrance and often arrested or beaten.

In the wake of a protestor's death—police shot him in the stomach as he tried to protect his mother from a beating—Lewis and others organized a march from Selma to Montgomery. The day the march was to begin, March 7, is now known as "Bloody Sunday" because mounted police severely beat, stomped, and tear gassed protestors as they attempted to cross the Edmund Pettus Bridge. Lewis led the marchers and was among the first to be beaten; he had to be hospitalized with a fractured skull.

After the Civil Rights Act of 1964 and Voting Rights Act of 1965 passed, the already-simmering issues of African American separation and the rejection of nonviolence came to the fore within SNCC. In May 1966, at the end of SNCC's annual meeting, in this case a long, contentious, and emotion-filled one, SNCC elected the fiery Stokely Carmichael as chair, replacing Lewis. He remained with SNCC for a short time, leaving in the wake of controversy over the June Meredith March in Mississippi and the emergence of the black power slogan.

Since leaving SNCC, Lewis has most recently served as the U.S. Representative from Georgia's 5th District, representing Atlanta since 1986. Before becoming a member of Congress, he worked on the Voter Education Project in the South and then in the Carter administration as associate director of ACTION, which oversaw volunteer programs. He also served on Atlanta's City Council, taking office in 1982.

See also: Black Power; Bloody Sunday; Freedom Rides; Lawson, James; March on Washington, 1963; Mississippi Freedom Summer, 1964; Selma March; Sit-In Movement; Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee

Erin Boade

Bibliography

- Arsenault, Raymond. Freedom Riders: 1961 and the Struggle for Racial Justice. New York: Oxford University Press, 2006.
- Branch, Taylor. At Canaan's Edge: America in the King Years 1965–68. New York: Simon & Schuster, 2006.
- Branch, Taylor. Parting the Waters: America in the King Years 1954–63. New York: Simon & Schuster, 1988.
- Branch, Taylor. Pillar of Fire: America in the King Years 1963–65. New York: Simon & Schuster, 1998.
- Carson, Clayborne. In Struggle: SNCC and the Black Awakening of the 1960s. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1995.
- Hogan, Wesley. Many Minds, One Heart: SNCC's Dream for a New America. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 2007.
- Lewis, John, and Michael D'Orso. Walking with the Wind: A Memoir of the Movement. New York: Simon & Schuster, 1998.

Little Rock Nine

In the battle for school integration, nine black students became heroes to civil rights supporters when they enrolled at Central High School in Little Rock, Arkansas, for the 1957 school year. The “Little Rock Nine,” as the students were known, participated in one of the more famous integration conflicts, as white students and parents actively opposed their attempt to integrate the Little Rock school district. After the Brown v. Board of Education decision, in which the Supreme Court ruled segregation illegal in public schools, members of the Little Rock School Board began working on a plan for integration. After three years of deliberations and controversy, the board settled on a plan that would gradually integrate the district, beginning with high schools in the 1957–1958 school year. Initially, the board selected 17 black students to attend Central High, but by August, the number had dwindled to 9. A group of anti-integration Central High parents, called the Mother's League, sought a federal injunction to stop the school from integrating, but a judge refused their request. The students planned to enter the school for the first time on September 3, 1957.

Orval Faubus, the governor of Arkansas, had not been as militant in his opposition to integration as some of his southern counterparts, but he ultimately decided to oppose the integration of Central High. The night before the students were scheduled to attend school there, he addressed the state via television. Claiming to have received word that white supremacists were traveling to Little Rock to prevent the integration of Central High, he ordered troops from the Arkansas National Guard to prevent any black students from entering the school. The students did not attend class the first day of school, but Daisy Bates, an official with the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP), decided that the students should attempt to enter Central on September 4. The group planned to arrive at school together with Bates. Eight of the students did meet before school, but one student, Elizabeth Eckford, did not have a phone and was not aware of the plan. When the eight students arrived, they were shouted at and threatened by an angry mob of white segregationists. Members of the National Guard denied the students entrance into the school. Because of the violence, NAACP leaders decided to postpone integration until they could expect better conditions for the students.

Determined to enforce the orders of the federal courts, President Dwight Eisenhower arranged a meeting with Faubus. At the meeting, Faubus agreed to order National Guard troops to protect the students, but he later reneged on that promise. On September 20, a federal judge ruled that Governor Faubus could not legally use the Arkansas

National Guard to deny the students entrance into Central High. Although he expressed disappointment with the decision, Faubus accepted it and agreed not to send troops to the school. On September 23, the students planned to attend school. Before they arrived, another angry mob of white parents and segregation supporters gathered outside the school. They harassed and physically harmed several black reporters who were in Little Rock to cover the event. When the students arrived, the mob attacked them, shouting insults and threats. Although the students made it safely inside the building, by late morning the city police who were patrolling the school felt the mob was uncontrollable. Worried for the physical safety of the children if the mob overcame police barricades, school officials sent the students home out the back entrance of the school.

To ensure that the children could attend the school without threat of physical injury, President Eisenhower ordered the 101st Airborne Division into Little Rock to protect the students. With the troops' assistance, the students were able to attend school safely. To make sure that the students were safe once inside the building, members of the 101st served as escorts for them. After several months, the 101st troops left, and the students had to fend for themselves. They faced consistent persecution from their fellow students, including threatening letters, harassing phone calls, and physical abuse. Despite the harassment, the black students continued to attend school. Eight of the nine students completed the school year. Minnijean Brown was suspended in December for responding to harassment by pouring her soup on two white boys. She was expelled during the spring semester for insulting white students. Ernest Green was the only senior of the group. In May, he became the first black graduate of Central High School. The following school year, Governor Faubus closed down Little Rock schools in an effort to avoid further integration. When courts ruled his act unconstitutional, the school district was forced to integrate for the 1959 school year. Jefferson Thomas and Carlotta Walls, two of the original "Little Rock Nine," were the only two black students assigned to Central High. The students' ordeal was another example of tenacious white resistance to integration. The actions of the "Little Rock Nine" ensured that, despite the resistance, Little Rock schools would eventually integrate.

See also: Bates, Daisy; Brown v. Board of Education; National Association for the Advancement of Colored People

Blake A. Ellis

Bibliography

- Bates, Daisy. The Long Shadow of Little Rock: A Memoir. Fayetteville: University of Arkansas Press, 1986.
- Beals, Melba Pattillo. Warriors Don't Cry: A Searing Memoir of the Battle to Integrate Little Rock's Central High. New York: Washington Square Press, 1994.
- Huckaby, Elizabeth. Crisis at Central High, Little Rock, 1957–1958. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1980.
- Jacoway, Elizabeth, and C. Fred Williams, eds. Understanding the Little Rock Crisis: An Exercise in Remembrance and Reconciliation. Fayetteville: University of Arkansas Press, 1999.
- Record, Wilson, and Jane Cassels Record, eds. Little Rock, U.S.A.: Materials for Analysis. San Francisco: Chandler, 1960.

Long Hot Summer Riots, 1965–1967

The term "Long Hot Summer" is often applied to the riots occurring in the United States during the spring and summer months of 1965, 1966, and 1967. These violent disturbances often began in hot weather, often required the assistance of the National Guard, and caused much financial damage, many arrests, and many deaths. They helped to point out to the nation the discrimination still prevalent at the time, as well the reforms needed to heal a nation divided by race.

Part of understanding the Long Hot Summer Riots is understanding the effect of the Great Migration. From about 1890 until 1965, black Americans from the South migrated to northern cities. They were looking for opportunity and a better life. In the South, there was violence against blacks, lynchings, and Jim Crow laws (laws that limited the voting rights of black Americans). And the primarily agricultural-based economy of the South was in trouble: there was an attack of the boll weevil as well as a drought. The North offered opportunity, especially during World War I when European immigration declined and there was a growing need for laborers in northern factories and businesses.

Typical of other immigrants, these black Americans who migrated to the North congregated in neighborhoods—most often in the older, less desirable parts of inner cities. But unlike other immigrants, blacks were excluded from moving into better neighborhoods because of discriminatory practices. In fact, segregation by neighborhoods continued into the latter part of the 20th century. (The Fair Housing Act of 1968 legally put an end to these practices.)

Continued discrimination, overcrowding, high unemployment, and inadequate schools made these neighborhood potential powder kegs, especially if their populations were aware of news being reported by the media.

Although the media did report on continuing civil rights gains before to the period of 1965 through 1967, they also presented images of racism and violence. In 1955, 14-year-old Emmett Till was lynched in Money, Mississippi, and pictures of his battered body appeared in Jet magazine. This was also the year of the highly publicized stance by Rosa Parks in Alabama. In 1957, media images showed federal troops in Little Rock as they enforced the desegregation of Central High School. In 1963, there were violent outbreaks in Savannah, Cambridge, Maryland, Philadelphia, Chicago, and especially in Birmingham, Alabama, where racists bombed a church, killing four little girls. In 1964, there were a number of disturbances and racially motivated murders: three civil rights leaders were lynched in Mississippi and law enforcement was implicated; blacks started using Molotov cocktails; a number of cities, including the New York neighborhoods of Harlem and Bedford Stuyvesant, had violent altercations. All of these events were reported in the media. Things were heating up.

Then, on August 11, 1965, in the Watts neighborhood of Los Angeles in the middle of a summer heat wave, a simple incident ignited a major riot. A highway patrolman stopped a speeding black driver and arrested him for driving under the influence. A mob started to congregate and events escalated. Passing white motorists were dragged out of their cars and beaten; automobiles were overturned and set on fire. Eventually, the National Guard had to be called in to restore order. In all, 34 people were killed, nearly 4,000 people were arrested, and there was $35 million in damages.

In the spring of 1966, emotions again flared in Watts, although not to the extent they had the previous year. But in July, Chicago exploded with rock-throwing and fire-bombing. Again it required the National Guard to quell the violence. Three people were killed by stray bullets and there were 533 arrests. Within weeks, violence requiring the National Guard also broke out in the Hough neighborhood of Cleveland. Later the same month, the courts had to ban demonstrations by white extremists in Baltimore, Maryland. In all, 43 different cities had racially violent events in 1966.

In 1967, nearly 150 cities had racial disturbances. Those in Detroit and Newark were major. But it seemed that just as a violent situation in one city began to calm, violence broke out in another, from Nashville (April 7), to Jackson, Mississippi (May 10), to Houston (May 16) to Tampa (June 11), to Cincinnati (June 12), to Atlanta (June 17).

Then in July 1967, the two worst riots of the summer broke out, the first in Newark, New Jersey. Lasting from July 14 to July 17, the riots in Newark began in the Central Ward and spread into the downtown area. In the end, there was $10 million dollars in damage, 725 people injured, 1,500 arrested, and 23 people killed. The unemployment rate for black males between 16 and 19 was 37.8 percent, and there was a long history of perceived police brutality.

The Detroit riots began on July 23 and lasted for five days. The flash point for the violence was the arrests of 82 people who were at an after-hours bar celebrating the return of two Vietnam War veterans near the home of Danny Thomas, a Vietnam veteran who had been killed by a gang of white youths. The neighborhood became inflamed and the violence escalated. In the end, there was $22 million dollars in damage, 1,189 people injured, and 43 people killed—the youngest was 4 years old and the oldest, 68—and 7,000 people arrested.

As a result of all the violence, President Lyndon Johnson appointed a Commission on Civil Disorder on July 28, 1967 to be chaired by Governor Otto Kerner of Illinois. Their famous conclusion stated, “Our nation is moving toward two societies, one black, one white—separate and unequal” (The Kerner Report, p. 1).

See also: Detroit, Michigan, Riot of 1967; Johnson, Lyndon Baines; Kerner Commission Report; Los Angeles, California, Riot of 1965; Urban Ghetto; Urbanization

William P. Toth

Bibliography

- Allen, Rodney F., and Charles H. Adair, ed. Violence and Riots in Urban America. Worthington, OH: Charles A. Jones Publishing, 1969.
- Fuguitt, Glenn V., John A. Fulton, and Calvin L. Beale. The Shifting Patterns of Black Migration from and into the Nonmetropolitan South, 1965–95. Washington, DC: U.S. Department of Agriculture Rural Development Research Report No. 93, 2001.
- The National Advisory Commission on Civil Disorders. The Kerner Report. New York: Pantheon, 1968.
- Upton, James N. A Social History of 20th Century Urban Riots. Bristol, IN: Wyndham Hall Press, 1984.

Los Angeles, California, Riot 1965

The Los Angeles riot of 1965, also known as the Watts riot, or Watts rebellion, was one of the most explosive, racially charged civil disturbances of the 1960s. The riot began on August 11 when a white police officer, Lee W. Minikus, stopped Marquette Frye, a 21-year-old African American man, and Ronald Frye, his 22-year-old brother, for reckless driving. After Marquette, the driver, failed the standard Highway Patrol sobriety test, Minikus informed him that he was under arrest for drunk driving. Having arrived on a motorcycle with no way to take Marquette to jail, Minikus radioed for a police vehicle and a tow truck to remove the car from its location at 116th Street and Avalon Boulevard, a predominantly black neighborhood two blocks away from the Frye home in the Watts community.

After learning that Minikus would not release the car to him, Ronald went home to find his mother, hoping she could claim the vehicle and prevent impoundment. Mrs. Frye, Ronald, the tow truck, the patrol vehicle, and Minikus's motorcycle partner arrived simultaneously, as a growing number of residents and passers-by watched Marquette's arrest unfold. By this time, Minikus called in for more reinforcements as the number of onlookers quickly swelled from dozens to hundreds, intensifying tensions between the Frye family and the officers. These tensions erupted into violence within minutes when Mrs. Frye became enraged over the forcible arrest of Marquette. Witnesses grew increasingly more hostile, as Marquette, Ronald, and their mother fought with the arresting officers, leading to the subsequent arrest of the entire family. As the scene cleared, the crowd became irate, throwing bottles and rocks—even spitting—at officers, resulting in the arrests of two other African Americans who police alleged incited the crowd to violence.

Within hours of the arrests, rumors spread throughout the Watts community about police treatment of the Frye family, and those arrested from the crowd; chaos and rebellion ensued. A number of Watts community members engaged in violence and vandalism throughout the night and into the early hours of the morning. By the next day, police still failed to gain complete control over the pockets of disturbances erupting throughout Watts. Over the course of the next two days, local community activists, religious leaders, teachers, business owners, and the Los Angeles County

Human Relations Committee worked to prevent further outbreaks of violence and destruction, but their efforts were largely unsuccessful. Violence, looting, and destruction permeated the Watts community and some adjacent areas for the next few days.

In an attempt to restore peace, then Governor Pat Brown sent the National Guard to quell the unrest. The arrival of National Guardsmen, however, only served to heighten tensions and spread the destruction into south-east Los Angeles. Guardsmen found it difficult to control each incidence of rebellion; they also found it difficult to distinguish African American victims of the riot from African American participants, prolonging the riot's end. Lasting six days, the riot left 34 people dead, more than 900 seriously injured, and 4,000 arrested, as well as more than $35 million in property damage and destruction.

To many white Americans, the rioting and destruction in Watts appeared to be a violent reaction to an isolated event. To others, the rioting was simply inexplicable, an unlawful and terrifying response to things of which they had no complete knowledge. Furthermore, media images and descriptions of African American rioters served to intensify already demonized perceptions of African Americans held by whites, who had little to no real contact with them. The Frye arrest symbolized much more for many of the residents of Watts, and rioting represented a dramatic solution to deeply rooted problems within the African American community that both the local and federal government ignored for decades.

When the rioting ended, Governor Brown enlisted the help of a government panel, the McCone Commission, to find reasons why the Watts community exploded as it had, and to provide details on what exactly occurred during the days of unrest. The McCone Commission, led by former CIA director John McCone, released a comprehensive report—Violence in the City: An End or a Beginning?—in December 1965 detailing their findings on the revolt, and pointing to several of its underlying determinants. The commission concluded that unemployment, underemployment, inadequate schooling, and a tense relationship between the Los Angeles Police Department and African American residents all contributed to the unfolding of the Watts riot. They also maintained that the presence and illegal activities of African American gangs and petty criminals were other important mitigating factors in the six-day rebellion.

Although the McCone Commission arrived at many accurate conclusions, in a sense, they were obvious, particularly to those living in African American communities in and around Los Angeles. Moreover, implicit and explicit prejudices about poor African Americans and Hispanic Americans informed the commission's conclusions. They overlooked and underestimated the persistence of conflicts within poor African American families caused by outside factors of unemployment, insufficient educational resources, and a lack of proper housing in Watts and other African American communities in Los Angeles. Furthermore, the report downplayed the ongoing problem of police brutality against African Americans by the Los Angeles Police Department, an issue which, by the 1960s, became more salient as its occurrences rose. Therefore, the assertion that the Los Angeles Police Department struggled to control African American criminal activity in Watts, without acknowledgement of its tendency to brutalize and terrorize African Americans—specifically young African American men—was a major failure in the McCone Commission report. This, however, was merely one of several instances within the report in which the McCone Commission overlooked or minimized the social and historical factors that led to the riot.

In the two decades before the Los Angeles riot, African Americans experienced extreme prejudice in the job and housing markets, and the same sources of discrimination largely excluded them from full participation in the American economy. Also, despite the gains of civil rights activists and organizations, such as Thurgood Marshall and the NAACP, forcing integration in the educational system through legislation, many schools throughout the United States remained segregated. White Americans fled into suburban communities to avoid sending their children to school with African American youths, allowing middle class African Americans to move into formerly white-occupied areas, and increasing the number of poor African American ghettos throughout the nation. Despite the diligent efforts of civil rights activists to create greater African American inclusion in American society, African American communities continued to endure restrictive housing provisions limited to overcrowded urban areas, or underdeveloped suburban and rural areas. Likewise, employment opportunities for African Americans were often limited to positions of service to white Americans. In short, where African Americans did not create political, economic, educational, and social spaces in which they could participate fully, few, if any, existed. The McCone Commission's failure, or inability, to recognize these overwhelming problems in the daily lives of many African Americans in Los Angeles reflects perhaps their greatest source of discontent, for it was an outgrowth of yet another point of frustration in African American life—invisibility.

High levels of segregation, poverty, and discrimination made African Americans, poor African Americans especially, in Los Angeles figuratively invisible to white and middle class Americans. At the very least, they were domestic, and public servants of varying sorts, those who lived on the other side of town. At most, they were agitators of racial integration and racial equality, or sources of racial conflict. Invisibility therefore, played a significant role in the actions of many African Americans during the Los Angeles riots. For some, it was an attempt at gaining national attention, a drastic move to expose the great inconsistencies within the professed American ideals of freedom and equality, and the praxis of those ideals. Indeed, a significant number of studies revealed that African American rioters did not randomly destroy property in Los Angeles, but that much of the property burned or looted belonged to business owners who discriminated against African American community members. Conversely, a significant number of rioters had no underlying political motives; the civil unrest provided an opportunity to commit crimes or provided access to things they would not have ordinarily afforded. Still others in the African American community did not participate in the riots; the extent of their involvement was through the media, or through voluntary aid to those seriously injured during the riots. Consequently, the commission's failure to address or acknowledge the issues vital to preventing further outbreaks of civil rebellion left many in the African American community disillusioned.

The feeling of disillusionment among African Americans was merely one of many impacts of the Los Angeles riot. Rioting in Watts, and its national media coverage, sparked rioting in hundreds of other cities around the United States throughout the 1960s. African American communities in New York City; Washington, D.C. Providence, Rhode Island; Hartford, Connecticut; Phoenix, Arizona; Chicago, Illinois; Cambridge, Massachusetts; Detroit, Michigan; and Jersey City, New Jersey all erupted into revolt. Each city had its own legacy of long-term social and political exclusion and discrimination. Watts and other African American communities in Los Angeles remained largely poor communities segregated from upper and middle class Los Angeles residents. The plight of poor African Americans in Los Angeles gained greater media coverage, and increased white Americans' awareness of their plight, but white American attitudes about African Americans shifted very little, if at all. White Americans now understood what happened in African American communities, but because of the riot, they were less inclined to sympathize, thus maintaining a strenuous relationship between white Americans and African Americans. Conversely, African American rioting in Los Angeles and other African American communities forced all Americans to rethink the nature and impact of race on all groups within the United States. For those who did riot with underlying political agendas, at least some part of their grievances was recognized. Still, gaining heightened recognition for the legion of problems plaguing inner-city black communities did not necessarily generate useful solutions. Yet another impact of the riot was the shift in African American leadership, from the older generation of African Americans who used legal strategies and nonviolent means of civil disobedience to address discrimination, to the younger generation who had lost faith in the previous strategies of political agitation and were not opposed to violent means of civil disobedience if necessary. This new leadership represented a shift in the African American Civil Rights movement that brought with it messages of cultural pride, nationalism, and empowerment, and gave rise to organizations such as the Black Panther Party and the black arts movement.

Perhaps the most discouraging impact of the riot in Los Angeles is the relative lack of change in the area. The lessons of the riot and its successors throughout the country have seemingly gone largely ignored. To a great extent, the problems that existed for many African American Los Angeles residents in the 1960s remain prevalent. The greatest example of this was the occurrence of the Los Angeles riots of 1992, which included residents of various economic, racial, and ethnic backgrounds. Nonetheless, there are many existing civil rights organizations within Los Angeles working to address the persisting problems of social injustice in Los Angeles.

See also: Kerner Commission Report; Johnson, Lyndon Baines; Long Hot Summer Riots, 1965–1967; Urban Ghetto; Urbanization

Lacey P. Hunter

Bibliography

- Harding, Vincent, Robin D. G. Kelley, and Earl Lewis. "We Changed the World: 1945–1970." In To Make Our World Anew: A History of African Americans. Robin D. G. Kelley and Earl Lewis, eds., 445–542. New York: Oxford University Press, 2000.
- Horne, Gerald. The Fire This Time: The Watts Uprising and the 1960s. Charlottesville: University Press of Virginia, 1995.
- Johnson, Paula B., John B. McConahay, and David O. Sears. "Black Invisibility, the Press, and the Los Angeles Riot," The American Journal of Sociology 76, no. 4 (1971):698–721.
- The McCone Commission. "Violence in the City: An End or a Beginning?" and Bullock, Paul [excerpts from] Watts: The Aftermath." In Taking it to the Streets: A Sixties Reader. Alexander Bloom and Wini Breines, eds., 142–52. New York: Oxford University Press, 1995.

Los Angeles, California, Riot 1992

The ill-famed beating of a 25-year-old African American on March 3, 1991 and the equally notorious assault of a 33-year-old white truck driver on April 29, 1992, "book-ended" 109 hours of violence and looting in Los Angeles, California, from April 29 through May 4, 1992. The toll of the Los Angeles Riot of 1992: 53 dead, 2,383 injured, 12,000 arrested, 7,000 fires, and 3,100 businesses damaged or destroyed, at a loss estimated at between $700 million and $1 billion, makes Los Angeles the site of the most deadly and costly riot in contemporary U.S. history.

The Los Angeles Riot of 1992 is a story of intersections. The intersection of Foothill Boulevard and Osborne Road in the middle-class Lake View Terrace neighborhood of Los Angeles is where George Holliday—an Argentinean-born plumbing supply salesman—videotaped the beating and arrest of Rodney G. King by four officers of the Los Angeles Police Department (LAPD) in the early morning hours of March 3, 1991, after King was pulled over for speeding. The intersection of West Florence and South Normandie Avenues in gritty South Central Los Angeles is where Reginald Denny was pulled from his truck, beaten and robbed by six young men in an expression of lawlessness, fueled ostensibly by rage at the April 29, 1992 acquittal of the four LAPD officers for the beating of King. Filmed from a helicopter hovering some 1,000 feet above Florence and Normandie, the Denny beating was broadcast live from coast to coast.

The video of two brutal beatings, at two starkly different intersections in America's second largest city, serves as an iconography of cause and effect. In the almost 20 years since the riot, scholarship has explored other intersections in attempts to explain why Los Angeles erupted in violence in 1992. For some scholars and students of urban America, the beating of King and the subsequent acquittal of Officers Laurence Powell, Timothy Wind, Theodore Briseno, and Sergeant Stacey Koon ignited decades of smoldering resentment against a police department at once praised and yet vilified for a “tough-on-crime” approach to policing that many saw as harboring a violent racism at its core. Such was the conclusion of an independent commission at the time of the Rodney King beating whose examination of the LAPD wrote of an alarming disregard for unwarranted force under the “color of law.”

Other scholars point to economic disenfranchisement, paying particular attention to the decline of manufacturing in Los Angeles, and the concomitant growth of an increasingly suburban-centered service economy in the high-technology “knowledge-industries,” as well as increasing competition for low-paying unskilled jobs among African Americans and Hispanics. A protracted economic recession in 1992 contributed to already high inner-city unemployment, which in turn contributed to an increase in the illegal drug trade, property crime, and assault. The impact of this recession on the chronically unemployed young men and women in the city of Los Angeles devastated an already distressed group at the margins. In 1992, unemployment approached 50 percent for inner-city youth. Rodney King was emblematic of the lives of the men and women of his generation. On March 3, 1991, King was an underemployed part-time usher at Dodger stadium who three months earlier was released from prison after serving time for an armed robbery.

In 1990, sociologist Theodore Caplow and his colleagues noted a 20-year decline in rioting and violent demonstration in the United States, which they attributed to the use of the courtroom and litigation as the primary mode of nonviolent struggle in the post-Civil Rights era. At first glance, the Los Angeles riot seems to belie this conclusion. Yet almost 48 hours after the verdict in the LAPD criminal trial, Rodney King broke his long silence to declare that he would have his day in court. King, perhaps more than anyone else, understood that the criminal prosecution of four police officers was not a final instance of justice denied. In a civil suit against the City of Los Angeles, King was awarded $3.8 million dollars in compensation for his brutal beating.

A 1993 federal civil rights trial against the four officers resulted in a guilty verdict against Powell and Koon for violating King’s civil rights.

On April 29, 1992, acquittal mixed with hopelessness was the base for an alchemy of rage, not only for the beating of King, but for the violent death of 15-year-old Latasha Harlins, who was killed in Compton, California on March 16, 1991, just 10 days after the beating of Rodney King. Harlins was shot in the back of the head after an altercation with Soon Ja Du, a 49-year-old Korean-immigrant merchant who wrongly accused Harlins of stealing a container of orange juice. Convicted of voluntary manslaughter, Du was sentenced to five years probation, 400 hours of community service, and a $500.00 fine; the sentence was upheld on appeal. Harlins’s brutal slaying was recorded by the store’s security camera. Like the King videotape, the videotaped slaying of Latasha Harlins seemed to show that justice was yet again denied to an African American. The jury acquittal in the beating trial of the four LAPD officers and the sentence imposed on Du were the two events that caused the eruption of lawlessness and violence that began on the evening of April 29, 1992.

The Los Angeles riot began as a violent insurrection in response to a perception of the failure of the American system of justice. Anger and chaos during a period of economic decline quickly led to what witnesses described as a “party-like” atmosphere of gleeful looting by inner-city poor of all ages and races. Political pundits on the right attributed a “culture of poverty” to the looting; critics on the left viewed the riot as a response to nascent economic disenfranchisement resulting from globalization. Scholars of the “new media” place Holliday’s videotape at the advent of “citizen-journalism,” pointing out that Holliday’s video led to sweeping reforms of the LAPD. Other analysts accuse the media of simplifying the King beating and particularly charge that the editing of the Holliday tape for broadcast left out important images of King that led the jury in the criminal trial to conclude that King was violently resisting arrest.

When Rodney King assured the public that he would have his day in court, he also pleaded, “Can we all get along?” This simple question goes to the heart of the agonizing history of conflict and social relations in the United States. It is the image of an unidentified young African American man, however, who, more than any other, captured the essence of the riot. Surrounded by antipolice graffiti, a photographer captured the young man just moments after he spray-painted the powerful message that emerged from Los Angeles in the Spring of 1992, no justice, no peace.

See also: Los Angeles, California, Riot of 1965; Urban Ghetto; Urbanization

David Alan Rego

Bibliography

- Cannon, Lou. Official Negligence: How Rodney King and the Riots Changed Los Angeles and the LAPD. New York: Basic Books, 1999.
- Gooding-Williams, Robert, ed. Reading Rodney King, Reading Urban Uprising. New York: Routledge, 1993.
- Jacobs, Ronald F. Race Media, and the Crisis of Civil Society: From the Watts Riots to Rodney King. New York: Cambridge University Press, 2000.
- Los Angeles Times. Understanding the Riots: Los Angeles Before and after the Rodney King Case. Los Angeles: Los Angeles Times, 1992.

Louima, Abner

In August 1997, Abner Louima (1966–) was beaten and sexually assaulted by New York Police Department (NYPD) officers at the 70th Precinct in Brooklyn. The Louima case, like the earlier Rodney King case in Los Angeles, exposed police brutality to the public. The abuse of Louima was also one of several instances of police violence against unarmed black men in New York City in the late 1990s and after. Ten years after the torture of Louima, the activist Reverend Al Sharpton stated, “Louima is to police-community relations what Selma was to the voter rights movement” (“One Man & One City Forever Changed”).

Louima, then a security guard in his early thirties, had immigrated to the United States from Haiti in the early 1990s to escape political violence. On August 9, 1997, he was arrested for a crime he did not commit. Officer Justin Volpe, then 25 years old, arrested Louima after a fight broke out at Club Rendez-Vous in Flatbush, Brooklyn, falsely claiming Louima had hit him. The abuse began as Louima was transported to jail. Another man, Patrick Antoine, accused of being involved in the fight, was arrested and struck by police officers.

At the 70th Precinct station, Volpe, with the help of Officer Charles Schwarz, took Louima into a bathroom and beat him. Volpe sodomized him with a stick, the handle from a toilet plunger, tearing Louima’s colon and bladder. Volpe then forced the stick into Louima’s mouth and broke several teeth. The officers left Louima bleeding and half-naked on the dirty floor. Hours after the attack, an ambulance was summoned to bring Louima to a hospital. Police initially dismissed Louima’s ruptured colon as the result of consensual sexual activity. A nurse doubted this explanation, and the case was reported to the NYPD Internal Affairs Bureau, which did not follow up on the call.

Louima’s case came to public awareness when Mike McAlary of New York’s Daily News, tipped off by NYPD officers, wrote a series of columns that eventually won the Pulitzer Prize for Commentary. Officer Eric Turetsky came forward soon after McAlary’s series began, saying he saw Volpe and Schwarz go into the bathroom with Louima, and that Volpe proudly displayed the stick afterwards. (McAlary died of cancer in late 1998.)

In August 1997, thousands marched with members of Louima’s family to City Hall to demand redress from Mayor Rudolph Giuliani. During Giuliani’s term in office (1994–2001), the shooting deaths of two unarmed black men, Amadou Diallo in 1999 (an immigrant from West Africa), and Patrick Dorismond in 2000, kept police brutality a prominent issue. The city of New York paid more than $18 million in settlements in these cases and in police brutality cases that unfolded after Giuliani left office. Louima received a settlement of $8.75 million in 2001. (Patrick Antoine, who was also arrested and beaten that night, received a settlement of $250,000 in 2000.)

At trial, Volpe testified to sodomizing Louima and threatening his life if he ever came forward. Volpe was convicted of raping and beating Louima and sentenced to 30 years in federal prison, not to be released before 2025. Charles Schwarz was convicted of lying about participating in the attack. He served five years in federal prison and was released in May 2007.

Other officers accused of lying about Volpe and Schwarz’s actions had varying fates. Thomas Bruder and Thomas Wiese were convicted in 2000 and had their convictions overturned in 2002. Both were fired. Each later sued, but failed to have his job restored. Rolando Aleman and Francisco Rosario received probation. Michael Bellomo was acquitted.

After the court settlement, Louima and his family moved to Florida. Louima has used the money to pay tuition for hundreds of students in Haiti. Fueled in part by his real estate work, the Abner Louima Foundation has worked to establish hospitals in Haiti. Since 1997, Louima has spoken out about his own and other cases of police brutality. He marched with Reverend Al Sharpton in a demonstration against the December 2006 police shooting of Sean Bell, an unarmed black man. Ten years after his abuse by police, Louima reported still feeling physical pain from his injuries. He stated that he forgave, but could not forget, the attack. In an editorial for New York's Daily News, he wrote he was lucky to have survived and stressed the importance of community involvement in curbing police brutality.

See also: Sharpton, Al

Denise S. Guidry

Bibliography

- Chan, Sewell. "The Abner Louima Case, 10 Years Later." New York Times, City Room. <http://cityroom.blogs.nytimes.com/2007/08/09/the-abner-louima-case-10-years-later/>.
- Delattre, Edwin J. Character and Cops: Ethics in Policing. Washington, D.C.: AEI Press, 2002.
- Destafano, Anthony M. "Ten Years After a Brutal Assault by NYPD Officers, Abner Louima Says His Suffering Helped Expose Bad Cops." Newsday (New York), August 5, 2007, Nassau edition. Lexis-Nexis.
- Louima, Abner. "I Fight So This Will Never Happen Again, Louima Says." Daily News (New York), August 5, 2007. http://www.nydailynews.com/news/ny\_crime/2007/08/05/2007-08-05\_i\_fight\_so\_this\_will\_never\_happen\_again\_.html.
- Marzulli, John, and Brian Kates. "One Man & One City Forever Changed." Daily News (New York), August 5, 2007, sports final edition. Lexis-Nexis.
- "NYPD's Costly Brutality Cases." Daily News (New York), November 29, 2006, sports final edition. Lexis-Nexis.
- Pulitzer Prize Board. The Pulitzer Prize Winners: 1998—Commentary: Mike McAlary of the New York Daily News. <http://www.pulitzer.org/year/1998/commentary/works/index.html>.

Lowndes County Freedom Organization

The Lowndes County Freedom Organization (LCFO) was an effort initiated by the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee (SNCC) in 1966 to organize an independent political party in Lowndes County, Alabama. Black residents of rural Lowndes County were impoverished, and few if any blacks actually owned land. Although blacks made up the majority of the population in the county, they held no elected offices and were virtually excluded from participating in local politics. Lowndes County was often referred to as "Bloody Lowndes" because of its history of racial violence.

Before the passage of the 1965 Voting Rights Act, African Americans in Alabama who were registered to vote constituted less than 20 percent of those eligible to vote. Civil Rights organizations like the Southern Christian Leadership Conference (SCLC), SNCC, and Congress of Racial Equality (CORE); along with the Alabama Democratic Conference (ADC)—a political action group—worked to increase the number of black registered voters in the state. Increased voting registration activity in neighboring Selma in 1965 spurred some action in dormant Lowndes County.

Unlike the Mississippi Freedom Democratic Party (MFDP), an interracial political party created to empower rural southern blacks, LCFO was not an alternative to the Alabama Democratic Party, but rather, a third party. The goal of LCFO was not initially to form an all-black political party; the lack of participation by whites facilitated such circumstances. The goal of the organization, however, was to circumvent the existing political structures that prevented blacks from participating in the local political process. The LCFO, also known as the Black Panther Party, adopted the image of a black panther as the symbol for the political party. The panther symbol, when juxtaposed against the Alabama Democratic Party's symbol of a white rooster, was meant as a representation of strength. If the LCFO were successful, SNCC planned to organize political parties similar to the LCFO in other areas of Alabama.

Despite the dangers that African Americans faced when they attempted voter registration activity, local blacks met with members of SCLC on March 19, 1965 and formed the Lowndes County Christian Movement for Human Rights (LCCMHR). The LCCMHR was created to facilitate black voter registration, as well as to act as an intermediary between the black community and the local government. John Hulett, Lowndes County native and one of only two African Americans registered to vote in the county, was elected the first chairman. Although SCLC had initially helped to establish the LCCMHR, it failed to continue to support the organization. When no support staff was sent to Lowndes County to begin political organizing, Hulett reached out to SNCC for help.

The passing of the Voting Rights Act of 1965 outlawed disfranchisement tactics such as literacy tests and as a result Lowndes County saw an increase in black voter registration. The rise in black political activity strengthened white opposition. On August 20, 1965, civil rights worker Jonathan Daniels was killed when a deputy sheriff fired a shotgun at a group of protesters. SNCC cited the deaths of white civil rights sympathizers Jonathan Daniels and Viola Liuzzo as pivotal events that strengthened the resolve of the organization to raise black political consciousness in Lowndes County. SNCC took the lead in helping to form the Lowndes County Freedom Organization. John Hulett was also elected to head LCFO.

A specification in Alabama state law permitted the establishment of a political party at the county level. After the failed seating of the MFDP in Atlantic City in 1964, members of SNCC decided that an independent political party would better serve the black residents of Lowndes County. The independent party could gain recognition when nominated candidates of the independent party received 20 percent of the votes in the county election. The 1966 elections proved to be crucial for LCFO. Despite the defeat of LCFO candidates in the general election, scholars believe that the creation of LCFO proved to be an important step in the emergence of black power politics.

The LCFO represented a change from previous SNCC projects. Stokely Carmichael served as project director and brought a brash new militancy that counterbalanced the rural grassroots movement in Lowndes County. The Lowndes County project was the first project since the 1964 Mississippi Freedom Summer project that was not an interracial movement. In 1966, Huey P. Newton and Bobby Seale founded the Black Panther Party for Self-Defense in Oakland, California. Inspired so much by the Stokely Carmichael and the LCFO, Newton and Seale adopted the black panther symbol to represent their organization. In 1969, the LCFO merged with the National Democratic Party of Alabama. See also: Black Panther Party; Black Power; Carmichael, Stokely (Kwame Ture); MFDP; Mississippi Freedom Summer, 1964; Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee; Voting Rights Act of 1965

Shirletta J. Kinchen

Bibliography

- Branch, Taylor. At Canaan's Edge: America in the King Years, 1965–1968. New York: Simon and Schuster, 2006.
- Carmichael Stokely, and Michael Thelwell, Ready for the Revolution: The Life and Struggle of Stokely Carmichael (Kwame Ture). New York: Scribner Publishing, 2003.

- Carson, Clayborne. In Struggle: SNCC and the Black Awakening of the 1960s. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1981.
- Eagles, Charles W. Outside Agitator: Jon Daniels and the Civil Rights Movement in Alabama. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1993.
- Jeffries, Hasan Kwame. Bloody Lowndes: Civil Rights and Black Power in Alabama's Black Belt. New York: New York University Press, 2009.
- Joseph, Peniel. Waiting 'Til the Midnight Hour: A Narrative History of the Black Power Movement in America. New York: Henry Holt, 2006.
- Walton, Hanes. Black Political Parties: An Historical and Political Analysis. New York: Free Press, 1972.

Lynching

Lynching is a form of extralegal violence that has been used as a means of enforcing white supremacy and social control in the United States. In its 1940 definition of lynching, the Tuskegee Institute stipulated that “there must be legal evidence that a person has been killed, and that he met his death illegally at the hands of a group acting under the pretext of service to justice, race, or tradition” (Lynching in the New South, p. 17). Lynching has taken multiple forms, including hanging, shooting, burning, and beating to death. In some cases it involved dismemberment and torture, and on some occasions was performed as a spectacle before large crowds.

The term lynching is derived from Colonel Charles Lynch, a patriot in frontier Bedford County, Virginia, during the American Revolution. Plagued by Tories and outlaws, Lynch and other community leaders decided to take matters into their own hands in order to control lawlessness and restore peace and security. Acting outside formally constituted law enforcement mechanisms, Lynch presided over an informal court and thus established “lynch law” in the region. Similar practices were used in other areas of Revolutionary Virginia and elsewhere.

The Revolutionary War furnished the ideological justification for the violent abuse of alleged enemies of the public good. The democratically inspired doctrine of popular sovereignty was cited by vigilantes who worked “out of doors” to protect and perpetuate established patterns of social and political order, especially when community members felt threatened. Vigilante groups, including lynch mobs, were frequently led by those with a vested interest in maintaining the status quo, including businessmen, professionals, planters, politicians, and law enforcement officers. Accordingly, vigilantism can be interpreted as a socially conservative phenomenon.

Lynching, along with other forms of vigilantism and social violence, was used in antebellum America to discipline those perceived to transgress social, political, and racial orthodoxies. Black and white abolitionists were frequently targeted, the most famous incident being the lynching of newspaper editor Elijah Lovejoy in 1837. Members of religious minority groups such as Catholics and Mormons were also victimized by lynching during this period. Lynching was applied as an alternative system of justice in the Old West; the San Francisco Vigilance Committee of 1856 was the iconic embodiment of organized frontier justice.

Although lynching did not disappear in other regions of the country—a 1920 lynching of three black men in Duluth, Minnesota, provided one noteworthy example—after the Civil War it became an increasingly southern and racial affair. Reconstruction-era violence in the South was particularly bloody, with the Ku Klux Klan and other parallel groups acting as the paramilitary arm of the white Democratic Party. Most violence in this period targeted African Americans who sought to challenge the white power structure through upward mobility in education, politics, or economics. Whites who were working in the South to secure African American rights or promote the Republican Party were also victimized. Lynching represented an effective means of suppressing African American assertiveness, maintaining a pliant and subservient black labor force, and smothering black political power. Federal troops were largely successful in breaking up the Klan in South Carolina after the passage of the 1871 Civil Rights Act, but white terrorism continued virtually unabated in other states, especially Mississippi, Louisiana, and Florida.

The height of the lynching era in the United States lasted from roughly 1880 to 1930. The Tuskegee Institute recorded the lynching of 3,437 African Americans and 1,293 whites from 1880 to 1951. Sociologists Stewart Tolnay and E. M. Beck counted 2,462 black victims in 2,018 separate incidents of lynching from 1882 to 1930. In addition, 1,977 blacks were legally executed in 10 southern states (as opposed to only 451 whites) during the same period, for a combined total of 4,291 blacks who were violently put to death in the South from 1882–1930—an average of about one African American killed every four days. Lynching statistics, kept in systematic fashion only from 1882 to 1968, are understandably imprecise, as they were often based on incomplete information, and there were many additional lynchings that went unrecorded. Patterns of lynching varied from state to state and county to county: Virginia, for instance, had substantially fewer lynchings than Georgia, and approximately one-third of southern counties had no black lynchings from 1882–1930.

The most common rationale for southern lynching was that it was an exercise in popular justice. Southern whites believed there existed a kind of social contract between the races that defined the limits of acceptable behavior; lynching was one means of policing those boundaries and punishing transgressors. Legally constituted mechanisms for enforcing social order were considered too slow or feeble, and many Southerners expressed doubt in the criminal justice system's ability to carry out its responsibilities. Rather than seeing themselves engaged in illegal activity, lynchers believed they were serving the larger social good and a higher law, sidestepping the more precise and tedious process of establishing guilt through evidence and then meting out proportional punishment. Historian Michael Pfeifer has argued that 19th- and early 20th-century lynching existed as part of a conflict over the nature of criminal justice, pitting rural and working-class supporters of "rough justice" against middle-class and progressivist advocates of due process. In most cases, there was little proof that lynching victims actually committed the purported offenses they were killed for. Only a tiny number of white participants in lynch mobs were ever apprehended, and fewer still were convicted. Most lynchings therefore were performed with at least the tacit consent, if not approval, of the surrounding white community.

Scholars have offered a number of theories to explain the causes of black lynching, reflecting the complexity of the phenomenon. Early sociological views argued that mob violence was the result of weak educational, religious, and civic institutions; exploitative economic relationships; poverty; and ineffective law enforcement. Because lynching was associated with a premodern rural culture, the modernization of the southern economy would strike at the roots of the practice. A more recent historical treatment posited that lynching served to teach all southerners, black and white, male and female, precisely where in the social hierarchy they stood, with blacks as debased, white women as vulnerable, and white men as the protectors of womanhood and civilization. Another theory suggested that lynching was a reaction to the possibility of post-emancipation interracial relationships between black men and white women, and represented an effort by psychologically frustrated white men to maintain their own status as well as control over black female sexuality. Other historians have situated lynching within the context of the Southern culture of honor or white insecurities fueled by the combined force of race hatred, sexual fears, honor, moralism, and localistic republicanism. Yet another approach sees lynching as a form of human sacrifice connected to the peculiar version of Protestant Christianity practiced in the postbellum South. Some of the most recent interpreters of lynching have emphasized its role as a means of labor control, specifically in maintaining a large, inexpensive, and submissive labor force. They suggest that it served as a crucial mechanism for perpetuating a plantation economy in the postbellum South and was attached to the distinctiveness of southern politics and cotton culture.

Rather than viewing lynching as an outdated relic of premodern barbarity or primitivism, it is more useful to understand it as a modern phenomenon. The essentially modern character of lynching was particularly prominent in spectacle lynchings such as Henry Smith (Paris, Texas, 1893), Sam Hose (Newnan, Georgia, 1899), and Jesse Washington (Waco, Texas, 1916). The thousands of people, including women and children, who assembled to witness the lynchings drove cars or arrived on specially chartered trains, took photographs of the event and the victims, and spread the news via newspapers, telegraph, and radio. The mass production of lynching postcards, distributed nationally through the mail, made even more people virtual participants. "Trophies" acquired from the victim's body were displayed in the front window of Main Street stores. For many white southerners, spectacle lynchings were a grisly but popular form of mass entertainment.

African Americans mounted a sustained opposition to lynching, particularly in the late 19th and 20th centuries. One of the most prolific and vocal critics of lynching was Ida B. Wells. In contrast to the prevailing myth among whites that lynching was primarily used to discipline black rapists and murderers, Wells demonstrated that lynching victims were accused of rape in only about one-third of cases, and approximately two-thirds of all lynchings were for small offenses such as shoplifting and "insolence." Driven out of Memphis, Tennessee, because of her antilynching writings, Wells moved to New York and also traveled to Great Britain where she helped foster a transatlantic antilynching crusade.

Many other prominent African Americans also spoke out against lynching, including Mary Church Terrell, Mary McLeod Bethune, Walter Francis White, W. E. B. Du Bois, and Paul Robeson. The National Association for the Advancement of Colored People advocated laws to halt the practice and conducted an in-depth study that resulted in the publication Thirty Years of Lynching in the United States, 1889–1918. The American Communist Party and International Labor Defense made antilynching a cornerstone of their platform designed to attract African Americans as members. Black newspapers documented and condemned lynchings, and black playwrights wrote 14 antilynching plays from 1916–1935. Interracial groups formed to protest lynching, and southern white women sought to end the practice via the Association of Southern Women for the Prevention of Lynching.

For the most part, the federal government was timid in its response to lynching. In 1901, George Henry White, the last former slave to serve in Congress, introduced a bill that would make lynching a federal crime, but it was summarily defeated. President Theodore Roosevelt made public statements against lynching, engendering harsh feelings from white southerners, but he did little in terms of concrete action. The Dyer Anti-Lynching Bill, introduced in 1918, passed the House of Representatives before being killed by filibuster in the Senate. Yet another antilynching bill, the Costigan-Wagner Bill, was defeated in 1935. Despite pressure from his wife Eleanor, President Franklin D. Roosevelt refused to speak out in favor of the bill, fearing backlash from the core Democratic constituency of the white South. Some progress was made after World War II, and the Truman administration called for federal antilynching legislation in 1947, but the power of southern Democrats over Senate committees prevented any movement on the issue. In short, the federal government never passed an antilynching bill, a failure that the U.S. Senate formally apologized for in 2005.

Lynching was used against other minority groups in American history as well. An estimated 600 Mexicans were lynched between 1848 and 1930, with at least 163 lynched in California alone from 1848–1860. Native Americans and Chinese Americans were also lynched in the West. Italian Americans, particularly Sicilian immigrants, were lynched in numerous states in the late 19th and early 20th centuries.

Indeed, the largest mass lynching in American history occurred in New Orleans in 1891, when 11 Italians were lynched after being acquitted of murdering the city police chief. One of the most famous individual lynchings in the United States, which helped lead to the resurrection of the Ku Klux Klan in 1915, was of the Jewish factory owner Leo Frank in Atlanta.

Persistent opposition to lynching, combined with an increased commitment to law and order by southern state politicians, led to a significant decline in the practice, as the rate fell to about 10 blacks lynched per year in the South during the 1930s. Lynching continued to wane in the 1940s and 1950s until surging in reaction to civil rights activism in the 1960s. Mississippi was particularly violent, headlined by the Klan-orchestrated murder of James Chaney, Andrew Goodman, and Michael Schwerner in Philadelphia during the 1964 Freedom Summer. Lynching has fallen to negligible levels since the 1960s; when it has occurred, such as in Alabama in 1981 and Texas in 1998, the white perpetrators have been apprehended, convicted, and even executed by the state.

See also: Antilynching Campaign; Ku Klux Klan; National Association for the Advancement of Colored People; Wells-Barnett, Ida; White Mob Violence

Patrick Q. Mason

Bibliography

- Allen, James et al. Without Sanctuary: Lynching Photography in America, 7th ed. Santa Fe, NM: Twin Palms Publishers, 2005.
- Brundage, W. Fitzhugh. Lynching in the New South: Georgia and Virginia, 1880–1930. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1993.
- Dray, Philip. At the Hands of Persons Unknown: The Lynching of Black America. New York: Random House, 2002.
- Pfeifer, Michael J. Rough Justice: Lynching and American Society, 1874–1947. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 2004.
- Tolnay, Stewart E., and E. M. Beck. A Festival of Violence: An Analysis of Southern Lynchings, 1882–1930. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1992.
- Waldrep, Christopher. Lynching in America: A History in Documents. New York: New York University Press, 2006.

Manchester Conference, 1945

Held in Manchester, England, from October 13–21, 1945, the Manchester Conference—often referred to as the Fifth Pan-African Congress—brought together more than 200 delegates from across Africa, the West Indies, and North America in its call for black self-determination. For many scholars, the Manchester Conference represents a turning point in the history of Pan-Africanism and nationalism in Africa. Previous Pan-African conferences, namely the series of congresses organized by W. E. B. Du Bois and the National Association for the Advancement of Colored Peoples (NAACP), never offered a direct challenge to the nature or future of European rule in Africa, but instead the conferences' organizers focused their attention on securing political, social, and economic reforms from the colonial powers. The Manchester Conference, however, dramatically altered the method and message of the Pan-African struggle, as its delegates demanded the immediate end to European rule in all of Africa and the West Indies. For the next two decades, the radical message of the Manchester Conference set the tone for the African struggle for independence as a new generation of nationalist figures—led by Kwame Nkrumah, Jomo Kenyatta, and I.T.A. Wallace-Johnson—invoked the lessons of Manchester as they guided their respective countries to independence in the 1950s and 1960s.

The ambition to hold a fifth Pan-African conference grew out of a desire on both sides of the Atlantic to resurrect the Du Boisian congresses of the 1910s and 1920s. These conferences, beginning in Paris in 1919, represented an important meeting ground for a growing diasporic concern for events in Africa. African American and West Indian delegates dominated the debates at these conferences as they called on the colonial powers and the international community to exercise greater responsibility in the governing of African affairs. In particular, they demanded reforms in the fields of land ownership, labor, and education. After the 1927 New York Pan-African Congress, Du Bois began to set his sights on holding the Fifth Pan-African Congress within Africa itself. This fifth conference was to take place in Tunis in 1929. Yet, it never got off the ground, as it encountered resistance from a French government nervous about allowing a potentially subversive and embarrassing meeting to convene in one of its colonies. Furthermore, the onset of the Great Depression further stymied Du Bois and others' efforts at organizing a fifth congress in 1929 or in the early 1930s.

By the mid-1940s, the political and social exigencies of World War II had led many to seek the renewal of the Du Boisian Pan-African movement with a Pan-African conference to be held on the continent itself. Through pressure from Amy Jacques Garvey, the first wife of the famed black nationalist Marcus Garvey, Du Bois began to explore the idea of holding a Pan-African conference in Liberia at the conclusion of the war. In his preparations, he contacted black leaders throughout the United States, the West Indies, and in Europe. Yet in Britain, he encountered resistance to his ambition for a Liberian conference as he learned of preparations for a fifth conference already being made by the little known and newly formed Pan-African Federation (PAF).

Led by prominent British-based activists George Padmore, Ras T. Makonnen, and I.T.A. Wallace-Johnson, the PAF represented a union of African and black student and activist organizations aimed at challenging the political and social structure of life within Britain and its empire. Issues of race, unequal distribution of wealth, labor, and education emerged as the most prominent interests of the PAF and its member organizations as they made preparations for a conference set to coincide with the second meeting of the World Trade Union Congress (WTUC) scheduled for September 1945 in Paris. This conference was not merely intended to renew the Pan-African tradition forged by Du Bois in the 1910s and 1920s. Rather, the PAF also looked to its envisioned conference as an opportunity to incorporate a more diverse and radical collection of black voices in shaping the future of Pan-African politics. For the leaders of the PAF, this included a greater emphasis on the involvement of black student organizations, as well as of African and West Indian labor leaders through the forthcoming Pan-African conference.

From the United States, Du Bois looked on the PAF's arrangements with both interest and concern. In his correspondence with Padmore and others, he cautioned against holding another conference in Europe, citing the need to extend the movement into Africa itself. He further expressed his dismay at the failure of the PAF to approach the NAACP for support in the conference's organization. For its part, the PAF did not refute Du Bois's suggestion at holding a conference in Africa. Instead, the organization even acquiesced to Du Bois's wish to classify the proposed Paris conference as an "exploratory conference" for a future meeting on the continent. In spite of this, Du Bois and the PAF were never able to clear the tensions between them. Padmore and the PAF continued with their preparations with only minimal input from Du Bois and the NAACP. For instance, Padmore, the PAF, and its affiliated organizations decided the conference's agenda, dates, and even the ultimate venue change from Paris to Manchester, England, without Du Bois's or the NAACP's prior notice or approval. As a result, when the Manchester Conference convened in October 1945, it did so as a meeting of British-based black and African organizations primarily concerned with challenging the problems of race and colonialism within the scope of the British Empire. Yet in spite of the tensions between him and the organizers, Du Bois not only attended the conference, but also accepted the organizers' invitation to serve as the "International President of the Congress" in celebration of his pioneering role in shaping the 20th-century Pan-African movement.

The Manchester Conference's first panel opened on October 15 with a discussion of the "The Colour Problem in Britain." Introducing the topics to the delegates, Edwin Du Plan of the Gold Coast reminded them that, after World War I, Britain's black community faced large-scale unemployment with the return of white soldiers from the war. The need for soldiers and the creation of low-paid factory work during the World War II helped alleviate the country's problem with black unemployment, yet Du Plan noted it had little effect on countering the political and social barriers faced by Britain's black community. Even when black workers were employed, Du Plan emphasized that many of them faced the constant threat of deportation after the termination of their contracts. In addition to these labor problems, the panel discussed the government's failures in addressing issues of family, youth, and education in Britain's black and mixed-race communities. As a result of these racially driven oversights, the panel argued that the government had left these communities disproportionately poor and susceptible to violence and arrest by the country's predominately white police force.

The hallmark of the Manchester Conference, however, came in its discussion over the future of European rule in Africa. For most of the conference's delegates, imperialism had run its course. In panels on West, South, and East Africa, the Manchester delegates argued that imperialism had unequivocally failed to bring the widespread "progress" and "civilization" promised to the peoples of Africa through colonial rule. Instead, the delegates argued that, through colonial rule, African peoples suffered from violently enforced policies of forced labor, the systematic destruction of their precolonial political and social institutions, and widespread illiteracy and political repression. In addition to these debates, other panels focused on the continued imperial threats to the world's three independent black states—Ethiopia, Liberia, and Haiti—and on labor issues in the Caribbean. After a week of deliberations, the conference closed on October 21, 1945 with an assertion of the rights of all African peoples to the principle of self-determination and a demand for an immediate end to colonial rule on the continent.

The aftermath of the conference thus ushered in a new era in the history of African nationalism. No longer were discussions of colonial reform sufficient. Political and labor leaders, such as Kwame Nkrumah and I.T.A. Wallace-Johnson, invoked the lessons of Manchester as they sharpened their attacks on the colonial system in the postwar years. For Nkrumah, this included the publication of his first book Towards Colonial Freedom (1947) and, with Wallace-Johnson, the founding of the West African National Secretariat (WANS). The WANS attracted the interest of other Manchester delegates such as Bankole Awooner-Renner and G. Ashie-Nikoi with its aim to create a single, socialist state uniting West Africa. Nkrumah's 1947 return to the Gold Coast resulted in the breakdown of the WANS. Yet, in the Gold Coast, he, along with fellow Manchester alumni (Joe Appiah, Awooner-Renner, Du Plan, and Ako Adjei), adopted the conference's message of self-determination as they began their nine-year struggle for independence. In other African colonies, Jomo Kenyatta returned to Kenya in 1946 where he was imprisoned for 10 years before taking over as the country's first president in 1963. Hastings Banda and his Nyasaland African Congress led Malawi to its independence in 1964.

The legacy of the Manchester Conference and its effect on the future of Pan-African politics has long been debated among scholars. Unlike any previous conference, the Manchester Conference opened a space for young African leaders to assert themselves on an international stage. For many scholars in the 1960s and 1970s, however, the Manchester Conference also signaled the moment in which the international meaning of "Pan-Africanism" shifted from that of black solidarity to that of African continental unity. As a result, this scholarship, exemplified in the classic works of Colin Legum, Ali Mazrui, and Vincent Baketepu Thompson, understood post-Manchester Pan-Africanism in terms of the political and diplomatic processes leading to the formation of the Organization of African Unity (OAU) and the operations of this institution. More recently, diasporic scholars such as Penny von Eschen, James Meriwether, and Kevin Gaines have begun to challenge this position by highlighting the roles of prominent African American and diasporic figures in postwar Africa. Even more important, these scholars have begun to explore the political, social, and cultural meanings that African achievements, such as the continent's struggle for independence, had in shaping the methods and discourse of the black freedom movement in the United States during the 1950s, 1960s, and 1970s.

In 1995, several events marked the 50th anniversary of the Manchester Conference. In October, three separate conferences met in Manchester with panels on the relationship between Pan-Africanism and labor, gender, immigration, and neocolonialism, as well as discussions on the legacy of Nkrumah and other historical figures. Furthermore, British historians Marika Sherwood and Hakim Adi used the conference's anniversary to mark the publication of their edited collection The 1945 Manchester Pan-African Congress Revisited (1995). Adi and Sherwood's work is unparalleled by any previous research on the conference. They not only meticulously documented the events leading to the conference, but also included previously unpublished accounts of the conference by two of its lesser-known delegates, as well as brief biographies of more than 120 individuals and organizations who took part in the conference. Even more important, this collection includes a complete reprint of George Padmore's 1947 conference report titled Colonial and Coloured Unity.

See also: African Imperialism; Du Bois, W. E. B.; Garvey, Marcus; Gold Coast; Kenyatta, Jomo; Nkrumah, Kwame; Organization of African Unity; Pan-African Congresses; Pan-Africanism

Jeffrey S. Ahlman

Bibliography

- Adi, Hakim. West Africans in Britain, 1900–1960: Nationalism, Pan-Africanism and Communism. London: Lawrence & Wishart, 1998.
- Adi, Hakim, and Marika Sherwood. The 1945 Manchester Pan-African Congress Revisited. London: New Beacon Books, 1995.
- Du Bois, W. E. B. The World and Africa: An Inquiry into the Part Which Africa Has Played in World History. New York: International Publishers, 1965.
- Langley, J. Ayodele. Pan-Africanism and Nationalism in West Africa, 1900–1945: A Study of Ideology and Social Classes. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1973.
- Nkrumah, Kwame. Towards Colonial Freedom: Africa in the Struggle against World Imperialism. London: Farleigh Press, 1947.

Padmore, George. Pan-Africanism or Communism?: The Coming Struggle for Africa. London: Dennis Dobson, 1956.

Thompson, Vincent Baktepu. Africa and Unity: The Evolution of Pan-Africanism. London: Longmans, Green, 1969.

Mandela, Nelson

Nelson Mandela (1918–) was the first democratically elected president of South Africa. From 1994 to 1999, Mandela led his country in its first five years of democracy and reconciliation. Before Mandela assumed this position, he was a staunch antiapartheid activist. Mandela actively participated as a card-carrying member and leader of the African National Congress (ANC). After joining the political body in 1942, he was one of the activists who advocated for the formation of an ANC Youth wing in 1944, which he, Walter Sisulu, and others succeeded in establishing. Besides working within a political organization, Mandela also challenged the state. In his quest to oppose white domination, Mandela earned the government's ire with his participation in several protest activities. Chief among them was the 1952 defiance campaign when participants burnt their passbooks. Mandela also spoke publicly. For his activism, Mandela became a government target and eventually operated underground. With the American CIA's help, the South African government arrested this trained lawyer in 1962. Mandela was ultimately convicted of high treason. Sentenced to life imprisonment on Robben Island, Mandela carried the struggle forward even within the prison system. There, he led protests to secure healthier food, longer trousers, and study privileges. Affectionately known as Madiba, this world-renowned leader has contributed immensely to solving problems on the African continent, to expanding South African borders to embrace other Africans, to fighting for children's causes and becoming a spokesperson on the confronting and fighting the crippling disease of AIDS. In leading the country in the forefront of struggle and global equality, Mandela has also championed human rights.

Before Mandela catapulted into international fame, he grew up in a tiny village in Umtata located in the former Transkei along South Africa's eastern coast. Born on June 18, 1918, his parents named him appropriately Rolihlahla, which "means to shake a tree" or "to stir up trouble." A Methodist teacher renamed him Nelson after the famed admiral Horatio Nelson because the pronunciation of his real name gave the educator difficulty. Mandela's father was the principal acting chief to a paramount in Thembuland. His father, according to his biographer Tom Lodge, viewed Mandela's mother as his favorite wife. On his father's death, Mandela assumed the position of a paramount chief's ward. Although this appeared to be his destiny, Mandela chose another career path. He became a lawyer. This Wesleyan mission-educated product ultimately attended the University of Fort Hare, where he earned a bachelor of arts degree. Mandela even participated in school politics by joining the Student Representative Council (SRC). His allegiance to his fellow students landed him in trouble when he participated in a protest boycott that resulted in his suspension from the college.

After his suspension, Mandela went to Johannesburg, the fabled city of gold. There, he met Walter Sisulu who took him on as a mentee. Sisulu was also Mandela's confidant. The two remained lifelong friends (Sisulu died in 2003). Mandela used his position in Johannesburg to further his education. He received a bachelors of arts degree at the University of South Africa (UNISA) by correspondence and immediately after this milestone, he began studying law at the University of the Witwatersrand (WITS). There, at WITS, Mandela met future struggle colleagues, Joe Slovo, Harry Schwarz, and Ruth First. Besides the academic community that he embraced, Mandela made his home in the northeastern township of Alexandra. As a black and colored township community, Alexandra was a stronghold and leader of resistance struggles such as bus boycotts, especially during the 1940s before the Nationalist Party entrenched segregation beginning in 1948. Swept up into this political current, Mandela joined the ANC and thus continued his crusade against tyranny and oppression. Mandela credits many people for his political education. Chief among them were the teachings of Mahatma Gandhi whose ideas of Satyagraha resonated with him. Mandela engaged in many peaceful protests, and for his actions he became one of the 156 people arrested on December 5, 1956 and charged with treason. At this trial, the government allowed defendants to speak. Mandela took the opportunity to explain what actions that the ANC proposed to take to end the system of inequality that defined South Africa at the time. The treason trial took place over five years, with all of the accused acquitted.

The success, or lack thereof, with nonviolence began to change Mandela's intellectual framework. Initially a

Nelson Mandela revisits the prison on Robben Island, South Africa, where he was incarcerated for more than two decades as a political prisoner, February 11, 1994. (Louise Gubb/The Image Works) proponent of nonviolence, Mandela reconsidered this strategy after the Sharpeville Massacre. On March 21, 1960, the Pan-African Congress (PAC) called for a pass protest. Instead of the peaceful demonstration that the organizers had arranged, the police opened fire, killing 69 people, and injuring other fleeing parties. After this disturbance, the government banned the ANC and PAC, and made it unlawful for these organizations to operate. Mandela, already operating underground, and considered a government threat and dubbed the “Black Pimpernel,” helped to create the Mandela or M-Plan. This strategy called for the creation of cell units having three to four people, but no more than five, who would engage in guerrilla warfare. This indoctrination included political education and military training in camouflage, reconnaissance, topography, photography, fire training, and communication.

As part of the Umkhonto weSizwe (MK or Spear of the Nation) an underground movement founded on December 16, 1961, Mandela renounced his stance on nonviolence. Besides his role as an activist, Mandela, a divorcee (his first wife was Evelyn Mase with whom he had four children), struggled with seeing a newlywed wife, Winnie Madikizela-Mandela, because soon after their nuptials he went underground for 17 months. The couple had two daughters, Zindzi and Zenani. While on the run, Mandela made speeches and recorded interviews. During one interview, a day after the Sharpeville massacre, Mandela donning an Afro, with a part centered in the middle, and a fully grown beard, spoke about South Africa’s political situation and the state of Africans. In responding to the question what do Africans want, Mandela told a news correspondent that Africans need the right to vote and full political equality with whites. It took 52 years before Mandela and other South Africans realized this goal. Within that time frame, the MK strategized to destroy railway lines, government installations, electrical facilities, and other hard and soft targets.

To further MK’s objectives, leaders often met at clandestine locations. One of these places was the Lilliesleaf Farm in Rivonia. There, insurgents met to discuss strategy in a place considered a refuge. Rivonia was a safe house until a tip by the American Central Intelligence Agency informed the South African government of Mandela's whereabouts and the disguises that he wore. On August 5, 1962, the police arrested Mandela. The state charged him with the crimes of leaving the country illegally and inciting workers to strike in 1961. The arrests continued. On July 11, 1963, while Mandela lay in prison, his colleagues such as Ahmed Kathrada, Walter Sisulu, and Govan Mbeki among others faced arrest. All of the accused were tried and convicted of charges of sabotage, which Mandela confessed he did, but denied a second charge of plotting a foreign invasion of South Africa. Mandela used the opportunity to convey his thoughts on the political situation under which black South Africans lived as second-class citizens. Once on the dock, Mandela recounted how he had fought against white domination and that he was prepared to die in his quest for democracy, freedom, and racial harmony. Even in the state's presence, Mandela spoke from the heart. He chose his words deliberately to convey his disdain for any forms of domination no matter what race or ethnicity.

In showing this balanced account, Mandela appealed to liberals while he also reinforced his position against apartheid. Mandela also offered his vision of a new South Africa. Similar to Martin Luther King Jr.'s "I have a Dream" speech, Mandela called for equality based on people's character rather than their skin color. In sharing this ideal with King, Mandela showed how he envisioned the ANC's policy of nonracialism. Despite his appeal, Mandela faced life imprisonment on Robben Island. He remained on the isle once reputed as a bird sanctuary, a leper colony, and World War II naval base for 18 years. He spent the other nine years at Pollsmoor Prison. Unlike PAC leader Robert Sobukwe who had a house all to himself on Robben Island, Mandela served his term mixed with the general population. Younger ANC adherents or political prisoners belonging to other organizations revered Mandela and often sought his counsel. Even with his senior authority, Mandela was not above the inhumane practice of tauza, when inmates jumped up and down and had their private cavities searched. During his tenure, the world's most well-known prisoner barely received visits and had his mail read and doctored before he received them.

With his privacy violated on many levels, Mandela helped to remake the prison environment in which he lived. Political prisoners taught each other and received study privileges to conduct correspondence courses as part of the reformation of the prison system. While Mandela and the others altered the political terrain within the prison by having hunger strikes and befriending the wardens, he kept up negotiations with the South African government. Former President P. W. Botha initially began talks with Mandela, but when Mandela refused to renounce violence, the white minority leader rescinded his offer. Still left to resolve this problem was the next South African President F. W. De Klerk who did decide to release Mandela on February 11, 1990. Mandela left prison donning a gray suit and holding his wife's hand and clenching his fist with the other. De Klerk not only signed for Mandela's release, he also repealed major cornerstones of apartheid such as the 1950 Group Areas Act (GAA), which required that all race groups live in their designated areas. For their efforts in ending apartheid, Mandela and De Klerk received the Nobel Peace Prize in 1993. Two years later in 1995, after the formation of an interim government, Mandela assumed the presidency and won 63 percent of the vote. He used his presidency to advocate for reconciliation, even dubbing the New South Africa as "the rainbow nation."

As president, Mandela was the consummate statesman. He traveled around the world on behalf of South Africa. Mandela also participated in negotiating affairs with other African nations. For example, Mandela helped to resolve the ongoing dispute between Muammar Gaddafi and the United States. With Mandela's urging, Gaddafi agreed to release the men responsible for the Lockerbie plane crash on December 21, 1988. Mandela arranged to have the trial in a third country, rather than the countries representing the plaintiffs such as the United States and Britain. He even spoke on the defendant's behalf. Mandela also stood up for his friends, such as Cuban ally Fidel Castro. Castro supported the ANC during apartheid and allowed South Africans to inhabit his country, something that, to the chagrin of the West, Mandela refused to overlook. The Xhosa leader has also shown his public admiration for Gaddafi's Libya.

Even with his high approval rating, some criticisms developed. His inability to direct more attention to the AIDS crisis earned him consternation from AIDS activist Edwin Cameron. Mandela, as well as successor Thabo Mbeki, failed to propose funding to develop AIDS research or to create some kind of plan to impede the disease's progress, which consumes hundreds of South Africans. Other criticisms are concerned with domestic policy. Some pundits believe that Mandela's outreach globally hindered the country's development because he granted little attention to the plight of the homeless and the dire economic poverty that paralyzes portions of the nation's sector. The ANC promised homes and delivered; however, the contractors constructed them rapidly and they contained structural problems. Needless to say, Mandela was no saint, but he was a man of courage and conviction, and for that Madiba earns deep respect and reverence.

His political role continues as a retired statesman. Concerned with the problems besetting the world, his third wife Graca Machel, along with Desmond Tutu, called a special meeting with the world's leaders in Johannesburg. With projects such as these, Mandela, the retired South African president not only keeps physically busy but he also stimulates his mind. As a retiree, Mandela engages directly with the ongoing AIDS crisis. He experienced first hand the debilitating effect that the disease inflicts upon its host. His son Makgatho died of the disease on January 6, 2003. Unlike during his presidency, Mandela has given his verbal and financial support to AIDS research. He has supported an AIDS fundraising campaign. Mandela also served as a spokesperson in support of HIV/AIDS research at the XV International AIDS Conference in Bangkok, Thailand. Mandela leads by example. As a children's advocate, Mandela won the Global Friend's Award in 2005. His community outreach and support of national and international programs remains an inspiration to many leaders, the educated, and lay people.

Behind the public persona that has appeared national and international television screens is a humble and graceful man. Mandela still engages in a strict physical regime, which has him up at four in the morning for calisthenics. This former boxer has always stayed in shape even while in prison in a small prison cell, which not only confined him intellectually but also physically. His height is six feet and above. Several authors have written books about Mandela, some offering an authorized portrait, others a more critical analysis of Mandela's presidency, his role in the liberation struggle, his prison term, and his retirement. Mandela traces his life from his regal beginnings in Umtata to his imprisonment in Long Walk to Freedom, published in 1994. Readers learn about early South African history, especially the impact that Alexandra had on his political development. The work also deals with his relationship with Winnie Madikizela-Mandela. Through his prose, readers learn a lot about Mandela, the man, not the national and international hero that he became. Readers feel the frailty.

Besides written works penned by Mandela or scholars are cinematic reproductions. In the film Mandela and De Klerk, the director relayed the story of Mandela's release from prison. Sidney Poitier offered a riveting performance playing Mandela. Another cinematographic feat, Goodbye Bafana, a film that was screened at the Berlin Film Festival in 2007, portrays Dennis Haysbert as Mandela, and reconstructs Mandela's relationship with his prison guard James Gregory. His immortalization continues with public monuments in South Africa and abroad in such places as London. On March 31, 2004, the country witnessed the renaming of Sandton Square to Nelson Mandela Square. Three years later in 2007, in London, the city honored Mandela by unveiling a statue at Parliament Square. Mandela accepted the honor on behalf of all South Africans. This attitude attests to Mandela's humanity and graciousness. He is truly a modern hero.

See also: African Imperialism; African National Congress; Antiapartheid Movement; Biko, Steve; Castro, Fidel

Dawne Y. Curry

Bibliography

- Limb, Peter. Nelson Mandela: A Biography. Westport, CT: Greenwood Press, 2008.
- Lodge, Tom. Mandela: A Critical Life. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2007.
- Mandela, Nelson. Long Walk to Freedom: The Autobiography of Nelson Mandela. Boston: Little, Brown, 1994.
- Sampson, Anthony. Mandela: The Authorized Biography. New York: Knopf, 1999.
- Turnley, David C. Mandela!: Struggle & Triumph. New York: Abrams, 2008.

March on Washington Movement, 1941

In 1941, A. Philip Randolph pushed for an all-black march on Washington to demand equal rights in government positions in the defense industry and the military. The organizers canceled the march when President Franklin D. Roosevelt issued Executive Order 8802.

The onset of World War II in Europe and the subsequent enforced war preparation created millions of new jobs, especially in the defense industry. This seemed to offer new opportunities for African Americans to improve their status and finally reach full citizenship. Hoping to take part in the economic upswing, African Americans migrated from the South to the new jobs centers; however, blacks met with racism, exclusion, and often violence. The situation was not much different in the armed forces where African Americans served in segregated units and were mostly assigned to service units. The federal government tended to ignore the issue or even supported racial discrimination.

In contrast to World War I, African Americans were no longer willing to tolerate their underprivileged and oppressed status based on the separate-but-equal premise. They demanded federal and state officials, as well as the president, to intercede and force companies to hire on an equal basis. The NAACP and the National Urban League joined a number of groups that focused on equal rights in employment. They demanded the creation of a committee to scrutinize and investigate racial discrimination. Government officials, however, did not consider it necessary to establish a separate committee to cover race issues.

A. Philip Randolph, the president of the Brotherhood of Sleeping Car Porters, believed a mass demonstration in Washington would be the most effective way to address the employment inequities faced by African Americans at this time. His idea for the march was strongly influenced by Gandhian concepts of nonviolent civil disobedience and his labor experience in protest marches and in rallying. Putting massive pressure on the government to demand jobs and equal participation in national defense was the only promising strategy for change. Having petitioned relentlessly, he grew frustrated with the reluctance of companies, the government, and the American president to make changes.

In January 1941, Randolph founded the March on Washington movement (MOWM) and called for 10,000 African Americans to join this protest march in Washington, D.C. scheduled for July 1, 1941. Its specific aim was the issuance of an executive order by the president to abolish racial discrimination in the government, military, and national defense industry.

The African American community foremost hailed and supported Randolph's call for an African American mass march on Washington. The MOWM made extensive use of the African American press that acted as an important information link between the organizers and the participants in the march. Randolph used his methods of communication and the following he established during his fight for the Brotherhood of Sleeping Car Porters. The leading Civil Rights movements, the NAACP and the National Urban League, among others, embraced Randolph's plan and joined forces with him. Their appeals to President Roosevelt demanding a reformation of the defense program had not been crowned with success.

Initially meeting with protest, Randolph planned to exclude white supporters from the march. In an effort to build black self-esteem and community, he wanted the march to be organized, financed, and carried out solely by blacks. Furthermore, he feared that white communists would infiltrate and co-opt the march, thereby discrediting the event.

The March on Washington Committee, responsible for rallying and organizing, was made up of people from various Civil Rights movements, churches, and black organizations and acted nationally and locally. They planned for the marchers to walk silently behind muffled drums through the city to the Lincoln Memorial. The numbers of people wanting to participate rose sharply above 10,000. By June 1941, the organizers expected 100,000 African Americans to participate.

The initial reaction of the government was a demand to call off the march, arguing it would only stir racial hatred. The unwillingness of the organizers to comply with the president's request and the rising numbers of African Americans willing to participate started to concern government officials and the president. Roosevelt sent his wife Eleanor Roosevelt and Fiorello LaGuardia, the mayor of New York, to talk with and appease Randolph and White on June 13. They were unsuccessful in convincing the organizers to call off their march.

On June 19, 1941, the president finally met with Randolph and White. They informed Roosevelt that 100,000 people were planning to march and that only the passage of an executive order to ban all racial discrimination in the war industries and armed forces could prevent the march and satisfy the African American community. Despite serious reservations within the government, Roosevelt acquiesced at least partially to the demands of the MOWM. On June 25, 1941, Roosevelt issued Executive Order 8802, which prohibited employment discrimination on the basis of race, creed, color, or national origin in federal agencies and war-related industries. The order established the Federal Employment Practices Committee (FEPC) to monitor employment in defense industries and government agencies. Roosevelt, however, was not willing to end segregation in the military. To the dismay of many of his followers, Randolph called off the March on Washington.

Cancellation of the march notwithstanding, Randolph continued his MOWM organizing local rallies and marches to protest race discrimination. Most established Civil Rights movements, however, no longer supported Randolph, but rather criticized him for his methods. Despite this fall from grace, his MOWM and Randolph's methods were the paragon for the March on Washington in 1963.

See also: Brotherhood of Sleeping Car Porters; March on Washington, 1963; National Association for the Advancement of Colored People; Randolph, A. Philip; Roosevelt, Eleanor; White, Walter

Christine Knauer

Bibliography

- Barber, Lucy G. Marching on Washington: The Forging of an American Political Tradition. Berkeley: University of California Press, 2002.
- Bracey, John H. Jr., and August Meier. "Allies or Adversaries? The NAACP, A. Philip Randolph and the 1941 March on Washington," Georgia Historical Quarterly 75 (1991):1-17.
- Garfinkel, Herbert. When Negroes March: The March on Washington Movement in the Organizational Politics for FEPC. Glencoe, IL: Free Press, 1959.
- Pfeffer, Paula F. A Philip Randolph, Pioneer of the Civil Rights Movement. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1990.
- Sitkoff, Harvard. "Racial Militancy and Interracial Violence in the Second World War," The Journal of American History 58 (1971):661-81.
- Wynn, Neil A. The Afro-American and the Second World War. New York: Holmes & Meier Publishers, 1976.

March on Washington, 1963

On August 28, 1963, more than 250,000 demonstrators from all across the country descended on the nation's capital to participate in a March on Washington focusing on Jobs and Freedom. Not only was it the largest demonstration for human rights in U.S. history, but it also showcased, for the first time, unity among the various civil rights organizations. The event began with a rally at the Washington Monument featuring several celebrities and musicians. Participants then marched across the mile-long National Mall to the Memorial. The three-hour long program at the Lincoln Memorial included speeches from prominent civil rights and religious leaders. The day ended with a meeting at the White House between the leaders and organizers of the march and President John F Kennedy.

The idea for the 1963 March on Washington was conceived by A. Philip Randolph, international president of the Brotherhood of Sleeping Car Porters, president of the Negro American Labor Council, and vice president of the AFL-CIO. Randolph, a long-time civil rights activist, was committed to improving the economic condition of black Americans.

In 1941, Randolph threatened to assemble 100,000 black Americans in the capital to help convince President Franklin D. Roosevelt to sign an executive order banning discrimination in the armed services and creating the Fair Employment Practices Committee. As a result of this meeting with Roosevelt, Randolph postponed his idea for more than two decades. In 1962, however, the 73-year-old elder statesman of the Civil Rights movement reprised his idea with renewed motivation. With black employment at double the rate of white employment, and with civil rights for black Americans still unrealized, Randolph proposed a new march for jobs and freedom. When he first proposed the march in late 1962, he received little response from other civil rights leaders. But he knew that cooperation would be difficult because each of the civil rights organizations had their own agenda for the Civil Rights movement, and the leaders competed for funding and press coverage. Nonetheless, success of the March on Washington would depend on the participation of the "Big Six" civil rights organizations. These organizations and their leaders were Roy Wilkins of the National Association of the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP); Whitney Young Jr., of the National Urban League (NUL); Dr. Martin Luther King Jr., of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference (SCLC); James Farmer of the Conference of Racial Equality (CORE); and John Lewis of the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee (SNCC).

By June 1963, Dr. King had agreed to cooperate with Randolph on the march. The older, more conservative NAACP and NUL were still ambivalent. But after winning Randolph's promise that the march would be a nonviolent as well as a nonconfrontational event, Roy Wilkins of the NAACP pledged his organization's support. The promise of a nonviolent and nonconfrontational demonstration disappointed the more militant CORE and SNCC leaders who had already joined with Randolph. In addition, white supporters such as labor leader Walter Reuther, as well as Jewish, Catholic, and Presbyterian officials offered their participation and help.

The organization and details of the march were handled by Bayard Rustin, a close associate of Randolph's. Rustin, an antiwar and civil rights activist, had extensive experience in organizing mass protests. Before the March on Washington, his most notable mass protest was organizing the first Freedom Ride in 1947. He had also participated in Randolph's plans for the 1941 march. With only two months to plan, Rustin established his headquarters in Harlem, with a smaller office in Washington. He and his core staff consisting of 200 volunteers quickly organized the largest peaceful demonstration in U.S. history. While Randolph and the NUL focused on jobs, the other civil rights groups centered on freedom. To finance the march, money was raised from the sale of buttons promoting the march at 25 cents per button. Thousands of people also sent in cash contributions.

A flyer produced by the National Office of the March on Washington for Jobs and Freedom articulated the six major goals of the march: meaningful civil rights laws, a massive federal works program, full and fair employment, decent housing, the right to vote, and adequate integrated education. More specifically, what was demanded in the March on Washington was passage of "meaningful" civil rights legislation at this session of Congress—no filibustering; immediate elimination of all racial segregation in public schools throughout the nation, a big program of public works to provide jobs for all the nation's unemployed including job training and a placement program, a federal law prohibiting racial discrimination in hiring workmen, either public or private, two dollars an hour minimum wage across the board nationwide; withholding of federal funds from programs that discriminate; enforcement of the Fourteenth Amendment, reducing congressional representation of states where citizens are disenfranchised, a broadened Fair Labor Standards Act to include currently excluded employment areas, and authority for the attorney general to institute injunctive suits when any constitutional right is violated.

Civil rights leaders, including Roy Wilkins (bottom left) and A. Philip Randolph (bottom center), join hundreds of thousands of Americans in a march on Washington, D.C., in a multiracial demonstration for civil rights and equal opportunity in August 1963. (Lyndon Baines Johnson Library and Museum)

As plans progressed, however, the primary goal of the march turned toward passing federal civil rights legislation put forward by President Kennedy in the wake of the demonstrations in Birmingham, Alabama. The proposed march initially caused great concern within the Kennedy administration. From the administration's point of view, they had cause for concern. In May, massive black demonstrations in Birmingham had culminated with a night of rioting. Other parts of the country were ready to explode as well. Bob Moses, field secretary for SNCC, testifying before a House subcommittee on the president's civil rights bill to end discrimination in public places, education, and employment, warned congressmen they were facing a situation in Mississippi that had the potential to be far worse than Birmingham. With this information in hand, Kennedy believed that a mass gathering in Washington had the potential to undermine efforts being made to secure civil rights legislation and would damage the image of the United States globally. The president was also concerned that the event might intensify already heightened racial tensions across the country. Kennedy was also concerned that the march might erode the public support for the Civil Rights movement at large. Kennedy called Dr. King and other civil rights leaders to the White House in late June 1962 to try to convince them to cancel the march, but he was unable to persuade them.

Various influential organizations and individuals also opposed the march. Besides the expected, such as southern segregationists and members of the Ku Klux Klan, the black separatist group, National of Islam, and its outspoken member, Malcolm X, also opposed the march. Malcolm X referred to it as the "farce on Washington," and any member of the Nation of Islam who attended the march was subjected to a 90-day suspension from the organization. The National Council of the AFL-CIO also chose not to support the march, adopting a position of neutrality. A number of international unions, however, independently declared their support and attended the march in substantial numbers. Hundreds of local unions also fully supported the march.

On August 28, the marchers arrived in chartered buses, trains, planes, and private cars. More than 200,000 had assembled by the Washington Monument on the National Mall, where the march was to begin. It was a very diverse crowd consisting of black and white, rich and poor, young and old, white collar, blue collar, unemployed, celebrities, and everyday people. The diversity of those in attendance was also reflected by the event's presenters and performers. Some of these included Marian Anderson, Daisy Lee Bates, Joan Baez, Bob Dylan, John Lewis, Odetta, Peter, Paul, and Mary, Rabbi Joachim Prinz, A. Philip Randolph, Walter Ruther, Bayard Rustin, Josh White, Roy Wilkins, and Whitney Young Jr.

Televised live to an audience of millions, the march provided numerous rhetorical moments in the form of speeches, songs, prayers, and actions (i.e., black and white people holding hands). Although the official march goals included an endorsement of Kennedy's civil rights bill—in part because the administration had officially cooperated with the march—some of the most passionate speeches criticized the bill as incomplete. John Lewis, the 23-year-old president of SNCC promised that without meaningful legislation, blacks would "march throughout the South." His speech prepared with other members of SNCC had originally suggested in the speech that they could not support the Kennedy legislation because it did not guarantee the right of black people to vote. In another part of the speech, SNCC had suggested that there was very little difference between the major political parties. They suggested that, as a movement, blacks could not wait on the president or the members of the Congress; they had to take matters into their own hands. Some people suggested that this portion of the speech was too inflammatory and that it might motivate people to riot. As a result, Lewis was forced to rewrite his original speech, which generally called the Kennedy legislative agenda for civil rights "too little, too late." Randolph and Wilkins also gave speeches. The most memorable speech of the day, however, came from Dr. King. The speech, reportedly delivered extemporaneously, would forever be known as the "I Have a Dream" speech. King's speech began with a powerful indictment of the nation's injustices against black Americans, then focused on a message of hope and determination, and a proclamation of what America could become, epitomizing the day's message of racial harmony, love, and a belief that blacks and whites could live together in peace. "I Have a Dream" is considered one of the greatest and most influential speeches in American history.

The march was an American landmark event for the early Civil Rights movement, and an overwhelming success owing to the organizers, leaders, participants, and extensive coverage by the media. The march is partly credited with winning passage of the federal Civil Rights Act of 1964. Although there was a presigned executive order authorizing 1,000 plus military intervention in case of rioting, there were no major disturbances. The behavior of the participants and onlookers proved that the presence of the military was unnecessary. Many Americans witnessed, for the first time, black and white people united, marching and celebrating together.

After the march, King and other civil rights leaders met with President Kennedy and Vice President Lyndon B. Johnson at the White House. Feeling the pressure of more than 200,000 Americans, Kennedy told them that he intended to throw his whole weight behind civil rights legislation. The march had not only achieved tangible goals, but it had also brought widespread attention to the struggle for civil rights. See also: Abernathy, Ralph David; Anderson, Marian; Bates, Daisy; Civil Rights Act of 1964; Kennedy, John Fitzgerald; King, Martin Luther Jr.; National Association for the Advancement of Colored People; Lewis, John; March on Washington Movement, 1941; Rustin, Bayard; Southern Christian Leadership Conference; Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee; X, Malcolm

Janice D. Hamlet

Bibliography

- Carson, Clayborne, ed. The Autobiography of Martin Luther King, Jr. New York: Warner Books, 1988.
- Carson, Clayborne, David J. Garrow, Gerald Gill, Vincent Harding, and Darlene Clark Hine, ed. The Eyes on the Prize Civil Rights Reader. New York: Penguin Books, 1991.
- Hampton, Henry, and Steve Fager, eds. Voices of Freedom: An Oral History of the Civil Rights Movement from the 1950s through the 1980s. New York: Bantam Books, 1990.
- Williams, Juan. Eyes on the Prize: America's Civil Rights Years, 1954–1965. New York: Penguin Books, 1982.

Marshall, Thurgood

Thurgood Marshall (1908–1993) was born Thurgood Marshall (a name he later shortened legally) to Norma and William Marshall in the age of Jim Crow. Although Thurgood Marshall is perhaps best remembered for his historic position as the first black Supreme Court Justice and other men, such as Martin Luther King Jr., have garnered more fame for their leadership in the Civil Rights movement, Marshall's most direct and lasting contributions to the advancement of the race came in the years before the movement. Marshall, as an activist, laid the groundwork for the movement. As a direct result of Thurgood Marshall's and other civil rights leaders' efforts to uplift the race by overturning their subordinate legal status, blacks have earned political influence and arguably a stronger sense of community.

Throughout his life, Marshall was intimately and passionately involved with issues pertaining to equal rights for all men and women, regardless of race, ethnicity, or creed. Marshall's activism extended from his time at the NAACP (1932–1961) through his time as U.S. solicitor general (1965–1967). This can also be seen in the opinions and dissensions he wrote on the country's highest court (1967–1991). His NAACP tenure was a pivotal time for the organization when overturning racial segregation was one of its primary mandates. It was at the beginning of his career that Marshall began his work on his first segregation case, Murray v. Pearson, to open admission at the University of Maryland Law School to blacks—the same institution that denied him admittance only a few years earlier. By the time Marshall joined the bench of the Supreme Court, he had argued 32 cases before that body and won 29 of them, mostly in the name of racial desegregation and other civil rights causes.

The gains made by the Murray decision were small, for it only opened the law school; other graduate programs would be sued in the coming decade. Nevertheless, Murray was a significant step toward the larger educational accomplishments of Marshall and the NAACP. During the next two decades leading up to Brown (1954), which overturned Plessey v. Ferguson (1896), Marshall's cases challenged the foundation of American law itself. His goal was not merely to remind the nation to adhere to the Fourteenth Amendment—equal protection—but to demonstrate that the rules that he fought to overturn were wrong.

Marshall challenged segregation case after case. Although most of his cases dealt with educational equality, the future Justice also fought for blacks' right to vote in Texas primaries (Smith v. Allwright, 1944), the right to rent or buy any place of residence, and for equality of pay. In 1954, Marshall argued Brown v. the Board of Education, Topeka, Kansas in front of the U.S. Supreme Court. The Brown case encompassed five school segregation cases in Virginia, South Carolina, Delaware, Kansas, and Washington, D.C. After 17 years of success in opening postsecondary and graduate education through a series of court cases, Marshall, the Legal Defense Fund, and the NAACP were ready to take on educational segregation on a primary school level. Separate was clearly unequal. This inequality was apparent in Clarendo County, South Carolina, for example; per capita spending for white students was $179 compared to spending for black students of $43, and the student-to-teacher ratio in the white schools was 28:1, but in the black school system it was nearly double, 47:1.

Thurgood Marshall, the first African American appointed to the U.S. Supreme Court, built a remarkable legal career on the premise that all forms of racial segregation were unconstitutional. (Joseph Lavenburg, National Geographic Society, Collection of the Supreme Court of the United States)

Topeka, Kansas was different. The facilities were equal. Marshall's argument in Brown had to go further than the need for equal facilities; otherwise the Court could uphold Plessy and again rule that school segregation was permissible as long as facilities were equal. Marshall wanted educational integration. He focused on testimony presented by experts about the terrible effects of state-sponsored segregation on black children. Marshall argued "that segregated schools, perhaps more than any other single factor, are of major concern to the individual of public school age and contribute greatly to the unwholesomeness and unhappy development of the personality of Negroes which the color caste system in the United States has produced" (Supreme Justices, p. 52). The case was not easily won; it was almost a year-and-a-half after the Court began hearing the case that Chief Justice Warren finally read the Court's unanimous decision "Separate educational facilities are inherently unequal" (Brown v. Board of Education 347 U.S. 483).

The Supreme Court extended the Brown decision beyond education by expanding the principle to desegregate other public facilities. Through a series of signed and per curiam opinions, the Court ordered equal access to public parking lots, restaurants, cemeteries, hospitals, parks, golf courses, buses, beaches, and amphitheatres.

Marshall realized the impact of the Brown decision. He believed that Brown "probably did more than anything else to awaken the Negro from his apathy to demanding his right to equality" (A Defiant Life, p. 147). Therefore, the 1954 decision can be seen as the foundation for the Civil Rights movement; however, Marshall did not think Brown alone made the movement. When reflecting on the importance of his victories in Smith and Brown, Marshall once said, "I don't know whether the voting case or the school desegregation case was more important. Without the ballot, you've got no goddamned citizenship, no status, no power, in this country. But without the chance to get an education, you have no capacity to use the ballot effectively. Hell, I don't know which case I'm proudest of" (Supreme Justices, p. 75). See also: Brown v. Board of Education; Houston, Charles Hamilton; Johnson, Lyndon Baines; National Association for the Advancement of Colored People; Thomas, Clarence

Noah D. Drezner

Bibliography

- Ball, Howard. A Defiant Life: Thurgood Marshall and the Persistence of Racism in America. New York: Three Rivers Press, 2001.
- Drezner, Noah D. "Thurgood Marshall: A Study of Philanthropy Through Racial Uplift." In Uplifting A People: Essays on African American Philanthropy in Education, Marybeth Gasman and Katherine V. Sedwick, eds., 98–100. New York: Peter Lang, 2005.
- Smith, J. Clay, ed. Supreme Justices: Speeches and Writings. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 2003.

Matthews, Victoria Earle

Social reformer, journalist, and settlement house founder, Victoria Earle Matthews (1861–1907) committed her life to service. Born May 27, 1861, as one of nine children to a Virginia-born slave in Georgia, Victoria was part of the urban migration after emancipation. First moving to Richmond and Norfolk, Virginia, Victoria and her family arrived in New York City in 1873. She gained some education through the public schools, but she had to leave and find employment as a domestic to help her family. At 18, she married William Matthews, a coachman, and began to write articles and short stories for the Waverly magazine under the pen name, Victoria Earle. Her writings appeared in children's magazines and in both black and white newspapers as a way to earn money and as an intellectual outlet. Soon widowed and following the death of her only son, Matthews devoted her time to social welfare activities.

An admirer of Ida B. Wells, journalist and leader of the antilynching movement, Matthews joined with other black women in the New York City-Brooklyn community to honor Wells at a testimonial dinner in Lyric Hall on October 5, 1892. This event led to the formation of two important women's clubs: the Woman's Loyal Union, organized by Matthews and Maritcha Lyons later that month, and the Woman's Era Club of Boston, founded by Josephine St. Pierre Ruffin in January 1893.

As founder and first president of the Woman's Loyal Union, Matthews assumed a leadership position in the emerging club movement. She attended the first conference of black women in the summer of 1895, delivering a speech, "The Value of Race Literature." She was party to the formation of the National Federation of Afro-American Women in 1895 and became a delegate to the Congress of Colored Women at the Atlanta Exposition in December 1895. Despite the racial segregation at the Exposition, Matthews attended, heard the speech of Booker T. Washington, and visited other southern cities to gather information about the condition of black women in cities. She brought back this information to the New York women. The next summer, Matthews joined these black women in Washington, D. C. to merge two national organizations into the National Association of Colored Women, for which Matthews served as the national organizer.

On the trip back from the Atlanta Exposition and her tour of southern cities, she witnessed conditions for young, black women coming from the rural South to the northern cities in search of better wages, working conditions, and opportunities. Traveler's aid was unconcerned about black women being duped by unscrupulous men at the docks.

After her return to her Brooklyn home on Poplar Street, she gathered clubwomen together to develop a protective service for young working girls. The White Rose Home opened on February 11, 1897 to shelter and protect these young migrants and train them in practical self-help. Matthews and her helpers filled the need for travelers' aid by meeting the arrivals at the boats. The service expanded by providing agents at the Norfolk docks and became the White Rose Travelers' Aid Society in 1905. In addition to temporary lodging and training, services similar to employment agencies emerged to protect the women at work and obtain fair wages. Protecting and training black domestics received the support of white benefactors Mrs. C. P. Huntington, Grace Dodge, and Mary L. Stone, who contributed money and served as volunteers.

Matthews balanced training in practical skills (cooking, laundry, sewing, chair caning, and wood burnishing) with lectures on race history and leadership. Matthews turned over her personal collection of race literature to the settlement library and encouraged the young women to read the books to establish race pride. When race leaders visited New York City, Matthews invited them to speak to the women and encourage them to achieve.

Matthews and her sister clubwomen served as administrators, fundraisers, and teachers/volunteers. Alice Moore Dunbar taught in the kindergarten. Hallie Q. Brown served as assistant superintendent. When Matthews's health declined, Frances Reynolds Keyser assumed the leadership for the White Rose Home. Matthews died of tuberculosis on March 10, 1907. Services were held at her church, St. Philips Episcopal, followed by her burial in New York City's Maple Grove Cemetery.

Her legacy lived on through the White Rose Home, which became a model settlement house. The services provided impetus for the formation of the National League for the Protection of Colored Women in 1906. Urban multi-service centers grew out of these homes or missions for the protection of young black women. The centers filled the needs for lodging, job placement, night classes, industrial training, day nurseries, kindergartens, libraries, boys and girls clubs, savings clubs, choir and music programs, and social gatherings. They became the training ground for black visiting nurses and social workers graduating from emerging educational programs in social work. The centers cooperated with the National Urban League through affiliation and laid the foundation for major social services in black communities for generations.

See also: Antilynching Campaign; National Association of Colored Women; Wells-Barnett, Ida.

Dorothy Salem

Bibliography

- Logan, Shirley W. With Pen and Voice: A Critical Anthology of Nineteenth-Century African-American Women. Carbondale: Southern Illinois University Press, 1995.
- Salem, Dorothy. To Better Our World: Black Women in Organized Reform, 1890–1920. Brooklyn: Carlson Publishing, 1990.
- White, Deborah Gray. Too Heavy a Load: Black Women in Defense of Themselves, 1894–1994. New York: W. W. Norton, 1999.

McKay, Claude

Poet, journalist, editor, and black radical, Claude McKay (1889–1948) is best known for the literary contributions he made to the period in African American history commonly known as the Harlem Renaissance (1920–1930). Claude McKay was born in the upper Clarendon Parish in Jamaica in 1889 to Thomas Francis McKay and Hanna Ann Elizabeth Edwards. The youngest of eight children, McKay lived a sheltered life of relative ease as a result of the hard work of his parents. The McKay family's economic circumstances situated them as members of a small elite group of black farmers, but their dark skin ensured a somewhat marginalized social status among the lighter complexioned people whose skin color granted social status. These earlier experiences greatly influenced McKay's writing.

Before leaving his homeland of Jamaica in 1912 at the age of 22, McKay wrote two volumes of poetry in dialect. These volumes established McKay as an important literary figure among his local constituency. His arrival at Tuskegee Institute in Alabama that same year marked the beginning of an important period of self-discovery. The harsh realities of southern racism in part prompted McKay to leave Tuskegee a few months later to attend Kansas State College, a decision that proved unsatisfactory socially, but was beneficial to his career and intellectual development. It was during his two year stay in Kansas that McKay first read W. E. B. Du Bois's work, The Souls of Black Folk (1903). For McKay, Du Bois clearly articulated the marginalized social, political, and economic position that blacks in America occupied. Arguments made by Du Bois resonated with McKay's own experiences, both in Jamaica and in America. His poetry and writing reflected a growing sense of racial and class consciousness that was further enhanced by his encounters with other writers, artists, and intellectuals whom he met during his years in New York.

By the summer of 1914, McKay found himself in Harlem, New York, married to Eulalie Imelda Lewars, a long-time friend from Jamaica. During his early years in New York, McKay found employment as a porter, waiter, and briefly as an unsuccessful restaurant owner. He continued honing his writing skills and incorporated bits and pieces of his employment experiences into his poetry and fiction.

New York offered ample opportunities to engage in social activities, and McKay often did so with abandon. It was also here that he began further exploring his own homosexuality, which no doubt played a role in the dissolution of his marriage after only six months. His wife returned to Jamaica where she bore McKay's only child, a daughter whom he never saw.

By 1918, New York was becoming a hot bed of social protest. McKay was able to surround himself by like-minded radicals such as black socialist, Hubert Harrison. McKay also established working relationships with prominent men and women able to advance his writing career, such as Frank Harris, publisher of Pearson's Magazine, and Crystal Eastman, sister of Max Eastman, chief editor of the radical magazine the Liberator, and scholar Arthur Schomburg. McKay's reputation as a notable writer of the Harlem Renaissance era is both national and international. During his lifetime he contributed poems, short stories, and critical essays to many of the most popular literary journals of his time. Notably, in the aftermath of the 1919 Chicago race riot, he published "If We Must Die"—a militant poem that, in many ways, was an immediate precursor to the Harlem Renaissance. Claude McKay died in 1948 of heart disease. See also: Chicago Race Riot of 1919; Harlem Renaissance; "If We Must Die"; New Negro Movement; Red Summer Race Riots

Beverly A. Bunch-Lyons

Bibliography

- Cooper, Wayne F. Claude McKay: Rebel Sojourner in the Harlem Renaissance, A Biography. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1987.
- Holcomb, Gary Edward. Claude McKay, Code Name Sasha. Gainesville: University Press of Florida, 2007.

Ramesh, Kotti Sree, and Kandula Nirupa Rani. Claude McKay: The Literary Identity from Jamaica to Harlem and Beyond. Jefferson, NC: McFarland, 2006.

Tillery, Tyrone. Claude McKay: A Black Poet's Struggle for Identity. Amherst: University of Massachusetts Press, 1992.

Media Stereotypes

The stereotyping of African Americans within American media has been occurring since before the Civil War. Scholars have noted that the most prevalent forms are the slick Zip Coon, the savage Brute, the passive Uncle Tom, and the no-nonsense Mammy. Also present were images of the young black child as Pickaninny, the dim-witted yet noble Buck, and the tragically confused biracial Mulatto. Many of these images have appeared in print (posters, advertisements), heard on radio shows (the unseen banter of white men pretending to be Black on Amos n' Andy from 1928 to 1937), film (since before The Birth of a Nation in 1915 to contemporary "urban dramas"), and television programming of all genre. In each of these depictions, African Americans are reduced to caricatures of racial representations that often misinformed popular culture. A stereotype is defined as a standardized way of perceiving members of a group. Those who often seek to stereotype various groups (in this case, African Americans) reduce a complex, multifaceted people into homogeneous groups with only a subtle degree of variation.

Exposure of these media stereotypes began early in American history. During the days of minstrelsy, images appeared on billboards advertising upcoming stage shows. Many of these posters depicted the grinning Zip Coon wearing upscale garments that were mismatched and poorly fitted. This same pretentious character represented the free black's inability to fit into white society. The Brute, however, often appeared in the popular mainstream press as a reminder of how dangerous freed blacks could be. Misshapen and hideously unattractive, the Brute evoked fear in the hearts of white Americans. The editorial pages of many early newspapers reminded readers that these men (and women) would be set free to roam among them if abolitionists had their way. In advertising, images of the older, gray-haired Uncle Tom sitting placidly on a backwoods porch often appeared, seemingly content within his life of servitude. The Mammy was his female counterpart, often large and dark-skinned, cooking and cleaning for the master and missus, raising their children and occasionally working the fields when needed.

It has been argued by media scholars that these stereotypes are still with us today in newer, more modern guises. Many African American comedians still "skin and grin" as did Zip Coon; using comic routines that are buffoonish and self-deprecating. Young black men as brutish gang members threaten our streets while older, more conservative "Toms" supposedly support the slow, but gradual process of America society. Meanwhile, many sitcoms have featured large, mammy-like women doting after children and carrying out their expected duties.

During the 1960s and beyond, many media stereotypes of African Americans, previously coarse in their demeanor, were now transformed into articulate and highly intelligent people. For many black audiences, these countertypes attempted to send the message that they now had many of the same innate possibilities for success as did their white counterparts. For other audiences, black people had become assimilated into lifestyles that helped support the status quo of society, law, and order. Some movies and television shows featured black detectives and lawyers. Social responsibility was demonstrated by doctors and teachers working within the community, and social equality was shown through successful African American business owners. Each of these generalizations attempted to draw attention away from ongoing struggles against racial inequality and injustice.

Audiences often learn about other cultural groups from media, reinforcing cultural beliefs and subsequent values. Stereotypes have allowed writers and producers of programming and images to create shorthand versions of characters. These well-worn constructs often avoid explanations of motivations and instead use stereotypes to represent what these motivations probably are. Within an urban crime drama, it is not important to know the motivations of a young black man trapped within gang life. Through media stereotypes, audiences can make assumptions about criminal behavior and probable intent, allowing the hero/heroine to rescue society from the young man's criminality and chaos. These plots posit constructs and then move forward with a pretense, a problem, and the resolution. Stereotypes within narrative often take complex notions of the real world and make them easier to understand through oversimplification.

Media stereotypes have also affected the self-definition of African Americans. These “internalized media stereotypes” cause African American audiences to alter their self-image. Young black males may behave in a more aggressive fashion because of how their lives are depicted in videos. Assumptions about relationships are based on televised depictions of black marriages and romances. Traditionally black neighborhoods are considered undesirable based solely on how a television show (especially news coverage) frames them. Media stereotypes have been so pervasive that many other countries have seemingly come to “understand” African Americans through what they have seen in American media.

See also: BET; Jim Crow; The Birth of a Nation

Darrell Newton

Bibliography

- Anderson, Lisa M. Mammies No More: The Changing Image of Black Women on Stage and Screen. Lanham, MD: Rowman & Littlefield, 1997.
- Bogle, Donald. Toms, Coons, Mulattoes, Mammies, and Bucks: An Interpretive History of Blacks in American Films. New York: Continuum, 2001.
- Cripps, Thomas. Making Movies Black: The Hollywood Message Movie from World War II to the Civil Rights Era. New York: Oxford University Press, 1993.
- Martinez, Gerald. What It Is—What It Was!: The Black Film Explosion of the '70s in Words and Pictures. New York: Hyperion, 1998.
- Watkins, S. Craig. Representing: Hip Hop Culture and the Production of Black Cinema. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1998.

Meredith, James

James Meredith (1933–) is a civil rights activist who is best known for becoming the first African American student to attend the University of Mississippi in October 1962. Meredith's entry into the school served as a major turning point for the Civil Rights movement. James Howard Meredith was born June 25, 1933, in Kosciusko, Mississippi to farmers, Moses and Roxie Meredith. Moses Meredith was one of few African Americans in Mississippi who not only owned his own farm, but was also registered to vote, and he made a strong effort to make sure that James and his nine brothers and sisters were sheltered from the racism of the surrounding community. After graduating high school, James Meredith immediately joined the U.S. Air Force, which he served in from 1951 to 1960. In 1956, he married Mary June Wiggins, and the pair had three sons. After his discharge from the military, Meredith enrolled at Jackson State College for two years before applying for a transfer to the University of Mississippi at Oxford. Despite his excellent grades, he was denied admission twice before finally gaining acceptance in 1962. Then-governor Ross Barnett adamantly opposed Meredith's admission to the University, and personally traveled there to prevent Meredith from registering for classes. Meredith finally gained entrance to the school on October 1, 1962, where his presence sparked riots all over the campus. In all, 5,000 federal troops and 500 U.S. marshals were needed to quell the violence, which left two people dead and hundreds injured.

Many students treated Meredith poorly during his two semesters at the university. Although some apparently accepted his presence and he made friends, some students living in his dorm would bounce basketballs on the floor directly above Meredith's room at all hours of the night to disturb him. When Meredith would go to the cafeteria, people turned their backs to him, and if he sat at a table with other students, those students, who were all white, would immediately get up and move to another table. Despite this poor treatment, Meredith graduated with a degree in political science on August 18, 1963.

Following his time at the University of Mississippi, Meredith continued his education at the University of Ibadan in Nigeria before receiving a law degree from Columbia University in 1968. In addition to continuing his studies, Meredith remained a pivotal figure in the Civil Rights movement throughout the 1960s. Most notably, he led a civil rights march from Memphis, Tennessee to Jackson, Mississippi in the summer of 1966. Calling his march the “Walk Against Fear,” he hoped that his example would encourage the nearly half-million disenfranchised in Mississippi to overcome their fear of white retaliation and they would register to vote. Meredith did not invite any national civil rights groups to join him, instead choosing to march alone. On June 6, the day after the march started, Meredith was shot by sniper Aubrey James Norvell after walking only 28 miles. Although wounded, Meredith healed enough to finish the march two weeks later, this time joined by Dr. Martin Luther King and other nationally recognized civil rights activists. A photograph of Meredith after he was wounded won a Pulitzer Prize in photography in 1967.

James Meredith (photo taken in 1966) is a civil rights activist who is best known for becoming the first African American student to attend the University of Mississippi in October 1962. (Library of Congress)

Meredith ceased his civil rights activism in the late 1960s and authored a memoir about his time at the University of Mississippi entitled Three Years in Mississippi, published in 1966. He then settled into a career as a stockbroker before running unsuccessfully for a congressional seat in 1972, and then serving as a domestic advisor on the staff of U.S. Senator Jesse Helms, a one-time segregationist, beginning in 1989. Although he received a barrage of criticism from the civil rights community, Meredith, a staunch Republican, defended his decision to work for Helms, stating that he had written letters to every member of the House of Representatives and Senate offering his services and only Helms had replied. Meredith's most recent publication a historical work, Mississippi: A Volume of Eleven Books, was published in 1995. He presented his papers to his alma mater, the University of Mississippi, on March 21, 1997.

In 2002, Meredith's son Joseph graduated from the University of Mississippi with a doctorate in business administration. Joseph Meredith also received honors for being the most outstanding student in the school of business administration.

Today, Meredith distances himself from the Civil Rights movement of which he was such an instrumental part, referring to himself instead as a citizen who fought to protect the rights extended to all Americans. He currently lives in Jackson, Mississippi with his second wife, journalist Judy Alsobrooks, and runs a small used-car dealership. See also: Black Conservatives; Kennedy, John Fitzgerald; Republican Party; White Mob Violence

Sara K. Eskridge

Bibliography

- Barrett, Russell H. Integration at Ole Miss. Chicago: Quadrangle Books, 1965.
- Doyle, William. An American Insurrection: The Battle of Oxford, Mississippi, 1962. New York: Doubleday, 2001.
- Lord Walter. The Past That Would Not Die. New York: Harper and Row, 1965.
- Meredith, James. Three Years in Mississippi. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1966.

MFDP

The Mississippi Freedom Democratic Party (MFDP), founded on April 26, 1964 in Jackson Mississippi, was organized as an alternative to the regular Mississippi Democratic Party that denied African Americans in the state their voting rights. Spurred on by the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee (SNCC) and the Council of Federated Organizations (COFO), the MFDP had two objectives from the outset: to affirm black self-determination and to challenge northern-based white allies to take a stronger stance in support of the southern-based Civil Rights movement.

Building on SNCC's years of organizing around voter registration in the state, the MFDP was inspired by the 1963 "Freedom Ballot," a mock gubernatorial election in which nearly 80,000 black Mississippians cast votes. It envisioned itself as the catalyst to organizing black political participation in the state while serving as a nonexclusionary party open to both blacks and whites and running an integrated slate of candidates. Further, unlike mainstream political parties, women occupied leadership roles in the MFDP. Two of the most noticeable women were Fannie Lou Hamer and Victoria Gray, who ran for the House and Senate, respectively, in the state primary races for Congress. Noting the danger of bucking the establishment of the racist political structure in Mississippi, Hamer, who had received many death threats for her participation in civil rights activities, stated, "But if I fall, I'll fall five feet four inches forward in the fight for freedom" (Freedom's Daughters, p. 315).

In addition to the central roles Hamer and Gray played, Ella Baker acted as a voluntary director of the MFDP's Washington, D.C. office and keynoted the party's convention. Displaying a keen understanding of the long-term effect of the MFDP's ability to politicize poor African Americans in the state and develop a new grassroots leadership Baker noted, "It is important that you go to the [Democratic National] convention whether you are seated or not. It is even more important that you develop a political machinery in this state. The MFDP will not end at the convention. This is only the beginning" (Freedom's Daughters, p. 317).

On August 21, 1964, the 68 MFDP delegates arrived in Atlantic City, New Jersey and began to lobby for support to be seated as Mississippi's official delegation for the Democratic National Convention. President Lyndon Johnson was so worried that a high-profile fight over seating the MFDP would cost him reelection by losing southern votes that he attempted to undercut support for the party. In a well-known show of insecurity and power politics, as Fannie Lou Hamer was addressing 110 members of the convention's Credentials Committee, Johnson called a press conference so that media attention would be drawn away from Hamer's compelling testimony about what it meant to be black and poor in Mississippi, which was being broadcast nationwide.

Seeing that the MFDP would not be deterred, President Johnson made an effort to placate the upstart delegation. Johnson offered a compromise; he would allow two of the party's delegates that he hand-picked to be seated as nonvoting delegates-at-large, and the rest of the MFDP's delegates would be accepted as guests of the convention. Although some MFDP delegates were initially in favor of the compromise and some heavyweight civil rights leaders such as Roy Wilkins and Martin Luther King urged the MFDP to accept the deal, the party rejected it.

Johnson was incensed by the party's refusal and had their phones tapped. Further, at Johnson's request, FBI agents posed as NBC correspondents to try to extract information from party delegates. The most underhanded incident occurred when Hubert Humphrey and Walter Mondale brought the rejected compromise to the Credentials Committee as if the MFDP had accepted it. Based on the assumption that the MFDP was in favor of the compromise, both the Credentials Committee and full Democratic Convention approved the compromise without the knowledge of the MFDP. With that, the MFDP was locked out of participating in the convention the same way as Mississippi residents were barred from voting.

Although 20 MFDP delegates managed to enter the convention hall and stage a protest that was nationally televised, with credentials passes given to them by other sympathetic delegates, in the end the MFDP was unable to unseat the regular Mississippi Democratic delegation. The mainstream Democrats viewed the MFDP as a threat to business as usual and, as journalist Carl Braden noted, "They [the MFDP] were really serving notice that if [they] are going to be involved in politics, it's going to be an entirely different kind of politics and different people are going to run things... I mean this is a threat... If you're somewhere in power you don't want that happening" (Freedom's Daughters, pp. 323–24).

The Mississippi Freedom Democratic Party may not have been seated at the Democratic National Convention, but it brought the struggle and injustice that African Americans in Mississippi faced to a national spotlight, helped pass the 1965 Voting Rights Act, and led to an overhaul of the Democratic Party, opening it up to groups that previously had little or no representation in its councils before the MFDP's challenge. Thinking back on the MFDP, civil rights activist Bob Moses noted, "The MFDP was raising an important question with this country, and with the Democratic Party, as one of its major political institutions: Generations of Black people had been denied access to the political process; could they get it now?... We were challenging them [the Democratic Party] to recognize the existence of a whole group of people—white and Black and disenfranchised—who form the underclass of this country" (Radical Equations, pp. 82–83).

Although the answer to Moses's question was a resounding "NO," according to civil rights scholar Leslie McLemore, the MFDP represented, "the coming of political age of Black people in Mississippi in a way that had not been seen since Reconstruction" (Olsen, 2001, 324).

Further, John Lewis, a SNCC chairman during the 1960s, indicates that the MFDP's challenge was the turning point of the Civil Rights movement, noting that until the Democratic Convention failed to seat the MFDP, most civil rights activists held on to the belief that the democratic system would eventually work. After the Atlantic City debacle, however, such faith in the system was lost and people now saw that if change was going to happen, they were going to have to make it happen.

See also: Baker, Ella; Disfranchisement; Hamer, Fannie Lou; Lowndes County Freedom Organization; Johnson, Lyndon Baines; Mississippi Freedom Summer, 1964; Moses, Robert; Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee; Voting Rights Act of 1965

Paul T. Miller

Bibliography

- Carson, Clayborne. In Struggle: SNCC and the Black Awakening of the 1960s. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1981.
- Lewis, John. Walking with the Wind. New York: Simon & Schuster, 1998.
- Moses, Robert. Radical Equations: Math Literacy and Civil Rights. Boston: Beacon, 2001.
- Olsen, Lynn. Freedom's Daughters: The Unsung Heroines of the Civil Rights Movement from 1830 to 1970. New York: Scribner, 2001.
- Ransby, Barbara. Ella Baker & the Black Freedom Movement: A Radical Democratic Vision. Chapel Hill: The University of North Carolina Press, 2003.

Million Man March

On October 16, 1995, an estimated 850,000 African American men gathered on Washington, D.C.'s National Mall for one of the largest political rallies in U.S. history. By comparison, 250,000 people of all ethnic and racial backgrounds gathered for the 1963 March on Washington for Jobs and Freedom to hear Martin Luther King's "I Have a Dream" speech. The so-called Million Man March was organized principally by the controversial leader of the Nation of Islam, Minister Louis Farrakhan, and was meant to generate discussions about self-help and to engage African American men to commit to their families and to help stop drug use, violence, and other vices in their communities. These themes were repeated in the speeches delivered by more than 60 African American and diasporic African dignitaries including Maya Angelou, Reverend Jeremiah

Wright, Martin Luther King III, Rosa Parks, Reverend Jesse Jackson, Reverend Benjamin Chavis, Minister Rasul Muhammad, Dick Gregory, and Senator Aldebert Bryan of the Virgin Islands. Concentrated on the themes of atonement, reconciliation, and responsibility, the Million Man March was not—as projected in the media—another frustrated attempt to uncover racism and the hands of white America in the plight of African Americans.

The march was organized in the context of troubling political trends showing that African American concerns were being pushed to the periphery of the political landscape. In 1994, sweeping Republican Party victories in congressional elections—based in part on the positive reception of the Contact with America—led to Republicans becoming the majority party in the U.S. House of Representatives for the first time in 40 years. Republicans, like Minority Whip Newt Gingrich and Tom DeLay, played active roles in setting political agendas for President Bill Clinton, particularly on issues like law enforcement and welfare reform, which concerned African Americans. In many ways, the Million Man March can be seen as a direct reaction to two Republican-led initiatives in mid- to late-1995—the Taking Back Our Streets Act (which called for the building of new prisons and tougher sentencing) and the Personal Responsibility Act (which called for significant reforms in welfare programs).

On the same day as the Million Man March, female leaders associated with the march organizers called for the National Day of Absence, which would be observed by those who could not be in attendance in Washington, D.C. On the National Day of Absence, African Americans were encouraged to be absent from school and work and to attend either teach-ins or worship services, which would facilitate discussions and contemplation on the livelihood and self-sufficiency of African American communities across the country. Organizers of both the march and the Day of Absence hoped to move the movements beyond political discourse and sought to engage the issues plaguing African American communities on a spiritual level. Given the role played by ministers of the Nation of Islam and Christian religious leaders in both movements, the fact that they emphasized spiritual healing as the foundation for solutions to various social ills makes sense.

The various themes of spiritual healing, atonement, reconciliation, and responsibility were highlighted in the Million Man March Pledge. After the speech delivered by Minister Louis Farrakhan, he asked all men in attendance to raise their right hand and to repeat the following:

I _____ pledge that from this day forward, I will strive to love my brother as I love myself.

I _____ from this day forward will strive to improve myself spiritually, morally, mentally, socially, politically and economically for the benefit of myself, my family and my people.

I _____ pledge that I will strive to build business, build houses, build hospitals, build factories and enter into international trade for the good of myself, my family and my people.

I _____ pledge that from this day forward I will never raise my hand with a knife or a gun to beat, cut or shoot any member of my family or any human being except in self defense.

I _____ pledge from this day forward, I will never abuse my wife by striking her, disrespecting her, for she is the mother of my children and the producer of my future.

I _____ pledge that from this day forward, I will never engage in the abuse of children, little boys or little girls, for sexual gratification. But I will let them grow in peace to be strong men and women for the future of our people.

I _____ will never again use the "b" word to describe any female, but particularly my own Black sister.

I _____ pledge that from this day forward that I will not poison my body with drugs or that which is destructive to my health and my well-being.

I _____ pledge from this day forward that I will support Black newspapers, Black radio, Black television. I will support Black artists who clean up their acts and show respect for themselves and respect for their people and respect for the heirs of the human family.

I _____ will do all of this, so help me God.

After the pledge, each man in the crowd was asked to hug another. Although controversies about the lack of involvement and support by President Clinton and the actual size of the crowd during the Million Man March would shape some of the public discourse surrounding the events on October 16, 1995, the march helped initiate internal discussions and reassessments within African American communities. Moreover, it spawned a number of similar movements, including the Million Woman March (1997), the Million Youth March (1998), and the Million Family March (2000). The energy and discussions created by the movement were highlighted in Spike Lee's 1996 movie Get on the Bus.

See also: Clinton, William Jefferson; Farrakhan, Louis; March on Washington, 1963; Nation of Islam

Walter C. Rucker

Bibliography

- Cottman, Michael H., and Deborah Willis. Million Man March. New York: Crown Trade Paperbacks, 1995.
- Hull, Mary. Struggle and Love, 1972–1997: From the Gary Convention to the Aftermath of the Million Man March. Philadelphia: Chelsea House, 1997.
- Moore, Lenard D., and Eugene Redmond. Gathering at the Crossroads: The Million Man March. Winchester, VA: Red Moon Press, 2003.
- Reid, Frank Madison, Jeremiah A. Wright, and Colleen Birchett. When Black Men Stand Up for God: Reflections on the Million Man March. Chicago: African American Images, 1996.
- Sadler, Kim Martin. Atonement: The Million Man March. Cleveland, OH: Pilgrim Press, 1996.

Mississippi Freedom Summer, 1964

During the summer of 1964, hundreds of black and white students volunteered to enter the Deep South to work on a program called Freedom Summer. The impetus behind Freedom Summer was to work on voter registration, establish freedom schools, and get the black community involved in local politics. Most of the volunteers were members of the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee (SNCC), Congress of Racial Equality (CORE), and The National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP). These groups together combined to make the Mississippi Council of Federated Organization for the sole purpose of politically organizing black communities, in Mississippi

Mississippi was an important place for civil rights work for several reasons. First, perhaps out of the entire South, blacks in Mississippi had horrible political and economic conditions, especially in the Mississippi Delta. In 1962, Mississippi only had 6.7 percent of the black population registered to vote. Despite the constitutional right for all citizens to be able to vote, black Mississippians were constantly in fear of losing their home, jobs, and lives from white retaliation. Furthermore, the white political machine continually disfranchised the black community through enforcement of poll taxes and literacy test.

The second reason Mississippi was important was the continued economic oppression facing the black community. The Mississippi Delta was severely impoverished. Mechanization caused a lot of workers to lose their jobs, and those who still had jobs were in fear of losing them because they fought to be able to vote. Black Mississippians and SNCC organizers believed the key to a brighter economic future rested in the hands of those who ran the government. Many communities in Mississippi had a black majority, so they should not only be able to vote but also hold political office.

One of the local individuals that helped organize and galvanize a nation for political and economic improvement in Mississippi was Mrs. Fannie Lou Hamer. Born in Montgomery County, Mississippi, Hamer was raised by sharecroppers and continued working as a sharecropper in the Mississippi Delta. Once SNCC became active in Mississippi during the summer of 1962, Hamer worked with them to educate and register to vote thousands of poor blacks living in the area. Hamer was also not intimidated by the white community. When the owner of the plantation she worked for asked her not to register to vote, she did so anyway, despite the threats of being removed from the land she had worked so hard on.

Although she was Hamer continued to work for voter rights in Mississippi. One of the events that placed her into the national spotlight was her arrest in Winona, Mississippi after returning from a citizenship class in Charleston, South Carolina. She was arrested on trumped-up charges and severely beaten while in jail. There was a highly publicized court case, in which the defendants were found not guilty. After all the publicity from Hamer's beating and subsequent trial, however, her name began garnering national attention both for her personally and for the state of Mississippi.

Hamer was also a founder and organizer of the Mississippi Freedom Democratic Party (MFDP) in the spring of 1964. The creation and sustaining of the MFDP became one of the primary goals of Freedom Summer. Volunteers traveled from house to house in the black community urging individuals to vote and become active in the political process. The creation of the MFDP was especially important because of the upcoming presidential election. They wanted to make President Johnson realize that the needs of the black community had to be met and the Democratic Party, as it currently was, did not represent black America. The main goal of the MFDP was to unseat the all-white Mississippi Democratic regulars at the Democratic Convention in Atlantic City, New Jersey, and be recognized as the true representatives of Mississippi.

Volunteer worker urges Southern African Americans to register to vote in 1964. (National Archives)

On August 20, 1964, MFDP delegates arrived, including Hamer. Upon their arrival, the convention had to decide who would represent Mississippi on the convention floor. The Credential Committee held a hearing that was broadcast live across the nation. Hamer spoke on the injustices going on in Mississippi and the political climate of the South. Just as her speech was starting to get impassioned, President Johnson interrupted the broadcast with an impromptu press conference.

Despite President Johnson's attempt to cut Hamer off, the nation had already seen enough to give national support to the MFDP. President Johnson was afraid that if he issued his support for the MFDP, he would lose the southern Democratic vote and ultimately the presidency. A compromise had to be reached. The convention decided to offer the MFDP two seats at large and bar any delegation guilty of discrimination. All but four of the regular Democrat delegates from Mississippi walked off the floor, and the MFDP tried to obtain those seats but were not allowed on the floor. Ultimately, the MFDP turned down the two seats. The MFDP did not get seated at the convention, but the creation and support of the party helped to achieve a major goal of Freedom Summer—getting the local community interested and active in local politics and garnering the nation's attention toward black voting rights in the South.

Beyond the local community, hundreds of white volunteers from the North helped spread the word and educate the black community about their voting rights. Community centers were created where children could have not only "traditional" educational classes, but also organize for political change in their communities. Before these northern volunteers went to Mississippi, they received training in Oxford, Ohio, led by Jim Forman and other SNCC members, including Fannie Lou Hammer. The purpose of training was to introduce them to nonviolence tactics and give them an understanding of what mob violence might be like. If past events, like the Freedom Rides, were any indication of how white mobs acted on both black and white bodies, the volunteers knew that violence, if not death, was likely.

Nothing illustrated that threat better than the disappearance of a black volunteer, James Chaney, and two white volunteers, Andrew Goodman and Michael Schwerner. These three men set out on June 21 for Philadelphia, Mississippi to investigate the bombing of a black church. The men were arrested and then released that same evening, never to be seen again. Press conferences were held and the families of all three men begged the public for any information about their whereabouts. President Johnson even launched an FBI investigation into their disappearance. The wife of Michael Schwerner, Rita, publicly addressed the fact that if all the men had been black, there would be no national attention over their disappearance and that it was a shame that white men had to die before the violence in Mississippi, and the South in general, would be noticed by the American public. Eventually, the scorched remains of their car were found, leading everyone to fear they were dead. Their suspicions were confirmed on April 4 when their bodies were found buried together in a shallow grave. The FBI had offered $30,000 to a Ku Klux Klan member for the information on where they were buried. All three were killed by gunshots to the head, and Chaney was also severely beaten. The families of the three men wanted them all to be buried together, but because of continued segregation in cemeteries, their wish could not be fulfilled.

The disappearance of the three men did have a positive impact on the events of that summer. It placed more media attention on the volunteers and perhaps resulted in less violence than normal toward the workers. Despite the media, approximately 80 volunteers were beaten and 1,000 were jailed over the course of the summer. In addition, houses, Freedom Schools, churches, and other centers of volunteer activity were burned or firebombed. Despite the fear of violence, students were eager to work in Mississippi. Although cooperation between black and white workers showed the nation how all people could work together to effect change in Mississippi, however, people began to question whether the presence of whites was actually a positive for accomplishing the goals of Freedom Summer.

For instance, local blacks could expect more harassment from local whites for just talking with the volunteers.

Immediately, white youth started driving through the black communities where white volunteers were staying and would break windows, start fires, or make other threats against the black community. The black community was inviting violence by talking to the volunteers, and this was obviously a very dangerous situation. Some white volunteers would become frustrated because any black person who was outspoken or supported the efforts of the volunteers would lose their jobs or worse. It was not uncommon for the local police or local whites to follow the volunteers into the black community and report their findings back to their employers or other members of the community.

Another issue that was debated was the role of white women. Southern attitudes about what “white womanhood” meant and how it was threatened by going into the black community did not go over very well with the southern white men. In an effort to protect volunteers and black citizens, a majority of white women were given jobs that involved the Freedom Schools instead of canvassing the black communities. Their presence became a mixed blessing because the volunteers were able to open up more schools than they originally planned. Many more students wanted to attend the schools than previously thought. Some students were so eager to learn they showed up for school as early as 6 A.M.

The schools went beyond the scope of a regular classroom. The children learned not only American and world history, but also about their culture and American politics. Children were taught why it was important to be active in their community politics and how to be activist throughout their life. This lesson was an essential goal of Freedom Summer, as the organizers wanted the black community to learn to be a social force to recognize not only in Mississippi, but also the country.

In all, Freedom Summer left behind a strong legacy. First, black disfranchisement was brought to the forefront with the passage of the Voting Rights Act of 1965. The passage of the Voting Rights Act would allow federal examiners to take over voting registration in places where there was a history of discrimination and banned literacy tests as a requirement for registering to vote. The impact on voter registration in Mississippi was tremendous. The percent of blacks registered to vote rose from 6.7 percent to nearly 60 percent. There was also a substantial increase in voter registration across the country. Second, the MFDP had opened up the world of politics to black Mississippians. Black Americans realized that they could and should have a place in American politics.

Lastly, Freedom Summer opened up Mississippi to the rest of the country. As a result, more Americans were aware of the various civil rights issues plaguing Mississippi and it was not just black Americans saying that change had to occur. White Americans were becoming just as vocal as black Americans, and this made the rest of the country stand up and take notice.

See also: Carmichael, Stokely (Kwame Ture); CORE; Freedom Schools; Hamer, Fannie Lou; MFDP; Moses, Robert; National Association for the Advancement of Colored People; Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee; Voting Rights Act of 1965

Cristy Casado Tondeur

Bibliography

- Carmichael, Stokely. Ready for Revolution: The Life and Struggles of Stokely Carmichael. New York: Scribner, 2003.
- Carson, Clayborne et al., eds. The Eyes on the Prize: Civil Rights Reader: Documents, Speeches, and Firsthand Accounts from the Black Freedom Struggle, 1954–1990. New York: Penguin Books, 1991.
- Mills, Hay. This Little Light of Mine: The Life of Fannie Lou Hamer. New York: Penguin Group, 1993.
- Payne, Charles. I've Got the Light of Freedom: The Organizing Tradition and the Mississippi Freedom Struggle. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1995.

Montgomery Bus Boycott

---

The Montgomery Bus Boycott is often heralded as the beginning of the modern Civil Rights movement. Sparked by Rosa Parks's refusal to give up her seat for a white passenger, the bus boycott engaged all of Montgomery's African American community in a nonviolent, mass protest of Jim Crow segregation that spanned 381 days, financially crippling the Montgomery City Lines. After the U.S. Supreme Court affirmed a lower court ruling that Alabama's segregated bus law was unconstitutional, the community boycott and segregated buses in Montgomery ended. Yet the Montgomery bus boycott by the city's black community ushered in an era of direct action by African Americans across the South against the inequities of Jim Crow.

The social, political, and economic structure of the South rested on a bifurcated racial hierarchy and institutionalized racial segregation that permeated virtually every aspect of southern life. This Jim Crow system consistently deprived African Americans of equal opportunity, access to public spaces and facilities, and their constitutional rights. Southern white society controlled African Americans with time-worn customs and inequitable Jim Crow laws, as well as the use of intimidation and terror. Overt threats and merely the intimation of lynching kept many African Americans from challenging the status quo.

In Montgomery, as in many cities throughout the segregated South, African Americans rode in the rear of the bus. The front was reserved for white passengers. Blacks paid at the front, just as white passengers, but they then had to exit the bus and walk to the rear to board through the back door. As part of the degradation inherent in Jim Crow, bus drivers—this often depended on the capriciousness or the viciousness of the individual bus driver—sometimes drove away before they could board at the rear, leaving them stranded and out their bus fare. Although the black section was always in the rear, the color line was not static. When whites were not on the bus, blacks could sit nearer to the front. As more whites boarded, and the seats filled, the color line moved farther back. Black passengers, at that point, were expected to give their seats to the white passengers, gender notwithstanding.

The Women's Political Council (WPC), headed by Jo Ann Robinson, an English professor at Alabama State College, had been entertaining for some years the idea of a boycott of the bus system and looking for a test case to challenge Montgomery's segregation ordinances. The case of Claudette Colvin initially seemed to be the most promising. On March 2, 1955, the 15-year-old Colvin had been arrested for not giving up her seat after the bus driver ordered her to move. Colvin had been seated in a row not normally reserved for whites, which Montgomery's segregation ordinance did not specifically cover. Robinson and others in the WPC consulted with E. D. Nixon, president of the Montgomery NAACP, and Clifford Durr, a former Roosevelt New Dealer and local white attorney. In the end, they decided against using Colvin's arrest as either a test case or to rally support for a boycott. Colvin's standing in the community—she was young, unwed, and pregnant—did not bode well for its success. In all, they rejected three possible test cases before Rosa Parks's arrest.

As Rosa Parks rode home from work on the evening of December 1, 1955, she sat in the first row of seats reserved for African Americans. When more passengers boarded bus No. 2857, and the white rows filled, the bus driver, James F. Blake, ordered Parks and three others to give their seats to the white passengers. Although the other three complied, Parks refused. Dispelling the myth that she refused to move because her feet hurt, Parks later said, "the only tired I was, was tired of giving in" (Rosa Parks, p. 116). Blake called the police and police officers Fletcher B. Day and Dempsey W. Mixon arrested Parks in front of the Empire Theater for violating the city's segregation ordinance. Parks had problems with Blake previously, in 1943, when he forced her off the bus for not exiting the front door after paying her fare and entering the bus from the rear. After that incident, Parks avoided Blake's bus for more than 12 years.

Nixon and Durr arranged for Parks's release on bond, and she agreed to allow her arrest to be used as a test case. Parks had a sterling reputation in the community: she was married, articulate, and held a stable job at the Montgomery fair, a popular department store. When contacted by black attorney Fred Gray (who had been contacted by Nixon) about Parks's arrest, Robinson and the WPC began circulating thousands of leaflets calling for a boycott of the city's buses. Nixon organized a meeting of black leaders for the night of December 2 at Dexter Avenue Baptist Church where he challenged them to lead such an effort.

The first day of the boycott, December 5, was highly successful. More than 90 percent of the black community boycotted the buses. That same day, a Montgomery court convicted Parks and fined her $10.00, plus $4.00 in court costs. In an afternoon meeting at the Mount Zion African Methodist Episcopal (AME) church, community leaders created an organization to run the boycott, the Montgomery Improvement Association (MIA), the name suggested by Reverend Ralph D. Abernathy of the black First Baptist Church of Montgomery. At this meeting, the MIA's first president, 26-year-old Martin Luther King Jr., the pastor of Dexter Avenue Baptist Church, had been unanimously elected, not because of his "potential of leadership" but because of the rivalries between other black leaders in Montgomery and the fact that King had only been in the city a short time and had not yet made enemies in the community. Mount Zion AME hosted a mass meeting that night, but the boycott's initial success and Parks's conviction clearly meant that the boycott would continue until the bus line changed their policies. The African American churches played a large role in disseminating information and providing a source of strength and support for the black community during the boycott.

The MIA demanded three things from the Montgomery City Lines: courtesy from bus drivers; the hiring of four black bus drivers; and more equitable seating on the buses, although they did not demand integrated seating. The MIA's plan called for blacks to be seated from the rear to the front and whites from the front to the rear, without any seats being reserved for a specific race. According to Jo Ann Robinson, the reason that they did not demand integration openly was that "no one was brazen enough to announce publicly that black people might boycott city buses for the specific purpose of integrating those buses. Just to say that minorities wanted 'better seating arrangements' was bad enough. . . . To admit that black Americans were seeking to integrate would have been too much; there probably would have been much bloodshed and arrests of those who dared to disclose such an idea!" (The Montgomery Bus Boycott and the Women Who Started It, p. 23). The bus company refused to meet any demands.

For the next 381 days, African Americans refused to ride the buses in Montgomery. They walked and they organized carpools. Those who owned their own automobiles volunteered their vehicles or drove people themselves. Black cab drivers charged only a fraction of their fares to black riders. The MIA purchased station wagons to transport people back and forth from work or the store. Donations poured in from outside the state as churches, both black and white, raised money and sent gifts such as shoes.

The bus boycott also had white support, but it was extremely limited in scope. White liberals such as Clifford and Virginia Durr and Reverend Robert Graetz, the white minister of Trinity Lutheran Church, openly supported the boycott. Others, such as Juliette Hampton Morgan, wrote letters to the newspaper praising the effort. In many cases, white employers picked up and dropped off their maids and housekeepers or paid their cab fare. In response, Montgomery police ticketed white women for transporting their maids and newly organized White Citizens' Councils used pressure and threats to stop the practice. The Montgomery City Lines, which depended heavily on black riders, suffered tremendous financial hardship without them.

During the course of the boycott, King and other black leaders became the targets of white discontent. The Montgomery police arrested King for speeding, and both his and Nixon's homes were bombed. Such harassment created greater solidarity among the black community at large and reinforced their commitment to resist injustice and maltreatment. Other supporters of the boycott faced white violence as well. Even after the boycott ended, white extremists bombed Abernathy and Graetz's homes, as well as Bell Street Baptist Church, Hutchinson Street Baptist Church, Abernathy's First Baptist Church, and Mount Olive Baptist Church.

Montgomery's city government also tried to stop the boycott, but without such overt violence. The Alabama legislature had passed an antiboycott law in 1921 that Montgomery city officials used in an attempt to end the boycott. A Montgomery grand jury indicted 89 black leaders, 24 of them ministers, for conspiring to boycott the Montgomery City Lines. King, of all of the 89 conspirators, was the only one tried. He was found guilty and levied a $500 fine. King's trial, far from quashing the boycott, attracted national attention and helped establish him as a national figure. In the aftermath of the trial, Jet magazine described King as "Alabama's Modern Moses."

Although the MIA initially wanted to use Parks's case to challenge bus segregation, it also decided to challenge segregation directly in federal court. On February 1, 1956, Attorneys Fred Gray and Charles D. Langford filed suit on behalf of four African American women, Aurelia S. Browder, Susie McDonald, Mary Louise Smith, and Claudette Colvin, who had been mistreated on Montgomery city buses. As Gray made clear, "I wanted the court to have only one issue to decide—the constitutionality of the laws requiring segregation on the buses in the city of Montgomery" (Bus Ride to Justice, p. 69). Gray feared that having Parks's prosecution associated with the petition might distract from that issue.

Browder v. Gayle (Montgomery Mayor William A. Gayle) came before the three-judge U.S. Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit. On June 5, 1956, the panel, in a two-to-one decision, ruled Alabama's segregation bus laws unconstitutional. Judges Frank M. Johnson Jr. and Richard T. Rives, both white Montgomerians, courageously found for the plaintiffs at great personal cost, citing Brown v. Board of Education as a precedent for their decision. On November 13, 1956, the U.S. Supreme Court affirmed the judgment of the 5th Circuit, upholding the lower court decision. It rejected the city and state's appeals on December 17. The Supreme Court order to desegregate the buses arrived in Montgomery on December 20, 1956, prompting the MIA to end the bus boycott.

The Montgomery bus boycott demonstrated the power and influence of a committed African American community. Unlike subsequent civil rights campaigns, the press played a relatively minor role in the boycott's success, the credit for which should be attributed largely to Montgomery's black leadership. As historian J. Mills Thornton notes, "the participants in the demonstrations by and large derived their enthusiasm and dedication from the prospect of effecting specific changes in their own municipalities" rather than a devotion to larger, national civil rights strategies (The Walking City, p. xxi). In this way, the Montgomery Bus Boycott foreshadowed future civil rights campaigns.

See also: Brown v. Board of Education; Jim Crow; King, Coretta Scott; King, Martin Luther Jr.; Parks, Rosa; Rustin, Bayard; White Citizens' Councils

Dan J. Puckett

Bibliography

- Branch, Taylor. Parting the Waters: America in the King Years, 1954–63. New York: Simon & Schuster, 1988.
- Garrow, David J., ed. The Walking City: The Montgomery Bus Boycott, 1955–1956. Brooklyn, NY: Carlson Publishing, 1989.
- Gray, Fred D. Bus Ride to Justice: Changing the System by the System: The Life and Works of Fred Gray. Montgomery, AL: The Black Belt Press, 1995.
- King, Martin Luther Jr. Stride Toward Freedom: The Montgomery Story. New York: Harper and Brothers, 1958.
- Parks, Rosa (with James Haskins). Rosa Parks: My Story. New York: Dial Books, 1992.
- Robinson, Jo Ann. The Montgomery Bus Boycott and the Women Who Started It: The Memoir of Jo Ann Gibson Robinson, ed. David J. Garrow. Knoxville: University of Tennessee Press 1987.
- Thornton, J. Mills III. Dividing Lines: Municipal Politics and the Struggle for Civil Rights in Montgomery, Birmingham, and Selma. Tuscaloosa and London: The University of Alabama Press, 2002.

Moore, Queen Mother Audley

Queen Mother Audley Moore (1898–1996) was a prominent civil rights activist, an advocate of Pan-Africanism, and an active participant in a number of movements, causes, and organizations for more than eight decades. She was born in New Iberia, Louisiana in 1898, the oldest of three daughters born to Henry and St. Cyr Moore. Her father had served as a sheriff in New Iberia, and her mother died when Moore was five years old. Having witnessed the lynching of her mother's father and her grandmother's husband, Moore gained an early understanding of racism and racial violence in the early-20th-century South. After the untimely death of Moore's mother, her father sent Moore and her two siblings to live with her maternal grandmother in New Iberia while her father moved to New Orleans. Reunited with her father a few years later, Moore and her sisters moved to New Orleans and lived with him until his death when Moore was in the fourth grade. Forced to drop out of school to care for her sisters, Moore used some of her father's assets to rent a house and earned income as a hairdresser in order to support her family.

Experiencing the sheer brutality of racism and lynch law in the South, as well as the daily injustices experienced by people of color in New Orleans, Moore was perhaps predisposed to radical political expressions later in life. In 1919, Marcus Garvey came to New Orleans to give a speech at a meeting hall and to establish a branch of his newly formed United Negro Improvement Association (UNIA). Although local police initially prevented Garvey from speaking, a group of armed African Americans ensured he would not be interrupted the following night. Moore, in attendance at both rallies, brought two pistols with her during the second attempt by Garvey to deliver an address. When police attempted to interrupt the rally, she was among those who waved their guns and turned away the white police in an unprecedented display of defiance. Moore immediately became a member of the UNIA and served in the organization for much of her subsequent life.

Moore and her family left the South during the Great Migration, making temporary stops in California and Chicago before settling permanently in Harlem in 1922. While in Harlem, Moore was a dedicated follower of Garvey and she began to expand her activism. Concerned with the working conditions of African American domestic workers, Moore organized the Harriet Tubman Association as a mechanism to address their particular plight. Her active interests in working class and subaltern peoples led her to become affiliated with the Communist Party by 1930. Given her dedication to Garvey, the UNIA, and—by extension—African American capitalism, this embrace of communism may seem difficult to comprehend. Although Garvey was imagining African repatriation for the African American masses, Moore understood that something had to be done to ameliorate the exploitative conditions faced by African Americans throughout the country. This transition in her organizing activities might also be linked to the deportation of Marcus Garvey by 1925 and the resulting marginalization of the UNIA.

Initially joining the International Labor Defense (ILD), she officially joined the Communist Party in 1933. Both the ILD and the Communist Party had taken active roles in the Scottsboro case and, in the midst of the Great Depression, communism seemed to offer real answers for the exploitation of workers, white supremacy, and racism. In addition to fighting racial discrimination and the rights of African American working women, Moore also played a role in the integration of major league baseball and the Coast Guard. In the 1940s, she served as the campaign manager for Benjamin E. Davis Jr., an African American communist politician in New York who made two successful bids for the New York City Council. In the midst of the McCarthy era, Moore renounced the Communist Party and resigned her membership. In the period between the 1950s and the 1970s, she gravitated toward more mainstream political expressions and movements, including involvement with—or membership in—the National Council of Negro Women and the NAACP. Moore also greatly expanded the scope of her activism, including participation in the Pan-African Congresses and the Organization of African Unity. To this end, she founded, or was a founding member of, the University Association of Ethiopian Women, the World Federation of African People, the Congress of African People, and the Republic of New Africa. As a direct result of her international activities, in 1972 Moore received the title of “Queen Mother” of Asante in recognition of her efforts to bring about Pan-African unity. Over the last two decades of her life, Moore became increasingly involved in the reparations movement. Shortly before her death, she made her last public appearance at the Million Man March in October 1995. Queen Mother Moore died of natural causes in a Brooklyn nursing home on May 2, 1997.

See also: Black Nationalism; Garvey, Marcus; Million Man March; Universal Negro Improvement Association

Walter C. Rucker

Bibliography

Moore, Audley, and Cheryl Gilkes. Interview with Audley (Queen Mother) Moore: June 6 and 8, 1978. Cambridge, UK: Schlesinger Library, Radcliffe College, 1986.

Rediger, Pat. Great African Americans in Civil Rights. Outstanding African Americans. New York: Crabtree Publishing, 1996.
Smith, Jessie Carney. Epic Lives: One Hundred Black Women Who Made a Difference. Detroit: Visible Ink Press, 1993.

Moorish Science Temple

The Moorish Science Temple was a quasi-Islamic black nationalist movement established in Newark, New Jersey, in 1913 as the Canaanite Temple. Although explicitly unorthodox, it was the first broad-based movement in America espousing any form of Islamic ideology or beliefs. The founder and initial leader of the group, Timothy Drew (1886–1929), was known by the appellation Prophet Noble Drew Ali. The group’s supposed connection to Moorish culture arose from Ali’s fundamental teaching that African Americans were Muslims of Moroccan heritage descended from the Old Testament Moabitic line of Canaanites. In this vein, the group adopted as their symbol the red banner of Morocco with its green five-pointed star, the points representing love, truth, peace, freedom, and justice. Within 10 years, the group’s membership soared to between 20,000 and 30,000 followers, claiming members in most of the leading cities of the Northeast and Midwest, as well as a handful in the South. The birth of the movement and its rapid expansion directly correlated with the Great Migration of African Americans from the South to the urban centers in the North.

Factionalism split the movement several times, and, in 1925, Ali removed himself and many of his followers to Chicago, where three years later the group officially became known as The Moorish Science Temple of America. Shortly thereafter, Ali wrote the Seven Circle Quran, which, despite its name, bore no resemblance to the Quran of orthodox Islam. It consisted of a broad range of doctrines, beliefs, and teachings, fusing Masonic symbolism, Christian mysticism, and Rosicrucianism, with Islamic terminology and preexisting Moorish Science beliefs. Many of the book’s passages were adopted wholesale from contemporaneous works of the religious fringe. The Seven Circle Quran played a major role in Moorish rites and religious gatherings; it was reverently recited in whispered tones at most events.

Several hallmarks of the movement distinguished its members. They appended their names with the surname El or Bey, wore turbans or fezzes, greeted each other with their right hand raised while saying “Peace” or “Islam,” and owing to their original beliefs, referred to black people as Asiatics. They prohibited the consumption of pork, alcohol, and tobacco, as well as dancing and attending the theater. Prayers were held three times a day, at sunrise, midday, and sunset; and they met in congregation on Fridays, strictly upholding gender separation. Furthermore, a fundamental aspect of Moorish belief was loyalty and respect for America and its laws, as well as participation in the electoral process. Ali also promoted peace and love between Asiatics, who in their totality included virtually all people of color. On the other hand, he taught that Europe and people of European descent were from the pagan, uncivilized regions of the world and therefore the mixing of Asiatic blood with Europeans was despised.

The group had many influences, including Marcus Garvey’s Universal Negro Improvement Association, Freemasonry in the form of the Mystic Shrine, Theosophy, and several others. In fact, Drew Ali’s name, Noble, is a clear claim to membership as a Shriner, and Garvey’s calls for economic self-reliance can be seen in the founding of the Moorish Science Corporation. The business ventures of the corporation included selling various herbal remedies, and the establishment of restaurants and stores. Very few of the beliefs in Moorish Science derived from orthodox Islam; nonetheless, orthodox Muslims took a dim view of Ali and the Moorish Science Temple. In 1929 and 1930, the movement was condemned in three fatwas (Islamic rulings) in Egypt and Sudan, including one from the venerable Al-Azhar Mosque in Cairo.

By the late 1920s, Ali’s hold on the community was failing as further factionalism, financial impropriety, and an increasing hostility between some members and white law enforcement reached a violent crescendo. Ali was jailed under the accusation of ordering the death of a political rival, and he died a few months later on July 20, 1929, while out on bond and awaiting trial. Whether his death was caused by revenge or natural causes is unclear. Dissension within the movement increased as a battle for leadership furthered the series of violence and arrests. Kirkman Bey was eventually elected leader of the movement and held the position until his death in 1959. The group’s growth continued unabated during the 1940s, when it was estimated that at least 50 temples were active across America. The movement came under intense scrutiny by the FBI, which was convinced that the Moorish-American espousal of Asiatic unity equaled complicity with the Japanese during World War II.

The FBI continued to monitor and actively pursue the destruction of the movement until the 1970s. The Moorish Science movement has remained intact to the present, albeit smaller and further factionalized, and has successfully extended its activities to the U.S. prison system, where it has a strong following.

See also: Ali, Noble Drew; Black Nationalism; Garvey, Marcus; Great Migration; Universal Negro Improvement Association

Brent D. Singleton

Bibliography

- Allen, Ernest Jr. “Identity and Destiny: The Formative Years of the Moorish Science Temple and the Nation of Islam.” In Muslims on the Americanization Path? Yvonne Yazbeck Haddad and John L. Esposito, eds., 163–214. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2000.
- Curtis, Edward E., IV. Islam in Black America: Identity, Liberation, and Difference in African-American Islamic Thought. Albany: SUNY Press, 2002.
- Dannin, Robert. Black Pilgrimage to Islam. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2002.
- Gomez, Michael A. Black Crescent: The Experience and Legacy of African Muslims in the Americas. New York: Cambridge University Press, 2005.
- Turner, Richard B. Islam in the African-American Experience, 2nd ed. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 2003.

Morrison, Toni

Toni Morrison (Chloe Anthony Wofford) (1931–), a noted novelist, was born on February 18, 1931, in Lorain, Ohio, the second of four children. Her parents, George Wofford and Ramah Willis Wofford were sharecroppers and had moved to the North to escape the rampant racism in the South. Morrison’s father worked three jobs for 17 years to provide for his family. Beginning at a young age Morrison developed an interest in reading. She was an extremely avid reader, reading authors like Jane Austin and Tolstoy among many others.

Both Morrison’s parents instilled in their children a great sense of pride in their Southern and African American heritage and let their children know that hard work and determination were the keys to success. This advice held true for Morrison who graduated high school with honors in 1949. Morrison later went on to obtain a bachelor's degree in English with a minor in the classics from Howard University in 1953, and in 1955 Morrison obtained her master's degree from Cornell University. It was also at Howard University where Morrison started referring to herself as "Toni," a shortened version of her middle name.

Upon graduating from Howard, Morrison began teaching introductory English at Texas Southern University in Houston, returning later in 1957 to Howard as a member of the faculty. While back at Howard, Morrison fell in love with Jamaican-born architect Harold Morrison. They eventually married in 1961 and had two boys. The marriage proved to be an unhappy one ending in divorce after Morrison was pregnant with their second child. To escape the unhappiness of her union, Morrison joined a small writer's group, where she started writing a story about a girl who prayed to God for blue eyes, a girl from Morrison's childhood. After a trip to Europe, Morrison returned to Lorain, Ohio with her sons in tow to live with her parents.

In 1964, she was hired by a textbook subsidiary of Random House in Syracuse, New York, as an associate editor. In 1967, she was transferred to New York City and became a senior editor at Random House, a job where she would stay for the next 20 years. While editing books for some of the most prominent African Americans in the country, such as Angela Davis, Muhammad Ali, and Alex Haley, Morrison was still attempting to turn her small story into a novel. While working as an editor for Random House by day, Morrison began writing at night, bringing more imagination and detail to the story, and in 1970 The Bluest Eye was published. Although it was not a huge commercial success right away, it has continued to garner critical acclaim.

Morrison's second novel, Sula, was published in 1973. Excerpts of the book were later republished in Redbook magazine, and in 1975, the novel was nominated for the National Book Award in Fiction. As Morrison watched her sons grow up, she began to write a novel that focused more on the lived experiences of African American males. With the publication of Song of Solomon in 1977, Morrison's third novel, Morrison gained national and international acclaim. The book won the National Book Critic's Circle Award and the American Academy and Institute of Arts and Letters Award. Tar Baby, Morrison's fourth novel was published in 1981, and Morrison's picture appeared on the cover of Newsweek magazine in March of that same year. Also from 1976 to 1977, Morrison worked as a visiting lecturer at Yale University in New Haven, Connecticut.

American writer Toni Morrison receives the Nobel Prize in literature from King Carl XVI Gustaf of Sweden in the Concert Hall in Stockholm, Sweden, December 10, 1993. Morrison is the first black woman to receive this prize. (AP Photo)

In 1983, Morrison left Random House as senior editor and in 1984 was named the Albert Schweitzer Professor of the Humanities at the State University of New York in Albany. Her fifth novel, Beloved, was published in 1987 and was based on the true story of the enslaved woman, Margaret Garner, who escaped a plantation in Kentucky with her husband Robert. When the enslavers eventually catch Garner, Garner attempted to kill her children hoping that they would make it to heaven and not be forced to endure a life of servitude as enslaved, but she was successful in killing only one. Morrison writes the novel from Garner's point of view, making her the benevolent protagonist who is haunted by her murdered daughter. The novel gained worldwide acclaim, earning Morrison the 1998 Pulitzer Prize for fiction, and was made into a film in 1998 with the aid of Oprah Winfrey. In 1987, Morrison was named the Robert F. Goheen Professor in the Council of Humanities at Princeton University, where she was the only African American woman to hold a named chair at an Ivy League University.

Her sixth novel, Jazz, which was about how murder is shaped by love and relationships, was published in 1992, and Morrison became the eighth woman and first African American to win the Nobel Prize in Literature in 1993. In 1999, Morrison published Paradise; her eighth novel, Love, was published in 2003. A Mercy was published in 2008, and Morrison continues to publish a plethora of short stories and plays. In June 2005, Toni Morrison received a Doctor of Letters from Barnard College.

Toni Morrison is one of America's most critically acclaimed novelist and writers of our time. Her style of writing, original in its conceptual and rhetorical patterning, has proved to be the reason why she is so beloved by many. In her interview with Nellie McKay, Morrison described how she began the writing process with an idea and how the characters for her novels were outgrowths of such ideas. Throughout her writing career, Toni Morrison has always stressed how important African American history and African American culture are to the history of America and how her work reflects and attempts to maintain this sentiment. See also: Davis, Angela; Ebo Landing; Haley, Alex; Transmigration

Kaila A. Story

Bibliography

- Beaulieu, Elizabeth Ann. The Toni Morrison Encyclopedia. Westport, CT: Greenwood Press, 2003.
- McKay, Nellie. An Interview with Toni Morrison. Conversations with Toni Morrison. Jackson: University Press of Mississippi, 1994.
- Rigney, Barbara. The Voices of Toni Morrison. Columbus: Ohio State University Press, 1991.
- Taylor-Guthrie, Danielle. Conversations with Toni Morrison. Jackson: University Press of Mississippi, 1994.

Moses, Robert

Robert Paris Moses (1935–), a noted civil rights activist, was born on January 23, 1935, in Harlem, New York. Moses's family was not well-off and he grew up in a Harlem housing project. His intellectual prowess was evident early on and, after passing a city-wide exam, he gained entrance to an elite public school, Stuyvesant High School. After graduating from high school in 1952, Moses earned a scholarship to Hamilton College in New York and later earned a master's degree from Harvard University in 1957. Although Moses specialized in mathematical logic, he studied philosophy and was greatly influenced by the work of French philosopher Albert Camus. Through reading Camus and in his travel abroad during college, Moses was exposed to the ideals of pacifism, ideals that would remain at the core of his value system for the rest of his life. In 1959, while teaching high school math at Horace Mann in Manhattan, Moses helped civil rights activist Bayard Rustin organize the second Youth March for Integrated Schools. The next spring, Moses took part in a demonstration in Newport News while visiting his uncle in Virginia. From that point forward, Bob Moses would dedicate himself to the Civil Rights movement.

Bob Moses placed a great deal of emphasis on developing local black leadership in Mississippi because these local residents not only had a vital stake in the successful outcome of civil rights projects, they could also identify with each other and help each other along. Local blacks thought about their work with the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee (SNCC) in terms of making some sense out of living in Mississippi. In addition, Moses encouraged young people to enter the civil rights struggle because he felt that young blacks would not be limited as much by the economic responsibilities that faced their elders and would be free to act more assertively. Moses was also keenly aware of the necessity to face and minimize black fears while conducting the Voter Registration Project in Mississippi. In 1963 Moses stated that “You dig into yourself and the community to wage psychological warfare; you combat your own fears about beatings, shootings and possible mob violence; you stymie, by your mere physical presence, anxious fear of the Negro community (In Struggle, p. 78). Moses lived this philosophy, leading the way by example, quelling the fear of anxious Mississippi residents by putting himself squarely in front of danger and often beating it back. So often did he do this that one local resident once noted of Moses, “Poor Bob took a lot of beatings. . . . Sometimes I think he was Moses in the Bible. He pioneered the way for black people in McComb. . . . He had more guts than any one man I’ve ever known” (In Struggle, p. 78).

In 1960, after seeing the resolute and courageous faces of southern blacks taking part in the sit-in movement, Moses went to work in the Atlanta office of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference (SCLC). There was little there for him to do but stuff SCLC fund-raising packages, however, and when Jane Stembridge, a member of SNCC who worked in the same office suggested that he assist that organization by recruiting black leaders in the South, Moses readily agreed. From Atlanta Moses traveled through Mississippi in the summer of 1960, a trip on which he met Amzie Moore, the head of the Cleveland, Mississippi NAACP. Moses recalls that “Amzie was the first one to really speak to me about the potential in Mississippi of the students’ energy to blow open the issues of racial discrimination and white supremacy” (Radical Equations, p. 41). In the summer of 1961, Moses headed a voting registration project in McComb, Mississippi, where he, Reginald Robinson, and John Hardy opened a school to train black residents to take Mississippi’s literacy test for voters. Moses experienced his first confrontation with the state’s authorities on August 15 of that year when, after escorting three black residents to the courthouse in Liberty, Mississippi to register to vote, he was arrested and charged with interfering with the discharge of the arresting officers’ duties. The arresting officer, who knew exactly who Moses was and how important the voter registration project was in changing the balance of power in the state, asked, “You the nigger that came down from New York to stir up a lot of trouble?” (Radical Equations, p. 48). Following his own code of ethics that mandated the struggle begin with the individual, Moses stood up to the officer and subsequently spent two days in jail before allowing the NAACP to post his bond.

Almost two weeks later Moses experienced a more violent encounter after attempting to register more local blacks. Billy Jack Caston, cousin of the local sheriff, and two other white residents beat Moses nearly unconscious, a crime for which Caston was acquitted. Violence was no stranger to the South; but on September 25, 1961, an event occurred that would bring the voting rights project to a standstill for the remainder of that year. On that day, E. H. Hurst, a white state legislator, shot and killed Herbert Lee, a founding member of the Amite County NAACP. Hurst, who claimed Lee attacked him with a tire iron, was never charged with Lee’s murder. Moses recalls, “Lee’s killing paralyzed the voter registration movement, stopped it cold, with no Black person in all of rural southwest Mississippi willing to make an attempt at registering” (Radical Equations, p. 50). Although Moses and practically all of the local blacks who had worked closely with him had been jailed and the McComb experience acted as a temporary setback for SNCC, Moses remained determined to make progress.

In the summer of 1962, Moses went to work expanding his young SNCC staff and by spring of 1963, 6 SNCC offices and 20 black field secretaries were operating in Mississippi. In an effort to minimize conflict between the various civil rights organizations, SNCC field secretaries worked under the auspices of the Council of Federated Organizations (COFO) where Moses was named director of voter registration. Moses continued his efforts to the western part of the state, this time edging away from his earlier policy of relying on entirely local black leadership. SNCC organized a food drive for residents of Leflore County that involved a number of the organization’s northern branches and thus made the problems of poor rural Mississippians visible to a wider range of people. Not only did this food drive feed people but, as Moses explained, “Whenever we were able to get a little something to give to a hungry family, we also talked about how they ought to register” (In Struggle, p. 80). In this way Moses and SNCC linked receiving assistance to taking personal responsibility for achieving freedom by registering to vote.

Signaling a dramatic shift in the voting rights project, in an April 1963 meeting before the SNCC general conference, Moses argued that Mississippi’s blacks were unlikely to gain the franchise quickly enough to win electoral victories before they lost their jobs to industrial automation and lack of education. He insisted that because illiterate whites were allowed to vote, and because blacks in the state were denied equal educational opportunities, blacks were owed either the right to vote irrespective of being literate or the opportunity to immediately learn to read and write. As such, Moses’s position initiated the “one man, one vote” campaign, a movement that would encourage all blacks in the state to participate in the political process.

The 1964 Mississippi Summer Project, designed specifically to expose the intolerance of racist whites to a national audience while creating the environment for a confrontation between state and federal authorities whereby federal agents would be forced to protect civil rights activists, was another turning point in the evolution of SNCC. By this time, although local blacks had worked hard and sacrificed greatly to achieve voting rights, Moses was convinced that only outside intervention and greater national publicity about the deplorable conditions in rural Mississippi would bring about the kind of large-scale change he was trying to create. This would require bringing in hundreds of whites from around the country to help with the voter registration project, a marked departure from the almost exclusive use of local blacks thus far in the voting rights campaign. The first step was for Moses and Allard Lowenstein, a white activist and friend of Moses, to organize a “Freedom Vote.” This campaign would allow local blacks to vote for their own set of candidates in their own communities, as many blacks were barred from voting in the 1963 November general election. In what was deemed as an encouraging sign, more than 80,000 local blacks voted in this symbolic election, setting the stage for the next challenge.

Building on the success of the Freedom Vote, Moses and COFO set about creating a nonracist political organization that would lay legitimate claim to the Democratic Party delegation at the Democratic National Convention in 1964. To that end, on April 26, 1964, the Mississippi

Freedom Democratic Party was formed at a rally in Jackson, Mississippi. In addition to creating a political party, COFO members established Freedom Schools to teach traditional academic subjects, as well as contemporary issues, leadership development, and political skills. Although the MFDP was unable to unseat the regular Democratic delegation at the Democratic National Convention in Atlantic City, New Jersey, it brought the issues of white supremacy and voting rights for the state’s blacks front-and-center on a national stage and forced long-term changes in the Democratic Party. As Moses recalls, “The MFDP was raising an important point with this country, and with the Democratic Party, as one of its major political institutions: Generations of Black people had been denied access to the political process; could they get it now?... We were challenging the [Democratic Party] to recognize the existence of a whole group of people—white and Black and disenfranchised—who form the underclass of this country” (Radical Equations, pp. 82–83). The MFDP’s challenge served notice to the nation that being black and poor was no longer going to act as a barrier in the way of the residents of Mississippi as they laid claim to their rights as U.S. citizens.

Shortly after the Summer Project concluded, SNCC arrived at a crossroads, as an ideological split between James Foreman and Bob Moses pointed in two different directions. Foreman, who viewed SNCC as a permanent organization, believed that it also needed a more centralized leadership to carry out its mission. Moses, on the other hand, was committed to SNCC’s emphasis on informal leadership and consensus building, where a broad range of voices had equal opportunities to be heard. As a result of his unwillingness to push his own agenda and his sense that large segments of SNCC and COFO had grown dependent on his leadership, Moses grew ever reluctant to express his views, and his influence on policy decisions waned through the mid-1960s.

Moses, who was conflicted by Camus’s dilemma of maintaining a balance between moral purity and political effectiveness, resigned as director of COFO in late 1964. He was discouraged with the hard-line approach SNCC had taken under the leadership of Stokely Carmichael, an approach that attempted to centralize control of the organization under a small group of people who wanted to dictate what local branches should be doing. In 1965, Moses took a leave of absence from SNCC to focus on antiwar activities. He challenged the argument made by many black leaders that civil rights activists should devote their energy to black community organizing and not risk previous gains by involving themselves in the antiwar or other movements. He noted, “Certainly one of the most basic rights we have been seeking is the right to participate fully in the life of this country. Now if by participating—that is; taking part in the discussions of the great issues that face the country—we threaten the right to participate, we have to begin to wonder whether the right is real” (In Struggle, p. 185). Moses quit SNCC in 1966 and moved to Canada to avoid the Vietnam War draft.

After living in Canada and then teaching in Tanzania from 1969–1975, Moses returned the United States where he completed a doctorate and taught high school math. In 1982, he received a McArthur Foundation “Genius Grant” and started the Algebra Project, a program that teaches math literacy as a key that opens the door both higher education and thus employment opportunities for poor and minority students. According to Moses, algebra is a gatekeeper, a subject that students must master or they are effectively shut out of higher level math-based subjects such as physics, calculus, and engineering. As he sees it, math literacy is a contemporary civil rights issue much the way the right to vote was in the 1960s because proficiency in these subjects is critical for being successful in the technology-driven 21st century. The Algebra project runs in more than 25 cities and serves more than 40,000 students.

See also: Carmichael, Stokely (Kwame Ture); MFDP; Mississippi Freedom Summer, 1964; National Association for the Advancement of Colored People; Rustin, Bayard; Southern Christian Leadership Conference; Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee

Paul T. Miller

Bibliography

- Branch, Taylor. At Canaan's Edge: America in the King Years, 1965–68. New York: Simon & Schuster, 2006.
- Carson, Clayborne. In Struggle: SNCC and the Black Awakening of the 1960s. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1981.
- Hogan, Wesley C. Many Minds, One Heart: SNCC's Dream for a New America. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 2007.
- Moses, Robert. Radical Equations: Math Literacy and Civil Rights. Boston: Beacon Press, 2001.

MOVE Bombing

The MOVE bombing of May 13, 1985 was one of the most controversial episodes in Philadelphia's history. MOVE emerged around 1972 in Philadelphia as a small but radical group of African Americans led by John Africa. His commune first settled at North 33rd Street near Pearl Street in the Powelton Village area of Philadelphia. There they lived according to the self-styled teachings of John Africa. He promoted a communal “back to nature” lifestyle, vegetarianism, reverence for all animal life, and scorn for “The Establishment.” From their house, MOVE members often gave public speeches denouncing Philadelphia's mayor and police department. In addition, the presence of open garbage, insects, rats, and other animals on the MOVE premises posed public health hazards for Osage Avenue residents.

Neighborhood complaints about the lifestyle of MOVE brought the radical organization into confrontation with the city of Philadelphia throughout the 1970s. On March 28, 1976, Philadelphia police confronted several MOVE members at the 33rd Street house. MOVE later claimed that Janine Africa and her baby were thrown to the floor by police and that the baby later died. Angry MOVE members stepped up criticism of Philadelphia mayor Frank Rizzo, and Rizzo reacted with a court order to demolish the MOVE compound. On August 6, 1978, a gun battle between police and MOVE erupted during which MOVE member Delbert Africa was beaten by Philadelphia police officers and one policeman was killed. Delbert Africa and eight other MOVE members were arrested and brought to trial; nine MOVE members were sentenced. In 1981, however, the three police officers accused of beating Delbert Africa were acquitted.

After the 1978 incident, MOVE went underground. It reemerged in 1982, settling in the house of John Africa's sister, Louise James, in a Philadelphia neighborhood known as Cobbs Creek. During this time, MOVE members who were frustrated about not winning the release of their jailed members stepped up their public harangues against the neighborhood and the police. On Memorial Day 1984, W. Wilson Goode, Philadelphia's first African American mayor, met with Osage Avenue residents who asserted that MOVE was infringing on their rights. Goode was advised by the FBI and other law enforcement officials that there were no grounds for action against MOVE. The neighbors of MOVE, however, formally organized themselves in February 1985 into a group called “United Residents of the 6200 Block of Osage Avenue.” On May 1, 1985, the United Residents said in a press conference that the MOVE house had become a military bunker. The next day the United Residents informed Mayor Goode that a five-gallon gasoline can was hoisted to the roof of 6221 Osage Avenue. It was then that the mayor and Philadelphia police knew that a violent confrontation between the city and MOVE was imminent. Arrest warrants for four MOVE members were approved by a city judge.

On May 13, 1985, Mayor Goode authorized Philadelphia police to surround the house at 6221 Osage Avenue, which now had a bunker constructed on its roof as well as a gasoline can. Using a bullhorn, police asked that the four MOVE members for whom they had arrest warrants to come out and surrender. None did. Then the mayor gave permission for a pilot in a police helicopter to drop a bomb in order to dislodge the bunker. The bomb missed its target and instead hit the gasoline can, igniting the entire house. City officials decided not to put out the fire immediately but to “let the bunker burn.” Eleven MOVE members burned to death including five children. Among the dead was MOVE founder John Africa. A woman, Ramona Africa, and a boy, Birdie Africa, escaped from the house alive. Ramona Africa was arrested and taken into custody by police. In 1986, Ramona Africa was put on trial and was found guilty of riot and conspiracy charges and was given a seven-year sentence. She was released from prison in 1992.

The MOVE bombing of May 13, 1985, in Philadelphia made international headlines. Some applauded the city of Philadelphia’s handling of the crisis, but others, such as MOVE supporters, condemned it. Philadelphia African Americans in particular were critical of Mayor Goode who in response formed an investigatory commission. The Philadelphia Special Investigation Commission issued its report in 1986. The commission found the city of Philadelphia negligent in the death of the 11 people and careless in its handling of conflict resolution. It found that Mayor Goode did not negotiate with MOVE earlier and that he allowed the confrontation on May 13, 1985 to spin out of control.

But the MOVE bombing story does not end there. More than 60 houses on Osage Avenue and Pine Street also burned down, leaving 250 people homeless. Between 1985 and 1996, the city of Philadelphia rebuilt the Osage Avenue homes, but many residents were unhappy, citing various defects. Milton Street, elected mayor of Philadelphia in 1999, sympathized with their plight and offered each family $150,000 for a new house and moving expenses. In all, 37 families on Osage Avenue and part of Pine Street took the buy-out offer, but 24 families refused. So in 2003, they went back to court. In April 2005, a United States District Court jury awarded each homeowner a sum of $530,000 for punitive damages against city officials, breach of contract, and damages for emotional distress. Today MOVE members are still active in Philadelphia but keep a low profile.

See also: Black Power

Eric Ledell Smith

Bibliography

- Anderson, John, and Hevenor, Hilary. Burning Down the House: MOVE and the Tragedy of Philadelphia. New York and London: W. W. Norton, 1987.
- Bracey, LaVon Wright. Making Them Whole: A Philadelphia Neighborhood and the City’s Recovery from the MOVE Tragedy. Philadelphia: Affie Enterprises, 1990.
- Goode, W. Wilson, and Stevens, Joann. In Goode Faith. Valley Forge, PA: Judson Press, 1992.
- Philadelphia Special Investigation Commission. The Findings, Conclusions, and Recommendations of the Philadelphia Special Investigation Commission, March 6, 1986. Philadelphia: The Commission, 1986.

Muhammad, Elijah

Elijah Muhammad (Elijah Poole) (1897–1975), leader of the Lost-Found Nation of Islam in the Wilderness of North America, was born in Sandersville, Georgia in October 1897 to William and Mariah Poole. His father was a pastor at Bold Spring and Union Baptist churches while sharecropping and working in sawmills to provide for a quickly growing family. Mariah Poole worked as a domestic for white families and, instead of earning wages, she was often paid in parts from slaughtered animals. Young Elijah Poole, like his six siblings, grew up in the black church and frequently listened to his father’s fiery sermons. In fact, Elijah became so enamored by the Bible, he began to preach and evangelize at a young age—even, at times, correcting errors in his father’s sermons. A close student of biblical scripture, Elijah joined the church at age 14, at his father’s behest, yet he struggled with what he considered inconsistencies in the Bible and Christian doctrine.

Elijah had a brief stint in school, leaving between the fourth and eighth grades, because the Poole children needed to help generate income for the family. He began working at age 10, providing firewood and other services after the family relocated from Sandersville to Cordele, Georgia. Although denied formal education, Elijah had practical and transformative experiences with white supremacy and racial oppression during his early years, claiming later in life to have witnessed the aftermath of three lynchings in Georgia. On one occasion, a white man proudly showed him the severed ear of a lynched African American. On another occasion, in the winter of 1907, Elijah witnessed an 18-year-old African American youth hanged and his body riddled with bullets after being accused of raping a white woman. Both the mob murder and the lack of reaction by the African American community enraged the then 10-year-old Elijah and this anger would later fuel his antipathy for all whites.

In 1919, Poole married Clara Evans of Cordele and by 1922 the couple had their first two children—Emmanuel (1921) and Ethel (1922). With a growing family, Poole—an employee of the Southern Railroad Company as a gang laborer—experienced mounting levels of stress in trying to provide sufficient support for Clara and their children.

Between 1920 and 1921, Poole and one of his brothers were witnesses to the lynching of another black man, and this may have played some role in his decision to relocate his family to Detroit, Michigan in April 1923. As part of a flood of black southern migrants in the 1920s, the Poole family struggled to establish an economic foothold in Detroit. As Poole went from job to job, the family grew even larger with the addition of three more children—Lottie (1925), Nathaniel (1926), and Herbert (1929).

By the late 1920s and early 1930s, Poole was frequently unemployed, as the Great Depression ravished the labor market. In the midst of his despair, Clara Poole found the family's salvation in the most unlikely of places—in the guise of Wallace Dean (W. D.) Fard Muhammad. Influenced by the Moorish Science Temple of America and Marcus Garvey's UNIA, Fard Muhammad was preaching a fiery, black nationalists brand of Islam in Detroit in his self-proclaimed quest to wake the “dead” nation of Islam in the

Elijah Muhammad, as spiritual leader of the Nation of Islam in the United States, established a religious organization that gave poor urban African Americans a sense of racial pride and economic and political self-sufficiency. (Library of Congress)

West. At the insistence of Clara, Elijah Poole made a visit to one of Fard Muhammad's sermons in the fall of 1931. Later that same year, Poole met Fard Muhammad after a particular speech and was so inspired by his message that Poole asked Fard if he were the "one we read in the Bible that...would come in the last day under the name Jesus" (An Original Man, p. 22). To this suggestion, Fard Muhammad answered in the affirmative. Unbeknownst to either man at the time, this brief exchange would change both their lives and would lead to the creation and growth of one of the most powerful black organizations in U.S. history.

At the age of 33, Elijah Poole became a disciple of a man he variably knew as Fard (pronounced Far-ad) Muhammad, the Mahdi, Jesus, and "Allah in the Flesh." After joining Fard Muhammad's movement, Poole received a new surname—Karriem—and became the "supreme minister" of Allah's Temple of Islam as Fard Muhammad's second in command. The normally soft-spoken Karriem was not an extraordinarily effective or gifted public speaker, and this was painfully apparent during his first talks given at Detroit's Temple of Islam. Despite this seeming limitation, Karriem had a peculiar kind of charm and charisma that swayed audiences to favor and pay attention to his word.

Between 1932 and 1934, the movement began to take further shape as Fard Muhammad and his supreme minister created a fully functional organizational apparatus. Fard Muhammad changed the name of the organization from the Allah Temple of Islam to the Nation of Islam. In addition, he developed the Fruit of Islam, a security force under the command of Supreme Captain Kalot Muhammad (Elijah's younger brother), as well as the Muslim Girl's Training and General Civilization Class, which emphasized the instruction of women in the domestic realm. Finally, for the benefit of children in the movement, Fard Muhammad created the University of Islam to serve as a grade school providing instruction in history, Arabic, mathematics, and the sciences. This forward momentum was halted when a man allegedly associated with Nation of Islam committed a ritualized murder of another man named James Smith. Fard Muhammad was arrested and released on the condition that he permanently leave Detroit.

Fard Muhammad went to Chicago where he founded Temple No. 2 of the Nation of Islam. Karriem, who changed his name to Elijah Muhammad in 1933, assumed the role of leader of the Detroit Temple (No. 1). The next year, in 1934, Fard Muhammad mysteriously disappeared and Elijah

Muhammad became the "minister of Islam" and the new leader of the movement. In attempting to quell factional disputes within the Nation of Islam in the wake of Fard Muhammad's disappearance, Elijah Muhammad fought an uphill battle for several years. By 1935, he left Detroit and settled his family in Chicago, thereby establishing Chicago Mosque No. 2 as the official headquarters of the Nation of Islam. As part of a recruitment effort to generate more loyal converts, Muhammad started a newspaper called The Final Call to Islam. The newspaper floundered, however, and, within a year, it ceased publication. In the meantime, Muhammad was still in the midst of quelling factional disputes within the organization and received a number of personal death threats. As a result, he moved to Milwaukee to establish Temple No. 3 and, then, Washington, D.C. (Temple No. 4) where he lived, separated from his family, for the next few years.

In 1942, Muhammad was arrested for resisting the military draft. He left Washington, D.C. and relocated in Chicago to rejoin his family. In 1943, Muhammad was arrested again on eight counts of sedition for instructing members of the Nation of Islam to not register with Selective Service or serve in the U.S. Army. On those charges, he was found guilty and served three-and-a-half years of a five-year sentence in a federal prison at Milan, Michigan. Although the temples he helped to establish remained in operation, membership in the Nation of Islam fell to about 1,000 by the time of his release from prison in 1946. After his release, the Nation of Islam went through an unprecedented period of growth. Between 1946 and 1955 alone, it constructed 12 new Muslim temples in various parts of the country. By 1959, the Nation of Islam could boast 50 temples in 22 states, including the District of Columbia.

Embracing the notion of the "double-duty dollar," Muhammad encouraged the growth of black-owned businesses, particularly those owned by loyal members of the Nation of Islam. Members, barred from buying anything on credit, opened grocery stores, book stores, restaurants, barber shops, bakeries, cleaners, and other businesses across the country. With the influence of popular and charismatic figures like Malcolm X, Muhammad Ali, and Louis (X) Farrakhan, membership in the organization swelled to as many as 20,000 by the mid-1960s. The sizable membership was matched by the financial resources of the Nation of Islam, which were estimated at more than $75 million by 1972.

The meteoric rise of Muhammad's version of the Nation of Islam was not without significant controversy. Despite the popularity of the charismatic Malcolm X, he and Elijah Muhammad became increasingly distant for a variety of reasons. As far back as 1955, Malcolm X had heard of rumors of Muhammad's alleged adultery. A succession of six of Muhammad's personal secretaries had become pregnant and, because of the prohibition against premarital sex in the Nation of Islam, each woman received sentences of 1 to 5 years of isolation from the Muslim community. In all, Muhammad has been accused of taking nine "wives," getting six pregnant, and fathering at least eight children out of wedlock. When two of these women filed paternity suits charging that Muhammad fathered their combined four children, they revealed that they both had sexual relations with Muhammad beginning when they were teenagers. Both women eventually approached Malcolm X who was shocked and alarmed about the allegations.

Tensions between Muhammad and Malcolm X grew between April 1963 and January 1964. In April 1963, Malcolm went to Phoenix, Arizona to confront Muhammad about his alleged adultery. Thinking of a way to explain this inconsistency in his mentor, Malcolm had already developed an excuse by referring to biblical prophecy; David had coveted another man's wife, Lot committed incest with a daughter, and Moses fornicated with Ethiopian women. Thus, many prophets had erred and committed sin before and Muhammad was no different. According to Malcolm X, Muhammad admitted to the allegations and praised him for his insight into biblical prophecy. When Malcolm X set out to inform other Muslim officials in an attempt to quash the rumors, however, many of them, including Louis X (Farrakhan), turned on him and reported to Muhammad that Malcolm was trying to undermine him.

The tensions became increasingly awkward as Malcolm's stature in the media grew and Muhammad's was consequently eclipsed. When Malcolm's picture was placed on the front cover of Louis Lomax's 1963 work When the Word Is Given, officials at Chicago Temple No. 2 were outraged. By 1964, Malcolm was the second most sought after speaker at American universities. He was asked to sit for magazine interviews (Life, Newsweek, and Playboy) and TV talk shows ("Meet the Press"), many of which he refused to avoid jealousies generated at the Chicago headquarters. The final insult for members loyal to Muhammad was the $20,000 advance and contract from Doubleday for an autobiography of Malcolm X. The jealousies emanating from Chicago's Temple No. 2, although not necessarily from Elijah Muhammad himself, provide the context for the series of punishments Malcolm X faced after his inflammatory comments regarding the November 22, 1963 assassination of President John F. Kennedy. In many regards, Malcolm's suspension and eventual assassination were due to the fear that he would completely eclipse Muhammad—not to statements attributed to him regarding a white president.

On February 24, 1975, Elijah Muhammad died of congestive heart failure in Chicago. At the time of his death, the Nation of Islam had 79 temples in 70 cities, but membership had been in decline since Malcolm's murder. Muhammad was succeeded by his son Wallace Dean Muhammad who changed the organization's name to the World Community of Islam in the West and altered its theology to be in accord with more orthodox interpretations of Islam. By 1978, Louis Farrakhan led a splinter group to reestablish the Lost-Found Nation of Islam based on the original teachings of Fard Muhammad and Elijah Muhammad. In 1985, the World Community of Islam in the West was disbanded, leaving Farrakhan's group as Elijah Muhammad's sole organizational legacy.

See also: Ali, Muhammad; Black Nationalism; Destination, Detroit, Michigan; Farrakhan, Louis; Nation of Islam; X, Malcolm

Walter C. Rucker

Bibliography

- Berg, Herbert. Elijah Muhammad and Islam. New York: New York University Press, 2009.
- Clegg, Claude Andrew III. An Original Man: The Life and Times of Elijah Muhammad. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1997.
- Evanzz, Karl. The Messenger: The Rise and Fall of Elijah Muhammad. New York: Pantheon, 1999.
- Muhammad, Elijah. Message to the Blackman in America. Chicago: Muhammad Mosque of Islam No. 2, 1965.
- Walker, Dennis. Islam and the Search for African-American Nationhood: Elijah Muhammad, Louis Farrakhan, and the Nation Of Islam. Atlanta, GA: Clarity Press, 2005.

Nash, Diane

Diane Judith Nash (1938–) is a pacifist and outspoken advocate of civil rights for African Americans, women, veterans, and young people. She became the leader of the Nashville sit-in movement in 1960 at the age of 22. Nash continued to exercise nonviolent protest for civil rights in the South during the 1960s and is one of the most iconic and well-known female leaders to emerge from the era commonly known as the Civil Rights movement.

Diane Judith Nash was born in Chicago's South Side on May 15, 1938. Nash's father, Leon Nash, migrated north from Mississippi and held a clerical job in the military during World War II. Dorothy Bolton Nash, Diane's mother, also migrated north from her Tennessee birthplace. Raised by her grandmother, Carrie Bolton, until she was seven, Nash was taught to turn a blind eye toward racial injustice and strive to be a polite and accepting girl. Growing up, she attended the Sisters of the Blessed Sacrament parochial school, which was operated by nuns who taught only minority students. Later she would attend public high school and go on to Washington, D.C. to begin her college career at Howard University. Soon after, in 1959, Nash decided to transfer to Fisk University in Nashville Tennessee.

Although the racial climate in Chicago was by no means harmonious, Nash was still shocked by the severity of segregation in Nashville and throughout the South. Years later, in an interview published in the renowned Civil Rights documentary Eyes on the Prize, Nash stated that she understood the facts and stories surrounding segregation, but had no emotional relationship with the policy. It was only after she moved to the South and saw the signs that said "white" and "colored" and actually could not drink out of the water fountain or go to the ladies room that Nash said she had a real emotional reaction.

After a degrading encounter at the Tennessee State Fair, Nash vowed to seek out people and organizations intent on putting an end to segregation. Nash soon found that a man attending Vanderbilt Divinity School named Reverend James M. Lawson Jr. was organizing a series of workshops that added the methods of nonviolent protest to the arsenal of tactics used by young persons in their quest for equal rights.

At first, Nash was skeptical of the nonviolent approach and she later confessed that it was years before she was convinced. After taking part in the workshops held under the auspices of the Nashville Christian Leadership Conference (NCLC), Nash was elected chair of the Student Central Committee. Although the workshops involved role playing that often got rough, it was not until she and the other Nashville students staged sit-ins at the lunch counters of two of the city's department stores during November and December 1959, that she was given a chance to test the effectiveness of nonviolent protest. Nash, along with John Lewis, James Bevel, Marion Berry, and several others repeatedly bought items and attempted to sit at lunch counters. Unfortunately, the actions did not achieve the goal of desegregation. But Nash and her fellow protestors did not give in easily.

It was not until the sit-in staged in Greensboro, North Carolina, by four students from North Carolina Agricultural and Technical College on February 1, 1960 that the movement was launched into the national spotlight. The Nashville student group attempted to desegregate Nashville's lunch counters once again, and this time they were successful. From February 13 to May 10, 1960, the Nashville sit-in movement directed protest at Kress, Woolworths, McClellans, Walgreens, and city bus terminals. At first, there was little resistance, but after two weeks, the 81 protestors were jailed for disorderly conduct. Although the NCLC and its allies raised enough bail money to release the students, they chose to stay in jail on principal.

After escalation of white violence, the students marched to City Hall and upon reaching the steps of the building, Nash confronted Mayor Ben West asking: "Do you feel it is wrong to discriminate against a person solely on the basis of their race or color?" Mayor West confessed that he did. Nash and the student group she led had initiated desegregation of public places in Nashville, the first southern city to begin the departure from Jim Crow laws.

It was also during this time that Diane Nash had the opportunity to become active with the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee (SNCC) as it was beginning to take shape. From April 1960, Nash, along with James Bevel and Marion Barry, traveled to Raleigh, North Carolina to attend a conference at Shaw University that would serve to solidify goals and unite all participants of the movement. It was here that Nash, who was one of the few young women leading the student movement, met Ella Baker who became a much needed female role model and source of confidence for Nash.

Instead of returning to Fisk to resume her traditional education, Nash devoted her time and energy to keeping the momentum of nonviolent protest going. Taking the helm of the Direct Action Committee of SNCC, Nash, along with Charles Sherrod, J. Charles Jones, and Ruby Doris Smith, traveled to Rock Hill, South Carolina in early February 1961. While rallying for support of nine students from Friendship College who had been convicted of trespassing and sentenced to 30 days hard labor after participating in lunch counter sit-ins, Nash along with her companions were immediately arrested as well. She was sent to the York County Jail where she penned a poignant letter-to-the-editor of the Rock Hill Herald stating the intentions of the protestors who were only trying to help focus attention on a moral problem.

Nash also became involved with another sort of protest in the form of Freedom Rides. The first of the Freedom Rides began in Washington, D.C. in May 1961. Discouraged by the levels of aggression, some Freedom Riders wanted to abandon the endeavor, but Nash stepped in arguing that if they let them stop protesters with violence, then the movement would die. After this Nash coordinated Freedom Rides from Birmingham, Alabama to Jackson, Mississippi. In the end, Attorney General of the United States Robert Kennedy successfully urged the Interstate Commerce Commission to enforce total desegregation of all interstate terminals.

After a second victory, Nash moved on from fighting for desegregation to advocating voting rights for blacks in the South. In 1962, Nash was sentenced to serve two years in prison for teaching lessons of nonviolent protest to children in Jackson, Mississippi where she and her husband, James Bevel, were living. This time, Nash was four months pregnant. She was released on appeal and did not serve the full term.

For her work with the Voting Rights Committee of SNCC, Nash was asked by President John F. Kennedy to serve on the committee that led to the passing of the Civil Rights Act of 1964. She also joined the staff of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference and worked closely with Dr. Martin Luther King as an organizer, strategist, field-staff person, race-relations staff person, and workshop instructor. In 1965, she and Bevel were awarded the Southern Christian Leadership Council's Rosa Parks Award for planning and carrying out the campaign for voter registration in Selma, Alabama.

Nash's lifework is to empower young people to feel that they can bring awareness to any injustice they may be experiencing in their lives through nonviolent means. She has spoken at countless college and universities, youth organizations, and human rights conferences and currently resides in Chicago where she has worked for several decades in tenant organizing, housing advocacy, and real estate.

In 2003, Nash received the "Distinguished American Award" presented by the John F. Kennedy Library

Foundation. A year later, the LBJ Award for Leadership in Civil Rights was bestowed on Nash by the Lyndon Baines Johnson Library and Museum. Her most recent honor was the bestowal of the National Civil Rights Museum's Freedom Award in 2008.

See also: Baker, Ella; Freedom Rides; Lawson, James; Lewis, John; Sit-In Movement; Southern Christian Leadership Conference; Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee

Mary Jo Fairchild

Bibliography

- Halberstam, David. The Children. New York: Random House, 1998.
- Mullins, Lisa. Diane Nash: The Fire of the Civil Rights Movement. Miami, FL: Barnhardt & Ashe Publishing, 2007.
- Williams, Juan. Eyes on the Prize: America's Civil Rights Years, 1954-1965. New York: Penguin, 1988.
- Wynne, Linda T. "The Dawning of a New Day: The Nashville Sit-Ins, February 13-May 10, 1960." Tennessee Historical Quarterly 50 (1991):42-54.

Nation of Islam

The Nation of Islam had its beginnings in Detroit during the 1930s. In the context of both the Great Migration and the Great Depression emerged a mysterious man who called himself Wallace Dean (W. D.) Fard Muhammad. Influenced by Noble Drew Ali's Moorish Science Temple, Marcus Garvey, and the African American church, Fard Muhammad spread his unique interpretation of Islam among African Americans in Detroit. Based on police and FBI records, he was born in either New Zealand or Portland, Oregon, on February 25, 1891 to Hawaiian or British and Polynesian parents. Using a variety of aliases, Fard Muhammad had married and fathered a son before abandoning his family to move to Los Angeles by the 1920s. Between 1918 and 1929, he was in and out of jail and prison until leaving Los Angeles permanently in June 1929. Fard Muhammad relocated to Detroit, with a brief stop in Chicago, where he became a retail salesman and, in the lore of the Nation of Islam, he was a "silk peddler." While displaying and selling his wares, Fard Muhammad would discuss African American history, racial oppression, and Islam with his potential customers. By 1931, he rented public halls in order to deliver lengthy speeches, and these meetings became the actual genesis of the Lost-Found Nation of Islam in the Wilderness of North America.

According to Fard Muhammad—who would famously claim to be Allah in the flesh—he was sent on a mission to wake the “dead” and lost nation in the West, to teach them the truth about whites, and to prepare them for the coming Battle of Armageddon. In his unique rendition of Armageddon, when the forces of good and evil would prepare for battle at the mountain of Megiddo in the Great Plain of Esdraelon in Asia Minor, the combatants would really be black “Asiatics” and white “Devils,” and the location of the battle would be North America. For the next three years, Fard Muhammad spread his teachings until his mysterious disappearance in 1934. In the meantime, he encountered a very impressionable Elijah Poole (late Elijah Karriem and, eventually, Elijah Muhammad). During their first encounter, Fard Muhammad revealed to Poole that he was the returned redeemer—Jesus—although he would later claim to all of his followers that he was, in reality, Allah himself.

After Fard Muhammad’s disappearance in 1934, Elijah Muhammad became the “messenger” and leader of the Nation of Islam. The movement grew steadily until World War II when Muhammad and his followers refused to bear arms for the United States. In 1943, Muhammad was convicted of encouraging resistance to the draft and served 3.5 years of a 5-year sentence in a federal prison. When he was released in 1946, the Nation of Islam’s membership dropped from a high of 8,000 in the last year of Fard Muhammad’s leadership to just under 1,000 by the end of World War II. In the two decades between 1946 and 1966, however, Elijah Muhammad was to turn this situation around and make the Nation of Islam one of the strongest black organizations in North America.

Upon his release from prison in 1946, Muhammad relocated to Chicago in order to establish a foothold in the city. In 1954, Temple No. 2 on Chicago’s South Side was established and became the headquarters of the Nation of Islam. Between 1946 and 1955, a total of 12 new Muslim temples were constructed in various parts of the country. By 1959, the Nation of Islam had 50 temples in 22 states and the District of Columbia and an estimated 3,000 registered and paying Muslim members, 15,000 believers, and about 50,000 sympathizers (or people who did not attend services at a temple and who were likely Christians, but who supported the ultimate goal of the Nation). The influence of this movement spread more widely than can be readily measured. Through their newspaper, Muhammad Speaks, founded by Malcolm X in 1957, hundreds of thousands of African Americans read and were inspired by the words of Elijah Muhammad. In July 1959, a TV documentary entitled “The Hate That Hate Produced” was aired, which introduced the Nation of Islam to white America and put Malcolm X on a national stage as the most articulate and passionate spokesman of black anger and rage. Liberal whites and moderate civil rights leaders joined in their condemnation of what they considered a black hate group that advocated black supremacy.

With charismatic and transcendent leaders and members like Malcolm X, Muhammad Ali, Khalid Muhammad, and Louis Farrakhan, the Nation of Islam perfected a formula for remaining relevant to black urban communities across the United States. Oddly enough, the Nation of Islam is a politically conservative organization, influenced heavily by both Booker T. Washington and Marcus Garvey. Beginning with Elijah Muhammad, leaders of the organization lecture about self-reliance, hard work, and moral uplift. Members of the Nation of Islam have strictly regimented lives. They cannot drink alcohol, engage in public cursing, use drugs, fornicate or have premarital sex, carry concealed weapons, buy anything on credit, or purchase pornography. Men in the Nation of Islam are encouraged to attend Monday night training sessions Fruit of Islam, the organization’s security force. Women have specialized classes on some Wednesday and Thursday nights.

Theologically, the brand of Islam embraced by members of the Nation differs radically with what can be considered more orthodox variations of the religion. With a blend of black nationalism, a strong antipathy for whites, and some basic tenants of Islam, the “true knowledge” as members refer to it has both intriguing and problematic aspects. According to Nation of Islam doctrine, 66 trillion years ago, there were 13 black tribes of humanity (the original man) until one was destroyed in an incident that led to the creation of the moon. From that time and until 6,000 years ago, the Nation of Islam claims that 12 black tribes ruled the planet uncontested until a “big-headed” scientist named Yacub sought to create his own tribe. A master of genetics and the principles of magnetism, Yacub realized that like repels, but unlike attracts. Thus, if he could create a race so different from others, they would attract—and therefore dominate—all others. On the island of Patmos, Yacub grafted germs (genes) from the original black Asiatics to make brown people, then red people, yellow people, and finally whites. With each successive generation of lighter peoples, the races of Yacub became more and more susceptible to wickedness and evil. Thus, whites were “grafted Devils” and, with the use of “tricknology” they conquered the world and continue to control it.

The concept of black nationalism with the Nation of Islam is wrapped around the unique theology of the organization. According to their teachings, Allah would allow the grafted white Devils to rule the world for 6,000 years before destroying these abominations. The time of the grafted Devils was to end in 1914 (the onset of World War I), but Allah issued a reprieve, for destroying the Devils in North America would also lead to the destruction of his chosen people—the lost-found Nation. Fard Muhammad was sent to awaken the lost-found Nation—the black Asiatic people—and convince them to separate from white America. Apparently, their teachings claim that the Book of Revelations includes the prediction that 1970 would be the year that Allah was to destroy the grafted Devils once and for all. If African Americans had not managed to separate from whites by then, they too would be destroyed by Allah’s wrath.

Of course 1970 came and went and neither a black nation was created nor were whites destroyed. In the last iteration of this story, Allah had issued another reprieve—this time until the year 2000. At that time, Allah would send a mothership to transport his chosen people away from North America before destroying whites. After the year 2000, the Nation of Islam has moved away from making predictions about Armageddon and the end of the reign of whites.

In terms of the more practical side of the Nation of Islam’s teachings, the organization has been key in reforming and transforming ex-convicts, with Malcolm X serving as the epitome of this phenomenon. In 1985, it began the “Dopebusters” antidrug program in Washington, D.C.’s Mayfair Mansions. In the course of a handful of months, Fruit of Islam task forces cleaned drugs and drug dealers out of an African American government project. Likewise, Louis Farrakhan and the Nation of Islam provided the organizational apparatus for the 1995 Million Man March, the 1997 Million Woman March, and the 2000 Million Family March. Finally, Nation of Islam temples and mosques engage in community outreach and employment programs. Many of these endeavors explain why so many African Americans—fully aware of the contradictions in the Nation of Islam’s history, actions, and ideology—tend to be loyal to the organization and its leaders when the Nation is critiqued by white liberals, politicians, or media pundits.

See also: Black Nationalism; Farrakhan, Louis; Million Man March; Muhammad, Ali; Muhammad, Elijah; X, Malcolm

Walter C. Rucker

Bibliography

- Curtis, Edward E. Black Muslim Religion in the Nation of Islam, 1960–1975. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 2006.
- Gardell, Mattias. In the Name of Elijah Muhammad: Louis Farrakhan and the Nation of Islam. Durham, NC: Duke University Press, 1996.
- Muhammad, Elijah. Message to the Blackman in America. Phoenix: Secretarius MEMPS Ministries, 1973.
- Ogbar, Jeffrey Ogbonna Green. Black Power: Radical Politics and African American Identity. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 2004.
- White, Vibert L. Inside the Nation of Islam: A Historical and Personal Testimony by a Black Muslim. Gainesville: University Press of Florida, 2001.

National Association for the Advancement of Colored People

Currently headquartered in Baltimore, Maryland, the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP) is an advocacy and civil rights organization that has fought to ensure equality, justice, and inclusion for African Americans throughout its long and distinguished history. With approximately 400,000 members as of 2007, the NAACP is the largest civil rights organization in the United States, with regional offices in California, New York, Michigan, Missouri, Georgia, and Texas, as well as local, youth, and college chapters in practically every state in the United States.

The origins of the NAACP can be found within two separate historical trajectories, both linked directly or indirectly to lynching and racial violence. First, the savage 1899 lynching of Sam Hose, in Newnan, Georgia, set into motion a series of events that would lead to the founding of the Niagara Movement. On April 23, 1899, Hose—an African American migrant farm worker who had previously killed his white employer—was tortured, dismembered, and burned alive in front of 2,000 whites. W. E. B. Du Bois, having heard about the arrest of Hose and fearing the potential of his lynching, prepared a letter to be delivered to Joel Chandler Harris, editor of the Atlanta Constitution, which sought to provide a reasoned description of the evident facts. Before Du Bois arrived at the editorial office, news had reached him that Hose had already been lynched and that his knuckles were on display at a grocery store in downtown Atlanta. As Du Bois would later recount in his autobiography, the Hose lynching served as a “red ray,” which disrupted his goal of becoming a “scientist” who would seek to resolve issues regarding equality and justice through scholarship and his work as a professor at Atlanta University. In many ways, the Hose lynching was the genesis of Du Bois’s transformation into a scholar-activist.

In the decade leading up to Hose’s lynching, 115 black Georgians had been murdered by white mobs. Du Bois and others demanded that Governor Allen Candler actively protect the state’s black population from these frequent acts of murderous violence. This appeal fell on deaf ears and the Hose incident was linked to the tumult that surrounded the issue of black suffrage by white supremacist politicians. This was the height of the black nadir, and the white South was seemingly determined to ignore the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments, using any justification available. The myth of the black murderer and rapist represented a sufficient rationalization for the continued subjugation of African Americans throughout the South. The emotion of the Hose case and the continued frustrations created by white opposition to the human rights of African Americans coalesced in the form of a political statement by Du Bois—The Souls of Black Folk (1903).

In attacking the problematic leadership of Booker T. Washington, Du Bois created a platform for future black activism in The Souls of Black Folk. He called for suffrage rights, civil rights, and the education of black youth. Although he had earlier been a strong supporter of Washington’s economic program, Du Bois grew to realize that Washington’s accommodationist doctrine had shifted the burden of resolving the racial divide squarely on the shoulders of African Americans—the victims of suffocating levels of oppression. As a direct result of Washington’s efforts to accommodate white supremacy, white southerners not only placed the blame on the victims of their deleterious policies, they also began to steadily erode the few remaining rights of African Americans. In Du Bois’s diatribe against Washington in The Souls of Black Folk, he rightly points out that during the years of Washington’s leadership, the movement to disfranchise black men in the South had widened, the Supreme Court had moved to officially sanction racial segregation, and monetary aid was being steadily withdrawn from black liberal arts colleges. The specter of Sam Hose denied any attempt to blame the victims of white supremacy and, in Du Bois’s evolving world view, made necessary resistance, constant pressure, and activism.

The Souls of Black Folk produced a significant amount of political momentum and led to the founding of the Niagara Movement in Fort Erie, Ontario, in July 1905. A total of 32 prominent African Americans, including Du Bois, William Monroe Trotter, and John Hope, met to discuss the means by which civil rights and an end to racial discrimination could be achieved. Expanding on the platform Du Bois outlined in The Souls of Black Folk, this organization listed a number of major objectives: voting rights, an end to discrimination in public accommodations, social integration, judicial equality, and the education of black youth. Despite Du Bois’s attempt to credit William Monroe Trotter with creating the organization’s political platform, the Niagara Movement’s goals were largely based on concepts articulated by Du Bois two years earlier. At the next meeting, scheduled for August 15, 1906, in Harper’s Ferry, West Virginia, the estimable Ida B. Wells-Barnett joined the Niagara Movement and the group incorporated her antilynching campaign into its platform. By the end of 1906, the Niagara Movement had established 30 branches and, although underfunded and understaffed, the organization had managed a handful of victories for civil rights at the local level.

The second historical trajectory that led to the founding of the NAACP was the 1908 Springfield, Illinois race riot. In a city preparing to celebrate the centennial of its most famous son in 1909, Abraham Lincoln, a race riot began on August 14, 1908, which led to seven deaths—including one lynching—and the destruction of dozens of homes and businesses. White progressives in Springfield and across the country were appalled by the details of the riot and the fact that it occurred in, of all places, the birth city of Lincoln. In response to the race riot, socialist William English Walling wrote an article entitled “Race War in the North” for the Independent that described, in graphic detail, the Springfield riot and called on progressive whites to come to the aid of their fellow black citizens. Among those influenced by the article was Mary White Ovington, a New York socialist and social worker. Ovington sought out Walling and, along with Jewish social worker Dr. Henry Moskowitz, the three white progressives launched a call for a national conference on the plight of African Americans during the commemoration of Lincoln's centennial birthday on February 12, 1909. Among the 60 people attending the conference were a number of notable African American activists and intellectuals: Du Bois, Wells-Barnett, Mary Church Terrell, Mary McLeod Bethune, and Arthur Spingarn, among others.

During the February 12, 1909 conference, the National Negro Committee was formed to serve as the organizational apparatus that would articulate a platform for African American civil rights. In May 1910, the National Negro Committee organized a permanent body to be known as the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, and Ovington was appointed as the executive secretary. Other members of the NAACP's executive committee included Moorfield Stoery (national president), William English Walling (chair of the executive committee), John Milholland (treasurer), and Du Bois (director of publicity and research); Du Bois was the only African American in the NAACP's early leadership core. The platform and goals set forth by the NAACP were adopted from the Niagara Movement. In this way, the two historical trajectories—the Niagara Movement and progressive/radical whites—merged together to create one of the most powerful and effective civil rights organizations in U.S. history.

Notable early activities of the NAACP include the 1913 protest against segregation in the federal government sanctioned by Woodrow Wilson, the boycott of the 1915 film The Birth of a Nation, and the 1917 Silent March against lynching and racial violence in New York City. As a result of its early emphasis on local organizing and rigorous recruitment, the NAACP's membership grew dramatically. In addition, the number of branches increased from just 50 offices and 6,000 members in 1914 to more than 300 branch offices and 90,000 members reported by 1919. With the publication of Thirty Years of Lynching in the United States: 1889–1918, the NAACP launched a more concerted effort to record and investigate lynchings, with the goal of encouraging legislative action to bring an end to this evil practice. Although the NAACP never successfully forced antilynching legislation at the federal or state level, the organization's commitment and efforts in this regard led to the gradual decline in the annual number of lynchings in the United States. One effective mechanism used by the NAACP to highlight lynchings was the distribution of flags to all branches the denote each time "A Black Man Was Lynched Today."

In the midst of its ever-expanding fight against lynching and racial violence, the NAACP began to address other areas of African American life that needed dire attention. By the 1930s, the NAACP began to look at education, housing, health care, public transportation, employment, and other issues that limited the life chances of African Americans. It was also during this era that the organization's hesitance to engage in mass direct action became apparent. Instead of staging mass marches, pickets, or boycotts, the organization engaged in court room battles and political lobbying as means to fight for enforcement of the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments. In the three decades after 1936, the NAACP won or significantly contributed to a number of courtroom and legislative battles, including Murray v. Maryland (1936), Gaines v. Canada (1938), Smith v. Allwright (1944), Morgan v. Virginia (1946), Shelley v. Kraemer (1948), Sipuel v. University of Oklahoma (1948), Sweatt v. Painter (1950), McLaurin v. Oklahoma State Regents (1950), Brown v. Board of Education (1954), the Civil Rights Act of 1957, the Civil Rights Act of 1964, and the Voting Rights Act (1965). The work of Charles Hamilton Houston, Thurgood Marshall, Walter White, and Roy Wilkins were significant in these victories.

By the 1960s, the NAACP began to expand its activism beyond the court room and state and federal law-making bodies and began to engage in direct action. In 1960, the NAACP's Youth Council began a series of lunch-counter sit-ins around the South, resulting in the desegregation of more than 60 department store lunch counters. In addition to sit-ins, NAACP organizers engaged in other forms of nonviolent social protest including marches and civil rights rallies. As a result the successes of direct action as a tactic, the NAACP named its first field director to oversee the legal and safety concerns of nonviolent protesters. Ironically, field director and highly successful organizer Medgar Evers was fatally shot outside his home in 1963.

In keeping with the constant changes occurring with the Civil Rights movement, the NAACP went through various transformations as well. By the 1970s and 1980s, the organization became a strong advocate for black political participation and actively engaged in voter registration drives, the creation of voting sites in high schools, and extending the Voting Rights Act. In addition to emphasizing political engagement and participation in the African American community, the NAACP helped increase the mounting global pressure against apartheid in South Africa by encouraging a boycott of the nation. By 1993, the antiapartheid movement was successful owing, in part, to the concerted activities of the NAACP and allied organizations.

See also: Antiapartheid Movement; Antilynching Campaign; Du Bois, W. E. B.; Houston, Charles Hamilton; Jim Crow; Marshall, Thurgood; Niagara Movement; Springfield Race Riot of 1908; Terrell, Mary Church; Wells-Barnett, Ida; White, Walter; Wilkins, Roy

Walter C. Rucker

Bibliography

- Berg, Manfred. The Ticket to Freedom: The NAACP and the Struggle for Black Political Integration. Gainesville: University Press of Florida, 2005.
- Bernstein, Patricia. The First Waco Horror: The Lynching of Jesse Washington and the Rise of the NAACP. College Station: Texas A&M University Press, 2005.
- Hughes, Langston. Fight for Freedom: The Story of the NAACP. New York: Norton, 1962.
- Jonas, Gilbert. Freedom's Sword: The NAACP and the Struggle against Racism in America, 1909–1969. New York: Routledge, 2005.
- Kellogg, Charles Flint, ed. NAACP: A History of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, Volume I, 1909–1920. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1973.
- Sullivan, Patricia. Lift Every Voice: The NAACP and the Making of the Civil Rights Movement. New York: New Press, 2009.
- Tushnet, Mark V. The NAACP's Legal Strategy against Segregated Education, 1925–1950. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1987.
- Wedin, Carolyn. Inheritors of the Spirit: Mary White Ovington and the Founding of the NAACP. New York: Wiley, 1998.
- Zangrando, Robert L. The NAACP Crusade against Lynching, 1909–1950. Philadelphia: Temple University Press, 1980.

National Association of Colored Women

The National Association of Colored Women (NACW) was the preeminent association of African American women from its founding in 1896 through the first decades of the 20th century. The NACW grew rapidly and, within 20 years of its founding, had 50,000 members in more than 1,000 clubs around the nation. African American women organized themselves around the need to uplift the race, better their communities, defend the morality of black women, and improve the lives of poor black women and children. Whereas other women's organizations in the late 1930s began to erode its dominance, the NACW has continued to provide fellowship for black women and social welfare benefits to African Americans around the country.

African American women have a long tradition of self-help, benevolent associations, and social clubs. In the post-Civil War period, many women joined church women's auxiliaries, the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, the King's Daughters, and other associations that dispensed charity to needy blacks in their community and fought for temperance, suffrage, education, and civil rights for African Americans.

By the 1890s, women flocked to new secular women's clubs organized around social welfare and race uplift. In the summer of 1892, elite clubwomen came together in Washington, D.C. to form the Colored Woman's League of Washington, D.C. Led in part by Mary Church Terrell, a wealthy school principal, in 1894 the league began to affiliate with other women's leagues to become a national organization. The next year, Josephine Ruffin, a clubwoman from Boston and editor of the Woman's Era monthly journal, founded the National Federation of Afro-American Women. In 1896, to avoid competition and factionalism, the two organizations merged into the National Association of Colored Women, with Terrell as the first president. This new organization listed as its goals promoting education for African American women, raising home standards, aid to women and children, especially working women and children, political rights for African Americans, and interracial understanding.

Leaders of the NACW argued that women had to uplift the race by helping African Americans gain respectability through improved morals, especially for women. Clubwomen's emphasis on morality stemmed from the lack of respect accorded black women. Ruffin had founded the National Federation of Afro-American women partly in response to a slanderous letter sent by John Jacks, a Missouri editor, to Florence Balgarnie, a British suffragist and reformer. Jacks accused African American women of sexual immorality, as well as thievery and deceit. Clubwomen focused on proving the morality of black women; promoting middle class norms for homes, children, education; cleanliness; and improving social and economic conditions that would protect women from sexual abuse. Clubwomen sometimes caused resentment among the poor whom they were trying to aid, because their emphasis on respectability inevitably placed the burden of improvement on blacks themselves, who were often innocent victims of sexual abuse and institutional racism. The NACW motto, "Lifting as We Climb," expresses this classism. When women in the NACW worked to aid African American women, they believed that they worked to benefit the entire race because they believed that the perceived immorality of black women held back all African Americans. Furthermore, they argued that because men had lost power through disfranchisement, women had to take the lead. Such a dominant role for women in race uplift occasionally caused tensions with black men who wanted women to yield such leadership to black men.

The NACW first convened in 1897 in Nashville, where, in addition to emphasizing women, children, and the home, they discussed the convict lease system, Jim Crow conditions, especially in railroad travel, and lynching. Many projects spearheaded by local clubs were related to education and children's issues. The kindergarten department was one of the first departments established in 1901 under president Josephine Silone-Yates. The Charleston (South Carolina) Free Kindergarten Associations, established in 1902, sold copies of a speech written by Mary Church Terrell to raise the funds needed to open two kindergartens. Clubwomen were also particularly interested in opening homes for delinquent girls in the South and for migrant girls in the North. One of the earliest efforts was the White Rose Mission in New York, founded by Victoria Mathews, which took in southern girls arriving in New York City. It aided 5,000 girls in the first 15 years. Southern state federations of women's clubs also opened homes for delinquent girls and schools offering an industrial education, often because their states refused to allocate public funding for such projects. Clubwomen also turned their attention to health care; the Neighborhood Union in Atlanta established a health clinic for children, and the Phyllis Wheatley Woman's League of Chicago sponsored talks on health and sanitation.

In addition to social welfare, the NACW also promoted black history and literature, evident in the inclusion of black literature on the program of one of the earliest conventions, in Buffalo in 1901. They made a significant contribution to public history when, in 1916, the Frederick Douglass Memorial and Historical Association (FDMHA) requested the aid of the NACW in raising funds to save the former home of civil rights leader Douglass. The NACW raised enough to burn the mortgage at the 1918 meeting in Denver, and NACW members worked through the FDMHA and the NACW to continue to raise money for the home's upkeep.

In the 1920s, NACW leadership increasingly focused on internationalism and interracial cooperation. Prominent NACW women became involved in pan-African issues and global women's organizations. Anna Julia Cooper attended the first Pan-African Conference in 1900, and Mary Church Terrell attended three international meetings, including the International Conference of Women in Paris in 1919. The most well-known clubwomen in the nation formed the International Council of Women of the Darker Races, an organization that studied conditions of women of color around the world and established correspondence with women's groups in Liberia, South Africa, Haiti, and Brazil. Clubwomen also became active in the Women's Division of the Commission on Interracial Cooperation (CIC), a regional group begun after Atlanta clubwoman Lugenia Burns Hope invited two white women to the 1920 meeting of the NACW. The CIC focused on issues such as improved working conditions for domestic servants and antilynching law. Such cooperation in the CIC followed an earlier decision of the General Federation of Women's Clubs not to seat Josephine St. Pierre Ruffin in 1900 and to exclude black women from their organization.

The NACW began to lose authority in the 1920s as the explicitly masculine UNIA and male-dominated Harlem Renaissance moved the spotlight back on men as the leaders of the race. Furthermore, the changing sexual mores of the 1920s departed from the NACW's strict emphasis on chastity. In 1928, the association started a Better Homes drive to improve dress, manners, and hygiene for black children; and two years later the NACW eliminated all other departments in order to focus exclusively on the mother, the home, and the child, as well as women in industry. African American women more interested in the political fight for civil rights increasingly turned to the National Council of Negro Women, established by former NACW president Mary McLeod Bethune. The NACW continued to organize women's clubs that focused more narrowly on their local community needs. In so doing, it has helped thousands of communities around the country, in particular in areas concerning education, children, and social welfare.

See also: Antilynching Campaign; Bethune, Mary McLeod; Mathews, Victoria Earle; Pan-Africanism; Terrell, Mary Church; Tubman, Harriet; Universal Negro Improvement Association; Wells-Barnett, Ida.

Bibliography

- Davis, Elizabeth. Lifting as They Climb. Washington, D.C.: National Association of Colored Women, 1933.
- Giddings, Paula. When and Where I Enter: The Impact of Black Women on Race and Sex in America. New York: William Morrow, 1984.
- Johnson, Joan Marie. Southern Ladies, New Women: Race, Region, and Clubwomen in South Carolina, 1890–1930. Gainesville: University Press of Florida, 2004.
- Salem, Dorothy. To Better Our World: Black Women in Organized Reform. Brooklyn, NY: Carlson, 1990.
- Shaw, Stephanie. "Black Club Women and the Creation of the National Association of Colored Women." Journal of Women's History 3 (Fall 1991):10–25.
- Wesley, Charles H. The History of the National Association of Colored Women's Clubs: A Legacy of Service. Washington, D.C.: The Association, 1984.
- White, Deborah Gray. Too Heavy a Load: Black Women in Defense of Themselves, 1894–1994. New York: W. W. Norton, 1999.

National Council for Black Studies

---

Founded in 1975 by a group of academics from various disciplines concerned about the future of the emerging field of black studies, The National Council for Black Studies, Inc. (NCBS) is the premier organization for professionals committed to the development of the discipline. In its brief 30-year history, it has successfully established itself as a leader of the black studies movement in both the national and international community, and has steadfastly held to committing itself to academic excellence and social responsibility.

The birth of the black studies movement was a natural extension of the social turbulence of the Civil Rights and Black Power movements that rocked the nation in the 1960s. As noted by Karenga (2002) in Introduction to Black Studies, black student demand on college campuses led to the creation of academic and community-based programs that were a reflection of the history and culture of people of African descent. As college and universities struggled to fulfill student demands for a meaningful and relevant education, a cadre of black scholars and intellectuals emerged as leaders in the field.

The many ambiguities surrounding the content, structure, purpose, and nature of the discipline led Bertha Maxwell Roddey to convene and assume leadership of a new organization dedicated to strengthening and promoting academic and community programs in the area. Under Roddey's leadership (1975–1978) and those that followed, (William King, William "Nick" Nelson, Carlene Young, Dolores P. Aldridge, Charles Henry, Selse Williams, William Little, James Stewart, Shirley Weber, and Charles Jones) NCBS successfully influenced the development of a core curriculum for the discipline, provided a base for activist scholars; challenged institutional attacks on black studies programs and faculty members who supported them; and played a vanguard role in the development and institutionalization of black studies programs on college and university campuses throughout the United States.

Among its many achievements, NCBS assumed a leadership role in the development of curriculum standards. The 1981 publication of the Black Studies Core Curriculum, developed by a committee chaired by Perry Hall, was a major step in this direction. The organization's ability to focus its attention on the continued development of uniform standards for the discipline was strengthened by a three-year, $300,000 grant awarded by the Ford Foundation in 1988. In 1990, the release of the Holistic Afrocentric Curriculum Model report, which resulted from a collaborative effort among board members William Little, Carolyn Leonard, and Edward Cosby, was hailed as a breakthrough in the conceptualization of black studies from an Afrocentric rather than a Eurocentric worldview. In addition, the Ford Foundation grant allowed the organization to focus on professional development for new scholars and administrators entering the field. NCBS established summer institutes that allowed new scholars to study with some of the preeminent scholars in the field, and offered new administrators the opportunity to explore the challenges of leadership for chairs and program coordinators of Africana/black studies. The success of these initiatives resulted in a three-year extension and an additional $300,000 grant from the Ford Foundation.

A recent collaboration between NCBS and the National Black United Fund Federation Charities has provided the organization with funding to support community outreach programs. This initiative, led by board member Patricia Reid-Merritt, allows federal employers to contribute to NCBS through the combined federal campaign. Affiliated institutions receive grants to support educational and service programs in the black community.

The NCBS annual conferences have consistently offered scholars the opportunity to present their research and to partake in scholarly discourse with others in the field. Scholars from a cross section of traditional and nontraditional disciplines engage in ongoing debates about their positioning and linkages to the field of black studies. In addition, new emerging young scholars offer insights from the first generation of trained scholars with terminal degrees in the field of black studies. The growth of degree-granting programs in black studies led to the creation of the first national honor society to recognize outstanding achievement for majors and minors in Africana/black studies. Ankh Maat Wedjau was established by NCBS in 2004. Senior scholars in the field served as charter members and, in March 2005, the first class of student achievers was inducted.

Coupled with its many successes, the organization has also experienced numerous challenges from both internal and external forces. Steeped in a radical belief that promotes the primacy of African culture to African-ascendant people, NCBS has often been forced to defend its own philosophy, beliefs, and practices as it fought, publicly, against those who attacked black studies scholars, the legitimacy of the discipline, and the organization founded to define, promote, and strengthen its presence in the academy and the community. The interdisciplinary nature of black studies has often led to conflict and confusion among those who experienced difficulty in separating themselves from traditional disciplines. More specifically, NCBS has fought diligently to demonstrate the need for a collective, organized, independent body of scholars, academics, and intellectuals whose primary commitment is to the development of the field of black studies.

With a strong membership base and institutional affiliates from across the country, NCBS continues its mission to develop and promote black studies and black scholars, to engage in effective community outreach strategies, and to participate, fully, in all actions leading to the empowerment of African people.

See also: Afrocentricity; Asante, Molefi Kete

Patricia Reid-Merritt

Bibliography

- Asante, Molefi K., and Ama Mazama, eds. Encyclopedia of Black Studies. Thousand Oaks, CA: Sage Publications, 2005.
- Fenderson, Jonathan. 2009. "Toward Organizational Dialogue in Black Studies." Journal of Black Studies. 39, no. 4 (2009): 497–507.
- Karenga, Maulana. Introduction to Black Studies. Los Angeles: University of Sankore Press, 1993.

Marable, Manning. Dispatches from the Ebony Tower: Intellectuals Confront the African American Experience. New York: Columbia University Press, 2000.

National Council of Negro Women

The National Council of Negro Women (NCNW), founded on December 5, 1935, became the first umbrella organization to consolidate the power of all black women's groups to more effectively gain action from the national government. NCNW founder, Mary McLeod Bethune, as past president of the National Association of Colored Women (NACW), saw women's potential for organizing and fundraising. In 1929, she invited organizations to meet and form a national council dedicated to African American women's issues as white women had earlier done through the National Council of Women. In all, 29 women representing 14 organizations attended the founding meeting at the 137th Street Branch of the YWCA in Harlem. Debate ensued, leaving the NACW leadership split on the value of the new organization. Supporters, including Mary Church Terrell, Dr. Dorothy Ferebee, and Charlotte Hawkins Brown, selected Bethune as the first president.

Bethune used her friendship with Eleanor Roosevelt to gain assistance from the federal government on race issues. As the head of the Division of Negro Affairs at the National Youth Administration (1936–1943), Bethune viewed racial inclusion as a means to influence policy. She helped organize the Federal Council on Negro Affairs (informally called the black cabinet), which brought more managers and administrators into Washington, D.C. She used this power base to advance the rights of black women. By 1937, the NCNW gained public attention from the "National Conference on the Problems of the Negro and Negro Youth" held at the Labor Department. In 1938, more recognition came with the "Conference on Governmental Cooperation in the Approach to the Problems of Negro Women and Children" held at the Department of the Interior. These conferences created public recognition of the NCNW and brought its leaders into direct discussions with government officials.

Under Bethune, the NCNW grew in members, structure, and recognition; developed a full-time paid staff; and purchased a national headquarters building in 1943. The

Mary McLeod Bethune addresses an annual meeting of the National Council of Negro Women, established in 1935. (National Park Service-Mary McLeod Bethune Council House NHS, Washington, D.C.)

NCNW became the clearinghouse for information related to black women and race issues and disseminated this information through its publication, African American Woman's Journal. During World War II, the NCNW campaigned for integration of the military and for admission of black women into the Women's Army Corps (WACS). NCNW sponsorship resulted in the S. S. Harriet Tubman, the first ship to honor a black woman. Bethune represented the NCNW as an advisor to the U.S. delegation at the founding conference of the United Nations in 1945. By 1949, the NCNW represented 22 national organizations including sororities, professional associations, occupational societies, women's auxiliaries, denominational groups, and clubs.

Well-qualified and dedicated women followed Bethune. Dorothy Boulding Ferebee (1949–1953) and Vivian Carter Mason (1953–1957) continued the direction of the NCNW. Dorothy Irene Height (1957–1998) created a professional staff capable of program delivery and won tax-exempt status in 1966, enabling the NCNW to gain grants and contributions for its programs addressing youth, health, employment, hunger, civil rights, international relations, and family life. Growth in membership through affiliation progressed through the years from 500,000 in the 1930s to 4 million by the 1980s. Government agencies recognized the NCNW as the predominant national organization, hence, reinforcing the organization's representative power.

Collaboration and coalition building remain. Dorothy Height continues as president emerita and chair following her retirement in 1998. The NCNW belief in commitment, unity, and self-reliance appears in their current promotion of financial security, health issues, achievement, and recognition of African American women leaders.

See also: Bethune, Mary McLeod; Black Cabinet; National Association of Colored Women; Roosevelt, Eleanor; Terrell, Mary Church

Dorothy Salem

Bibliography

Collier-Thomas, Bettye. N.C.N.W., 1935–1980. Washington, D.C.: National Council of Negro Women, 1981.
Height, Dorothy I. Open Wide the Freedom Gates: A Memoir. New York: Public Affairs, 2003.

Negro League Baseball

Andrew “Rube” Foster formed the Negro National League in 1920, thereby establishing the most organized and stable league for black players throughout the years of segregated baseball. Earlier leagues had existed. Black men participated in the National Colored League as early as the mid-1840s, and there had been integrated teams and all-black clubs during the Civil War era, particularly in the Northern states.

In 1867, the Brooklyn Uniques challenged the Philadelphia Excelsiors to the “championship of colored clubs,” the earliest game in which scores are available for all-black teams; Philadelphia won, 37–24. That same year, the Philadelphia Pythians attempted to join the newly formed National Association of Base Ball Players, the first organized baseball league in the country, but they—along with any other team with black players—were not permitted to join this all-white league.

Nevertheless, black players did occasionally participate on teams consisting of white players. In 1878, John “Bud” Fowler pitched for the International League, breaking the minor league color barrier. In 1883, a Toledo team in the Northwestern League signed catcher Moses Fleetwood “Fleet” Walker, a black man who had played integrated baseball for Oberlin College. The next year, Walker’s team merged with the American Association, thereby making Walker the first black player on a major league ball club roster, several decades before Jackie Robinson’s sensational signing.

Actually, Robinson was far from the first African American to play professional ball. During the 1880s, 13 black players participated on minor leagues teams populated by white players, with 1887 being their peak year. Difficulties were significant for these players, with fans threatening them, and white teammates refusing to pose for team photos if they appeared in them. Moreover, if a black man pitched, some teammates would deliberately make errors to prevent the pitcher from winning his game.

On July 14, 1887, National League star Cap Anson refused to play against George Stovey for racial reasons; the next day, the International League agreed to ban all future contracts with players of color. Frank Grant and Bob Higgins continued to play on integrated teams through 1888, and Fleet Walker through 1889, but the ban was in full effect by then.

In 1885, Frank Thompson formed the first all-black professional team, the Cuban Giants. Other important professional teams followed, including the Philadelphia Orions, the Boston Resolutes, the Lord Baltimores, the St. Louis Black Stockings, the New York Gothams and Cuban X Giants, and the Michigan Page Fence Giants.

Challenges abounded for black players and the owners of these teams. Owners generally lacked sufficient funding, so players’ wages were uncertain. Some teams followed predetermined schedules, which assisted them in collecting greater gate fees; but they also barnstormed, traveling across parts of the country and challenging local teams to matches. The teams divided gate receipts in ways that were determined before the game.

In 1901, Baltimore Orioles manager John McGraw attempted to pass light-skinned Charlie Grant as a Native American, in hopes of circumventing the ban on black players. His ruse was uncovered, and the talented second baseman was prohibited from play.

Initially, Rube Foster’s National Negro League was formed by eight teams located in Chicago, Illinois; Dayton, Ohio; Detroit, Michigan; Indianapolis, Indiana; Kansas City, Kansas; and St. Louis, Missouri; this was named the Western League. Shortly thereafter, six more teams formed the Eastern Colored League, and the two divisions met in their own version of the World Series.

Foster became ill in 1926; the Eastern League collapsed in 1928, and the Western League folded after the 1930 season. Two leagues—the Negro Southern League and the East-West League—appeared in 1932, and then the Negro National League name was revived. With six to eight teams each year, this organization lasted through 1936. Starting in 1937, two divisions re-formed, and the league flourished until 1947, when Brooklyn Dodgers manager Branch Rickey signed Jackie Robinson to a contract. This began the integration of modern-day baseball in the National League, and that year, Robinson won the Rookie of the Year Award. Also that year, Bill Veeck of the Cleveland Indians signed Larry Doby, thereby breaking the color barrier in the American League. Doby participated in All-Star games from 1949–1954.

Other players who made a successful transition from the Negro leagues to major league baseball include Leroy “Satchel” Paige who, after pitching for black teams for 22 years, joined the Cleveland Indians in 1948 and pitched well into his fifties. Another was catcher Roy Campanella, who also played for Branch Rickey’s Dodgers. Perhaps the most sensational player to cross the color line was the last to do so, Hank Aaron, who signed with the Milwaukee Braves in 1954 and went on to break the major league home run record (755) and the record for runs batted in (2,297).

Other men who played their entire careers in the Negro leagues, but who clearly had the skill to play in the all-white major leagues, include “Smokey” Joe Williams, Josh Gibson, “Buck” O’Neil, “Mule” Settles, Oscar Charleston, “Bullet” Joe Rogan, and “Cool Papa” Bell. Starting in 1971, a Negro League Committee selected nine players for Baseball National Hall of Fame and Museum induction; in the years since, the Veterans Committee has continued honoring talented men from these leagues.

See also: Black Athletes; Jim Crow; Robinson, Jackie

Kelly Boyer Sagert

Bibliography

- Cottrell, Robert C. Blackball, the Black Sox and the Babe: Baseball's Crucial 1920 Season. Jefferson, NC: McFarland, 2002.
- Hauser, Christopher. The Negro Leagues Chronology: Events in Organized Black Baseball, 1920–1948. Jefferson, NC: McFarland, 2006.
- James, Bill. The New Bill James Historical Baseball Abstract. New York: The Free Press, 2001.
- Lanctot, Neil. Negro League Baseball: The Rise and Ruin of a Black Institution. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 2004.
- Loverro, Thom, ed. The Encyclopedia of Negro League Baseball. New York: Facts of File, 2003.

Negro Seamen Acts

The Negro Seamen Acts were a series of laws passed in Southern coastal states during the antebellum period intended to prevent seditious communication between slaves and foreign or Northern free blacks. Although South Carolina’s Negro Seamen Acts were the most controversial and have received the most scholarly attention, similar laws were also passed in Georgia (1829), North Carolina (1830–1831), Florida (1832), Alabama (1839, 1841), and Louisiana (1842). These acts prompted innumerable protests from Great Britain and intensified the rising sectional tensions between Northern critics of slavery and Southern defenders of states’ rights that eventually culminated in the American Civil War.

The first Negro Seamen Acts were passed in South Carolina on December 21, 1822, five months after the discovery of an apparent slave revolt led by a Charleston free black man named Denmark Vesey. Suspicions that visiting free black seamen had encouraged and assisted Vesey in planning the rebellion prompted calls to forestall the consequences of free black seamen influencing the state’s slaves. Under the provisions of the acts, free blacks employed on board vessels docking at a South Carolina port from any other state or foreign nation were to be seized and placed in jail until the vessel was ready to depart the state. Furthermore, the captains of these vessels were required to pay for the expenses of these confinements, and if they failed either to remove the free black seamen from the port or refused to pay for their detentions, the captains could be fined at least $1,000 or imprisoned for two months, and the free black seamen could be sold as slaves.

Almost immediately the acts were greeted with widespread opposition and nearly endless controversy. In February 1823, captains of American vessels argued that the acts subjected their ships to considerable expense, inconvenience, and delay. And members of Charleston’s Chamber of Commerce complained in 1826 and 1830 that the laws not only drove away commerce and thus impoverished the city, but also that the acts were regularly evaded and failed to prevent interactions between free black seamen and slaves. But the most steady and fervent salvos were launched from representatives of the British government, who decried the treatment of free British subjects and argued that the acts violated the free trade provisions of the 1815 Commercial Convention between the United States and Great Britain.

Not confining their discontent to petitions and protests, however, opponents of the Negro Seamen Acts also questioned and challenged their constitutionality. Only weeks after the acts’ passage, a lower court in South Carolina upheld their constitutionality. Then in August 1823, the U.S. Circuit Court ruled that the laws violated the exclusive right of the federal government to regulate commerce and was therefore unconstitutional. Defenders of the Negro Seamen Acts responded that South Carolina had a right to protect its citizens from “moral pestilence,” and compared the laws to maritime quarantine regulations enacted to prevent the importation of deadly infectious diseases. But proponents more generally argued that the court’s decision violated the state’s sovereignty and independence, thus placing the emerging doctrine of states’ rights at the heart of the defense of the Negro Seamen Acts.

Officials in South Carolina accordingly disregarded the ruling and continued to imprison free black seamen, igniting what some historians consider the first nullification crisis between the state and federal governments. Despite this consistent and fervent defense of the Negro Seamen Acts and the principle of states’ rights, the acts did undergo several alterations. The South Carolina legislature passed the first modifications to the acts in December 1823, repealing the enslavement provision and exempting free black sailors on naval vessels contingent on their remaining on board their ships while in port. But at the urging of the South Carolina Association—a group of prominent Charlestonians formed after the Vesey conspiracy to preserve order and implement stricter controls over the city’s black population—the 1823 law also enacted more severe penalties for free black offenders, and, in 1835, the enslavement provision was reinstated. In 1856, the Negro Seamen Acts were again amended, allowing free black seamen to remain on board their vessels rather than being removed to the jail after captains provided bonds to ensure that their colored mariners would not go ashore. Like previous versions of the law, however, this provision produced unintended consequences. One ship captain petitioned the Charleston City Council in March 1858 asking to be relieved from a fine, claiming that his free black crewmen had been lured ashore by persons desiring to collect the portion of the fine given to informants.

Protests and legal battles over the Negro Seamen Acts persisted throughout the remainder of the antebellum period, and champions of the acts and the principle of states’ rights consistently came to their defense, sometimes using violent or extralegal means. For instance, when Massachusetts agent Samuel Hoar arrived in Charleston in late 1844 to initiate legal suits again challenging the arrest of free black citizens of the Bay State, the South Carolina legislature condemned him as a seditious danger to public safety, and Hoar was compelled to flee under the threat of mob violence. Similarly, South Carolina authorities derided the Massachusetts legislature in 1845 for its increasing hostility toward the institution of slavery. White Southerners were thus increasingly suspicious of any action that challenged their peculiar institution or the laws enacted to police the South’s considerable slave population. Before long this sectional rift would boil over into a Civil War that would abolish slavery and the Negro Seamen Acts.

See also: Vesey, Denmark

Michael D. Thompson

Bibliography

- Hamer, Philip M. “British Consuls and the Negro Seamen Acts, 1850–1860.” Journal of Southern History 1 (May 1935):138–68.
- Hamer, Philip M. “Great Britain, the United States, and the Negro Seamen Acts, 1822–1848.” Journal of Southern History 1 (February 1935):3–28.
- Pearson, Edward A. Designs against Charleston: The Trial Record of the Denmark Vesey Slave Conspiracy of 1822. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1999.

New Negro Movement

The New Negro movement was a bold effort to transform American images of African Americans through art and literature, while instilling race pride within the black community itself. Pursuing racial renewal through cultural diplomacy, the new Negro movement gave birth to the Harlem Renaissance (1919–1934), a period of black artistic efflorescence. A golden age of black cultural nationalism, the Harlem Renaissance was a grand response to the call of W. E. B. Du Bois, who, in November 1920, wrote that an age of black literature was due. The literati of the Harlem Renaissance—Alain Locke, James Weldon Johnson, Jean Toomer, Zora Neale Hurston, Jessie Redmon Fauset, Wallace Thurman, Langston Hughes, Countee Cullen, Claude McKay, and others—were the vanguard of the new Negro movement, fulfilling their roles as part of what W. E. B. Du Bois called “the talented tenth.” Graphic artists, such as Aaron Douglas, William H. Johnson, and Miguel Covarrubias, complemented their verbal genius with visual forms. Collectively, the writers, artists, intellectuals, and performers were known as the “new Negroes,” and their era would be called the Harlem Renaissance. For the first time in American history, African Americans could rightfully claim to have produced a distinctive culture and to have contributed significantly to the American experience.

The term “new Negro” actually predates the “new Negro movement” itself. Henry Louis Gates has traced the use of this metaphor back to its origins. The term “new Negro” had been variously used to refer to transplanted Africans as slaves in the New World, then to newly emancipated slaves, and then to politically activist African Americans. In 1900, Booker T. Washington wrote A New Negro for A New Century. From 1905 to 1910, the Niagara Movement, an organization founded by W. E. B. Du Bois, became the forerunner of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP), an interracial organization founded in Springfield, Illinois in 1909. The New Negro movement should be distinguished from Hubert Harrison’s radicalist “new Negro manhood” movement. From August–October 1919, Harrison (d. 1927) edited the ephemeral New Negro magazine, but stood outside the mainstream new Negro movement. Although it championed many of the political ideals of black activists of the time, the new Negro movement itself was not political.

The term “new Negro” was already a social reality, and the new Negro movement simply solidified the emergent and robust self-consciousness of that new reality. The “new Negro” was really the product of the Great Migration (1915–1920) of more than a million blacks who moved from the rural South to the urban North in search of prosperity. In Harlem, a black middle class emerged, and a convergence of social forces made Harlem the cultural capital of African Americans from the 1920s to the mid-1930s. The new Negro movement stood in tense counterpoise with separatist Jim Crow laws—America’s apartheid.

Meanwhile, in December 1924, Vanity Fair heralded the advent of the “new Negro” in a two-page feature, “Enter, The New Negro, a Distinctive Type Recently Created by the Coloured Cabaret Belt in New York.” Mexican caricaturist Miguel Covarrubias drew striking images of African Americans that radically departed from the old stereotypes, and African American writer Eric Walrond, future author of Tropic Death (1926), wrote the captions. In the Vanity Fair feature, Walrond proclaimed the demise of artistic stereotypes of the “old Negro.” At a time when African Americans had virtually no political recourse, their voice could best be heard through their distinctive music, poetry and art—a creative and humanistic effort to achieve the goal of civil rights by producing positive images of African Americans and promoting activism through art.

In its heyday, the effective leader of the new Negro movement was philosopher Alain Locke (1885–1954), whose roles as both race leader and cultural pluralist proved a rare combination. As the first African American Rhodes Scholar, his exquisite education abroad in Oxford and Germany—culminating in his Harvard doctorate in philosophy—prepared Locke to become the most important African American intellectual between the great W. E. B. Du Bois and Martin Luther King Jr. As the spokesman and chief strategist of the new Negro movement during the Harlem Renaissance period and beyond, Locke resolved to sweep away the pejorative stereotypes of the “old Negro” through the transformative ideas and visual rhetoric of art, music, drama, and literature.

The most spectacular cultural product of the new Negro movement was the Harlem Renaissance. The ideology of the new Negro movement expressed itself through the Harlem Renaissance, which sparked a new pride in everything African American, and presented, to both white and black audiences, the artistic and literary gifts of the “talented tenth”—the vanguard of that African American elite who could best represent the new image of African Americans to America at large. This was a watershed period in African American history for psychological revalorization and race vindication. Although blacks were being objectified as icons of exotic, African-rooted primitivism, the Harlem Renaissance achieved a major objective of the new Negro movement, which was to instill a race pride in blacks and a corresponding respect for blacks by mainstream America.

Locke’s cultural pluralism was a novel strategy: Launch a cultural movement that would enrich America and gain the respect of the white majority, and the masks of black stereotypes (which were nonthreatening because they reinforced black inferiority in the eyes of whites) would disappear, revealing the true humanity of African Americans beneath the façade. Although its success was short-lived, the new Negro movement was brilliantly conceived and masterfully promoted.

The Harlem Renaissance presented itself as a microcosm or “self-portraiture” of black culture to America and to the world. For Locke, art ought to contribute to the improvement of life—a pragmatist aesthetic principle that may be characterized as “meliorism.” The new Negro movement transfused black consciousness by shaping a new self-image through powerful literary and artistic images. Although the movement is frozen in history, Locke’s ideology is very much alive. In 2004, philosopher José Medina transposed Locke's "new Negro" ideology and applied it to the concept of the "new Hispanic." As for reliving the experience of the Harlem Renaissance, which is the legacy of the new Negro movement, this can be experienced in a new way today, thanks to the Virtual Harlem Project, developed by the Electronic Visualization Laboratory of the Department of Computer Science at the University of Illinois at Chicago.

The new Negro movement also had a transformative effect on America at large. The writers of the new Negro movement fundamentally altered the way in which America views itself, although that change has been slow in coming. The changes in race relations today are partly the delayed impact of the new Negro movement, which advocated what Alain Locke would later call, "a new Americanism." See also: Du Bois, W. E. B.; Harlem Renaissance; Hughes, Langston; Locke, Alain; McKay, Claude; Negritude

Christopher George Buck

Bibliography

- Baker, Houston A., Jr. Modernism and the Harlem Renaissance. Chicago: The University of Chicago Press, 1987.
- Buck, Christopher. Alain Locke: Faith and Philosophy. Los Angeles: Kalimat Press, 2005.
- Holmes, Eugene C. "Alain Locke and the New Negro Movement." Negro American Literature Forum 2, no. 3 (Fall 1968):60–68.
- Locke, Alain, ed., The New Negro: An Interpretation. New York: Albert and Charles Boni, 1925, 1927.
- Long, Richard A. "The Genesis of Locke's The New Negro." Black World 25, no. 4 (1976):14–20.
- Medina, José. "Pragmatism and Ethnicity: Critique, Reconstruction, and the New Hispanic." Metaphilosophy 35, nos. 1/2 (2004):115–46.
- Nadell, Martha Jane. Enter the New Negroes: Images of Race in American Culture. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 2004.
- Scholz, Sally J. "Individual and Community: Artistic Representation in Alain L. Locke's Politics." Transactions of the Charles S. Peirce Society: A Quarterly Journal in American Philosophy 39, no. 3 (Summer 2003):491–502.
- Watts, Eric King. "African American Ethos and Hermeneutical Rhetoric: An Exploration of Alain Locke's The New Negro." Quarterly Journal of Speech 88, no. 1 (2002):19–32.

New Orleans Riot of 1900

The week of July 23, 1900, proved to be one of the bloodiest weeks in the Crescent City's history. Police went on a manhunt for Robert Charles (1865–1900), a biracial man who shot 24 whites including seven police officers, even as a mob composed primarily of white men and boys thronged the streets inflicting random acts of violence on blacks who were routinely chased, beaten, and shot.

The events began in New Orleans on Monday evening, while the 34-year-old Charles and his 19-year-old roommate, Lenard Pierce, sat quietly on the doorsteps of a white family's house at 2815 Dryades Street. According to historian William Ivy Hair, the two men were awaiting the return of Charles' girlfriend, Virginia Banks, who lived nearby in a back room of 2849 Dryades Street when three New Orleans policemen, Sergeant Jules C. Aucoin, Patrolman August T. Mora, and Officer Joseph D. Cantrelle, approached the two men claiming that they looked suspicious. When the officers approached Robert Charles, he did not have a previous criminal record in New Orleans, although he had once been arrested in Mississippi in 1894 for peddling alcohol in a dry county. Charles moved to New Orleans shortly after his brush with the law, but voluntarily returned to Mississippi in October 1896 to stand trial for the charge, and received a verdict of not guilty.

The exchange between Charles, Pierce, and the three officers is sketchy, with conflicting accounts of the ensuing gunfire that erupted between Officer Mora and Robert Charles. Reverend D. A. Graham of the A.M.E. Church in New Orleans reported to the Indianapolis newspaper, The Freeman, that when the policemen began clubbing Charles, he drew the Colt revolver he was carrying in an inside coat pocket. Afterwards, Officer Mora admitted to using his billet and drawing his gun before Charles drew his pistol. Both men were shot in the exchange, although Charles escaped with a bullet wound in his leg.

Seven white police officers and a civilian arrived at Charles's one-room home at 2023 Fourth Street sometime during the early morning hours of July 24, precisely the location where Charles had fled to dress his wound. The officers intended to kill him on sight. Instead, another gun battle ensued with Charles killing Captain John T. Day and Patrolman Peter J. Lamb. Charles fled and took refuge at the home of acquaintances Silas and Martha Jackson. He remained hidden in the Jackson's home located at 1208 Saratoga Street for the week, even as violence raged on in a city boiling with racial conflict.

By Wednesday, July 25, a white mob estimated in the thousands began a tragic reign of lawlessness in which numerous black men and women were assaulted and killed, including a newsboy who was knifed, a man who was dragged from a car and beaten to death, and a 75-year-old man on his way to work in the French Market. On Friday, July 27, a black informant led police to Saratoga Street where Charles was cornered inside an upstairs bedroom. The mob remained outside the two-story house during the standoff in which Charles refused to surrender.

Eventually Charles, armed with a Winchester rifle and home-made bullets, was shot multiple times while exiting the house after a mattress was set ablaze and thrown inside the house producing a cloud of black smoke. Charles continued to fire his weapon as his body was riddled with bullets. A Tulane medical student on the scene, Charles A. Noiret, fired the bullet that killed Charles. After his death, the mob dragged Charles's body into the street where it was repeatedly shot, punched, kicked, and mutilated. That night the rioting continued, and an African American public school named for philanthropist Thomy Lafon was burned.

In her pamphlet "Mob Rule in New Orleans," civil rights activist Ida B. Wells-Barnett described the mob that roamed the streets throughout the week as completely lawless. She went on to say that the mob was in the streets daily, beating, shooting, and killing African Americans at will.

Robert Charles (also known as Curtis Robertson or Robinson) migrated to New Orleans from Copiah County, Mississippi, only six years before the fateful drama. Charles maintained a membership in the International Migration Society, an organization promoting a Back-to-Africa Movement, and sold Bishop Henry M. Turner's publication, Voices of Missions, which advocated African American rights to fight in self-defense. He worked as a laborer and was described by those who knew him as an intelligent man who dressed well. He also wrote prolifically, having filled scores of composition books with unknown content that were removed from his home after his death and subsequently lost. Charles owned several "well-worn text-books" that were removed by police and souvenir seekers. Notwithstanding the murders that Charles unquestionably committed and journalist labels such as "fiend" and "Negro desperado," evidence suggests that Charles was a thinker and a writer who lacked formal education, yet possessed an interest in the complexity of race relations and a predilection toward intellectual improvement.

A month after the rioting had quieted, Reverend Graham noted in a letter to The Freeman that never before had African Americans been as victimized and terrorized by whites in the South. Still, numerous people who knew or were in the vicinity where Charles hid on Saratoga Street were arrested and incarcerated for at least a year. Charles was buried in an unmarked grave in Holt's Cemetery in New Orleans.

See also: Jim Crow; Lynching; Turner, Henry McNeal; Wells-Barnett, Ida; White Mob Violence

Jayetta Slawson

Bibliography

- Hair, William Ivy. Carnival of Fury: Robert Charles and the New Orleans Race Riot of 1900. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1976.
- Wells-Barnett, Ida B. "Mob Rule in New Orleans." On Lynchings. New York: Arno Press, 1969.

New York Silent March of 1917

The New York "Silent March" of 1917 is considered one of the first mass demonstrations by African Americans in the 20th century. On July 28, 1917, an estimated 10,000 African American men, women, and children marched silently down Fifth Avenue in New York City to the sound only of muffled drums. The demonstration served as a response to an eruption of racially motivated violent attacks on the black community. James Weldon Johnson, at that time field secretary for the NAACP, served as the principal organizer of the New York "Silent March," also known as "The Negro Silent Protest Parade." The East St. Louis riots of 1917 emerged as the central motivating factor for the protest.

The racial tension in East St. Louis, Illinois increased during the early months of 1917, as a result of African Americans replacing white workers in the city's industrial factories. The tension began to boil over on July 1, 1917, when members of the white community drove into a black residential area and began firing guns. Moments later, two white out-of-uniform police officers drove into the area and were subsequently shot and killed. On July 2, 1917, East St. Louis's white residents retaliated against the African American community and began shooting at black men, women, and children. They also burned their houses, lynched men from streetlamps, destroyed their businesses, and beat people to death. The East St. Louis massacre left 39 African Americans dead and 8 white fatalities. The rioters destroyed more than $400,000 worth of property and nearly 6,000 African Americans were driven from their homes and forced to seek refuge.

At a meeting of the NAACP's Harlem branch, the East St. Louis riot served as its primary topic. The executive committee initially planned to organize a mass meeting at Carnegie Hall to discuss the massacre and voice their concerns. James Weldon Johnson recalled a conversation he had with Oswald Garrison Villiard, journalist and NAACP treasurer, and suggested a silent protest parade. He called for the participation of all classes of African Americans in the Greater New York area to join this effort. A planning committee of pastors from leading churches and other influential African American men and women made preparations for the march.

Although the East St. Louis riots served as the primary motivator for the march, the memories of numerous lynchings, most notable the lynchings of Ell Persons in Memphis, Tennessee, and Jesse Washington in Waco Texas, also inspired the black community to organize and demonstrate their frustrations to the nation. Members of the African American community assembled at 59th Street and Fifth Avenue in New York and marched into the center of Manhattan on July 28, 1917. The procession was headed by children, some as young as six years old, wearing white. They were followed by the women also dressed in white and men in the rear dressed in dark clothes. W. E. B. Du Bois was among the many prominent marchers. A banner that stretched half the width of the street read, "Your Hands Are Full of Blood," immediately followed by a marcher carrying an American flag.

As planned, no one in the demonstration spoke a word. An apathetic crowd of approximately 20,000 spectators

Silent March in New York City on July 28, 1917. The parade was organized by the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People and religious leaders in Harlem to protest violence against African Americans throughout the United States. (Library of Congress) consisting of blacks, as well as whites, lined the streets as they, too, abided by the code of silence. There were no bands, cheering, or hand clapping to break the monotony. Although no one spoke a word, the demonstrators conveyed their messages to the nation through numerous signs that read: “Mother, Do Lynchers Go To Heaven?”; “Mr. President, Why Not Make America Safe for Democracy”; “Maligned As Lazy, Murdered When We Work”; “Race Prejudice Is the Offspring of Ignorance, and the Mother is Lynching.”

The New York “Silent March” of 1917 created a model for future public demonstrations. The event succeeded as a result of the efforts from nearly 100 churches, fraternal lodges, and civil rights organizations. The NAACP held the most prominent role in the protest and launched its crusade against lynching and other forms of racial injustice.

See also: Antilynching Campaign; Du Bois, W. E. B.; East St. Louis, Illinois, Riot of 1917; Lynching; National Association for the Advancement of Colored People

Darius Young

Bibliography

- Bernstein, Patricia. The First Waco Horror: The Lynching of Jesse Washington and the Rise of the NAACP. College Station: Texas A&M University Press, 2005.
- Dray, Philip. At the Hands of Persons Unknown: The Lynching of Black America. New York: The Modern Library, 2002.
- Johnson, James Weldon. Along This Way: The Autobiography of James Weldon Johnson. New York: Penguin Books, 1933.
- Zangrando, Robert L. The NAACP Crusade Against Lynching, 1909–1950. Philadelphia: Temple University Press, 1980.

Newton, Huey P.

Huey Pierce Newton (1942–1989) was a leader and co-founder of the Black Panther Party for Self-Defense. Named after Louisiana senator Huey Long, Newton was the seventh child of Armelia and Walter Newton in Monroe, Louisiana. At age three, Huey Newton migrated to Oakland, California, with his family, searching for economic opportunity and a better quality of life. During the years following World War II, Oakland boasted a burgeoning African American population and a busy port that promised more possibilities than Louisiana ever could. For the Newton family and other black families like them, however, Oakland was not the Promised Land: schools were substandard, living accommodations were meager, at best, and jobs were ephemeral.

Melvin Newton and Walter “Sonny Man” Newton Jr., Newton’s two older brothers, and Walter Newton Sr., Newton’s father, were most influential in Newton’s childhood development. Melvin epitomized the potential of pursuing a life of ideas. He attended San Jose State College and taught his brother Huey the value of learning. “Sonny Man,” leaving home as a teenager, thrived in the illegal economy and showed Newton the allure of street life. Huey Newton would later recall that while Sonny Man appeared to live freely, this freedom was only an illusion. Despite the illusion, Walter provided Huey Newton with lessons to negotiate life on Oakland’s streets. To Huey, Newton Sr. was the glue that held their family together. Holding multiple jobs and performing the duties of a Christian minister, Walter Newton Sr. combined spirituality with pragmatism and taught his sons the necessity of opposing white racism.

Never feeling at home in structured classrooms, Newton received his education during his formative years on the streets of Oakland. There he and his friends experimented with, acted out, and constantly engaged the politics of masculinity and found the hustler’s life appealing. In the 10th grade at Oakland Technical High School, Newton was expelled for his behavior and he transferred to Berkeley High School in Berkeley, California. Newton’s experience at Berkeley High School was only a little better. In fact, it was at Berkeley High School that Newton’s trouble with the law began, forcing him to go to juvenile hall. Unable to attend Berkeley High School upon leaving juvenile hall, Newton returned to Oakland Technical High School and graduated in 1959.

Social promotion and the politics of bureaucratic public high schools allowed Newton to graduate without possessing requisite scholastic aptitude. After a period of self-directed study under the tutelage of his brother Melvin, however, Newton entered Oakland City College in the autumn of 1959. It was at Oakland City College from 1959 to 1966 that Newton began actively seeking answers to the problems plaguing African American communities nationwide. Reading radical theorists like Che Guevara, Malcolm X, Franz Fanon, Karl Marx, and Mao Zedong, and participating in black cultural and political organizations, Newton began to develop his own theoretical framework. The first organizations he joined were the Afro-American Association and the Soul Students Advisory Council, student groups devoted to studying African American history, political thought, and cultural production, and creating a black studies curriculum on campus. Disappointed with the presence of political consciousness but lack of political activity in the two organizations, especially the two groups' dismissal of black working poor men, Huey Newton and Bobby Seale, a friend and student at Oakland City College, created the Black Panther Party for Self-Defense.

The Black Panthers were initially organized in 1966 as an armed police patrol to protect black community residents from brutal police violence. By 1969, with Bobby Seale as its chairman and Huey P. Newton as its minister of self-defense, the organization went nationwide, with more than 40 chapters devoted to the daily concerns of black urban communities.

In autumn 1967, Newton's life took a dramatic turn when a police traffic stop turned deadly. Newton had been a victim of police harassment since his days of police patrols in 1967. After being pulled over for unknown circumstances in the early morning hours of October 28, 1967, an altercation with the police left Patrolman John Frey dead, Patrolman Herbert Heanes wounded, and Newton near death with a bullet in his stomach. Treated for his bullet wounds at Kaiser Hospital, Newton was interrogated, brutalized, and chained to a gurney by police. Newton retained the services of Charles Garry, a prominent lawyer known for working with leftist causes. Accused of murder, felonious assault, and kidnapping, Newton awaited trial in San Quentin Prison and the Oakland County Jail. After months on trial, on September 8, 1968, Newton was found guilty of manslaughter and sentenced to a 2- to-15-year sentence at the California Men's Colony, East Facility, in San Luis Obispo, California. Most of Newton's 22 months at the penal colony were spent in isolation. While Newton was imprisoned, Charles Garry feverishly worked to obtain an appeal. On May 29, 1970, the California Appellate Court announced that Newton's conviction was reversed and determined that, because the jury had been denied critical information in determining Newton's fate, a new trial was ordered. In August 1970, Newton was released on bail. In the early 1970s, Newton's defense team participated in two more trials to save him from imprisonment. Both ended in a mistrial. Cleared of all charges, Newton set out to rebuild the party.

The Federal Bureau of Investigation's Counter-Intelligence Program (COINTELPRO) from 1970–1974, however,

made bolstering the party difficult. Also, Newton's move to possess absolute authority in the party, going by names like the supreme commander, the servant of the people, and the supreme servant of the people, made strengthening the party difficult. Furthermore, Newton's stardom among the country's celebrities, who provided him with luxury items, drugs, and alcohol, compromised his position among those individuals the party purported to serve.

Newton's drug abuse and alcoholism may have contributed to his fleeing the country in 1974 and further estranged the Black Panther Party from black communities. In late 1973, Newton allegedly shot a prostitute, Kathleen Smith, and brutalized a tailor, Preston Callins, for calling him "baby." Shortly after being arrested and posting bail for assaulting Callins, Newton fled the United States and obtained asylum in Cuba where he remained until 1977, relinquishing control of the declining Black Panther Party to Elaine Brown. Upon his return to the United States, Newton was imprisoned, released on bail, and eventually acquitted for the murder of Smith. Callin's case was dropped after he declared that he could not remember his assaulter. Newton also resumed control of the party after Elaine Brown resigned her post, citing irreconcilable differences with Newton.

After the Black Panther Party officially disbanded in 1982, Newton's wife, Fredericka, left him, and his drug and alcohol abuse, as well his problems with law enforcement, continued. In 1985, he was suspected but never indicted for burglary. In 1986, he was cleared of possessing illegal firearms. In 1988, Newton served time in prison for parole violation. On August 22, 1989, Newton was fatally wounded after being shot three times in what seems to have been a drug deal gone awry.

Despite COINTELPRO initiatives created by the Federal Bureau of investigation to discredit Huey Newton, Newton's involvement with the criminal justice system, his authoritarianism within the party, and his drug problems, especially during the last decade of his life, Huey P. Newton was a scholar and the Black Panther Party's chief theoretician. In 1966, after six years of study, Newton received his associate's degree, was awarded a bachelor's degree in education and politics from the University of California at Santa Cruz in 1974, and won his doctorate from the History of Consciousness Program at the University of Santa Cruz in 1980 by successfully defending his dissertation "War Against the Panthers: A Study of Repression in America."

Interestingly, although graduating high school with substandard educational skills, Newton was a prolific writer who (co)authored five books and scores of articles, essays, and position papers. These writings are indicative of Newton's openness to ideas, his ability to synthesize political theories, and a willingness to develop his own understanding of the oppressive forces and strategies to eliminate structural inequalities that jeopardized African American's social, political, and economic well-being.

In 1966, when the party was initially organized, Newton was a black nationalist and posited that only black people's control of capitalists' institutions in their community could bring about African American empowerment. In 1969, Newton's understanding of marxism led him to embrace revolutionary socialism as an ideology necessary to seize economic and political power from the elite ruling class and end the exploitation of the poor and working classes. By 1970, Newton hypothesized that only an internationalist struggle linking radical and progressive forces in different countries could bring about fundamental change. In 1971, Newton's intercommunalism combined ideas of empire and imperialism to articulate an understanding of social movements that transcended the confines of national boundaries.

Newton's political growth and demise was symptomatic of the shifts in the U.S. post-Civil Rights era political economy. In the 1970s, the most ostensible constraints on African Americans' well-being were apparently removed with 1960s civil rights legislation, the end of white mob rule, and the ascendance of neoconservative ideologists who coopted notions of equal protection. Heterogeneous black working class communities that had been created only decades before were floundering under burdens of northern racism, capitalist exploitation, and black people's search for cultural and political identity. Newton's ideological and political development and ultimate ruin is indicative of the hope, potential, and reality of progressive factions in American society who challenged systems of oppression and exploitation. Huey P. Newton may not fit the American fantasy of a spotless, pure hero, but he does epitomize the complex nature of the radical liberation movements in a global age.

See also: Black Panther Party; Black Power; Brown, Elaine; Cleaver, Eldridge; COINTELPRO; Seale, Bobby

Jamie J. Wilson

Bibliography

- Brown, Elaine. A Taste of Power: A Black Woman's Story. New York: Pantheon Books, 1992.
- Churchill, Ward. Agents of Repression: the FBI's Secret War Against the Black Panther Party and the American Indian Movement. Boston: South End Press, 1988.
- Churchill, Ward. "'To Disrupt, Discredit, and Destroy': The FBI's Secret War Against the Black Panther Party." In Liberation, Imagination, and the Black Panther Party. Kathleen Cleaver and George Katsiaficas, eds., 79–117. New York: Routledge, 2001.
- Clemons Michael and Jones, Charles E. "Global Solidarity: The Black Panther Party in the International Arena." In Liberation, Imagination, and the Black Panther Party. Kathleen Cleaver and George Katsiaficas, eds., 20–39. New York: Routledge, 2001.
- Foner, Philip S. The Black Panthers Speak. New York: Da Capo Press, 1995.
- Grady-Willis, Winston A. "The Black Panther Party: State Repression and Political Prisoners." In The Black Panther Party Reconsidered. Charles E. Jones, ed., 363–90. Baltimore: Black Classic Press, 1998.
- Jeffries, Judson. Huey P. Newton: The Radical Theorist. Jackson: University Press of Mississippi, 2002.
- Johnson, III, Ollie A. "Explaining the Demise of the Black Panther Party: The Role of Internal Factors." In The Black Panther Party Reconsidered. Charles E. Jones, ed., 391–414. Baltimore: Black Classic Press, 1998.
- Jones, Charles E. and Jeffries, Judson. "Don't Believe the Hype": Debunking the Panther Mythology." In The Black Panther Party Reconsidered. Charles E. Jones, ed., 25–55. Baltimore: Black Classic Press, 1998.
- Lockwood, Lee. Conversations with Eldridge Cleaver, Algiers. New York: Dell Publishing, 1970.
- Newton, Huey P. To Die for the People: The Writings of Huey P. Newton. New York: Vintage Books, 1972.
- Newton, Huey P. Revolutionary Suicide. New York: Harcourt Brace Jovanovich, 1973.
- Newton, Huey P. War Against the Panthers: A Study of Repression in America. New York: Harlem River Press, 1996.
- Pearson, Hugh. The Shadow of the Panthers: Huey Newton and the Price of Black Power in America. Reading, MA: Addison Wesley Publishing, 1994.
- Seale, Bobby. Seize the Time: The Story of the Black Panther Party and Huey P. Newton. New York: Random House, 1970.
- Umoja, Akinyele O. "Repression Breeds Resistance." In Liberation, Imagination, and the Black Panther Party. Kathleen Cleaver and George Katsiaficas, eds., 3–19. New York: Routledge, 2001.

Niagara Movement

In response to Booker T. Washington's cautious approach to social justice, W. E. B. Du Bois, Frederick McGhee, and Monroe Trotter agreed that something had to be done. Du Bois suggested that they convene a meeting of the talented tenth who were interested in creating an organization dedicated to the freedom and growth of the Negro. The name, Niagara Movement, was derived from their vision and because Niagara Falls was where the meeting took place.

Du Bois sent invitations to 60 African American leaders who were secure in their profession and principles to resist any backlash from Booker T. Washington to meet in Buffalo, New York, to organize an organization dedicated to the freedom and growth of the Negro and for racial equality. On July 9, 1905, 29 black intellectuals and professionals and Iteenager, met in Buffalo. Because of racial prejudice at the hotel in Buffalo, the meeting moved to the Eric Beach Hotel, Fort Erie, Ontario, July 10. Those in attendance included Du Bois, Trotter, Fred L. McGhee, Reverdy Ransom, Charles B. Purvis, Lafayette Hershey, Freeman H. M. Murray, J. Max Barber, Edwin Jourdain, Rev. Bryron Gunner, Alonzo F. Herndon, Henry L. Bailey, W. H. H. Hart, George Jackson, and William H. Richards, who were known as the Niagarites.

The structure of the movement reflected what Du Bois had suggested to Washington during the meetings for the Committee of Twelve. The structure included an executive committee, several committees, and a chairman for each Niagara state chapter, which were to be organized immediately after the meeting. Membership dues were $5 annually. Du Bois was elected as secretary; Jackson was elected treasurer; Trotter served as chair of the Press and Public Opinion committee, which Du Bois also served on; and the Constitution and By-Laws of the Niagara Movement was voted on. The Niagara Movement was officially formed and incorporated in January 1906.

The Declaration of Principles, drafted by Du Bois and Trotter, was signed by all those who were in attendance. The declaration recognized the progress within the African American communities—buying of property, uplift in home life, the advance in education, literature and art, crime prevention, and the constructive and executive ability of religious, economic, and educational institutions. The principles called for suffrage for men and women, civil liberty, economic opportunities, quality education, equal justice within the court system, better health care, permanent employment and membership into labor unions, removal “Jim Crow” cars, and rewarding soldiers for their service with promotions and the opportunity to be admitted to the military academy. Finally, the principles stated duties that every person should adhere to. More important, the Niagarites called on the government to enforce the Thirteenth, Fourteenth, and Fifteenth Amendments to the Constitution.

The second meeting, held August 15, 1906, at Storer College, Harper’s Ferry, West Virginia, occurred during the 100th anniversary of John Brown’s birth and the 50th anniversary of the battle of Osawatomie. More than 150 people, representing 34 state chapters, including the Massachusetts Niagara Women’s Auxiliary, were in attendance. Speeches by Reverdy Ransom and Du Bois spoke straight to the heart of the Niagara movement. Ransom addressed the significance of John Brown’s anniversary, calling him a man true to the slave. Ransom also spoke of the two classes of African Americans and their opposing perspectives. In his speech “Address to the Country,” Du Bois presented a five-point resolution calling for quality education, enforcement of the Fourteenth Amendment and the reduction of congressional seats for states where African Americans could not vote, justice, and jobs. He ended his speech by urging young people to stand up for their rights, to prove themselves worthy of their heritage, to treat men as men, and to have courage.

Unlike the first meeting, a number of women traveled to Harper’s Ferry with their husbands and fathers. Mrs. Gertrude Wright Morgan, Mss. O. M. Walker, Mrs. H. F. M. Murray, Mrs. Mollie Lewis Kelan, Ms. Ida D. Bailey, Miss Sadie Shorter, and Mrs. Charlotte Hershaw were only a few of the women who attended the meeting in 1906. Even though they could not attend any of the sessions, they participated in the program, attended the opening and closing sessions, had a women’s meeting, and attended the celebration for John Brown. Mrs. Mary Ovington, a reporter for the New York Evening Post, also attended the meeting and, later in 1908, became the first white member of the Niagara movement.

The 1907 Niagara movement meeting was held at Boston’s Faneuil Hall, with 800 people in attendance. At this meeting that Trotter resigned as chairmen of the press and public opinion committee and a disagreement between Trotter and Clement Morgan had a major impact on the meeting. By 1908, strife and conflict, lack of funding and central leadership, and the pressure from the Tuskegee machine began to take its toll on the organization. Thus attendance at both the 1908 and 1909 annual meeting, which was held in Oberlin, Ohio and Sea Isle City, respectively, was low. The 1910 meeting was cancelled.

Du Bois let it be known that African Americans would not cease protesting for their rights, but it would be by voting, persistent hammering at the truth, sacrifice, and work that they would get their rights as freeborn Americans. This was the mission and purpose of the Niagara movement.

See also: Du Bois, W. E. B.; Jim Crow; National Association for the Advancement of Colored People; Springfield Race Riot of 1908; Trotter, William Monroe

LaVerne Gyant

Bibliography

- Aptheker, H. A Documentary History of the Negro People in the United States, Vol. 2. New York: Citadel Press Book, 1992.
- Drinkard-Hawkshawe, D. "Prelude to the Niagara Movement and the NAACP," Crisis 84, no. 2 (1977):53–57.
- Du Bois, W. E. B., The Autobiography of W. E. B. Du Bois: A Soliloquy on Viewing My Life from the Last Decade of the First Century. New York: International Publishers, 1968.
- Lewis, D. L. W. E. B. Du Bois: Biography of a Race. New York: Henry Holt, 1993.

Nicodemus, Kansas

Nicodemus, Kansas, was a town settled by and for African Americans from Kentucky and Tennessee who were seeking a better life in the American West in 1877. It derived its name from an enslaved African who was believed to be the first to purchase his own freedom in America. Many of the settlers of Nicodemus were enslaved before the American Civil War. They were seeking a new life in Kansas in response to escalating racism in the American South by white politicians and their constituencies, angered over what they perceived as unfair gains by blacks during Reconstruction.

The town itself was a planned community devised by a small committee of seven known as the Nicodemus Town Company. Simon P. Roundtree, a black preacher, and W. R. Hill, a white planner, led the group's efforts. The wide circulation of a document created by Roundtree spurred the growth of the settlement. This flier warmly invited African Americans to settle in the new community. The Nicodemus Town Company created a supporting flier repeating the invitation. An early resident of the town, Benjamin "Pap" Singleton, was instrumental in spreading the word through his own personal distribution of these invitations to black communities outside the state of Kansas.

The first winter in the settlement was difficult for its new arrivals. There had not been enough time to plant and harvest crops before the weather grew bitterly cold. Food and supplies were scarce. The new settlers were greatly aided by their Native American neighbors in the Osage Nation who supplied them with food and other necessities. The next year settlers saw success in farming and in finding employment with the local railroads.

By 1879, the population of Nicodemus was close to 600 residents. As the town continued to grow, several of its inhabitants became successful. Anderson Boles was the owner of a hotel and also a prominent local farmer. Z. T. Fletcher was the town's first postmaster and also owned a hotel. A. T. Hall and E. P. McCabe made their fortunes in real estate. The latter became the first African American politician elected to statewide office in Kansas when he became state auditor.

The residents of Nicodemus believed that the presence of a railway line through the town would attract new businesses and more residents to the growing community. In 1887, town residents voted in favor of issuing $16,000 in bonds to persuade the Missouri Pacific Railroad to offer service through the town. The community also courted another rail company, the Union Pacific. The promise of a rail line excited residents, creating a great deal of optimism about the future of the settlement; however, neither of the railroad companies pursued by the town decided to lay tracks in Nicodemus. The Union Pacific Railroad determined that a location to the south of the settlement was the best place for their operation.

Nicodemus-based business owners, seeing the location of a rail line as the lifeblood of a new settlement, followed the railroad to the nearby area that later came to be known as the city of Bogue, Kansas. This loss of business was gradual but irreversible, leading to rapid population decline in the early half of the 20th century. Only 16 people were listed as residents of the town by 1950, rebounding slightly to about 80 in the 1980s.

In 1976, the town was selected as a National Historic Landmark and in 1996 a National Site. The last designation provided funds for preservation of various town landmarks and the creation of public programs detailing the history of the settlement.

See also: Black Nationalism; Exoduster Movement; Singleton, Benjamin “Pap”

Christopher Keith Johnson

Bibliography

- Frazier, Ian. Great Plains. New York: Penguin Books, 1990.
- Painter, Nell Irvin. Exodusters: Black Migration to Kansas after Reconstruction. New York: Knopf, 1977.
- Schwendemann, Glen. “Nicodemus: Negro Haven on the Solomon.” Kansas Historical Quarterly 34 (1968):10–31.

Nkrumah, Kwame

Kwame Nkrumah (1909–1972) was an African activist, intellectual, and statesman, and the first prime minister and later president of Ghana, the first sub-Saharan African country to gain independence. He played a pivotal role in developing the concept of Pan-Africanism.

Kwame Nkrumah was born on September 18, 1909, and baptized as “Francis” a few days later in the local Roman Catholic Church in Nkroful, a village located in what was then called the British-ruled Gold Coast Colony and today called Ghana. His father, a goldsmith, gave him the name Nwia Kofi Ngonloma, but Nkrumah often used this as well as his day-name Kwame (for Saturday) on many instances throughout his life. Nkrumah, a gifted student, was schooled in Africa, America, and England where he would subsequently earn several degrees in various subjects. He attended the Roman Catholic elementary school in his father’s town Half Assini where he became a pupil teacher by the age of 14. From there, he would attend a government training college in Accra that was eventually merged with the Prince of Wales College at Achimota. Upon graduation, Nkrumah became employed as a teacher at the Roman Catholic junior school at Elmina but eventually received a position as headmaster of a Catholic junior school at Axim within a year. While also considering a career as a priest, two years after teaching at Axim, Nkrumah accepted a teaching post at the Catholic seminary in Amissano.

Kwame Nkrumah was influenced by Kwegyir Aggrey, African vice principal of Achimota, who was educated in America to study abroad. He was accepted and attended Lincoln University in Pennsylvania, a university for black men supported by the Presbyterian Church, on a modest scholarship between 1935 and 1939. He earned a BA degree in economics and sociology from Lincoln in 1939 and also secured a degree in sacred theology. Nkrumah earned a master of science in education in 1942 from the University of Pennsylvania while teaching at his alma mater.

As a student, Nkrumah became increasingly interested in issues related to African and African American liberation. At this time that he began to associate with black student organizations and radical ideologies. Kwame Nkrumah became radicalized in Jim Crow America while reading Karl Marx, Marcus Garvey, and W. E. B. Du Bois and associating with radical black student organizations. He pledged the all-black fraternity Phi Beta Sigma Fraternity, Inc., and began to write essays detailing his anticolonial ideas. Nkrumah was elected president of the African Students Organization of America and Canada while teaching at Lincoln. His first major publication, Towards Colonial Freedom, published in 1947, was written between 1942 and 1945. It was also during this time that Nkrumah met the Trinidadian Marxist C.L.R. James in 1943. He left America for England in 1945 where he registered to study at the London School of Economics in the doctoral program in anthropology and a degree in philosophy at University College, London where he worked with A. J. Ayer. While in England, he also met and assisted the West Indian activist George Padmore in organizing the Fifth Pan-African Congress in Manchester in 1945. He also created the West African National Secretariat to support the end of colonialism in Africa and became vice president of the West African Student Union (WASU) while in England.

In 1947, he returned to Ghana to serve as general secretary of the newly created African nationalist party the United Gold Coast Convention (UGCC). As a consummate organizer, Nkrumah was able to transform the UGCC into a mass movement by linking it with numerous local affiliate groups disenchanted with colonial rule. In February 1948, a series of riots took place in Accra and other towns involving disgruntled veterans and workers (the veterans having been initially fired upon). The British jailed several members of the UGCC, including Nkrumah, suspecting that they instigated the riots. The members of the UGCC were eventually released and Nkrumah was subsequently catapulted to national leadership as he traveled throughout the country calling for “self-government.” The Watson Commission of Enquiry was set up to investigate the riots. This commission would ultimately recommend a greater role for Africans in the governance of the country, echoing the pattern set by the Burns Constitution (1946) that granted Africans a greater role in the legislative council. The commission would go further in that a new Constitution was established by an all-African Committee and open elections were to be held. Nkrumah was disenchanted with the gradualist approach adopted by the British and would proactively continue to support self-governance for Africans.

The UGCC included a network of associations with youth groups, organized labor, and host of local interest cliques. Nkrumah used his personal contacts within the larger framework of the UGCC to establish a base of support within a vanguard party that eventually broke away from the UGCC. As a result of this split with the UGCC,

Nkrumah formed the Convention People’s Party (CPP) in 1949. Nkrumah, having gained popular support at the grassroots level, began his “self-government NOW” campaign that included a general strike. Kwame Nkrumah was jailed for his activities in 1950 but after the CPP captured nearly all of the elective seats in the legislative assembly (22, 780 of 23, 122 votes) in the elections of 1951, he was released. Nkrumah was able to develop a working relationship with the British Governor Sir Charles Arden Clarke between 1951 and 1954 that developed from a diarchy of leadership between Africans and the British to internal self-government under the leadership of Kwame Nkrumah as prime minister of Ghana by 1952. The CPP was able to gain 72 of 104 available seats in the legislature by 1954 and nearly 70 percent of the seats by 1956. Ghana became an independent republic after 1957 under the leadership of Kwame Nkrumah. Ghana was the first sub-Saharan African state to achieve independence. Nkrumah married an Egyptian, Fathia Halen Ritz, in 1957, with whom he had three children. Nkrumah would come to play an integral role in the development of Pan-Africanism after 1957 as the leader of the first independent sub-Saharan African country and come to influence other African leaders in the region. In April 1958, Nkrumah came to host the All African People's Convention, and this organization was the precursor to the creation of the Organization of African Unity. Kwame Nkrumah was declared the first president of an independent Ghana in 1960.

Kwame Nkrumah was the first prime minister and later president of Ghana, the first sub-Saharan African country to gain independence in 1957. (Library of Congress)

Kwame Nkrumah made a series of attempts to improve Ghana while serving as president. These activities included attempts to industrialize Ghana's economy, the development of an Africanized civil service, and the Volta River project created to use hydroelectric power resources. He also developed a modern military by implementing conscription and the acquisition of ships and aircraft. As a result of increased revenue from Ghana's major export crop, cocoa (world price of cocoa increased dramatically in 1954), Nkrumah moved to improve education and health services. This consisted of the building of a new university and a deep water port. Domestic tensions in Ghana did not dissipate with the leadership of Nkrumah. He introduced restrictions on civil liberties and all political opposition was severely curtailed. He used the profits from the rising cocoa prices, not to benefit the farmers, but to build up the country's infrastructure. This fostered hostilities among his former constituents. Strikes were outlawed and political opponents were jailed under the Nkrumah regime. The internal improvement projects orchestrated by Nkrumah were partially financed through foreign loans catapulting the country into great debt. Despite these internal problems, Nkrumah remained largely popular on the world stage among African people worldwide that eventually led to the creation of the Organization of African Unity in 1963. He remained committed to the idea of a united Africa throughout much of his life, as evidenced with the 16 books he wrote on the subject of African liberation.

Kwame Nkrumah played a fundamental role in shaping the independence of Ghana, West African independence movements, and in the development of Pan-African ideologies worldwide. He was not only a symbol to Africans but to African Americans as well struggling for freedom in the United States through the 1950s and 1960s. Nkrumah had significant intellectual exchanges with people of African descent interested in black liberation throughout his life across the African Diaspora from the Americas to Africa including C. L. R. James, George Padmore, and W. E. B. Du Bois. Du Bois was invited to Ghana to complete a comprehensive volume of peoples of African descent before his death in 1963. Nkrumah's reading of Marx made him a committed socialist as reflected with such works written by him as Neo-Colonialism: The Last Stage of Imperialism (1965) and African Socialism Revisited (1967). Nkrumah occupies a place in world history as an important proponent of both Pan-Africanism and African socialism. The people of West Africa were galvanized by the activism of Nkrumah, and this inspired a proliferation of liberation movements throughout Africa. In 1960s America, civil rights activists such as Stokely Carmichael were also inspired by Nkrumah as well. Carmichael changed his name to Kwame Ture (combining the name Kwame with that of Sekou Toure, president of Guinea at the time). Upon Nkrumah's overthrow in 1966, it was Sekou Toure who gave him sanctuary.

As Kwame Nkrumah adopted increasingly restrictive measures of governance; he engendered many internal and external enemies. These enemies, when apprehended, were often detained without trials. During Nkrumah's presidency, trade unions lost their autonomy, political parties organized around regional or ethnic identities were outlawed, and laws such as the Preventive Detention Act made it possible to arrest political opponents on the charge of treason without trial. The Nkrumah administration became rife with nepotism and corruption as the country fell into heavy debt. In 1964, Nkrumah declared himself life president as all political opposition was suppressed. Although the Volta Dam project opened to much fanfare in January 1966, while on a visit to Vietnam a month later, Nkrumah was overthrown in a military coup. He was exiled in Conakry, Guinea as the guest of President Sekou Toure. Toure honored Nkrumah with the title of co-president during his stay. Nkrumah continued to write while in exile completing such works as Voice from Conakry (1967) and Handbook of Revolutionary Warfare (1968). When London-based publishers refused to print his works, Nkrumah created Panaf Books in 1968. Kwame Nkrumah died of cancer on April 27, 1972 in Bucharest, Romania. Several works written by Nkrumah were published posthumously including The Struggle Continues (1973), I Speak of Freedom (1973), and Revolutionary Path (1973).

The idea of African liberation as fostered by Kwame Nkrumah has had a profound impact on the development of black-nationalist ideologies worldwide. Nkrumah was both statesman and intellectual in terms of his enduring political and intellectual contributions. His writings are seminal when considering the intellectual history of modern African resistance movements and the impact of these movements on black freedom struggles in the African Diaspora. The connections he fostered with black intellectuals were a part of a long history of exchanges across the African Diaspora in reaction to a common historicocultural experience of oppression. While the methods he used as president of Ghana will remain in great debate, his importance in the history of black liberation is not in great dispute. Several sub-Saharan African nations moved swiftly toward independence on the liberation of Ghana after 1957.

See also: African Imperialism; Du Bois, W. E. B.; Garvey, Marcus; Manchester Conference, 1945; Pan-African Congresses; Pan-Africanism

Hettie V. Williams

Bibliography

- Aldo, Ebenezer O. Kwame Nkrumah: A Case Study of Religion and Politics in Ghana. Lanham, MD: University Press of America, 1997.
- Arhin, Kwame., ed. The Life and Work of Kwame Nkrumah. Trenton, NJ: Africa World Press, 1993.
- Birmingham, David. Kwame Nkrumah: The Father of African Nationalism. Athens: Ohio University Press, 1998.
- Milne, June. Kwame Nkrumah, A Biography. London: Panaf Books, 2007.
- Nkrumah, Kwame. The Autobiography of Kwame Nkrumah. New York: Brill Academic Publishers, 1973.
- Poe, Daryl Z. Kwame Nkrumah's Contribution to Pan-African Agency: An Afrocentric Analysis. New York: Taylor & Francis, 2003.

Norton, Eleanor Holmes

Eleanor Holmes Norton (1937–), civil rights activist, lawyer, and U.S. Congresswoman, was born into an industrious educated family who instilled in her a drive for self-reliance and success. Her father, Coleman Sterling Holmes, was a member of the first graduating class of the Washington's Cardozo Business High School, the first of its kind for African Americans. His father was a firefighter and his grandfather was a fugitive slave who escaped from Virginia. Vela Lynch, her mother, was from a hard working family in North Carolina. She received a BA from Howard University in 1947 and became an educator, teaching in the D.C. public school system. Eleanor Holmes, named for first lady Eleanor Roosevelt, was born in June 13, 1937, in segregated Washington, D.C.

In 1942, Norton entered kindergarten at Bruce Monroe Elementary then attended Banneker Junior High School (now senior high school) before entering Paul Laurence Dunbar High School in 1952, the first public high school for African Americans in the country. Her leadership skills, praised throughout her adult career, were predetermined at an early age. In elementary school, she was president of the school glee club and treasurer of the student council. She was president of her class at Banneker, graduating in 1952 with honors, and with the Danforth Foundation Award, given to a junior high school graduating student with outstanding qualities. One year after the Brown v. Board of Education decision that ended separate educational facilities, Norton graduated from Dunbar's last segregated class in 1955 with a Ford Foundation scholarship.

She entered Antioch College in 1957, with plans to become a doctor. Although medical school proved difficult, it was her participation in socially conscious school organizations and an observation of mounting racial protests around the country that determined a switch from pre-med to a pre-law and history academic program. As president of the college's NAACP chapter, she organized the trip to Washington, D.C. for the Pilgrimage of Prayer and spent a summer at the Encampment for Citizenship in New York. In February 1960, the year she graduated from Antioch, the Greensboro, North Carolina sit-in at the Woolworth lunch counter by four North Carolina A&T university students prompted her participation in the picketing of segregated Geyer's restaurant and the bowling alley in nearby Xenia.

She continued to be socially active after entering law school at Yale University during the social intensity of the 1960s. While studying law and history, and teaching English and Speech at New Haven College, she helped to start a student chapter of Congress on Racial Equality (CORE). During the summer of 1963, while a member of Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee (SNCC), she negotiated the release of Fannie Lou Hamer and Lawrence Guyot who had been beaten and jailed in Winona, Mississippi.

While at Yale, she established lifelong relationships with other activists including feminist lawyer Pauli Murray. Norton received her law degree in 1964 and later that year, a friend introduced her to Edward Worthington Norton, who would later become her husband.

Having no interest in electoral politics at this point in her career, Norton's social activism of her college years carried over into her professional career. She lobbied for a black voice in the traditionally all-white Mississippi Freedom Democratic Party (MFDP) state delegation national convention. In October of 1964, she was a clerk for Judge A. Leon Higginbotham Jr., the first black district court job in Philadelphia. During the spring of 1965, she was reacquainted with Edward Norton and they married in October of that year. At the time of their marriage, he was in his final year at Columbia University Law School, so the couple made their home in New York City where she worked as a lawyer for the American Civil Liberties Union (ACLU). In the beginning, her cases dealt with antiwar and civil rights, but as the scope of civil liberties broadened with the unrest of the 1960s, her defense of First Amendment violations increased. One of her most controversial cases was the successful representation of segregationist George Wallace in his bid to speak at New York City's Shea Stadium during his run for president in 1968. It was her successful argument before the Supreme Court in 1966, which overturned a judgment that prevented the National States Rights Party from organizing a protest in Princess Ann County, Maryland, however, that brought her national attention.

In the 1970s, Norton's personal and professional life underwent several changes. On July 8, 1970, she gave birth to a daughter Katherine Felicia and to her son John Holmes on March 17, 1972. She added another specialty to her legal expertise when she began teaching one of the first women-and-the-law courses at New York University's law school. She also argued an ACLU discrimination class action suit filed by women researchers at Newsweek magazine, which broke new ground in the area of women's rights. She also coauthored with 30 other women lawyers Sex, Discrimination and the Law: Causes and Remedies (1975), the first case book on women. President Jimmy Carter appointed her the first female chair of the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission (EEOC) in 1977, which brought her back to a very changed Washington, D.C.

Rotating directors and a critical backlog of cases had labeled the EEOC as ineffective. For the next 10 years, Norton worked to turn its reputation around by first reorganizing staff and then attacking the case backlog. Civil rights issues were no longer at the forefront. In a transitional era of stiff competition for jobs by blacks and women, Norton focused her legal skills on Affirmative Action. By the time she resigned in 1981, after Carter's defeat by Ronald Reagan, she was considered one of the most influential women in America.

Norton remained busy as a lecturer and visiting professor at Berkeley and the Boalt Law School. She was later appointed professor at Georgetown University Law Center where she taught labor law, employment law, and negotiations and set up a fellowship program on women's law and public policy. She also became the voice of the Free South African Movement, participating in the sit-in at the South African Embassy. Friends encouraged her to run for the district's lone congressional seat following Walter Fauntroy's decision not to run another term. In 1990, Norton was elected along with Sharon Pratt Kelly as mayor. Her many accomplishments include the restructuring of the financial relationship between Washington and Congress, the first vote on DC statehood, and negotiating the continued residency of major government employers such as the Department of Transportation. She currently is in her eighth term as Congresswoman and continues to be awarded for her contributions to the field of law and politics.

Eleanor Holmes Norton has served five terms in the House of Representatives as the elected delegate from Washington, D.C. (U.S. House of Representatives)

See also: Congressional Black Caucus; MFDP; Student Non-violent Coordinating Committee

Donna M. Wells

Bibliography

Lester, Joan Steinau. Eleanor Holmes Norton: Fire in My Soul. New York: Atria Books, 2003.

Obama, Barack

Barack Hussein Obama is the first African American to hold the highest office in the government and was elected 44th president of the United States of America on November 4, 2008. He was born on August 4, 1961, in Honolulu, Hawaii, to his white mother, Stanley Ann Dunham from Wichita, Kansas, and his black father Barack Obama Sr. of Luo ethnicity from the Nyanza province of Kenya. They met at the University of Hawaii where they were both students and married in 1961 at a time when miscegenation was still considered illegal in many states. They divorced in 1964 after Obama Sr. left to attend Harvard. Upon graduation, he went back to Kenya and came back to visit again only once in 1971. Barack Obama Sr. died in a car accident in 1982 in Kenya.

In 1966, his mother remarried Indonesian Lolo Soetoro, whom she met as a student in Hawaii, and the family moved to Jakarta, Indonesia. After the birth of their daughter, Maya Cassandra Soetoro on August 15, 1970, Ann and Lolo separated. They divorced in 1980. In 1971, at age 10, Barack Obama returned to Hawaii and stayed with his maternal grandparents, Madelyn and Stanley Armour Dunham. His mother also moved to Hawaii from 1972 to 1975, earned her PhD, and returned to Indonesia to undertake fieldwork. She later became a program officer at the Ford Foundation. Obama decided to stay in Hawaii, where he lived with his grandparents and entered Punahou Academy from which he graduated in 1979. His mother came back to the United States in 1994, but died one year later, on November 7, 1995, at 52 from ovarian cancer.

In 1979, Barack Obama attended Occidental College in Los Angeles and after two years, transferred to Columbia University in New York where he received a BA in political science in 1983. After working at the Business International Corporation and the New York Public Interest Research Group, he moved to Chicago where he became a community organizer and worked for a church-based organization for three years with low-income residents in Roseland community and the Altgeld Gardens public housing development on the city's South Side.

Although he did not receive a religious education, in 1988 Barack Obama joined Trinity United Church of Christ and was an active member for two decades until a controversy broke out during the 2008 presidential campaign over Reverend Jeremiah Wright's sermons and comments. In 1986, he met two of his Kenyan siblings, his sister Auma, who was visiting, and later his brother Roy, who lived in the United States. In 1988, Obama went to Kenya to meet the rest of his paternal relatives in Alego, north-western Kenya.

After this trip he entered Harvard Law School and became an editor of the Harvard Law Review. He was the first African American to become president of the journal two years later, which got him a contract to write a book on race relations, published in 1995 under the title Dreams from My Father: A Story of Race and Inheritance. The audio version earned him the Grammy Award for Best Spoken Word Album in 2006. He graduated with a JD magna cum laude from Harvard in 1991. He met his wife, Michelle Robinson, in June 1989 as they were both working for the same law firm. They married on October, 3, 1992. Their first daughter, Malia Ann, was born in 1998 and the second daughter, Natasha, in 2001. He then returned to Chicago where he worked as a civil rights lawyer. In 1992, under his leadership Project Vote helped register 150,000 of 400,000 unregistered African Americans during Bill Clinton's presidential campaign. From 1992 to 2004, he taught Constitutional Law at the University of Chicago. During the same period he also worked as an attorney for a law firm specializing in civil rights litigations and neighborhood development.

He ran for the Illinois State Senate as a Democrat and was elected in 1996 from the south side neighborhood of Hyde Park and served for eight years. He served as chairman of the Public Health and Welfare Committee. He worked on a bipartisan platform to draft legislation on ethics, health care, and childhood education for the poor. He also worked on creating a state earned-income tax credit for the working poor.

Barack Obama speaks at a town hall meeting in Texas during his campaign for president in 2008. Obama, the first black man to serve as president, was sworn in as the 44th president of the United States in January 2009. (Star Image/Dreamstime)

In 1999, after three years in the Illinois State Senate, he tried to run for the First Congressional District of Illinois, challenging Bobby Rush, cofounder of the Illinois Black Panther Party and longtime congressional representative, but lost 30 percent to 61 percent in the Democratic primary in 2000. He won the Democratic primary for the U.S. Senate in 2004 with 52 percent of the vote. On July 26, 2004, he delivered the keynote at the Democratic National Convention in Boston. In November he was elected to the U.S. Senate with a landslide vote of 70 percent against 27 percent for Alan Keyes, an African American candidate. Barack Obama was the fifth African American senator and the third to be popularly elected. He sat on the Foreign Relations, Environment and Veteran Committees and opposed the war in Iraq as early as 2002. He resigned from his Senate seat on November 13, 2008.

On February 10, 2007, he announced his candidacy to the election of President of the United States of America in Springfield, Illinois, where Abraham Lincoln had delivered his “House Divided” speech in 1858. After a long race against Hillary Rodham Clinton—who endorsed him on June 7—he was the designated candidate of the Democratic party for the election of President of the United States, with Delaware Senator, Joseph Biden, as his running mate. He then started campaigning against John McCain, the Republican nominee. He was the first major candidate to turn down public financing since the creation of the system in 1976. Barack Obama won the presidency against John McCain, with 52.9 percent of the popular vote against 45.7 percent and 365 electoral votes to 173.

In 2004, he signed a contract to write three books. The first, The Audacity of Hope, published in 2006, has been at the top of the New York Times Best Seller list ever since. The second will be a children's book to be coauthored with his wife Michelle and their two daughters.

See also: Clinton, William Jefferson; Congressional Black Caucus

Veronique Helenon

Bibliography

- Kennedy-Schaffer, Alan. The Obama Revolution. New York: Phoenix Books, 2009.
- Mendell, David. Obama: From Promise to Power. New York: Harper Collins, 2008.
- Obama, Barack. Dreams from My Father: A Story of Race and Inheritance. New York: Three Rivers, 1995.
- Obama, Barack. The Audacity of Hope: Thoughts on Reclaiming the American Dream. New York: Three Rivers, 2006.

Operation PUSH

Operation PUSH (People United to Serve Humanity) was founded in 1971 by Reverend Jesse Jackson to serve as a vehicle for the promotion of progressive civil rights and political activism. The organization specifically arose out of an internal dispute within the Southern Christian Leadership Council (SCLC) between Jackson and Reverend Ralph David Abernathy. Under the auspices of SCLC, Operation Breadbasket—the predecessor to Operation Push—was founded in 1962 to address the economic struggles within African American communities. Jackson had been selected by Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. to head the Chicago chapter of SCLC's Operation Breadbasket in 1966. Within Chicago's South Side, Operation Breadbasket—under Jackson's leadership—worked to boycott white-owned businesses in order to secure jobs for African Americans and to facilitate the purchase of goods and services for African American contractors. The underlining operating principle within Operation Breadbasket and, later, Operation PUSH was black self-sufficiency and community self-determination—two seemingly black nationalists themes.

After King's assassination in 1968, Abernathy succeeded him as head of the national SCLC. Almost immediately, Abernathy and Jackson began to clash, culminating in the December 1971 suspension of Jackson from his administrative duties. Shortly after the suspension, Jackson officially broke away from SCLC—and thus Operation Breadbasket—and started Operation PUSH. Despite early financial struggles, Operation PUSH outlasted and exceeded Operation Breadbasket. By 1976, the organization launched PUSH-Excel, which was a program aimed at urban minority teenagers, emphasizing education and job placement as measures against youth violence and criminality. In addition, the organization engaged in direct-action campaigns, encouraging minority youth reading, and job creation and placement programs throughout the 1970s. Perhaps the organization's most successful campaign was encouraging major corporations in Chicago to adopt affirmative action programs that would focus on hiring more black executives and would purchase from minority businesses. By the 1980s, several highly publicized boycotts against corporations like Coca Cola, CBS, Nike, Kentucky Fried Chicken, Budweiser, and Anheuser Busch were organized in order to secure affirmative action hires and patronage for minority businesses. Operation PUSH began a slow decline, largely in connection to Jackson's bids for the Democratic Presidential nomination in 1984 and 1988.

Directly after his stint as shadow senator from 1991 to 1996, Jackson moved to merge Operation PUSH with the National Rainbow Coalition and the resulting entity—Rainbow/PUSH—combined the goals of the two organizations he previously founded. Whereas Operation PUSH focused on education, economic uplift, self-sufficiency, and job placement, the National Rainbow Coalition was a purely political organization that grew initially out of Jackson's presidential bid in 1984. During the campaign, Jackson called for a "Rainbow Coalition" of various disadvantaged peoples from a wide array of racial and ethnic backgrounds to advocate for voting rights, affirmative action, and the Great Society-type social engineering that had largely been relegated to the periphery during the Reagan years.

From 1998 to 2009, Rainbow/PUSH has been involved in a number of endeavors, from trying to increase minority involvement in NASCAR to forcing Freddie Mac to earmark more than $1 billion in mortgage loans specifically for minority home buyers. Perhaps the most significant and successful work by Rainbow/PUSH was the organization's investigations of hate crimes and its outcry and relief efforts during Hurricane Katrina and the widespread devastation it caused along the Gulf Coast.

See also: Abernathy, Ralph David; Jackson, Jesse; Southern Christian Leadership Conference

Walter C. Rucker

Bibliography

- Bruns, Roger. Jesse Jackson: A Biography. Westport, CT: Greenwood Press, 2005.
- House, Ernest R. Jesse Jackson & the Politics of Charisma: The Rise and Fall of the PUSH/Excel Program. Boulder, CO: Westview Press, 1988.
- Jackson, Jesse. A Time to Speak: The Autobiography of Reverend Jesse Jackson. New York: Simon & Schuster, 1987.

Organization of African Unity

Founded on May 25, 1963, the Organization of African Unity (OAU) ushered in a new way of addressing problems besetting the African continent. Member states, which numbered 54 until Morocco renounced its allegiance in 1984, pledged to honor each country's sovereignty and to fight for Zimbabwe's and other countries' liberation, still under colonialist rule at the time of the OAU's founding. Besides being dedicated to eradicating colonialism, the OAU's paramount objective was to obtain unity among Africa's ethnically and linguistically diverse nations. The problem was that African leaders had different strategies for obtaining this goal. Three opposing groups formed: the Casablanca group, the Monrovia group, and the Brazzaville group. Led by Ghana's Kwame Nkrumah, the Casablanca Bloc, which consisted of Ghana, Algeria, Guinea, Morocco, Egypt, Mali and Libya, called for a federation of African states; the Monrovia Bloc led by Senegal's Leopold Senghor, which comprised Nigeria, Liberia, and Ethiopia, advocated for unity through economic cooperation. Lacking the power to challenge these dominating groups, the Brazzaville bloc of former French colonies, such as Senegal, Tunisia, and Algeria, acquiesced. Even with this concession, a debate still raged regarding the best strategy for obtaining African unity. To resolve the quandary, Emperor Haile Selassie I, who became the OAU's first chairperson, invited the factions to Addis Ababa, where the OAU ultimately established its headquarters and celebrated the diplomatic unification of 32 of Africa's 54 states. Despite its lack of authority, its inability to enforce decisions, plus create an armed military unit, the OAU represented a major symbolic force on Africa's vast continent.

Notwithstanding its shortcomings, the OAU had laudable goals. OAU members wanted to ensure that all African nations received equal treatment. The body wanted all of its citizens to have proper representation before the OAU. Human rights were another issue that the OAU addressed. Violations of human rights was an issue that developed because of the myriad ways that colonial powers or the apartheid regime had infringed on the liberties of African citizens. Torture, police brutality, and draconian legislation represent some of the human rights violations that Africans endured while under the yoke of colonialism or apartheid. By resolving the human rights issues, Africans faced the possibility of lessening the economic and diplomatic stranglehold that colonial authorities or African dictatorships had over Africa's heterogeneous population. To ensure a better quality of life by obliterating poverty, the OAU wanted to raise the living standards of African nations. This included better sewage facilities, education, infrastructure improvements, food sustainability, and development. In the diplomatic arena, the OAU sought to provide its member states with a forum to settle disputes. The problem was that its members vowed not to interfere in the policymaking decisions of its sister states, creating further discord especially when civil wars erupted or ethnic genocide occurred.

Lack of enforcement coupled with a noninterference policy left Africa's contestations in the hands of outsiders, such as the United Nations (UN), which tried to resolve the refugee problem in 1964 when it established a commission on refugees. It was only four years later in 1968 that the UN achieved success, when OAU members signed an agreement to help refugees. Members also agreed to limit interstate conflicts by containing problems stemming from the refugee issue within the borders of origination. This system worked for a while. Africa's refugee problems continued to flourish as a result of ethnic wars in the Sudan and Rwanda among other places. Other problems also existed. Nigeria's Ogoni people faced neocolonialism as foreign companies, such as Shell, drilled for oil, causing environmental damage with pipes above ground and flames burning 24 hours. As leader of the Movement for the Survival of the Ogoni People (MOSOP), Ken Saro-Wiwa pleaded before his death in 1995 for OAU and UN intervention. Adherence to noninterference crippled the OAU by rendering it ineffective in resolving this ongoing dispute and extreme violation of human rights.

Throughout its 39 years of existence, the OAU also achieved some successes. It stood at the forefront of ending colonial and white minority rule. By supplying liberation movements such as South Africa's African National Congress (ANC) and Zimbabwe's African Union (ZANU) with weaponry and military training, the OAU took an active role in fulfilling one of its goals, the liberation of countries under systems of racism and oppression. As an antiapartheid activist, the OAU prevented South African planes from flying over the rest of the continent. That was not all. At the OAU's behest, South Africa was prevented from using African harbors and was expelled from the United Nations. Furthermore, in an attempt to foster economic growth and a sustainable future, the OAU established the African Development Bank in 1964. Despite these achievements, the OAU came under fierce scrutiny and criticism. OAU critics asserted that the body represented a dictator's club and that it did little to ensure the rights and liberties of its citizens. This presented a problem for a lot of reasons, namely that the OAU failed to fulfill its predetermined objectives, the unity of the continent. Seeing the inherent problems within the OAU, its last chairperson South African President Thabo Mbeki disbanded the body on July 9, 2002 and replaced it with the African Union (AU). Unlike the OAU, the AU has the authorization to engage indirect interventions into member states to help resolve conflicts and to eventually create a peacekeeping force to regulate ethnogenocide, modern slavery, and other problems that Africa faces.

See also: African Imperialism; African National Congress; Antiapartheid Movement; Nkrumah, Kwame; Pan-Africanism

Dawne Y. Curry

Bibliography

- El-Ayouty, Yassin. The Organization of African Unity After Thirty Years. Westport, CT: Praeger, 1994.
- Gilbert, Erik, and Jonathan T. Reynolds. Africa in World History: From Prehistory to the Present. Princeton, NJ: Prentice Hall, 2004.
- Harris, Gordon. Organization of African Unity. New Brunswick, NJ: Transaction Publishers, 1994.
- Naldi, Gino. The Organization of African Unity: An Analysis of Its Role. London: Mansell, 2000.
- Saro-Wiwa, Ken, and William Boyd. A Month and a Day: Detention Diary. New York: Penguin, 1996.

Organization of Afro-American Unity

The Organization of Afro-American Unity (OAAU) was founded by Malcolm X on June 28, 1964, in Harlem, New York. It was a black nationalist organization that hoped to unite African Americans to defend their civil and human rights. The OAAU advocated self-determination, self-defense, and a number of political, economic, and educational initiatives aimed at empowering African Americans. Inspired by the Organization of African Unity (which sought unity among recently decolonized African nations), the OAAU promoted Pan-African unity and viewed the U.S. black freedom struggle in a global context.

In March 1964, Malcolm X officially broke with the Nation of Islam (NOI). Personal tensions with the NOI contributed to the split, but Malcolm also wanted to take bolder action on civil rights issues. Although he started his own separate religious organization, the Muslim Mosque Inc., the formation of the OAAU represented his decisive shift toward secular political organizing. Malcolm's 1964 travels in Africa and the Middle East also shaped the OAAU. He was exposed firsthand to the anticolonial struggle and to nationalist ideology and practice. He came to view recently decolonized nations and their leaders as potential allies, and he began perceiving the African American struggle in an international framework.

The OAAU was a "nonsectarian" and "nonreligious" organization that sought unity among all African Americans fighting for civil rights. It supported the self-determination and cultural uplift of black urban communities and advocated self-defense, education, and the mobilization of African Americans' internal resources. It sponsored or planned to sponsor a wide range of activities. These included the formation of "defense units" and "rifle clubs," and political initiatives such as voter registration and the formation of political clubs. Malcolm X advocated such tactics as rent strikes and called for community control of black schools. The OAAU stressed the need for education and established a Liberation School that offered classes on history and politics, as well as consumer education, child care, and other spheres of private life. Malcolm X proposed a number of OAAU activities, including a drug rehabilitation program, a "Guardian system" for youth, and community anticrime initiatives.

The OAAU viewed the African American struggle in global terms. It saw black people in the United States as part of a global majority rather than a domestic minority, and it viewed African governments and the African Diaspora as allies. This “internationalizing” of the Civil Rights movement presented new strategic openings for the OAAU. Malcolm X began referring to “human rights” instead of “civil rights” as a goal, and he announced plans to bring the United States before the United Nations on charges of racism. He also became more critical of capitalism and began calling for a new political, economic, and social system.

During its brief existence, the OAAU held rallies in Harlem, with attendance typically between 250 and 800 when Malcolm spoke. It had a headquarters in Harlem and started a short-run newsletter, The Blacklash, with an average circulation between 200 and 300. Its membership was never more than several hundred, with a few dozen dedicated people at its core. Dues were $1, with a $2 initiation fee to join. The OAAU also established international branches in London, Paris, Ghana, Kenya, and Egypt, and it founded an Information Bureau in Ghana to exchange news on African and African American struggles.

Malcolm X was the indispensable leader of the OAAU, but he had a circle of intellectuals and professionals around him who played secondary leadership roles. Malcolm was not able to fully devote himself to the OAAU while he was alive, and his assassination undercut his plan to spend more time building the group. The OAAU was an all-black organization, although Malcolm X’s views on white alliances had shifted since his NOI days. Although still skeptical of whites and still insistent on an all-black organization that could achieve independent black power, he was more open to forming alliances with anyone who shared the OAAU’s goals.

Throughout its existence, the OAAU faced obstacles. It was under constant surveillance by the FBI and other intelligence organizations, and a leading member turned out to be a police infiltrator. Malcolm X wanted the group to be a collectively run organization, but this desire clashed with the OAAU’s dependence on Malcolm’s prestige, charisma, and leadership. Furthermore, traditional black Muslims were skeptical of the OAAU’s secular orientation, whereas some members thought Malcolm was becoming “soft” on white racism with his increased openness to working with whites. Malcolm consciously included women in leadership roles, but they still struggled with male chauvinism within the OAAU.

Malcolm X’s sister, Ella Collins, assumed control of the OAAU shortly after Malcolm’s assassination on February 21, 1965. Without Malcolm’s leadership, however, the organization quickly withered away. Still, the legacy of the OAAU as an embodiment of Malcolm X’s political and organizational thinking persisted. The OAAU offered the seeds of a radical black urban political program and international vision that African American activists in the following years would draw from.

See also: Black Nationalism; Organization of African Unity; Pan-Africanism; X, Malcolm

Derek Wolf Seidman

Bibliography

- Breitman, George. The Last Year of Malcolm X. New York: Merit Publishers, 1967.
- Sales, William W. From Civil Rights to Black Liberation: Malcolm X and the Organization of Afro-American Unity. Boston: South End Press, 1994.

Owens, Jesse

James Cleveland “Jesse” Owens (1913–1980) was the first American track-and-field athlete to win four gold medals in a single Olympic competition. In three events, he also set records. Yet, he is best remembered as the black athlete who triumphed in Berlin in 1936, while Nazi Chancellor Adolf Hitler, who believed in the irrefutable superiority of the Aryan nation, looked on.

Owens was born on September 12, 1913, in Oakville, Alabama, the youngest child of Henry Cleveland Owens, a sharecropper, and Mary Emma (née Fitzpatrick). The family moved to Cleveland, Ohio, most likely in 1922; one story says that, when Owens started school there, he introduced himself as J. C. (James Cleveland). His teacher, though, heard those sounds as “Jesse.”

After Charles Riley, his gym teacher at Fairmount Junior High, watched Owens run, he invited him to train with the track team; Owens quickly began breaking records. As a senior at Cleveland East Technical High School, he tied the 100-yard dash world record (9.4 seconds) at the Interscholastic Championships in Chicago. He set other records there, including in the 220-yard dash (20.7 seconds), and the long jump (24 feet, 9-5/8 inches). Reports of his success nearly always mentioned his race; he was called, among other descriptors, “saddle-colored,” or the “streak of ebony.”

Owens was recruited by several colleges, but he chose Ohio State University. Because scholarships were not available, he worked part-time jobs to pay for his tuition. Because of the segregated nature of American society, he stayed in housing apart from white teammates and ate in different places. They also traveled separately.

On May 25, 1935, Owens broke three world records and tied another, all within the span of one hour: 220-yard sprint (20.3 seconds), long jump (26 feet, 8-1/4 inches), 220-yard low hurdles (22.6 seconds), and the 100-yard dash (9.4 seconds). On July 5, 1935, he married Minnie Ruth Solomon, the mother of his three-year-old daughter, Gloria. They later had two more daughters: Beverly and Marlene. A year later, Owens qualified for the Olympic team, but because Hitler had revoked the citizenship of German Jews, the American Olympic Committee considered boycotting the 1936 Olympiad XI. Meanwhile, the Negro press was comparing Hitler’s treatment of Jews to how blacks were treated in the United States; these journalists debated whether a black person should refuse to compete, regardless of official decisions.

The Olympic boycott, however, did not happen, and Owens did compete, tying the world record in the 100-meter dash (10.3 seconds), setting an Olympic record in the long jump (26 feet 5-1/4 inches) and in the 200-meter sprint (20.7 seconds), and participating in the world record-setting 400-meter relay (39.8 seconds). All of these records remained unbroken until the late 1940s; the long jump record was held until 1960.

Hitler did not shake Owens’s hand after his victories; it was later described as a snub, but German officials claimed that a decision was made to stop congratulating athletes, for fear of missing someone. Hitler had particular reason to despise Owens; the runner scored 40 points, about two-thirds of the score of the entire male track team from Germany.

After the games, Owens decided not to return to Ohio State. He wanted to race professionally and make public appearances. After opportunities became less available, though, he could not return to amateur racing status, being suspended after choosing professional venues. He therefore participated in more moneymaking ventures, one of which led him to bankruptcy court. He also raced against horses before Negro League baseball games.

Jesse Owens at the start of his record-breaking 200 meter race at the 1936 Olympic Games in Berlin. The grandson of a slave, Owens won four gold medals in track and field at the summer games. (Library of Congress)

In 1953, Owens was appointed secretary of the Illinois State Athletic Commission. He formed his own public relations agency and presented lectures to schools and other groups. He toured India, Singapore, Malaysia, and the Philippines for the U.S. Department of State; and, in 1956, President Dwight Eisenhower asked him to serve as one of the country’s representatives at the Olympic Games in Australia. During the 1960s, he endorsed products and worked as running coach for the New York Mets.

Ohio State awarded Owens an honorary Doctorate of Athletic Arts degree in 1972. In 1976, President Gerald Ford honored him with the Medal of Freedom, the highest honor an American civilian can receive. In 1979, Jimmy Carter decorated him with the Living Legend Award. Carter also offered a tribute when Jesse Owens died from cancer on March 31, 1980, at the age of 66: “Perhaps,” Carter said, “no athlete better symbolized the human struggle against tyranny, poverty and racial bigotry. His personal triumphs as a world-class athlete and record holder were the prelude to a career devoted to helping others. His work with young athletes, as an unofficial ambassador overseas, and a spokesman for freedom are a rich legacy to his fellow Americans.”

After his death, his widow continued to operate the Jesse Owens Foundation, which provides financial assistance to youth. In 1982, the road leading to the Berlin stadium where Owens ran was renamed “Jesse Owens Allee;” members of his family attended the ceremony. In 1990, George Bush presented Ruth Owens with the Congressional Gold Medal in honor of her husband’s accomplishments; in 2001, Ohio State University completed the Jesse Owens Memorial Stadium.

See also: 1936 Summer Olympics, Berlin; Black Athletes

Kelly Boyer Sagert

Bibliography

- Baker, William J. Jesse Owens: An American Life. New York: The Free Press, 1986.
- Owens, Jesse. The Jesse Owens Story. New York: G. P. Putnam’s Sons, 1970.
- Owens, Jesse, with Paul G. Neimark. Blackthink: My Life as Black Man and White Man. New York: William Morrow, 1970.

Pan-African Congresses

The Pan-African Congresses were a series of five international conferences that took place between 1919 and 1945. These meetings contributed to the articulation of Pan-African ideas and represented an important part of the Pan-African movement. The congresses offered a forum for the discussion of Pan-Africanism. Their objectives were to foster unity among peoples of African descent and to encourage the creation of an institutional framework that could support the development of a strong Pan-African movement. Despite many attempts to establish a stable organizational apparatus, the different congresses reflect a failure to coordinate the goals and ideals of a diverse group of peoples. Lacking an institutionalized tradition, many of the shortcomings and achievements of the congresses were dependent on individual figures. The most important was W. E. B. Du Bois who provided intellectual continuity and logistical support to the first four congresses, and contributed to the establishment of a tradition that would serve as a model for the fifth Pan-African Congress.

During the 19th century, African peoples faced the threat of the growing colonial ambitions of European nations, and black peoples in the United States and the West Indies had to deal with discrimination and economic exploitation. These circumstances contributed to the growth of Pan-African ideas. These generally stated that peoples of African descent throughout the world shared a common cultural heritage and the historical experience of exploitation and inequality. Pan-Africanism developed as a body of ideas and movements that advocated for solidarity among peoples of African descent and asserted their rights for social, political, and economic equality.

Before 1919, there were meetings that already announced the emergence of different Pan-African ideologies. In 1893, there was a Congress on Africa in Chicago. At this meeting representatives from Africa and the Americas discussed issues related to the political rights of black peoples. In 1900, the recently created African Association sponsored the organization of a Pan-African Conference in London. Thirty-two delegates from Africa, the United States, and the West Indies attended this event. The Conference produced a document called “To the Nations of the World” that condemned racism and the exploitation of peoples of African descent. As a result of the conference, the African Association became the first Pan-African Association. The association planned to organize a meeting every two years; its purpose was to provide continuity to the movement and promote its growth. The association, however, was short-lived. Plagued with internal conflicts and financial instability, it would soon disappear. Despite these shortcomings, this first Pan-African Conference and the Pan-African Association were important on a symbolic level. They contributed to the articulation of a notion of Pan-Africanism that would influence future generations of activists and intellectuals.

Between 1900 and 1919, social and political changes affected the development of the Pan-African movement. The ideals of democracy and equality started to become popular among peoples throughout the globe, and the educated elements of societies that lived under oppressive conditions started to achieve economic and political strength. These changes were evident in the emergence of nationalist ideas in parts of West Africa and South Africa, and in the tensions that developed in the United States that would later result in the Civil Rights movement. An important result of these changes was the emergence of W. E. B. Du Bois, one of the most important ideologues of the Pan-African movement.

Among many other things, W. E. B. Du Bois was a pioneer in the study of the history and sociology of African Americans in the United States, and one of the most articulate critics of racial inequality. Although the origins of Pan-African ideas go back to the 18th and 19th century, Du Bois has been credited with the articulation of the notion of Pan-Africanism as the belief that all peoples of African descent share a common heritage and should unite to fight against discrimination and racial injustice. He contributed to the creation of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP), a group that supported the organization of the first two Pan-African Congresses.

It was the NAACP that sent Du Bois to Paris in 1919. He was sent to investigate allegations of mistreatment of black soldiers in the U.S. Army who were stationed in France. He was also charged with representing African interests in the peace conference that was about to take place. While in Paris, Du Bois organized the first Pan-African Congress with the objective of voicing the needs of African peoples on the eve of the Paris Peace Conference.

A total of 57 delegates representing 15 countries attended the Congress. Du Bois outlined an agenda that included an assessment of the conditions that affected black peoples and the articulation of their demands. Among the requests of the Congress were the administration by the Allies of the former German colonies in Africa as a condominium, the improvement of living conditions (abolition of slavery, corporal punishment and forced labor, general access to education), the inclusion of Africans in the government of their own countries as soon as their level of development allowed for it, and the granting of self-rule to Africa at some point in the future.

When compared with the demands of the 1900 London Congress, the requests of the Paris Congress were relatively moderate. From an organizational point of view, the achievements of the Paris Conference were also modest compared with those of London, as no permanent organization was created as a result of the Congress.

The second Pan-African Congress took place at different sessions in London, Paris, and Brussels in 1921. In total, 110 delegates attended the Congress and more than 1,000 visitors were present at the event. There were 41 delegates from the United States, 7 from the West Indies, and 24 from Africa and Afro-Americans living in Europe. The resolutions passed at this congress were more radical than those approved in Paris. The congress produced a document entitled "Declaration to the World," which is also known as the London Manifesto. The final resolutions fully supported the principles of racial equality and self-government, without taking into consideration differences in the level of development of various societies. In this regard, the 1921 congress returned to the tradition initiated in 1900. More specifically, the manifesto was divided in four parts. The first one was a general critique of the relations between black and white peoples. The second part focused primarily on condemning the policies of the major colonial powers. The third section demanded that the sovereignty of the governments of Abyssinia, Liberia, and Haiti was respected. Finally, the congress issued a general challenge to the rest of the world.

During the second congress, differences started to emerge among various groups that represented diverse approaches to Pan-African ideas. Some delegates from the French-speaking African territories disagreed with the hard criticism levied against French and Belgian colonial policy. Blaise Diagne, who had been instrumental in the organization of the first Pan-African Congress, was among those who thought that the language of the resolutions was too radical. Even though he was African, he was in effect a French politician as a representative of Senegal in the French Chamber of Deputies. He found the declaration too extreme and abandoned the movement.

Another conflict emerged between the followers of Marcus Garvey and Du Bois. Garvey was a Jamaican activist who traveled in South America and Europe and was in contact with important African American activists such as Booker T. Washington. Washington himself had been in conflict with Du Bois over their different views about education for African Americans. Garvey founded the Universal Negro Improvement and Conservation Association and African Communities League, better known as the Universal Negro Improvement Association (UNIA) in 1914. The objectives of this association included the creation of a confraternity among black peoples, the promotion of race pride, and the development of independent Negro nations. Garvey traveled to the United States in 1916, when Harlem was in the process of becoming an important African American area. There he found fertile ground for his ideas. In New York, Garvey started a New York branch of the UNIA and founded a number of short-lived publications of which the Negro World became the most important vehicle for spreading his ideas.

Garvey created a number of subordinate organizations geared at putting in practice his Pan-African ideas. UNIA organized annual conventions that were celebrated in Harlem. These meetings were well attended and rivaled the congresses organized by Du Bois. They openly demanded the liberation of African peoples. This direct approach conflicted with the more gradualist attitude that characterized the Pan-African congresses, and became the main reason for the strong clash between Garvey and Du Bois.

Du Bois agreed with the aims of Garvey; however, he did not approve of his methods. Garvey's approach, together with his slogan "Africa for the Africans" was condemned in Brussels and Paris. After bitter discussion it was decided that Garvey would not be invited to the next congress.

Despite the problems that plagued the second congress, delegates agreed to create a second Pan-African Association. The presidency was given to Gratien Candace, a Guadeloupe-born intellectual and politician, and the general secretary was Isaac Béton, a young schoolmaster from Martinique. In practice, the association was in the hands of the individual figures of Du Bois and Béton, which undermined its capacity to achieve institutional strength. It was poorly financed and the tensions between the Anglophone and Francophone sections of the organization were a continuous obstacle. Despite the many disputes that plagued the association, a third Pan-African Congress was organized, mostly as a result of the efforts of Du Bois.

The third Pan-African Congress met in 1923 in London and Lisbon. It was badly organized and poorly attended. Only 11 countries were represented and the majority of the delegates were from the United States. As a consequence, the activities of the congress were more modest than the previous ones. Delegates decided to promote the creation of Pan-African committees, and they issued a statement in which they identified some fundamental needs of peoples of African descent. Among the things discussed were the right of Africans to participate in their own government, the need to make education available at all levels, access to land and other economic resources, and the abolition of slave trade. The resolutions also mentioned more specific demands such as home rule and responsible government for West Africa and British West Indies; the abolition of white minority rule in Kenya, Rhodesia, and South Africa; and the elimination of lynching and mob laws in the United States.

The limitations of the Pan-African Association prevented it from organizing a Pan-African meeting in 1925. Despite the many difficulties, Du Bois continued to work for the growth and development of the Pan-African movement. His efforts resulted in the organization of the fourth Pan-African Congress in New York in 1927. The congress took place from August 21–24. It was attended by 208 delegates from 11 countries. The American contingent was the largest; Africans were scarcely represented, with a few delegates from Liberia, Sierra Leone, and the Gold Coast. Other countries represented were Haiti, the Virgin Islands, the Bahamas, Barbados, and South America. There were also some non-African attendees, including the renowned anthropologist Melville Herskovits. The resolutions of this congress echoed the ones agreed on at the previous congress.

After the fourth congress, Du Bois decided that it was time to take the Pan-African congress to the African continent. Given the logistical problems of the movement and the economic crisis that surged in 1929, however, these plans were thwarted. The economic and political problems that affected most of the world during the 1930s interrupted the development of the Pan-African congresses. The movement, however, continued to evolve.

The congresses that took place between 1919 and 1927 were unsuccessful in achieving the goals of African liberation and racial equality. They also failed to provide a strong organizational framework for the development of the Pan-African movement. Du Bois had provided the intellectual foundations to the movement and much of the logistical work. Despite these limitations, these congresses were important in sowing the seeds of Pan-Africanism. They introduced Pan-African ideas to an international audience and fostered both debate and unity among peoples of African descent on both sides of the Atlantic Ocean. In doing this they provided direction and guidance to those who revitalized the Pan-African movement after World War II.

The Abyssinian crisis of 1935 and the end of World War II contributed to the reemergence of the Pan-African movement. Numerous organizations were created to condemn the Italian invasion of Ethiopia and to offer support to the Ethiopian peoples and royal family. The crisis raised serious questions about the ability of the League of Nations to safeguard the rights of African peoples. Moreover, it cast serious doubts on the commitment of European states to protect African interests.

The end of World War II brought to the front difficult questions for European colonial powers. Having fought in the name of freedom and equality, Allies would face growing discontent in their colonies and increasing demands for political participation and social and economic development. The Atlantic Charter signed in 1941 stated the right to self-determination and gave legitimacy to the aspirations of millions of peoples throughout the world who lived under colonial control. European powers, however, were unwilling to extend these rights to their colonial subjects, at least not before they had been properly prepared. This was an unacceptable state of affairs for people who had contributed heavily to the cause of the Allies during the war and whose ambitions for independence had become quite evident in the growth of mass nationalist movements in many parts of Africa.

The hypocritical attitude of colonial governments strengthened the conviction of many organizations that had emerged in Europe and Africa, and the quest for the political liberation of Africa became the galvanizing force behind the creation of the Pan-African Federation (PAF) in 1944. This organization was composed of numerous political and labor groups. It served to canalize their demands and helped articulate their objectives. Their goals were to promote the well-being and unity of African peoples and to foster collaboration with peoples who share the aspirations of peoples of African descent. The organization was located in Manchester. It planned to fulfill its mission by creating centers devoted to the study of African history and culture, by sponsoring the publication of materials about Africa, and by organizing international conferences to promote the ideals of African freedom. The PAF proved to be an effective platform for the opposition to colonial rule in that it allowed member organizations to communicate more effectively with other groups and organize demonstrations, approve resolutions, and collect financial aid more efficiently.

The PAF was behind the organization of the fifth Pan-African congress that took place in Manchester in 1945. It had been originally proposed by in a meeting of the World Federation of Trade Unions that met in London earlier that year. The interest shown by various organizations allowed the PAF to make quick arrangements. Some of the organizers were Peter Milliard, George Padmore, Kwame Nkrumah, Jomo Kenyatta, and Peter Abrahams. The Congress opened on October 15. For the first time Africa was adequately represented. Many of those who attended went on to become important figures in their countries such as Obafemi Awolowo, Dr. Hastings Banda, and Joe Appiah. All the organizations that formed the PAF were represented, as well as numerous political and cultural organizations and trade unions. Other groups represented were the Federation of Indian Organizations and the Independent Labor Party of Britain. Despite the large attendance there were significant absences. There were no representatives from Haiti, the French Caribbean, Francophone Africa, Ethiopia, Portuguese Africa, the Belgian Congo, and Muslim North Africa.

The Manchester congress issued an unequivocal condemnation of colonialism and racial discrimination. Among the specific demands were immediate independence for African colonies, removal of British armed forces from Egypt, support for the struggle of African peoples in South Africa, full citizenship for peoples of African descent in the United States, and equal access to social and economic opportunity to all African peoples. The Manchester congress represented a comprehensive challenge to colonial ideology and racist practices founded in the principles presented in the Atlantic Charter.

This fifth Congress also marked a significant shift in the focus and direction of the Pan-African movement. Although it followed the intellectual tradition instituted by previous congresses, this meeting was clearly dominated by the issue of African political liberation. For the first time, Africans took center stage and adopted positions of leadership. Most important, the congress became a true vehicle for political pressure, as it incorporated trade unions and other popular organizations that provided added strength to their demands. In the end the congress combined the intellectual traditions of the past with the force of the masses.

The congress was instrumental in bringing together the ideas of Pan-Africanism and the strength of African nationalisms. It set the foundations for further cooperation among African states. The independence of Ghana helped pave the way for this collaboration. After the congress the PAF set up a committee presided by Du Bois and Kwame Nkrumah and it was decided that the headquarters of the Pan-African Congress would stay in London.

Although the values and ideas of Pan-Africanism continued to be important in the postindependence period, no more congresses were organized. The Pan-African movement became more focused on the issue of political and economic unity between African states, and the emphasis on solidarity with peoples of African descent became secondary.

See also: African Imperialism; Du Bois, W. E. B.; Garvey, Marcus; Kenyatta, Jomo; Manchester Conference, 1945; Nkrumah, Kwame; Pan-Africanism

Esperanza Brizuela-Garcia

Bibliography

- Du Bois, W. E. B. The World and Africa; An Inquiry into the Part Which Africa Has Played in World History. New York: International Publishers, 1965.
- Esedebe, P. Olanwuche. Pan-Africanism. The Idea and Movement, 1776–1963. Washington, D.C.: Howard University Press, 1982.
- Geiss, Imanuel. The Pan African Movement. A History of Pan Africanism in America, Europe and Africa. New York: Africana Publishing, 1974.
- Muchie, M. The Making of Africa-nation: Pan Africanism and the African Renaissance. London: Adonis and Abbey Publishers, 2003.
- Padmore, George. Pan Africanism or Communism. New York: Doubleday, 1971.

Pan-Africanism

Pan-Africanism is an ideology that states that peoples of African descent share a common cultural and historical heritage. Pan-African ideas have been the foundation of political and intellectual movements that historically have advocated for one or more of the following principles: Africa as the homeland of all peoples of African descent, the existence of a distinct African personality, the assertion of Africa's pride in its past as well as its culture, the right of all peoples of African descent to self-determination and economic advancement, political and economic unity.

Pan-African ideas first originated among African Americans in North America and the West Indies. The lack of political freedoms and economic opportunities that characterized the life of blacks in much of the Americas contributed to the emergence of ideas of unity, solidarity, and resistance among African American peoples.

During the 18th and 19th centuries people of African descent took different actions to assert their rights and improve their quality of life. These responses were important factors that influenced the emergence of Pan-African movements. Among the most important were movements that promoted the return of free blacks to Africa. The best example of this was the emigration schemes organized by the American Colonization Society that relocated 13,000 Africans in Liberia between 1817 and 1857.

During the 19th century the contacts between Europeans and Africans increased. Debates over the abolition of the slave trade and slavery revealed a widely held racist attitude toward people of African descent. This became the justification of European nations for their growing intervention in African affairs, as well as for the mistreatment of blacks in the Americas. Faced with these situations, African, African American, and West Indian intellectuals started to formulate ideas that asserted the value of African cultures and societies. Among those who produced early writings were J. A. B. Horton, Edward W. Blyden, and the Reverend James Johnson.

In 1897, Sylvester Williams, a barrister from Trinidad, created the African Association. The objectives of the organization were to lobby the British parliament and government and to inform the public about the issues that affected the lives of African peoples. The headquarters for the association were in London, and membership was restricted to Africans and African Americans. From its inception, Williams hoped the association would sponsor international conferences where delegates from different areas of the world could discuss the issues that affected black peoples.

The first Pan-African Conference took place in 1900. In all 32 delegates from the United States, the West Indies, and Africa attended it. During the conference the delegates petitioned for the improvement of the political and social conditions that affected the lives of Africans living under colonial regimes. They also produced a document called "To the Nations of the World" in which they condemned the use of racist ideas to justify the exploitation of African people.

The first Pan-African Conference provided a formal forum for the discussion of Pan-African ideas and marked the beginning of a more distinct, if yet diverse, Pan-African movement. An example of this was the transformation of the African Association into the Pan-African Association.

The original plans were to organize a meeting every two years to provide continuity and growth to the Pan-African movement. The first meetings were to take place in the United States in 1902 and in Haiti in 1904. The association also published a newspaper, Pan-African. This was edited by Sylvester Williams and was published monthly.

The association was short-lived because of internal conflicts and financial instability. The next Pan-African Conference took place in 1919. The years that led to it were marked by social, political, and economic changes that had a significant impact on the ideology and movement of Pan-Africanism. The spread of democratic ideas had started to reach people who lived under all kinds of oppressive conditions, and the educated elites in many of these societies were becoming economically and sometimes even politically powerful. These changes can be appreciated in the emergence of nationalist ideas in areas of West Africa and South Africa. This period also saw the emergence of tensions in the United States that would give way to the Civil Rights movement years later. From these emerged one of the most important ideologues of the Pan-African movement, W. E. B. Du Bois.

Among many other things, W. E. B. Du Bois was a pioneer in the study of history and sociology of African Americans in the United States, and one of the most articulate critics of racial inequality. He had attended the 1900 London Conference and has been credited as the first to articulate some of the fundamental principles of Pan-Africanism.

Before 1919, Pan-African ideas continued to be discussed in different forums. For example, in 1911 there was a Universal Races Congress that was aimed at improving relationships among people of different races. The congress was organized by the International Union of Ethical Societies and attracted a significant number of participants from different areas of the world. In 1912, the ideological rival of Du Bois, Booker T. Washington, organized the International Conference on the Negro. This conference was aimed at examining the education methods that were being used in the United States to improve the lives of black people and to explore the possibility of applying such methods in Africa and the West Indies.

These meetings helped promote Pan-African ideas and influenced individuals who made significant contributions to the growth of the movement. A good example of this was Mohamed Ali Duse, an Egyptian man who lived in England and attended the Universal Races Congress. He launched the African Times and Orient Review, a publication aimed at providing accurate information about Africans and peoples of African descent. This journal contributed to the dissemination of Pan-African ideas that would become important in the definition of the Pan-African movement after World War I.

The Pan-African movement was reinvigorated after World War I when Du Bois called for a meeting in Paris in 1919. The objectives of this Pan-African Congress were to examine the situation of black people; identify their social, political, and economic needs; and articulate their demands of development and equality. A total of 57 delegates representing 15 countries attended the Congress. The resolutions passed demanded that the recently created League of Nations looked after the welfare of African peoples and requested that Africans be allowed to participate in their own government.

The Second Pan-African Congress was celebrated in London, Paris, and Brussels in 1921. A total of 110 delegates attended. The resolutions passed at this congress may be found in the document "Declaration to the World," which came to be known as the "London Manifesto." The resolutions called for racial equality and self-government. The radical tone of the document caused debates among the delegates, some of whom were in favor of a less confrontational approach to the issue of decolonization.

The congress also succeeded in creating a new Pan-African Association. The leaders of this organization were Du Bois and Isaac Béton, a schoolmaster from Martinique. The association was poorly financed and deeply divided, however, and it failed to provide continuity to the Pan-African movement.

A third Pan-African Congress was organized despite the problems of the Pan-African Association and thanks to the indefatigable work of Du Bois. It met in 1923 in Lisbon and London; however, the organization and the attendance were poor. Only 11 countries were represented and, as usual, African Americans dominated the congress.

The activities of this congress were more modest than previous ones. Delegates issued a statement in which they identified some fundamental needs of African peoples such as political participation, access to land and other economic resources, and education at all levels. They also demanded home rule and responsible government for West Africa and British West India; the abolition of white minority rule in Kenya, Rhodesia, and South Africa; and the suppression of lynching and mob laws in the United States.

Because of the failure of the Pan-African Association to resolve its internal conflicts and establish a strong organizational structure, no congress was held in 1925. Despite these difficulties Du Bois continued to push for the growth of the Pan-African movement. He managed to organize a fourth Pan-African congress in New York, in 1927. A total of 208 delegates from 11 countries participated in this meeting. African Americans continued to dominate the event. Africans were scarcely represented, with a few delegates from Liberia, Sierra Leone, and the Gold Coast. The resolutions of this congress echoed those formulated in the previous meeting.

After the fourth congress, Du Bois decided to hold the next congress on African soil. Given the organizational weakness of the movement and the economic crisis that developed in 1929, however, it became impossible to organize this event. The next Pan-African Congress would have to wait until the end of World War II.

While Du Bois promoted his views on Pan-Africanism through these congresses, other important movements were also influenced by Pan-African ideas. Marcus Aurelius Garvey, a Jamaican-born activist, developed an alternative approach to Pan-Africanism. Garvey traveled in South America and Europe, was in contact with Mohammed Ali Duse, and was influenced by the writings of authors such as Booker T. Washington. In 1914, he created the Universal Negro Improvement and Conservation Association and African Communities League, generally known as the Universal Negro Improvement Association (UNIA). The objectives of this association included the creation of a confraternity among black peoples, the promotion of race pride, and the development of independent Negro nations. Garvey traveled to the United States in 1916 when Harlem was in the process of becoming an important African American area. There he found fertile ground for his ideas. In New York Garvey started a branch of the UNIA and founded a number of short-lived publications, of which the Negro World became the most important vehicle for spreading his ideas.

Garvey created a number of subordinate organizations geared at putting in practice his Pan-African ideas. UNIA organized annual conventions that were celebrated in Harlem. These meetings were well attended and rivaled the congresses organized by Du Bois. They openly demanded the liberation of African peoples. This direct approach conflicted with the more gradualist attitude that characterized the Pan-African congresses and became the main reason for the strong clash between Garvey and Du Bois.

Garvey's quest for the liberation of Africa encouraged him to establish concrete connections to the continent. In 1920, he sent a delegation to Liberia to explore the possibilities of settling Afro-Americans in that country. The plan seemed to be well received at first, but soon conflicts with the local Liberian authorities and the opposition of colonial powers, as well as the United States, prevented Garvey from settling in Liberia.

Garvey also faced a crisis back in the United States where he was accused of mismanagement and fraud. Garvey was arrested and later sent to prison. His wife continued with the organization of UNIA as much as she could and the conventions continued to be held. In 1927, Garvey was pardoned and expelled from the United States after which he returned to Jamaica and tried to reorganize his movement. He traveled to the West Indies and Europe where he had mixed receptions. In 1930, the section of UNIA in the United States finally collapsed. The Negro World continued to be published until 1933. He died in 1940 after multiple and failed attempts to reorganize his movement and clear his name.

Garvey represented a radical approach to Pan-Africanism. His unequivocal demands for African liberation injected his views on racial equality and pride with new energy and made them more appealing to a large number of black people.

Between the two wars, there were other organizations that promoted Pan-African ideas. Among the most important were the National Congress of British West Africa (NCBWA) and the West African Students Union (WASU), both based in London. Some pressure groups were also formed by exiles in France. Some were the Ligue Universelle pour la défense de la race noire, the Comité de la défense de la Race Negre, and the Ligue de la défense de la Race Negre. Most of these advocated for the rights of black people to education and economic development and challenged the notions of inferiority of the black race.

Between 1934 and 1945, several Pan-African groups in England started to move closer together and become better defined and organized. Two wings became dominant: a "conservative Pan-Africanism represented by the Jamaican Harold Moody and his organization, the League of Colored Peoples (LCP), and a more radical Pan-Africanism represented by George Padmore.

The LCP was created in 1931. Moody arrived in Britain in 1904 and developed an ideology of Pan-Africanism that was mitigated by his strong Christian beliefs. Moody believed in the importance of working with Europeans to improve the lives of Africans and West Indians. He worked mainly with religious groups. At first the LCP was not a political organization; however, the Abyssinian invasion and German aspirations to regain control of their lost colonies turned the meetings of the LCP into forums for the discussion of such issues.

At the other end of the spectrum was George Padmore, whose real name was Malcolm Ivan Nurse. He was born in Trinidad to a middle class family and claimed to be the nephew of Sylvester Williams. He had studied in the United States and had been a member of the Communist Party. His approach to the issue of African liberation was more radical than that of Moody. He actively participated in the creation and running of several organizations that advocated for the political rights of African peoples and helped reinvigorate and redefine the postwar Pan-African movement.

The Abyssinian crisis (1935) was a galvanizing moment for the Pan-African movement. It called into question the ability of the League of Nations and the commitment of European powers to safeguard the interests of African peoples. The end of World War II and the signing of the Atlantic Charter in 1941 marked the beginning of a new understanding of the right to freedom and self-determination. African people were aware of the significance of this moment and increased their demands for independence. This culminated in the creation, in 1944, of the Pan-African Federation (PAF) under the initiative of a number of African organizations.

The PAF, with its headquarters in Manchester, served to articulate the demands of the various groups that composed it. It advocated for the welfare and unity of African people and people of African descent. It planned to fulfill its mission by promoting the study of Africa and organizing conferences. The PAF proved to be an effective platform for the opposition to colonial rule, as it enabled member organizations to operate more efficiently.

The PAF organized the fifth Pan-African Congress, which took place in Manchester in 1945. For the first time Africa was adequately represented, and many of those who attended became political leaders in their own soon-to-be-independent nations. All the organizations that formed PAF were represented, as well as numerous political and cultural organizations and trade unions.

Delegates at the Manchester Congress unequivocally condemned colonialism and racial discrimination. Among other things they demanded immediate independence for African territories, removal of British armed forces from Egypt, support for the struggle of African people in South Africa, and full citizenship for the people of African descent in the Americas. The congress successfully articulated the political aspirations of African people and served as a catalyst for the growth of the nationalist movements that achieved independence for many African states.

African nationalist leaders took center stage at the Manchester Congress. They reinforced the Pan-African movement by combining the influence of elites and intellectuals with the strength of the masses. In doing so they produced a shift in the focus and nature of the Pan-African movement.

The focus of the Pan-African movement after the Manchester Congress gave great importance to the issue of African unity. In 1958, Kwame Nkrumah, the leader of Ghana, organized a meeting of independent African states in the Ghanaian capital of Accra. The countries represented were Egypt, Ethiopia, Ghana, Liberia, Libya, Morocco, Sudan, and Tunisia. This was the first step in a process toward African unity that would be plagued with problems and controversy. Some nations favored immediate political unity, but others advocated for a more gradual approach. This resulted in the creation of two camps, the Casablanca group and the Monrovia Group.

After numerous meetings where the differences between the two groups were further debated, the Pan-African ideals took the form of the Organization of African Unity (OAU), in May 1963 in Addis Ababa. The organization was originally formed by 32 governments. Gradually, 21 more states joined this group. South Africa became the 53rd member in 1994. The objectives of the OAU were to promote solidarity and unity among African people; coordinate cooperation; improve the lives of common people; defend sovereignty, territorial integrity, and independence; eradicate colonialism; and promote international cooperation. The OAU has faced the numerous political and economic crises that have affected the African continent in the postcolonial era. After many failures to pursue the objectives for which it was created, it was agreed that a new organization was needed.

In a meeting in 1999 called to amend the OAU charter, the delegates in attendance decided to establish the African Union. Among the objectives of the new organization are to accelerate the political and socioeconomic integration of the continent; promote peace, security, and stability; promote democratic principles and institutions; and foster sustainable development in all areas of human endeavor. The objectives of the African Union reflect the social and political changes experienced by African people in the postcolonial period. To that extent, this new organization reflects the evolving values of modern Pan-Africanism.

See also: Du Bois, W. E. B.; Garvey, Marcus; Manchester Conference, 1945; Nkrumah, Kwame; Organization of African Unity; Pan-African Congresses

Esperanza Brizuela-Garcia

Bibliography

- Bandele, Ramla M. Black Star: African American Activism in the International Political Economy. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 2008.
- Esedebe, P. Olisanwuche. Pan-Africanism. The Idea and Movement, 1776–1963. Washington, D.C.: Howard University Press, 1982.
- Geiss, Imanuel. The Pan African Movement. A History of Pan Africanism in America, Europe and Africa. New York: Africana Publishing, 1974.
- Moses, Wilson Jeremiah. Classical Black Nationalism: From the American Revolution to Marcus Garvey. New York: New York University Press, 1996.
- Muchie, M. The Making of Africa-nation: Pan Africanism and the African Renaissance. London: Adonis and Abbey Publishers, 2003.
- Padmore, George. Pan Africanism or Communism. New York: Doubleday, 1971.

Parks, Rosa

On December 1, 1955, Rosa Louise Parks (1913–2005) refused to give up her seat on a Montgomery, Alabama, bus for a white passenger. This act of defiance against Jim Crow segregation sparked the Montgomery bus boycott—often heralded as the beginning of the modern Civil Rights movement—a nonviolent economic boycott of Montgomery's bus system by the black community that successfully ended racial segregation on the city's public transit. For her courage and actions, Parks is widely considered the mother of the Civil Rights movement.

Rosa Louise McCauley was born on February 4, 1913, in Tuskegee, Alabama, to James and Leona McCauley. After James and Leona separated, Leona moved with her children, Rosa and Sylvester, to Pine Level, Alabama, a town on the outskirts of Montgomery where they lived with Leona's parents. By the age of 11, Rosa attended the Montgomery Industrial School for Girls, and a few years later, she attended the laboratory school at Alabama State Teacher's College for Negroes in Montgomery. Family illnesses forced Rosa to abandon her education to support her family.

While living in Montgomery, 18-year-old Rosa met Raymond Parks, a barber. The self-educated Parks had been one of the charter members of Montgomery's NAACP and had been actively involved in supporting the Scottsboro Boys' defense in the early 1930s. Parks's courage, at a time when black activism was extremely dangerous, deeply impressed Rosa. They were married on December 18, 1932, in Pine Level. Historian and Parks's biographer Douglas Brinkley has noted that her husband was a significant factor in her radicalization during the Great Depression, as he would discuss the NAACP and its strategies for encouraging African American suffrage and integration with Parks. Encouraged by her husband, Rosa Parks returned to school and earned her high school diploma in 1933.

Until World War II, Parks had not been involved in the black civil rights struggle. This changed after she took a job at Maxwell Field in Montgomery in 1941. By 1943, all military bases, Maxwell Field included, had been desegregated. Unlike Montgomery's city buses, she rode integrated trolleys on base and her experience at desegregated Maxwell prompted her to join the Montgomery NAACP. At her first meeting, Parks was elected secretary of the organization. In this capacity, she helped lead a voter registration drive, although white registrars worked diligently to keep African Americans off the voter rolls. It took until April 1945 for Parks to finally be registered to vote.

After the war, Parks continued as secretary of the Montgomery NAACP, but she also worked as a housekeeper and seamstress, most notably for the liberal white activists Clifford and Virginia Durr. In July 1955, Virginia Durr arranged for Parks to attend a two-week session on racial desegregation at the Highlander Folk School in Monteagle, Tennessee. The experience at Highlander, and her exposure to individuals such as civil rights pioneer Septima Clark, strengthened her desire to work for civil rights.

Just months after her return from Highlander, on the evening of December 1, 1955, Parks violated segregation laws by refusing to give her seat to a white passenger on a city bus. Parks initially had been seated in the first row of the black section, but as more whites boarded the bus, the color line moved farther back. When this occurred, African Americans were expected to relinquish their seats to make room for the white passengers. Parks refused. The bus driver, James F. Blake, called the police and had Parks arrested. As she recounted in her autobiography, she was not physically tired. A few days later, Parks was found guilty of disorderly conduct and violating a Montgomery ordinance and fined $10, plus $4 in court costs.

In response to Parks's arrest, E. D. Nixon and Jo Ann Robinson, a professor at Alabama State College, met to discuss a boycott of the bus system by Montgomery's African Americans. At a subsequent mass meeting, Martin Luther King Jr., the pastor of Dexter Avenue Baptist Church, was chosen to lead the effort. The entire African American community supported the Montgomery bus boycott, refusing to ride the city's buses for 381 days, placing a tremendous financial strain on the bus company. On May 11, 1956, a federal court decision in Browder v. Gayle ruled Alabama's bus segregation laws unconstitutional, upheld by the United States Supreme Court on November 13, 1956. The boycott came to an end on December 20, 1956, after the city passed a desegregation ordinance for the city's buses. Whereas the boycott propelled King into national prominence as the leader of the Civil Rights movement, Rosa Parks's courageous refusal to give in to the inequities of the Jim Crow system made her a symbolic figure whose inspiration reached well beyond the borders of the United States.

Rosa Parks, whose refusal to give up her bus seat to a white passenger sparked the Montgomery Bus Boycott and fueled the Civil Rights movement, sits in the front of a bus on December 1, 1955. (Library of Congress)

Hounded by death threats and at odds with the local leaders of the Civil Rights movement, Rosa and Raymond Parks, along with Leona McCauley, moved to Detroit, Michigan, in July 1957, to live with family members. In Detroit, Parks worked as a seamstress but continued to be involved in the Civil Rights movement, lecturing widely to diverse groups. Her interest in politics led to a job with U.S. Representative John Conyers in 1965, for whom she worked until she retired in 1988. In honor of her husband Raymond, who died in 1977, she founded the Rosa and Raymond Parks Institute for Self-Development in February 1987, to mentor youths to achieve their full potential.

Although Parks was a symbol of the Civil Rights movement and an inspiration to millions because of her courage and quiet dignity, official recognition of her contributions to American history came late in her life. On September 9, 1996, President William J. Clinton presented her with a Presidential Medal of Freedom, the highest award given to a civilian. A few years later, on May 3, 1999, she received a Congressional Gold Medal. Time magazine also recognized her as one of the 100 most influential people of the 20th century. Rosa Parks died on October 24, 2005, in Detroit at the age of 92. In striking contrast to her notoriety as one of the most detested figures in the United States after the boycott, Rosa Park became the first woman in American history to lie in state in the United States Capitol. It is estimated that 50,000 people paid their respects to the "Mother of the Civil Rights Movement."

See also: King, Coretta Scott; King, Martin Luther Jr.; Montgomery Bus Boycott; Robinson, Jo Ann

Dan J. Puckett

Bibliography

- Branch, Taylor. Parting the Waters: America in the King Years, 1954–63. New York: Simon & Schuster, 1988.
- Brinkley, Douglas. Rosa Parks. New York: Viking Penguin, 2000.
- Parks, Rosa, with Gregory J. Reed. Quiet Strength: The Faith, the Hope, and the Heart of a Woman Who Changed the Nation. Grand Rapids, MI: Zondervan Publishing House, 1994.
- Parks, Rosa, with Jim Haskins. Rosa Parks: My Story. New York: Dial Books, 1992.

Plan de San Diego

The 1915 Plan de San Diego was intended to be a multi-racial militant coalition involving Latinos, African Americans, and Native Americans against whites in South Texas. A number of forces led to the planning of this rebellion, but more than two decades of abject racial violence in the form of lynchings and beatings were perhaps most important. In January 1896, Aureliano Castelon was shot eight times and his body was burned in San Antonio by a white mob. In response, 25 Mexicans drafted a notice entitled "Slaughter the Gringo," which called for the death of all gringos and Germans, excluding African Americans, Italians, and Cubans. The "Slaughter the Gringo" notice served as an important precursor to events occurring in southern Texas between 1915 and 1917.

South Texas became the site of a massive shift to commercialized farming after 1900 that had social and economic reverberations for decades thereafter. Before this period, this region was primarily a ranch society and the economy revolved around livestock raising. By 1904, technological advances such as dry farming techniques, irrigation systems, and refrigerated railcars made intensive farming possible in this semiarid region. As a result, land prices sky-rocketed and many struggling Mexican ranchers sold their lands to primarily white farmers. Before this agricultural revolution, Mexican workers were employed as vaqueros, or cowboys. After 1904, the only work for Mexican laborers in South Texas was as migrant farm workers, tenant farmers, or sharecroppers.

The growth of commercial agriculture in South Texas had other implications for Mexican workers. Many Mexicans coming to Texas after 1910 were from northern Mexico, a region primarily dominated by mining and ranching interests. The mines paid relatively high wages because of their remote location, the various dangers involved with mining, and the fact that North Mexico was sparsely populated. The Mexican Revolution, however, led to the physical destruction of many of the mines, forcing mine workers to find work elsewhere. The mine workers were soon followed by vaqueros in their exodus to Texas because the entire ranching economy was symbiotically linked to mining; essentially, the ranches of North Mexico provided food and leather goods for the mining operations. Both the miners and vaqueros could have chosen to go south, but then they would have likely become debt peons on the numerous haciendas, or landed estates, which predominated in Central and South Mexico. This was a fate that many Mexican workers had sought to avoid in the first place by relocating to North Mexico. Their only other option was to cross the northern border where they thought a thriving ranching society was to be found. Instead they were to become a landless peasantry in a system far worse than the Mexican hacienda.

Haciendas in South Mexico and Mexican-owned ranches in North Mexico and South Texas had one thing in common—paternalistic work arrangements that somewhat mitigated the conditions faced by peons and vaqueros. The agricultural revolution beginning in Texas created a decided shift away from paternalistic relations. The introduction of transplanted farm societies from the Midwest and North led to massive dislocations, and Mexican laborers in Texas effectively transformed into a proletariat. Paternalism would no longer be a mitigating factor in their lives; instead the cold and calculating science of capitalism would dictate their existence. In addition, this massive transformation had a racial character that inevitably drove an even deeper social wedge between Mexicans and whites.

It is in this context that the events occurring in Texas between 1915 and 1917 can be best understood. During this time period, the valley and border regions of southern Texas became a virtual combat zone. In January 1915, Basilio Ramos Jr. was captured and subsequently charged with conspiracy to levy war against the United States. On his person was found a document that is now known as the “Plan de San Diego.” Similar in language to the “Slaughter the Gringo” notice, this plan called for the death of all white males over the age of 16 and the creation of the “Liberating Army for Races and Peoples,” which was to be composed of Latinos, African Americans, and Japanese. The plan is considered irredentist by many historians because it called for the independence of Texas, New Mexico, Arizona, Colorado, and Upper California, the same regions that the drafters of the plan stated were robbed during the 1836 Texas Revolution and the 1846–1848 Mexican War.

This movement was far beyond simple irredentism, however, because another provision of the plan called for the distribution of land to Native Americans and African Americans upon successful completion of the revolution. These lands would be set up as independent republics that would be annexed by Mexico only if it was expedient. The plan was to begin on February 20, 1915, but nothing of note happened until July. Between July and October 1915, the entire Lower Rio Grande Valley region was disrupted by a series of raids and attacks. The attackers burned bridges, derailed trains, cut telegraph and phone lines, sabotaged irrigation pumping plants, and attacked Texas Rangers and U.S. Army personnel stationed throughout the region. By August 1915, this primarily rural struggle was beginning to gain support among Mexicans in urban areas. In San Antonio, for example, 28 Mexicans were arrested after showing sympathy for the rebellion.

White backlash to the plan resulted in even more racial violence in 1915. Mexicans suspected of engaging in raids were executed without due process and lynchings became an everyday occurrence. In July 1915, two Mexicans were shot to death by law enforcement agents in Mercedes. In August, a Mexican man was lynched near San Benito. In September, 14 Mexicans were shot and their bodies were publicly displayed as a warning to sympathizers of the “Plan de San Diego.” This backlash resulted in the exodus of thousands of Mexicans from the border area. Many were forced to leave because Texas Rangers and white vigilante groups confiscated their weapons and ordered them to move to towns where they could be better controlled. It is estimated that well over a hundred Mexicans were killed in 1915 alone. As a result of the white backlash, the hostilities intensified again by May 1916, as sympathizers of the plan engaged in more disruptive and destructive activities. In response to the 1916 raids, the U.S. government ordered virtually all armed forces ready for combat duty to be stationed along the Lower Rio Grande. This act brought an end to the raids, but similar hostilities persisted in southern Texas throughout much of the 20th century.

See also: Lynching; Mexican War; White Mob Violence

Walter C. Rucker

Bibliography

- Acuna, Rodolfo. Occupied America: A History of Chicanos. New York: Harper Collins Publishers, 1988.
- Barr, Alwyn. Black Texans: A History of Negroes in Texas, 1528–1971. Austin, TX: The Pemberton Press, 1973.
- Montejano, David. Anglos and Mexicans in the Making of Texas, 1836–1986. Austin: University of Texas Press, 1987.
- Rosenbaum, Robert J. Mexicano Resistance in the Southwest: The Sacred Right of Self-Preservation. Austin: University of Texas Press, 1981.

Plessy v. Ferguson

In The Souls of Black Folk (1903), W. E. B. Du Bois wrote that the principle problem of the 20th century will be that of the color line. Being black was “strange” largely because of the estrangement between the races in America. The “color line” was drawn in bold by Plessy v. Ferguson, 163 U.S. 537 (1896). By keeping the Jim Crow status quo, Plessy deepened the racial divide. This is the notorious “separate but equal” case. Although not part of the decision verbatim, these three words, which accurately express the legal fiction of the Supreme Court’s ruling, gave legal sanction to Jim Crow segregation. Thus “separate but equal” equals “Jim Crow affirmed.”

This opinion is couched in legal language that requires an understanding of constitutional law to decode. The high court held that the separation of the races within states does not violate the Fourteenth Amendment, which had previously granted African Americans equal protection under the laws. The technical terms notwithstanding, the Court’s purport was patent. In black and white, Justice Henry Billings Brown kept blacks from whites. This bad result was “good law” for nearly six decades. It would take Brown v. the Board of Education, 347 U.S. 483 (1954) to overrule Justice Brown. If, except for the Dred Scott case, Plessy was the worst Supreme Court ruling ever handed down, as Justice Harlan indicated in his dissent, then the Brown decision may rank as the greatest Supreme Court decision. To appreciate the greatness of Brown v. Board of Education, it is necessary to understand Plessy first.

Democracy is a process of progressive equalizing. It is a matter of degree. Mollified by democratic language and reasoning, nevertheless Plessy is a harsh and fundamentally undemocratic decision. More than undemocratic, it was antidemocratic because Plessy may be characterized as an antidemocratic reaction to the then-recent democratic reforms of Reconstruction (1865–1877).

Reconstruction was the nation’s first experiment in economic emancipation and interracial democracy. The three Reconstruction Amendments—the Thirteenth, Fourteenth, and Fifteenth Amendments (1865, 1868, and 1870, respectively) established (legally but not factually) civil rights for all Americans. But the experiment failed; or rather, America failed the experiment. The reforms introduced by Reconstruction were being systematically dismantled in the South. For instance, the promise of “forty acres and a mule” was proclaimed by General William T. Sherman but never delivered by Congress. Reconstruction was progressive; Plessy was regressive. Plessy, in fact, was the ultimate deconstruction of Reconstruction—the final judicial nail in its historical coffin. Far worse were its social and historical consequences, for the decision legitimized legal segregation. Plessy was a pact with the devil of Jim Crow, and it legitimized the American apartheid of systemic segregation. Plessy’s “separate but equal” doctrine was an oxymoron. Yet, as the supreme law of the law, it held sway for well over a half-century. It would take the Brown decision to successfully overturn it. Brown v. Board of Education exposed the Plessy decision as a contradiction, ruling that “separate but equal” is inherently unequal.

The 1890 Louisiana Separate Car Act provided that railway companies in Louisiana would have equal but separate accommodations and facilities for whites and nonwhites. Violation of this act triggered a fine and imprisonment. The local, activist Comité des Citoyens (Citizens’ Committee) decided to challenge the constitutionality of this law. On June 7, 1892, Homer Adolph Plessy (1863–1925), a “Creole of Color,” bought a first-class ticket at the Press Street Depot in New Orleans. This shoemaker, a man in his late twenties, was about to board a train on the East Louisiana Railroad for passage to the city of Covington, which was in St. Tammany Parish (county) in Louisiana. His ticket was for a seat in the first-class carriage, on a train scheduled to depart at 4:15 P.M. The trip was to have taken around two hours in its traverse to Covington, which was 30 miles to the north, on the other side of Lake Pontchartrain, near the Mississippi border. Plessy never reached his physical destination because he had a legal destination in mind. A dignified gentleman donning suit and hat, he quietly took his seat in a compartment reserved for whites only. Upon collecting his ticket, the conductor asked if Plessy were a “colored man.” To this query, Plessy answered in the affirmative and the conductor instructed him to go to the coach reserved for nonwhites.

This unruffled admission was not inevitable; it was planned in advance, for Plessy could easily have passed as white. Thus the conductor would probably have believed Plessy had he answered in the negative. Was Plessy white or black? To use the inartful slang of the day, Plessy was an “octoroon” (a person of one-eighth black blood), an accident of “hypodescent” (a peculiar American doctrine that classifies anyone with the least trace of African ancestry as “colored,” with all of the legal and social stigmas that would attach to that pejorative classification). Phenotypically, Plessy exhibited none of the physical features associated with his race. There are no extant photographs of Homer Plessy, but the record is clear: he was identifiably a “bi- multi-racial” man, as the Supreme Court acknowledged in its decision. Facially, Plessy was white; racially he was black by the standards of that day. He was the perfect man to challenge the constitutionality of the Louisiana Separate Car Act.

Needless to say, both the conductor and passengers were taken aback. Pursuant to Louisiana law, Conductor J. J. Dowling informed Plessy that he had to move to the “colored car.” Reeking of soot and smoke, this Jim Crow car was typically hitched right behind the locomotive. Its seats were wooden, while the first-class seats were cushioned. With adamantine equipoise, Plessy refused. Law enforcement was summoned, and “Detective” Chris C. Cain appeared on the scene. Identifying himself as a private detective, he evidently was deputized and held police rank. In any event, Plessy did not question “Captain” Cain’s authority. When directed to leave with Cain, Plessy did so, without incident. Plessy complied with the officer of the law in order to challenge the law itself.

Captain Cain took Plessy to the Fifth Precinct police station on Elysian Fields Avenue. There he was booked for violating the Separate Car Act. His hearing took place on the morning of June 8. Waiving his right to a hearing, Plessy was released on $500 bail, a tidy sum in those days, paid by Paul Bonseigneur, treasurer of the Comité des Citoyens. Plessy returned to his home on brick-paved 244 1/2 North Clairborne Avenue in the integrated, middle-class Faubourg Tremé district, where his wife Louise was waiting for him. Plessy resumed his respectable trade of making leather shoes and boots to order in Patricio Brito’s shoemaking business in the French Quarter.

The arraignment was set for October 13, nearly five months later. Plessy was to appear before John H. Ferguson, judge of Section “A” of the Criminal District Court, Parish of Orleans. In the case filed as 19117 The State of Louisiana v. Homer Adolph Plessy, Judge Ferguson heard arguments by 55-year-old James Campbell Walker, a local Creole attorney, and Assistant District Attorney Lionel Adams, who was reputed to be a “crack trial lawyer.” Walker had agreed to defend Plessy and took the case for $1,000. Ironically, Homer Plessy and Judge Ferguson had the very same skin color. After failing in his motion to have the case dismissed, Walker filed a motion to stay the proceedings so that arguments on the constitutionality of the Separate Car Act could be heard. Judge Ferguson then set a date for October 28.

Meanwhile, in his October 14 brief, Walker had argued that the Louisiana statute violated the Thirteenth and Fourteenth Amendments. By requiring him to sit in a Jim Crow car, the state was branding Plessy with a “badge of slavery,” although proscribed by the Thirteenth Amendment (1865). The Separate Car Act also offended the Fourteenth Amendment (1868), which forbade any state’s abridging the rights of U.S. citizens. The judge then congratulated Walker for the work that was evident in his brief. Judge Ferguson rendered his decision on November 18, finding that there was no evidence that Plessy was not to be provided with equal accommodations and that he was simply denied the freedom of violating a state law. On November 22, Plessy appealed to the Louisiana Supreme Court, which was docketed as case number 11134.

Albion Winegar Tourgée (1838–1905) took over as lead attorney for Plessy, although Walker remained as part of Plessy’s legal team. Tourgée argued as before, and with the same result. The brief challenging the constitutionality of the Separate Car Act (collaboratively written by Tourgée and Walker) had 14 paragraphs. After reviewing the statutory language of the Separate Car Act, the Louisiana high court noted a recent decision regarding the act’s constitutionality in which they held that the act would be unconstitutional because it ceded too much power and authority to Congress in its duties to regulate commerce and travel between the states. Because Plessy’s destination was intrastate, however, the Commerce Clause was not implicated. The court then cited a Supreme Court case known as Civil Rights Cases, 109 U.S. 3, in order to dismiss Plessy’s Thirteenth Amendment claim.

His Thirteenth Amendment claim having failed, the court then addressed Plessy’s alternative pleading—his challenge of the Separate Car Act as a violation of the Fourteenth Amendment. Having cited a number of precedents on which it relied, the court held that the accommodations were, indeed, equal and thus a violation of the Fourteenth Amendment did not occur. Then, in a prescient, almost prophetic pronouncement, the court went on to say that to hold that the requirement of separate, though equal, accommodations in public conveyances violated the Fourteenth Amendment would nullify the statutes establishing separate schools or those prohibiting interracial marriage. All are laws based on difference of race, and if such difference cannot furnish a basis for such legislation in one of these cases it can not in any case. Clearly, had Plessy gone the other way, school segregation might have been struck down as unconstitutional far in advance of Brown v. Board of Education.

Needless to say, Homer Plessy did not prevail before the Louisiana high court. But that was as it should have been. That way, the case could be appealed all the way to the Supreme Court, which was Plessy's real goal in challenging the constitutionality of the Separate Car Act in the first place. Although the necessary court documents were filed by the end of February 1893, it took more than three years until the matter came before the Court. The case was argued on April 13, 1896, and the Court handed down its decision on May 18, 1896. Albion Winegar Tourgée represented Homer Plessy, with former Solicitor General Samuel F. Phillips serving as co-counsel. (James C. Walker's health prevented him from making the trip to Washington.) Tourgée and Walker had filed one of the two briefs on Plessy's behalf (argued in 23 numbered paragraphs), and Phillips submitted the other. Alexander Porter Morse defended Judge Ferguson against a charge of judicial error, and M. J. Cunningham, attorney general of the State of Louisiana, and Lionel Adams prepared the legal brief on Ferguson's behalf.

"The gist of our case," Tourgée declared in his opening statement, "is the unconstitutionality of the assortment [racial discrimination]; not the question of equal accommodation." Space does not permit a detailed analysis of Tourgée's and Walker's constitutional arguments as laid out in their brief, which Charles A. Lofgren analyzes as (1) the Restrictive Rights Argument, and (2) the Affirmative Rights Argument (The Plessy Case, pp. 152–64). Nor does space allow for an epitome of Samuel Phillips's three-page brief, which focused solely on the Fourteenth Amendment issue. These briefs, however persuasive, were not determinative.

Justice Henry Billings Brown delivered the opinion of the Court. In Plessy v. Ferguson, 163 U.S. 537 (1896), Justice Brown dismissed Plessy's Thirteenth Amendment argument in short order by noting that legal equality and social equality are two distinct issues. The role of the Court was to rule on the former and decline from deciding on the latter, as the question of social equality was clearly outside its purview. The Fourteenth Amendment implicated a different, albeit related, set of issues. Justice Brown assessed that the main objective of the Fourteenth Amendment was to enforce the absolute equality of the two races before the law. In his view, however, it could not have been intended to abolish distinctions based on color, or to enforce social, as distinguished from political equality, or a commingling of the two races on terms unsatisfactory to either. Thus Brown contended that laws permitting or requiring, their separation in places where they are liable to be brought into contact do not necessarily imply the inferiority of either race to the other, and have been generally, if not universally, recognized as within the competency of the state legislatures in the exercise of their police power.

The Court concluded that the enforced separation of the races, as applied to the internal commerce of the Louisiana, neither abridges the privileges or immunities of African Americans and other people of color, deprives them of their property without due process of law, nor denies them the equal protection of the laws, within the meaning of the Fourteenth Amendment. Nothing could be further from the truth, of course. The Deep South, for all practical purposes, became a dual society. Like oil and water, black and white were not supposed to mix. Yet the metaphor falls short in its symbolic power, for oil and water do not combust, but racial tensions do. The Plessy decision could only exacerbate those social tensions. Legal questions aside, social issues had to be addressed. The Court perforce had to speak to the issue of racial prejudice and the role of the law in promoting social equality beyond legal equality (or the fiction of such equality).

Here, besides discounting the Thirteenth Amendment challenge entirely (finding that forced segregation is not a vestige or "badge of servitude"), the Supreme Court completely disavows any social responsibility for the public's general welfare in terms of race relations. By giving legal sanction to Jim Crow laws, the high court was on low moral grounds. Even on purely legal grounds, the decision applies a mere test of reasonableness to the Separate Car Act. Constitutional scholars call the reasonableness standard the "rational basis test" or "rational scrutiny." This is the way that the Supreme Court has typically deferred to "states' rights" in constitutional controversies. Yet this same legal tradition has produced powerful dissenting opinions. Such was the case in Plessy.

Justice Harlan's Sidelined: In one of the most celebrated dissents in Supreme Court history, Justice Harlan eloquently took his fellow justices to task for a fundamentally flawed decision. His dissent is all the more remarkable considering the fact that Justice John Marshall Harlan (1833–1911) was “a former slaveholder” from Kentucky (Lofgren 3). Harlan’s “color-blind” rhetoric echoes in court chambers, classrooms, and in civic spheres to this very day. But there was simply no jurisprudential framework at that time for asserting an individual’s “fundamental rights” over “states’ rights.”

By modern legal standards, the Plessy case should have triggered “strict scrutiny,” but, historically, that would be a gross anachronism. Under current equal protection theory, the Supreme Court holds all racial classifications to be constitutionally suspect and subject to strict scrutiny, which is the most stringent form of judicial review. Under strict scrutiny, a race-based law cannot pass constitutional muster absent a compelling state interest that cannot be protected by any less drastic means. But the idea that gave rise to strict scrutiny did not appear until 1938 in U.S. v. Carolene Products Co., 304 U.S. 144, 153 n.4 (1938), where the Supreme Court called for a “more exacting judicial scrutiny” in certain circumstances or cases. Four years later, in Skinner v. Oklahoma, 316 U.S. 535 (1942), the Supreme Court coined the term “strict scrutiny” for the first time, to define the new judicial standard that the Court would apply to laws that deprive individuals of their civil rights.

Hardening of the Color Line: On January 11, 1897, more than four-and-a-half years after his arrest, Homer Adolph Plessy found himself before Orleans Parish Criminal District Court once more. On the charge of having violated Section 2 of Act 111 of the Separate Car Act, Plessy pled guilty. He duly paid his fine of $25. Nationally, his case was met with apathy; privately, Plessy faded into obscurity. On Sunday, March 1, 1925 at 5:10 A.M., Plessy died. A local paper reported a two-line notice of his death. But Homer Adolph Plessy is immortal as a symbol of the struggle for equality and racial justice.

W. E. B. Du Bois was right. The color line would be the central problem of the 20th century. Plessy v. Ferguson reinforced that color line in stark black and white, even though Homer Plessy and Judge Ferguson each had the same skin color—light brown. In causing racial and legal status to converge, Plessy’s “separate but equal” was a “bright line” rule. First, the rule of hypodescent sustains a binary opposition between black and white and defines anyone with a perceptible trace of African ancestry as black. Based on this simple classification scheme, all blacks must be segregated from whites where Jim Crow laws demand it. Homer Plessy was thus the perfect man to put the Separate Car Act to test, for he exposed the absurdity of hypodescent and its legal consequences. Although he was, by legal fiat, black, his skin color was as white as Judge Ferguson, who sat in initial judgment of him. Added to this irony is the fact that, as a gentleman who comported himself with the utmost dignity by aristocratic Southern standards, Homer Plessy exploded the negative stereotype of the “Negro” that the Jim Crow laws were meant to protect against.

Although the Louisiana courts differentiated between racial segregation and racial discrimination, the bottom line remains the same: race segregation is race subordination. History proves this to be true. In a certain sense, historian David Brion Davis was right: the Confederacy won the Civil War ideologically, at least insofar as civil rights were concerned. Plessy calcified entrenched Jim Crow laws and gave them Supreme Court sanction. “Rather, whatever the realities of the hardening color line in America,” Lofgren concludes, “the formula associated with Plessy [separate but equal] could be invoked against the worst deprivations” (The Plessy Case, p. 201). Like cracks in glass, the “separate but equal doctrine” spread throughout the Jim Crow states, as transportation segregation reinforced education segregation. Thus it took 58 years before the Brown decision overruled Justice Brown’s 1896 ruling to erase the color line legally, although not socially. Plessy v. Ferguson did not justly resolve the America dilemma of racism, but it did focus legal attention on it. In that sense, Plessy was as much of a milestone as it was a setback.

See also: Brown v. Board of Education; Fourteenth Amendment; Jim Crow

Christopher George Buck

Bibliography

- Anderson, Wayne. Plessy v. Ferguson: Legalizing Segregation. New York: Rosen Publication Group, 2004.
- Boxill, Bernard R. “Washington, Du Bois, and Plessy v. Ferguson.” Law and Philosophy 16, no. 3 (May 1997):299–330.
- Elliot, Mark. Color Blind Justice: Albion Tourgee and the Quest for Racial Equality from the Civil War to Plessy v. Ferguson. New York: Oxford University Press, 2009.
- Fireside, Harvey, and Marc H. Morial. Separate and Unequal: Homer Plessy and the Supreme Court Decision That Legalized Racism. New York: Carroll & Graf, 2004.
- Lofgren, Charles A. The Plessy Case: A Legal-Historical Interpretation. New York: Oxford University Press, 1987.

- Medley, Keith Weldon. We As Freedmen: Plessy v. Ferguson. Gretna, LA: Pelican Publishers, 2003.
- Roback, Jennifer. "The Political Economy of Segregation: The Case of Segregated Streetcars." Journal of Economic History 46 (1986):893–917.
- Thomas, Brook, ed. Plessy v. Ferguson: A Brief History with Documents. Boston: Bedford Books, 1997.

Poitier, Sidney

Sidney Poitier (1927–) was born prematurely in Miami, Florida. His parents, Reginald James and Evelyn Outten Poitier, were impoverished Bahamian tomato farmers. Three months after his birth, Poitier and his family moved to Cat Island in the Bahamas. Because of the family's poverty, Poitier's formal education did not begin until he was 11. By age 12, he had finished his education to help his father work on the fruit farm. Hoping Poitier would have more opportunities, his father sent him to Miami to live with his brother Cyril in 1943. He worked several jobs until the Ku Klux Klan threatened him for failing to deliver a package to the rear door. In fear, he fled to New York and worked as a dishwasher. Unable to pay for housing, Poitier was jailed for vagrancy and eventually found shelter at an orphanage. Looking for a change, he joined the army at age 16 and pretended to be the required age of 18.

A year later, Poitier was discharged and found a job as a dishwasher and janitor in New York. Upon seeing an advertisement for black actors in Harlem's Amsterdam News, he auditioned for a role. Because of his thick West Indian accent and poor reading skills, Poitier was rejected. After learning how to read and working on his accent, Poitier reauditioned and was accepted into the American Negro Theater. In 1945, he earned his first role with the American Negro Theater as the understudy of Harry Belafonte in the Days of Our Youth. A year later, he made his first starring appearance on Broadway in Lysistrata. Poitier stumbled through his lines, but the critics found his foibles humorous. This performance then led to a role in Anna Lucasta in 1947 and a tour of the play in 1948.

Poitier took his success on the stage to acting in films in 1949. He started with an appearance in an army documentary called From Whom Cometh My Help. A year later, Poitier starred in his first Hollywood production titled No Way Out. He expanded his acting credits to include the films Red

Ball Express (1952), Go, Man, Go (1954), and Blackboard Jungle (1955). Critics took notice of Poitier and praised his emotional range, especially in his performance of Cry, the Beloved Country in 1955. Poitier's acting accomplishments then led to a host of laudable performances in Goodbye, My Lady (1956), Band of Angels (1957), Something of Value (1957), Edge of the City (1957), The Defiant Ones (1958), Mark of the Hawk (1958), Virgin Island (1958), and Porgy and Bess (1959).

In-between acting, Poitier found time to marry Juanita Marie Hardy, a dancer, in 1950. After having four children, they divorced in 1965. In 1976, Poitier married Joanna Shimkus, an actress, and they later had two daughters. Poitier returned to the theater in 1959 and played the lead role in Lorraine Hansberry's A Raisin in the Sun. In 1960, he appeared in the acclaimed film version. Poitier continued his notable roles in All the Young Men (1960), Paris Blues (1961), and Pressure Point (1962). In 1963, he won an Academy Award for his performance in Lilies of the Field and became the first African American actor to win in the category of leading actor. He followed this performance with impressive work in The Long Ships (1964), The Greatest Story Ever Told (1965), A Patch of Blue (1965), and To Sir, With Love (1967). Poitier's most significant roles came with his next two films Guess Who's Coming to Dinner (1967) and In the Heat of the Night (1967). Both roles promoted equal treatment of blacks and social integration. He later turned to television movies and played Supreme Court Justice Thurgood Marshall in Separate but Equal in 1991 and Nelson Mandela in Mandela and de Klerk in 1997.

After finding success in acting, Poitier turned his attention to directing. His debut came with Buck and the Preacher in 1972. This western movie showed the significance of African Americans in the West's development and featured black heroes. Poitier's second directorial film, A Warm December (1973), had nominal success. He rebounded in 1974 with Uptown Saturday Night. The popular film showcased the talents of Bill Cosby, Harry Belafonte, Flip Wilson, and Richard Pryor. He later reteamed with Bill Cosby in A Piece of Action (1977) and Ghost Dad (1990). In 1980, he directed Richard Pryor in the hit Stir Crazy. His later directing projects, Shoot to Kill (1998) and Little Nikita (1988), also received some praise.

Poitier reflected on his successful career in his 1980 autobiography This Life. He wrote another memoir in 2000 titled The Measure of a Man: A Spiritual Autobiography and won a Grammy Award for the text's reading in 2001. Poitier has also been the recipient of several other accolades, including the Kennedy Center Honors Lifetime Achievement Award in 1995, the NAACP's Hall of Fame Award in 2001, and the Academy of Motion Pictures Honorary Award in 2002. He continues to be a revered figure in the acting community and participant in the NAACP and the Martin Luther King Jr. Center for Nonviolent Social Change.

See also: Belafonte, Harry; Cosby, Bill; King, Martin Luther Jr.; Marshall, Thurgood; National Association for the Advancement of Colored People; Pryor; Richard

Dorsia Smith Silva

Bibliography

- Goudsouzian, Aram. Sidney Poitier: Man, Actor, Icon. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 2004.
- Keyser, Lester J. The Cinema of Sidney Poitier: The Black Man's Changing Role on the American Screen. San Diego: A. S. Barnes, 1980.

Poor People's Campaign

The Poor People's Campaign was a movement organized and led by the Southern Christian Leadership Conference (SCLC) and its director, Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. It was intended to dramatize the plight of the nation's poor and address economic injustice. The plan was to bring thousands of poor people of all races to Washington, D.C., where they would engage in radical nonviolent direct action in order to convince Congress and President Lyndon B. Johnson to make eliminating poverty the number one goal of the nation.

The masses of African Americans appeared to be untouched by the most sweeping legislation guaranteeing civil rights since Reconstruction. In 1965, almost one-third of African Americans lived below the poverty line, and half of all black households lived in substandard dwellings. Indeed, the percentage of poor blacks had actually increased between 1959 and 1965. The unemployment rate for blacks was almost double that of whites; for black teenagers, it was more than twice that for white teens. The crumbling infrastructure of inner-city neighborhoods was further eroded by so-called urban renewal; the employment situation was exacerbated by the movement of jobs to the suburbs. The high school dropout rate soared, drug abuse became rampant, and fragile families were further strained.

Northern urban communities with thousands of poor, black residents were also fertile ground for the nascent Black Power movement. The nonviolent direct action that had been so successful in the past held no appeal for the hundreds of thousands of blacks who were trapped there with little to no opportunity for improvement. Nor had the War on Poverty, developed by the administration of President Lyndon B. Johnson to eradicate poverty in America, been much help. Although noble, its efforts were too little, and it was opposed by powerful politicians at the local level and whites who felt Johnson was giving handouts to the undeserving poor. The poor, their hopes raised by community action programs and maximum feasible participation, again found their hopes unanswered. As such, the cities became simmering cauldrons of frustration, alienation, and hopelessness that exploded in 1965.

Every summer from 1965 through 1969, northern cities were visited by urban rebellions, sometimes referred to as race riots. The Los Angeles neighborhood of Watts was the first of these on August 11, 1965. Six days of rioting reduced Watts to rubble, claimed 34 lives, and recorded property damage of $35 million. Urban rebellions also occurred in 1966, but arguably the worst year of the phenomenon was 1967. A total of 59 riots occurred, the deadliest being in Newark, New Jersey and Detroit, Michigan. The Newark rebellion left 27 dead, including children, a police officer, and a fire fighter, and caused millions of dollars in damage. Conditions in Detroit were so bad that 43 blacks were killed. Not even 800 state and city police and the National Guard could restore order. President Lyndon Johnson was forced to send in the 82nd and 101st Airborne to restore order.

After the Newark and Detroit riots, Johnson established the National Advisory Commission on Civil Disorders, commonly known as the Kerner Commission after its leader, Governor Otto Kerner of Illinois. Johnson recognized that the only way to end the despair of the masses of blacks was a sustained government program designed to end joblessness, substandard housing, poverty, and disease. The Kerner Commission report surprisingly blamed white racism as the chief cause of the riots and warned that America was once again becoming a dual society, one black and one white.

Poor People's March in Washington, D.C., on June 18, 1968. (Library of Congress)

King and the SCLC were keenly aware that the times called for bold measures. He recognized that the campaign would be different from those implemented during the Civil Rights movement; it was demanding nothing less than a wholesale transformation of American capitalism. Moreover, King intended to force the nation to choose between eliminating poverty, which he saw as a moral issue, and continuing an increasingly unpopular war in Vietnam, against which he had become a vocal critic. To him the two were inextricably linked.

The Poor People's Campaign had three stages. First, it would crisscross the nation putting together a group of several thousand black, Latino, Native American, and white Appalachian poor people who would travel to Washington to live in a shanty town much like that erected by the Bonus Army of the early 20th century. They would participate in daily demonstrations in the capital and be joined by parallel demonstrations in cities across the country. These would be crowned by a mass march echoing the 1963 March on Washington. Second, the demonstrations would engender mass arrests as they had in the South, further dramatizing the plight of the poor. Finally, there would be an economic boycott of the most powerful businesses in America. The Poor People's Campaign would show that all the gains of the Civil Rights movement were hollow without economic parity and opportunity. It would either be a brilliant success or a humiliating failure.

King and the SCLC were instantly attacked by the media, the political Left, and white Americans who were weary of the struggle for equality. Leaders of the other civil rights organizations also criticized King, not only for the campaign, but for his stinging and public rebuke of the Vietnam War. Most of organized labor refused to support the effort. Finally, President Lyndon Johnson turned against King, too, and he lost the warm working relationship they had developed. But King pressed on.

His empathy for and support of the poor took him to Memphis, Tennessee, where he marched in solidarity with city garbage collectors who were seeking a living wage and better working conditions. On April 4, he was assassinated.

Coretta Scott King, his widow, and the SCLC decided to continue the Poor People's Campaign under the leadership of the Reverend Ralph Abernathy, the close friend and confidant of King. From May 14 to June 24, more than 2,500 poor people lived in a shanty town they had erected and named Resurrection City. The camp boasted a city hall, cultural capital, a medical facility, dining hall, psychiatrist, a university, and zip code. It fanned out across the Reflecting Pool to the base of the Lincoln Memorial. Residents policed themselves and provided a model for interracial cooperation. Thousands of them fanned out daily across locations in the capital to shame the U.S. government into significant action against poverty.

Unfortunately, conditions in the camp quickly turned miserable. Washington was unusually cool that year in May and June, and it rained 28 of the 42 days of the operation. Residents were soon knee deep in mud, trash, and rotting food. On June 4, Senator Robert F. Kennedy, who had become a champion of the poor and was running for the Democratic nomination for president, was assassinated. Finally, it was clear that the leadership of Dr. King was sorely missed; Reverend Ralph Abernathy lacked the charisma and contacts of Dr. King, and he spent little time at the camp, appearing to prefer the comfort of the black-owned Pitts Hotel to the muddy squalor of Resurrection City. By the middle of June, fewer than 300 people remained in the camp.

Fighting and near-riots broke out in the camp on June 22. Police were called in, but police dogs and more than a thousand tear gas grenades failed to stem the trouble. On June 24, about 1,000 police closed Resurrection City, arresting Reverend Abernathy and 175 people. Charges of assault against police officers, disorderly conduct, curfew violations, and public drunkenness were levied against those arrested. The Poor People's Campaign failed to persuade public officials to pour more resources into eliminating poverty, and it was deemed a failure and the end of the Civil Rights movement.

Recent scholarship, however, has reevaluated the campaign and somewhat redeemed its reputation. The Poor People's Campaign ignited the third wave of the Civil Rights movement: economic empowerment. The interracial structure of the effort showed that a strong alliance based on class was not only important but necessary. Indeed, the Reverend Jesse Jackson would bring this alliance to fruition with his emphasis on a Rainbow Coalition during his 1988 presidential campaign. The Poor People's Campaign highlighted the weaknesses of runaway capitalism and consumerism in a manner not seen since the Great Depression.

See also: Abernathy, Ralph David; Jackson, Jesse; Johnson, Lyndon Baines; King, Martin Luther Jr.; Southern Christian Leadership Conference; War on Poverty

Marilyn K. Howard

Bibliography

- Freeman, Roland L. Mule Train: A Journey of Hope Remembered. Nashville, TN: Thomas Nelson. 1998.
- Honey, Michael. Going Down Jericho Road: The Memphis Strike, Martin Luther King's Last Campaign. New York: W. W. Norton, 2007.
- McKnight, Gerald. The Last Crusade: Martin Luther King, Jr., the FBI and the Poor People's Campaign. New York: Westview Press. 1998.

Populist Party

The populist movement was a revolt by farmers in the South and Midwest against the Democrats and Republicans for ignoring their interests and difficulties. In the 1880s, a drought had caused the farmers to experience crop failures, falling prices, debt, and lack of credit facilities. The farmers organized the National Farmers' Alliance and the Colored Farmers' Alliance in an attempt to remedy their problems. They achieved regional victories but were of little influence nationally. In the 1890s, the agrarian interests refocused their energies and reorganized their efforts by forming the Populist Party. The Populist Party, also known as the People's Party, evolved from the Grange, Greenback Party, and Farmers' Alliances and campaigned to have the federal government buffer economic depressions, regulate banking and corporations, and provide assistance to the suffering farmers.

In 1892, the Populist Party held its first national convention. Delegates met in Omaha, Nebraska and nominated James B. Weaver as its presidential candidate and James G. Field as its vice presidential candidate. The Omaha Platform endorsed free coinage of silver, a graduated income tax, the secret (Australian) ballot, direct election of senators, a single term for the president and vice president, government ownership and operation of railroads, and an eight-hour working day. Weaver, a former Union army general and Iowa congressman, and Field, a Virginia ex-Confederate general, collected more than 1 million popular votes. The voters also elected several Populist Party congressmen, three governors, and hundreds of minor officials and legislators. Most of the party's strength came from the agrarian areas of the Midwest, but poor Southerners also showed a strong support for the party.

Poverty was a common denominator among blacks and whites, and the party leaders envisioned a program that would benefit both races and be injurious to neither. The party's success had depended on black cooperation, and party leaders made concessions to gain the support it needed. In some ways the party broke down racial barriers. In the South, the populist movement approached the blacks for support and forged a common cause between poor whites and blacks. In Georgia, Tom Watson led the Populist Party revolt against the Democrats by promising black voters that the party would respect their civil and political rights. Blacks participated in the party, not just as figure-head appointments but at the innermost levels. They were elected to local and national party committees and served as delegates to the national conventions. They campaigned to mixed audiences and spoke from the same platforms as white campaigners. Populist Party sheriffs made sure blacks were represented on jury duty and populist newspapers praised the achievements of black citizens. In Texas, the party tried to build a coalition of black and white voters but was unable to persuade the majority of Texas blacks to abandon the Republican Party. Throughout the South, conservatives dominated politics and feared Negro domination. The conservatives began making efforts to defeat the populists by buying black votes and intimidating black voters. Eventually the Black Populists became apathetic and factionalized.

In 1896, the Populist Party fused with the Democrats after William Jennings Bryan, a free-silver candidate, was defeated in his bid for the presidency. The Populist Party gradually disappeared as a political force. By 1900, the party was no longer politically effective, and by 1908, it had ceased to exist.

See also: Colored Farmers Alliance

Nancy A. McCaslin

Bibliography

- Brexel, Bernadette. The Populist Party: A Voice for the Farmers in the Industrialized Society. New York: Rosen Publishing Group, 2003.
- Goodwyn, Lawrence. The Populist Moment: A Short History of the Agrarian Revolt in America. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press, 1978.

Powell, Adam Clayton Jr.

Adam Clayton Powell Jr. (1908–1972) was born in New Haven, Connecticut, on November 29, 1908. He rose to prominence in the early 1930s and 1940s as a preacher, civil rights activist, and national politician. Powell's family moved to New York City, where his father, Adam Clayton Powell Sr., served as the 17th pastor of Abyssinian Baptist Church in Harlem. As a child, Adam Clayton Powell Jr., attended New York City public schools. He earned a BA in 1930 from Colgate University, and in 1932 he received an MA in religious education from Columbia University Teachers College. The next year Powell married Harlem's Cotton Club chorus line dancer, Isabel Washington.

Shortly after graduating from Columbia, Powell served as an associate pastor at his father's church, where he developed a charismatic preaching style. He assisted his father in alleviating the economic strain of the Great Depression on the black community in Harlem by organizing soup kitchens, distributing clothing to the poor, and finding jobs for the unemployed. On November 1, 1937, Powell succeeded his father as pastor of Abyssinian. During his early tenure as pastor, Powell substantially increased the size of the congregation through community outreach and inspired preaching.

During the New Deal, Powell used his status to improve the employment situation of African Americans in New York City. In the late 1930s, he cofounded the Greater New York Coordinating Committee for Fair Employment. This organization consisted of various professional groups, including black fraternities and sororities, black nationalists, and Communists. Powell's organization protested against antiblack hiring practices throughout the city in public utilities, such as the electric and telephone companies.

In the 1930s, Powell also helped organize rent strikes and public boycotts led to the hiring and promotion of African American employees in restaurants and department stores in Harlem, the New York City bus company, the public utilities, Harlem Hospital, and officials at the 1939 World's Fair. Along with his community activism, from 1936 to 1944, Powell cofounded and published the radical weekly newspaper, The People's Voice. The paper served as a platform for Powell to inform the African American community about his crusade for better housing, schools, and employment opportunities.

In the early 1940s, Powell became a professional politician and represented Harlem by winning a seat in 1941 on the New York City Council. While serving on the council, Powell continued his campaign against racial discrimination, bringing attention to employment discrimination at the telephone company and city colleges. Between 1942 and 1944, he also served as a member of the New York State, Consumer Division, Office of Price Administration. From 1942–1945, he was a member of the Manhattan Civilian Defense. He used his growing political clout to speak at rallies, in support of World War II and use those speaking opportunities to denounce racial segregation in the military.

In 1945, Powell was elected on the Democratic ticket to serve in the House of Representatives, representing Harlem's 22nd Congressional district. Powell became the first black congressman from New York. In the same year, he divorced Isabel and married popular pianist and actress, Hazel Scott, who gave birth to his first child, Adam Clayton Powell III, in 1946.

A prominent civil rights spokesman, Adam Clayton Powell Jr. was elected to the U.S. House of Representatives from New York in 1945 and became chair of the Education and Labor Committee in 1961. (Library of Congress)

On his arrival in Washington, Powell continued his civil rights campaign. Although Powell was only one of two African American congressional representatives, he successfully challenged de facto segregation on Capitol Hill. Black representatives were then prohibited from using Capitol dining areas, which were reserved only for the white Congressional leaders. Powell, however, would bring Harlem residents to eat with him in these restaurants. Powell also confronted the racial bigotry of staunch segregationists like John E. Rankin of Mississippi on the floor of the House of Representatives.

In the House, Powell would attach an antidiscrimination clause to significant pieces of legislation. His clause eventually became referred to as the Powell Amendment. In 1955, he attended the historic Bandung Conference of Asian and African nations in Bandung, Indonesia. These formerly colonized countries met to discuss ways in which to promote cultural and economic cooperation and to oppose U.S. and European colonialism. On Powell's return to the United States, he urged President Dwight D. Eisenhower to support the emerging, but less developed, countries. During the same decade, Powell began to experience legal problems and in the mid-1950s, he stood trial for tax evasion and fraud. After a hung jury, the Department of Justice decided not to retry the case.

In 1960, Powell divorced and married for the final time. This time he wed Yvette Diago, and she bore him a second son, Adam Clayton Diago Powell. In addition to a new marriage, Powell became chairman of the prestigious and powerful Labor and Education Committee in 1961. During that decade, as a supporter of President Lyndon B. Johnson's Great Society program, Powell's committee passed dozens of measures that authorized federal programs to improve education and training for the deaf, provide college student loans and public school lunches, and increase the minimum wage, thus expanding opportunities for all Americans, including African Americans.

Powell's legal and professional troubles continued into the 1960s. Colleagues accused him of misappropriating his committee's budget, taking trips overseas at tax payers' expense, and missing congressional sessions and committee meetings. He was also criticized for refusing to pay a slander judgment to a Harlem constituent, Ester James. In 1967, the House Democratic Caucus removed Powell as committee chairman. The House also declined to return him to his seat until the federal government investigated the allegations against him.

In June 1969, the Supreme Court ruled that the House had unconstitutionally excluded Powell from Congress, and he returned to his seat in the 90th Congress, but without any seniority or back pay. In the summer of 1970, Charles B. Rangel defeated Powell in the Democratic primary in Powell's district in New York City. Powell then tried and failed to make the November ballot as an independent candidate. In 1971, he resigned as pastor of Abyssinian Baptist and permanently retired to the Bahamian island of Bimini. On April 4, 1972, he died at the age of 63 of complications from prostate cancer at Jackson Memorial Hospital in Miami, Florida. His body was cremated and his ashes scattered over the Caribbean around Bimini.

See also: Johnson, Lyndon Baines; Kennedy, John Fitzgerald; Rustin, Bayard

Dwayne A. Mack

Bibliography

- Hamilton, Charles V. Adam Clayton Powell, Jr.: The Political Biography of an American Dilemma. New York: Atheneum, 1991.
- Haygood, Will. King of the Cats: The Life and Times of Adam Clayton Powell, Jr. New York: Houghton Mifflin, 1993.
- Powell, Adam Clayton, Jr. Adam by Adam: The Autobiography of Adam Clayton Powell, Jr. New York: Dial Press, 1971.
- Powell, Adam Clayton, Jr. Marching Blacks: An Interpretive History of the Rise of the Black Common Man. New York: Dial Press, 1945.

Powell, Colin

Colin Powell (1937–) is a distinguished black military and political luminary and a prominent Republican, whose commitment to help his community and to serve his country make him one of the most respected public figures in the annals of American and African American history. Powell was born in South Bronx, New York City. His parents, Luther and Maud Powell, migrated from Jamaica and worked in the Manhattan garment industry. Growing up in a multicultural social environment, Powell attended local public schools and the City College of New York.

Powell joined the army in 1959 as a second lieutenant. After his training at second infantry school, he commanded a platoon at Fulda Gap, West Germany. At Fort Devens, Alabama, Powell met Alma Johnson, whom he married in 1962. In the same year he went to South Vietnam for his first tour as a military adviser and earned his first Purple Heart and a Bronze Star for his distinguished service.

As a young black captain in Georgia, Powell was insulted because of his race and for being a serviceman in Vietnam. He was refused services at a hotdog stand. He had a similar experience at a restaurant in Birmingham, Alabama. He had to go to the back door where African Americans came to place their order. In 1966, Powell went for his second tour in South Vietnam. He was stationed at Chu Lui and then assigned as a military planner under General Charles M. Gettys. In this tour he was injured in a helicopter crash. Despite his broken ankle, Powell saved the entire crew from the wreckage. For this heroic act in a noncombat situation, he received the second Purple Heart and the Soldier's Medal for bravery.

After he returned from Vietnam, he earned his masters degree in business administration in 1971 from George Washington University. The next year he worked for the Office of Management and Budget at the White House. In the 1980s, Ronald Reagan appointed him to his cabinet as the national security adviser. His biggest moment came when he was appointed the chairman of the Joint Chiefs-of-Staff in 1989, the very year in which he conducted an invasion of Panama. Two years later, Powell was given a second term as the Joint Chiefs-of-Staff. During this time he directed Operation Desert Storm in 1991. Powell split openly with the Congressional Black Caucus over the use of force during the Persian Gulf War.

Along the lines of these black representatives in Congress, Reverend Jesse Jackson believed that Powell was guilty of associating with the Reagan and Bush administration even though he was aware that their policies impeded African Americans' social and economic progress. Because of Powell's association with the Republican Party, Joseph Lowery, the president of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference (SCLC) protested against Powell's presence at the King Week parade in Atlanta that celebrated the birthday of Martin Luther King Jr.

In 1993, Powell retired from army after 35 years of distinguished service. Remembering his segregated past in the army, two years before his retirement, in his address to the Twentieth Annual Convention of the Tuskegee Airmen in Detroit, he expressed his gratitude to those black men and women who served under the racially separated system.

Powell's failure to criticize Washington's policy of putting disproportionate numbers of black men and women in harm's way and his reconciliation in the Los Angeles Riots in 1992, after the beating of Rodney King, infuriated the NAACP and civil rights leaders. They blamed him for siding with the white community. Even though he was not forthcoming in criticizing the racial atmosphere in the army, Powell, in his capacity as a military leader, demonstrated his commitment to help young black men and women succeed in the armed forces.

Powell was well respected in the black community for his philanthropic activities as the chairman of the non-profit America's Promise foundation and for his fight for active government involvement in protecting the Civil Rights Act of 1964, ensuring constitutional protection for all Americans. On December 16, 2001, the Bush administration nominated Powell secretary of state. He was the first African American to hold the highest position in the state department and the highest-ranking black official in any U.S. administration. He was regarded as a moderate voice on several issues in the Bush administration, notably on Iraq. Powell urged caution and at times seemed at odds with his cabinet colleagues. His views in favor of involving the UN and giving Iraq a last chance to disarm eventually prevailed.

Even though a loyal Republican, Powell was extremely critical of the party's record on racism, and he advised Republicans to get rid of its southern strategy of pandering to certain constituencies at the expense of black voters. In the 2000 Republican Convention, he challenged the party to live up to the language of reconciliation, to adopt policies that lead to inclusiveness, and to provide minorities the opportunity to rise up the social ladder. In 2008, Powell openly supported and voted for Democratic presidential candidate Barack Obama, and, for this decision, he has been criticized by conservatives like Rush Limbaugh and Dick Cheney. Powell's passionate beliefs in family and his heartfelt love for the country made him a shining star in the galaxy of prominent Americans. Whether it was the humiliation inflicted on him as a black serviceman traveling in the Deep South or as an African American in the dangerous thickets of Vietnam, Powell survived the challenges. He stands as an inspiring example for future generations of Americans and more importantly for African Americans and immigrants. See also: Clinton, William Jefferson; Congressional Black Caucus; Obama, Barack

Bibliography

- Harari, Oren. The Leadership Secrets of Colin Powell. New York: R. R. Donnelley's Sons, 2002.
- Means, Howard. Colin Powell: Soldier/ Statesman-Statesman/ Soldier. New York: Donald I. Fine, 1992.
- Powell, Colin L., and Joseph E. Persico. My American Journey. New York: Random House, 1995.
- Roth, David. Sacred Honor: Colin Powell: The Inside Account of His Life and Triumphs. Grand Rapids, MI: Zondervan Publishing House, 2003.
- Wukowits, John F. The People in News. San Diego, CA: Lucent Books, 2000.

Pratt, Geronimo Ji Jaga

Geronimo Ji Jaga Pratt, former deputy minister of the Los Angeles branch of the Black Panther Party, spent 27 years in jail for the alleged murder of Caroline Olsen and the shooting of her husband, Kenneth, in 1968. Two black men allegedly attacked Caroline and Kenneth Olsen on a tennis court in December 1968. Three years later, Kenneth Olsen positively identified Geronimo Pratt as one of the assailants, from a photo given to him by the Los Angeles Police Department. Pratt was the fourth black man whom Olsen had identified.

Ji Jaga maintained his innocence throughout his incarceration. He always proclaimed that he was 400 miles away at a Black Panther Party meeting in Oakland at the time of the murder. Ji Jaga was apprehended in 1970 and charged with kidnapping and murder.

Ji Jaga was raised in Louisiana where he claimed to have witnessed lynchings and intimidation by groups such as the Ku Klux Klan. He later joined the army and was a highly decorated Vietnam veteran who served two combat tours in Vietnam. In total he earned 18 medals including two Purple Hearts.

On leaving the army he moved to Los Angeles and enrolled at UCLA. Within months of his arrival, Ji Jaga met Alprentice "Bunchy" Carter who was the founder of the local Black Panther Party (BPP) branch. In 1969, Carter and fellow BPP member John Huggins were murdered at Campbell Hall at UCLA in a dispute with US Organization members. George and Ali Stiner along with Claude Hubert of the US Organization were arrested, convicted, and sent to San Quentin prison for their involvement.

After Carter's death, BPP members found a tape Carter had previously recorded that instructed the Los Angeles

BPP to make Ji Jaga minister of defense. This made Ji Jaga a key member of the organization. Ji Jaga's combat experience and skills also became crucial as federal agencies led by the FBI targeted the BPP.

In the 1960s, the BPP and other revolutionary, leftist, and progressive organizations and individuals were targeted by the FBI's COINTELPRO (Counter Intelligence Program). Operations against the Panthers included continuing harassment by police agencies, misinformation supplied to Panthers to encourage tension among the ranks, and also deadly assaults like the 1969 December 4 raid in Chicago that killed Fred Hampton and Mark Clark. Four days later, the LAPD SWAT squad invaded the Los Angeles Panthers headquarters; however, the building had been fortified under the instructions of Ji Jaga, which prevented the police from gaining full access to the building.

As the Panthers held out inside the building, masses gathered around the police line, forcing the police to retreat. Six Panthers were wounded, 13 were arrested, but because of their successful self-defense, no Panthers were killed that night. The arrested Panthers were charged with assaulting the police and Ji Jaga spent two months in jail. All charges against the Panthers were later dropped.

When news of this event broke out, the FBI set out to "neutralize" Ji Jaga. On a nationwide tour, Ji Jaga was hounded by police surveillance and COINTELPRO disinformation designed to foster distrust against him within the BPP. In June 1970, the FBI sent out a memorandum on Ji Jaga along with his picture to FBI offices in New York, New Haven, Atlanta, Chicago, Sacramento, San Diego, and San Francisco.

This plot would result in his conviction for the robbery and murder of Caroline Olsen. The murder case was based on three primary contingencies. First was the ability of the key prosecution witness (Julius Butler) to convince the jury that he had heard Ji Jaga confess to the crime despite being a paid informant for the FBI and the LAPD. The district attorney convinced the jury that he was not simply a "snitch" or a paid informant. Second was the ability of the key prosecutor to conceal facts from the jury proved pivotal. On this note, the jury was never informed about the facts that Butler was a paid informant and that Kenneth Olsen had identified someone else as his wife's killer in a lineup. Third was the ability of the FBI to suppress any evidence in its possession that would support Ji Jaga's alibi that he was in Oakland at the time of the murder. All of this combined led to Ji Jaga spending 27 years in jail.

Elmer "Geronimo" Pratt (photo taken in 1971) was a member of the Black Panther Party in Los Angeles. (AP Photo)

Ji Jaga was designated a prisoner of conscience by Amnesty International. Amnesty International first called for a full federal inquiry into Pratt's case in a report published in October 1981. The organization also called on the governor of California to conduct an inquiry into the case in 1988. Over the years Ji Jaga and his defense team led by Johnnie Cochran filed a series of unsuccessful appeals against his conviction. In 1996, the defense was eventually allowed an evidentiary hearing based on new evidence that included information showing that Julius Butler was listed as a confidential informant in the state prosecutor's files at the time of Ji Jaga's initial trial.

Even after revelations about the FBI's COINTELPRO program in the late 1970s confirmed that Butler had been a police spy, Los Angeles authorities continued to oppose any retrial of Ji Jaga. According to the memoirs of former FBI agent Wesley Swearingen, the FBI also had a wiretap of the BPP headquarters in Los Angeles during the period that Caroline Olsen was killed. These wiretap logs showed that Ji Jaga was in San Francisco at the time of the murder, not in Los Angeles where the murder occurred.

Ji Jaga's alibi for the initial conviction was further undermined because the COINTELPRO operation had also succeeded in driving a wedge between different factions of the Panthers, and leading Panthers were discouraged from testifying in Ji Jaga's defense. At the initial trial, only Kathleen Cleaver testified in Ji Jaga's behalf. In 1996, however, six former BPP members testified that Ji Jaga was in San Francisco at the time of the murder.

In 1997, Orange County Court Judge Evertt Dickey, a conservative Republican, ruled that that Ji Jaga's 1972 conviction on murder and kidnapping charges should be overturned because of misconduct by the Los Angeles district attorney's office. In June 1997, Geronimo Ji Jaga Pratt was released from prison after spending 27 years in jail. In 1999, the Los Angeles district attorney's office noted that they would not seek a retrial. In 1997, the key witness against Ji Jaga, Julius Butler, resigned from the board of the First African Methodist Episcopal Church.

Ji Jaga considers himself to have been a political prisoner and still fights for the freedom of other inmates who he says have been repressed because of their political views, including Leonard Peltier, the American Indian advocate, and Mumia Abu Jamal, another ex-Black Panther. In April 2005, Ji Jaag also spoke at the funeral of his late lawyer, Johnnie Cochran.

See also: Black Panther Party; BPP, Los Angeles Branch; Cleaver, Kathleen Neal; COINTELPRO; Abu Jamal, Mumia

James Thomas Jones III

Bibliography

- Cochran, Johnnie, A Lawyers Life. Los Angeles: Thomas Dunne Books, 2002.
- Jones, Charles E., ed. The Black Panther Party: (Reconsidered). Baltimore: Black Classic Press, 1998.
- Olsen, Jack. Last Man Standing: The Tragedy and Triumph of Geronimo Pratt. New York: Anchor Books, 2001.
- Swearingen, W. FBI Secrets: An Agent's Expose. Boston: South End Books, 1994.

Racial Profiling

In spite of the significant legacy of the civil rights and due process movements on American public institutions, African Americans still face persisting problems of racial prejudice. Along with discrimination in education, employment, or housing, the salience of race in American contemporary society is particularly exemplified through racial profiling. Most commonly known as "Driving While Black" or "Driving While Brown" (D.W.B.), this highly controversial law enforcement practice refers to police-initiated stops that appear to target disproportionately African American and Hispanic drivers compared to their number on the highways. Minor traffic violations are used as a pretext to stop and interrogate motorists and look for drugs or weapons. For the African American collective memory, these much debated practices are reminiscent of the former slave patrols apprehending runaways in the antebellum South or of the traffic stops designed to arrest black political activists in the 1960s. Part of the American criminal justice history, they perpetuate the lasting mistrust between police and minorities and contribute to the widespread feeling among black citizens that they are excluded from the public space and alienated from their national citizenship.

These law enforcement procedures have increasingly been deployed since the War on Drugs, which was launched under the Nixon Administration. Created in 1973, the Drug Enforcement Agency (DEA) elaborated in the 1970s a "drug courier profile" in order to identify narcotics smugglers in the airports. Along with various behavioral predictive characteristics (e.g., cash payment of airline tickets, evidence of nervousness, use of an alias), the ethnic factor was an important component of these new criminal identification techniques. The law and order agenda that surfaced in the 1980s and festered in the 1990s paved the way for new coercive social control frameworks that led to a major political shift in state power conception. In a context of moral panic about violence and lawlessness, stringent law enforcement and massive penal containment were voiced by opinion-formers and policymakers as the only efficient solutions for the expansion of crack markets and for the rise of the youth gun violence. Under the "Operation Pipeline," a training program set off by the DEA, police officers multiplied from the mid-1980s on pretextual traffic stops on the highways of all 50 states.

With the support of civil rights advocates and organizations, African Americans have criticized the legitimacy of these proactive devices, which undermine their confidence in the police at the local and national levels. Even if law enforcement agencies have long denied the use of racial profiling, several statistical analyses have firmly established, as a result of court actions, the ordinary and arbitrary nature of these police practices. As part of the settlement of Wilkins v. Maryland State Police (1993), a civil lawsuit filed by a black Harvard Law School graduate, data analyzed by expert John Lamberth from Temple University showed that if African Americans represented 72 percent of the traffic stops initiated by the Maryland State Police, they only committed 17 percent of the traffic violations. In State of New Jersey v. Soto (1996), the same expert called by the defense in this criminal case found out that if blacks constituted 13 percent of the driving population, 73 percent of the arrested motorists by the New Jersey State Troopers were black. In 1999, the New Jersey Attorney General's Office acknowledged in an official report that African Americans were twice as likely to be the target of police stops.

Exacerbated by prevalent stereotypes of a violent and criminal black lower class, the high rates of homicide suffered by African Americans and their overrepresentation in the official arrest statistics enabled police organizations to give tacit support to racial profiling. Building on a "statistical discrimination" theory, economists have actually argued that these law enforcement procedures were not an accurate testimony of intentional racial discrimination but an effective method for maximizing "hit rates," namely the successful arrests of drug traffickers and seizures of narcotics contraband. Conversely, legal scholars, as well as social scientists, have pointed out that those investigation techniques had a fateful consequence on the racial demographics of the prison population, which saw for the last two decades a dramatic increase in the incarceration rate of young black males. By disproportionately scrutinizing minorities, racial profiling mechanically contributes to the racialization of criminal justice.

In spite of multiple legal challenges to those police procedures, American judicial institutions have supported these investigation techniques, which have been extensively deployed since the 1980s by law enforcement agents. On the one hand, plaintiffs in civil cases have met tremendous difficulties to prove that police officers were motivated by an intentional racial discrimination and violated the equal protection guarantee of the Fourteenth Amendment. On the other hand, the United States Supreme Court has given over the years increasing power to law enforcement agents in order to effect search and seizure. As early as 1968, the Supreme Court articulated in Terry v. Ohio the first legal principle according to which investigative stops were not a constitutional violation of the unreasonable search and seizure clause of the Fourth Amendment. In 1996, this ruling was notably reinforced in Whren v. United States. Dismissing the racial argument, the Court asserted that the traffic violation can be considered by itself a probable cause or a reasonable suspicion for a police-initiated stop even if this offense rationale is only an excuse for a drug investigation. In 1997, the Supreme Court went even further; in Maryland v. Wilson it stated that police officers may command the driver or any passenger out of the vehicle during a lawful stop and search. These successive decisions were deeply criticized by legal scholars and civil liberties organizations, as law enforcement agents were given significant latitude in making searches and seizures that could lead to police misconduct and brutality against law-abiding and minority citizens.

As racial profiling is strongly embedded in social practices and legal mechanisms, it deeply influences African Americans' perceptions of the legitimacy of democratic institutions. These investigation devices broaden the racial cleavage, as they are considered very differently by blacks and whites. According to a December 1999 Gallup Poll, if 77 percent of blacks and 56 percent of whites believed that racial profiling was widespread, 42 percent of blacks compared to only 6 percent of whites felt that police-initiated stops were motivated by their racial or ethnic background. The survey also underlined the unequal confidence in the criminal justice system fairness, as 58 percent of blacks compared to 85 percent of whites had a favorable opinion of their local police. Regardless of their law obedience and social status, black motorists driving on the highway and black pedestrians walking in white neighborhoods feel particularly humiliated to be stopped, interrogated, and searched disproportionately by police officers. African Americans have to adjust their daily behaviors to these law enforcement practices by avoiding lavish cars and certain racially identified places and also by training their children to react properly to police-initiated stops. In this respect, these investigation devices contribute objectively to the perpetuation of residential segregation, as African Americans may prefer to live in a black neighborhood where they feel they will be less subject to police stops. Enacted primarily for criminal purposes, profiling techniques not only perpetuates the persistent beliefs about inequality within minority communities but also maintain racial hierarchy in American society.

Political leaders took stock in the late 1990s of the impact of racial profiling on civil liberties and race relations. In 1997, Representative John Conyers of Michigan introduced the Traffic Stops Statistics Act, which passed in March 1998 by a unanimous vote the House of Representatives, but not the Senate. Its purpose was to enhance the accountability and strengthen the control of these investigation techniques. The bill required that data on each police-initiated traffic stops should be collected on a nationwide basis and analyzed by the attorney general. It addresses the need for consistency in reporting data such as the date and location of the stop, the ethnicity and age of the motorist, the alleged traffic offense, as well the rationale for the search. Supporting this legislative initiative, the American Civil Liberties Union (ACLU) launched a campaign in 1999 to end to the use of pretext stops and to pass the Traffic Stops Statistics Act. It also called on the U.S. Justice Department to ensure that racial profiling was not used in federally funded drug interdiction programs. With other civil rights organizations such as the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP), the ACLU also filed lawsuits against several states such as Colorado, Illinois, Maryland, Michigan, Oklahoma, and Pennsylvania. Even though this bill has not since become a federal law, some states have passed legislation and adopted written guidelines on traffic stops. During the 2000 presidential debates, the two candidates asserted that racial profiling was damaging for minority communities.

The September 11 terrorist attacks brought to an end the uneasy consensus that was emerging across the national political spectrum in the late 1990s on the inappropriateness of racial profiling. The U.S. Patriot Act of 2001 authorized police to search for any property and seize any material pursuant to a search warrant that represents evidence of a criminal offence in violation of the laws of the United States. Arab Americans, Middle Easterners, South Asians, and Muslims have since been the prime target of these provisions. Recalling the detainment of Japanese Americans during World War II, which was authorized in 1942 by President Roosevelt and endorsed in 1944 by the U.S. Supreme Court (Korematsu v. United States), the ACLU, the Congressional Black Caucus, and the NAACP questioned, among other organizations, the legitimacy of the antiterrorist laws regarding the protection of civil liberties. They also pointed out how these provisions might roll back the minor improvements realized in matters of racial profiling for an African American population that has increasingly been embracing Islam. Revealing how much the debate is far from closed, a bipartisan group of lawmakers in the House of Representatives and Senate introduced the End Racial Profiling Act in 2004.

Part of African American history, the changing racial profiling patterns demonstrate the flexibility of a social control technique that can be deployed by law enforcement agencies to address tragic historical situations but also maneuvered to a large extent by policymakers and opinion-formers to answer moral panic that they themselves helped to create.

See also: Fourteenth Amendment

Jean-Philippe Dedieu

Bibliography

- Bass, Sandra. "Policing Space, Policing Race: Social Control Imperatives and Police Discretionary Decisions." Social Justice 28 (2001):156–76.
- Domke, David, Philip Garland, Andre Billeaudeau, and John Hutcheson. "Insights into U.S. Racial Hierarchy: Racial Profiling, News Sources, and September 11." Journal of Communication 53 (2003):606–23.
- Harcourt, Bernard E. "Rethinking Racial Profiling: A Critique of the Economics, Civil Liberties, and Constitutional Literature, and of Criminal Profiling More Generally." The University of Chicago Law Review 71 (2004):1275–381.
- Harris, David. "Driving While Black and All Other Traffic Offenses: The Supreme Court and Pretextual Traffic Stops." The Journal of Criminal Law and Criminology 87 (1997):544–82.
- Harris, David. Profiles in Injustice: Why Racial Profiling Cannot Work. New York: New Press, 2002.
- Heumann, Milton, and Lance Cassak. Good Cop, Bad Cop: Racial Profiling and Competing Views of Justice. New York: Peter Lang, 2003.
- Kennedy, Randall. Race, Crime, and the Law. New York: Pantheon, 1997.
- Miller, Jerome. Search and Destroy: African American Males in the Criminal Justice System. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1996.
- Weitzer, Ronald, and Steven A. Tuch. "Perceptions of Racial Profiling: Race, Class, and Personal Experience." Criminology 40 (2002):435–56.

Radical Republicans

The Radical Republicans were a faction of the Republican Party during Reconstruction who wanted to punish the South and completely uproot its feudal race-based society and replace it with an egalitarian and democratic system.

During the Civil War, the radicals opposed President Abraham Lincoln's call for a quick and lenient readmission of Southern states into the Union. They wanted tougher restrictions against former Confederates and greater civil rights protections for the freedmen, as well as ratification of the Thirteenth Amendment and repudiation of the Confederate war debt. Lincoln used a pocket veto to prevent the radical Wade-Davis bill from becoming law in 1864. Congress retaliated by refusing to seat delegations from three Southern states who met Lincoln's less stringent qualifications.

After Lincoln's assassination, President Andrew Johnson adopted a reconstruction policy that greatly restricted the rights of the former slaves, and he freely pardoned former Confederate officers. These policies outraged the radical Republicans who had after the war become an alliance of the prewar abolition movement and the newly freed slaves. To undo Johnson, the radicals in Congress passed the Civil Rights Bill of 1866, a Southern Homestead Act, the Fourteenth Amendment, and extension of the Freedmen's Bureau. Johnson vetoed all of these bills, but Congress easily overrode the president. In 1867, the conflict between Johnson and the radicals led Congress to a failed attempt to remove the president from office.

The Radical Republican agenda reached its zenith with the Reconstruction Acts of 1867. These acts divided the South into five military districts. Congress entrusted the army to guarantee that African Americans had the ability to exercise their civil and suffrage rights. The acts further stipulated that Southern states must ratify the Fourteenth Amendment (and later the Fifteenth Amendment) in order to be readmitted to the Union.

The alliance between black and white Republicans in the South was often contentious. African Americans were concerned that they did not get their due share of patronage and offices, considering that they made up the overwhelming majority of Republican voters in the South. Increasingly, however, they became more assertive in their demands as they gained political power and experience. During Reconstruction, 16 Radical black Republicans served in Congress, including two United States senators. Blacks held one governorship and many other higher state offices throughout the South. More than 600 African Americans served in Southern state legislatures.

The Southern state governments established by the Radical Republicans after 1867 had to carry most of the burden of Reconstruction without financial assistance from Congress or the moral support of the Northern electorate. Radical state governments throughout the South supported a program of wide sweeping reforms as revolutionary as those of 1776. These reforms bettered the interests not only of the freedmen, but also the poor whites. Reforms included subsidization of railway construction, which provided both jobs and access to markets for the poorer agricultural areas; a system of free public education; regulations curbing abuses in the tenant farming system; purchase of land for redistribution; a liberalized penal code; and bans on discriminatory election laws.

By 1870, the influence of Radical Republicans in Washington was in sharp decline. The Ku Klux Klan Act of 1870 and a watered down Civil Rights Act in 1875 were the last dying gasp of radicalism. In a series of important decisions handed down in the 1870s and 1880s, the United States Supreme Court weakened the provisions of the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments, undermining the efforts of the radicals to gain African American equality. The death of Representative Thaddeus Stevens in 1868 and Senator Charles Sumner in 1874 deprived the radicals of their strongest leaders. Economic issues arising from industrial society and mass immigration attracted the attention of the Northern voters, as they deemed conditions in the South inconsequential to their interests.

At the state level, following readmission of the Southern states, conservative white Democrats used violence and intimidation to frighten African Americans from the polls. The Achilles heel of the radical program had been the necessity to borrow heavily and raise taxes in order to finance their reforms. As conservative whites used race as a wedge issue to divide poor and middle class whites from the Radical African American Republicans, they leveled a series of volatile accusations against the radicals, including financial mismanagement, corruption, and race baiting. Although examples of corruption abound, they were neither more numerous, nor more egregious than they were at contemporary Northern state or the national legislatures. Moreover, native Southern whites showed no scruples when it came to overcharging the radical state governments for services such as bond sales.

One by one as conservative white Democrats captured state governments, they implemented grandfather clauses, literacy tests, and other means to restrict black suffrage. When President Rutherford B. Hayes withdrew the last of the federal troops from the South in 1877, Radical Republicanism ceased to exist. Gains made by African Americans in civil and political rights during Radical Reconstruction were lost by the end of the 19th century.

See also: Civil Rights Act of 1866; Civil Rights Act of 1875; Fifteenth Amendment; Fourteenth Amendment; Hayes, Rutherford B.; Johnson, Andrew; Joint Committee of Fifteen; Lincoln, Abraham; Reconstruction Era Black Politicians; Republican Party; Stevens, Thaddeus; Sumner, Charles

Gregory J. Dehler

Bibliography

- Foner, Eric. Reconstruction: America's Unfinished Revolution, 1863–1877. New York: Harper and Row, 1988.
- Hahn, Steven. A Nation Under Our Feet: Black Political Struggles in the Rural South, From Slavery to the Great Migration. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 2003.
- Hyman, Harold M. The Radical Republicans and Reconstruction, 1861–1870. Indianapolis: Bobbs-Merrill, 1967.
- Summers, Mark Wahlgren. Railroads, Reconstruction, and the Gospel of Prosperity: Aid Under the Radical Republicans, 1865–1877. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1984.
- Trefouse, Hans. The Radical Republicans: Lincoln's Vanguard for Racial Justice. New York: Knopf, 1969.

Randolph, A. Philip

Asa Philip Randolph (1889–1979) was an African American trade union and civil rights leader who advocated the use of labor movements as a promising tool in the African American struggle for civil rights. He founded the Brotherhood of the Sleeping Car Porters and organized mass protests to end segregation and discrimination in employment and the army.

Randolph was born to an African Methodist Episcopal minister and a seamstress in Crescent, Florida. Although Randolph grew up in a very religious environment, he later became an atheist, but always maintained his strong belief in nonviolence. In 1891, his family moved to Jacksonville, Florida, a city with a thriving African American community. His parents wanted to provide a good education to Randolph and his brother and sent them to Cookman Institute, a superior black school. Randolph was an excellent student and was the valedictorian of his class. After high school, he experienced employment discrimination and segregation firsthand, in that he could find only low-paying manual labor jobs. During this time, he gained his first experience in organizing black workers to protest against their bad situation.

Part of the first wave of African American migration from the Deep South to Northern cities in search for a better future, Randolph moved to New York City and settled down in Harlem with plans to become an actor. Working again in menial jobs during the day, he took classes at the City College of New York and New York University at night. He soon realized that the employment opportunities and conditions of blacks in the North were not as different from the Deep South as he had hoped. After his parents forbid him to pursue an acting career, he switched majors from drama to politics and economics, but never graduated.

In 1914, he married Lucille Green, a widow six years his senior, who operated a beauty shop and was able to finance them both. Through his wife, Randolph met Chandler Owen, a Columbia University student, who shared his ideas and socialist convictions. They both joined the Socialist Party and dispersed their ideas as soapbox orators in Harlem. Both men considered socialism the remedy for the social and political problems of America and the route to promote social justice and political equality for African Americans.

As the majority of African Americans were part of the labor force, Randolph believed organizing and mobilizing black workers in labor movements was the way to eventually achieve civil rights. He fused labor rights with civil rights. Although never opposing racial integration, Randolph oscillated between all-black activism and interracial cooperation. Throughout his life, Randolph was convinced that change had to come from within the black community. Blacks should no longer beg for improvement. Randolph believed that only the pressure of black mass movement and nonviolent civil disobedience could change politics and public opinion and improve the position of African Americans.

In November 1917, Randolph and Owen began publishing The Messenger, a socialist monthly magazine that gained an excellent reputation in the African American community. As an intellectual voice for the Harlem community, The Messenger advocated socialism and unionism among blacks. Through the magazine, Randolph opposed World War I and African American participation in it and protested racism and racial violence in the United States.

Although treasuring racial pride, Randolph rejected racial separatism and became one of Marcus Garvey's most forthright opponents. For Randolph, racial pride and racial integration were compatible. With the help of George Schuyler, the two managed to continue publishing the financially variable magazine.

Between 1917 and 1923, Randolph and Owen independently founded numerous labor unions to include blacks in the labor movement. Randolph continuously fought unions and the American Federation of Labor (AFL) and the Congress of Industrial Organizations (CIO) for their racism and exclusion of black workers. Although Randolph was initially a staunch advocate of socialism, he was to remain an fervent anticommunist throughout his life.

In 1925, knowing Randolph's support of black workers' rights, the Pullman porters, an all-black service staff of the Pullman sleeping cars, asked him to help them found and lead a trade union to fight for their rights. Underpaid and exploited, they wanted better employment and working conditions. Randolph met with the porters and on August 25, 1925, they founded the Brotherhood of Sleeping Car Porters (BSCP). For the next 10 years, under Randolph's leadership and using The Messenger and later his magazine Black Worker as a medium, the union struggled to reach their goals. The Pullman company defamed Randolph and continuously refused to negotiate with the union. In 1935, the union finally forced the company to negotiate. After two years of bargaining, the company agreed to a contract that included wage increases and work-hour reduction. With the signing of the contract, the Brotherhood became the officially accepted representative of the Pullman porters. It was the first victory of an all-black union over an American company. Randolph remained the president of the BSCP until 1968. In 1978, the union dissolved and its remaining members merged with the Brotherhood of Railway and Airline Clerks.

Through his efforts for economic improvement combined with civil rights, Randolph gained a respected status in the African American community. In 1936, during his struggle for the BSCP, Randolph became president of the newly founded National Negro Congress (NNC). The NNC was a loose association of African American groups and white supporters. It was especially committed to the labor movement and cooperated closely with trade unions to create a blacks mass movement. Randolph left the NNC when he thought it to be increasingly influenced by Communists and white labor movements.

With the rising number of job opportunities in the defense industry in the late 1930s and early 1940s, the second wave of black migration from South to North took place. African Americans, however, often met with racial discrimination when searching for work in the defense industry. Despite serious efforts and pleas, the White House did not help improve the situation of African Americans who became increasingly frustrated and angry. Basing his activism on this anger, Randolph called for a march of 100,000 African Americans on Washington to protest discrimination in defense industry and the armed forces. He launched the March on Washington Movement (MOWM), demanding an executive order to abolish discrimination in the defense industry and the military. With his plan for mass mobilization, Randolph became the advocate of a new approach in the Civil Rights movement. The date for the all-black march was set for July 1, 1941. Initially hesitant to submit to the pressure, Roosevelt gave in due to the mere threat of a protest march of tens of thousands of African American in Washington. On June 25, 1941, President Roosevelt issued Executive Order 8802 that forbade government contractors to practice employment discrimination based on race, creed, color, or national origin and included the creation of a Fair Employment Practices Committee (FEPC) to enforce the order. Randolph canceled the march. After the political success of the planned march, he continued the MOWM. The all-black mass movement that stood for non-violent civil disobedience acted locally and organized rallies against discrimination.

A. Philip Randolph won respect for his quiet dignity and his firmness in a life-long commitment to racial justice. A union organizer and socialist early in life, he became the country's best-known African American trade unionist and a nationally prominent leader in the struggle for civil rights during the early to mid-20th century. (Library of Congress)

After the war, Randolph turned his attention to an issue that he had failed to attain with his March on Washington in 1941—the integration of the armed forces. In 1947, the Congress and the American public discussed a Selective Service Act and Universal Military Training without considering the abolishment of segregation. To fight military segregation, Randolph and Grant Reynolds founded the Committee against Jim Crow in the Military Service and later the League of Nonviolent Civil Disobedience Against Military Service. Initially, the committee used traditional means of communication and publishing, but soon it stepped up pressure by threatening that African Americans would no longer bear arms for the United States if the armed forces did not integrate and ban discrimination. It urged black youth to resist induction and military service. In a meeting with President Truman and a speech before the Senate Armed Service Committee, Randolph laid out his position and could not be dissuaded from his militant plans to launch a mass movement boycotting the military. Needing the black vote in the upcoming presidential election and fearing Randolph's civil unrest, President Truman issued Executive Order 9981 on July 26, 1948. It ordered the equal treatment and opportunity for all and the formation of an advisory committee. Randolph was pleased and called off the civil disobedience campaign in August 1948.

After the end of the League of Nonviolent Civil Disobedience Against Military Service in 1948 and of the Committee Against Jim Crow in the Military Service with the beginning of the Korean War, Randolph worked again more powerfully for an end to labor discrimination and trade union segregation. In 1955, he was elected vice president of the newly merged AFL-CIO's Executive Council.

To pressure trade unions and the AFL-CIO to improve the position of African Americans in unions, Randolph founded the Negro American Labor Council (NALC) over which he presided from 1960 to 1966.

Randolph cooperated more closely with the NAACP and other civil rights groups and gave up his idea of establishing his own Civil Rights movement. With his trade union activism, he also supported the fight and organized protest marches for the integration of American schools. He continued to organize marches, pressuring the administration for change. In cooperation with the NAACP and Martin Luther King Jr., he organized, for example, The Prayer Pilgrimage on May 17, 1957, where about 50,000 people protested and prayed for freedom in front of the Lincoln Memorial. Randolph's belief in the effectiveness of mass movements influenced the development of the new generation of Civil Rights movements and their strategies to attain full civil rights.

In March 1962, Randolph conceived a plan for a new march on Washington protesting the slow economic progress, especially of black youth. Randolph worked with Martin Luther King Jr., and his planned Jobs Rights March and Mobilization became the March on Washington for Jobs and Opportunities. The movement was an interracial project that, in contrast to Randolph's initial plans, was a protest for new civil rights acts rather than only economic improvement. Randolph became the director of the march and cooperated closely with Bayard Rustin whom he considered the best organizer and logistician. On August 28, 1963, a march on Washington conceived by Randolph finally materialized. Though broadened in its aims and modernized, it was based on his earlier March on Washington Movement and the fulfillment of his long-held dream. After the 1963 March on Washington, black protest radicalized and often rebutted nonviolent civil disobedience. Randolph rejected these developments and stood for more traditional and less militant methods of activism. The new movements often castigated him for his opinion.

In 1964, Randolph received the Presidential Medal of Freedom from President Lyndon B. Johnson. In 1968, he retired as the President of the BSCP and became president of the A. Philip Randolph Institute, a national organization of black trade unionists, founded by Randolph and Bayard Rustin in 1965. Supported by the AFL-CIO, the institute pledged to bridge the gap between the African American community and the trade unions. In 1979, A. Philip Randolph died at the age of 90. He is well remembered in the African American community for his struggle for black workers and civil rights.

See also: Brotherhood of Sleeping Car Porters; Jim Crow; March on Washington Movement, 1941; March on Washington, 1963; National Association for the Advancement of Colored People

Christine Knauer

Bibliography

- Anderson, Jervis. A. Philip Randolph: A Biographical Portrait. New York: Harcourt Brace Jovanovich, 1973.
- Barber, Lucy G. Marching on Washington: The Forging of an American Political Tradition. Berkeley: University of California Press, 2002.
- Bates, Beth Tompkins. Pullman Porters and the Rise of Protest Politics in Black America, 1925–1945. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 2001.
- Davis, Daniel S. Mr. Black Labor: The Story of A. Philip Randolph, Father of the Civil Rights Movement. New York: E. P. Dutton, 1972.
- Garfinkel, Herbert. When Negroes March: The March on Washington Movement in the Organizational Politics for FEPC. Glencoe, IL: Free Press, 1959.
- Harris, William H. Keeping the Faith: A. Philip Randolph, Milton P. Webster, and the Brotherhood of Sleeping Car Porters 1925–37. Urbana: University of Illinois, 1977.
- Pfeffer, Paula F. A Philip Randolph, Pioneer of the Civil Rights Movement. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1990.
- Wright, Sarah E. A. Philip Randolph. Integration in the Workplace. Englewood Cliffs, NJ: Silver Burdett Press, 1990.

Ray, James Earl

James Earl Ray (1928–1998) was a career criminal who confessed to the slaying of Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. in Memphis, Tennessee, on April 4, 1968. Despite his admission of guilt in open court the next year, Ray's ambiguous statements before, during, and after his trial raised serious questions about what had motivated him and whether or not he had acted alone. The entire truth about the assassination may never be known.

Born in Alton, Illinois, on March 10, 1928, Ray was the oldest of the nine children of George (Speedy) and Lucille Maher Ray. Raised in extreme poverty in the country town of Ewing, Missouri, Ray dropped out of school and left home at the age of 16. After enlisting in the U.S. Army just before his 18th birthday, he served in Germany for almost three years until December 1948, when he was given a general discharge for ineptness and lack of adaptability for military service.

Within a year of his dismissal from the army, Ray began a life of crime and punishment. He committed a number of armed robberies, and from October 1949 until his escape from the Missouri State Penitentiary in April 1967, Ray spent more than 14 years behind bars. While a fugitive, he traveled extensively using money most likely accumulated from dealing contraband in prison. After visiting New Orleans in December 1967, he apparently began to stalk Dr. King for the purpose of killing him. Ray's racism had been obvious to many people who came in contact with him, and his intolerance of African Americans had festered for years.

Ray purchased a high-powered rifle, scope, and ammunition in Alabama at the end of March and drove to Memphis a few days later. He checked into a rooming house across the street from the Lorraine Motel where King and other members of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference were staying. They had come to support black sanitation workers in their strike against the city and planned to lead a march downtown on the following day. As the group prepared to leave the motel for dinner at about 6:00 P.M., a single gunshot rang out, fatally wounding King.

Ray left the scene immediately, narrowly avoiding a police dragnet. Investigators recovered a rifle with Ray's fingerprints on it almost immediately. The assassin drove to Atlanta, got on a northbound bus, and slipped across the border to Canada less than 40 hours after the murder. Two months later, immigration officers at Heathrow Airport in London apprehended Ray when he attempted to board a plane for Brussels. The British government quickly extradited him to the United States.

After Ray fired his first lawyer, Judge Preston Battle reset the legal proceedings for April 7, 1969. Instead of standing trial, Ray took his attorney's advice and pled guilty to murder in exchange for a 99 year sentence. Within days, he changed his mind, dismissed his counsel, and petitioned the judge for a reversal of his sentence. From that time until his death from liver disease in 1998, Ray proclaimed his innocence and insisted that an elaborate conspiracy lay behind the assassination of King. Despite his constant agitation, the state of Tennessee never granted him a new trial. See also: King, Martin Luther Jr.; Southern Christian Leadership Conference

Michael Thomas Gavin

Bibliography

- McMillan, George. The Making of an Assassin: The Life of James Earl Ray. Boston: Little, Brown, 1976.
- Posner, Gerald. Killing the Dream: James Earl Ray and the Assassination of Martin Luther King, Jr. New York: Random House, 1998.
- Seigenthaler, John. A Search for Justice. Nashville, TN: Aurora Publishers, 1971.

Reagon, Bernice Johnson

Bernice Johnson Reagon (1942–), a musician, writer, activist, educator, cultural historian, and curator, devoted her entire career to weaving her life experiences into the study of African American history. She was born on October 4, 1942 in Albany, Georgia to Beatrice Wise and Reverend Jessie Johnson. The third of eight children, she was exposed at an early age to the challenges facing blacks living in the South and learned the value of struggle and protest in facing those challenges.

Reagon grew up with music as the cornerstone of her professional career. From her father, also a singer, she learned the basics and began singing in his Baptist church at the age of five. In the fall of 1959, she entered Albany State College in Albany, Georgia where she majored in music and also studied German lieder and Italian arias.

While at Albany, she was secretary of the local Youth Chapter of the NAACP but found she preferred the more confrontational style of the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee (SNCC) and participated in a march in her hometown protesting the arrest of two students in 1961. She was arrested along with other members of SNCC and was suspended from school for her involvement. It was her attraction to the protest songs sung by the marchers and the songs sung by fellow incarcerated women that moved her to join SNCC's Freedom Singers in 1962, and to enter Spelman College in Atlanta that same year as a history major. She left within a year, however, to join SNCC's Freedom Singers, performing at mass meetings, fundraisers, and voter registration drives. During this time, she met and married Cordell Reagon, a SNCC field worker and Freedom Singer from Tennessee. She left the Freedom Singers to give birth to her first child, Toshi, in 1964; she later gave birth to a son, Kwan Tauna, in 1965. She was the founder of the a capella group, the Harambee Singers in 1966 and recorded her first solo album, Songs of the South in 1966 followed by Sound of Thunder in 1967. For several years, following her divorce from Cordell also in 1967, Reagon pursued her study of traditional African American music.

Reagon left Atlanta in 1968 to perform during the Poor People's Campaign on the Washington Mall where she was first exposed to the Smithsonian Institution's Festival of American Folklife, an annual event that presents American culture in a festival-type setting. After completing her studies at Spelman in 1970, she moved to Washington, D.C. permanently to work as a field researcher for the Folklife Festival. She began working full-time at the Smithsonian Institution in 1974 as the founder and cultural historian in the African Diaspora Project of the Division of Performing Arts where she conducted extensive research on the relationship between black cultural expression throughout Africa, the Caribbean, and South America. The project later evolved into the Program in African American Culture.

In 1973, she founded Sweet Honey in the Rock, an internationally renowned a capella group of women that performs a broad repertoire of music ranging from traditional blues and spiritual music to modern folk and protest songs. Sweet Honey evolved from Reagon's continued interest in merging education and music with social and political issues. Sweet Honey has performed all over the world, not only in festivals and concerts, but in significant political and cultural venues such as the United Nations Decade for Women Conference in Nairobi, Kenya in 1985.

While working at the Smithsonian and performing with Sweet Honey during its infancy, Reagon pursued a doctorate degree in history at Howard University, which she was awarded in 1975. Her dissertation, Songs of the Civil Rights Movement, 1955–1965: A Study in Culture History, explores oral traditions and examines both freedom protests songs of the 1960s and popular commercial protest songs as oral history sources for reconstructing historical periods. When Smithsonian's Performing Arts Division was dismantled, Reagon was transferred to the Public Programs Division of the National Museum of American History in 1983 where she continued to direct the Program in African American Culture until she was promoted to curator of the Division of Community Life in 1988.

While at the Smithsonian, Reagon was instrumental as a contributor and consultant to the award-winning Voices of the Civil Rights Movement: Black American Freedom Songs 1960–1966, a collection of freedom songs documented within the context of African American musical culture. In 1993, she retired from the Smithsonian and was made Curator Emeritus of the National Museum of American History. Also that year, she was appointed Distinguished Professor of history at American University where she taught until 2002.

Throughout retirement, Reagon has remained active, serving as scholar, producer, and host of the groundbreaking radio series Wade in the Water: African American Sacred Music Traditions, a collaborative production of National Public Radio and the Smithsonian Institution, which began broadcasting in 1994, for which she received the Peabody Award for Significant and Meritorious Achievement in Broadcasting in 1994. She was a contributor author and editor of We'll Understand it Better By and By: Pioneering African American Gospel Composers (1992) and We Who Believe in Freedom: Sweet Honey in the Rock Still on the Journey (1993). In 1998 she served as composer and compiler of the sound score for the award-winning documentary film Africans in America: America's Journey Through Slavery. Reagon composed and produced much of Sweet Honey's repertoire, but in 1996, she retired as artistic director, participating instead as part of a collective artistic directorship. After more than 30 years of performing with the group, she fully retired from Sweet Honey in 2004.

Throughout her career, Reagon has been recognized for her artistry and scholarship in African American history and culture. She was awarded the genius award from the John D. and Catherine T. MacArthur Foundation Fellowship in 1989 and received the Presidential Medal for her contributions to public understanding of the humanities in 1995. In 2003, she received the Heinz Award for the Arts and Humanities. She returned to Spelman as the William and Camille Cosby Endowed Professor in the Fine Arts for the 2002–2003 academic year. For more than 40 years, Reagon has contributed to the study of African American culture and history as a scholar, educator, artist, and activist. She continues to lecture on the evolution of cultural history.

See also: Albany, Georgia Movement; National Association for the Advancement of Colored People; Poor People's Campaign; Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee

Donna M. Wells

Bibliography

Harding, Vincent, and Rosemarie Freney Harding. Bernice Johnson Reagon: The Singing Warrior. Denver, CO: Veterans of Hope Project, 2000.

Stuckey, Sterling. Going Through the Storm: The Influence of African American Art in History. New York: Oxford University Press, 1994.

Reconstruction Era Black Politicians

After the American Civil War and the implementation of the Reconstruction Acts, African Americans for the first time in U.S. history had the opportunity to take part in the political process. Among those who tried to implement social, political, and economic reform during Reconstruction were a small percentage of African American politicians.

Approximately 2,000 African Americans held political office at the local, state, and national level during Reconstruction (1865–1877). These individuals who had been disenfranchised now stood at the center of power. They came from diverse backgrounds. Nearly half had been free before the Civil War while the other half had experienced the horrors of slavery and acquired their freedom through manumission, running away, or simply purchasing themselves. Approximately 100 of the nearly 2,000 African American politicians during Reconstruction in the South were Northern blacks who migrated to the South after the war to assist in securing the rights of millions of former slaves.

The professional training that African American politicians possessed varied as much as their origins. Individuals who held local political office—sheriffs, tax collectors, town councilmen, etc.—generally had limited education and some were illiterate. They depended on others for help in conducting business. African American politicians who held state and national office were usually educated and many had extensive formal education. For example, Hiram Revels, who was elected to the U.S. Senate from Mississippi in 1870, was an ordained minister of the African Methodist Episcopal Church and received formal training at a Quaker seminary in Indiana and at Illinois's Knox College. The first major foray for many African Americans into politics after the Civil War was in the state constitutional conventions held throughout the former Confederate states. Although each state had constitutional conventions with African American members, the number and influence of those members varied from state to state. For example, South Carolina's 1868 state constitutional convention was composed of a majority of African Americans. By contrast, Alabama's constitutional convention was composed of only a small minority of African Americans and therefore they wielded less influence.

The states where African Americans had a major presence in the state constitutional conventions usually translated into a major presence in a state's legislature. In the first South Carolina legislature, there were a total of 127 members; 87 were African Americans. Where they had a majority in state legislatures, African Americans were able to bring about major changes to protect the rights of the newly freed people. African American politicians were also concerned with providing education and a way for all African Americans to pursue the American dream of land ownership.

Despite the tenacity of many African American politicians at the state level, they faced constant opposition. In Georgia in September 1868, for example, the white members of the state legislature refused to seat all of the African American members. The white legislators simply declared that the African American members were ineligible. One year later Georgia's Supreme Court ruled that African Americans were eligible to serve in the Georgia legislature and were allowed to assume their seats; however, they continued to face opposition to any legislation they proposed.

The first African American congressmembers of the United States (from left to right): Senator Hiram Revels of Mississippi, Representatives Benjamin Turner of Alabama, Robert C. De Large of South Carolina, Josiah Walls of Florida, Jefferson Long of Georgia, Joseph Rainy of South Carolina, and R. Brown Elliott of South Carolina. (Library of Congress)

African American politicians confronted animosity not only from their counterparts in state assemblies, but from hate groups as well, most notably the Ku Klux Klan. Between 1867 and 1868 approximately 10 percent of African Americans who served as delegates at constitutional conventions had become victims of Klan violence.

Regardless of the animosity exhibited toward many African American politicians at the state level, some were able to build a strong base of support and enact reform, at least on the local level, in favor of African Americans. For example, Blanche K. Bruce (who would become the first African American to win a full six-year term in the U.S. Senate) created a strong political machine in Bolivar County, Mississippi. At one point during Reconstruction he held three offices—sheriff, tax collector, and superintendent of education.

Even though many African American politicians were able to have some influence locally in voting rights and education, their influence was limited because at no time during Reconstruction was there a complete African American rule in the South. The only African American who came closest to controlling the governorship in any former Confederate state was Pickney B. S. Pinchback, the lieutenant governor of Louisiana. After the impeachment of the state's governor, Henry Wormoth, in December 1872, Pinchback served as governor for 41 days. There would not be another African American governor in the United States until 1990.

A handful of African American politicians at the state level used their positions for personal gain. For example, Thomas W. Cardozo, who served as Mississippi's superintendent of education, was convicted of embezzling funds marked for Tugaloo College.

At the national level African American politicians held seats in the U.S. House of Representatives and U.S. Senate. Although small in number—only 18 African Americans served in the U.S. Congress from 1868–1877, they fought not only for the rights of African Americans, but pushed for improvements to local infrastructure, protective tariffs, and relief for Native Americans.

Despite the presence of African American politicians at the national, state, and local level, the steps they had taken toward true equality were thwarted by the mid-1870s as whites and former Confederate officials began to “redeem” their governments and implement repressive measures that excluded African Americans from the political process. Although African American politicians may not have accomplished all they had hoped, they proved that they were as worthy of political office as much as any white politician. Furthermore, it gave many African Americans hope that one day they would be treated as equals in all levels of society.

See also: Bruce, Blanche K.; Disfranchisement; Fifteenth Amendment; Ku Klux Klan; Republican Party; Revels, Hiram; White Supremacy

Jonathan A. Noyalas

Bibliography

- Drago, Edmund L. Black Politicians and Reconstruction in Georgia: A Splendid Failure. Athens: University of Georgia Press, 1992.
- Holt, Thomas. Black over White: Negro Political Leadership in South Carolina during Reconstruction. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1977.
- Rabinowitz, Howard N., ed. Southern Black Leaders of the Reconstruction Era. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1982.

Red Summer Race Riots

The year 1919 marked a turbulent era in American history. The country experienced economic instability, labor strife, and a xenophobic tide of hatred under the banner of the “Red Scare” in the wake of World War I. Entwined in this postwar turmoil, clashes between the races intensified. James Weldon Johnson dubbed this period the “Red Summer” for the blood that flowed in the streets as a result of white-on-black violence. Between the tumultuous months of April and October, at least 26 race riots erupted across the country. Although these acts of brutality had occurred before and would endure for some years to come, the Red Summer of 1919 represents a particularly dismal chapter in race relations in the United States.

Overarching structural factors—demographic, economic, and political conditions—stirred racial animosities during the Red Summer. Beginning in the 1890s, African Americans left the rural South for better prospects in southern cities, the North, and the West. This “Great Migration” saw an exodus of 500,000 black southerners between 1916 and 1919. World War I particularly prompted this migration, as people of color found more opportunities outside of the South as foreign immigration dwindled and the military draft created labor shortages on the home front. The influx of people, especially in northern cities, often resulted in strains on housing, food, and public transportation, contributing to already tense race relations. Economic conditions and labor strife also fed into the violence. Adding to this racial resentment, businesses also used blacks as strikebreakers. Furthermore, authorities often ignored or displayed open hostility toward people of color. Some policemen and militia members turned a blind eye toward rioters or even actively participated in the violence themselves.

These structural concerns reinforced the cultural mindset that flourished after World War I. The radical ideology that emerged in the late 19th century, which incorporated Social Darwinism and scientific racism, continued to feed whites' views of supremacy, and these beliefs led to a paranoid fear of sexual attacks on the sanctity of white women. White newspapers fed this cultural consensus that allowed white-on-black riots to thrive during the Red Summer. They not only provided the fuel before race riots—running stories and rumors of alleged black crimes and atrocities while downplaying white infractions—but also generated the “official” version of events afterward.

Although structural factors and cultural attitudes set the scene for violence, precipitating events—alleged or real attacks, murders, or other infractions—created the immediate spark that prompted whites to act. Moreover, as people of color continued to assert their rights as citizens, whites strove to hold them back. World War I only heightened these tendencies. As the black population increased, and when whites believed that blacks encroached into their spheres of work, neighborhoods, and recreation, violence often resulted.

Not solely centered in one geographical locale, race riots appeared across the United States in 1919. Places as varied as Bisbee, Arizona; New London, Connecticut; New Orleans; Omaha, Nebraska; New York City; and Longview, Texas experienced white-on-black riots during the Red Summer. Riots in Washington, D.C., Chicago, and Phillips County, Arkansas, stand out as particularly brutal. After weeks of lurid and sensationalized news stories in Washington, D.C.'s newspapers about white women allegedly suffering attacks by black men, white soldiers, sailors, and marines invaded streetcars and African American neighborhoods for three days starting on July 19, after a white woman contended that two black men attacked her.

Although newspapers reported that 15 people died in the violence, actual numbers may have been two to three times that many. In Chicago, white and black gangs squared off for 13 days beginning July 27, after a black youth accidentally swam across the “color line” in Lake Michigan and drowned after being met with rocks from the white beachgoers. African Americans identified the white culprits, but authorities instead focused on one of the black accusers. When the violence subsided, 23 blacks and 15 whites had died, more than 500 people suffered injuries, and 1,000 black families had no homes. In Phillips County, Arkansas, hundreds of whites from surrounding counties and states arrived after a shootout occurred on September 30 between two white law enforcement officials and a group of African Americans meeting to organize a sharecroppers and tenant farmers union. By October 3, the violence had subsided after nearby federal troops patrolled the area. At least 25 blacks and 5 whites died, but many observers believed that as many as 200 people of color perished during the riot.

People of color responded to violence and ideology by creating newspapers, organizations, and literature to assert that they would not assume a subordinate position in society. The NAACP, for example, focused its efforts on exposing and putting a stop to white brutality. Through its newspaper, The Crisis, it provided detailed statistics, and in 1919, it published the book Thirty Years of Lynching in the United States to highlight the causes and atrocities of this type of violence. Black newspapers, especially the Chicago Defender, also became outspoken critics of black America's plight. Moreover, this era proved a rich and powerful time for African American inspiration, producing the new Negro movement and the Harlem Renaissance, which stressed a sense of worth and boldness.

Out of these forces emerged the horrors of the Red Summer. National conditions and local circumstances built an environment that allowed race riots to flourish throughout the country. These months marked both the apex of white violence against African Americans and the beginning of a heightened black response.

See also: Chicago Race Riot of 1919; Elaine, Arkansas, Riot of 1919; Great Migration; “If We Must Die”; Jim Crow; Lynching; McKay, Claude; National Association for the Advancement of Colored People; New Negro Movement; White Mob Violence

Bibliography

- Stockley, Grif. Blood in Their Eyes: The Elaine Race Massacres of 1919. Fayetteville: University of Arkansas Press, 2001.
- Tuttle, William. Race Riot: Chicago in the Red Summer of 1919. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1996.
- Williamson, Joel. The Crucible of Race: Black-White Relations in the American South Since Emancipation. New York: Oxford University Press, 1984.

Redlining

Redlining is a practice whereby companies or institutions deny goods and services to certain groups on the basis of race or where they live. Mortgage and car insurance industries are widely known to engage in the practice. Key stakeholders in redlining are borrowers, lenders, government regulators, realtors, and fair housing advocates. African Americans living in highly populated urban areas tend to experience the worst impacts of redlining. Redlining was historically supported by a combination of government policies and private-sector practices.

In the 1930s, Federal Housing Administration (FHA) lending guidelines provided a critical policy basis for redlining in the housing industry. When deciding to grant or deny mortgages and mortgage insurance, FHA regulators relied on underwriting guidelines. One reason the FHA put forth to justify its redlining policy was to prevent inharmonious racial groups from mixing. The FHA also argued that separating homeowners by race would prevent property values from declining. These policies resulted in limited housing opportunities for African Americans who increasingly lived in racially segregated neighborhoods. The housing available to African Americans had lower assessed property value, was substandard in quality, and was more overcrowded than housing available to whites.

The federal government created the Home Owners Loan Corporation (HOLC) in 1933. The HOLC introduced the practice of amortizing, or paying off mortgage loans over time at agreed upon interest rates, as well as a color-coded rating system to appraise property values. Amortizing made loans widely available and affordable. The color-coded rating system mostly benefited white buyers entering the housing market after the Great Depression. It included a red-colored designation for undesirable properties and is credited as the basis for the term “redlining.”

Areas with significant African American populations tended to fall into this category.

Realtors used restrictive covenants to carry out redlining. A restrictive covenant is language included in housing-related legal documents, usually deeds, to prevent homes from being sold to, or purchased by, certain racial groups. The existence of restrictive covenants helped to perpetuate the segregated neighborhoods caused by redlining and provided a convenient rationale for denying loans to African Americans. It was not until the U.S. Supreme Court struck down the power to enforce restrictive covenants in the Shelley v. Kraemer case of 1948, that African Americans gained some relief from the most adverse effects of redlining. One drawback to the decision is that, although it became illegal for the government to enforce restrictive covenants, the decision did not outlaw the housing industry practice.

The laws and public policies supporting redlining have changed in recent decades. The most significant government legislation enacted to expand housing access, and limit exclusionary practices like redlining, was the Fair Housing Act of 1968. Lenders could no longer use race as a factor to determine credit worthiness. Over the next several years, government regulators were lax in enforcing the law. Fair housing advocates engaged in various protests to resist bank redlining and bring to light the injury caused to African Americans by banks and lenders who practiced redlining. Their actions successfully brought attention to the practice and influenced Congress to pass further anti-redlining legislation.

When Congress passed the Home Mortgage Disclosure Act (HMDA) in 1975 and the Community Reinvestment Act (CRA) in 1977, fair housing advocates tackled redlining head-on through protests, lawsuits, and consumer education in the community reinvestment movement. Throughout the 1980s, government regulators enforced HMDA by requiring banks to collect data about where they made housing loans and to document efforts to make loans in previously underserved communities. Despite these advances, lenders continued to deny loans to African Americans into the 1990s at rates that were about twice that of white borrowers.

A turning point in the fight against redlining occurred in the 1990s with more aggressive government support for programs to expand African American homeownership. Lenders in the private sector simultaneously developed loan products that made it easier for African Americans to qualify for home mortgages. The drawback to these increased opportunities was high interest rates and confusing repayment terms. Fair housing advocates soon after introduced a new term, “reverse redlining,” to explain troubling new lending practices.

Reverse redlining is a process in modern credit markets that makes it easier for lenders to exploit African American borrowers. Predatory lending and subprime loans are key components to the new approach. Lenders target African Americans to purchase or refinance mortgages at high interest rates in the subprime market, rather than qualify them for low interest rates in the prime market. Reverse redlining practices contributed to record home ownership levels among African Americans in the early 2000s, but gave way to unprecedented default and foreclosure rates near the end of the decade. Fair housing advocates urge the government and private companies to combat reverse redlining by using objective criteria and fair terms when lending to African American borrowers.

See also: Urban Ghetto; Urbanization

Lezlee J. Hinesmon-Matthews

Bibliography

- Bullard, Robert D., J. Eugene Grisby, III, and Charles Lee, eds. Residential Apartheid: The American Legacy. Los Angeles: CAAS Publications, 1994.
- Immergluck, Dan. Credit to the Community: Community Reinvestment and Fair Lending Policy in the United States. Armonk, NY: M. E. Sharpe, 2004.
- Squires, Gregory D., ed. From Redlining to Reinvestment: Community Responses to Urban Disinvestment. Philadelphia: Temple University Press, 1992.
- Thomas, June Manning and Ritzdorf, Marsha, eds. Urban Planning and the African American Community: In the Shadows. Thousand Oaks, CA: Sage Publications, 1997.

Reparations

The idea that African Americans are owed reparations for their ancestors' labor as slaves has captured public attention at many times since the Civil War and is now in a period of resurgence. That resurgence is a result of several factors. First, some other groups have received limited reparations. Most notably, 82,000 Japanese Americans interned during World War II received $20,000 each in 1988. And there have been limited cases where Native Americans received compensation, such as the 1972 Native Alaska Claims Settlement Act, which provided nearly $1 billion to settle Native American claims to land in Alaska. Second, there is increasing concern that the Civil Rights movement's agenda of bringing about equality is unfulfilled and the affirmative action movement is declining.

Much of the modern reparations movement traces its origins to 1969, when James Forman interrupted Sunday morning services at the Riverside Church in Harlem and delivered the black manifesto. But reparations are also highly controversial. According to a recent poll by the Mobile [Alabama] Register, 5 percent of whites support reparations, whereas 66 percent of blacks support them. The controversy results from vastly different ways of viewing our history and its impact on the present.

Reparations proponents (who are often called reparatonists) begin their case with talk about centuries of injustice—the violence of beatings, torture, psychological brutalization that lay at the heart of slavery. Slavery began with trafficking in human beings, kidnapping people from Africa, unspeakable conditions on transatlantic ships to the Americas, and then generations of slavery in North America. Slavery in North America entailed the destruction of families, statutes prohibiting education or marriage, random beatings, lack of opportunity to advance economically, and generations of forced labor that made their owners wealthy.

There was some opportunity when slavery ended in 1865 to give the recently freed slaves the opportunity to realize the promise of America that whites held. There was much talk about 40 acres and a mule, a phrase taken from General William Sherman's Field Order No. 15, which promised to use property confiscated from Confederate supporters to provide land to newly freed slaves. But those promises were not fulfilled. A primary role of the federal government after the war was to oust newly freed slaves from their land and return it to the prior white owners. Instead of assistance, newly freed slaves were greeted with harsh Black Codes and long-term labor contracts.

The problems continued during the era of Jim Crow—the period of segregation and legalized discrimination, including limited voting, schooling, housing, and employment rights, that ran from the end of Reconstruction in 1877 until the modern Civil Rights era. It was not until the civil rights revolution of the 1950s that there was anything approaching equal treatment of African Americans by law.

The Civil Rights Act of 1964 prohibited private discrimination in employment.

According to reparationists, the problems of slavery and Jim Crow are continuing. According to recent census data, nearly one in four (25%) African Americans live in poverty, compared with 8 percent of non-Hispanic, white Americans; 30 percent of African American children live in poverty, compared with 9 percent of non-Hispanic white children. Median income for African American families is less than $31,000 and for white non-Hispanic families it is nearly $46,000. The case for reparations is built on such inequalities. If there were no inequalities in income today, there would be little reason to talk about reparations. We might then conclude that slavery and the Jim Crow era had little continuing effect.

Reparationists seek to make the lives of African Americans better and to make opportunities more available. Thus, they propose a series of actions for reparations. Those actions begin with relatively modest proposals, like a national truth commission, to study the effects of slavery and Jim Crow and its effects on the present. Representative John Conyers has lobbied since 1989 for a national commission to study the history and legacy of slavery. A study might also include a national slavery museum and a national apology. Reparationists see those kinds of actions as a way of changing how we think about our history of racism. They optimistically think that it might be possible to educate about the multiple connections between past harm and present inequality and in that way remake social policy. They seek more talk of what President George Bush said in 2003 while visiting Goree Island, that the slave trade was “one of the greatest crimes of history.”

Reparationists also seek local action, such as truth commissions, to investigate individual localized crimes such as the Tulsa Race Riot of 1921, the Rosewood Massacre, the Tuskegee syphilis experiment, the sterilization of welfare recipients in North Carolina, the Wilmington, North Carolina, riot of 1898, and the Greensboro, North Carolina, massacre of 1979. Institutions are also investigating their culpability in slavery. In 2000, the Aetna Insurance Company apologized for writing life insurance policies on slaves and the Hartford Courant apologized for printing ads for runaway slaves. Many schools that date back to the era of slavery, like the University of Alabama and Brown and Yale Universities, are also investigating their past.

Most reparationists want much more than truth commissions and apologies. They want money in some form. They typically ask for funding for community-building programs, which will fund primary education, health care, and business development. Reparationists commonly propose the use of trust funds to administer the programs. Some of the most radical reparationists even propose payments to individuals, but those are rare. And in a few extreme cases, reparationists draw on black nationalist thinking, and they request a separate black state.

Central and as yet unanswered question, is how would one measure reparations payments and how much would they likely cost? There are two basic ways of measuring the amount owed. The more modest measure is known as the unjust enrichment measure. It measures the amount that African Americans have contributed through their labor, which they have not been paid for. That involves estimating the value of African American contributions. The second, larger measure is known as the tort measure. It measures the harm to slaves (in terms of stolen labor, physical and emotional abuse, loss to families) and to their descendants (in terms of lost educational and business opportunities). Here the harm is enormous, for slavery’s crimes continue to replicate victims for generations. Reparations is aimed at changing all this—redistributing property and correcting for generations of violence and lack of opportunity.

There are two primary means by which reparations are sought. One is through lawsuits. That method is difficult, because lawsuits are not well suited to deal with large-scale societal problems. They are best able to handle discrete disputes between individuals and corporations. And the few lawsuits filed for reparations have proven relatively unsuccessful. A series of lawsuits filed in 2002 against corporations that benefited from slavery were consolidated under the titled, In re African American Slave Descendants Litigation, and were dismissed in January 2004. A major lawsuit for victims of the Tulsa, Oklahoma race riot of 1921 was dismissed in March 2004. It was filed by the Reparations Coordinating Committee (RCC), a group of lawyers, social scientists, and activists dedicated to pursuing the cause of reparations. The RCC is led by Adjoa Aiyetoro, Charles Ogletree, and Randall Robinson.

There have been a few successful lawsuits. One, Pigford v. Glickman, settled claims by African American farmers denied loans by the Department of Agriculture in the 1980s.

By late 2004, farmers had received approximately $660 million in settlement. Another case settled for $20 million is a class action lawsuit against New York Life Insurance Company for life insurance policies for people who were killed by the Turkish government during the Armenian genocide in 1915. Individual lawsuits might be the basis for limited reparations; they might also raise public consciousness. But for the great crimes in American history, reparations are going to have to come through legislation in Congress and in state legislatures.

Reparationists face a significant uphill struggle. Opponents advance a series of arguments. Some deny any liability for slavery. They say that the evils of slavery and Jim Crow were committed by others and that current taxpayers should not have to pay. Although the innocence argument is powerful, many taxpayers are beneficiaries of a system in which some people have an easier time advancing economically than others; many of those taxpayers are beneficiaries of a system that involved oppression of African Americans. But many are innocent (and probably have little or no benefit). The nature of social legislation, however, is that taxpayers are often asked to pay to improve the lives of people who have been injured. The sad fact, of course, is that it takes generations to eradicate the effects of slavery and Jim Crow. And the sad fact is that slavery and Jim Crow produced more harm than the benefits they conferred. Thus, there are probably people who will be asked to pay—taxpayers—who are in some sense innocent. That is the unfortunate part of being part of American society. We have obligations that must be paid independent of fault. That is particularly clear after 9/11, when the Airline Stabilization Act provided millions of dollars to the families of 9/11 victims, even though no one thought the United States was at fault for the attacks.

A second objection states that slavery is the cause of current problems. The income differential between blacks and whites is often attributed to factors such as single parenthood. There is room for additional research on the role of slavery and Jim Crow, as well as black culture in determining the current chasm between black and white wealth. Reparationists attribute single parenthood to welfare policy, which is in some ways yet another consequence of slavery.

A third objection is that reparations does not make sense as social policy. They are too backward-looking, too divisive between blacks and whites, and are not the best way to redistribute property. One should ask whether there are other programs that are better suited to closing the income gap. Reparations talk is, indeed, divisive, for it uses a sordid history to challenge the distribution of wealth in the present. Reparations holds out the promise, when used in conjunction with other programs, of resolving conflict and overcoming the past.

A fourth objection is that the debt has already been paid through the people who died during the Civil War and through welfare programs like the Great Society. Finally, some say, with indignant nobility, that we cannot put a price on the legacy of slavery. But we miss the chance to revisit our history. And the way to repair damage is to pay for some of it. Of course we cannot repair all the past damage to everyone. Reparations skeptics often ask about Egypt paying the Jews or the Babylonians paying people they oppressed. But reparations for slavery and Jim Crow present a different kind of claim for harms that are very alive and leading to differential impacts right now.

Despite recent setbacks in the courts, reparations action continues. Recently, the Chicago City Council has required that companies that do business with the city disclose any connections they have to slavery. The California legislature required insurance companies to disclose any insurance policies they wrote on slaves' lives. As the collection of information grows and as people see the many ways that slavery contributed to economic growth and continues to affect Americans today, it is likely that reparations talk will continue.

See also: Field Order No. 15; Forty Acres and a Mule; Jim Crow; King, Martin Luther Jr.; Muhammad, Elijah; Nation of Islam; Rosewood, Florida, Riot of 1923; Stevens, Thaddeus; Tulsa, Oklahoma, Race Riot of 1921; Tuskegee Experiment; X, Malcolm

Alfred L. Brophy

Bibliography

- Barkan, Elazar. The Guilt of Nations: Restitution and Negotiating Historical Injustice. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 2000.
- Brooks, Roy L. Atonement and Forgiveness: A New Model for Black Reparations. Berkeley: University of California Press, 2004.
- Brophy, Alfred L. Reconstructing the Dreamland: The Tulsa Race Riot of 1921—Race, Reparations, Reconciliation. New York: Oxford University Press, 2002.
- Robinson, Randall. The Debt: What America Owes to Blacks. New York: Dutton, 2001.
- Winbush, Raymond. Should America Pay?: Slavery and The Raging Debate on Reparations. New York: Amistad, 2003.

Yamamoto, Eric. Interracial Justice: Conflict and Reconciliation in Post-Civil Rights America. New York: New York University Press, 2000.

Republic of New Afrika

The Republic of New Afrika (RNA) is the name given to the proposed independent African American nation within the borders of the United States that consist of the southern states of Louisiana, Mississippi, Alabama, Georgia, and South Carolina. These “Black Belt” states were chosen because of their large black populations and their historical significance as states where African Americans worked, tilled, and lived on the land—first as slaves, then as freedpersons—for centuries. The Provisional Government of the Republic of New Afrika (PG-RNA), a black nationalist organization created during a conference held in Detroit, Michigan, in 1968, proposed the independent nation as an example of black self-determination, believing that African Americans will never enjoy full freedom, justice, and equality under the U.S. government and constituted a “nation within a nation,” that laid rightful claim to the proposed territory as just compensation for centuries of oppression. The PG-RNA also supports reparations for African Americans as compensation for forced enslavement, Jim Crow segregation, racial violence, and continued forms of racism.

On March 31, 1968, the Malcolm X Society and the Group on Advance Leadership (GOAL), two Detroit-based organizations involving the Obadele brothers, Gaidi (Milton Henry, 1920–2006) and Imari Obadele (Richard Henry, 1930–), close associates of Malcolm X, called together 500 black nationalists in Detroit, Michigan to discuss the political situation of African Americans. Building on Malcolm’s call for black self-determination and his admonition that land is the basis of independence, the 500 nationalists called for the formation of the independent Republic of New Afrika. The original demands of the PG-RNA called for a negotiated cessation by the United States of the five southern states based on the results of a national plebiscite of black folks; the establishment of a sovereign and independent government to be eligible for membership in the United Nations; and for reparations as compensation for injustices perpetuated against African Americans by the United States government for the past 300 years. Finally, the conferees produced a Black Declaration of Independence drafted and signed by 100 delegates, a constitution, and the framework of a provisional government.

Robert F. Williams, a human rights advocate most famously known for his stand against Klan terrorism in Monroe, North Carolina, in the late 1950s, and subsequent flight from the United States on false charges of kidnapping, was elected president while living in China; Gaidi Obadele was elected first vice president; Betty Shabazz, widow of Malcolm X, was elected second vice president; Imari Obadele I served as minister of information; and Obaboa Olono, was treasurer. The governing body of the PG-RNA is the People’s Center Council, which combined legislative and judicial power and supervised industries and land, and the president served as chair of the council. The PG-RNA based its political philosophy on the principles of Ujamaa—cooperative economics and community self-sufficiency—promoted by Tanzanian President Julius Nyerere.

For the next several years, the PG-RNA set about achieving several goals, including negotiating with the U.S. Congress over reparations and land; building consulates in cities such as New York, Chicago, Washington, D.C., Baltimore, Los Angeles, Cleveland, and San Francisco; calling for the formation of local “People’s Militias” and developing a standing army to defend the territory; and meeting with representatives from countries such as China, Vietnam, the USSR, Sudan, and Tanzania to gain international recognition for the proposed Republic. By 1970, the organization would concentrate much of its activities in Mississippi, specifically the capital of Jackson, where the PG-RNA established its headquarters and began the work of organizing the plebiscite and garnering the support of black Mississippians, particularly black college students at Tougaloo College. Also in 1970, Imari Obadele was elected president. Robert F. Williams had resigned the presidency after returning to the United States, prompting an interim government administered by the Obadele brothers. A Ujamaa Committee headed by Hekima Ana (Thomas Norman) replaced it before electing Obadele. A new constitution, the Code of Umoja, was also adopted. In 1971, the RNA began efforts to acquire land in Mississippi to establish El Malik as the capital of the nation.

Because of its political philosophy and black nationalist orientation, the RNA has had several confrontations with local, state, and federal police, prompting the Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI) to designate it as a subversive organization. This made the RNA a target of the FBI's Counter Intelligence Program (COINTELPRO) and subjected to numerous raids and arrests. The most well-known confrontation came on August 28, 1971, when 11 members (RNA-11), including Obadele, were arrested in Jackson, Mississippi, and charged with various crimes including murder and waging war on the state. All were eventually acquitted.

The PG-RNA still exists and is headquartered in Washington, D.C. The official slogan is "Free the Land." It is a leading organization within the National Coalition of Blacks for Reparations in America (NCOBRA) along with other progressive organizations.

See also: Black Nationalism; Black Power; COINTELPRO; Shabazz, Beatty X; Williams, Robert F.

Tony Gass

Bibliography

- Cunnigen, Donald. "The Republic of New Africa in Mississippi." In Black Power in Belly of the Beast, Judson L. Jeffries, ed. 93–115. Chicago: University of Illinois Press, 2006.
- Davenport, Christian. "Understanding Covert Repressive Action: The Case of the U.S. Government Against the Republic of New Africa." Journal of Conflict Resolution 49 (February 2005):120–40.
- Obadele I, Imari Abubakari. "The Struggle Is for Land." Black Scholar 3 (February 1972):24–36.
- Obadele I, Imari Abubakari. "The Struggle of the Republic of New Africa." Black Scholar 5 (June 1974):32–41.

Revels, Hiram

Hiram Revels (1822–1901) was the first African American to serve in the legislative branch after the Civil War. He was a prominent civil rights activist who struggled in the aftermath of Reconstruction. Born in 1822 in Fayetteville, North Carolina, Hiram Revels was the free son of a mixed marriage between African and Croatan/Indian parents. Details of his early life are sketchy. At the age of 16, Hiram became apprenticed to his brother, Elias P. Revels, as a barber in Lincolnton, North Carolina. In 1841, his brother died in an unfortunate accident, leaving Hiram to manage the barber-shop. Over the next three years, he managed the barber-shop with minimal results. In 1844, clamoring to expand his education, Hiram became a student at an abolitionist

Quaker School in Liberty, Indiana, which was the center of abolitionist activism in the state. Revels continued his education when he attended school in Ohio and eventually attended Knox College in Illinois. Revels's matriculation at the school was a logical choice for the aspiring young abolitionist African American.

After his brief stint as a student at Knox College, Revels started a career as an evangelist. He became an ordained minister in the African Methodist Church. As a young minister, he traveled throughout the Midwest, specifically to African American congregations in Ohio, Illinois, Indiana, Tennessee, Kentucky, Missouri, and Kansas. After his career as an itinerant preacher, Revels settled in Baltimore, Maryland. While there he became the principal of a school geared for African American students. He also became the pastor of a local church. He continued in this capacity until the outbreak of the Civil War in 1861.

In 1861, South Carolina, along with six other Southern states, seceded from the Union. The disgruntled states protested the victory of Republican Abraham Lincoln in the election of 1860. In the first year of the conflict, the state of Maryland, despite the presence of slavery within its borders, remained loyal to the Union.

The status of Maryland as a border Union state provided Revels with an opportunity to prove his status as a patriotic American. Revels was a firm believer in the necessity to maintain the Union, at whatever costs. To a certain degree, Revels had a personal stake in the Civil War. If the Union was dismantled, Revels, as an African American, was in danger of losing his personal liberties. He decided to become actively involved in the war. In 1861, Revels organized two regiments of African American troops to fight against the Confederates. Over the next year, he traveled extensively, ending up in St. Louis, Missouri. St. Louis, with a population of 115,000 slaves, afforded Revels the opportunity to form a sizable regimental group. In 1863, Revels was able to recruit enough men to create one African American regiment. In addition to his recruiting talents, Revels also joined in active service. In 1863, he became Union chaplain with a Mississippi regiment of free blacks. He also became the provost marshal of Vicksburg, Mississippi, the site of one of the bloodiest battles of the Civil War. As provost in Vicksburg, Revels handled the affairs of ex-slaves living in the city. After the war, Revels returned to the ministry. He settled in Natchez, Mississippi, where he participated in the local chapter of the African Methodist Episcopal Church.

Hiram Revels was the first African American to serve as a U.S. senator. In January 1870, he was elected to the U.S. Senate seat once occupied by Confederate president Jefferson Davis. (Library of Congress)

In his years at Natchez, Revels assumed a position of leadership among the newly freed African American population. He specifically had to handle the relations between the Reconstruction Act of 1867 and the newly created state government. In late 1868, the military governor of Mississippi, Adelbert Ames, appointed Revels to the Natchez City Board of Aldermen where he gained valuable experience in municipal politics. In 1869, John Lynch, a prominent local African American leader in Natchez, encouraged Revels to become a candidate for the state legislature. Over the next few months, Revels introduced numerous local bills in the legislature. In December 1869, the Mississippi Republican caucus, wishing to push the civil rights of African Americans in the South, nominated Revels to become a U.S. Senator from Mississippi, essentially filling a void left when Jefferson Davis vacated his seat to become president of the Confederacy in 1861. After a delay from many Southern Senators, on February 23, 1870, Hiram Rhodes Revels was accepted into the Senate by a vote of 48 to 8. Two days later, Revels was seated in the Senate, becoming the first African American to gain admission as a senator and congressman.

Over the course of his brief stint, Revels dealt with significant issues. Among the most important issues were the debate over the readmission of Georgia into the Union without civil rights protections for African American. In 1870, Revels was the first African American to give an official speech on the floor of the Senate over the issue of Georgia. On March 4, 1871, he vacated his seat. In the years after his congressional career, Revels acted as president of Alcorn College. He died on January 16, 1901 and was the first African American to serve in the U.S. Senate.

See also: African Methodist Episcopal Church; Lincoln, Abraham; Reconstruction Era Black Politicians; Southern Free Blacks; Union Army

Jaime Ramón Olivares

Bibliography

Lawson, Elizabeth. The Gentleman from Mississippi, Our First Negro Congressman, Hiram R. Revels. New York: J. S. Oglivie, 1960.
Thompson, Julius. Hiram R. Revels, 1827–1901: A Biography. New York: Arno Press, 1983.

Revolutionary Action Movement

The Revolutionary Action Movement (RAM) founded in 1962 was one of the first revolutionary nationalist formations of the 1960s created in response to the oppression of people of African descent living in America. Blacks were being oppressed politically, economically, socially, and physically, and this became the impetus for the creation of a number of groups to respond and counter these actions. These individuals and groups who desired to be self-determined and free from the hegemonic actions widely practiced throughout the United States became participants in what became known as the Black Power movement. Although there were many perspectives on how to gain liberation from oppression, simplistically put, there were two major ideological camps involved in the Black Power movement. There were those who advocated for integration and a demand for the American government to live up to the promises of citizenship and equality and those who believed chances were slim that America would recognize blacks as equal and therefore advocated for black separatism. RAM's ideology favored the latter and consisted of ideals around blacks constituting a separate nation within America, although not all of their members agreed with this. Their ideals of black separatism influenced many of the other black power groups in the 1960s who were advocating for radical change in relation to the treatment of blacks.

This organization existed primarily underground, resulting in details about them being more limited than other black revolutionary nationalist groups. Those included in the formation of this group were college students, the working class, and some intellectuals who identified themselves as New Afrikan nationalists. New Afrikan nationalists adhere to the idea that people of African descent are a distinct nation within the United States and should have sovereignty. Students played a large role in the formation of RAM. During the 1960s, many groups fighting race-based oppression were either started or comprised mainly of students on college campuses throughout the United States, and RAM was no exception.

This organization was composed of individuals commonly defined as black revolutionary nationalists and they used a motto of “One Purpose, One Aim, One Destiny,” with theoretical underpinnings much like that of Marcus Garvey. The organization produced two publications, the bimonthly Black America and the weekly RAM Speaks. In addition to educating black communities using this literature, this grassroots organization had “street meetings” consisting of informal gatherings targeting inner-city youth to inform them about the ideals RAM espoused and as a means of recruitment.

Max Stanford, aka Akbar Muhammad Ahmad, the first field chairman, articulated a number of objectives for the organization including giving black people a sense of racial pride, solidarity, dignity, unity, and commitment to the struggle for independence. Another of RAM’s objectives was for people of African descent everywhere to be free of colonial and imperialist rule. Also, those of African descent in America should demand sovereign nationhood and reparations and take the U.S. government to the World Court and the United Nations for human rights violations and genocidal treatment of this group. To reach these objectives, members of RAM believed they must engage in guerilla warfare. Because of their decision to operate underground, members of this group often conducted their work through other established groups such as Malcolm X’s Organization for African American Unity (OAAU), Afro-American Association, Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee (SNCC), Conference of Racial Equality (CORE), National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP), Dodge Revolutionary Union Movement (DRUM), and the League of Revolutionary Black Workers (LRBW) in Detroit, Michigan. Their primary objective was to make these groups more militant, often resulting in a revolutionary faction within the respective groups. RAM was also successful at organizing black youth into a paramilitary force called the Black Guards in 1967.

RAM’s ideals of separatism did not stop with blacks in America but encompassed a Pan-African stance, with some members identifying as black internationalists. RAM’s internationalist ideals aligned with beliefs that non-European people throughout the world should seek to free themselves from imperialist domination through revolution. Because no black person is free until all black people are free, organizing for the liberation of people of African descent globally became an important aspect of their platform.

The organization’s life was relatively short, ending in 1968 as a result of the FBI counterinsurgency program COINTELPRO, as well as internal issues. RAM, among other black nationalist groups, was identified and targeted as a threat to America by then FBI Director J. Edgar Hoover and consequently came under attack. Although the individuals who made up the various black nationalist groups were under constant assault and scrutiny, as one group disbanded another was in its formative stages. For instance, former RAM members created the Black Liberation Party, the Black Panther Party for Self-Defense, and the Provisional Government of the Republic of New Afrika.

See also: Black Panther Party; Black Power; COINTELPRO; Republic of New Afrika; Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee; Williams, Robert F.; X, Malcolm

Efua S. Akoma

Bibliography

- Kelley, Robin. “Stormy Weather: Reconstructing Black (Inter)Nationalism in the Cold War Era.” In Is It Nation Time? Contemporary Essays on Black Power and Black Nationalism. Eddie S. Glaude Jr., ed., 67–90. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 2002.
- Robinson, Dean. Black Nationalism in American Politics and Thought. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press, 2001.

Umoja, Akinyele O. "Repression Breeds Resistance: The Black Liberation Army and the Radical Legacy of the Black Panther Party." New Political Science 21, no. 2 (1999):131–55.

Van Deburg, William, ed. Modern Black Nationalism: From Marcus Garvey to Louis Farrakhan. New York: New York University Press, 1997.

Robeson, Paul

Paul LeRoy Bustill Robeson (1898–1976), a truly multi-talented genius, was a singer, actor, linguist, amateur and professional athlete, and an ardent advocate of African American civil rights and anti-imperialism. He was born on April 9, 1898, in Princeton, New Jersey, to Reverend William Drew Robeson and Maria Louisa Bustill Robeson. In 1860, Paul's father—likely a descendant of Igbo-speaking people from the Niger River Delta—had escaped from a North Carolina plantation at age 15, graduated from Lincoln University in Pennsylvania, and eventually became a pastor of Witherspoon Street Presbyterian Church. Robeson's mother was a school teacher who came from an abolitionist Quaker family. Although his mother died in a fire by the time Robeson turned six, both his parents instilled in him the importance of education and sharpening his considerable mental abilities.

During his senior year at Somerville High School, Robeson won a statewide scholarship competition and entered Rutgers College in 1915. He was only the third African American to be admitted to Rutgers and was the only student of color on campus during his four years there. During freshmen tryouts for the Rutgers football team, Robeson was savagely beaten by several white players, leaving him with a broken nose and a dislocated shoulder. After recovering from his injuries, Robeson made a second attempt at tryouts in which a future teammate stepped on his hand with a cleated foot, ripping away several of Robeson's fingernails. After Robeson literally lifted the player over his head, in an attempt to injure him, the coaches of the football team informed him that he had made the varsity squad. An imposing 6'2", 210-pound player at defensive end, Robeson's athletic prowess was certainly a factor in Rutgers's average margin of victory of 41 points during the 1915 season. His freshman campaign was followed by two consecutive seasons as a first-team football All-American. In addition to football, Robeson also played varsity basketball and baseball and ran track. In total, he accumulated 15 varsity letters before his graduation.

Robeson's athletic prowess was matched, or surpassed, by his abilities in the classroom. After maintaining a 3.8 GPA during his freshman year, Robeson was only one of three students at Rutgers accepted into Phi Beta Kappa and was one of four students selected in 1919 to Cap and Skull, the honors society at Rutgers. That same year he delivered the valedictory speech in which he predicted that he would be governor of New Jersey by 1940 and a prominent African American leader. After graduation, Robeson entered Columbia Law School in 1920 and moved to Harlem. While a full-time law student, he began playing professional football for the Akron Pros and the Milwaukee Badgers in the American Professional Football Association, which later became the National Football League. In addition to his professional football career, Robeson also began performing as a singer and stage actor to pay his way through Columbia.

While maintaining a busy career, Robeson married Eslanda Cardozo Goode, head of the pathology laboratory at Columbia Presbyterian Medical Center and daughter of a prominent mixed-race family in New York, in August 1921. Despite Paul's extramarital affairs, the two stayed married until Eslanda's death in 1965. In 1923, Robeson graduated from Columbia Law School and accepted a job at Stotesbury and Miner in New York City while singing part-time at Harlem's world-famous Cotton Club. His interest in law soon faded after a white secretary refused to dictate from him. Robeson soon quit the firm and became a full-time performer and part-time student at the School of Oriental Languages at the University of London. In 1924, he played two leading roles in All God's Chillun Got Wings and Eugene O'Neill's The Emperor Jones. By 1925, Robeson's professional singing career reached a new height as he began to sing Negro spirituals at concert halls throughout the United States and Europe.

At the age of 29, Robeson was already considered one of the most famous and recognizable Americans in the world. He was voted into the "All Time All-American College Eleven," the first college football Hall of Fame, in 1927. His deep bass voice, chiseled face, and imposing physique were iconic hallmarks. In 1928, he sang "Ol' Man River" for the first time while playing Joe in the London production of Show Boat. In many ways, this song became his personal signature. Not only is his rendition of "Ol' Man River" considered definitive, but Robeson would consciously change the lyrics over time, rendering the once southern lament into a song of social change and revolution. If “Ol’ Man River” was the song that became his signature, then his 1930 role as Othello in England held a similar stature. Although no U.S. production company would employ Robeson to play Othello, given his close physical interactions, on stage, with a white Desdemona, he reprised the role in New York in 1943 and toured the United States until 1945. Robeson was a 1945 winner of the NAACP’s Spingarn for his role as Othello, and his Broadway run of the play was the longest of any Shakespeare play in history.

Paul Robeson as Othello in the Theatre Guild Production of Othello, Broadway, 1943–1944. (Library of Congress)

In 1933, Robeson starred in the movie version of Emperor Jones and began intensive language training at the School of Oriental Languages. Over the course of several years of formal and self-study, he learned to read and sing in Spanish, Russian, Chinese, Arabic, French, German, Swahili, and several other African languages. In sum, Robeson mastered as many as 20 languages. In the 1930s alone, Robeson starred in four movies, three plays, and sang internationally all while taking language courses in London.

Although Robeson was one of the most famous Americans in the 1930s and early 1940s, from the late-1940s until his death in 1976, he almost completely disappeared from public view, and specific efforts were made to erase him from history and public record. Robeson was retroactively removed from the 1918 All-American first team. Likewise, Rutgers University systematically removed his name from sports records, a move that was not reversed until 1995. As a result of his political affiliations and public pronouncements, the U.S. government moved to undercut his influence abroad and his ability to earn income at home. Robeson was essentially blacklisted. Prevented from movie and stage roles, singing in concert halls, or appearing on radio or TV, his income went from more than $100,000 per year in the 1930s to less than $6,000 year in the late 1940s and throughout the 1950s.

With his facility for the languages of the world community and his fame as a performer, Robeson used his stage to combat Jim Crow in the United States, fascism and Nazism in Europe, and imperialism in Africa and Asia. Moreover, at the height of the Cold War, McCarthyism, and red baiting in the United States, Robeson embraced communism and the Soviet Union. This culminated in the 1949 Peekskill, New York riot in which anticommunist (and largely antiblack and anti-Semitic) protesters violently disrupted a Robeson concert in the weeks after a controversial statement he made at the World Peace Conference in Paris about African Americans not wanting war against the Soviets. In 1950, the State Department revoked his passport and, during an appeals hearing in February 1952, the State Department issued a brief citing Robeson’s political activity on behalf of the colonial peoples of Africa as a reason why he should be denied the right to travel beyond the borders of the United States.

Investigated by the House Un-American Activities Committee (HUAC) and publicly criticized by Eleanor Roosevelt, Jackie Robinson, Roy Wilkins of the NAACP, and just about every other African American leader, with the exception of W. E. B. Du Bois, Robeson was increasingly isolated as a result of his unwavering political stances. In 1958, he published his only book entitled Here I Stand, which was a detailed articulation of his political ideology. Later that same year, his passport was restored and Robeson returned to the international stage as a performer and political activist. His last two decades were fraught with poor health, exhaustion, and rumors of CIA and MI5 surveillance. After retiring from the public eye to live a relatively quiet life in Philadelphia, Robeson died on January 23, 1976. Since 1995, Robeson has been the posthumous recipient of a number of awards and honors in an attempt to rewrite his important legacy back into history and public memory.

See also: African Imperialism; Black Athletes; Black Folk Culture; Cold War and Civil Rights; Du Bois, W. E. B.; Harlem Renaissance; Robinson, Jackie

Walter C. Rucker

Bibliography

- Boyle, Sheila Tully and Andrew Bunie. Paul Robeson: The Years of Promise and Achievement. Amherst: University of Massachusetts Press, 2001.
- Brown, Lloyd L. The Young Paul Robeson: On My Journey Now. Boulder, CO: Westview Press, 1997.
- Foner, Philip Sheldon, ed. Paul Robeson Speaks: Writings, Speeches, Interviews, 1918–1974. New York: Brunner/Mazel, 1978.
- Ford, Carin T. Paul Robeson: "I Want to Make Freedom Ring". Berkeley Heights, NJ: Enslow, 2008.
- Robeson, Paul. Here I Stand. Boston: Beacon Press, 1988.

Robinson, Jackie

The Negro Leagues showcased some of the greatest players in the history of baseball. Although perhaps not the greatest player in Negro League baseball history, Jackie Robinson (1919–1972) is certainly the most famous. Robinson is well known for breaking the color barrier in white professional baseball. Born January 31, 1919, in Cairo, Georgia to sharecroppers Millie and Jerry Robinson, Jackie Roosevelt Robinson grew up in Pasadena, California. Of the five Robinson children, Jackie was the youngest. His mother taught him at a young age to combat racism by using his talents. Jackie's means of showcasing his talents became sports.

After a stint at Pasadena Community College, Robinson attended UCLA in 1939. While there he excelled in the classroom and in football, track, and baseball. He earned varsity letters in all four sports, the first to do so at UCLA. After college, Robinson played semiprofessional football in Hawaii. He also worked for a few months as an athletic director in the National Youth Administration. He was drafted by the United States Army in 1942 to fight in World War II. He was sent to Fort Riley, Kansas, where he became an officer and was part of a segregated unit there.

In 1943 in Fort Hood, Texas, he was involved in a racial incident when a bus driver tried to make him go to the back of a bus. His refusal to give up his seat led to his being charged with conduct unbecoming an officer and willful disobedience. This experience sharpened his sense of racial injustice, so he spoke assertively about the unjust conditions that African Americans were subjected to. With the help of the black press, fellow service men, and the NAACP, the court martial was dropped and he was later acquitted and honorably discharged in 1944. Thus, his spirit of activism became evident before he embarked on the famous "experiment."

By 1945, Robinson joined the famous Kansas City Monarchs where he played with the great Satchel Paige. In 1946, Branch Rickey signed Robinson to play with the Brooklyn Dodgers. Robinson became the player to end segregation in Major League baseball. While stoically enduring incredible racial abuse such as name calling and foul play during games from players on both sides, fans, and umpires, he led his team to the league title, won Major League Rookie of the Year, and finished with a .297 batting average and a league-leading 29 stolen bases.

After three years of silence, he began to speak up when pitchers narrowly missed his head, fans shouted epithets, or obscene mail came to his home. He fought the denial of equal service in eating and sleeping quarters, or wherever he faced discrimination. Finally, the curative effects of time and recognition of Robinson's value to the team caused the majority of players to settle into the spirit of cooperation.

Before the Dodgers came calling, Robinson coached a basketball team in Austin, Texas. He later signed to play second base with the famous Kansas City Monarchs in 1945, where he performed admirably on a team of talented veterans like Satchel Paige. A primary reason Branch Rickey chose Robinson instead of one of the more talented, established Negro League stars was Robinson's stamina and tolerance, extreme patience, and forbearance.

Jackie Robinson's performance made the world recognize that black people and especially, Negro League players, could perform exceptionally well. In fact, with Robinson on the roster, the Dodgers won National League pennants in 1947, 1949, 1952, 1953, 1955, and 1956. In

Jackie Robinson was the first African American to play Major League Baseball. (Library of Congress)

1955 they defeated the New York Yankees in the World Series. Robinson is remembered not just for his enormous talents on the field, but for his inner resolve and human character that allowed him to restrain himself from retaliating to severe racist abuses with so much at stake. Throughout Robinson's career, he was able to persevere and achieve at high levels despite the overt racism in American sports and society. In his later years Robinson was attacked for being conservative, particularly as a result of his well-publicized criticisms of Paul Robeson and other African American leaders. During the McCarthy era, Robinson was called before the House Un-American Affairs Committee (HUAC) to denounce Robeson as a communist sympathizer. Despite the criticism regarding Robinson's political stances, none can deny the radical statement his integration of major league baseball made in 1947.

See also: Black Athletes; Negro League Baseball; Robeson, Paul; World War II (Black Participation in)

Thabiti Lewis

Bibliography

Lewis, Thabiti. Ballers of the New School Race and Sports in America. Chicago: Third World Press, 2009.
Rampersad, Arnold. Jackie Robinson: A Biography. New York: Knopf, 1997.

Robinson, Jo Ann

Jo Ann Gibson Robinson (1912–1992) was born April 17, 1912 in rural Georgia, the youngest of 12 children. She played an instrumental, although often overlooked, role in the events leading up to the Montgomery bus boycott, as well as in the boycott itself. An educator throughout her life, she acquired a master's degree in English from Atlanta University, which led her to accept a professorship at Alabama State College in 1949.

There she joined the Women's Political Council (WPC). After Robinson experienced a humiliating experience on a bus at the hands of a racist driver who objected to her sitting in the fifth row on a nearly empty bus, she decided to convince the other WPC women to focus on segregation in public transportation.

Segregation on the Montgomery City Lines was similar to that in public transportation in most southern cities and towns. The first five rows of seats were reserved for white patrons, and African Americans were to use the back four rows, which meant that African Americans had to stand beside empty whites-only seats if the rest of the seats were full. In addition, if the first five rows were full and a white rider boarded and all other seats were occupied, four African American riders would be forced to give up their seats so the white rider could sit, as African Americans were barred from sitting in the same row as a white. These rules resulted in situations such as Robinson experienced, when she was asked to vacate a seat regardless of the lack of other passengers, and that Rosa Parks experienced, when she refused to give up her seat on a full bus.

For the next six years, the WPC, along with other groups, complained to Montgomery's city commissioners about how badly bus drivers and white riders treated African American bus patrons, and they prepared for a boycott. Contrary to the narrative many learn about the Montgomery movement, it did not spontaneously erupt in the wake of Rosa Parks's arrest. In fact, Robinson wrote a letter to Montgomery's mayor in which she spoke of a potential bus boycott by African Americans, making it clear that they comprised the majority of the bus system's patrons and thus could take away its profits. She wrote this letter shortly after the Brown v. Board of Education of Topeka (1954) decision declared school segregation unconstitutional.

Following Rosa Parks's arrest on December 1, 1955, Robinson and other African American leaders decided that the perfect time had come to execute their one-day boycott plans. Others had been arrested that year as well, but Robinson and others felt that their cases would not be as sympathetic; one of those arrested was a teenage girl who was a few months pregnant. Parks, on the other hand, was well respected, and she was an officer of the NAACP. Robinson, two fellow faculty members, and two students stayed up all that night copying and bundling notices announcing the boycott, set to begin December 5, the day of Parks's trial. Members of the WPC distributed tens of thousands of flyers the next day, and by the end of that Friday, almost all Montgomery African Americans knew of the plans.

The boycott proved so successful that boycotters decided to continue it. Robinson and others organized the Montgomery Improvement Association (MIA), and Robinson served on its executive board and edited its newsletter, which eventually expanded to four pages. The MIA handled donations, organized car pools and taxis to transport boycotters to work, and served as a liaison between the mass movement and white bus and city officials. Robinson was selected to be a member of this latter delegation.

The MIA delegation's initial proposals included the following: bus drivers should be courteous to African American passengers; African Americans would take seats from the back to the front of the bus and whites from front to back, and once the bus was full, no one would have to give up a seat; and African American drivers should be hired on predominantly African American routes. In a series of meetings, white officials continued to reject these proposals, so the boycott continued. In late January, white officials announced they would no longer meet with the African American contingent to discuss options, and police harassed boycotters; Robinson herself got 17 unjustified traffic tickets. By February, pro-boycott attorneys filed suit against the city, and this suit eventually made its way to the Supreme Court, which struck down segregation. Meanwhile, a grand jury in Montgomery declared the boycott illegal and ordered the arrest of leaders, including Robinson. On December 20, 1956, however, the marshals served the Supreme Court order on Montgomery's city officials; the next day, African Americans again rode the buses, this time integrated ones.

Several years after the boycott was over, Robinson and other teachers left Alabama State in the wake of investigations by a state committee into those faculty members it suspected of organizing the boycotts. These investigations intensified because of a 1960 sit-in some of the college's students organized. Robinson resigned after the spring semester in 1960. She took a position at Grambling College in Louisiana but left the next year, leaving the South to teach high school in Los Angeles until retiring in 1976. Her memoir about her Montgomery years was published in 1987, and the Southern Association for Women Historians gave it a publication prize. Robinson died in 1992.

See also: Jim Crow; King, Martin Luther Jr.; Montgomery Bus Boycott; Parks, Rosa

Erin Boade

Bibliography

- Branch, Taylor. Parting the Waters: America in the King Years 1954–63. New York: Simon & Schuster, 1998.
- Crawford, Vicki L., Jacqueline Anne Rouse, and Barbara Woods, eds. Women in the Civil Rights Movement: Trailblazers and Torchbearers, 1941–1965. New York: Carlson Publishing, 1990.
- Garrow, David J. Bearing the Cross: Martin Luther King, Jr., and the Southern Christian Leadership Conference. New York: William Morris, 1986.
- Robinson, Jo Ann Gibson. The Montgomery Bus Boycott and the Women Who Started It. Knoxville: University of Tennessee Press, 1987.
- Robnett, Belinda. How Long? How Long?: African-American Women in the Struggle for Civil Rights. New York: Oxford University Press, 1997.

Robinson, Ruby Doris Smith

Ruby Doris Smith Robinson (1942–1967) was a civil rights activist, a member of the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee (SNCC), and one of the organization's most important leaders and organizers before her untimely death at the age of 25. Born in Atlanta, Georgia, on April 25, 1942, Ruby Doris Smith was the second oldest of seven children. From their family home, both her mother and father ran separate business enterprises. Her mother, Alice Smith, was a beautician operating a beauty shop out of rooms attached to the house. Her father, J. T. Smith, owned and operated a store and also drove a cab and operated a local restaurant. After Robinson entered high school, her father founded a Baptists church and became its principal pastor. The social elevation experienced through her parents' hard work meant that Robinson was among the burgeoning African American middle class in Atlanta. She was a debutante as a high school senior and, after high school, in the fall of 1959, she entered Spelman College, a prestigious historically African American college for women.

Although Spelman, Morehouse, and other Atlanta University Center (AUC) schools were symbols of the African American elite, these institutions were also known for the progressive administrators, faculty, and students of their past and present including W. E. B. Du Bois, Benjamin E. Mays, Martin Luther King Jr., Howard Zinn, Gwen Robinson, and Julian Bond, among many others. Given someone of Robinson's social standing, background, and skin color, Spelman seemed to be a perfect fit for her. With the activist tradition of the AUC and recent events in the United States and the world—Ghana's independent in 1957, simultaneous calls by Malcolm X and Robert F. Williams for armed self-defense in 1959, and the early successes of the Civil Rights movement—Robinson's matriculation at Spelman served as a catalyst to her radicalization. By 1960, Robinson joined the Atlanta Committee on Appeal for Human Rights, which held a demonstration at the State Capitol.

As an actively involved member of the Atlanta Student Movement, Robinson worked with others to help desegregate Grady Memorial Hospital and, in 1961, she heeded Ella Baker's call to attend an organizing conference at Shaw University in Raleigh, North Carolina. This conference, which led to the launching of SNCC as a student-oriented civil rights organization, is where Robinson began to expand her activism. She joined the May 1961 Freedom Rides. After serving a 60-day jail sentence, Robinson became involved in voter registration in McComb, Mississippi. During this phase of her involvement in SNCC, many took note of her leadership and organizing abilities. Known for a sharp mind, a quick wit, and a steady determination, Robinson quickly gained the respect of her colleagues in SNCC—male and female, white and black alike. She often volunteered for some of the most dangerous assignments in SNCC, and her courage, assertiveness, and bold action were a source of inspiration for her peers.

By late 1962, Robinson was less active in the field and began to focus more of her energies on organizational administration and leadership. Indeed, she was one of the key members of a small cadre of leaders within SNCC and perhaps the most respected female in the entire organization. After her marriage to Clifford Robinson in 1963 and the birth of their son, Robinson found it difficult to juggle the demands of commitment to SNC and her new family. As the stress mounted, Robinson's health began to falter as early as 1964. In spring 1965, she earned her BA in physical education from Spelman College and became a member of SNCC's Personnel Committee after her election as executive secretary. After the organization moved to open calls for black power the next year, Robinson embraced the change and even gravitated more toward black nationalism and Pan-Africanism. She provided critical logistical support for initiatives in both the North and South during the early months of SNCC's black power phase. Despite her continued radicalization, Robinson likely voted against or abstained from voting on the measure that led to the ouster of whites from SNCC. Soon after the December 1, 1966 vote, Robinson fell ill and, by April 1967, she was diagnosed with terminal cancer. On October 7, 1967, Ruby Doris Smith Robinson died at the age of 25.

See also: Black Power; Freedom Rides; Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee

Walter C. Rucker

Bibliography

- Collier-Thomas, Bettye, and V. P. Franklin. Sisters in the Struggle: African American Women in the Civil Rights-Black Power Movement. New York: New York University Press, 2001.
- Fleming, Cynthia Griggs. Soon We Will Not Cry: The Liberation of Ruby Doris Smith Robinson. New York: Rowman & Littlefield Publishers, 1998.
- Fleming, Cynthia Griggs. "Black Women Activists and the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee: The Case of Ruby Doris Smith Robinson." In "We Specialize in the Wholly Impossible: A Reader in Black Women's History". Darlene Clark Hine, Wilma King, and Linda Reed, eds. 561–77. Brooklyn, NY: Carlson Publishing, 1995.
- Ross, Rosetta E. Witnessing and Testifying: Black Women, Religion, and Civil Rights. Minneapolis: Fortress Press, 2003.

Roosevelt, Eleanor

Eleanor Roosevelt (1884–1962), human rights activist, was born Anna Eleanor Roosevelt into a prominent New York City family. A niece of U.S. President Theodore Roosevelt and the wife of President Franklin Delano Roosevelt, Roosevelt became a force for social change in American society. An influential First Lady, she integrated the White House and advised the president on the country's economic and social problems, including civil rights of African Americans. Roosevelt served as a United States Delegate to the United Nations (1945–1952; 1961–1962) and as a chairperson of the UN Commission on Human Rights (1947–1948). The Universal Declaration of Human Rights was established under her leadership.

Eleanor Roosevelt was the daughter of Elliott Roosevelt and Anna Hall. Roosevelt's father was the godfather of Franklin Delano Roosevelt (who was Eleanor's fifth cousin). Despite her family's wealth, Roosevelt had an unhappy childhood. Her father was an alcoholic and her mother was aloof; both died before Eleanor's 10th birthday. While at a boarding school in England, Roosevelt was mentored by the schoolmistress who recognized her student's desire to help the oppressed. After returning to New York City (1902), Roosevelt taught dancing to immigrants and investigated laborer conditions. Eleanor Roosevelt and Franklin Delano Roosevelt married in New York City where President Theodore Roosevelt gave his niece away (1905). Six children were born thereafter: a daughter and five sons. Busy with her growing family, Roosevelt dealt with an interfering mother-in-law while her husband became active in politics. After love letters between her husband and social secretary were discovered in 1918, Eleanor Roosevelt left Franklin Roosevelt and offered him a divorce, which he refused. After he promised fidelity, they reconciled. Thereafter, Eleanor Roosevelt pursued her own interests with the suffrage movement and the League of Women Voters. She taught history and government at Todhunter School in New York City. After Franklin Roosevelt nearly died from polio (1921), Eleanor Roosevelt persuaded her husband to continue with his life and political career, despite his disability.

Eleanor Roosevelt immersed herself with African American issues. She befriended Mary McLeod Bethune, president of Bethune-Cookson College. The FBI started a file on Roosevelt in 1924. After Franklin Roosevelt's election as president (1933), the First Lady encouraged Americans to contact her for concerns. A popular First Lady, she received many letters, traveled to investigate concerns locally, and reported back to the president. She advised her husband to establish the National Youth Administration (NYA), where Mary McLeod Bethune was later appointed as chief of NYA's Division of Negro Affairs. Roosevelt prompted her husband to start discussions with African American leaders on antilynching legislation and desegregation of the armed forces. She agreed with the NAACP's opposition to wage differences based on race.

The president sometimes listened to his wife: he halted the firing of African American women in the Census Bureau, but he would not support the Senate antilynching bill (1937). Sharecroppers were invited to the White House to meet with the President and First Lady, who later visited their homes in the South. The First Lady defied Alabama's segregation laws by joining her African American colleagues at the Southern Conference for Human Welfare (1938). She resigned from the Daughters of the American Revolution (DAR) when it refused to allow an African American singer, Marian Anderson, to perform at Constitution Hall (1939). In 1942, Roosevelt gave the Tuskegee Airmen her support in their request to join the United States Air Force pilots in the war against Nazi Germany. She also pushed for the Army Nurses Corps to admit African American nurses. She joined the NAACP board of directors and the National Council of Negro Women. White southerners who opposed the First Lady's human rights agenda complained to the president, but Franklin Roosevelt quietly supported his wife, as he preserved her letters.

Eleanor Roosevelt's activism continued after her husband's death (1945). She hosted events to honor her husband's memory and legacy while serving as U.S. Delegate to the United Nations and later as goodwill ambassador. After supporting the integration of the public schools, Roosevelt received death threats and the Ku Klux Klan placed a bounty on her head. She persevered by traveling worldwide, giving speeches, and hosting a radio program. Roosevelt's "My Day" columns were popular, appearing in newspapers across America (1935–1962). Her columns reflected her varied interests on human rights, children issues, parenting, and politics. Despite failing health, she was on the President's Commission on the Status of Women in her final year. She died on Nov. 7, 1962, in New York City. Anna Eleanor Roosevelt was buried beside her husband in the Rose Garden of the Franklin D. Roosevelt Presidential Library in Hyde Park, New York.

See also: Anderson, Marian; Bethune, Mary McLeod; Kennedy, John Fitzgerald; Ku Klux Klan; National Association for the Advancement of Colored People; National Council of Negro Women; Tuskegee Airmen

Bibliography

- Anthony, Carl S. "Skirting the Issue: First Ladies and African Americans." American Visions 7, no. 5 (1992):28–32.
- Bickerstaff, Joyce, and Wilbur C. Rich. "Mrs. Roosevelt and Mrs. Bethune: Collaborators for Racial Justice." Social Education 48, no. (1984):532–35.
- Black, Allida M. "Championing a Champion: Eleanor Roosevelt and the Marian Anderson 'Freedom Concert.'" Presidential Studies Quarterly 20, no. 4 (1990):719–36.
- Freeman, Elsie T., Walter Bodie, and Wynell Burroughs. "Document of the Month: Eleanor Roosevelt Resigns from the DAR: A Study in Conscience." Social Education 48, no. 7 (1984):536–41.
- Gerber, Robin. Leadership the Eleanor Roosevelt Way: Timeless Strategies from the First Lady of Courage. New York: Portfolio; Penguin Group, 2003.
- Nolde, O. Frederick. "Freedom's Charter: the Universal Declaration of Human Rights." Headline Series 76 (1949):3–62.
- Roosevelt, Eleanor. You Learn by Living. Louisville, KY: Westminster John Knox Press, 1960.
- Tyler, Pamela. "'Blood on Your Hands': White Southerners' Criticism of Eleanor Roosevelt during World War II." In Before Brown: Civil Rights and White Backlash in the Modern South. Glenn Feldman, ed., 96–115. Tuscaloosa: University of Alabama Press, 2004.
- Van Thoor, Mieke. "The Missing Civil Rights in Eleanor's Roosevelt's Autobiographies." European Contributions to American Studies 39 (1998):216–26.

Rosewood, Florida, Riot of 1923

Beginning on New Year's Day 1923 and lasting for a week, a series of white attacks on the black residents of Rosewood, an unincorporated community in Levy County inside Florida's Panhandle, resulted in the documented deaths of six blacks and two whites and the complete destruction of the mostly black populated village. The events of the Rosewood riot or massacre were forgotten by history until Gary Moore, a Florida journalist, rediscovered and reported on them in the 1980s. In 1994, Florida legislators, after a state investigation and report, passed a claims bill that provided compensation for survivors and descendants of the victims. Rosewood remains one of the worst episodes of racial violence in Florida and one of many violent clashes between whites and blacks in the United States during the early 20th century.

Rosewood's nightmare began on the morning of January 1, 1923, when Fannie Taylor, a white woman in nearby Sumner, claimed that an unidentified black man had assaulted her. Some Rosewood survivors reported that Taylor's assailant was not a black man, but her white lover, who was in her home while her husband was away at work. On that January morning, however, most of Sumner's white residents accepted her story and formed a posse to begin the manhunt. The posse believed that the assailant was Jessie Hunter, a black convict who had recently escaped from a local work crew. Hunter was supposedly hiding out around Rosewood after securing help from Sam Carter, a black man who lived between Sumner and Rosewood. The posse captured Carter, who confessed to hiding and taking Hunter away by wagon. Now a vengeful mob, the posse tortured and killed Carter and then moved on to Rosewood. There it confronted another black man, Aaron Carrier, whom the whites believed had also aided Hunter's escape. Before the mob could lynch Carrier, Edward Pillsbury, a sympathetic white man, managed to hide Carrier and remove him to safety.

Unfortunately, Sylvester Carrier, another member of the Carrier clan, was not so lucky. Two days after Carter's murder, a reduced white posse was still in search of Jessie Hunter (he was never found) when they heard news of a gathering of blacks at Sylvester Carrier's house in Rosewood. Sylvester Carrier had a reputation for standing up to whites and had made it known that he would not allow whites to bully him or members of his family. The white posse returned to Rosewood to investigate the reported black meeting at Carrier's house. Because of the recent violence, about two dozen members of Carrier's extended family had sought refuge inside Carrier's house, where they prepared to defend themselves.

When the posse arrived on the evening of January 4, Sylvester Carrier refused to allow any of the white men to enter his home. When two posse members, Harry Andrews and C. P. Wilkerson, attempted to force their way into the house, the blacks opened fire, killing Andrews and Wilkerson and wounding several other posse members, who returned fire against the house. Reports of the fight spread rapidly through Levy and neighboring Alachua County, where a white posse formed and moved on to Rosewood to reinforce the white men besieging Carrier's house.

Fighting at the house raged into the early morning of January 5. By then, several whites and blacks had been wounded and Sylvester Carrier and his mother, Sarah Carrier, lay dead inside the house; the rest of Carrier's family managed to escape during a lull in the shooting before dawn. News of the battle soon reached the other black residents of

An African American home in flames, the work of a white mob during the burning of Rosewood in 1923. (UPI-Bettmann/Corbis)

Rosewood. Many of them fled into the nearby woods and swamps, where they joined the Carrier refugees in hiding. After the fight, the enraged white posse burned down the Carrier house and a dozen other black homes in Rosewood. The whites also killed 50-year-old Lexie Gordon, a black woman, while she was trying to flee her burning home.

The violence at Rosewood continued for two more days. During that time, the white mob killed two more blacks, Mingo Williams and James Carrier, Sylvester's brother, who had been among the family members that escaped the Carrier house on January 5. On Sunday, January 7, the white mob celebrated the Sabbath by burning down the rest of the black homes and buildings in Rosewood. After a week of killings, two whites and at least six blacks were dead (undocumented reports claim many more blacks died), and the Rosewood community lay in ruins. The surviving black residents never returned. Rosewood disappeared from history.

Almost 60 years passed before Rosewood reclaimed public attention. In 1982, Gary Moore, a reporter for the St. Petersburg Times, published an article on Rosewood based on his reading of contemporary newspaper accounts and interviews with white and black witnesses. Moore continued to report on Rosewood but despite substantial initial public interest and a highly acclaimed segment on Rosewood on CBS News's 60 Minutes in 1983, national awareness of the massacre largely receded.

Ten years later, however, Rosewood regained state and national attention when the Florida legislature brought up a claims bill to compensate Rosewood survivors and descendants who claimed that the State of Florida had failed to protect the black residents of Rosewood because of their race. After a tough legislative battle, the Florida House and Senate passed the Rosewood bill, which Governor Lawton Chiles signed into law in 1994. The bill provided proven survivors $150,000 each in compensation, created a $500,000 fund to reimburse the Rosewood families who had lost property during the riot, funded 25 annual college scholarships for minority students (the scholarships gave preference to descendants of Rosewood survivors), and allowed the state to begin a criminal investigation of the violence. Renewed interest in Rosewood led to Director John Singleton's 1997 film, Rosewood, which dramatized the 1923 massacre.

See also: Jim Crow; Lynching; White Mob Violence; White Supremacy

Ridgeway Boyd Murphree

Bibliography

- D'Orso, Michael. Like Judgment Day: The Ruin and Redemption of a Town Called Rosewood. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons, 1996.
- Jones, Maxine Deloris, and Kevin McCarthy. African Americans in Florida. Sarasota, FL: Pineapple Press, 1993.
- Ortiz, Paul. Emancipation Betrayed: The Hidden History of Black Organizing and White Violence in Florida from Reconstruction to the Bloody Election of 1920. Berkeley: University of California Press, 2005.

Rustin, Bayard

Bayard Rustin (1912–1987) was born on March 17, 1912, in West Chester, Pennsylvania, the illegitimate son of Florence Rustin. Florence's parents, Janifer and Julia, raised Bayard in West Chester. Julia Rustin was raised as a member of the Society of Friends or Quakers. Her belief in the Quaker doctrine of pacifism and her social activism in organizations like the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP) helped Rustin become a social activist.

While in high school, Rustin began to protest racism. He refused to leave a West Chester restaurant that denied him service. He defiantly sat in the all-white section of the local theater. When traveling as a member of the West Chester High School track team, Rustin threatened not to run unless he and his black teammates were given integrated housing. After high school graduation in 1932, Rustin studied at Wilberforce University and Cheyney State University, but did not graduate. Bored with school, Rustin went to New York City to live with a relative in 1937. He found temporary employment in New York through the Works Progress Administration (WPA). In 1938, he enrolled at the City College of New York but again did not graduate because he was performing with the folk group Josh White Singers and folk singer Huddie Ledbetter. Furthermore, Rustin had become a youth organizer for the Young Communist League (YCL). In June 1941, however, after the YCL declared that the fight against fascism was more important than fighting racism, Rustin resigned. He had met the socialist labor union leader A. Philip Randolph while with the YCL, and, when he left the YCL, Rustin went to work for him. Randolph planned a "March on Washington" by thousands of African Americans if President Franklin Roosevelt did not end Jim Crow in the defense industries. Roosevelt gave in to Randolph's demand, issuing an executive order banning discrimination practices by federal defense contractors. Randolph cancelled the march, but Rustin disagreed. It was the first of several rifts between Randolph and Rustin.

In the late summer of 1941, Rustin was hired as race relations secretary for the Fellowship of Reconciliation (FOR), a religious pacifist organization. In FOR, Rustin came under the mentorship of the pacifist A. J. Muste. Muste introduced him to the teachings of Mahatma Gandhi and taught him how to weld Gandhi's philosophy, the organizational skills of the Communist Party, and the pacifism of his Quaker religion into his future life work: civil rights. In 1942, Rustin and others cofounded the Congress for Racial Equality (CORE). Unlike FOR, which emphasized pacifism, CORE focused on race relations. While still at FOR, Rustin took an additional job as a CORE field secretary. On a bus trip to Nashville, Tennessee, in 1942, Rustin defied the law by sitting in the "whites only" section. He was arrested but later released. He faced a longer period of incarceration, however, for being a pacifist during World War II. In 1944, Rustin registered as a conscientious objector but refused to report for a physical examination for assignment to a camp for conscientious objectors. As a result, Rustin served 28 months in a federal penitentiary for draft evasion.

After his release from prison in 1946, Rustin worked again with A. Philip Randolph, this time with his Committee against Discrimination in the Armed Forces. Randolph opposed a new federal law requiring universal military training because it sanctioned racial segregation. He put pressure on President Harry Truman to issue an executive order revising the law. Facing reelection in 1948 and desiring to keep the black vote, Truman succumbed to Randolph's demand. He issued Executive Order 9981 outlawing discrimination on the basis of race, color, religion, or national origin in the American military. Having succeeded, Randolph wished to disband the committee; however, Rustin and others expressed dissent with Randolph in a national press conference, an action Rustin later regretted.

In 1947, Rustin was part of a group of 16 CORE and FOR activists participating in what may be the earliest known "freedom ride" in the South. The bus trip was officially known as the "Journey of Reconciliation." The purpose of the journey was to test enforcement of the 1946 U.S. Supreme Court decision Morgan v. Virginia outlawing discrimination in interstate travel. CORE and FOR riders deliberately sat in segregated sections of buses and trains while traveling through the South. In Chapel Hill, North Carolina, Rustin and three others were arrested and charged with violation of the state's segregation laws. Rustin was sentenced to 30 days of hard labor on a chain gang, but he was released because of good behavior after 22 days. Afterwards Rustin lectured and wrote about his chain gang experience. Several years later the state of North Carolina abolished chain gangs.

Rustin's work with FOR took on an international dimension in 1951 when he helped organize the Committee to Support South African Resistance, which later became the American Committee on Africa. In 1952, FOR sent Rustin to Africa to meet with two of the leaders of the African independence movement: Kwame Nkrumah of Ghana and Nnamdi Azikiwe of Nigeria. Back in the United States, Rustin was touring to raise money for another African trip when disaster struck. Openly gay, Rustin was arrested on a "moral charge" in Pasadena, California, in 1953 and was sentenced to 60 days in jail. His arrest made national news. In disgrace, Rustin resigned from FOR. He soon found a job with a secular pacifist group: the War Resisters League (WRL). During Rustin's 12 years at WRL, he served as executive director, co-editor of the magazine Liberation, and spokesperson for the WRL at international pacifist meetings.

A. Philip Randolph helped Rustin obtain a leave of absence from WRL to assist the Reverend Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. during the Montgomery bus boycott in 1956. Dr. King knew of Gandhi's writings but was unclear about how a nonviolent protest should be carried out. Rustin's involvement in the Montgomery bus boycott ended when other boycott leaders asked Rustin to leave town for fear that publicity about his past would harm the boycott. Yet Dr. King continued to call on Rustin. In 1957, he asked Rustin to help organize the Southern Christian Leadership Conference (SCLC)'s Prayer Pilgrimage to the Lincoln Memorial in Washington, D.C. Rustin also organized the National Youth Marches of 1958 and 1959. He was set to organize a SCLC demonstration at the 1960 Democratic Convention until Congressman Adam Clayton Powell threatened to expose him as gay unless he quit the project.

When a March on Washington was proposed in 1963, Rustin and A. Philip Randolph saw an opportunity to do what they dreamed of. Because he originated the idea of a march back in 1942, A. Philip Randolph was selected by the major civil rights leader to be executive director of the march. Randolph, in turn, selected as his deputy director, Bayard Rustin, and it was Rustin who actually coordinated the planning of the event. Planning was going smoothly until South Carolina Senator Strom Thurmond took the floor of the U.S. Senate and denounced Rustin as a Communist, a draft dodger, and a homosexual. Although Thurmond's tirade triggered a call by some civil rights leaders for Rustin's resignation, Randolph and Dr. King continued to back Rustin as the march strategist. Rustin's job was anticipating the marchers' needs for housing and transportation, reconciling differences between civil rights and labor groups, lining up speakers and performers, and working with law enforcement officials to ensure a peaceful march. More than 200,000 whites and blacks attended the historic event on August 28, 1963. At the end of the day, the major civil rights leaders met with President John F. Kennedy at the White House. But Rustin was not among them because the other leaders said his presence would embarrass them. Nevertheless, Rustin's accomplishment as strategist of the 1963 March on Washington was the high point of his life.

Rustin and Randolph believed that the 1963 march owed its success to an alliance between organized labor and civil rights groups. Therefore Rustin and Randolph cofounded the A. Philip Randolph Institute, an organization funded by the American Federation of Labor and the Congress of Industrial Organizations (AFL-CIO). The Randolph Institute gave Rustin a formal leadership role in the Civil Rights movement and an organization promoting the coalition politics Rustin believed in. The Randolph Institute promoted the Recruitment and Training Program designed to increase minority participation in the building and construction trades. It also fostered voter registration and lobbied for labor interests in Congress. Rustin was president of the Institute from 1966 to 1979, and co-chairman from 1979 until his death. When he began working at the Randolph Institute, Rustin resigned from his job at the WRL and left the pacifist group, the Committee for Nonviolent Action.

With no time available for the peace movement, Rustin refused to participate in antiwar demonstrations during the 1960s and 1970s. He ridiculed civil rights leaders such as Dr. Martin Luther King Jr., who condemned the Vietnam War, arguing that civil rights and pacifism do not mix. Rustin held this position despite the fact that early in his career he himself was part of both movements. During this period, Rustin adopted opinions that were controversial in the black community. He opposed black studies and black power because he thought coalition building rather than separatism was the way to gain racial justice. Rustin promoted the tactics of nonviolence while there were riots in many American cities. He urged African Americans to support Israel rather than the Palestinians. Rustin's alienation from other civil rights leaders, the Black Power movement, and the antiwar movement caused one publication to call Rustin "the lone wolf of civil rights." After the 1940s, Rustin wrote many essays, speeches, and editorials that were published in newspapers and magazines. In 1971, Rustin published a number of these writings in a book entitled Down the Line. A second book followed in 1976: Strategies for Freedom: The Changing Patterns of Black Protest.

During the final decades of his life, Rustin worked with the A. Philip Randolph Institute as well as two international organizations. He was active in the International Rescue Committee (IRC), a group devoted to dealing with refugee problems around the world. With IRC, Rustin traveled to places like Southeast Asia espousing refugee relief in Cambodia, for instance. He was also a representative for Freedom House, traveling to places like Chile, El Salvador, Grenada, Dominican Republic, Pakistan, Zimbabwe, South Africa, and Haiti to monitor elections, protest dictatorships, and promote human rights.

Rustin was in Haiti assisting in setting up democratic elections in 1987 when he suddenly became ill and was rushed back to the United States. He died in New York City on August 24, 1987. His legacy grew after his death and books on his life and work appeared. On January 20, 2003, a documentary entitled Brother Outsider: The Life of

Bayard Rustin was first broadcasted on educational television. Formerly relegated to the background of the civil rights struggle by his peers and historians, Bayard Rustin is now being recognized as an important figure in the Civil Rights movement.

See also: CORE; King, Martin Luther Jr.; March on Washington, 1963; Montgomery Bus Boycott; Randolph, A. Philip; Southern Christian Leadership Conference; Scottsboro, Alabama Case

Eric Ledell Smith

Bibliography

- Anderson, Jervis. Bayard Rustin: Troubles I've Seen—A Biography. New York: HarperCollins Books, 1997.
- Carbide, Devon W., and Donald Weise, eds. Time on Two Crosses: The Collected Writings of Bayard Rustin. San Francisco: Cleis Press, 2003.
- D'Emilio, John. Lost Prophet: The Life and Times of Bayard Rustin. New York: Free Press, 2003.
- Haughton, Buzz. "Bayard Rustin: An Annotated Bio-Bibliography." Afro-Americans in New York Life and History 24, no. 2 (2000):7–56.
- Levin, Daniel. Bayard Rustin and the Civil Rights Movement. New Brunswick, NJ: Rutgers University Press, 2000.
- Rustin, Bayard. Down the Line: The Collected Writings of Bayard Rustin. Chicago: Quadrangle Books, 1971.
- Rustin, Bayard. Strategies for Freedom: The Changing Patterns of Black Protest. New York: Columbia University Press, 1976.

Scottsboro, Alabama Case

On March 25, 1931, nine young African Americans boarded a Southern Railroad freight train traveling from Chattanooga to Memphis, Tennessee. After an altercation between the nine African Americans and a group of white youths, and the subsequent ejection of the white youths from the train, authorities stopped the train in Paint Rock, Alabama, and arrested the nine African Americans. On the train, the authorities also found two white women, Victoria Price and Ruby Bates, both disguised as boys. After being arrested and taken to jail in nearby Scottsboro, Alabama, Victoria Price claimed she had been raped by several of the African Americans. To ward off possible lynch mobs, Alabama Governor Benjamin Meek Miller ordered the Alabama National Guard to protect the jail and promised a speedy trial for the accused black men. The nine African Americans—Haywood Patterson, Clarence Norris, Willie Robertson, Andy Wright, Eugene Williams, Ozie Powell, Roy Wright, Charles Weems, and Olen Montgomery—collectively became known as the Scottsboro Boys.

The trials of the Scottsboro Boys, which began 12 days after their arrest, prompted one of the most infamous examples of racial injustice in Alabama's history. As was the custom in the Jim Crow South, an all-white jury heard the case, presided over by Judge A. E. Hawkins. The Scottsboro Boys' attorneys, Stephen Roddy and Milo Moody, provided an incompetent defense. When the trials ended, eight of the nine defendants had been found guilty of rape and sentenced to death. A mistrial was declared in the case against Roy Wright, who was only 12 years old. The prosecution had sought a life sentence because of Wright's age, but 11 of 12 jurors held out for the death penalty.

After their initial convictions, the International Labor Defense (ILD), the legal arm of the American Communist Party, assumed the Boys' defense and brought national attention to the case. The Communist Party campaigned to defend the Scottsboro Boys, not only as a way to fight blatant injustice, but also because the publicity surrounding the case offered a tremendous recruiting opportunity among northern liberals and African Americans. Upon appeal, the Alabama Supreme Court upheld all but one of the convictions, when it ruled that Eugene Williams should not have been tried as an adult because he was only 13 years old. On November 7, 1932, however, the United States Supreme Court, in Powell v. Alabama, overturned the Scottsboro Boys' convictions. The Court determined that the defendants' right to competent legal council under the Fourteenth Amendment's due process clause had been violated by the state and remanded the case to the lower court.

The Scottsboro Boys' new legal team consisted of Samuel S. Leibowitz, a defense lawyer from New York, and Joseph Brodsky, the lead attorney for the ILD. The ILD brought in the flamboyant and highly successful Leibowitz, a non-Communist, to head the defense team, but the combination of Leibowitz, a New York Jew, and the communist ILD defending accused black rapists outraged southern whites and helped the Scottsboro case to become a cause célèbre, unleashing a torrent of suspicion, racism, and anti-Semitism in Alabama and throughout the South. It also galvanized the northern critics of Jim Crow society.

The second round of trials began on March 30, 1933, in Decatur, Alabama, presided over by Judge James E. Horton Jr. After Leibowitz unsuccessfully challenged Alabama's practice of excluding African Americans from its jury rolls, Haywood Patterson's trial began, as each of the Scottsboro Boys had to be tried separately. The trial was tension-filled

These nine African American youths, known as the Scottsboro Boys, were imprisoned in Scottsboro, Alabama, after being falsely accused of raping two white women in a freight car. Here, the young men are pictured conferring with civil rights activist Juanita Jackson Mitchell in 1937. (Library of Congress)

as Leibowitz and prosecutor Thomas G. Knight Jr., attempted to discredit the other's witnesses. Leibowitz had a measure of success poking holes in the testimony of the prosecution's main witness, Victoria Price. He also secured the surprise appearance of Ruby Bates, who recanted her earlier statement that she had been raped, but Bates's evasions on the witness stand made the prosecution's charge that she had been bribed by the defense more believable. Dr. Marvin H. Lynch, one of the doctors who initially examined Price and Bates, spoke with Judge Horton behind closed doors and told him that he was convinced the girls had not been raped, but he refused to testify because he feared his practiced in Scottsboro would be ruined.

In the closing remarks, Wade Wright, the Morgan County solicitor, emphasized both Leibowitz and the communists' participation in the trial and charged the jury to show them that justice in Alabama could not be bought by "Jew money" from New York. Wright's inflammatory speech had the desired effect. On April 9, 1933, the jury, which had deliberated for only five minutes, found Patterson guilty of rape and sentenced him to death. Disappointed with the jury's verdict and convinced of the Scottsboro Boys' innocence, Judge Horton, on June 22, courageously set aside the jury verdict and ordered a new trial. His decision to overturn the verdict cost Horton his political career. In the 1934 Democratic primary election—the election in the South—Horton was defeated and returned to private practice. In a clear rebuke of Horton's decision, Alabamians overwhelmingly elected Thomas Knight as lieutenant governor.

Despite Horton's belief in the Scottsboro Boys' innocence, Knight pressed ahead with another round of trials in late November 1933. A new judge, William W. Callahan, ruthlessly favored the prosecution, going as far as to instruct the jury that a white woman would not voluntarily have sex with a black man. Juries found both Haywood Patterson and Clarence Norris guilty of rape and sentenced them to death. Leibowitz wasted no time in filing their appeals. Judge Callahan postponed the remaining trials until the appeals process was completed.

As before, the Alabama Supreme Court refused to overturn the verdicts. And as before, the Scottsboro Case went to the United States Supreme Court, which heard arguments on February 15, 1935, on both the Patterson and Norris cases. Leibowitz argued that the verdicts should be overturned because the state excluded blacks from juries, in violation of the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. Forged jury rolls during the Patterson and Norris trials showed African Americans on the rolls, and this attempt at subterfuge outraged the justices. On April 1, 1935, the Court, in Norris v. Alabama, unanimously held Alabama's system of jury selection to exclude African Americans unconstitutional and overturned the convictions of Norris and Patterson.

Because public opinion in Alabama remained steadfastly in favor of prosecuting the accused Scottsboro Boys, the state went forward with another round of trials. Haywood Patterson's fourth trial opened on January 6, 1936, with Judge Callahan presiding once again. With this round of trials, the ILD withdrew from the case, and Leibowitz, profoundly unpopular in Alabama, allowed Clarence Watts, a Huntsville attorney, to take the lead. Although Leibowitz stayed in the background, he remained thoroughly involved in Patterson's defense. Lieutenant Governor Knight returned as the lead prosecutor. Patterson's conviction by another all white jury came as no surprise, but instead of giving him death as expected, the jury sentenced him to only 75 years.

Between Patterson's conviction in January 1936 and the Norris trial that opened on July 15, 1937, prosecutor and Lieutenant Governor Thomas Knight died, leaving the prosecution in the hands of Thomas Lawson, the assistant attorney general. Judge Callahan, determined to move quickly and bring the Scottsboro Case to an end, scheduled subsequent trials one after the other. In a trial that lasted only two days, another all white jury found Norris guilty of rape and sentenced him to death. After this conviction, Clarence Watts withdrew from the Scottsboro Boys' cases, leaving Leibowitz again to lead their defense. Lawson waived the death penalty in the following trials. In rapid succession, other all-white juries quickly convicted Andy Wright and sentenced him to 99 years, and Charley Weems received 75 years. Ozie Powell pleaded guilty to assaulting a deputy, but the state dropped rape charges against him. All charges were dropped against the remaining four Scottsboro Boys, Robertson, Montgomery, Williams, and Roy Wright.

In October 1937, the United States Supreme Court refused to review Patterson's conviction. Alabama Governor Bibb Graves commuted Norris's death sentence to life imprisonment after the Alabama Supreme Court affirmed the death sentence of Norris and the prison sentences of Wright and Weems. By this time, the Scottsboro Case had severely tarnished Alabama's image worldwide and Alabamians grew weary of the drawn-out spectacle. A number of prominent Alabama attorneys and newspapermen lobbied Graves to parole the imprisoned Scottsboro Boys, and Graves personally interviewed the remaining five. Whether incensed by their malevolence toward him or as a result of political cowardice, Graves refused to grant any pardons before he left office in 1939. He even refused to meet with President Franklin D. Roosevelt to discuss the matter.

It took until November 17, 1943, for the Alabama's Pardons and Parole Board to release Charlie Weems. In January 1944, it paroled both Norris and Wright. They both broke parole and were imprisoned once again. In late 1946, the board released Powell and paroled Norris once again. Norris broke his parole and left Alabama never to return. He lived as a fugitive until Governor George C. Wallace granted him a full and unconditional pardon in October 1976. As for Haywood Patterson, the board would not grant a parole, as they considered him the most dangerous and incorrigible of all the Scottsboro Boys. Nevertheless, Patterson managed to escape prison in the summer of 1948 and, after avoiding a large police manhunt, eventually reached his sister's home in Detroit. Patterson hid there for two years until his arrest by the Federal Bureau of Investigation, but Michigan Governor G. Mennen Williams refused his extradition to Alabama. Alabama officials let the matter die. While Patterson hid from authorities in Detroit, he wrote an account of his experiences, Scottsboro Boy, which appeared in 1950. Although he was not returned to Alabama, he remained troubled. After stabbing a man in a barroom fight on December 18, 1950, a jury in Detroit convicted Patterson of manslaughter and sentenced him to 15 to 20 years in prison. He died of cancer only two years later.

On June 9, 1950, Andy Wright left Kilby prison, the last of the Scottsboro Boys to be set free. The other Scottsboro Boys, as well as most of the other figures associated with the Scottsboro Case, remained out of the public eye. Only Samuel Leibowitz achieved notable success. After the Scottsboro Case ended, he returned to his highly successful law practice in New York City and later became a justice of the New York Supreme Court in 1962.

See also: Jim Crow; National Association for the Advancement of Colored People

Dan J. Puckett

Bibliography

- Carter, Dan T. Scottsboro: A Tragedy of the American South. Revised Edition. Baton Rouge and London: Louisiana State University Press, 1979.
- Gilmore, Glenda Elizabeth. Defying Dixie: The Radical Roots of Civil Rights, 1919–1950. New York and London: W. W. Norton, 2008.
- Goodman, James E. Stories of Scottsboro. New York: Knopf, 1994.
- Howard, Walter T., ed. Black Communists Speak on Scottsboro: A Documentary History. Philadelphia: Temple University Press, 2008.
- Kinshasa, Kwando Mbiassi. The Man From Scottsboro: Clarence Norris and the Infamous 1931 Alabama Rape Trial, in His Own Words. Jefferson, NC and London: McFarland Publishers, 1997.
- Norris, Clarence, and Sybil D. Washington. The Last of the Scottsboro Boys: An Autobiography. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons, 1979.
- Patterson, Haywood, and Earl Conrad. Scottsboro Boy. New York: Doubleday, 1950.

Seale, Bobby

Bobby Seale (1936–) is a prominent civil rights advocate and cofounder of the Black Panther Party. Seale and the Black Panthers advocated a militant approach to civil rights. The organization in general and Seale, in particular, strongly opposed the nonviolent and integrationist stances of Martin Luther King and other moderate civil rights leaders. Seale and the Panthers, furthermore, advocated militancy when necessary in order to acquire black liberation.

Robert George Seale was born October 22, 1936, in Dallas, Texas. Bobby and his family resided in Texas until World War II, and then moved to Oakland, California. Seale attended Berkeley High School until his senior year. Right before graduation Seale was informed that he would not graduate owing to poor grades in the last term. In anger he tried to enter both the Army and Air Force. Seale was turned down by both organizations because of an injury he received years earlier when a car ran over his foot. Angered by his failure, Seale returned to the Air Force recruitment center and tried to plead his case. After convincing doctors and recruiters that his foot injury would not inhibit his ability to perform, the Air Force inducted him into their program. After completing basic training, Seale went to Amarillo, Texas, to train as an aircraft sheet metal mechanic. After six months in Texas, Seale chose to go to Rapid City, South Dakota. Seale's specialties were needed at the Ellsworth Air Force Base in Rapid City. After almost four years in the Air Force, Seale was discharged for disorderly conduct.

Seale's discharge came after a battle between him and his commander. When the commander ordered Seale to hand in his drums, Seale refused, and was discharged. Seale's discharge was only one example of many when his temper and rage overcame him. Seale was known for having an uncontrollable temper and built up rage. While in the Air Force he beat a fellow troop member with a bed-adaptor.

After his discharge, Seale returned to Oakland to work as a sheet metal mechanic at various plants. He simultaneously worked to earn his high school diploma while attending night school. He finally received his diploma and, in 1962, began school at Merritt College, the city college of Oakland. At Merritt, Seale took classes in engineering and drafting. To make money on the side he was a bartender and stand-up comedian. While attending Merritt, Seale joined the Afro-American Association. Through this organization Seale met

Huey Newton. Within a few years, Newton and Seale became frustrated with the Afro-American Association. To Newton and Seale the association was not going far enough. Both men believed strongly in Malcolm X and the black power that he professed. In place of the Afro-American Association, Newton and Seale created the Soul Students Advisory Counsel.

Around this time, Seale married and on July 9, 1965, he and his wife Artie had a son, Malik Nkrumah Stagolee Seale. While Seale had started a family, he continued his fight for black liberation. In October 1966, Seale and Newton organized the Black Panther Party for Self-Defense. Fellow classmate and friend, Bobby Hutton was enlisted as the first member and became the treasurer of the party. The goal of the Black Panther Party (BPP) was set forth in their famous ten point program. The program advocated self-defense and militancy to bring black liberation. The Black Panthers, however, did not necessarily advocate separatism. The organization frequently worked with whites, if they too wished to advance the black race. The Panthers also set up a number of community programs, such as their infamous free breakfast program.

Although the BPP started out as an Oakland organization, it quickly gained national attention. The BPP adopted uniforms that contained black berets, black pants, black leather jackets, black shoes, and powder blue shirts. By 1968, BPP offices were opening up nationwide. The militancy of the Black Panthers quickly gained the attention of the national government. The Black Panthers often carried guns, which furthered concerned and drew the attention of the government. In 1968, J. Edgar Hoover, head of the Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI), ordered an investigation into the BPP.

Seale and many other Black Panthers gained additional national attention after protesting at the Democratic Convention in Chicago in 1968. Seale's involvement in Chicago, however, landed him in significant trouble with the government. In September 1969, Seale and seven white radicals were indicted under the antiriot provision of the Civil Rights Act of 1968. The provision forbids anyone from crossing state lines to riot.

When Seale came to trial, the judge of the case declared him bound and gagged after numerous outbursts in court. Seale consequently was sentenced to four years in jail for contempt of court. While in jail, Seale was charged for ordering the execution of Alex Rackley, a former Black

Bobby Seale (left) and Huey Newton cofounded the Black Panther Party, which advocated black power and black opposition to the Vietnam War. (AP/Wide World Photos)

Panther who was suspected of being a government informer. In May 1971, Seale was cleared of all charges when a hung jury could not reach a decision. The following year Seale was released from prison and the contempt charges were dropped.

When Seale returned to Oakland, he found a decimated Black Panther Party from the one he had left. The violence and militancy that the BPP advocated had left many members dead. Internal strife also had led to a decrease in popularity and membership. In 1973, Seale ran for mayor of Oakland but came in second out of nine candidates. He left the Black Panthers in 1974 but continued to fight against social and political injustices. Today, Seale continues to support various organizations that fight injustices in the world. His own organization, REACH, is dedicated to youth education and advancement.

See also: Black Panther Party; Civil Rights Act of 1968; Cleaver, Eldridge; COINTELPRO; Newton, Huey P.

Mindy R. Weidman

Bibliography

- Jones, Charles E., ed. The Black Panther Party Reconsidered. Baltimore, MD: Black Classic Press, 1998.
- Seale, Bobby. A Lonely Rage: The Autobiography of Bobby Seale. New York: New York Times Books, 1978.
- Seale, Bobby. Seize the Time: The Story of the Black Panther Party and Huey P. Newton. Baltimore, MD: Black Classic Press, 1991.

Selassie, Haile

Born Lij Tafari Makonnen in the village of Ejersa Goro (then Abyssinia), Haile Selassie (1892–1975) was the emperor of Ethiopia (1930–1936; 1941–1974) and became a powerful Pan-African figure and religious symbol for the Rastafarian movement. As the son of a prominent governor and grandnephew of Emperor Menelik II, the young Tafari excelled in school and soon caught the attention of his great uncle, who appointed him governor over portions of Sidamo province at the tender age of 14. After the death of Menelik four years later, Tafari took the same post his father had held and became governor of Harar. In April 1911, he formally entered the city and took the name Ras Tafari. (Ras is an Amharic term meaning Duke) On August 3, 1911, Tafari married Menen Asfaw, niece of Empress Lij Iyasu, whom he helped depose in September 1916. As a Coptic Christian, Tafari opposed Menelik's Muslim grandson and successor, Lij Yasu. Menelik's daughter Zauditu became empress in 1916, with Tafari named as regent to the throne. Upon Zauditu's death on April 2, 1930, Tafari became Emperor Haile Selassie I (meaning "Holy Trinity") and claimed that his imperial lineage ran deep into Ethiopia's past. Selassie maintained that he was a direct descendent of Makeda (the Queen of Sheba) and King Solomon of Israel, and at his coronation in Addis Ababa on November 21, 1930, he took the full title His Imperial Majesty, Emperor Haile Selassie I, King of Kings and Lord of Lords, Conquering Lion of the Tribe of Judah, Elect of God.

Selassie had played a crucial role in outlining Menelik's modernizing reforms throughout the 1920s, including the formal abolishment of slavery in 1924 and calling for Ethiopia's admission to the League of Nations in 1923. As emperor, he continued to stress internal reforms, introducing the country's first written constitution in 1931. The new constitution established a bicameral legislature and helped facilitate a degree of popular political representation unknown in the region's history. It was Italy's invasion of Ethiopia in 1935, however, that introduced Selassie to most of the world. On June 30, 1936, he traveled to Geneva and delivered an impassioned speech to the League of Nations asking for global support against fascist aggression. Selassie's contention—that World War II would be imminent if the League of Nations did not collectively come to the aid of nations like Ethiopia—would prove to be prophetic, and his stirring delivery helped solidify his place in the world's spotlight. After the League failed to take action, Italy invaded Ethiopia during the Second Italo-Abyssinian War and occupied the country for six years. Selassie fled to Europe in exile during this period until Italy's defeat at the hands of United Kingdom, and Ethiopian forces liberated the country in 1941.

Upon his return to power, Selassie continued to stress internal reform and the importance of Ethiopia's role in the emerging global community. Ethiopia became a charter member of the United Nations (UN), and Selassie introduced a revised constitution in 1955 that further extended political representation through the establishment of a lower house of parliament. In addition, he helped the country embark on a plan of massive educational reform and initiated a number of large-scale development projects aimed at modernizing Ethiopia's infrastructure. During the 1960s, Selassie began to champion Pan-Africanism while simultaneously aligning Ethiopia with the West. In 1963, he presided over the formation of the Organization of African Unity (OAU), headquartered in Addis Ababa, and traveled internationally throughout the decade and into the 1970s. As the head of state with the longest tenure in office, the emperor continued to garner respect and accolades at international events around the world. He was given precedence over all other leaders at the state funerals of President John F. Kennedy and Charles de Gaulle.

In 1972, severe drought caused a famine to spread in the Wollo province while Selassie celebrated his 80th birthday. The Imperial government kept many of the facts surrounding the scope of the famine from both Selassie and the rest of the world. When news of its existence finally reached the international community, Selassie suffered a serious drop in popularity, both within and outside Ethiopia. Wracked by his ill health and fledgling popularity, he was further weakened by economic disruption and a military coup deposed him on September 12, 1974. On August 28, 1975, state media reported that Selassie had died of complications following prostate surgery. Many, including his doctor, denied the government's version of events and charged that the ex-emperor had been murdered while under house arrest following his removal from power. Others believed that Selassie never passed away at all, including many within the Rastafari movement.

Beginning in the 1930s on the island of Jamaica, a growing movement based on Marcus Mosiah Garvey's "Back to Africa" campaign began to take hold among the more impoverished descendents of slaves imported to the island from West Africa. Based on a syncretic blend of Christianity and West African ritual, the Rastafarian movement was a particular form of Ethiopianism—a theology that posits the black race as the original Israelites of the Old Testament and interprets that the returned Messiah of the New Testament will be a redeemer for all African people. For many followers of the Rastafari movement, Garvey's writings and comments were prophecies fulfilled by the reign of Selassie and embodied in the emperor himself. Most within the movement see Selassie as God incarnate, a black Messiah who will unite the African Diaspora and lead the black race to freedom.

Selassie did not claim to be a deity, although he never denounced the Rastafari movement and its contention that he was the Redeemer prophesized in the New Testament Book of Revelation. In addition, his claim to the line of King Solomon and the titles he took on becoming emperor were direct references to the Book of Revelation and the Messiah. Selassie's defiance and eloquence before the League of Nations—and later, the United Nations—solidified his popularity throughout the African Diaspora. In addition, Ethiopia's defeat of Italy in 1941 and Selassie's subsequent return to power further enhanced the Rastafari contention that Ethiopia was a spiritually significant land, a pure and unfettered Africa that had remained free from colonial oppression. Selassie's call for Pan-African solidarity also indicated to many followers his status as a redemptive figure for the black race and helped fuel the growing messianic cult surrounding him.

On April 21, 1966, more than 100,000 Rastafarians gathered in Kingston when Selassie paid his first visit to Jamaica. Many came to view the man whom they believed to be God, and Selassie appeared frightened and surprised by the crowd. Nevertheless, Selassie left the airport at the behest of prominent Rasta leader Mortimer Planner and successfully toured Kingston amidst a throng of followers. It was here that Rita Marley, wife of musician Bob Marley, first viewed Selassie and converted to Rastafarianism. Her influence would later draw Marley himself into the faith, and the growing globalization of roots reggae music became a powerful conduit for Rastafarian ideals beginning in the late 1960s. One of Marley's most popular songs, titled "War," included lyrics drawn directly from Selassie's influential antiracism speech before the United Nations in 1963. Marley also wrote the prominent Rasta-infused song "Jah Live" as a reaction to Selassie's purported death in 1975.

Early influential Rastas, like Leonard Percival Howell, faced a fierce backlash from the Jamaican state. The government charged Howell with sedition after the leader refused to declare himself a loyal subject of King George V of England, instead pledging himself to Emperor Selassie. The earliest Rastas most likely considered Selassie a king for all African people and a symbol of black pride and unity; however, his status as a spiritual figure developed quite quickly. In 1963, Jamaica achieved its independence from England. Coupled with the growing popularity of roots reggae and Rasta culture, the faith began to spread and flourish worldwide. Fueled by emigration from the West Indies, a growing number of religious Rastas appeared in the United States and flourished in small communities, most commonly in urban areas. In addition, cultural Rastafarianism flourished to a greater degree as the popularity of Jamaican music continued to rise throughout the 1970s.

Rastafarian words and symbols directly reference Selassie as a prophet of the black race. Rastas pronounce the Roman numeral in “Haile Selassie I” as the first person pronoun “I” and commonly repeat the refrain “I-in-I” to signify their individual attachment to Selassie and the greater African race. Rastas also speak of Selassie as “Jah Rastafari Selassie,” and believe that marijuana (ganja) helps facilitate a deeper spiritual connection with both Selassie and each other. Some Rastafarians believe that Selassie is still alive; others insist that he will return to earth one day to facilitate a judgment of all peoples, calling the faithful to reside forever in Holy Mount Zion, a mythical place in Africa.

Selassie did not publicly denounce the Rastafari, but he did become more conservative in his rhetoric later in life and tried at times to redirect the movement. Despite his goal of Pan-African unity, he called on Planner, Howell, and other early Rasta leaders to encourage liberation and racial uplift in Jamaica itself, instead of outright emigration to Ethiopia. He also remained committed to the Ethiopian Orthodox Church and is said to have confided in Orthodox leaders his frustration with the course of the Rastafari movement in Jamaica. In the face of Italian aggression, his impassioned request for support from the League of Nations actually drew criticism from some black nationalists, including Marcus Garvey. In a 1967 interview, Selassie appeared to rebuff his status as a supernatural figure and denied being a divinity. Nevertheless, Selassie sympathized with the movement and its followers, donating a piece of land south of Addis Ababa for use by Jamaican Rastafarians in 1948. Called Shashamane, a small Jamaican community with a number of devout Rastas still inhabits the colony to this day.

See also: African Diaspora; African Imperialism; Ethiopian Peace Movement; Garvey, Marcus; Organization of African Unity; Pan-Africanism

Lane Demas

Bibliography

- Chevannes, Barry. Rastafari: Roots and Ideology. Syracuse, NY: Syracuse University Press, 1994.
- Chevannes, Barry, ed. Rastafari and Other African-Caribbean Worldviews. New Brunswick, NJ: Rutgers University Press, 1995.
- Getachew, Indrias. Beyond the Throne: The Enduring Legacy of Emperor Haile Selassie I. Addis Ababa, Ethiopia: Shama Books, 2001.

Lockett, Hans Wilhelm. The Mission: The Life, Reign, and Character of Haile Selassie I. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1989.

Marcus, Harold. Haile Sellassie I: The Formative Years. Los Angeles: University of California Press, 1987.

Schwab, Peter. Haile Selassie I: Ethiopia's Lion of Judah. Chicago: Nelson-Hall, 1979.

Self-Segregation

Self-segregation, a concept rearticulated in the late 20th century as “community-control black nationalism,” was embraced by a number of African American intellectuals and activists at the turn of the 20th century. In particular, this concept was given voice in the literary work of Sutton Griggs (Imperium in Imperio) and in the polemical writings of W. E. B. Du Bois. By the late 1960s, the term “black power” captured much of the essence of self-segregation as articulated by Griggs and Du Bois. In essence, self-segregation was a call to create autonomous and self-sufficient black communities in Jim Crow America.

As one of the principal advocates of self-segregation, Du Bois witnessed a remarkable ideological transformation between the publication of The Souls of Black Folk in 1903 and his resignation as the editor of Crisis and his first resignation from the NAACP on June, 26 1934. In the months leading up to his eventual resignation, Du Bois—apparently disenchanted with the prospects of defeating Jim Crow segregation—began to advocate for independence from white communities and reliance on black institutions and organizations. In a series editorials published in Crisis, the national organ of the NAACP, Du Bois began to articulate and give shape to his plan for self-segregation. In the April 1934 edition, he wrote that blacks should organize their strength as consumers, learn to cooperate and become producers, and create and run their own institutions. When Walter White, executive secretary of the NAACP, criticized Du Bois for this controversial stance, he responded by reminding readers that the light-complexioned spokesperson of the organization could pass for white and did not have to suffer the daily indignities of blackness and Jim Crow segregation. This war of words between editor and executive secretary would leave Du Bois no other choice but to tender his resignation from the newsletter he founded a quarter-century earlier.

After he left the editorial office of the Crisis, Du Bois gave a number of speeches that fleshed out, more fully, his idea of self-segregation. These efforts culminated in the publication of “A Negro Nation within the Nation” in June 1935. This article would be the most sustained treatment on the issue offered by Du Bois to date. He began the article with a discussion of the social, economic, and political problems facing blacks in the Depression-era South and North. Evoking concepts once championed by his arch rival, Booker T. Washington, Du Bois noted that African Americans had not successfully created a sound economic foundation in the aftermath of emancipation. The failure of Radical Reconstruction was the failure to provide freed people with land on which they could base an independent existence in America. Because he saw few available allies and no forthcoming changes in American society, Du Bois concluded the article by stating that the only plausible solution was racial separation and black community autonomy.

This call for “self-segregation” closely mirrors community-control black nationalism espoused by black power advocates. Stokely Carmichael (Kwame Ture) and Huey P. Newton would have found a great degree of resonance with Du Bois’s suggestion that African Americans could be self-sufficient through the creation of consumer cooperatives in which farmers sold their produce to black-owned grocers and technicians trained at Hampton and Tuskegee could guide black industry. What is startling about this change in Du Bois’s worldview is not only that it embraced Washington’s ideas about the utility of vocational training but it also incorporated some of the structural concepts operationalized by another one of his chief rivals—Marcus Garvey. See also: A Negro Nation Within the Nation; Black Nationalism; Black Power; Du Bois, W. E. B.; Garvey, Marcus; Griggs, Sutton

Walter C. Rucker

Bibliography

- Bracey, John, August Meier, and Elliott Rudwick, eds. Black Nationalism in America. Indianapolis: Bobbs-Merrill, 1970.
- Du Bois, W. E. B. “A Negro Nation with A Nation,” Current History and Forum 42 (1935):265–70.
- Du Bois, W. E. B. “Segregation in the North,” The Crisis 41 (1934): 115–17.
- Griggs, Sutton E. Imperium in Imperio. New York: Arno Press, 1969.
- Moses, Wilson Jeremiah. The Golden Age of Black Nationalism, 1850–1925. New York: Oxford University Press, 1978.

Selma March

The Selma march was a five-day event in 1965 during which an interracial group of protestors traveled more than 50 miles on foot from Selma, Alabama, to the state capital of Montgomery. It culminated in a mass rally on the steps of Alabama’s capitol building where a crowd of 25,000 people, including civil rights activists, religious leaders, and everyday people from across the United States, heard one of Martin Luther King Jr.’s most remembered speeches. The Selma march focused national attention on the exclusion of African Americans from the electoral process and galvanized public sentiment in support of the Voting Rights Act of 1965. The event was one of the last large-scale protest demonstrations of the Civil Rights movement’s “classic” phase during which a series of public protests drew national attention to the impact of racial segregation and helped bring an end to the legal structures of the system of racial discrimination known as Jim Crow.

The march that eventually made it to Montgomery began on Sunday, March 21, 1965, when approximately 3,000 people left Brown Chapel AME Church in Selma, Alabama, and crossed the Edmund Pettus Bridge on the eastern edge of the city. The procession continued along both highways and rural county roads, enduring rain and cold weather, as well as threats of violence, along the way. By court order, only 300 of the marchers were permitted to walk the entire distance from Selma to Montgomery, but as the march made its official entry into Montgomery on Thursday, March 25, its ranks swelled once again.

The march that reached Montgomery actually represented the third attempt to do so. On Sunday, March 7, in an event known as “Bloody Sunday,” a group of marchers made its way from Brown Chapel Church as far as the Pettus Bridge only to be set upon by state troopers and other law enforcement officers. With many of them attacking from atop horses, the officers pursued the marchers all the way back to Brown Chapel and continued their assault until no African Americans could be found on Selma’s streets. John Lewis of the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee (SNCC) was among the most seriously injured, suffering a fractured skull, and numerous others were treated for cuts, broken bones, and exposure to tear gas. In a development that was unusually swift for the time, film footage of the attack aired that same evening on ABC, interrupting the network's broadcast of the film Judgment at Nuremberg.

Two days later, Martin Luther King Jr. fronted a second march, but once again it only went as far as the Pettus Bridge. Per an advance agreement designed to comply with a federal court's injunction against proceeding all the way to Montgomery, King did not attempt to lead the group across the bridge. Instead, the group knelt in prayer and returned to Brown Chapel. That evening, attacks by local whites resulted in the death of James Reeb, a white seminary student who had traveled to Selma from Boston to participate. Reeb's death and the violence of Bloody Sunday prompted an address by President Lyndon Johnson before a joint session of Congress in which he called for passage of the Voting Rights Act and invoked the civil rights anthem "We Shall Overcome." Six days after Johnson's speech, the court lifted its injunction, and the third and final march commenced.

The full story of the march, however, stretched back further even than Bloody Sunday. For several years before 1965, a cadre of SNCC fieldworkers had been working with local black leaders and organizations in an effort to challenge racial discrimination in Selma and develop indigenous black leaders. These activists built their efforts around the issue of voter registration and coordinated regular processions of would-be black registrants to Selma's downtown courthouse. Their efforts prompted sustained and often violent reactions from local whites including state, county, and city officials who jealously guarded the political hold they maintained across Alabama's Black Belt.

The ability to count on such stubborn resistance was one of the reasons that, in 1964, Martin Luther King Jr. and the Southern Christian Leadership Conference (SCLC) accepted an invitation to come to Selma and lend King's national recognition to the continuing demonstrations. Although his arrival amplified existing tensions between

Flag-bearing demonstrators march from Selma to Montgomery, Alabama, in the historic March 1965 voting rights protest. The march led directly to the 1965 Voting Rights Act, which outlawed Southern states' attempts to prevent African Americans from voting. (Library of Congress)

SNCC and the SCLC, King brought additional resources and exposure to the Selma campaign. Racial tensions increased after King's arrival as Dallas County Sheriff Jim Clark met the protestors with violence and mass arrests. Clark jailed at least 4,000 demonstrators between January and March 1965. Events in Selma even prompted a visit from Malcolm X. In February, Jimmie Lee Jackson, a black resident of Marion, Alabama, was murdered during one of the numerous marches taking place simultaneously in the rural areas surrounding Selma. A proposal to carry Jackson's coffin to Alabama's state capital made his death the genesis of what became the Selma march.

In the years and decades that followed the Selma march, the city continued to be the site of civil rights activity as African Americans met resistance in their efforts to translate their newfound voting rights into tangible political power. Although the persistence of racial tensions revealed the Selma march to have been less than a panacea for many local concerns related to race, its contributions to the national Civil Rights movement are undeniable.

See also: Bloody Sunday; Johnson, Lyndon Baines; King, Martin Luther Jr.; Lewis, John; Southern Christian Leadership Conference; Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee; Voting Rights Act, 1965; Williams, Hosea

Robert Warner Widell Jr.

Bibliography

- Ashmore, Susan Youngblood. Carry it On: The War on Poverty and the Civil Rights Movement in Alabama, 1964–1972. Athens: University of Georgia Press, 2008.
- Branch, Taylor. At Canaan's Edge: America in the King Years, 1965–1968. New York: Simon & Schuster, 2006.
- Chestnut, J. L. Black in Selma: The Uncommon Life of J. L. Chestnut, Jr. Tuscaloosa: University of Alabama Press, 2007.
- Thornton, J. Mills. Dividing Lines: Municipal Politics and the Struggle for Civil Rights in Montgomery, Birmingham, and Selma. Tuscaloosa: University of Alabama Press, 2002.

Shabazz, Betty X

Betty X Shabazz (1934–1997), also known as Betty Dean Sanders and Betty X, was a former member of the Nation of Islam, wife of Malcolm X, and a longstanding professor and administrator at Medgar Evers College in New York. Born in either Detroit, Michigan or Pinehurst, Georgia in 1934, Shabazz was likely abused by her biological mother, prompting her adoption at age 11 by Lorenzo and Helen Malloy, a prominent entrepreneur in Detroit and his activist wife. After high school, Shabazz attended Tuskegee Institute in Alabama where she encountered frequent examples of overt racism. Finding southern racism incomprehensible, Shabazz moved to New York City in the mid-1950s where she attended the Brooklyn State Hospital School of Nursing. On one Friday night, a friend working at the hospital invited her to dinner and to attend a lecture by a minister of the Nation of Islam at Harlem Temple No. 7. Although Shabazz was not initially moved to join the organization, she did meet Malcolm X who later talked to her about her experiences with overt racism in Alabama.

By the time Shabazz graduated from nursing school in 1958, she was already a dedicated member of the Nation of Islam and, on January 14 of the same year, she and Malcolm X were married in Lansing, Michigan. Within seven years of their marriage, the couple had six daughters. Shabazz was, in fact, pregnant with twins on February 21, 1965, the day her husband was assassinated at New York's Audubon Ballroom. After Malcolm's death, Shabazz went back to school, earning a master's degree in public health education from Jersey City College in 1970 and a doctorate in education administration from the University of Massachusetts in 1975. In 1976, she began her work at Medgar Evers College in New York as an associate professor of health administration and, eventually, director of the school's Department of Communications and Public Relations.

Shabazz also played a significant role in elevating the Black Panther Party for Self-Defense to the national stage. Early in 1967, she was invited to appear at the Malcolm X Memorial Day Conference, the offices of Ramparts Magazine, and at the Black House—a cultural center in San Francisco—where she was escorted and guarded by several Black Panthers during her stay. Among those in Shabazz's armed guard detail were Huey P. Newton and Bobby Seale, two of the three founders of the Black Panther Party. In fact, the series of events that led to Shabazz's visit to the Bay area in 1967 also prompted Eldridge Cleaver's first meeting with Newton and Seale and his eventual decision to join the Black Panthers. Newton and Cleaver needed someone to draft an invitation letter to Shabazz and the person they enlisted was Cleaver, a follower of the teachings of Malcolm X while he was in prison.

In the 1990s, Shabazz engaged in a number of activities, from serving as a consultant for Spike Lee's film Malcolm X to publicly linking Louis Farrakhan to the assassination of her husband. Shabazz and Farrakhan reconciled after Qubilah Shabazz—her second daughter with Malcolm—was accused of trying to hire an assassin to kill Farrakhan. Farrakhan later participated actively in fundraisers for Qubilah's defense and invited Shabazz to give a speech at the October 1995 Million Man March. Tragically, Shabazz died on June 23, 1997 three weeks after suffering extensive burns in a fire set by her 12-year-old grandson who was, ironically, named after her husband. Her death was met with an international outpouring of grief by those touched by her perseverance and strength.

See also: Black Nationalism; Muhammad, Elijah; Nation of Islam; X, Malcolm

Walter C. Rucker

Bibliography

- Clarke, John Henrik, A. Peter Bailey, and Earl Grant, eds. Malcolm X: The Man and His Times. New York: Macmillan, 1969.
- Rickford, Russell John. Betty Shabazz: A Remarkable Story of Survival and Faith before and after Malcolm X. Naperville, IL: Sourcebooks, 2003.
- Shabazz, Ilyasah, and Kim McLarin. Growing Up X: A Memoir by the Daughter of Malcolm X. New York: One World/Ballantine Books, 2003.
- X, Malcolm, and Alex Haley. The Autobiography of Malcolm X. New York: One World/Ballantine Books, 1992.

Shakur, Assata

Assata Shakur (1947–), former member of the Black Panther Party, is currently living in exile in Cuba. While activists and artists in the United States and around the world hail Assata Shakur as a revolutionary thinker, the Federal Bureau of Investigation is offering $1 million for her capture. Assata Shakur was born in Jamaica Queens, New York as Joanne Deborah Byron. She was later known as Joanne Chesimard. Her birth date is believed to be July 16, 1947, but in her autobiography Assata, Shakur states with pride that the FBI has had difficulties gaining information about her origins. During her early life, Shakur lived with her grandparents in Wilmington, North Carolina. When her grandparents died she moved back to New York where she later enrolled in Manhattan Community College, intending to major in business administration.

While enrolled at the community college and later at City College in the 1960s, Shakur discovered the literature of the black arts movement and was involved in many political activities. After she graduated she became involved in the Black Panther Party for Self-Defense and owing to charges that she assisted in an attempted bank robbery, she was forced to go underground as a member of the Black Liberation Army, the underground wing of the Black Panther Party. From this point on, she was on the run from law enforcement. It was later discovered that the bank she was accused of robbing did not even exist at the time. On this note, the alleged bank robbery may have been the result of a COINTELPRO operation.

Between 1971 and 1972, Shakur was accused of three different bank robberies and in late 1972 and early 1973, she was accused of kidnapping and murdering a heroin dealer and attempting to murder policemen. None of these cases resulted in conviction. In 1972, the FBI used Assata Shakur as the face of a “manhunt” that they were engaged in against the Black Liberation Army, characterizing her as the “revolutionary mother hen” who nurtured the violence of the organization.

On May 2, 1973, Assata Shakur, along with Sundiata Acoli and Zayd Malik Shakur, were stopped allegedly for a defective taillight. As defense attorney Lennox Hinds explains, however, pulling over these three activists was consistent with the COINTELPRO guidelines of the FBI, which used the arrests of activists for minor violations as part of a larger strategy to disrupt the work of progressive and radical organizations. This incident resulted in a shootout in which Zayd Malik Shakur and State Trooper Werner Foerster were killed and Assata Shakur was shot and wounded. Although doctors testified that Shakur was too severely injured by the multiple gunshot wounds that she received to have resisted or fought back, she was charged as an accomplice to the murders of both Zayd Malik Shakur and Foerster and of assault on Trooper James Harper with intent to kill.

Police reportedly tortured Shakur while she was hospitalized. Officers held guns to her head in unsuccessful attempts to force her to confess to crimes and to provide information about Sundiata Acoli. Shakur's first lawyer, her aunt Evelyn Williams, was forced to strip naked to be searched before she visited Shakur, who was hospitalized, partially paralyzed, and handcuffed to a bed. She was the first female prisoner to be placed in the all-male prison on Riker's island and was subjected to inhumane treatment by prison guards because of her “dangerous” political beliefs. It was during this period of brutal incarceration that Assata Shakur became a mother and suffered the trauma of not being able to spend more than a few minutes with her daughter after giving birth.

Defense attorneys including Evelyn Williams, Lennox Hinds, Florence Kennedy, Bob Bloom, William Kunstler, and Ray Brown supported Assata Shakur's innocence, but she was eventually convicted as an accomplice in the murders of Zayd Shakur and Foerster by an all-white jury.

On November 2, 1979, Assata Shakur escaped from prison. No one was harmed in her prison break. Shakur lived as a fugitive for the next few years until she relocated, by unrevealed means, to Cuba in 1984, where she was granted political asylum by the Cuban government. The head of the FBI said that its attempt to find Shakur were hampered by the fact that residents of the neighborhoods they searched were not willing to help. In 1985, Shakur was reunited with her daughter, Kakuya. Assata Shakur remains a cultural worker and international icon living in Cuba today.

In 1987, Assata Shakur's autobiography Assata was published. Activists often cite reading Assata as a turning point, with an impact comparable to that of The Autobiography of Malcolm X. Personal and poetic, Assata is accessible to a wide range of readers. Assata Shakur's example has mobilized elders in the black freedom struggle, prison abolitionists, and members of the hip-hop generation. Known popularly as Tupac Shakur's godmother, Assata Shakur is praised in songs by hip-hop artists including Common, Cee-lo, and Mos Def who are, themselves, active players in the campaign against her continued criminalization.

The continuing story of Assata Shakur's life is a testament to the persistent struggle for freedom within the context of black captivity and imprisonment. Her solidarity with the Cuban Revolution and Cuba's support of her status as an unjustly convicted political prisoner has encouraged many to be critical of the United States' antagonistic relationship with Cuba. Along with Angela Davis and Kathleen Cleaver, Assata Shakur is one the living former members of the Black Panther Party who remains an icon and a catalyst for action in the contemporary movement for human rights and social justice.

See also: Black Panther Party; COINTELPRO; Destination, Cuba

Walter C. Rucker

Bibliography

- James, Joy. Imprisoned Intellectuals: Political Prisoners Write on Life Liberation and Rebellion. Lanham, MD: Rowman & Littlefield, 2003.
- Perkins, Margo V. Autobiography as Activism: Three Black Women of the Sixties. Jackson: University Press of Mississippi, 2000.
- Shakur, Assata. Assata: An Autobiography. Chicago: Lawrence Hill Press, 1987.
- William, Evelyn. Inadmissible Evidence: The Story of the African-American Trial Lawyer who Defended the Black Liberation Army. Brooklyn NY: Lawrence Hill Books, 1993.

Sharecroppers Union

The Sharecroppers Union (SCU) was a communist-led labor union of mostly African American farmers and farm workers in Alabama and Louisiana during the 1930s. Inspired by a local uprising of rural poor people in Arkansas, Angelo Herndon, a black Communist, organized the Croppers' and Farm Workers' Union in Tallapoosa County, Alabama in the summer of 1931. Ralph Gray, a local black tenant farmer and one-time small landowner, led the first local. Initially, the union demanded that tenant farmers be allowed to grow subsistence foods, to market their own crops, and to pick cotton for a minimum wage. Attacks by local police and vigilantes nearly crushed this nascent group.

In August remaining union members re-formed as the Sharecroppers Union. Al Murphy, a black ex-sharecropper and communist organizer, took control of the union in May 1932 and focused its efforts on the struggle for African American self-determination in the plantation region of the South. He likened the union effort to past slave revolts. Murphy delegated powers to local union "captains," who directed day-to-day organizing. He also encouraged the captains to defend their communities against further white violence, with arms if necessary. Union meetings, advertised as Bible classes, often bristled with guns of all sorts. Women joined these locals through auxiliary units called "Sewing Clubs." Organizers did not approach poor whites in these years because they did not trust them. After members clashed again with police in early 1933, the union became widely known for its militant stance and people joined in droves. The union had 73 locals by June.

In the mid-1930s, the union launched a series of strikes to protest planter abuse of New Deal legislation. Although cotton strikes in 1933 and 1934 failed to make significant gains, they reinforced the union's militant reputation. By the spring of 1935, the union claimed more than 10,000 members. At this high point, Communist Party USA abandoned confrontational tactics for participation in the Popular Front. The Central Committee replaced Murphy with Clyde Johnson, a white Communist from Minnesota.

During the Popular Front era, Johnson tried to transform the SCU from a secretive, armed movement into a public trade union. To do this, he sought to ally the union with other agrarian organizations. Although early efforts failed, black sharecroppers in Louisiana joined the union in late 1935. By May 1936, the union claimed more than 1,000 members in Louisiana. Later that year, the union merged with the Alabama Farmers Union (AFU), the state wing of the left-leaning National Farmers Union. The Louisiana locals were chartered as the Louisiana Farmers Union (LFU). This enlarged union called for New Deal legislation to help tenants achieve farm ownership, mortgage relief, and crop loans, and to establish price controls. Shifts in cotton production, however, had demoted most black members into wage labor by 1937. Seeking better representation, wage workers left the AFU and LFU that year and formed District 9 of the CIO-affiliated United Canning and Packing Workers of America (UCAPAWA). Tenants remained in the LFU. Economic and bureaucratic changes weakened both unions. Led by Hosea Hudson, a black Communist from Alabama, District 9 claimed only 2,000 members in 14 locals in late 1938; the LFU, meanwhile, had only 900 members. By 1940, District 9 had collapsed. The LFU grew to as many as 3,000 members by 1940, but suffered because of its communist ties. It disappeared during World War II. See also: Colored Farmers Alliance

Jarod H. Roll

Bibliography

- de Jong, Greta. A Different Day: African American Struggles for Justice in Rural Louisiana, 1900–1970. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 2002.
- Kelley, Robin D. G. Hammer and Hoe: Alabama Communists During the Great Depression. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina, 1990.
- Rosengarten, Theodore. All God's Dangers: The Life of Nate Shaw. New York: Knopf, 1974.

Sharecropping

Sharecropping was a labor system that grew in the wake of the Civil War and passage of the Thirteenth Amendment.

Penniless and landless, former enslaved African Americans became “croppers,” working on the same lands owned by their former owners. Because most landowners lacked cash and had to borrow money to produce crops, they employed croppers without paying them wages in most cases. Croppers would receive a portion of the crop yield on land designated from them, in exchange for a one-half or one-third share of the crop, farming tools, seed, and the use of mules and other beasts of burden (e.g., horses and oxen). With their share of the crop, African Americans could sell it to the merchant who extended credit to the land owner, or they could buy things like food and clothing on credit, normally at exorbitant rates, from a furnishing merchant, who, in some cases, was also the landowner.

In many ways, this labor system was akin to slavery or, at the minimum, debt peonage, in that croppers generated 100 percent of the labor in exchange for food, clothing, and shelter. With that said, there were a handful of significant differences for African American croppers. Although they earned no wages, croppers worked the land allotted to them as families, not as work gangs, and they typically did not work under direct white supervision. Without the ability to read or write, many African American sharecroppers were cheated out of their fair share of the crop, did not receive the correct value for their crop when purchasing items on credit, and were stuck in a constant cycle of debt. Sharecropping was perhaps singular proof that the key failure of Reconstruction was the failure to redistribute confiscated and abandoned land to ex-slaves. Until the Great Migration, the lives of the majority of African Americans would be bound to crop cultivation on the lands of former slave owners well into the 20th century.

See also: Black Nadir; Forty Acres and a Mule; Sharecroppers Union; Thirteenth Amendment; Washington, Booker T.

Walter C. Rucker

Bibliography

- Davis, Ronald L. Good and Faithful Labor: From Slavery to Sharecropping in the Natchez District, 1860–1890. Westport, CT: Greenwood Press, 1982.
- Jaynes, Gerald David. Branches Without Roots: Genesis of the Black Working Class in the American South, 1862–1882. New York: Oxford University Press, 1986.
- Nieman, Donald G. From Slavery to Sharecropping: White Land and Black Labor in the Rural South, 1865–1900. New York: Garland, 1994.
- Royce, Edward Cary. The Origins of Southern Sharecropping. Philadelphia: Temple University Press, 1993.

Sharpton, Al

---

Alfred Charles Sharpton Jr. (1954–), a black Pentecostal minister and a civil rights activist known for his inflammatory speeches on racial injustice, led a series of protest marches and sit-ins during the 1970s and 1980s in New York City. This controversial public figure represented the extreme wing of black activism.

Sharpton was born in a middle-class neighborhood in Brooklyn, New York, until a domestic tragedy forced his move to a housing project in the Brownsville area of the borough. This firsthand experience of the living conditions in this poor neighborhood, along with his profound admiration to the developing new black conscious and protests in the decades after World War II, directed Sharpton to the Civil Rights movement.

Dropping out of Brooklyn College, New York, he became the first youth director of Operation Breadbasket, an organization that boycotted and picketed corporations and supermarkets that conducted unfair business. In his biggest confrontation with the grocery chain store A&P, he was arrested along with Reverend Jesse Jackson.

In 1971, Sharpton became the youngest director of National Youth Movement (NYM), which aimed at combating police brutality and fighting drug abuse. Associating with James Brown, an American music legendary, Sharpton organized Hit Brown, a black concert promotion strategy and made concerted efforts to change the racial composition of the music business. But his endeavor in this direction did not bear fruit because he was suspected of having links with organized crime. This jeopardized his image and that of his movement in the community.

Sharpton protested against the New York City administration on several occasions. During the 1970 sit-in at New York City Hall, he demanded more summer jobs for blacks and for fair hiring and proper treatment of African Americans. A few months later, he led a group of black leaders to the New York deputy mayor's office meeting to protest the death of a 14-year-old black youth. In both instances he was arrested for his role in instigating racial tensions.

During the series of killings in the 1980s, Sharpton was a vibrant voice in his community. He stood in the front line of protest marches and sit-ins. The first instance that ignited racial violence was during the shooting death of four black unarmed teens. Bernard Goetz, a white man, was charged for this crime, but was later acquitted of murder charges. Sharpton and a group of his followers held a protest vigil at the steps of the New York City courthouse condemning the all-white grand jury for this decision. He led protest marches and sit-ins strikes on transit rail tracks after a white mob assaulted three black men at Howard Beach in Brooklyn, New York.

In this atmosphere of racial polarity, Sharpton organized another strike at the Grand Central Station rail tracks during morning rush hour to protest the hiring policy of the Metropolitan Transit Authority (MTA). His public debate with New York Governor George Pataki forced the highest official in the state to appoint the first black MTA board member, Laura Blackburn. This incident was a stepping stone for his rise to prominence in the national media as a civil rights leader.

In 1987, Tawana Brawley, an African American teen from Wappinger's Falls, New York, was found inside a garbage bag with racial epithets and dog feces smeared on her face. A gang of white men did the same to another black woman in Newton, New Jersey. In both these cases justice was not served. Sharpton held rallies at the steps of the New York City courthouse and brought national media attention to these injustices in the judicial system.

Two years later, a white mob killed a 16-year-old African American teen, Yusuf Hawkins, in Bensonhurst, New York. While leading a march to protest this crime, Michael Riccardi, a 27-year-old white man stabbed the minister in his chest. After this incident, Sharpton changed his strategy in fighting racial injustice. Even though he adopted a conciliatory approach to race relations and tried to establish ground in the white community, he came under FBI investigation of his past income tax returns.

He attempted to run twice for the U.S. Senate, garnering only a small percentage of the vote in the election primaries. Despite this failure, he was one of the few African Americans who won a place as a power broker in the New York political scene, who led a campaign during Decision 2000 in favor of Albert Gore Jr., the Democratic presidential candidate, and the only African American in the 2004 Democratic presidential primaries.

Sharpton stands as a committed advocate of the rights of the African Americans. He, along with Reverend Jesse Jackson and other civil rights leaders, continues the fight against racism, urban poverty, and racial violence in the nation.

Reverend Al Sharpton leads a protest to stop the execution of Troy Davis, a Georgia death row inmate, October 2008. (Katherine Welles)

See also: Bensonhurst, New York, Incident of 1989; Brown, James; Diallo, Amadou; Howard Beach Incident, 1986; Jackson, Jesse

Sivananda Mantri

Bibliography

Sharpton, Al, and Anthony Watkins. Go and Tell Pharaoh: The Autobiography of The Reverend Al Sharpton. New York: Doubleday Dell Publishing Group, 1996.

Sharpton, Al, and Karen Hunter. Al on America. New York: Dafina Books, 2002.

Shuttlesworth, Fred

Reverend Fred Lee Shuttlesworth (1922–), a minister and human rights activist, was one of the staunchest and most courageous opponents of racial discrimination and segregation during the Civil Rights movement of the 1950s and 1960s. Shuttlesworth and the organization he led, the Alabama Christian Movement for Human Rights (ACMHR), were instrumental in desegregating Birmingham, Alabama, one of the most segregated cities in the South and the home of Eugene “Bull” Connor, the notorious segregationist who used violence to maintain racial discrimination. The civil rights demonstrations in Birmingham during the spring of 1963, where police dogs and fire hoses were used to assault peaceful civil rights activists, some of them children, were broadcast on television to the United States and the world, prompting widespread support for desegregation. More important, the violence compelled President John Kennedy to enact legislation that would eventually become the Civil Rights Act of 1964, which outlawed segregation in public accommodations. Although Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. and his organization, the Southern Christian Leadership Conference (SCLC) led the protests in conjunction with the ACMHR, King and the SCLC have received most of the credit for the success of the Birmingham demonstrations. Activists and scholars agree, however, that it was the work of Shuttlesworth and the ACMHR that ultimately made the demonstrations successful.

Fred Shuttlesworth was born Freddie Lee Robinson on March 18, 1922, in Mt. Meigs, Alabama to Alberta Robinson and Vedder Greene. The unmarried couple also produced a daughter, Cleola. It was from his mother that Shuttlesworth would get his combative personality, earthy spirituality, and indomitable will, traits that would prove invaluable when challenging the authority of Bull Connor and the rigid code of race relations in Birmingham and the South as a whole. In 1925, Ms. Robinson and the children moved to Oxmoor, Alabama, where she would later marry William Nathan Shuttlesworth, a farmer and former miner. Both Fred and his sister would take his last name. Seven siblings would follow soon after. Although Shuttlesworth and his family grew up in poverty, they were able to maintain some stability. His childhood would cement identification with poor and working-class folk, and it was this segment of the African American population that proved to be Shuttlesworth’s staunchest supporters.

Birmingham was known as a rigidly segregated city that would not hesitate to violently keep African Americans in their “place.” In fact, African Americans referred to the city as “Bombingham,” and one black community was known as “Dynamite Hill,” for the number of bombings that took place there. Any African American who protested against discriminatory treatment could be attacked or even killed. It was while attending high school in Birmingham that Shuttlesworth would come face-to-face with racial discrimination, growing resentful of the rundown conditions of buses used to transport black children to equally dilapidated schools while white children enjoyed newer facilities and more reliable transportation. He was also subjected to the discriminatory behavior of the Birmingham police force. Shuttlesworth would distinguish himself as a student and athlete at Rosedale High School, graduating as class valedictorian in May 1940. Within a year of graduating, Shuttlesworth would marry the former Ruby Keeler, a union that produced four children: Patricia, Ruby Fredericka (Ricky), Fred Jr., and Carolyn.

Now with a growing family, Shuttlesworth would gradually embark on a career as a minister, a vocation he began to think about after graduating high school. Moving the family to Mobile, Alabama, to work as a truck driver on an air base, Shuttlesworth would study the Bible. Initially an African Methodist, Shuttlesworth would become a Baptist, and began occasional preaching at the invitation of Pastor E. A. Palmer of Corinthian Baptist Church. Talented as a preacher, Shuttlesworth would receive invitations to preach before other congregations and would further his theological education at Cedar Grove Academy in Prichard, Alabama. In September 1947, after completing the Academy, Shuttlesworth enrolled at Selma University. The next year, he was ordained as a Baptist minister on August 10, 1948, at Corinthian Baptist Church.

In 1949, the family moved to Montgomery and Shuttlesworth enrolled at Alabama State College, later serving as pastor of First (African) Baptist Church in Selma in 1950. It was at First Baptist that Shuttlesworth would encounter some of the class conflicts within the black community that would later plague his relationship with some churches in Birmingham. Shuttlesworth's class orientation, folksy preaching style, and blunt, direct manner caused problems with the more middle-class sensibilities of the church congregation, and Shuttlesworth left after two years. The next year Shuttlesworth accepted the pastorate of Bethel Baptist Church in an African American section of North Birmingham known as Collegeville. It was here that Shuttlesworth and his followers would begin a veritable crusade against the evils of Jim Crow segregation and other forms of racial discrimination in the city known unofficially as the "Johannesburg of the South."

Shuttlesworth began his crusade in earnest after the Supreme Court ruled in favor of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP) in the Brown v. Board of Education case in May 1954, which ruled school segregation unconstitutional. Determined to make the ruling a reality, Shuttlesworth joined the local branch of the NAACP. Headed by some members of the African American middle-class, the leadership was slow to respond to Shuttlesworth's suggestions and demands, which included petitioning the city for more black police officers and complying with the Brown decision. The local leadership and the city both rejected the requests.

In reaction to increasing demands of African Americans to dismantle segregation and extend freedom and democracy to all American citizens in the aftermath of the Brown decision, white state authorities in Alabama in 1956 were successful in banning the Alabama NAACP, preventing the organization from operating within the state. Shuttlesworth and members of his congregation then formed the Alabama Christian Movement for Human Rights on June 5, 1956, to carry on the fight, basing the organization on Christian and patriotic principles while calling for desegregation and expanded employment opportunities. Its membership consisted of mostly working-class African Americans, with the majority being black women, and they used direct action protests such as marches and sit-ins to highlight grievances. The ACMHR also believed strongly that God supported their efforts and their religious fervor spread rapidly to other African Americans. It would soon be the only organization in Birmingham to stand up to Bull Connor and other segregationists.

Shuttlesworth's courage knew no bounds, and his actions suggested that he and his family were willing to make sacrifices to bring about equality. After bus segregation was declared unconstitutional on December 20, 1956, Shuttlesworth announced that African Americans would ride the buses on a nondiscriminatory basis, despite resistance from the City Commission to a petition submitted by the ACMHR. On Christmas Day, Shuttlesworth's home next to the church was bombed when dynamite exploded under his bed. Although Bethel Baptist and the home were severely damaged, miraculously, Shuttlesworth received only scratches. Shuttlesworth and his followers took this as a sign that God was protecting him to lead the movement. Shuttlesworth would have other opportunities to put himself in harm's way. Demanding school desegregation, Shuttlesworth attempted to enroll his daughters at all-white Phillips High School; that same day, President Dwight Eisenhower signed the Civil Rights Act of 1957. A white mob beat Shuttlesworth severely with chains and baseball bats while his wife was stabbed and children suffered injuries. Again, Shuttlesworth survived. In 1958, the Birmingham World named Shuttlesworth “Newsmaker of the Year,” for 1957.

Between 1958 and 1961, Bull Connor increased his harassment of Shuttlesworth and the ACMHR as they continued to demand that the city commission hire black policemen and desegregate schools and parks. When black students began a sit-in at segregated stores and restaurants in 1960, Shuttlesworth encouraged them. Shuttlesworth was arrested several times during this period, and Bethel Baptist Church was also bombed for a second time. The activism would extend to Shuttlesworth’s children, as Pat, Ricky (Fredericka) and Fred Jr. were arrested in Gadsden, Alabama, for allegedly causing a disturbance on a Greyhound bus on August 16, 1960. Shuttlesworth would experience personal problems, however, as he and Ruby disagreed over money, his civil rights activities, and church responsibilities. Shuttlesworth also experienced problems in Bethel Baptist, causing him to agree to the pastorate of Revelation Baptist Church in Cincinnati, Ohio in 1961, although he continued to be heavily involved in Birmingham.

Shuttlesworth immersed himself in the Civil Rights movement in other parts of Alabama and throughout the South. He attended meetings of, and pledged financial support to, the Montgomery Improvement Association, the organization created after Rosa Parks refused to give up her seat on a segregated city bus on December 1, 1955, prompting the Montgomery bus boycott that brought Martin Luther King Jr. to national prominence. He was a founding member of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference in 1957, a major civil rights organization created for Dr. King to support local civil rights struggles throughout the South. And during the Freedom Rides of 1961, Shuttlesworth served as the point person for the Congress of Racial Equality (CORE), taking care of riders who were attacked in Birmingham.

In 1962, SCLC looked for a situation that would garner more national and international support for the Civil Rights movement. Shuttlesworth continuously urged Dr. King and the SCLC board to conduct demonstrations in Birmingham, feeling that if segregation could be broken there, it would cause desegregation in other parts of the South. At the same time, Dr. King and the SCLC needed something to push a reluctant federal government to end segregation. They hoped to do that by demonstrating to the public, through marches and sit-ins, how far segregationists would go to continue to deprive African Americans of their citizenship rights.

In spring 1963, King and the SCLC agreed to work with the ACMHR to carry out Project “C” (for confrontation) to advance the local and national movements, demanding total desegregation of schools and public facilities and the removal of obstacles to voter registration while forcing the Kennedy administration to act. Shuttlesworth led mass marches on city hall and helped organize other demonstrations and support. He later suffered injuries from a fire hose while demonstrating downtown. Although Shuttlesworth would disagree with some of King and the SCLC’s decisions regarding negotiations with the city, it was he who declared the demonstrations ended in May 1963 when the SCLC and the city reached a limited agreement on gradual desegregation of public facilities and gradual upgrading of black employees. The demonstrations directly resulted in the Civil Rights Act of 1964, outlawing segregation in public accommodations among other provisions.

Shuttlesworth would continue his activism in the succeeding years, remaining involved in the local movement in Birmingham while also demonstrating against unfair conditions in and around Cincinnati. In March 1989, he established the Shuttlesworth Housing Foundation to provide low-cost housing to poor families. He experienced continued strained relationships in his personal life, divorcing his wife Ruby in 1970 after 29 years of marriage and resigning from Revelation Baptist Church in 1966 to form another congregation. Shuttlesworth has received several accolades for his activism, the city of Birmingham renaming Huntsville Road in his honor in September 1978 and having a statue of his likeness erected in front of the Birmingham Civil Rights Institute and Museum in November 1992. In 2008, the Birmingham International Airport was renamed Birmingham-Shuttlesworth International Airport in his honor. He currently resides in Birmingham after retiring from the ministry in 2006.

See also: Bombingham; Jim Crow; National Association for the Advancement of Colored People; Southern Christian Leadership Conference; Sixteenth Street Baptist Church

Bibliography

- Branch, Taylor. Parting the Waters: America in the King Years, 1954–1963. New York: Simon & Schuster, 1988.
- Branch, Taylor. Pillar of Fire: America in the King Years, 1963–1965. New York: Simon & Schuster, 1998.
- Eskew, Glenn T. But for Birmingham: The Local and National Movements in the Civil Rights Struggle. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1997.
- Manis, Andrew. A Fire You Can't Put Out: The Civil Rights of Birmingham's Reverend Fred Shuttlesworth. Tuscaloosa: University of Alabama Press, 1999.
- White, Marjorie, and Andrew Manis, eds. Birmingham Revolutionaries: The Reverend Fred Shuttlesworth and the Alabama Christian Movement for Human Rights. Macon, GA: Mercer University Press, 2000.

Simpson, O. J.

The life of Orenthal James (“O. J.”) Simpson (1947–) was forever changed on July 8, 1994. On that day Simpson, who was once one of the most beloved American sports icons, was charged with the double murder of his ex-wife Nicole Brown Simpson and her friend Ronald Goldman. Before his tragic fall from grace, Simpson was a model of meritocracy for African Americans and was well respected by whites as an acceptable black who made the transition to the mainstream. He was an adored TV pitchman and sports commentator for NBC, and he had a somewhat successful stint as an actor. Simpson was even welcomed in country clubs during the 1980s, freely interacting in the segregated world of wealthy whites, and because of his huge popularity, he was the first African American crossover athlete to receive major corporate endorsements. Simpson paved the way for the lucrative advertising contracts that Michael Jordan, Tiger Woods, and LeBron James now enjoy.

Using sports as a means to escape the pitfalls of Potrero Hill, the San Francisco neighborhood in which he grew up, Simpson emerged as an All-American football hero in the late 1960s. He came from a humble background, as his father left when Simpson was a child, forcing Simpson’s mother to bear the burden of supporting four children. Although he often got into trouble as a teen, Simpson graduated from Galileo High School in 1965 and enrolled at City College in San Francisco. He not only did well on the field but also in the classroom, as he was able to pull his grades up to qualify to play at a Division I-A school. In 1967, Simpson transferred to the University of Southern California (USC) and married his first wife, Marguerite L. Whitley. He helped lead USC to the Rose Bowl and a national championship that year and earned All-American honors. In 1968, Simpson won the Heisman trophy and the next year was chosen as the first pick of the Buffalo Bills in the American Football League (AFL) draft. Simpson struggled to live up to his college reputation on the gridiron during his first three seasons, averaging a little over 600 yards. By his fourth year, after the AFL merged with the National Football League (NFL), Simpson was an offensive juggernaut and became the first NFL player to gain over 2,000 yards in one season. Simpson wowed Bills fans with his explosive running style, which catapulted him to celebrity status both on and off the field. In 1969, he got his first product endorsement with Chevrolet, and when Hertz hired him in 1975, Simpson became the first black celebrity spokesman for a major corporation. The Hertz commercials led to other contracts with companies such as Tree Sweet Orange Juice, Foster Grant Sunglasses, RC Cola, and Nabisco.

Five years after he signed the Hertz deal, Simpson’s 11-year marriage to Marguerite ended. A knee injury forced him to retire from football in 1979, the year after he was traded to the San Francisco 49ers. Facing life for the first time without football at the relatively young age of 32, Simpson used his fame for big payoffs in the business world. He hired lawyers who invested his football fortunes in food franchises such as Pioneer Chicken and Honey-Baked Ham stores, and he was also the main attraction at celebrity golf tournaments and convention banquets.

Simpson was inducted into the Football Hall of Fame in 1985, the same year he married Nicole Brown. Their marriage was very unstable, and in 1989 Nicole filed assault charges against Simpson, but he was given a light sentence—a $470 fine, 120 hours of community service, and mandated counseling twice a week. Unable to reconcile their differences, Nicole filed for divorce in 1992. Simpson not only lost his wife, but also was starting to lose his celebrity image as his popularity declined in the 1990s.

When Simpson was charged with the murders of his ex-wife Nicole and Ronald Goldman, race became a dominating factor in how the trial was covered and perceived. Having been a favorite son of America, many whites were disturbed and even felt betrayed by Simpson, who they thought played by all the rules to achieve the American dream. Thus, in many ways, the Simpson tragedy was a bitter reminder to the nation that a colorblind society did not exist.

Newsweek and Time magazines had some of the most controversial pretrial coverage of Simpson's disgraced image. In an article titled "Day and Night," Newsweek reporter Evan Thomas described Simpson as a man who eventually went wrong because he tried to go white. Using the theme of "two-ness"—a term W. E. B. Du Bois coined that relates to the struggle of being American as well as black—Thomas depicted Simpson as a black man who deliberately played the race card to get ahead. Thomas likened Nicole to a trophy wife and criticized Simpson for aspiring to be a successful actor, a goal Thomas said was based more on hope than reason. Although Simpson's company, Orenthal Productions, made four successful TV movies for NBC, Thomas does not credit him for being a smart business owner. Although he concedes that whites did not perceive Simpson as a threat, Thomas's constant referrals to Simpson as a face man in the business world and Simpson's attraction to white women conveyed the image of the black male white America fears.

Time's June 27, 1994 story, "End of the Run," was somewhat objective in its reporting, but stereotypical in its presentation of Simpson's mug shot on the cover. Time used a computer to darken Simpson's appearance, making him appear more blurred and heavily bearded, which brought charges of racism from prominent African Americans. In an editorial for The Chicago Defender, Earl Ofari Hutchinson claimed that Time darkened Simpson's photo to make him look more menacing and that the magazine's treatment of Jeffrey Dahmer, a confessed serial killer, was more favorable than its coverage of Simpson. Hutchinson pointed out that Time did not tamper with the photographs of Dahmer but presented him as a contrite young man. He also explained that Time did not scrutinize Dahmer's personality or make judgments about his character, but highlighted speculation about Simpson and called his relationship with Nicole dysfunctional and characterized by physical abuse.

As Newsweek and Time chose to examine controversial traits of Simpson's life, the black press was divided in its coverage because Simpson was not considered the usual black victim, and some African American reporters expressed no sympathy for him. Black newspapers did point out the disparity in terms of how white men had been portrayed in the media who committed similar crimes. Yet, owing to Simpson's crossover appeal, black publications such as The New Pittsburgh Courier reprimanded him for abandoning his community and claimed he had reneged on his obligation to black America. Most black newspapers did not indicate a presumption of guilt as Newsweek and Time had done, but rather asserted that Simpson had allowed himself to become too deeply entrenched into the mainstream.

After Simpson was arraigned for the murders of Nicole and Goldman, he stated that he was "absolutely, one hundred percent not guilty" during his second court appearance on July 23, 1994. He assembled a defense of high profile lawyers, whom the press nicknamed the Dream Team, which included Johnnie Cochran, Alan Dershowitz, Barry Scheck, Robert Kardashian, F. Lee Bailey, and Robert Shapiro. The trial lasted eight months and was covered daily by Court TV and a plethora of other media outlets. The prosecution argued that Simpson killed his wife and Goldman out of envious rage and attempted to use DNA evidence to convince the jury of Simpson's guilt. DNA experts testified that blood found in Simpson's home and truck matched Nicole and Goldman's. The defense, however, argued that Simpson was a victim of a setup by the police, claiming that evidence had been planted and blood samples were contaminated. One of the major turning points in the trial occurred when the defense exposed tapes of LAPD detective Mark Fuhrman using the word "nigger" in reference to African Americans. This contradicted Fuhrman's earlier testimony that he had not used derogatory terms to describe blacks, and it cast reasonable doubt on his claim to having found a black leather glove stained with Nicole and Goldman's blood, as well as blood in the driveway of Simpson's home. Another gaffe of the prosecution was their request for Simpson to try on the bloody glove, which had undergone extensive examination in the crime lab. The glove was apparently too small for Simpson's hand and Cochran, in perhaps one of the most famous quotes from the trial, urged the jury that "if it doesn't fit you must acquit."

Of the 12 jurors, 9 were black, and when Simpson was acquitted of the murders on October 3, 1995, race became a prevalent polarizing factor in how many Americans believed the jury reached its verdict. A Newsweek poll taken 13 days after the jury's decision revealed that 54 percent of whites disagreed with the "Not Guilty" verdict, but 85 percent of blacks believed it was the right ruling; 66 percent of blacks thought Simpson probably did not commit the slayings, but 74 percent of whites thought he probably did. Simpson immediately became a social outcast, as most whites believed he had escaped conviction. He endured constant scorn on golf courses and sneers in restaurants, as many accused him of craving the attention he received before his legal troubles began.

The Goldman and Brown families filed a civil suit against Simpson after the criminal trial and won $8.5 million on February 4, 1997. Punitive damages were later brought against Simpson for $25 million to be shared between Fred Goldman and Nicole's children. Simpson appealed the verdict, but the civil judgment was upheld in court. Since the civil trial, Simpson has become a constant tabloid figure, appearing on various cable shows still trying to tell his side of the story and proclaim his innocence. Eleven years after the criminal trial, he made what many considered one of his most arrogant moves with the release of the book If I Did It. If I Did It was not a confession but as Simpson claimed, an account of how he would have committed the murders of Nicole and Goldman. Ron Goldman's father was awarded the rights to the book to help pay the damages ordered by the civil suit judgment, but most bookstores refused to promote or sell it. Simpson received approximately $630,000 after If I Did It was completed, but the book was cancelled as a result of the public's extreme opposition.

Late in 2007, Simpson infamously made the headlines again when he and two associates were accused of robbing and kidnapping sports memorabilia dealers at gunpoint in a Las Vegas hotel-casino. Simpson maintained that he was trying to retrieve items that belonged to him and pleaded not guilty to all charges. The armed robbery case was not the cultural and racial spectacle that the media fueled in 1995, but the factor of race was again questioned, as no African Americans were on the jury. Thirteen years to the exact date that Simpson was acquitted of double murder, the jury found him, along with co-defendant Clarence (C. J.) Stewart, guilty of first-degree kidnapping, armed robbery, and 10 other charges in connection with the Las Vegas holdup. Simpson's attorneys plan to appeal, arguing that Simpson was a victim of racial prejudice associated with the 1995 homicide ruling. Both Simpson and Stewart face up to life in prison.

The armed robbery case brought attention to the national division in terms of how African Americans and whites feel regarding Simpson. Less than 30 percent of whites today believe that Simpson is not guilty of murder, but almost 90 percent of blacks still think he is innocent. Many African Americans also question the criminal proceedings and the nature of the Las Vegas case, as they did the 1995 trial. Those who absolutely loathe Simpson, however, consider his current status as a convicted felon an indirect way of bringing him to justice.

See also: Black Athletes

Jessica A. Johnson

Bibliography

- Edwards, Harry. "We Must Let O. J. Go: Separating Fact from Image." Sport (February 1995):80.
- Gibbs, Jewelle. Race and Justice: Rodney King and O. J. Simpson in a House Divided. San Francisco: Jossey-Bass Publishers, 1996.
- Gibbs, Nancy. "End of the Run." Time Magazine (June 27, 1994): 28-35.
- Hoversten, Paul. "Time Criticized over O. J. Cover." USA Today (June 22, 1994):D1.
- Hutchinson, Earl Ofari. "The O. J. Case and Hidden Racism." The Chicago Defender (September 6, 1994):12.
- Thomas, Evan. "Day and Night: He Lived Two Lives. An Inside Look at O. J. Simpson's World." Newsweek (August 29, 1994): 42-49.

Singleton, Benjamin "Pap"

Benjamin Singleton (1809-1892) pioneered the large-scale black emigration movement from the South to the Midwest during the last quarter of the 19th century. The self-proclaimed "Moses of the Colored Exodus" inspired thousands of African Americans, known as the Exodusters, to permanently relocate to Kansas and other states in the 1870s and 1880s.

Details of Singleton's early life are sketchy. Born a slave in Nashville, Tennessee, he learned the carpenter and cabinetmaker trades as he grew up. Although his owner sold him to Gulf Coast slaveholders numerous times, he always escaped and made his way back. Eventually, he fled briefly to Canada, but soon after took up residence in Detroit, where he surreptitiously aided other fugitives until the end of the Civil War. Singleton then returned home to Middle Tennessee in 1865 and began his public career in Edgefield as an advocate for the newly freed slaves. Mild-mannered, compassionate, and friendly, he became known universally as "Pap."

Asserting that the ownership of land offered the greatest opportunity for advancement and security, Singleton encouraged freed people to save their money to purchase small plots, rather than rent them. He and his associates organized the Tennessee Real Estate and Homestead

Association (1869), which attempted to locate available tracts on the outskirts of Nashville. Although some white people aided and encouraged Singleton, the endeavor failed. Most landowners either refused to sell to black people at all or demanded high prices for worn-out cropland.

Singleton's lack of success in this effort led him to conclude that freed people needed to separate entirely from their former masters and establish new lives outside the South. He looked at Kansas, the former home of abolitionist John Brown, as a possible refuge. Beginning in 1869, small parties of African Americans had ventured to the fertile prairies and began sending back encouraging reports of the conditions there. Singleton himself journeyed to Kansas in 1873 and, favorably impressed, returned with a group of pioneers to the southeastern part of the state, where he founded Singleton's Colony on 1,000 acres near Baxter Springs.

After coming back to Nashville the following year, "Pap" immediately made plans to take additional colonists west. Aided by like-minded colleagues in Tennessee, such as Columbus Johnson and A. D. DeFrantz, Singleton's revitalized Tennessee Real Estate and Homestead Association recruited and prepared likely emigrants; located suitable public lands for settlement (such as the communities of Dunlap and Nicodemus); and arranged special rates with steamboat companies for transportation to Topeka.

Wary of educated people and distrustful of politicians, Singleton acted, he believed, in the interests of the common people. In most of the South, sharecropping was proving to be little better than slavery, political promises had borne scarce fruit, and legal protection had steadily deteriorated. Many contemporary black leaders with statewide or national reputations opposed large-scale migrations out of the South as undermining black political strength. Singleton, however, disputed this rationale and insisted that the social and economic benefits of the exodus outweighed the political costs.

In the spring of 1880, an investigative committee of the United States Senate called Singleton to Washington to explain the agenda and goals of the Exoduster movement. He dramatized the impoverished position of African Americans in the South and asserted that only a mass emigration could provide the impetus for positive change. He claimed full responsibility for putting the undertaking into motion and dismissed those who ascribed more mundane causes for the exodus as unwilling to give him the proper credit that he deserved.

By 1880, years of black immigration to Kansas had severely taxed that state's resources. The later arrivals tended to be poorer than those who came earlier and almost no employment opportunities existed. After urging prospective homesteaders not to come to Kansas, Singleton and his allies searched for a new destination outside the United States for those leaving the South. After considering Canada but ultimately rejecting it as too cold, they settled on Liberia, where African Americans could have a government of their own. Few people, however, immigrated to Africa at that time.

By the mid-1880s, Singleton was more than 75 years old and was growing feeble, but he still devoted his energy to the cause. After years of promoting black nationalism, "Pap" had accumulated little to see him through old age. As his personal honesty and sincerity remained apparent to all who came in contact with him, and in recognition of a lifetime of service, the black community of the Midwest embraced "Pap" until the end of his life. Each year on his birthday, hundreds of African American supporters gathered at a suitable outdoor venue in either Topeka or St. Louis for a party that honored Singleton and served as a fundraiser for his support in the coming year. These annual celebrations continued until 1892, when Singleton died in Topeka at the age of 83.

See also: Exoduster Movement; Nicodemus, Kansas

Michael Thomas Gavin

Bibliography

- Athearn, Robert. In Search of Canaan: Black Migration to Kansas, 1879–1880. Lawrence: Regents Press of Kansas, 1978.
- Bontemps, Arna, and Jack Conroy. Anyplace But Here. New York: Hill and Wang, 1966.
- Entz, Gary R. "Image and Reality on the Kansas Prairie: 'Pap' Singleton's Cherokee County Colony." Kansas History 19 (1996):124–39.
- Higgins, Billy D. "Negro Thought and the Exodus of 1879." Phylon 32 (1971):39–52.
- Painter, Nell Irvin. Exodusters: Black Migration to Kansas after Reconstruction. New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 1977.

Sit-In Movement

The sit-in movement was just one of a number of techniques used by civil rights supporters in their campaign to end racial segregation. They appealed to the courts, the legislature, and sometimes the President of the United States for relief.

From time to time they depended on the actions of the federal government to sweep away discrimination in the military or in education. But the sit-in movement, which was not mandated by a Presidential Executive Order or driven by a Supreme Court decision, was just as important. It helped sweep away legal and cultural barriers that had blocked African Americans from equal access to food service, and enabled the Civil Rights movement to take greater advantage of an untapped resource: young African Americans.

The idea of the sit-in as a way to end food service segregation was not new. It had been tried in Chicago and St. Louis in the 1940s and in Baltimore in 1953. But little attention was paid to the attempts or the reasons for them. The idea gained new energy in the wake of the Montgomery bus boycott in 1955, where African Americans, using nonviolent methods, effectively ended the practice of segregated bus seating in Montgomery, Alabama. Montgomery's civic leaders expected African Americans to tolerate the humiliation of riding in the back of city busses to and from their downtown shopping trips. If the local economy could be crippled by a bus boycott, and whites required to treat African Americans with respect, could not the same be done by a sit-in?

In 1958, civil rights leaders began sponsoring a series of workshops throughout the South to train people in the ways of nonviolent protest. Many African American college students in and around the Nashville, Tennessee area attended those workshops. Their ultimate goal was to desegregate the lunch counters in Nashville's department stores. It did not make sense to them that although the stores would sell them clothes and school supplies, they would refuse them service when they wanted something to eat. The students' training was designed to prepare themselves for the day when they would break the color barrier at Nashville's lunch counters.

But four African American students from North Carolina's College of Agriculture and Technology beat them to the punch. On February 1, 1960, Joseph McNeil, Franklin McCain, David Richmond, and Ezell Blair Jr. strolled into the Woolworth's department store in downtown Greensboro. They bought toothpaste and school supplies, and then settled into seats at the lunch counter and ordered coffee. First, they were ignored. Then they were told they would not be served. Finally, the store manager called the police to complain. The police did nothing because the protesters were doing nothing. Four well-dressed young African American college students were sitting quietly at the lunch counter, waiting for service and doing their homework while they waited. Exasperated, the manager closed early. The four young men left, only to return. But this time there were six of them. By the end of the week there were more than 300 African American students seeking service at lunch counters at Woolworth's and at S. H. Kress and Company, another department store in Greensboro. They tried to order food. They were denied service, but remained at the counter, waiting quietly. Joining the sit-in were white students. Newspaper reporters and photographers were also on hand to record the events. When businesses considered the potential impact of the protest on their bottom line, many of them, including Woolworth's, rethought their policies, and by August, 1960, desegregated their lunch counters.

But the lunch counter sit-ins had repercussions that went far beyond Greensboro's city limits. Soon black and white students were staging sit-ins at restaurants, play-ins at segregated parks, and read-ins at segregated libraries across the United States. A few weeks after the events in Greensboro, students in Nashville began sitting in at lunch counters in their city. There was violence, as white students attacked the demonstrators, and later arrests, as the police moved into to take them to jail. But every time an African American student was removed from a lunch counter, there was another student waiting to take his/her place. The nonviolent protests, and the sometimes violent reaction, continued until May, when Nashville changed its policies and began serving African Americans at department store lunch counters.

The sit-ins also caused the leadership of the Civil Rights movement to think about how best to capitalize on this infusion of youthful energy. The answer materialized in late 1960 when the Southern Christian Leadership Conference (SCLC) underwrote the creation of the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee (SNCC). "Snick," as it was called, was originally composed of black and white university students who would enter the Civil Rights movement armed with energy and enthusiasm, determined to achieve equality wherever inequality might be found. In 1961, veterans of the sit-ins were participating in Freedom Rides, venturing into the Deep South on commercial busses to test compliance with federal laws guaranteeing equal treatment in interstate bus terminals. Later those same students would be in Mississippi, helping to register voters for the 1964 presidential election. The lunch counter sit-ins energized the Civil Rights movement by adding youth to the campaign to end inequality and adding national attention to the cause.

On February 1, 1960, four young African American college students walked into the Woolworth's in Greensboro, North Carolina, sat down at a whites-only lunch counter and triggered the Civil Rights movement that spread across the nation. Shown here on February 2, 1960, are (left to right) Joseph McNeil, Franklin McCain, Billy Smith, and Clarence Henderson. (Library of Congress)

See also: Baker, Ella; Freedom Rides; Lewis, John; Nash, Diane; Southern Christian Leadership Conference; Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee

John Morello

Bibliography

- Boyer, Paul. Promises to Keep: The United States since World War II, 2nd ed. Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1999.
- Garrow, David J. Atlanta, Georgia, 1960–1961: Sit-Ins and Student Activism. Brooklyn, NY: Carlson Publications, 1989.
- Moss, George Donelson. America in the Twentieth Century. Upper Saddle River, NJ: Prentice Hall, 2004.
- Oppenheimer, Martin. The Sit-in Movement of 1960. Brooklyn, NY: Carlson Publications, 1989.
- Torres, Sasha. Black, White, and in Color: Television and Black Civil Rights. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 2003.
- Williams, Juan. Eyes on the Prize: America's Civil Rights Years, 1954–1965. New York: Viking Press, 1987.

Sixteenth Street Baptist Church

Sixteenth Street Baptist Church in Birmingham, Alabama is an important historic site of the Civil Rights movement.

The home of Birmingham's first African American congregation, the church became a center of civil rights activity and the location of a tragic racially motivated bombing.

Birmingham, Alabama's first African American church was established in 1873, less than two years after the city was incorporated. Founded by migrants from rural Alabama who had come to work in the new industrial city's mines and mills, The First Colored Baptist Church of Birmingham met in a tinner's shop. The growing congregation later moved into its own downtown building. In July 1882, the congregation purchased a lot on the corner of Sixth Avenue North and Sixteenth Street, where the church now stands, and took the name Sixteenth Street Baptist Church. By 1887, the congregation constructed an impressive gothic revival building on the site, with several members of the church mortgaging their homes to help complete the project. This building was demolished in 1909 and replaced in 1911 with the present structure, designed by African American architect Wallace A. Rayfield. Largely Romanesque in design, the brick church features a central entrance porch flanked by two towers and stained-glass windows.

By the early 20th century, Sixteenth Street Baptist Church had grown to more than 1,000 members and was a major church of Birmingham's African American elite and middle class. Many members held professional positions, such as educators, and many were successful business people and community leaders. Located in Birmingham's downtown black business district, and with a seating capacity of 1,600, the church hosted concerts and other cultural events and political meetings.

From the late 19th century to the 1960s, the City of Birmingham strictly enforced an extensive system of racial segregation. African Americans and whites were separated by law in many public facilities including street cars and busses, theaters, hospitals, and restaurants. Separate schools, libraries, and parks were maintained for blacks and whites, and facilities for African Americans were always inferior to those provided whites. Almost all Africans Americans in the city were prevented from voting, and before the late 1960s, Birmingham had no black elected officials, police officers, or fire fighters.

Ambulance attendants load the body of an African American girl, one of four killed in the bombing of the Sixteenth Street Baptist Church in Birmingham, Alabama, on September 15, 1963. (AP Photo)

African Americans protested segregation and racial discrimination through legal actions in the courts, boycotts, sit-ins, and street demonstrations. In the spring of 1963, the Southern Christian Leadership Conference, led by Martin Luther King Jr., worked with the Birmingham-based Alabama Christian Movement for Human Rights (ACMHR) led by Fred L. Shuttlesworth to organize large-scale demonstrations. Sixteenth Street Baptist Church hosted some of the weekly mass meetings sponsored by ACMHR. Because of its size and central location, Sixteenth Street Baptist Church was used as a site to organize and launch daily demonstrations. These demonstrations generated worldwide publicity, as more than 3,000 demonstrators, including children, were jailed, and Birmingham authorities used police dogs and fire hoses against the demonstrators. Nationwide public reaction to the Birmingham protests encouraged the United States Congress to pass the 1964 Civil Rights Act.

Birmingham's public schools were desegregated during the second week of September 1963. Five African American students were placed in formerly all white schools, and violent protests occurred around the schools. In retaliation for the school desegregation, members of the Ku Klux Klan placed a bomb outside Sixteenth Street Baptist Church sometime during the night of Saturday, September 14. The bomb exploded the next morning at approximately 10:20 A.M., just as Sunday school classes were ending and before the start of the service. The explosion tore a large hole in the side of the church, blew out windows, and damaged the interior of the building. Four girls, Denise McNair (age 11), Addie Mae Collins (age 14), Cynthia Wesley (age 14), and Carole Robertson (age 14) were killed inside the basement women's rest room; they were crushed by falling debris. Several other members of the congregation were injured.

White supremacists had committed dozens of racially motivated bombings in the Birmingham area since the late 1940s, but the Sixteenth Street Baptist Church bombing was the first in which people were killed. The bombing and the deaths of the four girls were reported worldwide, and the incident generated both sympathy and outrage. Birmingham mayor Albert Boutwell, a segregationist, wept when told of the deaths. The City of Birmingham established a reward fund to encourage witnesses to come forward with information.

Carole Robertson's funeral was held Tuesday, September 17 at St. John AME Church, as Sixteenth Street Baptist Church was too badly damaged, and nearly 2,000 people attended. The next day a mass funeral for the other three girls was held at Sixth Avenue Baptist Church. Martin Luther King Jr. preached the sermon at this service and a crowd estimated at 7,000 people filled the church and the street outside.

The Birmingham Police Department, the Alabama Department of Public Safety, and dozens of agents from the Federal Bureau of Investigation investigated the bombing. On September 30, the State of Alabama arrested three known Klansmen, Robert Chambliss, John Wesley Hall, and Charles Cagle. But the suspects were charged only with illegal possession of dynamite and were fined.

The church received contributions from throughout the world totaling more than $200,000 to repair the damage done by the bombing. Sixteenth Street Baptist Church reopened in June 1964. In 1965, parishioners installed a large stained glass window over the front door of the sanctuary. Known as the Wales Window, it was donated by the people of Wales and depicts a black figure of Christ crucified and bears the inscription “You do it to me.”

No other arrests were made until Alabama Attorney General Bill Baxley reopened the investigation in 1971 and won a conviction of Robert Chambliss in 1977. Chambliss, whose nickname was “Dynamite Bob,” was a long-time Klansmen suspected in other racial bombings. He was sentenced to life in prison and died in 1985.

Public and media attention to the bombing was sporadic for more than a decade after the Chambliss conviction. Neither state nor federal law enforcement agencies made any serious efforts to investigate the case further or indict more suspects. But the church became a symbol of civil rights activism and sacrifice and was added to the National Register of Historic Places in 1980. In 1992, the Birmingham Civil Rights Institute, a museum and research center, opened across the street from Sixteenth Street Baptist Church. Nearby Kelly Ingram Park was renovated and several pieces of sculpture honoring Martin Luther King Jr. and the Birmingham civil rights demonstrators were placed in the park. More than 200,000 people visit the area, now designated the Civil Rights District, each year.

By 1995, a change of leadership in the Birmingham office of the Federal Bureau of Investigation led to a reopening of the case. The FBI did not announce the reopening until 1997, and that same year filmmaker Spike Lee released Four Little Girls, his documentary about the bombing. The film was nominated for the Academy Award and focused new international attention on the case. Also in 1997, President Bill Clinton appointed Doug Jones as U.S. attorney for the northern district of Alabama. Jones worked closely with the FBI and, in 2000, secured murder indictments against the two suspects still alive, Tommy Blanton and Bobby Frank Cherry. The two were tried separately. Blanton was convicted in 2001 and Cherry in 2002. Both were sentenced to life in prison.

In the 21st century the membership of Sixteenth Street Baptist Church has declined to about 200, but the church is a popular tourist and pilgrimage site. Because of the large number of visitors, weekly attendance at Sunday services averages 2,000. In 2007, the church completed the first phase of a major restoration, and fundraising continued to complete the restoration of the structure.

See also: Black Churches; Bombingham; King, Martin Luther Jr.; Shuttlesworth, Fred

James L. Baggett

Bibliography

- Cobbs, Elizabeth H., and Petric J. Smith. Long Time Coming: An Insider's Story of the Birmingham Church Bombing that Rocked the World. Birmingham, AL: Crane Hill Publishing, 1994.
- Fallin, Wilson Jr. The African American Church in Birmingham, Alabama, 1815-1963: A Shelter in the Storm. New York: Garland Publishing, 1997.
- Feldman, Lynne B. A Sense of Place: Birmingham's Black Middle-Class Community, 1890-1930. Tuscaloosa: University of Alabama Press, 1999.
- Hamlin, Christopher M. Behind the Stained Glass: A History of Sixteenth Street Baptist Church. Birmingham, AL: Crane Hill Publishers, 1998.
- Romano, Renee C. “Narratives of Redemption: The Birmingham Church Bombing Trials and the Construction of Civil Rights Memory.” In The Civil Rights Movement in American Memory. Renee C. Romano and Leigh Raiford, eds., 96-133. Athens: University of Georgia Press, 2006.
- Schnorrenberg, John M. Aspiration: Birmingham's Historic Houses of Worship. Birmingham, AL: Birmingham Historical Society, 2000.
- Sikora, Frank. Until Justice Rolls Down: The Birmingham Church Bombing Case. Tuscaloosa: University of Alabama Press, 2005.

Soledad Brothers

Despite its contemporary revolutionary connotations, the origin of the term “Soledad Brother” is far removed from progressive politics and revolutionary struggle. The term originally denoted an African American incarcerated in California's Soledad Prison. During the early 1970s, the term became integral to a political lexicon that divided Americans along New Left, Liberal, Moderate, and Conservative lines. For black power advocates, the "Soledad Brothers" were an example of the spirit needed to overthrow American racial apartheid.

The "Soledad Brothers" legend centers on George Jackson (1941–1971). Although Jackson was born in Chicago, it would be on the West Coast, where the family migrated in the mid-1950s, that the legend of George Jackson would be established. Shortly after his arrival, Jackson fell into a pattern of juvenile delinquency, which landed him in the Paso Robles Youth Authority Corrections facility. Confinement proved to be no deterrent, as George continued his criminal behavior upon release. Jackson's petty crimes led to a charge of stealing $71 from a local gas station. Considering Jackson's prior criminal activities, the judge sentenced the 18-year-old to a term of one year to life at Soledad Prison.

Once incarcerated, Jackson made several life-altering observations. Inspired by the revolutionary polemics of the Black Panther Party's (BPP) Huey P. Newton, Jackson began the process of becoming politicized. During his relatively frequent stays in solitary confinement, Jackson used his time wisely and voraciously devoured the works of Karl Marx, W. I. Lenin, Leon Trotsky, and Mao Tse-tung (Zedong). Informed by such thinkers, Jackson emerged from solitary confinement with radical ideas. Before accepting a field marshal position with the BPP, a politicized Jackson formed the Black Guerilla Family (BGF) with fellow inmate W. L. Nolen. The BGF was initially intended to be a vehicle that politicized black and Hispanic inmates and organized in efforts to secure prison reforms. Despite Jackson's intentions, correction officers labeled the group a prison gang. Ironically, Black Panther Party cofounder Huey P. Newton would be murdered by a street-level drug dealing BGF member on August 22, 1989. The BGF wrought an immediate reaction from correction officers. Toward dismantling the BGF, corrections officers struck a lethal blow. On January 13, 1970, BGF cofounder W. L. Nolen, along with two other inmates, was murdered. When contextualized with other mid-1960s law enforcement attacks on black radicals, Nolen's demise was predictable.

Despite the natural desire to exact some form of retribution for Nolen's death, Panther politics forbid it; such behavior was considered counterrevolutionary. BPP Field

Marshall George Jackson was mired in a peculiar dilemma; his personal desire for revenge, which BPP Chairman Huey P. Newton denounced as "reactionary suicide," was supported, if not mandated, by Soledad's prison culture. Toward countering such tendencies within the BPP, Newton invalidated reactionary violence in two position papers: "In Defense of Self-Defense" and "The Correct Handling of a Revolution." Newton had taught his cadre that it was a similar pursuit of retribution after Martin Luther King's assassination that led to the death of Lil' Bobby Hutton; Hutton had been the first to join the BPP. Jackson was torn between revolutionary edicts and prison culture. The matter was largely settled, however, after a grand jury ruled the murders justifiable homicide. In direct violation of existing revolutionary policies, George Jackson, Fleeta Drumgo, and John Clutchette murdered correction officer John Mills on January 13, 1970.

Within a late-1960s/early-1970s period of radicalism, the murder of a white correction officer by black inmates made sensational copy. Similar to Huey P. Newton's October 28, 1967 shootout, the "Soledad Brothers" became the cause célèbre for black revolutionaries and white radicals. Jackson's popularity would only increase with his legendary tomes: Soledad Brother and Blood in My Eye. Unbelievably, George Jackson's legend was extended by events that occurred absent his presence.

On August 7, 1970, Jonathan Jackson, George's younger brother, bodyguard for University of California, San Diego, Professor Angela Davis, stormed the Marin County Courthouse; the teenage Jackson executed the plan alone because the BPP deserted him moments before the attack was to commence. Jackson intended to send an unforgettable message via an unprecedented display of revolutionary actions. Jackson burst into the Marin County Courthouse brandishing a machine gun and carrying armaments for the three San Quentin prisoners—James McClain, William Christmas, and Ruchell Magee—involved in the day's court proceedings. Jackson instructed the others to take the judge, prosecutor, and three jurors' hostage. The teen-age Jackson planned to use the hostages as human shields while commandeering a local radio station. Jonathan intended to issue a national plea for the immediate end of the intolerable conditions present in the California penal system. Most important, Jackson sought to propagate the "Soledad Brothers" case and order their immediate release.

Unbeknownst to Jackson, officers had mobilized in the parking lot where a van awaited his return; as Jackson attempted to exit, officers opened fire on the vehicle. When the firing ceased, Jonathan Jackson, inmates William Christmas and James McClain, and Judge Harold Haley were mortally wounded. The district attorney was paralyzed by gunfire. Inmate Ruchell Magee was struck, yet survived. The kidnapped jurors were unharmed. As a result of what came to be commonly referred to as “The August 7th Rebellion,” Magee would be charged with murder, kidnapping, and conspiracy.

Incredibly, the blame for Jackson’s attack was also laid at the doorstep of University of California, San Diego, Professor Angela Davis. Davis had already achieved prominence via her public battle with California Governor Ronald Reagan over academic freedom and free-speech issues; both concepts proved anathema to California’s highest elected public official throughout his public career. Despite his demise, Jackson had succeeded in bringing attention to the Soledad Brothers; however, tragedy loomed on the horizon.

In preparation for George Jackson’s trial, authorities transferred him to San Quentin Prison. Three days before the trial, August 21, 1971, BPP Field Marshall George Jackson was gunned down by prison guards while standing in San Quentin’s prison yard. Corrections officers alleged that Jackson was in the midst of an escape attempt that had commenced earlier that day via a prison riot that left two guards and three inmates dead. Officers bolstered their charges by alleging Jackson had a 9-mm automatic pistol in his possession during the escape attempt. The alluded to weapon was allegedly smuggled in by Jackson’s legal counsel Stephen Bingham; Bingham would eventually be acquitted of the charges. Eyewitnesses to Jackson’s horrific demise testified that Jackson was neither attempting an escape nor did he have a weapon in his possession when officers mortally struck Jackson with gunfire. Those present maintain that Jackson was murdered by officers seeking retribution for their two fallen colleagues. When pressed to support their theory that Jackson was armed, prison officials were unable to produce either the weapon or records showing its destruction. George Jackson was 29 when slain by San Quentin Prison correction officers.

See also: Black Panther Party; Black Power; Davis, Angela; Newton, Huey P.

Bibliography

Brown, Elaine. A Taste of Power: A Black Woman’s Story. New York: Doubleday, 1992.

Churchill, Ward. Agents of Repression: The FBI’s Secret Wars Against the Black Panther Party and the Indian Movement. Boston: South End Press, 1988.

Cleaver, Kathleen. Liberation, Imagination and the Black Panther Party: A New Look at the Black Panthers and their Legacy. New York: Routledge, 2001.

Collier, Peter. Destructive Generation: Second Thoughts About the 60’s. New York: Free Press Paperbacks, 1989.

Durden-Smith, Jo. Who Killed George Jackson? New York: Knopf, 1976.

Jackson, George. Blood in My Eye. Baltimore, MD: Black Classic Press, 1990.

Jackson, George. Soledad Brother: The Prison Letters of George Jackson. New York: Coward-McCann, 1970.

Jackson, George. “A Talk with George Jackson.” Interview with Jessica Mitford. New York Times (June 13, 1971):30.

James, Joy, ed. The Angela Y. Davis Reader. Malden, MA: Blackwell Publishers, 1998.

Jones, Charles, ed. The Black Panther Party Reconsidered. Baltimore, MD: Black Classic Press, 1998.

Mann, Eric. Comrade George; An Investigation into the Life, Political Thought, and Assassination of George Jackson. New York: Harper & Row, 1974.

Newton, Fredericka, The Huey P. Newton Reader. New York: Seven Stories Press, 2002.

James Thomas Jones III

Southern Christian Leadership Conference

The Southern Christian Leadership Conference (SCLC) is a civil rights organization formed in January 1957 that played a key role in administering direct-action, nonviolent campaigns against legalized segregation in the United States. The chief founder, and first president of SCLC, the Reverend Martin Luther King Jr., successfully collected a partial payment on that “unpaid check” he had spoken of in his “I Have a Dream” speech in Washington, D.C. in August 1963, by overseeing the implementation of new laws and desegregating many aspects of public life in the South.

SCLC is located in the “Sweet Auburn” historic district, in the center of downtown Atlanta, Georgia. Originally housed at 208 Auburn Avenue, the SCLC offices were moved into the Prince Hall Masonic Temple building located at 334 Auburn. Today, the SCLC staff resides in their new headquarters on Edgewood Avenue, in the historic district of Atlanta.

Civil rights demonstrators from the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee (SNCC) and the Congress of Racial Equality (CORE) chained to a federal courthouse in New York City in protest of civil rights abuses in Jackson, Mississippi, 1965. (Library of Congress)

The significance of Auburn Avenue and the history of SCLC dates back to January 15, 1929, when King was born in the upstairs bedroom of a modest Victorian style home located at 501 Auburn. From 1955 to 1960, the Reverend Martin Luther King Sr. was pastor of the Ebenezer Baptist Church located on the same avenue, just two blocks west of their home on Auburn. Young Martin would often deliver guest sermons at Ebenezer, and eventually, in 1960 officially began serving as co-pastor.

It was at Ebenezer, within walls that reverberated with King's fiery speeches and sermons, that various African American leaders gathered in the first weeks of 1957 to discuss the formation of a southern organization grounded in Christian principles and committed to nonviolent social change. For civil rights leaders such as Bayard Rustin, Stanley Levison, Ella J. Baker, C. K. Steele, and many involved in the victorious Montgomery, Alabama bus boycott from December 1, 1955 to November 13, 1956, King represented a distinctive approach to social reform.

In retrospect, it seems clear that King's move to Montgomery in May 1954 to become pastor the Dexter Avenue Baptist Church began a new era in the African American liberation movement in the United States. Soon after his arrival, he joined the local NAACP and other advocacy organizations and encouraged participation by members of his church. King's personality played a decisive role in the bus boycott and the establishment of the first genuine grassroots movement directed pointedly against segregation in the South. King appeared as a vigorous and determined leader who bridged church and society as no one had in the long southern struggle for racial equality.

The founders of SCLC seized the grassroots momentum created in Montgomery and carried it into Atlanta. Ebenezer church served as more than SCLC's founding location; in subsequent years, the church building provided accommodations for various meetings, rallies, and their 1967 annual convention. King, the church membership, and SCLC participants were molded into an inseparable, united movement.

The first SCLC convention was held in Montgomery in August 1957. During this meeting, members adopted their official name and selected King as their first president, with C. K. Steele as the first vice president. The key to understanding the effectiveness of SCLC lies in viewing the composition of the organization as a loose connection of church groups capable of uniting in a mobilized campaign under the auspices of their leadership.

Under the guidance of King and Steele, SCLC participants made the decade of the 1960s a pivotal period in the history of the American Civil Rights movement. In less than five years, successful SCLC campaigns prompted African Americans to find and enjoy a new freedom, as segregation, Jim Crow customs, and lynching became part of the South's past. Notably, the Albany, Georgia campaign of 1961–1962 was pivotal in shaping the approach of SCLC to direct-action campaigns. In July 1962, while in an Albany jail, King became convinced that a “four-pronged approach” was the best means of unifying society. This approach consisted of legal action, direct action, selective buying, and voter registration.

During the Birmingham campaign of 1963, SCLC and King propelled the Civil Rights movement to national attention in an effort to gain leverage in negotiation and apply pressure to the United States government. In his “letter from a Birmingham Jail,” King outlined four stages of a nonviolent campaign: investigation to determine whether injustice existed, negotiation with local officials, self-purification, and direct action. Subsequently, the St. Augustine, Florida campaign of 1964 would test every stage of the nonviolence campaign. The following year brought the successful Selma, Alabama campaign. The famous Selma to Montgomery march prompted Congress to pass the 1965 Voting Rights Act.

By 1965, King had led SCLC to three cardinal gains. First, it had psychologically raised the hopes of African Americans by giving them a sense of pride, dignity, and confidence in themselves as a people. Second, SCLC and its allies had gathered and consolidated a tremendous amount of political leverage in gaining desegregation of facilities and polling booths. Last, the SCLC campaigns had laid important groundwork and precedent for future generations who were now armed with the right to vote, eat, sit, study, and live as they wished.

SCLC Presidents:

Martin Luther King Jr. (1957–1968)

Ralph D. Abernathy (1968–1977)

Joseph E. Lowery (1977–1997)

Martin Luther King, III (1997–2004)

Fred Shuttlesworth (February 2004–November 2004)

Charles Steele Jr. (November, 2004–)

See also: Abernathy, Ralph David; Albany, Georgia, Movement; King, Martin Luther Jr.; March on Washington, 1963; Montgomery Bus Boycott; Selma March; Shuttlesworth, Fred; Williams, Hosea

Bobby R. Holt

Bibliography

- Abernathy, Ralph David. And the Walls Came Tumbling Down: An Autobiography. New York: HarperCollins, 1991.
- Branch, Taylor. Parting the Waters: America in the King Years, 1954–1963. New York: Simon & Schuster, 1989.
- Branch, Taylor. Pillar of Fire: America in the King Years, 1963–1965. New York: Simon & Schuster, 1989.
- Fairclough, Adam. To Redeem the Soul of America: The Southern Christian Leadership Conference and Martin Luther King, Jr. Athens: University of Georgia Press, 2001.
- Garrow, David J. Bearing the Cross: Martin Luther King, Jr., and the Southern Christian Leadership Conference. New York: William Morrow, 1986.
- King, Jr., Martin Luther. Autobiography, ed. Clayborne Carson. New York: Warner Books, 1998.
- Peake, Thomas R. Keeping the Dream Alive: A History of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference from King to the Nineteen Eighties. New York: Peter Lang, 1987.

Springfield Race Riot of 1908

For two days in August 1908, a race riot ravaged the streets of Springfield, Illinois. Two African Americans were brutally murdered, four whites were killed by gunfire, more than 100 people were hospitalized, 40 African American homes were burned, and two dozen businesses were damaged or destroyed.

Two local events helped spark the riot. First, on July 4, 1908, Earl Ballard, a white man, was stabbed and killed by Joe Johnson, an African American. Second, on August 13, 1908, Mabel Hallam, a married white woman, reported that an African American man broke into her home during the night, choked her, and dragged her into her backyard, and proceeded to assault her. Neighbors came to her aid, but the assailant was already gone. Mrs. Hallam, bruised and badly shaken, told police that a young African American male, wearing a colored shirt and work clothes, was responsible. Police arrested George Richardson, an African American, who despite being misidentified twice by Hallam, was booked into the county jail.

On August 14, a white mob arrived at the jail to lynch Ballard and Richardson. Sensing trouble, local officials had transported the suspects 60 miles north to Bloomington, Illinois to avoid retribution. Rumors circulated that a local restaurant owner, Harry Loper, had allowed police to use his automobile to transport the prisoners. The mob turned its rage on Loper's restaurant, first throwing a brick through the window, and then by firing shots into the establishment. Louis Johnson, a white man, was hit by the gunfire and died on the scene. Still unsatisfied, the mob made its way to the African American neighborhood, known as the Levee, where they destroyed homes and businesses. When they came across Scott Burton, an African American barber, they hanged him from a tree, shot him, and burned his body. An estimated 3,700 militiamen arrived in the town, dispersed the crowd, and opened the state armory to the homeless and badly shaken African Americans. Hundreds more African Americans fled the town.

On August 15, the mob re-formed and proceeded to the home of 80-year-old William Donnegan, a wealthy African American who had been married to a white woman for 32 years. Claiming he fired at them, the mob slashed Donnegan's throat, hanged him from a nearby tree, and proceeded to burn his home.

Two weeks after the riot, Hallam recanted her story. She claimed that Richardson was not the man who attacked her. She gave the description of another African American male. Later, she told a special grand jury that she was not attacked by an African American man after all. Her assailant was a white man, with whom she was having an affair. Hallam and her family moved from Springfield a few months after the riot. Richardson was released from jail and continued to live in Springfield, and James was tried for the murder of Clergy Ballard and found guilty and hanged.

The scene in Springfield was eerily reminiscent of a lynching in Georgia just four years earlier. In 1904, in Statesboro, Georgia, a mob burned alive two African American men who were each accused of murder and destroyed the property of several other African Americans. By 1908, lynchings were a southern phenomenon. Between 1884 and 1900, 2,000 African Americans were lynched in the South. Springfield was among the first northern cities to witness the racial violence that would later sweep cities like East St. Louis, Illinois in 1917 and Chicago in 1919.

The two-day riot in Springfield, Abraham Lincoln's adopted home town, startled many Americans. As a result, the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP) was organized on Lincoln's birthday six months after the Springfield race riot. On August 13, 1994, a Springfield nonprofit group called Monument 1908 put headstones on four previously unidentified graves believed to belong to two African American and two white victims of the Springfield race riot of 1908.

See also: Lynching; National Association for the Advancement of Colored People; White Mob Violence

Samuel Paul Wheeler

Bibliography

- Krobe, James, Summer of Rage: The Springfield Race Riot of 1908. Springfield, IL: Sangamon County Historical Society, 1973.
- Pokorski, Doug. "Springfield Prepares to Honor Victims of Race Riot," The State Journal-Register. (August 11, 1994):11.
- Senecal de la Roche, Roberta. In Lincoln's Shadow: The 1908 Race Riot in Springfield, Illinois. Carbondale: Southern Illinois University Press, 2008.
- Senecal de la Roche, Roberta. The Sociogenesis of a Race Riot: Springfield, Illinois in 1908. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1990.

Stevens, Thaddeus

Thaddeus Stevens (1792–1868) was a lawyer and, as a Republican representative from Pennsylvania from 1858 to 1868, a leading radical voice in Congress. He consistently agitated for emancipation and later for the full legal equality of former slaves. Controversial throughout his life, Stevens never achieved the entire program he desired, but he helped shape some of the most important legislation of the Civil War and Reconstruction.

The second of four sons, Stevens was born on April 4, 1792, in Danville, Vermont, to shoemaker and surveyor

Joshua Stevens and Sarah Morrill. His father deserted the family when Stevens was 12. Stevens learned the shoemaking trade, but his mother moved the family to Peacham, Vermont in 1807 so that her children could attend the Caledonia Grammar School, also called the Peacham Academy. In 1811, Stevens entered Dartmouth College in Hanover, New Hampshire and graduated in 1814. He then relocated to Danville and began studying law with Judge John Mattocks.

On the recommendation of a Dartmouth classmate, Stevens moved to York, Pennsylvania in February 1815, where he became a teacher at the York Academy and studied with lawyer David Cassat. After passing the bar exam in 1816, Stevens moved to Gettysburg and established his own law office. He soon became one of the most prominent lawyers in southern Pennsylvania and served on the Gettysburg Council from 1822 to 1831. He demonstrated his commitment to the abolition of slavery early in his career, taking on the defense of fugitive slaves by the mid-1820s. In addition to his legal work, Stevens established the Mifflin Forge and Maria Furnace around 1826 and later an ironworks he named the Caledonia Forge.

Stevens became active in local and state politics, particularly the campaign against Masonry's secrecy and exclusion. His increasing political profile won him election to the state legislature in 1833. While serving in the Pennsylvania House of Representatives from 1833 to 1836 and again in 1839 and 1841, Stevens successfully argued for public education and the recharter of the Bank of the United States in Pennsylvania. Stevens left the legislature as anti-Mason political clout waned, and financial troubles with his ironworks following the Panic of 1837 prompted Stevens to set up a new law practice in Lancaster, Pennsylvania in 1842. While in Lancaster, Stevens participated in the Underground Railroad and continued to defend fugitive slaves against capture. In 1843, he also hired a biracial woman named Lydia Hamilton Smith as his housekeeper. Stevens never married and lived with her until his death, and the nature of their relationship inspired endless conjecture. Most historians agree that there is insufficient evidence to prove that Stevens and Smith had a romantic relationship.

In 1848, Stevens entered national politics, winning a seat in the House of Representatives as a Whig and serving until 1852. There, he gained renown for his impassioned speeches against the expansion of slavery into newly acquired territories. After the Whig party fractured in 1854, Stevens was integral to the organization of Pennsylvania's Republican Party. He returned to the House of

Thaddeus Stevens led the Radical Republicans in Congress during the Reconstruction period and was the primary instigator in the impeachment of President Andrew Johnson. (Library of Congress)

Representatives in 1858. With the advent of the secession crisis in 1860 and 1861, Stevens, who was by now chairman of the powerful Ways and Means Committee, emerged as a vehement foe of any compromise with the rebellious South. Stevens believed that national reunification required the abolition of slavery, and throughout the Civil War, he urged President Abraham Lincoln to do so. Although Stevens was often frustrated with Lincoln's progress toward declaring emancipation, he also became one of the administration's most important congressional allies in other respects. Stevens guided such legislation through the House as higher protective tariffs and the first income tax, which expanded the economic authority of the federal government. He also supported the passage of the Confiscation Acts and the first military draft in 1863. He was an early advocate of the enlistment of African American soldiers and late in 1863 successfully proposed legislation to give black soldiers equal pay and repeal the Fugitive Slave Law. Stevens also supported the Thirteenth Amendment abolishing slavery, which passed in 1865.

Some of Stevens's most radical suggestions involved the fate of the South after the Civil War. He unsuccessfully pushed for the seizure of the estates of rebellious planters for redistribution among former slaves. Stevens set himself firmly against the Reconstruction plan of President Andrew Johnson, which permitted the reorganization of Southern state governments and required only an oath of loyalty to pardon ex-Confederates. Especially as the new Southern governments began to adopt restrictive Black Codes, Stevens worked to galvanize opposition to Johnson. Congress passed the Civil Right Act of 1866 over Johnson's veto and in 1867 wrested control of Reconstruction from the President with the passage of the Reconstruction Act. This measure imposed military rule on the South and required its states to remove racial restrictions on voting in their new constitutions. In a final blow to Johnson, Stevens helped bring impeachment charges against him in February 1868 after Johnson attempted to replace Secretary of War Edwin Stanton without congressional approval. By this time, however, Stevens was too ill with dropsy and stomach ailments to lead the charge, which some historians blame for the impeachment effort's failure in May.

Stevens died at midnight at his Washington, D.C., home on August 11, 1868. After lying in state at the Capitol, he was buried at Schreiner's Cemetery in Lancaster, a site selected by Stevens because it was racially integrated.

See also: Civil Rights Act of 1866; Fourteenth Amendment; Johnson, Andrew; Lincoln, Abraham; Radical Republicans; Republican Party; Sumner, Charles; Thirteenth Amendment; Underground Railroad

Francesca Gamber

Bibliography

- Brodie, Fawn. Thaddeus Stevens: Scourge of the South. New York: W. W. Norton, 1959.
- Foner, Eric. Free Soil, Free Labor, Free Men: The Ideology of the Republican Party Before the Civil War. New York: Oxford University Press, 1970.
- Foner, Eric. Reconstruction: America's Unfinished Revolution, 1863–1877. New York: Harper & Row, 1988.
- Trefousse, Hans L. Thaddeus Stevens: Nineteenth-Century Egalitarian. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1997.

“Strange Fruit”

In 1935, Abel Meeropol saw a photograph of the lynching of Thomas Shipp and Abram Smith, which had taken place in Marion, Indiana, on August 7, 1930. The image haunted Meeropol for days and in response he wrote a three verse poem, “Strange Fruit.” The poem depicted the memory of trauma in the landscape, echoing the trope of the haunted tree in Hannah Crafts’s The Bondswoman’s Narrative (1859), Charles Chesnut’s story “Po Sandy” (1888), Paul Dunbar’s poem “The Haunted Oak” (1903), and Angelina Weld Grimké’s poem “Tenebris” (1927). Here Meeropol reminded readers that some trees were used for multiple lynchings and also evoked numerous tales of encounter with lynching’s aftermath (scenes of shoes, bones, teeth, and the strange fruit of the victim’s dismembered corpse). His poem spoke of a cultural haunting.

A union activist and a member of the American Communist Party, as well a Jewish schoolteacher, Meeropol published the poem under the pseudonym Lewis Allan in the New York Teacher in 1937 and in New Masses in 1939. After he set the poem to music, it was regularly performed at leftist gatherings, including once at a fundraiser for antifascists during the Spanish Civil War. But he is virtually forgotten as the original author of the lyrics to “Strange Fruit.” In January 1939, he took his song to the newly opened Café Society in Greenwich Village—Manhattan’s only integrated nightclub and the venue where Billie Holiday performed. He asked Holiday to listen and played his song at the piano. Meeropol remembered that afterwards Holiday asked only one question: what did “pastoral” mean?

Holiday was only 23 years old and had not yet recorded a political song. Before 1939 much of her material consisted of upbeat swing numbers, and she had sung with Count Basie and Artie Shaw’s bands before landing a solo engagement at Café Society in December 1938. Meeropol’s song would now mark a turning point in her career. She first performed her own version of “Strange Fruit” later in January 1939, at Café Society. “There wasn’t even a patter of applause when I finished,” Holiday recalled. “Then a lone person began to clap nervously. Then suddenly everyone was clapping” (Lady Sings the Blues, p. 85). Meeropol later added of her rendition: “She gave a startling, most dramatic and effective interpretation . . . which could jolt the audience out of its complacency anywhere. . . . Billie Holiday’s styling of the song was incomparable and fulfilled the bitterness and shocking quality I had hoped the song would have” (Greene, 59).

After that first performance, audience responses to the song continued to be extreme. For a long time it was rarely played on the radio and was almost impossible to find in record stores. Holiday's label had refused to record it and so she released it with the obscure label Commodore. She performed her own version around the country throughout the 1940s, sometimes encountering such violent audience responses that she was forced to stop singing or leave town. The South African government banned the song during apartheid. Yet others could not get enough. This was the first time anyone had sung so explicitly about lynching and many listeners were gripped. In October 1939, one journalist for the New York Post wrote that a record had obsessed him for two days. Even after 10 hearings "Strange Fruit" would "make you blink and hold to your chair," he explained. "Even now, as I think of it, the short hair on the back of my neck tightens and I want to hit somebody" (Billie Holiday: A Biography, p. 62).

Still others recognized the song as a call to arms in a year when three lynchings took place, a survey revealed that 60 percent of southerners thought lynching was justifiable, and audiences flocked to see Gone With the Wind. The film, later criticized for its romanticized "moonlight and magnolias" approach to American history, was sweeping the nation; but in "Strange Fruit" a smell of burning flesh accompanies the "scent of magnolias," as the lyrics put it. It is rare that a protest movement does not have a great protest song at its heart, and "Strange Fruit" was the anthem of the antilynching movement from 1939 onwards. It became one of the most influential protest songs ever written—often compared to Bob Dylan's "The Death of Emmett Till" (1963) and Nina Simone's "Mississippi Goddam" (1963).

It has been re-recorded by more than 100 musical artists to date, including Abbey Lincoln, Nina Simone, Sting, and Tori Amos. Black singer Josh White began singing "Strange Fruit" a few years after Holiday, and in 1941 he released it on his album Southern Exposure with a liner note by Richard Wright. Jazz writer Leonard Feather described it as the first un-muted cry against racism, and record producer Ahmet Ertegun called it a declaration of war and the beginning of the Civil Rights movement. Although Time Magazine initially dismissed it as propaganda for the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, by 1999 the magazine had hailed the song as the best of the century. Four years later the British magazine Q ranked it sixth in a list of 100 songs that have changed the world.

The song's presence also extended to a controversial exhibition of lynching photographs. In 2002, the exhibition

Without Sanctuary opened in Atlanta. It featured the photograph that had haunted and inspired Meeropol in 1935, along with Meeropol's lyrics on one of the foyer walls. And as visitors looked at the photographs, the sound of "Strange Fruit" filled the gallery.

See also: Antilynching Campaign; Black Folk Culture; Lynching; White Mob Violence

Zoe Trodd

Bibliography

- Davis, Angela. Blues Legacies and Black Feminism. New York: Pantheon Books, 1998.
- Greene, Meg. Billie Holiday: A Biography. Westport, CT: Greenwood Press, 2006.
- Holiday, Billie. Lady Sings the Blues. New York: Penguin, 1986.
- Margolick, David. Strange Fruit: Billie Holiday, Cafe Society, and an Early Cry for Civil Rights. Philadelphia: Running Press, 2000.
- Nicholson, Stuart. Billie Holiday. Boston: Northeastern University Press, 1995.
- O'Meally, Robert. Lady Day: The Many Faces of Billie Holiday. New York: Arcade Press, 1991.

Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee

The Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee (SNCC) was one of the most important organizations to participate in the 1960s African American Civil Rights movement. Often referred to as the "shock troops" of the movement, SNCC remained on the cutting edge of the southern black freedom struggle. The organization differed from other groups such as the Southern Christian Leadership Conference (SCLC) in its organizational style and leadership. Unlike the SCLC, SNCC believed in creating and developing leadership. In accordance with SNCC founder Ella Baker's famous stance that "strong people do not need strong leaders," SNCC based most of its actions on creating grassroots leadership in African American communities. This leadership style facilitated the emergence of different types of leaders who would have most likely been marginalized by other organizations in the movement. Northern blacks, women, whites, and especially local people held prevalent positions in SNCC and were essential to its development. Creating leaders among these groups enabled the organization to maintain a great deal of diversity and promoted community-based activism. The dynamics of the grass-roots leadership style encouraged by SNCC brought local communities into the forefront of the modern Civil Rights movement and helped pave the way for future generations of leaders among black southerners.

On the afternoon of February 1, 1960, four black students at North Carolina A & T entered a Woolworth's department store in Greensboro. Franklin McCain, Joseph McNeil, Ezell Blair, and David Richmond spent several dollars in the department store and then took seats at the store's segregated lunch counter where they were refused service. The four young men remained seated and refused to leave until served. They stayed at the lunch counter for nearly one hour before the store closed and they were forced to leave. The young students returned the next day with 20 of their classmates and took seats at the segregated counter. The four young men came back to the lunch counter for several consecutive days, bringing more classmates each time. By February 5, hundreds of young people, including some whites, joined the sit-in protest only to be denied service each time.

Within days of the initial protest, African American students in nearby Winston-Salem, Durham, and Raleigh, began conducting their own sit-ins at segregated lunch counters throughout the state. News of the sit-ins continued to spread, and eventually African Americans outside of North Carolina joined the movement. By mid-February, there were sit-ins in Norfolk, Virginia; Rock Hill, South Carolina; Baltimore, Maryland, and Nashville, Tennessee. By late March, students in Nashville and Atlanta, Georgia had begun massive sit-in demonstrations that commanded the attention of the American media.

Many people across the country were extremely impressed by this burgeoning movement that was being led by college-blacks. Included among these sit-in supporters was 56-year-old Ella Baker who was a veteran activist and current executive secretary for the SCLC. Ms. Baker realized the potential of these students if they could coordinate their protests through a national organization. She lobbied SCLC for an $800 grant to be used to construct such an organization, and SNCC was born at an April conference in Raleigh, North Carolina, which was attended by sit-in leaders from across the South.

SNCC's first major campaign began on the eve of the one-year anniversary of the original Greensboro sit-ins. On January 31, 1961, 10 young African Americans were arrested for sitting at a segregated lunch counter in Rock Hill, South Carolina. Upon their arrest, SNCC arrived in the city and began a campaign that would be known as "jail-ins." SNCC leaders knew that they would be arrested for sitting at the segregated lunch counters in Rock Hill, but did so anyway in order to fill the city's jails. This would apply pressure on city officials who would have to use a vast amount of resources to arrest and detain large numbers of protesters. The "jail-in" strategy that SNCC used in Rock Hill would become one of the most important tactics used during the Civil Rights movement.

Later that year, SNCC joined forces with the Congress of Racial Equality (CORE) to test a 1961 Supreme Court decision that banned segregation on interstate busses. In Boydton v. Virginia, the United States Supreme Court ruled that segregation on interstate busses and terminals was unconstitutional. Like every other victory for integration, however, the court decision would have to be tested to ensure that the United States government would back the rights of African Americans. Freedom Rides were designed to test Boydton v. Virginia. Members of CORE and SNCC planned to travel on buses through the South, desegregating bus terminals as they went. The original group included seven blacks and six whites who left Washington, D.C. for New Orleans on May 4, 1961. The trip was relatively uneventful at first, but the Freedom Riders met violence upon reaching the Deep South. On May 9, two of the protesters were attacked at the bus terminal in Rock Hill. A few days later, white segregationists slashed the bus tires outside of Anniston, Alabama and the group had to switch buses to proceed even deeper into the Jim Crow South. The violence reached a pinnacle outside of Birmingham, Alabama when white supremacists, aided by the absence of policemen, entered the bus and attacked all of the Freedom Riders and bombed their vehicle. Volunteer James Peck was beaten so badly that it took 53 stitches to close the wound he received from a blow to the head. The next day, pictures of the attack appeared on the front page of most of the nation's newspapers. This coverage of the violence that Freedom Riders faced forced the Kennedy administration to provide protection for future Freedom Riders.

SNCC experienced its first major internal conflict during the months after the Freedom Rides. Two factions emerged within the organization. One faction encouraged direct action protests such as sit-ins and marches. Another favored voter registration. Ms. Baker suggested that both sides pursue their objectives by their chosen means, and SNCC grew into two separate entities that worked together but chose to conduct different forms of activism.

The first major voter registration project took place in McComb, Mississippi and was led by Bob Moses who had been stirred into action after learning of the nationwide sit-in movement that began in February 1960 at the Greensboro Woolworth's. Moses was a 26-year-old high school teacher in Harlem, New York when he first heard of the sit-in movement. It immediately propelled him into action and he joined SNCC in 1960. By 1961, Moses had become SNCC's field secretary in Mississippi after entering the nation's most segregated state with nothing more than a list of contacts gathered by Ms. Baker during her decades of prior activism. In Mississippi, Moses was able to connect into underground networks of activists who had been fighting for black freedom in the state for decades. These activists were able to connect Moses to local people. By 1961, Moses had created a beachhead in Mississippi. True to SNCC's founding philosophy of grassroots organizing, most of the leaders in Mississippi were locals. Many outsiders entered the state to join Moses, but the majority of groundwork was done by local people who were mired in one of the nation's worst forms of poverty in 1961. The median income of local blacks was less than half the poverty level for a four-person household. This poverty extended into the state's racist educational system as well. Mississippi blacks were extremely undereducated. The state took aim to ensure that its black students did not achieve any form of academic freedom. Many local blacks did not even know that they had a constitutional right to vote. If they did pursue this right, Mississippi blacks were subject to violence. Because of the incredibly dangerous characteristics of white supremacists in the state, SNCC was severely limited in its ability to recruit organizers and incorporated anyone willing to risk their lives into the organization. Women, older black men, black youths, and some whites played key parts in the state as SNCC's presence in Mississippi grew in 1961.

Voter registration campaigns were key to the struggle for black freedom in Mississippi for two reasons. First, only a very small percentage of African Americans had been allowed to register over the previous decades. Counties like McComb, where only 5 percent of age-eligible citizens were registered to vote, were typical. Second, the state was characterized by an culture of extreme racial violence. The Mississippi Justice Department simply refused to prosecute whites who committed violence against African Americans. White supremacists in Mississippi knew fully well that any violence inflicted on African Americans would go unchecked. A black civil rights activist could be killed at any time. Direct-action campaigns in Mississippi were more dangerous to conduct than anywhere else.

In August, 1961, with the help of funds from the federal government's Voter Education Project (VEP), Moses began a voter registration project in McComb. SNCC workers traveled door-to-door in an attempt to convince potential black voters to register. Initially, the organization experienced some success as members began to venture out into other black communities to canvass potential voters and recruit new SNCC volunteers. Voter registration was often slow, however, owing to the prevalence of fear among black Mississippians. This fear was confirmed by the 1961 murder of Herbert Lee who was a native Mississippian who had been transporting SNCC workers throughout black communities. Lee was shot in broad daylight by a member of the Mississippi House of Representatives who was quickly acquitted. This confirmed to most black Mississippians that voter registration was impossible, and the murder greatly slowed SNCC's progress throughout the state. The organization kept fighting, however, and continued to spread into other regions of Mississippi including the rural Mississippi Delta where the majority of citizens were black. SNCC encountered the most impoverished and disenfranchised group in the state when it entered the delta, but it also incorporated an incredibly driven and able group of local black activists into the organization. Included among these local people was Fannie Lou Hamer of Ruleville, Mississippi who did not know that she should be allowed to vote until she attended a SNCC-sponsored meeting that took place in her local church in 1962. She was 44 years old and became one of the most important local leaders in Mississippi and symbols of the potential of grassroots organizing.

The direct-action division of SNCC also experienced several setbacks in 1961. Led by former Freedom Riders Charles Sherrod and Cordell Reagon, SNCC entered Albany, Georgia in October 1961 to lead protest activities in the city. The organization was effectively able to recruit local people to join movement activities, but it also encountered an obstacle that clashed with SNCC's basic philosophies. Initially, SNCC led marches and demonstrations in the city that were designed to protest segregation, discriminatory hiring practices, and the systematic disenfranchisement of black voters. Just weeks into their campaign, however, a local leader asked Martin Luther King Jr. to join black Albanians' fight for equality and freedom. King's leadership style was contradictory to the SNCC leadership tradition that promoted grassroots organizing.

Upon his arrival, King immediately assumed the leadership of peaceful marches through downtown Albany. He was arrested soon after, and building on SNCC's "jail-in" philosophy, King vowed to spend Christmas in prison if necessary. King arrived in Albany in December and brought the attention of the media with him. SNCC always welcomed media attention that would expose the plight of African Americans, but the newsmen focused almost exclusively on King. He became the face and symbol of the Albany movement. This would have drastic repercussions for local people who were pushed from leadership positions. Albany leaders, fearful of the media frenzy that the incarceration of the most famous black preacher in the United States could create, negotiated a deal with King without involving local leaders or SNCC. Upon King's release from prison, he declared victory and left the city. After King left Albany, local officials denied an accord had ever been reached. They reneged on their agreement with King and Albany's racial caste system continued as usual. SNCC leaders then had a hard time remobilizing local people who had become so dependent on King's leadership and prestige. Over the next several months, SNCC struggled against white officials to achieve nothing more than a stalemate that hardly threatened the status quo before the organization's involvement in the city.

By July 1962, SNCC had begun to reestablish leadership in Albany. King and his SCLC followers returned to the city that same month to assume leadership of the local people that SNCC had spent months mobilizing. As he had the previous year, King began leading demonstrations in the city; however, King's absence over the previous seven months had left many local people wary of his leadership position and he had trouble invoking large-scale protests. King was arrested twice more in Albany, but he could not fill the jails. SNCC was powerless to do so as well because King undermined the organization's leadership. Eventually, King left the city without any further concessions made by white officials. Leadership had been split, and both King and SNCC had been rendered ineffective as a result of the changing characteristics of Albany leadership. The developments in Albany reinforced to SNCC that it had to remain largely autonomous from national movement figures, especially King, in order to be effective. It also motivated the student-led organization to recruit even more local people into leadership positions as it conducted localized campaigns throughout the South.

The year 1963 was a turbulent one in the Civil Rights movement and a definitive one for SNCC. In May, King-led protests in Birmingham captured the world's attention as policemen and firefighters used German shepherds and fire hoses to break-up peaceful demonstrations on the Alabama city's streets. This protest inspired demonstrations across the country. In all, approximately 930 protests occurred in 115 U.S. cities. More than 20,000 people were arrested for demonstrating against Jim Crow and discrimination. Later that year, the SCLC, NAACP, CORE, and SNCC led a massive March on Washington, during which more than 250,000 protestors gathered on the mall in D.C. to protest segregation. King gave his famous "I Have a Dream" speech during that protest and cemented the moral righteousness of the Civil Rights movement. SNCC conducted various direct-action campaigns across the South with the help of an influx of volunteers, including many whites. White individuals such as Bob Zellner, Sam Shirah, Jane Stembridge, and Sandra Hayden either joined the fight against Jim Crow or became more prevalent leaders in the organization. By the fall of 1963, 20 percent of SNCC members were white. Voter registration activities spread throughout the South's Black Belt, and SNCC began to experience breakthroughs in Mississippi.

In November 1963, SNCC conducted a mock election called the Freedom Vote in Mississippi. This campaign was designed to allow Mississippi African Americans an opportunity to participate in their first election, as well as to show the federal government that black Mississippians truly desired a stake in national and state politics. To illustrate the political potential of African Americans in the state, SNCC conducted an independent election. Because African Americans had been systematically excluded from Mississippi's regular Democratic Party, SNCC created an alternative Democratic organization named the Mississippi Freedom Democratic Party (MFDP). SNCC, which now included a large number of white volunteers fanned the state. Black candidates ran on the MFDP ticket and were elected to mock offices, including the governorship. More than 80,000 black Mississippians participated in the Freedom Vote. This clearly showed that many more blacks desired a vote in Mississippi than the average of approximately 5,000 blacks who regularly voted in statewide elections. The Freedom Vote also helped lay the ground for a statewide voter registration campaign.

By the end of 1963, SNCC had come of age. The organization claimed large amounts of members from diverse racial and socioeconomic backgrounds. The Civil Rights movement was at its height, and the nation saw nearly 1,000 protests during the course of one year. SNCC leaders attempted to build on this momentum when planning for 1964. The organization knew that it could register black Mississippians if allowed. The Freedom Vote had showed that the disenfranchised African Americans in the state could and would be called into political action if SNCC took the proper measures. The other lesson that SNCC had learned over the previous years was that it could recruit a highly diverse and capable group of organizers from across the nation. Young people, including northern whites, cared about the SNCC cause and had shown in the years before 1964 that they were willing to risk injury and death in order to fight Jim Crow. These factors would all play a major influence on SNCC's planning for 1964.

In 1964, SNCC conducted the most ambitious and audacious civil rights campaign in the history of the United States when it launched an all-out campaign to crack Mississippi. Although the organization had achieved some previous successes in Mississippi, most of these, such as the Freedom Vote, were largely symbolic. The biggest deterrent in the state was the large-scale amount of unchecked violence that constantly threatened civil rights activists. SNCC could not get the federal government to help its cause even though Mississippi segregationists were blatantly violating the rights of black citizens. In 1964, SNCC decided that it needed a force large enough to effectively mobilize black Mississippians and prestigious enough to force the federal government to protect civil rights workers in the state. Based on SNCC's recent influx of white volunteers and sympathetic groups throughout the nation, the organization believed that it could recruit a large force of white college students to join the black freedom struggle in Mississippi during the summer of 1964. SNCC also believed that such a large group of white volunteers would force the federal government to protect civil rights workers in Mississippi. In the winter of 1963, SNCC representatives began appearing on northern college campuses to recruit young white students to participate in its 1964 Freedom Summer campaign.

Perhaps the most important goal of Freedom Summer was drawing attention to Mississippi and forcing federal intervention. The volunteers who would arrive in the state during the summer of 1964 were well positioned to do so. During the winter of 1963–1964, SNCC had recruited the children of American privilege. The organization believed that the more affluent its summer workers were, the greater chance of federal intervention. In all, 40 percent of the project's applicants came from Stanford, Harvard, Yale, and Princeton. Their parents included esteemed historian Arthur Schlesinger Jr., Congressman Don Edwards, and U.N. Ambassador Sidney Yates. As nearly 1,000 of these students poured into the state in late June, the nation took notice. Unfortunately, SNCC's greatest success in drawing federal intervention came at the expense of three lives. On June 21, SNCC workers Michael Schwerner, James Chaney, and Andrew Goodman were arrested in Philadelphia, Mississippi. Local police officers then held the three young men until dark before delivering them into the hands of Klansmen from Meridian and Neshoba County. The Klansmen, who had been tracking SNCC veteran Schwerner's moves for months, then executed the three young men and buried them under an earthen dam just outside of Philadelphia. The disappearance of the three workers, two of whom were white, drew the nation's interest and forced the federal government to build a presence in the state. It took the deaths of three young men for the federal government to launch a campaign against the KKK in the state, but their deaths probably saved dozens of lives during Freedom Summer.

Another important aspect of Freedom Summer was a program designed to create an active leadership class among Mississippi's black youths. Freedom Schools were taught mainly by white volunteers and provided training in the basic remedial skills absent from regular black schools in the state. The schools were also explicitly designed to incorporate young African Americans into the freedom struggle. Freedom Schools educated young blacks about the rich traditions of African American protest. They also encouraged high levels of student participation and let the black youths dictate the subject matter. Finally, the schools included training in civil rights protest activities such as sit-ins, letter-writing campaigns, and various forms of organizing. By the end of Freedom Summer, the students at Freedom Schools showed encouraging signs of leadership potential.

The final, and perhaps most practical, goal of Freedom Summer was to register black voters. Hundreds of volunteers canvassed black communities to convince local people to attempt to register. The volunteers often met various forms of violent resistance and reluctance from the black community, but did successfully convince approximately 17,000 age-eligible voters to attempt to register. The canvassers solicited votes as part of the MFDP, which was planning its own ambitious civil rights demonstration to take place later that year.

In 1960, the regular Mississippi Democratic Party split from the National Democratic Party in the presidential election. Rather than voting for John F. Kennedy, who rhetorically promoted civil rights, the Mississippi Democrats supported another Democratic candidate. In 1964, it looked like the regular Mississippi Democrats would again refuse the national Democratic nominee, incumbent President Lyndon B. Johnson, because of his strong civil rights platform. Based on this, and the exclusion of African Americans from the regular Mississippi Democratic Party, the MFDP concluded that it could successfully lobby to replace the traitorous Mississippi regulars at the 1964 National Democratic Convention to be held in Atlantic City in August. During the Freedom Summer, the MFDP successfully lobbied support from Democrats across the nation who promised to vote for the MFDP if the issue should hit the convention floor. By August, the MFDP believed it had enough support to unseat the Mississippi Democratic Party on the convention floor, thereby winning a major victory in front of a national audience. The challenge, however, would not go as planned.

Although the MFDP had support from a large faction of the National Democratic Party, it did not have the support of the party's leader, Lyndon B. Johnson. Johnson knew that the Mississippi Democrats would probably support Republican Barry Goldwater in the election and that the MFDP enjoyed a lot of support among national Democrats, but the president was afraid that if the MFDP was allowed to replace the Mississippi regulars, then important border states such as Kentucky, Tennessee, and Maryland could fall to the Republicans as well. The president also desired an orderly convention so as not to upset what he and his advisors perceived to be an enormous landslide in the oncoming election. To ensure that the convention went smoothly, Johnson used the power of the White House to suppress the challenge. He called a press conference during an emotionally charged and nationally televised press conference in which Fannie Lou Hamer described the horrors in Mississippi. He also threatened MFDP supporters with demotions and blacklisting should they support the civil rights group. Finally, he promised Hubert Humphrey the vice presidency if Humphrey could suppress the challenge. Johnson's tactics worked and the MFDP was offered a token compromise of seats. Enraged that they had been betrayed by the national Democratic Party, many MFDP leaders stormed out and became extremely alienated with the party and Johnson. The MFDP challenge severely discouraged many SNCC volunteers. As the summer wound down, and the summer workers left the state to return to their northern universities, SNCC experienced a great deal of displeasure and frustration. SNCC peaked during the Freedom Summer of 1964, but the disappointment from the MFDP challenge led many to leave the organization. Although it would conduct several meaningful protests after the MFDP challenge, SNCC would never be the same.

Over the next several years, SNCC led protests across the Southern Black Belt and did achieve meaningful successes. The level of activity after 1964, however, must be seen as disappointing in comparison to the massive campaigns before Freedom Summer. Overall, however, SNCC remained at the forefront of the movement and black intellectual thought. Black power, a term coined by SNCC staffer Stokely Carmichael, emerged in the late 1960s as an answer to the critics of the Civil Rights movement who were often frustrated by the limitations of working with the Democratic Party. SNCC also facilitated the growth of many of the major movements that characterized late 1960s protest including the antiwar movement, the feminist movement, and Latino movements in the southwestern United States. Many of the leaders of such movements came of age and experienced their first taste of leadership while in SNCC. Despite the frustrations that arose toward the end of SNCC, the organization played a major role in mobilizing African American communities, enforcing various aspects of civil rights legislation, and providing a model for grassroots leadership. See also: Baker, Ella; Black Power; Lowndes County Freedom Organization; Lewis, John; Nash, Diane; Robinson, Ruby Doris Smith, Sit-In Movement; Southern Christian Leadership Conference

William Mychael Sturkey

Bibliography

- Carson, Clayborne. In Struggle: SNCC and the Black Awakening of the 1960s. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1995.
- Greenberg, Cheryl Lynn. A Circle of Trust: Remembering SNCC. New Brunswick, NJ: Rutgers University Press, 1997.
- Hogan, Wesley C. Many Minds, One Heart: SNCC's Dream for a New America. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 2007.
- Mullins, Lisa. Diane Nash: The Fire of the Civil Rights Movement: A Biography. Miami, FL: Barnhardt & Ashe, 2007.
- Murphree, Vanessa. The Selling of Civil Rights: The Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee and the Use of Public Relations. New York: Routledge, 2006.
- Zinn, Howard. SNCC: The New Abolitionists. Cambridge, MA: South End Press, 2002.

Students for a Democratic Society

Students for a Democratic Society (SDS) was a radical student group that was very active in the 1960s. It evolved from the Student League for Industrial Democracy, which was the young people's branch of an organization developed in 1905 called the Intercollegiate Socialist Society. The group changed its name in the 1960s so as not to seem totally focused on labor issues, thereby appealing to a broader group of young people.

The organization held its first meeting in 1960 in Ann Arbor, Michigan. There an SDS staffer named Tom Hayden introduced his political manifesto, the Port Huron Statement. Hayden criticized the political system in general and the United States government specifically for its failure to realize world peace, the Cold War, the nuclear arms race, racial discrimination, economic inequality, and big business. He advocated reforming the two dominant political parties and developing a governmental system that would encourage, support, and sustain participatory democracy. Hayden also called for corporations to encourage more participation by their employees and an expansion of the welfare state to include a concerted effort to eliminate poverty. Finally, Hayden supported nonviolence as a tactic in the struggle for a more democratic, humane, and inclusive society.

The Port Huron Statement was unique among leftist groups for several reasons. First was the recognition that every organization needed a clear vision about its reasons for being. Second, the statement recognized that the problems in society were linked to one another, meaning that a more holistic approach to their resolution was needed.

Third, SDS made a commitment to work with any interested group regardless of its position in the political spectrum. Finally, unlike most left-leaning organizations, it rejected the militant anticommunism so prevalent in those organizations.

SDS grew slowly in part because of its policy of decentralization, a position it adopted from the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee (SNCC). The group had a national office with a president, vice president, and secretary, but it had few resources and was mostly a loose collection of campus-based chapters. During its early years, it mainly assisted SNCC in its civil rights work. Its 1964 summer convention revealed the fissures already developing between those who embraced traditional campus-based activism and those who wanted to branch out into other activities. Another outcome of the convention was the development of a more stable organization that included centralized administrative functions and increased attention to recruiting new chapters.

The year 1964 was a propitious one for SDS. On October 1 at the Berkeley campus of the University of Southern California, the free speech movement was born. Led by the charismatic Mario Savio among others, students protested against the administration, demanded that it cancel the ban on political activities, and give students more academic freedom. Hundreds of students demonstrated, held meetings, and engaged in strikes, virtually shutting down the university. SDS had truly become a national force with which to be reckoned.

The next year the administration of President Lyndon B. Johnson escalated the war in Vietnam by bombing the North Vietnamese and introducing ground troops into South Vietnam. The military draft was reactivated, and college students realized that there was more at stake than an esoteric exercise. SDS shifted its focus from civil rights to antiwar activities, and held its first teach-in against the war at the University of Michigan. It also organized a march against the war, which was held in Washington D.C. on April 17, 1965. Approximately 25,000 demonstrators converged on the city. Moreover, the organization expanded its antidraft activities to include protests against colleges and universities that had begun to supply the names and grade point averages of its male students, thereby assisting the military in deciding who would be drafted.

As the Black Power movement developed and white students became unwelcome in SNCC, SDS increasingly focused its attention on the development of campus-based activism through local chapters. It also stepped up its demonstrations against the Vietnam War and the draft, organizing several highly successful student strikes around the country. Like SNCC, it also became more militant. The organization demonstrated against businesses it deemed as profiting from the war, drawing the attention and increased criticism of the U.S. government. These activities drew the attention of the Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI), who had for some time had been working against SDS through a secret operation known as COINTELPRO.

In the autumn of 1967, SDS sponsored a well-attended demonstration at the Madison campus of the University of Wisconsin. Madison police attacked the demonstrators and a number of students were injured and arrested. Their action signaled to SDS that the nonviolent tactics it had borrowed from the Civil Rights movement were no longer effective, and thereafter its demonstrations became more like guerilla warfare as they engaged in raids on draft offices and the like.

Local SDS chapters organized a nationwide effort known as Ten Days of Resistance, which consisted of sit-ins, marches, and rallies against the war. In a show of interracial cooperation, SDS and Student Afro Society activists shutdown Columbia University, and it was estimated that about 1 million students skipped class on April 26, 1968, the largest student strike ever reported. Flush with power, the organization saw a huge increase in membership that year.

Solidarity was difficult to maintain, however. At the 1969 national convention, various factions of SDS faced off. A manifesto that said, in part, "You don't need a Weatherman to know which way the wind blows" was distributed to each conventioneer. Among the 11 members who contributed to the work, Bernardine Dohrn and Mark Rudd became the leaders of the so-called Revolutionary Youth Movement with SDS. Supporters of Dohrn and Rudd split off into yet another faction, which came to be known as the Weathermen or Weather Underground Organization. Its stated intention was the overthrow of the capitalist system, and its tactics were much more aggressive than any other campus-based organization. SDS never held another national convention, and by 1970 the Weather Underground had issued a declaration of war, committing bombings, arson, robbery, and murder in support of its goals. Several of its member went underground eluding authorities for decades, but by the 1980s most had turned themselves in.

Eventually they became involved in the very establishment they had fought so hard against.

See also: Black Panther Party; Black Power; COINTELPRO; Johnson, Lyndon Baines

Marilyn K. Howard

Bibliography

- Barber, David. A Hard Rain Fell: SDS and Why It Failed. Jackson: University Press of Mississippi, 2008.
- Hayden, Tom. The Port Huron Statement. New York: Perseus Publishing, 2005.
- Pekar, Harvey, Gary Dumm, and Paul Buhle. Students for a Democratic Society: A Graphic History. New York: Hill and Wang, 2008.
- Rudd, Mark. Underground: My Life with SDS and the Weathermen. New York: William Morrow, 2009.

Suffrage Movement, Women's

Throughout the long and painful struggle to secure the franchise for Americans of both genders and all races, many suffrage activists tended to frame the battle for the vote, quite literally, in black and white terms. Both before and after the Civil War, abolitionists and suffragists fiercely debated whether it would be more expedient to seek full political rights for white women or African American men first. Although the very terms of this debate inevitably pushed African American women to the margins of the discussion, African American suffragists consistently and fiercely resisted being thus marginalized. From the beginnings of the suffrage movement in 1848, to the enfranchisement of women in 1920, and beyond, black female activists insisted on African American women's right, not only to the vote, but also to full, equal access to political empowerment and authority.

During the 1820s and 1830s, the first radical abolitionist movement took shape in America. From the very beginnings of abolitionism, African American antislavery activists insisted that if America was to be a truly egalitarian republic, abolitionists needed to fight, not only for the end of slavery, but also for the civic and political empowerment of free African Americans. During the rise of political abolitionism during the 1840s and 1850s, many African American abolitionists called for the franchise to be extended to African American men. All too often treated as second-class citizens within white-led antislavery organizations, black male abolitionists insisted that they needed the vote if they were to be treated as equals both within antislavery circles and within American society as a whole.

The 1840s witnessed not only an increasing emphasis on politics within the abolitionist community, but also the birth of an organized woman's rights movement, which, among other demands, called for female suffrage. In July 1848, in Seneca Falls, New York, a group of women (and a few men) assembled to hold the first woman's rights convention in the United States. At this convention, organizers called for full voting rights for women, a radical move that was widely ridiculed by the popular press of the day. Despite the powerful hostility that woman's rights advocates faced in the decades leading up to the Civil War, they persisted in holding conventions, and boldly insisting on women's right to the franchise, throughout the 1850s. Although the formal woman's rights movement was dominated by both white women and African American women, the needs of African American women and concerns were all too often marginalized within woman's rights circles. Nonetheless, African American female activists were among the most powerful and persuasive voices in early struggles for female suffrage.

Much like white suffragists, many African American suffragists came to the woman's rights movement through their involvement in abolitionism. Antislavery activists Margaretta Forten, Frances E. Watkins Harper, and Harriet Forten Purvis, for example, were all deeply involved in female antislavery societies and abolitionist activism before the Civil War and ardent supporters of female suffrage after it. Pioneering educator, author, and newspaper editor Mary Ann Shadd Cary consistently blended abolitionist, civil rights, and prosuffrage rhetoric in her newspaper the Provincial Freeman during the 1850s. Shadd Cary joined the National Woman's Suffrage Association after the Civil War, advocating female suffrage both in the United States and Canada. Perhaps the most famous abolitionist and suffragist of the pre-Civil War era was Sojourner Truth, the formerly enslaved orator and activist who electrified the North with her eloquent speeches during the 1840s and 1850s. In a world in which white suffragists all too often ignored the claims of African American women, and African American men all too often prioritized the political empowerment of men over the needs of African American women, Truth insisted that securing full political rights for African American women would be a vital part of achieving the free and egalitarian America that all abolitionists and suffragists ostensibly longed for.

In 1865, America's long and bloody Civil War came to an end, leaving the shattered and bleeding nation to rebuild its society anew. In the 1860s and 1870s, Americans fiercely debated what this "brave new world," in which slavery had been abolished and millions of formerly enslaved Americans were suddenly free, ought to look like. One of the bitterest and most divisive of these discussions centered on questions of suffrage. It seemed plausible to many former abolitionists that widespread respect for African American men's valiant military service in the Union army during the war might make the white public receptive, for the first time in American history, to giving black men the right to vote. Abolitionists such as Frederick Douglass passionately insisted that it was the "Negro's hour": a rare and precious chance for black men to seize the political rights that had been denied to them for so long. Although Douglass was himself a staunch supporter of woman's suffrage, he was firmly convinced that the enfranchisement of black men would be a vital part of rebuilding the postwar South, and securing newly liberated slaves' rights in the American government.

Some female suffragists agreed with Douglass's line of reasoning. Although devoted to securing votes for women in the future, female suffragists such as Frances E. Watkins Harper felt that enfranchising African American men first would best serve the interests of the African American community as a whole. Facing a violent, tumultuous South, inhabited by former slaveowners eager to preserve their dominance in southern society, suffragists such as Harper called for immediately granting African American men the franchise, so that African American men could vote for policies and elect officials who would protect their interests and preserve their rights. Other female suffragists, however, insisted that it was of vital importance that activists push for the simultaneous enfranchisement of African American men and all women, lest they never again be presented with such a remarkable opportunity. Sojourner Truth was a powerful voice in favor of universal suffrage in the years immediately after the Civil War, insisting that to give black men, but not black women, the vote, would establish dangerous inequalities within the African American community. "There is a great deal of stir about colored men getting their rights," Truth affirmed in one speech, "but not a word about the colored women; and if colored men get their rights, and colored women not theirs, the colored men will be masters over the women, and it will be just as bad as before.”

In 1869, two national suffrage movements were founded, each organization taking a different side on the question of African American male suffrage. The National Woman’s Suffrage Association (NWSA) (led by white suffragists Susan B. Anthony and Elizabeth Cady Stanton) focused on the enfranchisement of women, and the American Woman’s Suffrage Association (AWSA) (led by white abolitionists Lucy Stone and Henry Blackwell) called for the enfranchisement of African American men first, and all women second. African American female suffragists joined both organizations, although slightly more activists became part of AWSA than they did NWSA. One year after the founding of NWSA and AWSA, the Fifteenth Amendment was passed, giving African American men the right to vote. So bitter was the spilt between NWSA and AWSA that the two organizations did not reunite in the wake of the Fifteenth Amendment’s passage, despite their common goal of securing voting rights for all American women. Although neither organization prioritized the needs of African American women, NWSA especially distanced itself from its roots in the abolitionist movement and struggles for African American civil rights. Stanton and Anthony accepted money from George Francis Train, a wealthy businessman prone to airing his racist views, in order to fund their suffrage newspaper, the Revolution. Stanton and Anthony themselves increasingly incorporated nativist and anti-African American rhetoric into their suffrage speeches and writings, lamenting that “ignorant” men should have been given the vote before white, middle- and upper-class women.

Frustrated by their persistent marginalization within mainstream, white-led suffrage institutions, African American feminists often pursued their suffrage goals through independent, African American led organizations in the decades after the Civil War. One important site of African American women’s suffrage activism during the 1880s and 1890s were women’s clubs. In these clubs, middle-class African American women met to pursue intellectual self-improvement, to organize on behalf of less fortunate members of their communities, and to agitate for causes such as female suffrage and temperance. In 1896, representatives from African American women’s clubs across the country came together to form the National Association of Colored Women, under the leadership of prominent activists including Anna Julia Cooper, Charlotte Forten Grimké, Frances E. Watkins Harper, and Mary Church Terrell. Throughout the late 19th century and early 20th centuries, the NACW was a powerful force for African American women’s suffrage in American society.

In 1890, the formerly feuding NWSA and AWSA reunited to become the National American Woman’s Suffrage Association (NAWSA). African American female suffragists continued to work within and alongside the predominantly white NAWSA, but they faced persistent marginalization and discrimination within the organization. Between 1890 and 1920, NAWSA increased its efforts to draw white southern women into the suffrage cause. These white southern suffragists often used racist rhetoric in making their arguments for votes for women, insisting that if white southern women were granted the franchise, they could counteract the “pernicious” effect that African American male voters had allegedly had on southern society. (What would become of black southern female voters in this scenario was left deliberately vague.) African American women faced similar difficulties in seeking to become fully involved in other white-dominated, prosuffrage organizations such as the Women’s Christian Temperance Union (WCTU). Although some white WCTU leaders, such as Amelia Bloomer, advocated the full integration of African American women into the WCTU’s efforts to secure the vote for women and combat alcohol abuse, most WCTU chapters remained decidedly segregated along racial lines.

In the 1910s, a younger, more radical contingent arose within the suffrage movement, which argued that American suffragists ought to follow the example of their British counterparts and use dramatic, and even violent, means to secure their suffrage goals. Led by two white suffragists, Alice Paul and Lucy Burns, in 1913, this faction of the movement organized a huge suffrage parade, the same day as Woodrow Wilson’s inauguration as president. Eager not to offend white southern suffragists, Paul and Burns informed African American suffragists that, although they might participate in the parade, they would need to march in a segregated group at the back of the procession. Some African American suffragists, including Mary Church Terrell, agreed to this restriction; but others, including suffragist and antilynching advocate Ida B. Wells-Barnett, refused to comply with the order. On the day of the parade,

Wells-Barnett and several of her African American female suffragist colleagues waited in the crowd, and then marched out into the middle of the designated “whites only” part of the parade, where they remained for the duration of the event. In part because of the dramatic theatrics, violent protests, and sustained hunger strikes of militant suffragists during the 1910s, female suffrage was finally granted when the Nineteenth Amendment was passed on August 26, 1920.

Although the Nineteenth Amendment made the enfranchisement of all American women the law of the land, much like the Fifteenth Amendment before it, for many decades, the Nineteenth Amendment did not truly benefit African Americans. In the decades after 1920, African American women and men who sought to exercise their voting rights, especially in the South, were barred from casting their ballots by a brutal, systematic campaign of violence and intimidation waged by white supremacists. One of the central goals of the Civil Rights movement of the 1950s and 1960s was to make the promises of the Fifteenth Amendment and the Nineteenth Amendment a reality for African Americans across the United States. Female civil rights activists such as Ella Baker, Fannie Lou Hamer, and Ann Moody fearlessly denounced the bigotry and violence of whites who forcibly sought to prevent African Americans from voting, and, in the face of sustained, violent attacks, they went to the South to register new African American voters. Although America’s contemporary political scene is far from ideal, with voters of color (particularly economically disadvantaged voters of color) facing significant obstacles to the full exercise of the franchise, the tireless efforts and courageous sacrifices of generations of African American suffragists has nonetheless helped to move American government and society closer to realizing their promise of being truly free, democratic, and representative.

See also: Cary, Mary Ann Shadd; Cooper, Anna Julia; Douglass, Frederick; Fifteenth Amendment; Liberty Party; National Association of Colored Women; Smith, Gerrit; Terrell, Mary Church; Truth, Sojourner; Wells-Barnett, Ida

Holly M. Kent

Bibliography

Gilmore, Glenda Elizabeth. Gender and Jim Crow: Women and the Politics of White Supremacy in North Carolina, 1896–1920. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1996.

Gordon, Ann, and Bettye Collier-Thomas, eds. African-American Women and the Vote, 1835–1965. Amherst: University of Massachusetts Press, 1997.

Terborg-Penn, Rosalyn. African-American Women in the Struggle for the Vote, 1850–1920. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1998.

Talented Tenth

The term “talented tenth” was coined in 1896 by the Reverend Henry L. Morehouse, who envisioned a class of erudite and upright African Americans emerging as a vanguard for the black community. But it was W. E. B. Du Bois (1868–1963) who gave this theory prominence. In 1903, Du Bois published his classic manifesto, “The Talented Tenth.” The theory was simple yet profound: Cultivate the talents of the best and brightest African Americans and they will advance the interests of all black Americans. Du Bois proposed: “Men of America . . . The Talented Tenth of the Negro race must be made leaders of thought and missionaries of culture among their people. No others can do this work and the Negro colleges must train men for it. The Negro race, like all other races, is going to be saved by its exceptional men” (156–57). These remarkable men held promise. But would they fulfill it? Du Bois reflected on this question for 45 years before he substantially modified his theory.

His theory was the product of his own experience. In 1900, Du Bois was struck by the plight of his people: “American Negroes were an inferior caste, were frequently lynched and robbed, widely disfranchised, and usually segregated in the main areas of life.” Then came his vision: “I looked upon them and saw salvation through intelligent leadership; as I said, through a Talented Tenth. And for this intelligence I argued we needed college-trained men” (“The Talented Tenth: Memorial Address”). As part of this process of mutual, social “salvation,” Du Bois was the talented tenth’s living exemplar, embodying all of its ideals. As a strategy for racial advancement, a critical mass of highly educated blacks could theoretically produce a sea change in the collective destiny of all African Americans. At the other end of the social spectrum was the “submerged tenth,” an underclass of “criminals, prostitutes and loafers” (The Philadelphia Negro, p. 311).

Critics tasked Du Bois for placing too great an emphasis on the educated elite—those who today are occasionally nicknamed “blackademics.” Pilloried by black radical Hubert Harrison as the “Subsidized Sixth,” the talented tenth theory was supported in principle by no less than Alain Locke—W. E. B. Du Bois’s intellectual equal and sometimes rival—who later became the first African American president of the American Association for Adult Education in 1945. This is a prime instance of a member of the talented tenth effecting a change in the fortunes of African Americans. In this case, Locke touched the lives of all Americans receiving adult education under the institutional auspices of the American Association for Adult Education.

Speaking of the talented tenth, Du Bois wrote: “Can the masses of the Negro people be in any possible way more quickly raised than by the effort and example of this aristocracy of talent and character? . . . There can be but one answer: the best and most capable of their youth must be schooled in the colleges and universities of the land” (The Autobiography of W. E. B. Du Bois, pp. 139–40). This implied some opposition to Booker T. Washington’s emphasis on industrial training for racial economic independence and his policy of quiescent accommodation as well. Eschewing “industrialism drunk with its vision of success” (The Autobiography of W. E. B. Du Bois, p. 149), Du Bois was careful to say that “these two theories of Negro progress were not absolutely contradictory” (The Autobiography of W. E. B. Du Bois, p. 236).

Later in life, Du Bois refined his theory. In August 1948, Du Bois delivered his “The Talented Tenth Memorial Address” at Wilberforce University to an audience of distinguished African Americans (representing the talented tenth), to whom he said: “My Talented Tenth must be more than talented, and work not simply as individuals. Its passport to leadership . . . would be its willingness to sacrifice and plan for such economic revolution in industry and just distribution of wealth, as would make the rise of our group possible” (The Autobiography of W. E. B. Du Bois, p. 163). Then, transcending this Marxist agenda, Du Bois spoke of the “Guiding Hundredth” (The Autobiography of W. E. B. Du Bois, pp. 177), which was his “new idea for a Talented Tenth” (The Autobiography of W. E. B. Du Bois, p. 168).

The “guiding hundredth” was to be a “group-leadership, not simply educated and self-sacrificing, but with a clear vision of present world conditions and dangers, and conducting American Negroes to alliance with culture groups in Europe, America, Asia and Africa, and looking toward a new world culture” (The Autobiography of W. E. B.

Du Bois, p. 168). The “guiding hundredth” would be open-ended, capable of forming alliances with other groups and races, including whites. This doctrine democratizes and internationalizes Du Bois’s strategy for racial advancement by placing it in a global context. Numerically narrower yet strategically broader, the “guiding hundredth” represents the evolution of Du Bois’s original theory of the “talented tenth.” In 1996, Henry Louis Gates Jr. and Cornel West reflected on the significance of Du Bois’s theory of the talented tenth in The Future of the Race.

See also: Du Bois, W. E. B.; Historically Black Colleges and Universities; Locke, Alain; Washington, Booker T.

Christopher George Buck

Bibliography

- Battle, Juan, and Earl Wright II. “W. E. B. Du Bois’ Talented Tenth: A Quantitative Assessment.” Journal of Black Studies 32, no. 6 (2002):654–72.
- Du Bois, W. E. B. The Autobiography of W. E. B. Du Bois: A Soliloquy on Viewing My Life from the Last Decade of Its First Century. New York: International, 1968.
- Du Bois, W. E. B. The Philadelphia Negro. New York: Schocken Books, 1967.
- Gates, Henry Louis Jr. Appendix: “W. E. B. Du Bois and ‘The Talented Tenth.’” In The Future of the Race, eds. Idem and Cornel West. 115–32. New York: Knopf, 1996.
- Green, D. S. “W. E. B. Du Bois’ Talented Tenth: A Strategy for Racial Advancement.” Journal of Negro Education 46, no. 3 (1977):358–66.
- Locke, Alain. “The Role of the Talented Tenth.” Howard University Record 12, no. 7 (1918):15–18.
- Morehouse, Henry L. “The Talented Tenth.” Independent (April 23, 1896):1.
- Rabaka, Reiland. “W. E. B. Du Bois’s Evolving Africana Philosophy of Education.” Journal of Black Studies 33, no. 4 (2003):399–449.

Terrell, Mary Church

Mary Church Terrell (1863–1954) was a social and political activist and a champion of the women’s suffrage movement. Born Mary Eliza Church on September 23, 1863, in Memphis, Tennessee, Terrell was the product of formerly enslaved parents. Her father, Robert Reed Church, was the son of a Mississippi planter and one of his female servants. Terrell’s mother, Louisa Ayres, was a bondswoman who gained literacy while in the clutches of slavery. Once legally emancipated, Ayres opened a store specializing in hair products. Ayres's establishment served as a major attraction for affluent women of Memphis and allowed her to generate enough wealth to purchase a home for her family.

Mary Church, often referred to as "Mollie" by members of her family, was protected from the vices of poverty and hopelessness that plagued a large segment of the newly freed black populace of Memphis. Nonetheless, her maternal grandmother, Eliza Ayres, shared her recollections of the traumatic incidences of slavery with "Mollie." Because of her parents' divorce and her mother's subsequent relocation to New York City in 1870, Terrell was sent to Yellow Springs, Ohio to attend the integrated Model School on the campus of Antioch College. She was one of the few African American children enrolled at the school. At age 12, Terrell moved to Oberlin, Ohio to complete her high school education, and later enrolled at Oberlin College.

During the late 1800s, very few women, and even fewer African American women, were afforded a college education. Terrell was one of the first African American women to attain a college degree in the United States. One year after her graduation from Oberlin College in 1884, she began teaching courses in grammar, mineralogy, and French at Wilberforce University. In 1886, Terrell moved to Washington, D.C. to teach at the premiere Colored High School. In 1888, acting on the advice of her father, Terrell commenced teaching and moved to Europe to study. Her experiences abroad allowed her to briefly escape American racism and segregation. In Europe Terrell began to crystallize her personal mission toward liberating the darker race and women.

In 1891, after her return to the United States, the then Mary Eliza Church married Robert Terrell, a colleague from the Colored High School and the first African American to graduate from Harvard University. Afterward, in compliance with the social customs of the era for women, she permanently withdrew from teaching. During the late 19th and early 20th centuries, women were not considered to possess the aptitude or intellectual capacity for higher education. Consequently, many women were relegated to perform domestic duties. Terrell, thereby, receded to domestic work.

In 1892, Terrell shed the chrysalis of domesticity to engage in a myriad of social and political activities centered on elevating the status of African Americans and women in the United States. During this same year, she began participating in the antilynching campaign. She joined forces with abolitionist Frederick Douglass to petition president

Benjamin Harrison to publicly denounce lynching in a congressional address. Her involvement in the women's suffrage movement during the last decade of the 19th century, however, far exceeded her involvement in the protest of lynching, the southern convict lease system, alongside a number of other social ills.

In 1895, Terrell became the first African American and the second woman to serve on the Board of Education in Washington, D.C. Her position on the board allowed her to challenge unjust decisions proposed by the predominately white committee. In 1896, she became president of the National Association of Colored Women (NACW), which represented a merger of the independent clubs that existed among black women. Although Terrell used an integrated approach to resolving the issue of women's disenfranchisement, she scorned the discriminatory practices of the General Federation of Women's Clubs (GFWC), the national organization established by white women to improve the “situation” of women in America. Although the GFWC and the NACW sought to fulfill similar objectives to ensure the betterment of life for women, the NACW was also committed to improving the situation of African Americans. Terrell, being thoroughly engaged in the struggle to ensure equal rights for women, as well as racial equality for black Americans, was one of the movement’s most critical agents.

Mary Church Terrell, an African American suffragist, was president of the National Association of Colored Women and a charter member of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People. (Library of Congress)

Remaining dedicated to the struggle for racial equality, in 1909 Terrell helped organize the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People and became a charter member. Although her husband, who was a political ally of Booker T. Washington, discouraged Terrell’s decision, she abided with the organization and in 1919 became vice president of the Washington, D.C. local branch. Throughout the course of her life, Terrell made groundbreaking achievements and overcame great odds that many African Americans and women alike could not surpass. She is most remembered for her commitment to justice and equality for America’s 19th-century pariahs—African Americans and women.

See also: Antilynching Campaign; National Association for the Advancement of Colored People; National Association of Colored Women; Washington, Booker T.; Wells-Barnett, Ida

Talitha L. LeFlouria

Bibliography

- Giddings, Paula. When and Where I Enter: The Impact of Black Women on Race and Sex in America. New York: William Morrow, 1984.
- Jones, Beverly Washington. Quest for Equality: The Life and Writings of Mary Eliza Church Terrell, 1863–1954. Brooklyn: Carlson Publishing, 1990, from Darlene Clark Hine, ed., Black Women in United States History, vol. 13.
- Sterling, Dorothy. Black Foremothers: Three Lives. New York: The City University of New York, 1988.
- Terrell, Mary Church. A Colored Woman in a White World. New York: Ransdell, 1940.

The Birth of a Nation

The Birth of a Nation, released in 1915, heralded a revolution in American film-making, but its laudatory portrayal of the Ku Klux Klan and its thoroughly racist depiction of African Americans have subjected it to extensive criticism. Thomas Dixon Jr.’s novel and play The Clansman provided the inspiration for director D. W. Griffith’s three-hour epic, which drew enormous crowds despite an exorbitant $2 ticket price and nationwide protests by the NAACP. Fans included Woodrow Wilson, who screened the film in the White House and commented “it is like history written with lightning.” The Birth of a Nation takes as its subject matter the Civil War, Reconstruction, and “redemption” by the Ku Klux Klan. The film’s main conclusion—that Reconstruction was the most horrific experiment in the nation’s history because it elevated a naturally inferior race to equality—both reflected and helped shape the pro-Southern view of 19th century history that would dominate popular and scholarly thought in the first half of the 20th century.

The film begins when Phil Stoneman, the son of the “great parliamentary leader” Austin Stoneman (who is undoubtedly based on Thaddeus Stevens, a Pennsylvania Congressman and Radical Republican), visits Piedmont, South Carolina to stay with his friend Ben Cameron. News of Lincoln’s election, however, sends Stoneman back home to Pennsylvania to enlist in the Union Army. After the war, Col. Ben Cameron, wounded in battle, is nursed back to health by Elsie Stoneman, the Congressman’s oldest daughter. The pair fall in love and move to the Cameron home in South Carolina.

The onset of Radical Reconstruction, however, allows Northerners like Representative Austin Stoneman to seize power and institute a plan to “crush the white South under the heel of the black South.” African American enfranchisement gives the vote to a people entirely unprepared to handle it, like the freedman who proclaims that “ef I doan’ get ‘nuf franchise to fill mah bucket, I doan’ want it nohow!” Griffith portrays a Reconstruction government made up almost entirely of African Americans, who eat chicken, drink whiskey, and take their shoes off while the state Congress is in session, and pass a series of bills designed to ensure black dominance over Southern whites. Silas Lynch, Austin Stoneman’s protégé, a mulatto “drunk with wine and power,” comes to epitomize the danger of empowering African Americans when he is elected lieutenant governor.

In despair over the chaos, destruction, and perversion of the social order wrought by Reconstruction, Ben Cameron founds the Ku Klux Klan in an effort to reestablish white control. The film’s damaging racial stereotypes are especially apparent in the scene in which Gus, a black Union soldier, whose bulging eyes and foaming mouth make him look more like a beast than a man, seeks to “marry” (or rape) Flora Cameron, Ben’s youngest sister. The final montage of the film depicts an epic battle between the forces of good and evil, as the Klan, led by Ben Cameron, swoops into the city, restores order to the streets, rescues Elsie Stoneman from the clutches of the villainous Silas Lynch, saves the residents of a small cabin from an attack by crazed African Americans, and finally puts an end to Reconstruction by keeping blacks from voting in the next election. The film ends with a double honeymoon, as Ben Cameron and Elsie Stoneman get married, along with their younger siblings Margaret and Phil. The weddings represent a reunion of North and South under a banner of white supremacy.

The portrayal of African Americans in The Birth of a Nation is one of the most egregious examples of overt racism in cinematic history. Reflecting and enlarging prevailing Southern stereotypes around the turn of the century, the film’s black characters (all of whom are played by white actors in black face) are portrayed either as hopelessly childlike and naïve, or as violent, criminal, lustful brutes with uncontrollable passions and unspeakable desires. Griffith’s racism had a political and historical purpose, however. African Americans are not portrayed as innately depraved; it is the addition of political equality and social power during Reconstruction that accounts for their dangerous and destructive behavior, and it is this power and equality that the Klan seeks to end. Early in the film, the Cameron’s slaves are happy and faithful to their masters. It is Lynch, who has been elected to office, and Gus, who has served in the Union army, who come to represent the dark side of black equality. The film’s portrayal of rioting and violent African Americans, therefore, attests to the dangers of a society in which the proper racial hierarchy has been inverted and seeks to justify the segregated and oppressed status of African Americans in the 1915 South.

Perhaps the most interesting historical contribution of The Birth of a Nation is its visual encapsulation of the racial worldview of white Southerners in the late 19th and early 20th century. The film’s idealization of antebellum Southern society, its antipathy toward Reconstruction, and its disturbing obsession with black sexuality and white female purity reflect the lines of thought that allowed black disfranchisement, lynching, and the rise of a Jim Crow South between 1890 and 1910. While it is of little use as a history of Reconstruction, The Birth of a Nation remains a fascinating primary source, which speaks to the nature of racism in the early 20th century and the manner in which history may be mobilized to justify oppression in the present.

See also: Ku Klux Klan; Lynching; White Supremacy

K. Stephen Prince Jr.

Bibliography

- Blight, David. Race and Reunion: The Civil War in American Memory. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 2001.
- Chadwick, Bruce. The Reel Civil War: Mythmaking in American Film. New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 2001.
- Dixon, Thomas Jr. The Clansman: An Historical Romance of the Ku Klux Klan. Lexington: The University Press of Kentucky, 1970.
- Lang, Robert. The Birth of a Nation (Rutgers Films in Print). New Brunswick, NJ: Rutgers University Press, 1994.

The Elevator

Founded by Philip Alexander Bell in 1865, The Elevator became one of the longest published African American newspapers of the 19th century. This “weekly journal of progress” reported on current events, American politics, science, and the arts for more than 40 years. Prominently displayed on the masthead, the motto of the newspaper expressed its chief concern: “Equality before the Law.” Bell planned to use the newspaper in the pursuit of social and political equality for African Americans. Under his leadership, The Elevator became one of the most widely read and influential black newspapers in California.

Bell, along with Peter Anderson, founded The Pacific Appeal in 1862, but a disagreement between the two over editorial policy prompted Bell to create The Elevator as a rival newspaper in 1865. Bell envisioned that The Elevator would serve as a venue for blacks to publicly enter the political debate over enfranchisement. Five influential black Californians who served on the Executive Committee of the California State Convention of Colored Citizens supported Bell’s plans. These five made up The Elevator’s Publishing Committee: William H. Yates, James R. Starkey, R. A. Hall, James P. Dyer, and Frederick G. Barbadoes. The paper’s prospectus stated that it was the organ of the executive committee, and will advocate political and civil equality to all American citizens. Bell and the committee wanted African Americans to be treated as Americans, not as a separate group.

Although the paper was based in San Francisco, it attracted a national readership, with published reports from communities across the country. The Elevator used well-known contributors and subscription agents. James J. Spelman, editor of The Baptist Messenger, was a regular correspondent using the pseudonym Private L. Overture. John J. Moore, the founder of San Francisco's first black church, regularly contributed editorials about the need for equality and self-development. William J. Powell served as The Elevator's corresponding editor. Robert Hamilton, the son of Abolition Times journalist Robert Hamilton, also served on the staff. David Ruggles, publisher of The Mirror of Liberty and The Genius of Freedom, served as the newspaper's treasurer.

Bell and the contributors hoped to persuade readers that blacks should be given the right to vote because of their patriotism and loyalty to the country that had granted them their freedom. When the mainstream papers were suggesting that blacks may take up arms against whites, The Elevator's writers tried to dispel such fears and downplay any militancy images. They argued that the country's underlying principles supported nothing less than universal suffrage. Indeed, hopes were high in October 1865 that an official petition to the California legislature for the black vote would be favorably received. The California State Convention of Colored Citizens met to discuss matters and The Elevator printed the proceedings. Unfortunately, the legislature refused to debate the issue. The national political scene also showed signs of increased disinterest. These discouraging developments were reflected in the newspaper's reduction in editorials on the enfranchisement topic.

Despite these disappointments, The Elevator continued to comment on political issues, and the Chinese labor question was no exception. Chinese immigration was rapidly increasing and Bell often spoke against it, claiming that the Chinese were taking job opportunities from blacks and lowering wages. The Elevator also continued to closely follow the California elections. In 1867, the newspaper endorsed the Union Party candidates and Bell discussed the various issues of the election. Bell had always been a supporter of the Republican Party, and this stance was clearly reflected in his comments. He was disappointed, however, that the Union Party did not directly address black suffrage in this election. When the Union Party lost the 1867 elections, Bell was concerned that equal rights would disappear from the political agenda.

Hope for the resurrection of the enfranchisement issue was raised anew with the election of President Grant. In the spring of 1869, Congress approved the Fifteenth Amendment, prohibiting the states or the federal government from using a citizen's race, color, or previous status as a slave as a voting qualification. Two-thirds of the states needed to approve the amendment, and Bell wanted California to be one of them. Once again, the topic of black enfranchisement dominated The Elevator, persuading voters to approve it. Updates on the ratification process across the country were regularly reported. Although California voters rejected the amendment, The Elevator was finally able to celebrate victory when the necessary amount of states did approve the amendment in 1870.

The Elevator had seen its major goal, black enfranchisement, achieved. The paper continued its mission to educate blacks about American politics, as well as commenting on specific reforms such as the need for equality in the educational system. Bell remained involved with The Elevator until his retirement in 1885. Although the exact date that the paper ceased publication is unclear, it was at least produced until 1898.

See also: Abolition, Slavery; Bell, Phillip A.; Colored Convention Movement; Republican Party

Donna Smith

Bibliography

- Dann, Martin E., ed. The Black Press: 1827—1890: The Quest for National Identity. New York: Capricorn Books, 1972.
- Goodyear, Frank H. "Beneath the Shadow of her Flag: Philip A. Bell's The Elevator and the Struggle for Enfranchisement, 1865—1870." California History 78 (Spring 1999):26–39.
- Penn, I. Garland. The Afro-American Press and its Editors. Springfield, MA: Willey, 1891.

Thomas, Clarence

Clarence Thomas (1948–) is the second black Supreme Court Justice in the United States. The second of three children, Clarence Thomas was born in Pin Point, Georgia, a small poor community outside Savannah that was given to freed slaves after the Civil War. He was born on June 23, 1948, to Leola and M. C. Thomas. His father abandoned the family shortly after Clarence was born.

After years of living in poverty with no indoor plumbing, Thomas moved to Savannah, Georgia, to live with his maternal grandfather, Myers Anderson, a religious man and self-taught entrepreneur. According to Thomas, this move proved to be a turning point in his life. For the first time, Thomas and his brother had an adult male figure and a comfortable home, with indoor plumbing and adult supervision. His grandfather enrolled Thomas in St. Benedict the Moor, a Catholic grade school that was started to educate poor African American children. Although Thomas had difficulty adjusting, this school pushed Thomas to excel and made him believe he could achieve great things as long as he worked hard. The stern hand of his grandfather proved influential in his life, teaching him discipline, the importance of an education, and hard work.

Because Anderson wanted Thomas to be a priest, he enrolled his grandson in St. John Vianney Minor Seminary, a Catholic boarding school, where he experienced bigotry for the first time. After graduating the seminary, in 1967, Thomas entered Immaculate Conception Seminary in Missouri to prepare for the priesthood; however, the prejudices there almost cost Thomas his faith. He was faced with southern bigotry from young men who were to be ordained as Catholic priests, something that troubled him. Ultimately, Thomas would enroll in Holy Cross College in Massachusetts. While at Holy Cross, Thomas worked part-time, participated in community service programs, and help establish the Black Student Union. In 1971, he graduated with an honors degree in English and soon thereafter married Kathy Grace Ambush who had his only child.

Thomas attended law school at Yale, where he had been accepted as part of an affirmative action program. To avoid being identified as the black student, Thomas often sat in the back of the class and avoided taking any civil rights courses. Instead he took business classes and studied tax and property law because he did not want to be labeled a civil rights attorney. This was his first experience, as he recalls, having the “monkey on his back,” being at Yale to satisfy some social goal, not because of his credentials but because of his race. It was at Yale that Thomas formulated his opinion against affirmative action programs because they helped more middle-class blacks and he was poor. After graduation from Yale in 1974, he accepted a position in Missouri to work in the Office of the State Attorney General John Danforth, a position that allowed him to work in the tax division. When Danforth won a seat in the U.S. Senate, Thomas became a corporate lawyer for the Monsanto Company and later went back to work as a legislative assistant for Danforth, who was now a senator.

In 1980, President Ronald Reagan gained an interest in Thomas when he attended the Fairmont Conference for black conservatives, and the Washington Post wrote an article about him. He was offered a job as the assistant secretary for civil rights in the U.S. Department of Education. Soon after, Reagan promoted him to chairman of the U.S. Equal Opportunity Employment Commission (EEOC) where he changed the environment of the agency. Under Thomas’s leadership the EEOC stopped the use of time-tables, numeric goals, and the use of trials that relied on statistical evidence of discrimination, a move that angered many civil rights groups.

President George Bush then appointed Thomas in 1990 to the U.S. Court of Appeals in Washington, D.C. In 1991, he was picked by President Bush to be the successor to Justice Thurgood Marshall, who had retired. There was widespread outcry by civil rights groups, particularly the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP) and the Congressional Black Caucus, against his nomination as an associate justice because of Thomas's opposition to affirmative action. Women's rights groups also opposed his nomination because of charges of sexual harassment from Anita Hill. During Senate confirmation hearings, which were broadcast nationally, Thomas denied all allegations. The Senate Judiciary Committee recommended him to the full Senate for confirmation and Thomas was confirmed by a 52 to 48 vote in the Senate, the closest confirmation vote in history. He took the oath of office October 23, 1991 and is the youngest member of the Court.

Clarence Thomas was seated on the U.S. Supreme Court in 1991. (U.S. Supreme Court)

Thomas is considered a conservative justice who attracts much debate. As a black Republican, Thomas is strongly supported by conservatives and despised by black intellectuals. Yet, Thomas argues that America should not expect blacks to speak in a monolithic voice.

See also: Black Conservatives; Congressional Black Caucus; Hill, Anita; Marshall, Thurgood; National Association for the Advancement of Colored People

Angela K. Lewis

Bibliography

- Foskett, Ken. Judging Thomas: The Life and Times of Clarence Thomas. New York: HarperCollins, 2004.
- Greenya, John. Silent Justice: The Clarence Thomas Story. Fort Lee, NJ: Barricade Books, 1997.
- Mayer, Jane. Strange Justice: The Selling of Clarence Thomas. Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1994.
- Thomas, Andrew Peyton. Clarence Thomas: A Biography. San Francisco: Encounter Books, 2001.

Till, Emmett

Emmett Louis Till (1941–55), was a young Chicago native whose lynching in Mississippi helped galvanize the modern Civil Rights movement. He was born on July 25, 1941, to Mamie and Louis Till. The latter died serving in Europe during World War II leaving only a ring with the initials L. T. At the age of five, Emmett was stricken with polio, which left him with a slight stutter.

In the summer of 1955, 14-year-old Till traveled to Money, Mississippi, to visit his great-uncle Moses Wright.

Because of the Supreme Court's Brown v. the Board of Education decision several months before, which mandated integrated schools, racial tensions in the area were volatile. Not long after his arrival, Till and some other teenagers visited Bryant's Grocery and Meat Market. Accounts of what happened have varied. Some say that Till whistled at store owner Carolyn Brant, which could have been misinterpreted because of Till's stutter. Others say Till said "bye baby" as he left the store. Four days later, Carolyn Bryant's husband Roy and his brother J. W. Milam threatened Moses Wright and kidnapped Till. Bryant and Milam were arrested for kidnapping Till and three days later, Till's body was found in the Tallahatchie River tied to a cotton gin fan. The body could be identified only through the L. T. initial ring. Bryant and Milam were later charged with murder.

Emmett Till's body was brought back to Chicago and newspaper photographers captured pictures of Mamie Till fainting. Till's mother decided to hold an open casket funeral and invited the press so that everyone could see Till's body. Tens of thousands of people gathered at the funeral. Jet magazine and the Chicago Defender published pictures, and local television stations aired funeral footage. Although black communities throughout the South had experienced lynching before, this was one of the first times that the aftermath was widely publicized. In addition to mobilizing the black community around civil rights, Till's lynching also had an effect on white northern journalists: it cemented the fact that the South was "worthy" of national news coverage.

Roy Bryant and J. W. Milam's trial began in Sumner, Mississippi on September 19. No black men or women of any ethnic background were allowed to serve on the jury. Although Moses Wright stood in open court and identified Bryant and Milam as the kidnapers, after 67 minutes of deliberation, the jury acquitted both men on the murder charges. A juror was later quoted as saying the deliberations would have taken less time if they had not taken a break. Outrage surrounding the verdict was published in newspapers all over the world including Belgium, France, and Germany. Moses Wright and Willie Reed, a black sharecropper who also testified against the men, fled to Chicago. Several months later Wright and Reed returned to Mississippi to testify on the kidnapping charges; however, the grand jury refused to indict.

In January 1956, Look magazine offered Bryant and Milam $4,000 for an interview with journalist William Bradford Huie. Milam went on the record and admitted to kidnapping Till and stated that they only intended to beat him. Because Till remained defiant, however, Milam forced him to strip and shot him at close range in the head. Huie later wrote a follow-up article that stated Bryant and Milam were ostracized by both the black and white communities, which put their stores out of business.

Emmett Till and his mother, Mamie Till Mobley. The 14-year-old Till was murdered by vigilantes in Mississippi in 1955. (Library of Congress)

J. W. Milam died in 1980 and Roy Bryant died in 1990, both of cancer. Mamie Till Mobley died in 2003 a few weeks before PBS aired a documentary chronicling Emmett's lynching. In 2004, Senator Charles Schumer and Representative Charles Rangel urged the Justice Department to reopen the investigation into Till's murder because of new evidence that suggested Bryant and Milam did not act alone. On May 10, 2004, the Justice Department and the Mississippi District Attorney's Office officially reopened the case.

See also: Jet Magazine; Lynching; White Supremacy

Lisa Doris Alexander

Bibliography

- Houck, Davis W., and Matthew A. Grindy. Emmett Till and the Mississippi Press. Jackson: University Press of Mississippi, 2008.
- Metress, Christopher. The Lynching of Emmett Till: A Documentary Narrative. Charlottesville: University of Virginia Press, 2002.
- Till-Mobley, Mamie, and Christopher Benson. Death of Innocence: The Story of the Hate Crime that Changed America. New York: One World, 2004.
- Whitfield, Stephen J. A Death in the Delta: The Story of Emmett Till. New York: Free Press, 1988.

“To Secure These Rights”

“To Secure these Rights” was a landmark report on civil rights issued by Harry S. Truman's President's Committee on Civil Rights on October 29, 1947. It provided information on the contemporary status of civil rights and made recommendations for appropriate legislation and measures.

Despite certain economic and social improvements during World War II, segregation and racism still dominated America's societal and political structures. In the light of the growing African American quest for racial equality, the South, in particular, wanted to reinstate the strict system of segregation and white dominance. Racial tensions and violence against blacks were increasing.

Initially President Truman was hesitant to actively enforce civil rights, fearing the exasperation of the South and an increased split of the Democratic Party. But appalled by the increasing racial violence, he personally intervened, and on December 5, 1946, established the President's Committee on Civil Rights.

The committee consisted of 15 members representing industry, labor, the legal profession, the South, and the African American community, as well as various religious denominations. Its task was to investigate the current status of civil rights of minorities in the United States and the ways in which current laws and federal, state, and local authorities could enhance and protect civil rights for all. The executive order mandated that all executive departments and agencies of the federal government cooperate. The committee held public hearings, sought evidence, and corresponded with private organizations, individuals, cooperating government agencies and local public agencies.

On October 29, 1947, the committee issued its revolutionary report "To Secure These Rights," which set out the general situation of civil rights in the United States, emphasizing the special position of African Americans. The report was divided into four parts. Part One, entitled "The American Heritage: The Promise of Freedom and Equality," laid out the American ideal of equality and freedom consisting of four essential rights: The Right to Safety and Security of the Person, The Right to Citizenship and its Privileges, The Right to Freedom of Conscience and Expression, and The Right to Equality of Opportunity.

Part Two, "The Record: Short of the Goal," outlined the existing shameful inadequacies of civil rights, highlighting the defective condition of the four essential rights including lynching, police brutality, the inequality of the system of justice, and the continuance of involuntary servitude. The disfranchisement of African Americans in the South in particular and the segregation in the Armed Forces were also listed as signs of the infringement of citizenship rights and privileges. The inequalities with respect to employment opportunities, on-the-job discrimination, education, housing, health services, public services, and accommodations were also noted. The report condemned segregation and the separate-but-equal premise as unfair and essentially contradicting the concept of American citizenship. Segregation had not only created unequal facilities and opportunities, but also hostility between the races. Only by ending segregation could the American society attain equal rights and racial accord.

Part Three, "Government Responsibility: Securing these Rights," pointed to the special role of government in safeguarding civil rights. It argued that the federal government could not evade its responsibilities and should take immediate action to guarantee civil rights for all. For moral and economic reasons, the United States was obliged to abolish the existing inequalities and segregation. It furthermore argued that the abominable status of civil rights would continue to adversely affect foreign policy interests and the image of the United States, specifically Washington, D.C. and its symbolic position.

Part Four, "A Program of Action: The Committee's Recommendations," suggested a broad range of measures to guard and expand civil rights and to end segregation. African American voting rights were to be protected. The report demanded the establishment of a permanent Fair Employment Practices Committee (FEPC). It recommended the reorganization, empowerment, and enlargement of the Civil Rights Section of the Department of Justice. In addition, it urged the government to establish a special section focusing on civil rights in the FBI, law enforcement agencies in the states, and a permanent commission on civil rights in the Office of the President, the Congress, and the states. The government was encouraged to enact legislation banning all segregation and discrimination on all levels and in all aspects of American society, including abolishing poll taxes, police brutality, forbidding lynching, and ending forced servitude. It demanded the end of segregation and discrimination in the Armed Forces and in all departments of the government.

The metropolitan newspapers praised the report, but the South mainly condemned it as inflaming racial hatred. The African American community welcomed the report, but most were skeptical about what real impact the report would have on African Americans.

Truman considered the report a landmark, but did not initially address its implementation. He used the report as the basis for a civil rights message to Congress in February 1948. It also led him to issue executive orders integrating of the Armed Forces and ending of discrimination in the civil services.

See also: Cold War and Civil Rights; National Association for the Advancement of Colored People; White, Walter

Christine Knauer

Bibliography

- Berman, William C. The Politics of Civil Rights in the Truman Administration. Columbus: The Ohio State University Press, 1970.
- Billington, Monroe. "Civil Rights, President Truman and the South," The Journal of Negro History 58 (1973):127–39.
- Gardner, Michael R. Truman and Civil Rights: Moral Courage and Political Risks. Carbondale: Southern Illinois University Press, 2002.
- McCoy, Donald R., and Richard T. Ruetten. Quest and Response: Minority Rights in the Truman Administration. Lawrence: University Press of Kansas, 1973.
- United States. President's Committee on Civil Rights, To Secure these Rights: The Report of the Civil Rights Committee on Civil Rights. New York: Simon and Schuster, 1947.

Trotter, William Monroe

William Monroe Trotter (1872–1934) was a newspaper publisher, a radical civil rights activist, and a critic of Booker T. Washington and his accommodationist approach to white racism. He was born in Springfield Township, Ohio, on April 7, 1872, the son of James Monroe and Virginia Isaacs Trotter. His father, who was recorder of deeds for Washington, D.C. under President Grover Cleveland, was also the author of an 1878 book and a former Union soldier who had enlisted in the famous 55th Massachusetts Regiment under the command Colonel Thomas Wentworth Higginson. William Monroe Trotter was a child of privilege, as he grew up in a mostly white neighborhood in Boston. In 1890, he graduated from the Hyde Park High School as class president and valedictorian of his class. In 1891, Trotter entered Harvard and, because of his academic acumen, he received the coveted Prize Deturs and was elected to Phi Beta Kappa in his junior year—the first African American student to do so in the history of the school. He graduated magna cum laude from Harvard University in 1895 and continued his education, earning his MA in 1896 before returning to Boston. He became a real estate broker, engaged in political activities for the Republican Party, and was married on June 27, 1899, to Geraldine Louise Pindell.

In 1901, Trotter and George Forbes, an assistant librarian at the West End Branch of the Boston Public Library, founded the Boston Guardian, a weekly publication that gave voice to Trotter's opposition to the powerful sway of Booker T. Washington and that advocated, in radical and aggressive fashion, the full inclusion of African Americans into the American mainstream. Trotter and Forbes modeled their paper after William Lloyd Garrison's the Liberator, publishing the Guardian from the same building and even on the same floor as the Liberator. Even before W. E. B. Du Bois launched his infamous attack against Washington in the 1903 publication of The Souls of Black Folk, Trotter was publishing acerbic diatribes against Washington and accommodationist approaches to white supremacy in the pages of the Boston Guardian. In one particularly sharp editorial published on December 20, 1902, Trotter alludes to Washington's "cowardice" and labels him a race traitor for making conciliatory remarks about southern state constitutions that had ignored the Fifteenth Amendment by actively evoking fears of "Negro Domination" as a rationale for denying African American suffrage. Through his bitter and even satirical editorials, Trotter successfully conveyed the notion that Washington was, in effect, the voice of the African American collective who blindly agreed with everything the so-called Wizard of Tuskegee wanted.

On July 30, 1903, Trotter and a group of his supporters disrupted a speech that Washington delivered at the Columbus Avenue African Methodist Episcopal Zion Church in Boston. By constantly heckling the speaker and shouting questions that challenged Washington's ideological stances, Trotter and the actions of his associates created a tremendous amount of chaos, which later came to be known as the Boston Riot. As a result of his actions, and at the insistence of Washington's supporters, Trotter and two others were arrested. Trotter and Granville Martin were fined $50 and spent a month each in the Charles Street Jail when they lost their appeal in the superior court. This incident solidified the mutual disdain and animus Washington and Trotter would have for each other. Moreover, the so-called Boston Riot catapulted Trotter to the national stage.

In 1905, Trotter, W. E. B. Du Bois, and other prominent African American intellectuals and activists concerned with the various aspects of the black nadir—the brutal combination of disfranchisement, segregation, sharecropping, and racial violence—founded the Niagara movement. Although Trotter helped push Du Bois toward a greater militancy in his approach to civil rights, the two quarreled over tactics, with Trotter insisting that any national civil rights organization be led and financed entirely by African Americans. To this end, Trotter founded the National Equal Rights League in 1908. Despite his philosophical and tactical disputes with Du Bois, Trotter participated in the 1909 merger of the Niagara movement with the group of white progressives from Springfield, Illinois who founded the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP), although he continued to vehemently oppose white involvement in the organization.

A political independent, Trotter initially supported Georgia Democrat Woodrow Wilson for president in 1912. When Wilson's policies began to illustrate his unfaltering commitment to segregation and disfranchisement, however, Trotter turned against the president and personally confronted Wilson with his concerns in the White House in November 1914. After a heated exchange, Wilson ordered Trotter to leave his office after stating that segregation was actually to the benefit of African Americans.

In 1915, Trotter organized boycotts and demonstrations against D. W. Griffith's racist film, The Birth of a Nation, a film President Wilson had shown in the White House. Trotter led more than 1,000 people in a march on the Massachusetts State House in opposition to the film and its glorified depiction of the rise of the Ku Klux Klan. In 1919, to Wilson's great annoyance, Trotter announced his intention to attend the Versailles Peace Conference to push for inclusion of a racial equality clause in the peace treaty ending World War I. When the U.S. government denied him a visa, Trotter took a job as ship's cook and so secured passage to France. Although he failed to obtain a hearing at the Versailles Peace Conference, his trip and continued editorials in the Guardian won international publicity for the cause against segregation and white supremacy.

In the decade between 1920 and 1930, Trotter became increasingly radicalized and was actively involved in the Scottsboro, Alabama case, and petitioned for the release of the soldiers involved in the 1917 Houston mutiny. Although a lifelong political independent, Trotter became a staunch supporter of the policies of President Franklin Delano Roosevelt, seeing in him a humanitarian and someone who could potentially embrace civil rights as a means of strengthening the entire nation. Hit hard by the Great Depression, Trotter lost control of the Guardian in 1934. He died at the age of 62 on his birthday, April 7, 1934, when he fell from the roof of a three-story Boston building.

See also: Du Bois, W. E. B.; Houston, Texas, Mutiny, 1917; Niagara Movement; Washington, Booker T.

Walter C. Rucker

Bibliography

- Fox, Stephen R. The Guardian of Boston: William Monroe Trotter. New York: Atheneum, 1970.
- Harrison, William. "Phylon Profile IX: William Monroe Trotter-Fighter." Phylon (1940–1956), 7, no. 3 (1946):237–45.
- Lunardini, Christine A. "Standing Firm: William Monroe Trotter's Meetings with Woodrow Wilson, 1913–1914." The Journal of Negro History, 64, no. 3 (Summer, 1979):244–64.
- Puttkammer, Charles W., and Ruth Worthy. "William Monroe Trotter, 1872–1934." The Journal of Negro History, 43, no. 4 (1958):298–316.
- Schneider, Mark R. Boston Confronts Jim Crow, 1890–1920. Boston: Northeastern University Press, 1997.
- William, Jeremiah Moses. The Golden Age of Black Nationalism, 1850–1925. New York: Archon Books, 1978.

Tulsa, Oklahoma, Race Riot of 1921

On the morning of May 30, 1921, the Greenwood section of Tulsa was one of the most prosperous African American communities in the country. It had more than 6,000 residents, numerous businesses, lawyers, physicians, a hospital, a school, two newspapers, and two movie theaters. Two days later, on the afternoon of June 1, the community had been destroyed. More than 35 blocks had been burned to the ground; virtually every black person in the city was being held in custody.

The origins of the riot can be found in several places. First, the Greenwood community was becoming more self-confident and prosperous. Tulsa's African American community grew rapidly in the decade before the riot. Migrants came from the Deep South and from other parts of Oklahoma. They were drawn by Greenwood's prosperity and job opportunities. The weekly newspaper, the Tulsa Star, edited by A. J. Smitherman, fostered the community's independence. Each week Smitherman's stories and editorials emphasized racial uplift, pride, and the need to protect against violence. When a young black man was taken from a jail in Oklahoma City in 1920, for instance, Smitherman chastised the Oklahoma City community for failing to take more aggressive action to protect him. He wrote that citizens had the right to use force—including taking life—to prevent a lynching.

Smitherman and other leaders of the Greenwood renaissance met frequently to discuss the news of racial inequality and violence and to take action. For example, J. B. Stradford filed a lawsuit in 1910 to challenge his arrest for violating a railroad segregation statute. J. D. Spears, a lawyer, was heard to remark that every time he heard of a lynching, it made him want to get some more ammunition. Still other Greenwood leaders were veterans of World War I, who had fought in France and had seen how the world might be organized differently from the segregation and deference demanded by white Tulsans.

But as aspirations and expectations in Greenwood soared, whites expected a return to prewar patterns of deference and subordination. Moreover, white Tulsans feared the freedom of the Greenwood community, where in music halls blacks and whites danced and drank together. Thus when a sensational newspaper story appeared in the May 31, 1921 edition of the Tulsa Tribune, Tulsa was primed for a racial showdown. The article told of a young white orphan, Sarah Page, who was attacked in an elevator by 19-year-old Dick Rowland. By late afternoon, there was talk of lynching and Tulsa's black citizens were becoming alarmed.

A group of veterans decided to go to the courthouse and protect Rowland around 7 P.M. Once at the Courthouse, they saw an angry white mob. They also received assurances that the sheriff would protect Rowland. Throughout the night, groups made periodic trips to the courthouse to check on the progress of the mob.

By 10 P.M., when the white mob had not dispersed, several dozen veterans appeared at the courthouse. The leader was a man of whom it was said after the riot that he had come back from France with outlandish ideas about equality. Someone, perhaps a police officer, tried to disarm the veterans and when they refused, riot erupted.

Smoke billows over the African American community of Greenwood during the Tulsa Race Riot of 1921, which left nearly 300 people dead. (Library of Congress)

The police department deputized perhaps 250 men. One white man present that evening recalled that he was instructed to “get a gun and get busy and try and get a nigger.” (Reconstructing the Dreamland, p. 40) Back in Greenwood, people also got out their rifles and prepared for the attack. The police formulated a plan to disarm everyone in Greenwood and take them into custody. Most surrendered peacefully, but there were some pitched battles, and some who refused to give up their guns were killed. After the arrests were made, the mobs followed with looting, then burning. Civilization broke down in Tulsa on June 1. There were reports of cold-blooded killing of unarmed men and women; a man was dragged behind a car. There are many unconfirmed reports of airplanes dropping turpentine balls on Greenwood to speed the destruction.

The arrests were completed by about 10 A.M., and the burning and looting were completed shortly afterwards. Then units of the National Guard arrived from Oklahoma City and restored order. Over the next several days, Greenwood residents were released from custody, but only when white employers came and vouched for them. Many left town immediately for places like Chicago, Los Angeles, and Kansas City. Those who stayed on lived in tents for months until they rebuilt homes.

The city refused to accept responsibility for the riot or for reconstruction. The all-white grand jury that investigated blamed the riot on Greenwood residents. The city attempted to prevent rebuilding in Greenwood by passing a building ordinance that required use of fireproof material. That ordinance was struck down as an interference with residents’ property rights. Moreover, insurance companies refused to pay on fire insurance policies, citing “riot exclusion” clauses, and the city was immune from suit.

The riot was brought back into public discussion in 1997 when the Oklahoma legislature established a commission to investigate it. In 2001, the commission recommended paying reparations, which the legislature declined to do. Then in 2003, a legal team led by Charles Ogletree and Johnnie Cochran filed a lawsuit on behalf of the riot victims. The city argued that it was filed too late. The plaintiffs argued, however, that the Oklahoma courts were effectively closed at the time of the riot and for decades afterwards. As the riot illustrated, when Greenwood residents tried to assert their rights, they were subject to extreme violence. Moreover, in 1923, Oklahoma’s governor declared martial law to reclaim control of the state from the Ku Klux Klan. In March 2003, the lawsuit was dismissed. In dismissing the suit, the federal court acknowledged that the courts were unavailable, but it said that the plaintiffs should have filed their case when the courts became available again. Riot victims were left, once again, waiting for justice.

See also: Franklin, John Hope; Ku Klux Klan; White Mob Violence; White Supremacy

Alfred L. Brophy

Bibliography

Brophy, Alfred L. Reconstructing the Dreamland: The Tulsa Race Riot of 1921—Race, Reparations, Reconciliation. New York: Oxford University Press 2002.

Ellsworth, Scott. Death in a Promised Land: The Tulsa Race Riot of 1921. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University, 1982.

Turner, Henry McNeal

Henry McNeal Turner (1834–1915) was a bishop of the African Methodist Episcopal (AME) Church and one of the most influential and outspoken African Americans in the late 19th-century South. Turner used his position and pulpit as a means of actively promoting economic, social, and political reform. He is particularly known for his contributions to the AME Church, Reconstruction politics, black nationalism, pan-Africanism, and black theology.

Turner was born free in Newbury Courthouse, South Carolina, in 1834. His paternal grandmother was a white plantation owner, and his maternal grandfather was reported to be an African prince. He grew up in Abbeville, South Carolina, working alongside field slaves on a local cotton plantation. As a teenager, he learned to read and write while working as a janitor in an Abbeville law firm.

After converting to Christianity in his late teenage years, Turner decided to become a preacher. He was licensed by the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1853 and served as an itinerant, traveling and preaching all over the South. Turner married Eliza Ann Preacher, daughter of a wealthy free black family in Columbia, in 1856. Together they had 14 children, although only four survived into adulthood and only two outlived their father. Following Eliza's death in 1889, Turner married three more times, the last of which, at the age of 73 to his secretary, evoked considerable controversy.

Turner joined the AME Church in 1858 and studied Latin, Greek, Hebrew, and theology at Trinity College in Baltimore. In 1860, he moved his family to Washington, D.C., where he became pastor of Union Bethel Church. In Washington he became exposed to politics, and he developed friendships with leading Republicans such as Thaddeus Stevens, Charles Sumner, and Benjamin Wade. Turner was part of a group that lobbied President Lincoln to allow freedmen to enlist in the Union Army, and when the first black regiment was created in 1863, he served as its chaplain. He was with the regiment as it fought numerous battles in Virginia during the closing years of the Civil War.

After the war ended, Turner was appointed by President Johnson to a post with the Freedmen's Bureau. He moved to Georgia, where he split time working with the bureau in providing education, relief, and suffrage for blacks and organizing AME churches around the state. Encouraged by emancipation and the Radical Republican commitment to black civil rights, Turner was hopeful for racial reconciliation and equality.

Turner was very active in politics during the late 1860s and early 1870s. He was instrumental in organizing the Republican Party in Georgia, acted as the leader of black Republicans in the state during the Reconstruction era, and was a delegate to the state constitutional convention. In 1868, Turner was elected to the state legislature from Macon, but, along with the other black representatives elected that year, he was barred illegally by whites from taking his seat. Eventually seated in 1870 at the behest of the U.S. Congress, Turner lost his reelection bid the next year, in part as a result of white political fraud and intimidation. Afterward he blamed moderate white Republicans for not more actively speaking up on his behalf and for betraying black political and civil rights more broadly.

Because of his role as an active preacher-politician in the Reconstruction South, Turner's life was threatened by whites on numerous occasions. He avoided armed mobs by hiding in houses, woods, and a hollow log at one point. On one occasion he narrowly escaped the Ku Klux Klan, who assassinated his speaking partner in Columbus, Georgia, and sought to kill him as well. In Macon, the homes of Turner and Jefferson Long, Georgia's only black congressman during Reconstruction, were once protected by 150 armed blacks who sought to prevent white vigilantes from doing harm to their political leaders.

As Reconstruction ended and white terrorist violence continued unabated, fewer black ministers believed in the efficacy of politics, and the black church gradually slid into a phase of relative conservatism. Turner proved to be the exception to this trend, as he vocally denounced the leadership of both national political parties. He became particularly disenchanted with the prospect of African Americans in the United States after the 1883 Supreme Court decision invalidating the Civil Rights Act of 1875; a few years later, in a private letter he referred to the Court as "an organized mob against the negro" (Respect Black, p. 78).

By the mid-1880s, Turner was generally embittered by the nation's betrayal of the progress and promises of Reconstruction. He taught that it was providential that Africans were brought to America, which, despite the horrors of slavery, allowed them to embrace Christianity and learn the principles of self-reliance and the rule of law. In the context of political rejection and the tightening grip of Jim Crow, however, it became evident that blacks in America could never gain their full manhood, a subject that Turner often dwelt on in sermons and speeches. He even suggested that unless something drastic changed, racial extermination was inevitable.

Disillusioned by the loss of black civil rights and by the increased quantity and brutality of lynching in the South, Turner concluded that there was no future for blacks in America, and embraced African emigration as the only remaining strategy for African Americans. He was elected an officer of the American Colonization Society in 1876, and later helped organize the International Migration Society. During the 1890s, he was one of the most prominent black nationalists in the United States and the most vocal advocate of recolonizing American blacks in West Africa. He traveled to Africa four times in the decade, surveying emigration opportunities and building the AME Church on the continent. Although he made few converts to the cause of emigration, partly as a result of negative reactions of returned emigrants to Liberia, Turner's pan-African vision and support for colonization provided an important precedent for the more popular movement led by Marcus Garvey two decades later.

Turner was well aware that by the 1890s he was on the radical edge of southern black leadership. It was a position he relished. As opposed to Booker T. Washington and other southern blacks who were tied into the white power structure, Turner's independence allowed him to launch fiery diatribes at whites, to be publicly offensive in condemning Jim Crow, and to deride hypocrisy of both whites and blacks wherever he saw it. His endorsement of emigration can be seen as a black nationalist alternative to the accommodationist posture of Washington during this period, although the latter was ultimately more successful in achieving his aims. Turner urged blacks to arm themselves to defend their homes, their leaders, and their manhood. He criticized black participation in the Spanish-American War, saying that fighting to liberate oppressed colored peoples abroad was for naught, given the intensity of race-baiting and lynching back home in the United States. In 1896, he called on blacks to register a protest vote, and although he supported William Jennings Bryan's bid for the presidency in 1900, he came to consider himself a Prohibitionist rather a supporter of either major political party.

Throughout his period of political activism, Turner remained an energetic and effective missionary and institution builder for the AME Church. His efforts were rewarded in 1880 when he became the first southern bishop elected in the denomination. He was the first AME bishop to ordain a woman, Sarah Ann Hughes, as a deacon in the church. In 1885, he published The Genius and Theory of Methodist Polity, demonstrating his theological and ecclesiastical acumen. An active writer and editor, he also founded three church-related periodicals (although he often devoted their pages to political and social issues): The Southern Christian Recorder (founded 1889), The Voice of Missions (1892), and The Voice of the People (1901).

Turner believed strongly that the black church should play a prominent role in improving the embattled black psyche and self-image. In a way that offended whites and some blacks who were more committed to separate roles for church and state, he combined religion and politics, believing that both were ultimately concerned with freedom from bondage and that they could and should work together for the uplift of the race.

His belief in religion's function as an agent of social and political change was perhaps best revealed in one of his most controversial and memorable statements. In 1895, at a conference in Atlanta that helped lead to the creation of the black National Baptist Convention, Turner famously proclaimed that "God is a Negro." The assertion reflected a culmination of his previous teachings rather than a departure or radically new idea. In the 1880s, he spoke of black angels in heaven and forcibly denounced the notion that God was white and the devil was black. In proclaiming God's blackness, which he asserted as an ontological rather than strictly physical fact, Turner became the first prominent African American leader to directly confront the issue of God's racial identity rather than simply reflecting on his divine commiseration with blacks as an oppressed people, an idea that had existed since slavery.

Rather than merely protesting against the dominant culture of whiteness, Turner's rhetoric of God's blackness was a conscious and proactive strategy to uplift the race through the affirmation of a more positive self-image. Turner considered his discussion of God's color, which whites criticized as heresy, as a means to the end of racial progress and a testimonial to the dignity and even sacredness of blackness. He has thus appropriately been seen by some scholars and churchmen as an important predecessor to the black theology movement of the 1960s.

The last of the group of preacher-politicians with roots in slavery and emancipation who played a substantial role in the expansion of black freedom during Reconstruction, Turner was one of the most popular black leaders of the late 19th century, particularly among the black lower class that he came from and ministered to. Old age, an increasingly oppressive racial climate, and the growing conservatism of the black church all combined to marginalize him as a public figure after the turn of the 20th century. In his final years he traveled to Canada, helping to establish the AME Church there and ministering to blacks who had fled north of the border in the pursuit of greater freedoms. He died in 1915 in Windsor, Canada. Turner Theological Seminary in Atlanta is named in his honor, as well as numerous churches throughout the United States and Canada.

See also: African Methodist Episcopal Church; American Colonization Society; Jim Crow; Ku Klux Klan; Lincoln, Abraham; Pan-Africanism; Republican Party

Patrick Q. Mason

Bibliography

Angell, Stephen Ward. Bishop Henry McNeal Turner and African-American Religion in the South. Knoxville: University of Tennessee Press, 1992.

Cone, James H. For My People: Black Theology and the Black Church. Maryknoll, NY: Orbis Books, 1984.
 Redkey, Edwin S., ed. Respect Black: The Writings and Speeches of Henry McNeal Turner. New York: Arno Press, 1971.

Tuskegee Airmen

The Tuskegee Airmen were a group of black pilots who flew missions and escorted heavy bombers over Italy and Germany during World War II and set out to prove that African Americans could fly combat aircraft. Despite early setbacks, the experiment proved successful and, by the end of the war, they had earned 150 Distinguished Flying Crosses and Legions of Merit, lost 66 pilots killed in action, and did not lose a single bomber to German fighters during escort duties over Italy and deep in the industrial heart of Germany.

Since 1607, both free and enslaved African Americans have served America traditionally in the infantry or cavalry. Once their service was completed, African Americans were marginalized back to the fringes of society as second-class citizens. Yet, more than 400,000 African Americans served in the Civil War and each of the two world wars. Moreover, black soldiers who served in the infantry and cavalry were at an economic disadvantage because of a lack of technical training. The pace of technology changed rapidly during World War I. By 1918, the use of aircraft in support of infantry was an integral part of military strategy.

More pilots were needed. Institutional racism and quotas prevented African Americans from entering the Army Air Corps. A 1925 Army War College report suggested that African Americans were incapable of operating aircraft, undisciplined, unskilled, and did not desire to fly as whites did, especially in war. The report lacked evidence, but its findings were accepted by the American military. Nevertheless, American black pilots such as Bessie Coleman, Willa Brown, William Powell, Cornelius Coffey, John C. Robinson, and ace Eugene Bullard distinguished themselves in World War I while attached to the French Air Force. Despite the report, Walter White, secretary of the NAACP, pressured the War Department to allow African Americans to fly in the military.

Subsequently, black aviation clubs sprang up in the cities of Chicago and Los Angeles. William Powell started the Bessie Coleman Flying Schools. Black leaders and politicians pushed for all-black airports and airlines; however, the movement died because of insufficient funding, the lack of political support, and the Great Depression.

Everyone was hit hard by the depression, as 25 percent of Americans were out of work. Poor whites suffered but African Americans were hit harder because many were already living well below the poverty line and tried to join the military as a way out. But the military would only take a limited number of African Americans in unskilled positions.

As war winds swept across Europe and Asia, however, the time was right to effect changes in military policy at home. Two key events changed the fortunes of black pilots wanting to serve their country. First, in 1939, Wyoming senator Harry H. Schwartz pushed for Public Law 18, which allowed black civilian pilots to train under the Civil Aeronautics Authority. The passage of this law opened the door for black pilots in the army.

Second, the chairman of the Civilian Committee on Participation of Negroes in the National Defense, Howard University Professor Rayford W. Logan, pushed for raised quotas in the armed forces. Logan's efforts were successful, as the Selective Service Act of 1940 raised the numbers for existing black quotas in the military.

Combined with pressure from other black leaders, these acts of legislation led to the creation of an experimental black pilot program at the Tuskegee Institute in Alabama. By January 1940, and under direction of George L. Washington, chief of aeronautics at the institute, training was underway at Montgomery, Alabama about 40 miles from Tuskegee. The long roundtrip from Montgomery to Tuskegee prompted the building of a new airfield only 12 miles from the school. A closer airfield made for less weary pilots and increased training time.

In May 1940, the first pilots were awarded their private pilot's license and two years later five of these pilots were commissioned into the Army Air Force and were the first members of the 99th Fighter Squadron; Captain Benjamin O. Davis Jr. was placed in command. The newly formed unit was only five pilots strong and too weak to ship out and could not fly with white units owing to segregation. The 99th Squadron could only sit and await the graduation of more black pilots.

Pilot training was a five-week course and army brass wanted the best crop of black pilots they could get. Entrance requirements were strict and the first few classes had a 70 to 80 percent washout rate. For example, the second class of pilots entered with 10 men, but only 3 graduated. Typically, the average soldier in the first few classes held a bachelor's degree; some even had master's degrees. As wartime attrition drained human resources, however, entrance requirements became less stringent. As a result, by the end of 1942, enough pilots completed training to form four fighter squadrons collectively known as the 332nd Fighter Group and assigned to the 15th Army Air Force.

The Tuskegee Airmen at Tuskegee Army Air Field. The Tuskegee Airmen were the only African American Air Corps officers during World War II. (Library of Congress)

In 1943, however, just before the invasion of Sicily, the 99th Fighter Group became the first of the 332nd to leave for war and was sent to Casablanca. While there, the 99th received their new P-40 fighters and were visited by several noted dignitaries, Hollywood stars, and war veterans. A critical visitor was Lieutenant Colonel Philip Cochran of the famed Flying Tigers. Cochran lived and trained with the 99th in Casablanca, imparting invaluable lessons from his combat experience in China. He treated the black pilots with respect and as fellow Americans. Phil Cochran was highly respected and regarded by veterans of the Tuskegee Airmen until his death in 1980.

Leaving Casablanca in May 1943, the 99th moved to an old German air base in Algeria and placed in the 33rd Fighter Group under the command of Colonel William "Spike" Momyer who virtually ignored their existence at first. Shorthanded, the 33rd pressed the 99th into action against the island of Pantellaria as the invasion of Sicily loomed. The 99th scored early successes against German fighters and ground targets. The island soon fell, however, and the 99th turned to escorting bombers over the Italian mainland.

During these escorts, it was soon discovered that the P-40 was slower and less maneuverable than the German aircraft, but it could take more enemy fire and turn tighter than the FW-190s or the ME-109s. Despite the P-40s' disadvantages, the 99th successfully escorted several bombing raids and did not lose a single bomber to German aircraft.

With Sicily secured and a foothold established in southern Italy, the 99th moved to the air base at Foggia, Italy. Assigned to bomb in support of the assault against the virtually impregnable Monte Cassino, the 99th did not engage many enemy aircraft. Shooting down fewer planes than their white counterparts, the black pilots were perceived as ineffective in combat. According to journalist Ernie Pyle, however, the actions of the 99th at Monte Cassino were extremely successful.

Consequently, prewar ghosts returned to haunt the 99th as Army Air Force leaders claimed that black pilots lacked the guts, discipline, organization, stamina, and aggressiveness to be good combat pilots. The Tuskegee experiment was in danger as Momyer and Hap Arnold threatened to dissolve the 99th and have the men reassigned to a rear area.

In the midst of this controversy, Davis was sent home. While there, he went to the Pentagon to argue on behalf of the Tuskegee Airmen. He suggested that improper training, fewer pilots, more missions resulted in the 99th requesting more leave than their white counterparts. Davis also took responsibility as a unit leader, claiming he had been too conservative in order to protect the Tuskegee experiment. As a result, Arnold changed his mind and convinced Army Chief of Staff George C. Marshall to keep the black pilot program in operation.

In the meantime, the 99th was reassigned to the 79th Fighter Group and sent to the Allied airbase at Madna. The 79th was an independent unit that did not have specific combat duties. The 99th was in limbo and its future was uncertain. However, the 79th was led by Colonel Earl Bates and, like Cochran at Casablanca, Bates treated the black pilots with respect. Bates was a no-nonsense commander that expected the 99th to perform at its best at all times. While there, the 99th flew more than 500 missions in support of the British Eighth Army where their morale, stamina, combat aggressiveness, and confidence all increased.

Soon after, the fortunes of the Tuskegee Airmen would change forever. In January 1944, the 99th was given the full responsibility of supporting the American landings at Anzio. A fierce five-minute dogfight over the beachhead erased five months of disappointment as 12 fighters of the 99th engaged 15 German fighters, shooting down eight of them. These pilots knew this was the last chance they had to impress their detractors and they made the most of it. A few months earlier an article in Time Magazine criticized the 99th as an ineffective and incapable unit. After the Anzio landings, the magazine ran another story giving the Tuskegee Airmen their full support.

By May 1944, the other three units of the 332nd Fighter Group had joined the 99th in Italy. The 332nd was moved northward to Ramitelli airbase to escort Allied bombers over Germany. Striking at the industrial heart of Germany, these missions were dangerous but crucial to the war effort, especially after the D-Day landings in June 1944.

By this time the cumbersome P-40s were replaced by the sleek and powerful P-51 Mustang. Army regulations allowed pilots and units to paint nose art on their planes to personalize it. A supply problem resulted in a surplus of red paint at Italian airfields. Black ground crews painted the tail assemblies of the 332nd P-51s solid red. Thereafter the Tuskegee Airmen became known as the Red Tail Angels in the skies over Germany. And by the time of the German surrender in May 1945, the 332nd did not lose a single bomber to German planes.

After the German surrender, the 332nd Fighter Group and the inactive 477th Bomber Group formed the 477th Composite Group, which was deactivated in 1946. The 332nd was re-formed and remained an active unit until 1949 after President Harry S. Truman desegregated the armed forces. The Tuskegee Airmen proved successful. The combat success of the 332nd proved false any report that African Americans could not, or lacked the desire to, fly. And by 1946, the training program at Tuskegee Army Air Field under the command of General Noel F. Parish produced almost 1,000 black pilots.

See also: National Association for the Advancement of Colored People; Roosevelt, Eleanor; Tuskegee Institute; White, Walter; World War II (Black Participation in)

Jeffery Othele Mahan

Bibliography

- Buchanan, Russell A. Black Americans in World War II. Santa Barbara: ABC-CLIO Books, 1997.
- Francis, Charles E. The Tuskegee Airmen: The Men Who Changed A Nation. Boston: Branden Publishing, 1955.
- Holway, John M. Red Tails Black Wings: The Men of America's Black Air Force. Las Cruces, NM: Yucca Tree Press, 1997.

- Homan, Lynn M., and Thomas Reilly. Black Knights: The Story of the Tuskegee Airmen. Gretna: Pelican Publishing, 2001.
- Lee, Ulysses. The United States Army in World War II: The Employment of Negro Troops. Washington D.C.: Center for Military History, 1963.
- McKissack, Patricia and Frederick. Red Tail Angels: The Story of the Tuskegee Airmen of World War II. New York: Walker, 1995.
- Pyle, Ernie. Brave Men. New York: Henry Holt, 1944.
- Sandler, Stanley. Segregated Skies: All-Black Combat Squadrons of World War II. Washington D.C.: Smithsonian Institution Press, 1992.
- Wynn, Neil A. The Afro-American and the Second World War. New York: Holmes & Meier, 1976.

Tuskegee Experiment

The Tuskegee Study of Syphilis in the Negro Male, better known as the Tuskegee Syphilis Study, was one of the most reprehensible and controversial scientific studies involving human subjects to take place in the United States. The study was conducted from 1932–1972 in Macon County, Alabama. The blistering racial climate that characterized much of the Deep South during this period accounted for the exploitation of the 399 black men selected to participate in the study of untreated tertiary syphilis in black men. Because blacks were believed to be unkempt, unsanitary, and libidinous, the high incidences of syphilis among African Americans in Macon County was believed to have extended from these variables. The high rate of poverty and illiteracy made Macon County residents vulnerable to the exploits of the U.S. Public Health Service who provided long-term funding for the project.

Entrenched in scientific racism, the impetus behind the Tuskegee Syphilis Study was a desire to prove that syphilis had different effects on African Americans than on whites. Whites were believed to suffer more from the neurological complications of the disease in its latent phase, whereas blacks were believed to suffer from its cardiovascular effects. Late 19th- and early 20th-century scientific curiosities about certain physiological aspects of African Americans (cranial size as a measurement of intellect), in addition to blacks presumed susceptibility and/or resistant to certain diseases (pellagra, malaria) aided in the justification of the experiment. Thus when the syphilis epidemic struck in the mid 1920s, as a result of the prominence of the disease among African Americans, it was immediately coined a “black disease.” By 1932, when the study properly began as an offspring of the former syphilis demonstrations throughout the South, the medical community was wedded to the belief that certain diseases were racially specific in regard to their effects.

The Tuskegee Study, in particular, was a continuation of the Oslo Study conducted by Dr. E. Bruusgaard, chief of the Venereal Disease Clinic in Oslo, Norway between 1891 and 1910. The Oslo Study was designed to show the effects of untreated syphilis in whites. The primary justification for the experiment was to observe the effects of untreated syphilis in African Americans in an effort to juxtapose scientific findings with the former Oslo Study.

Macon County, Alabama was a gold mine for researchers who wanted to learn more about syphilis. In the 1920s, the U.S. Public Health Service (PHS), with help from the Rosenwald Fund, set out to perform syphilis demonstrations throughout the South. The demonstrations were intended to test individuals for the disease to get an estimated number of infected carriers. When the Great Depression struck in the 1930s, however, there was no funding to treat the subjects. Researchers did not want to completely abort their efforts, and alternatively sought to apply their efforts toward the examination of the effects of untreated syphilis on black males.

When the study initially began in the early 1930s, there was no reliable cure for syphilis. The syphilitic subjects in the Tuskegee Study were provided some minor treatment that consisted of mercury and salvarsan that was highly toxic and ineffective. The toxicity and unreliability of the early treatments were the basis for Public Health Service officials denying treatment altogether. Even with the introduction of penicillin during the 1940s, the study subjects were still denied treatment. As a compensation for their cooperation, the men were offered incentives such as free physical exams, transportation to and from the clinic, meals after examinations, free medical treatment for nonsyphilis-related illnesses, and the promise that burial stipends would be provided to patients’ families. Many of the men were unaware of the severity of their medical condition and were merely told that they had “bad blood,” a term that the population applied to virtually every ailment. Nurse Eunice Rivers served as the nurse in the experiment from its inception to its collapse in 1972, when Jean Heller of the Washington Star published the story.

Nurse Rivers was employed by the PHS to monitor the study participants. She was in many ways a cultural mediator, “bridging the many barriers that stemmed from the educational and cultural gap between the physicians and the subjects” (Bad Blood, p. 6). The study participants trusted Rivers and were unaware that she was partially responsible for their detainment. Rivers never openly contested the experiment and, to secure employment, conceded with the PHS and doctors’ orders.

Because of the Tuskegee Syphilis Study, the medical community has tightened up restrictions on experiments involving human subjects. Internal review boards have been established on college campuses and elsewhere to monitor the efficacy and legitimacy of such experiments. The enforcement of certain mandates and restrictions to regulate human experimentation has proved beneficial in preventing studies similar to the Tuskegee experiment. See also: Clinton, William Jefferson; Tuskegee Institute

Talitha L. LeFlouria

Bibliography

- Gray, Fred D. The Tuskegee Syphilis Study: The Real Story and Beyond. Montgomery, AL: Black Belt Press, 1998.
- Jones, James H. Bad Blood: The Tuskegee Syphilis Experiment. New York: Free Press, 1993.
- Reverby, Susan M., ed. Tuskegee’s Truths: Rethinking the Tuskegee Syphilis Study. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 2000.
- United States Commission on Civil Rights; Alabama Advisory Committee. The Tuskegee Study: A Report of the Alabama Committee to the United States Commission on Civil Rights. Washington, D.C.: United States Public Health Service, 1973.
- United States. Tuskegee Syphilis Study Ad Hoc Advisory Panel, Final Report. Washington, D.C.: United States Public Health Service, 1973.

Tuskegee Institute

---

The Tuskegee Institute is an African American school that opened in the Black Belt of Alabama in 1881. Through the years, Tuskegee played a critical role in the education of African Americans. Today the Institute remains a prominent school for multiple disciplines in Tuskegee, Alabama.

On July 4, 1881, the Tuskegee Normal and Industrial Institute opened its doors. Originally created to train teachers, the school developed over time into an institution to train the masses of African Americans. The education African Americans received at the Tuskegee Institute was different from that of most schools. Booker T. Washington, the first president of Tuskegee, promoted the school as an industrial, or hands on, education. At Tuskegee, African American students participated in practical training in homemaking, agriculture, mechanics, and other industrial trades. The skills and trades practiced at Tuskegee were those in which African Americans were commonly engaged throughout the South.

Tuskegee’s style of education received a lot of positive feedback from many whites, but some African Americans took were offended by it. While white students at other schools were gaining a literary education, African Americans at Tuskegee were concentrating largely on industrial skills and trades. African Americans at Tuskegee did study some academic coursework; however, the large majority of their education was based on practical training. Washington argued that the education gained at Tuskegee helped African Americans make a life and living for themselves. This consequently would allow African Americans to advance economically. Washington believed economic advancement would result in eventual social advancement as well. Washington’s opponents, however, claimed that Tuskegee’s form of education did not help to advance African Americans but instead further estranged them from their white counterparts. Southern whites who had previously fought against the education of African Americans came to accept the Tuskegee Institute because they believed the school taught and encouraged African Americans to accept their inferior economic and social status. The school was so highly praised by many whites that prominent white businessmen such as Andrew Carnegie and Seth Low donated large sums of money to Tuskegee.

Tuskegee was the product of a political negotiation made in 1881. Lewis Adams, a former slave, and W. F. Foster, an Alabama senator, negotiated a deal that resulted in the founding of Tuskegee. Adam had never received any formal education, but he was able to read and write, as well as succeed in various trades. Adams was a prominent African American in Macon County, Alabama. In 1880, when Foster, a state senator, was up for reelection, he sought the help and support of Adams. In turn for Adams securing the African American vote for Foster, Foster agreed to help Adams establish a school for African Americans in Alabama.

When Foster was reelected, he along with fellow legislature Arthur Brooks succeeded in passing House Bill

Laboratory at Tuskegee Institute in Alabama, about 1902. (National Archives)

165, which granted $2,000 to the creation of Tuskegee. The money was only enough to employ staff for the school. Consequently, the first year of classes, which began on July 4, 1881, was held in a church building. When Washington received money from the Hampton Agricultural Institute, he purchased an abandoned plantation and used it to build up a campus for his school. The students at Tuskegee worked over the next few years to construct the school themselves on the recently purchased plantation. Over the years Tuskegee continued to grow and flourish. The initial academic course work was on an elementary level, but it quickly expanded to the secondary level, and in 1923 added postsecondary study.

Tuskegee gained national attention thanks to its president, Booker T. Washington. Washington was president of the Institute until his death in 1915, at which time Robert Moton became president. Moton helped create the Veteran's Administration Hospital. Dr. Frederick Patterson followed Moton in 1935. Patterson created the Tuskegee Airmen flight training program. The all-black airmen were highly decorated World War II veterans. The group also is credited with advocating for civil rights and bringing the movement to the forefront.

In 1985, Tuskegee received university status. With more than 40 majors, the school is attended by thousands of African Americans every year. Thus the brain child of Lewis Adams and the project of Booker T. Washington has remained standing and has continued to prosper for more than 100 years. The school played an integral role in educating African Americans at a time when many whites did not support the idea. For this Tuskegee will remain an important part of African American history.

See also: Historically Black Colleges and Universities; Tuskegee Airmen; Washington, Booker T.

Mindy R. Weidman

Bibliography

Harlan, Louis R. Booker T. Washington: The Wizard of Tuskegee, 1901–1915. New York: Oxford University Press, 1983.
Thrasher, Max Bennett. Tuskegee: Its Story and Its Work. New York: Negro Universities Press, 1969.

Universal Negro Improvement Association

The goal of the Universal Negro Improvement Association (UNIA), an international organization, was the liberation of all peoples of African descent by developing economic self-sufficiency, cultural pride, political independence, and newfound levels of race consciousness, thus creating an international brotherhood among black people.

During his international travels, Marcus Garvey interacted with scholars, writers, philosophers, and religious leaders who helped shape his worldview, which was ultimately introduced to the world through his creation of the Universal Negro Improvement and Conservation Association and African Communities League (UNIA-ACL). The UNIA-ACL was created by Garvey while he was living in his native home of Jamaica in 1914. Shortly after his arrival to Harlem, the UNIA-ACL gave way to what would be known around the world as simply, the UNIA.

Unlike any other organization at the time, the UNIA championed a black nationalist approach against religious deceit contrived by colonial Christians to validate slavery, enduring psychosocial effects of European imperialism, economic deprivation, political disenfranchisement, and cultural suppression among Africans and African Americans around the world.

By July 1918, an original constitution and book of laws was developed as an instrument of governance and to maintain consistency among chapters. Within the core belief system of the UNIA, a comprehensive list of affirmations served as the critical framework for building racial solidarity. On a daily basis, members' actions were an outward manifestation of the belief system, which posited that rights of all men are to be respected, all races must work to preserve their pure lineage. God shall be the guiding force, interracial marriage will lead to the annihilation of the Negro race, development of an almighty Negro nation in Africa must be promoted, those of African heritage should always be proud, dominion of Negro women by whites is unacceptable, and racial separation serves as the optimal means to maintain cultural ideals.

From its inception in 1914 until the 1940s, the UNIA in the United States held active chapter membership in Ohio, Michigan, New York, Pennsylvania, and Illinois. Focused on fighting racial injustice and violence aimed at African Americans in the United States, the UNIA established networks throughout the country that focused on uplifting the race. Through partnerships with clergy from black churches, businesses, political leaders, and intellectuals who shared the UNIA vision, programs were instituted to provide social services, religious motivation, cultural integrity, political awareness, education, and gainful employment.

To resolve economic hardships endured by deprived and often uneducated poor and working class African Americans, the UNIA initiated collaborative efforts with labor unions that yielded financial benefits to the economically disadvantaged by balancing wages in skilled labor markets throughout the United States and Canada. Business owners unwilling to extend opportunities for employment to African Americans found the UNIA to be a formidable force through mass protests that encouraged people to stop spending money in businesses that contribute to oppressing the race. Auxiliary groups within the UNIA, such as the Black Cross Nurses and African Legionnaires, existed to further ensure that the overall needs of members were being met.

As representatives from more than 1,000 chapters convened from August 1, 1920 through August 31, 1920, the First International UNIA Convention was successfully hosted in New York City, which later became home to the organization's first Liberty Hall. With attendees coming from more than 40 countries, nearly 2,000 members were present, including regional delegates who shared updates regarding local membership drives, fundraising efforts, propaganda aimed at destroying the reputation of the organization, and community issues to be addressed.

Economic developments and effective strategies to alleviate rights infringements were important, but the most significant accomplishment of the 1920 Convention was the adoption of the Declaration of the Rights of the Negro

Peoples of the World, as presented by the organization's Supreme Executive Council or international leadership. Published in the September 11, 1920 edition of The Negro World, the declaration gave life to the organization's motto, "One God! One Aim! One Destiny!" In the declaration active members found solace and strength that not only guided but reaffirmed their shared belief in global racial allegiance.

After the success of the first convention, subsequent conventions and celebratory parades were hosted at Liberty Hall during August of 1921 and 1922. Along with the Constitution, Declaration of Rights, and core belief systems, the UNIA developed its own pledge of allegiance to be recited in the presence of the definitive red, black, and green flag. Within the pledge, members committed to lifelong service that would further the goal of liberation, unity, and knowledge among African descendants around the world.

International leadership of the organization believed that the race could one day shape international politics once a unified vision was established, disseminated, and adopted by all chapters. Worldwide strategic goals were set throughout international regions to best meet the needs left void by corresponding governments. UNIA chapters in Africa and the Caribbean focused on developing political participation among natives to overcome cultural inequalities established during European colonization.

In March 1920, efforts of UNIA leaders began to make the infamous "Africans for Africans" slogan ring true. Research and preliminary planning for colonization of Liberia, including provisions for economic, political, and social growth independent of European influence, was initiated. Consistent with steps taken in American cities, the UNIA planned to create an environment in Liberia that fostered a sense of empowerment among Africans and African Americans by building schools that incorporated an Afrocentric viewpoint into education, sustainable employment opportunities, social enrichment through cultural activities, and long-term health through universal health care initiatives. Enthusiasm toward the growing project was echoed by members in Africa and the United States. Carrying enlightened African Americans to Liberia, the S. S. Phyllis Wheatly was purchased as the ship to fully complete the "Africa for Africans" charge of the UNIA, but it was unable to do so.

To their dismay, UNIA organizers who tirelessly worked until June 1924 to develop and negotiate what would be one of the largest ventures for the organization were told that progress would come to a screeching halt in Liberia because of conflicts of interest. The Fourth International UNIA Convention in 1924 marked a shift within the organization as the Black Star Line was reestablished as the Black Star Steamship Company. In addition to reclaiming their most notable business venture, members of the UNIA regrouped from the disappointing news of the Liberia project by focusing on avenues to create political power. Establishment of the Negro Political Union was the organization's strongest effort to directly challenge the political disenfranchisement of the race on a large scale.

During the Fifth International UNIA Convention, the organization worked to continue its mission while maintaining a dwindling membership. Although resistance to the UNIA grew in some African countries, the organization achieved success in other parts of the world including Central America. Substantial efforts were exerted in the region to mitigate deplorable working conditions, substandard living accommodations, and political inactivity among inhabitants of African descent. Between August 1, 1929 and August 31, 1929, the Sixth International UNIA Convention was hosted in Kingston, Jamaica, which was the final formal convention. Beyond participation in their own conventions, representatives of the UNIA participated in international conventions hosted by organizations with similar goals including the International Convention of the Negro Peoples of the World.

By January 1918, Harlem was not only the headquarters of the UNIA but it also set the stage for the first printing of the weekly newspaper. Subsequent editions were printed and distributed to all members around the world in multiple languages. Through the publication and distribution of The Negro World, members of the UNIA were unified on a global scale as the messages often reinforced the organization's mission and goals. To increase awareness of the mission, local chapters relied on independent black-owned newspapers in Chicago, Egypt, London, New York, and other key cities where UNIA chapters were forming.

Within each edition, UNIA members published updated committee reports on membership development, fundraising efforts, business enterprises, and social programs. In addition to committee reports, the newspaper announced special events and world news that affected the development of the organization, and recounted details of regional and national conventions for those unable to attend. As the newspaper was the thread that weaved together the organization's international membership, opponents of the UNIA sought to destroy the unprecedented circulation of The Negro World by banning circulation and imposing severe penalties on those caught distributing the newspaper.

Weekly advertisements encouraging members and supporters to patronize African American-owned businesses were placed in each edition of The Negro World. The UNIA was responsible for developing its own economic independence through the development of grocery stores, laundries, restaurants, insurance companies, tailoring company, record companies, newspaper subscriptions, and sales of stock in the Black Star Line, all of which were advertised in The Negro World.

Differing opinions among members as to the future actions of the organization began to create factions within the group. At the same time, civil rights organizations whose focus embraced integrationist approaches to resolving racial issues gained national notoriety, which further added to the UNIA's membership crisis.

In response to increasing violence against African Americans in the South, Marcus Garvey believed that by reiterating the UNIA's goal of racial separation would deter violence inflicted by members of the Ku Klux Klan (KKK). Representing UNIA leadership, Garvey visited KKK headquarters in Atlanta during June 1922 but was unsuccessful in his attempt to find a solution to the racial hostility felt among KKK members. Coincidentally, as violence against African Americans continued in the South, the Atlanta meeting caused greater alienation among members who felt the organization was taking the wrong approach toward civil rights violations.

The Black Star Line was officially started on June 27, 1919 with the purchase of the UNIA's first ship named Yar-mouth. In its second purchase, the UNIA's Black Star Line was expanded to include the S. S. Shadyside. Following the success of the first two ships, the S. S. Antonio Maceo was purchased as sales of the Black Star Line stocks began to increase. Subsequent ships were named after world-renowned scholars who held differing ideological perspectives from UNIA leaders, but were nonetheless influential in the early stages of the organizations development—the S.S. Frederick Douglass and S.S. Booker T. Washington.

Revenue generated by sales of Black Star Line stocks initially supported activities of the UNIA, but income did not sustain the organization for long. Criminal charges filed against Marcus Garvey suggesting long-term use of the mail system to defraud investors in the Black Star Line cast the UNIA in a negative light among members and critics. Skeptics of the UNIA used the charges against Garvey as impetus to publicly diminish the organization's image by painting it as a racist cult whose national leadership contradicted its own goals of racial unity and empowerment.

Marcus Garvey's formal sentence to five years imprisonment caused UNIA members already disappointed with the direction of the organization to denounce their membership publicly. In December 1927, remaining members of the UNIA traveled to New Orleans to send off the organization's first leader as he was being deported to Panama. See also: Black Nationalism; Black Star Line; Garvey, Marcus; Ku Klux Klan; Moore, Queen Mother Audley; Pan-Africanism

Caroline M. Harper

Bibliography

- Akpan, M. B. "Liberia and the Universal Negro Improvement Association: The Background to the Abortion of Garvey's Scheme for African Colonization." The Journal of African History 14 (1973):105–27.
- Christian, Mark. "Marcus Garvey and African Unity: Lessons for the Future from the Past." Journal of Black Studies 39 (2008):316–31.
- Cronon, Edmond D. Black Moses: The story of Marcus Garvey and the Universal Negro Improvement Association. Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 1969.
- Garvey, Amy J. The Philosophy & Opinions of Marcus Garvey or Africa for the Africans. Dover, MA: The Majority Press, 1986
- Rolinson, Mary G. Grassroots Garveyism: The Universal Negro Improvement Association in the Rural South, 1920–1927. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 2007.
- Shelby, Tommy. We Who Are Dark. London: The Belknap Press of Harvard University Press, 2005.
- Smith-Irvin, Jeannette. Footsoldiers of the Universal Negro Improvement Association: Their Own Words. Trenton, NJ: Africa World Press, 1989.
- Stephens, Ronald J. "Garveyism in Idlewild, 1927 to 1936." Journal of Black Studies 34 (2004):462–88.
- Vincent, Theodore G. Black Power and the Garvey Movement. Baltimore: Black Classic Press, 2006.

Urban Ghetto

The term "ghetto" is an Italian word originally used to refer to those sections of the European city set aside for Jews. In the Middle Ages, Jews were heavily discriminated against, denied access to employment, and deprived of access to quality housing. The result was extreme spatial congregation and segregation into what ultimately became known as urban “ghettos.”

In the U.S. the rise of the urban ghetto is a recent occurrence. It describes the geographically isolated, run-down, and impoverished residential districts of the inner city where mostly black and Latino people are crowded together. Like their European predecessors, America’s urban ghettos are clearly demarcated spaces easily recognizable by vacant lots, abandoned buildings, and physical deterioration.

Almost all European immigrants to the United States spent some time in an urban ghetto, benefiting from the social networks, cultural comforts (e.g., language, food, religion), and protection against hostilities. Although outsiders saw the ghetto as a squalid, unclean, foul, tenement-ridden environment, for insiders, these were communities that provided much of what they needed to achieve the American dream and make the transition into the American middle class.

A number of factors converged to transform these early ghettos to the sites of high unemployment, social pathologies, and poverty they are today. One was the large-scale black migration north during the early 20th century. Segregation, discrimination, and racial hostilities were notable in the cities that experienced high levels of African American migration. Blacks, faced with restricted housing markets and job ceilings that blocked economic progress, experienced a similar spatial segregation as that experienced by Jews in Europe. As was the case with Jews and other early immigrants to the United States, often it was easier (and safer) to live among one’s own kind. Another factor contributing to the transformation of the American ghetto was the out-migration of the white population. Whites were willing to pay to live in areas with few, or no blacks. Once they became acculturated into American society and acquired the language skills and higher incomes, they were well positioned to take advantage of the opportunities offered them by the federal government and consequently fled the inner cities in massive numbers and moved to other places. This has not been the case with African Americans and Latinos who now occupy the areas abandoned by earlier immigrant groups. Although economically African American ghettos started out well owing to the high wages paid in manufacturing, continued high rates of black migration north combined with white flight to the suburbs resulted in an increasingly isolated black inner city population. Thus racism, discrimination in the form of institutionalized racial preferences, and exclusionary practices all converged to produce today’s American urban ghetto.

Like the ghettos occupied by their European predecessors, the early African American ghettos were safe havens where people worked together, played together, worshipped together, and were educated together. Unlike their European predecessors, however, African Americans and Latinos did not experience comparable opportunities for upward—and outward—mobility. When they did, they left behind a place with little or no moral and social leadership. The urban ghetto today is a site where conditions have worsened.

There are three explanations for urban ghettos: social, economic, and structural. The social explanation suggests that ghettos form in places where there are high concentrations of people who exhibit “pathological” behaviors. In the minds of most Americans, urban ghettos are synonymous with public housing and thus are viewed as receptacles for “problem” families. In this sense, ghettos are lifestyle choices made by individuals. The individuals and the areas they inhabit are characterized by high rates of unemployment, illegitimacy, family dissolution, welfare dependency, violence, school dropout, teenage pregnancies, alcohol, and drug abuse and crime. Accordingly, they are a product of social institutions and cultural values resulting from poverty and social isolation. Ghetto dwellers have few job prospects and for males in particular, participating in illegal activities (e.g., drug trafficking) becomes an attractive option.

An alternative explanation for urban ghettos is the economic explanation. It suggests that ghettos are the result of closed alternatives. It is discrimination in access or the inability to fully participate in the job market that ultimately produces urban ghettos. African Americans and Hispanics are in ghettos because their limited access to job markets restricts their access to housing markets. They cannot afford (or are not allowed) to purchase better housing elsewhere.

The structural explanation maintains that urban ghettos are areas that have experienced significant losses of jobs, businesses, and population. Although they are located near busy central business districts of most major cities, culturally, intellectually, and economically they are highly isolated, which in turn impedes opportunities for financial, employment, business, and cultural contacts with the larger community.

See also: Great Migration; Kerner Commission Report; Urbanization; War on Poverty

Rickie Sanders

Bibliography

- Anderson, Elijah. Code of the Streets. New York: W. W. Norton, 1999.
- Anderson, Elijah. Streetwise: Race, Class and Change in an Urban Community. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1990.
- Du Bois, W. E. B. The Philadelphia Negro. New York: Schocken Press, 1967.
- Frazier, John, F. Margay, and E. Tettey-Fio. Race and Place: Equity Issues in Urban America. Boulder, CO: Westview Press, 2003.
- Jencks, Christopher, and P. Peterson, eds. The Urban Underclass. Washington, D.C.: Brookings Institution, 1991.
- Kusmer, Kenneth. A Ghetto Takes Shape: Black Cleveland 1870–1930. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1978.
- LeGory, Mark, and J. Pipkin. Urban Social Space. Belmont, CA: Wadsworth Publishing, 1992.
- Spear, Allan. Black Chicago: The Making of a Negro Ghetto, 1880–1920. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1967.
- Wilson, Julius. The Truly Disadvantaged. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1987.
- Wilson, Julius. When Work Disappears. New York: Knopf, 1996.

Urbanization

Urbanization is a two-pronged process. For a society, it is the transformation from being rural and agricultural to being urban and industrial. For individuals, the urbanization process is behavioral and spatial. It involves individuals making the spatial move from the rural countryside to the city and once there, adopting new behaviors, attitudes and ways of seeing the world. As a geographical concept, urbanization is visible on the landscape in the form of large, dense agglomerations of socially heterogeneous populations, high concentrations of settlements and/or businesses, and a wide range of other specialized services and activities. In addition to its being a process that represents itself on the landscape, urbanization is also a social process resulting in cultural and behavioral changes (e.g., changing attitudes toward work, family structure, role of women, identity, and economic status). It brings about changes in lifestyle and psychology; and social, cultural, economic, and political thinking. To be fully realized, the urbanization process requires both the move across space and the adoption of new ways of viewing the world.

Over time, the United States has become an urbanized society. In 1800, only 6.1 percent of the population lived in urban areas. By 1990, that number had increased to 75.2 percent. The two explanations commonly given for this exponential increase are increases in technological know-how and industrialization. As new more efficient technologies were applied to the agricultural sector, more and more people became redundant; their work was no longer needed. The jobs they had done were taken over by machines. Thus they were “released” from farm work. Left without a means of income, they were pushed off the farm and pulled to other, larger areas that offered more opportunities for employment. At the same time that labor was being released from farms, demand for machine produced goods was increasing. Urban areas with their ideal locations, greater economic and social capital, and large populations were perfect sites for planting the seeds of America’s industrial revolution. People came in droves from rural areas and abroad in search of a life that offered more.

African Americans were a part of this. The migration of blacks from the rural south to the cities of the Northeast, Midwest, and West during the early 20th century has been described as the largest internal movement of people in the history of the United States. Between 1900 and 1940, more than 1 million African Americans participated in this mass movement. Early on blacks had begun to move away from the South. During the 1870s, large numbers of blacks left the South, seeking their fortunes in places that were familiar—rural areas in Texas, Kansas, and Oklahoma. By 1910, new destinations were sought and in what came to be known as the Great Migration more than a quarter of a million blacks converged in the cities of the Northeast, the Midwest, and the West.

The Great Migration created the first large, concentrated urban black communities in cities such as Chicago, Detroit, New York, Los Angeles, and Cleveland. During the 1910s and 1920s, Chicago’s black population grew 148 percent, Cleveland’s by 307 percent, Detroit’s by 611 percent. Although the migration slowed during the Depression, nearly one-fourth of all blacks lived in cities of the North or West by 1940. The move to the cities continued during and after World War II. By 1960, 40 percent of all blacks lived outside the South and 75 percent lived in cities. Between 1910 and 1970, the country’s African American population was transformed from a predominately southern, rural group to a northern, urban one. By shedding their rural, southern backgrounds, and embracing their new life in cities, African Americans created a new black culture, complete with music, language, dress, and art.

The movement out of the South and to the cities of the North was the result of push and pull factors. Push factors are negative attributes of the place of origin. They included lack of opportunities, poverty, and overt racism. Pull factors are positive attributes at the destination. They included the prospect of jobs, schooling, and socioeconomic mobility. The war years witnessed the greatest influx of southern blacks to the cities of the North and Midwest. Northern-based industries were experiencing loss of labor owing to military enlistments. Foreign immigration was slowed owing to restrictions placed on immigration, but demand for industrial goods was increasing. The result was a severe labor shortage in most northern and western cities. Blacks were available to provide the cheap, plentiful labor that was needed for the emerging factories.

African Americans' encounters with city skyscrapers, new technologies, streetlights, automobiles, and masses of people profoundly affected their behavior, attitudes, and goals. A few were energized by the new environment and were lucky enough to turn it into a new home with satisfying jobs, homes, and communities. Another small number never succeeded and either returned to their rural origins or resorted to a life of repeated disappointments. For all, however, it was clear that the city contained new kinds of segregation and that their hopes were not to be fully realized. The notion that one could climb from rags to riches was one of America's greatest myths.

For a time, the initial encounter with the city embodied all the promises of urbanization progress, economic security, culture, and hope. Despite its promise, however, the rural urban migration of African Americans failed to deliver the dream. Today the city has a different set of associations that have less to do with progress and light than with decay, crime, and poverty. African American urban life today is characterized by a host of adverse economic and social conditions— anonymity, institutional racism, disrupted family structures, low socioeconomic standing, underachievement, underemployment, teen pregnancy, divorce, and a host of other problems.

The African American urban experience has been impacted by a number of social, economic, political and technological issues. Early on, access to housing and jobs became a major source of friction between blacks and whites. To maintain residential segregation, many cities adopted residential segregation ordinances and restrictive covenants. These were formal, institutionalized restrictions forbidding white property owners from selling their property to blacks. For whites who violated these agreements, the punishment was harsh. Thus African Americans were confined to all-black neighborhoods, in what eventually became known as urban ghettos. Although jobs were plentiful owing to the war effort, African Americans experienced significant job discrimination. Discrimination was so pronounced that in 1911, a concerned group of social workers, white philanthropists, and black leaders, founded the National Urban League. The National Urban League is the nation's oldest community-based organization devoted to empowering African Americans and facilitating their entry into the economic and social mainstream. At its inception, the mission of the Urban League was to dismantle the systems of institutionalized racism that prevented African Americans in cities from obtaining jobs.

More recently, one of the major issues facing African Americans in cities is gentrification. Gentrification may be defined as the process by which deteriorating, blighted properties in declining neighborhoods are purchased by middle class residents, renovated, beautified, and subsequently occupied by more affluent tenants. It tends to occur in neighborhoods with particular qualities (i.e., convenient to downtown, cheap but distinctive housing stock, and vibrant, lively communities). Gentrification is a general term for several simultaneous changes—an increase in median income, a decline in the proportion of racial minorities, a reduction in household size, changes in neighborhood character and culture (e.g., ideas about what is attractive, codes of public behavior, noise, and nuisance). It often results in the displacement of older residents who are forced to sell their property and move away if they cannot afford the rent and tax increases. It has been the cause of deep racial and class conflicts and has been described as a miscarriage of social justice in which wealthier, usually white, newcomers are used to carry out the wishes of urban developers and planners desiring to displace poor, minority residents so that the area they occupy can be put to a more profitable use.

On the other hand, the gentrification process has the potential for producing desirable results, reducing crime, spawning new investments in infrastructure, and increasing economic activity in neighborhoods. Unfortunately, older residents who manage to stay are often left on the sidelines—socially, culturally, and economically marginalized.

Another issue facing African Americans in cities is suburbanization or urban sprawl. Traditionally, urbanization has been associated with thriving central business districts in the downtown core. Post-World War II, however, has seen residential areas shift outward giving rise to suburbs. The beginnings of suburbanization can be marked by the proliferation of the automobile owing to Henry Ford's mass production assembly line, the desire of returning veterans for more living space, the growing middle class, and the desire for racial homogeneity. Levittown was the first planned suburban development. It was built in the early 1950s. It fit all of the criteria; space (all of the homes had a yard and garage), new appliances (which offered convenience to their owners), mortgages guaranteed by the federal government (small down payments), and racial exclusion (returning black veterans could not purchase homes in Levittown).

The trend to move farther and farther away from the downtown core continues today, leading to what many describe as urban/metropolitan sprawl. Sprawl may be defined as large scale, low-density urban expansion that extends beyond the urban fringe. Sprawl has led to an increase in traffic congestion, pollution, and infrastructure costs as American drive longer distances to and from work. For African Americans and other minorities in particular, the steady decentralization of entry level jobs away from the city core has resulted in a spatial mismatch or a diseconomy in travel time and service provision. Thus, low-skilled minorities residing in inner cities face adverse labor market outcomes in the form of higher rates of unemployment, lower average wages, and increased time spent commuting. Urban sprawl has also led to suburbanites' feelings of detachment from inner city problems.

The spatial mismatch hypothesis argues that sprawl exacerbates certain dimensions of racial inequality in America. It has also raised concerns about social polarization because of suburbanites' physical and psychological remoteness from inner city problems.

Neither of these issues can be separated from the economic climate in which they occur. The new service economy and the rise of the creative class have taken center stage and has become the engine driving 21st-century American urbanization. This has changed the city's economic core. Old retailers who resided in the urban core and who supplied goods to the working class population have been undermined by upscale boutiques, specialty shops, and restaurants catering to the new creative class. During the past 25 years, employment in manufacturing as a share of total employment in America's inner cities has fallen dramatically. Between 1967 and 2001, the United States lost 9 percent of its manufacturing jobs. In the cities of the industrial heartland, the loss reached more than 40 percent. There are two explanations for the declining employment in manufacturing. First, the phenomenal increases in worker productivity have given rise to dramatic increases in manufacturing output. Just as in the early days of urbanization/industrialization when increased agricultural productivity produced redundancy and prompted rural urban migration; today, in the manufacturing sector technological advances are again contributing to a situation where fewer workers are needed.

A second explanation for the decline in manufacturing employment is globalization. Lowering restrictions on trade has put the American worker in competition with overseas workers who are paid less, not represented by unions, and enjoy few of the benefits associated with work in the United States. Because manufacturers seek to reduce their labor costs, it is economically rational to move production to places where labor costs are lower.

In both instances, a steadily decreasing proportion of the American workforce is employed in manufacturing. Typically, industrial plants are closed down and not replaced. This phenomenon, known as deindustrialization, has had a significant impact on the social lives of African Americans and has been identified as a key determinant in urban and African American poverty. It has contributed to widening income inequality and high unemployment in America's cities. It has also been associated with a cycle of urban decay that seems immune to most policy recommendations and well-intentioned government interventions. Social conditions in the old industrial core have deteriorated fueling abandonment and decay. The culture of poverty that results has generated a system of ruthless, exploitative relationships for those confined to urban ghettos.

African American migration to urban areas was preceded by waves of immigrants from Europe. Roughly 10 million European immigrants came to the United States between 1860 and 1890. Nearly all of them settled in the great cities of the Northeast and the Midwest. Immigrants from other places (e.g., Asia) were few. They settled primarily in the West, attracted by the possibility of working on the expanding railroad system. Most immigrants were poor, lived in crowded tenements, and worked in factories. During the decade between 1900 and 1910, nearly 9 million immigrants entered the United States and more than 90 percent were from Europe. By 1950, the number of immigrants had dropped to slightly more than 1 million but significantly, only half were from Europe. In the 1980s, the number of immigrants increased to approximately 8 million, but 84 percent of these immigrants were from Latin America and Asia. Immigrants from Europe were less than 15 percent of the total immigration stream.

Similar to previous immigrants, most of the new immigrants move directly into cities in search of employment. Because they are willing to work for low wages and work under less than desirable conditions, they add to the already well-stocked, unskilled labor pool in urban areas. They also compete directly with inner city African Americans for low-paying jobs. As tensions rise between newer immigrant groups and established African American communities, conflict has erupted.

Cities were the Land of Opportunity for African Americans coming from the rural south and for many past and present immigrants. For most, however, they came to realize that it was also a far-off dream. The city had the opportunities, but they were not as available in the quantity as they had first hoped. In recent years, the long-term out-migration of African Americans from the south to the great cities of the Northeast, West, and Midwest has been reversed. Southern metropolitan areas, particularly Atlanta have led the way in attracting black migrants. Detroit, Chicago, New York, Philadelphia, and San Francisco experienced the greatest out-migration of African Americans.

See also: Great Migration; Kerner Commission Report; Redlining; Urban Ghetto

Rickie Sanders

Bibliography

- Baldwin, Davarian L. Chicago's New Negroes: Modernity, the Great Migration, & Black Urban Life. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 2007.
- Goings, Kenneth, and Raymond Mohl, eds. The New African American Urban History. Thousand Oaks, CA: Sage Publications, 1996.
- Harrison, Alferdteen. Black Exodus: The Great Migration from the American South. Jackson: University Press of Mississippi, 1991.

- Hartman, Chester, and Sarah Carnochan. City for Sale: The Transformation of San Francisco. Berkeley: University of California Press, 2002.
- Horne, Gerald. Fire This Time: The Watts Uprising and the 1960s. Charlottesville: University Press of Virginia, 1995.
- Kusmer, Kenneth L., and Joe William Trotter. African American Urban History Since World War II. Chicago: The University of Chicago Press, 2009.
- Lemann, Nicholas. The Promised Land: The Great Black Migration and How It Changed America. New York: A. A. Knopf, 1991.
- Self, Robert O. American Babylon: Race and the Struggle for Postwar Oakland. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 2003.
- Tate, Gayle T., and Lewis A. Randolph. The Black Urban Community: From Dusk Till Dawn. New York: Palgrave Macmillan, 2006.

US Organization

In the months after the 1965 Watts Riot, Maulana (Ron) Karenga, Hakim Jamal, Dorothy Jamal, Tommy Jacqueline-Mfikiri, Karl Key-Hekima, Ken Seaton-Msemaji, Samuel Carr-Damu, Sanamu Nyeusi, and Brenda Haiba Karenga founded a new black power organization called "US." Despite claims later made by a number of Black Panthers, US never meant "united slaves" and this continued reference is part of the legacy of the conflict between the two groups. Instead, US was an allusion to the group's mission to serve "us" blacks as opposed to "them" whites. In addition, the dispute that drove a permanent wedge between the Black Panthers and US was over whether cultural nationalism or political/revolutionary nationalism was the best solution for African American communities. Initially, the US Organization was founded on the ideological principles forwarded by Malcolm X after his break with the Nation Islam and through his assassination on February 21, 1965. Malcolm X's shift from religious nationalism to political and secular nationalism, which coalesced in the creation of the Organization of Afro-American Unity (OAAU), proved to be powerfully influential for Karenga and the other founders of US. Malcolm X's vision of the OAAU as a vanguard that would launch a cultural revolution was embraced by US who collectively understood that a cultural revolution was necessary before a violent revolution could take place.

According to the US Organization's first newspaper, Hakim Jamal was the official founder and Karenga was designated as the chairman of US. By the summer of 1966, however, Jamal split with US leaving Karenga to become the undisputed leader of the organization. Jamal's departure was likely due to ideological differences and his strong preference for following the teachings of his former associate, Malcolm X, while Karenga was pushing the organization more toward cultural nationalism. This ideological transformation was reflected in the symbolism of the US Organization as members shifted from wearing T-shirts bearing Malcolm X's face to ones with Karenga's likeness. Almost immediately after Jamal's departure, US and Karenga began the mission of fulfilling Malcolm X's goal of creating a cultural revolution by first building a "new" black culture that would be based on a number of African concepts, value systems, and traditions.

Since Karenga previously taught Kiswahili, and even met a number of the first members of US within the context of his language classes, he emphasized the use of African languages in order to express the goals, the organizational structure, and the cultural conceptualizations that served as foundations for US. Simba Wachanga (young lions) was the youth movement in US and served as its paramilitary wing; the Circle of Isihlangu (circle of the shield) were the organization's highest title holders, including Karenga's own title as Maulana or Master Teacher; Kawaida was the group's cultural nationalist philosophical, moral, and spiritual orientation; and two of the lasting legacies of US—Nguzo Saba (the seven principles of blackness) and the holiday Kwanzaa became popular beyond the US Organization and continue to be shaping influences throughout African American communities in the 20th and 21st centuries.

The particular brand of cultural nationalism espoused by Karenga and US is a blend of Kiswahili, Zulu, Kemetic (Egyptian), Gikuyu, and other African influences. Kawaida, Karenga's personal philosophy and theory of cultural nationalism, was borrowed from Zulu religious precepts and shaped by his antipathy for Christianity and other organized religions. According to Karenga, Kawaidists are part of the spiritual and theoretical legacy of Marcus Garvey and Malcolm X and the philosophy itself is meant to promote self-awareness and consciousness through the seven principles of blackness embodied by Nguzo Saba: Umoja (unity), Kujichagulia (self-determination), Ujima (collective work and responsibility), Ujamaa (cooperative economics), Nia (purpose), Kuumba (creativity), and Imani (faith). In this way, Kawaida undergirds and embodies the US Organization.

As a reflection of their change in consciousness and acceptance of Kawaida, US members—who often called themselves "advocates"—typically wore afros or shaved heads, donned Afrocentric clothing and jewelry, punctuated greetings with African phrases, adopted African names, and embraced other elements of an African aesthetic. US was an all encompassing organization for its advocates and became, in essence, a total way of life that permeated seven main facets: the family, the community, revolutionary schooling, the temple, the congregation, the revolutionary party, and nation building. This primarily inward focus, however, became a point of criticism by the group's detractors—including the Black Panther Party—who would label the cultural nationalism advocated by US as "pork-chop" or apolitical, reactionary, and nonrevolutionary nationalism.

Even so, in its early years, the US organization gained support nationally and abroad. By 1967, US advocates formed a chapter in San Diego and a group of black marines had even formed an affiliate chapter in Vietnam. In addition, the organization began to engage in coalition building as part of its strategy to create the united front of black nationalist organizations that Malcolm X envisioned when he formed the OAAU. Between 1967 and 1969, US formed coalitions with, and connections to, SNCC and the Black Panther Party for Self-Defense. Efforts to establish a coalition among these organizations is best epitomized by the August 11, 1967 Uhuru Day rally, an event designed to commemorate the 1965 Watts Uprising. The rally not only attracted US members, but also the likes of H. Rap Brown of SNCC and Huey P. Newton of the newly formed Black Panther Party, both of whom delivered guest speeches. At least in 1967, the idea of a united front seemed viable and before internal conflicts—fueled by FBI instigation—disrupted this momentum, umbrella movements like the Free Huey campaign, the Black Congress, the Black Federation, and the Congress of African People were created and US advocates were actively involved.

By early 1968, the roots of the infamous US/Black Panther conflict began when the two organizations had a dispute over security arrangements for a "Free Huey" rally scheduled at the Los Angeles Sports Arena on February 18, 1968. From that point forward, real and imagined differences between US and the Black Panthers were augmented by the FBI's COINTELPRO, as well as the egos of Karenga, Eldridge Cleaver, Newton, and members of the LA Branch of the Black Panther Party. By September 1969, the FBI stepped up its program to destabilize the creation of a united front and the Black Congress by actively stoking the fires of the US-Panther divide. In a series of contrived letters that threatened the assassination of Karenga by Panther Party members, the tensions between the two groups escalated to the point that violence was almost certain and clearly imminent. On January 17, 1969, a shootout between US and Panther members led to the deaths of two LA Panther leaders—John Huggins and Alprentice “Bunchy” Carter. This shootout proved the undoing of the Black Congress, which was effectively defunct by spring 1969, and the US-Panther divide continued.

As a result of the protracted conflict between the two organizations, the Panthers and the FBI generated a number of myths about Karenga and US. Among these myths was the notion that Karenga was a paid agent or informant of the United States government and that he was a diagnosed paranoid schizophrenic. Karenga and US were not without blame as a number of their actions between 1969 and 1971 discredited the organization and its leader. Karenga’s meeting with LA Police Chief Thomas Reddin soon after the assassination of Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. to apparently head off and prevent black rioting, demonstrated a willingness to work with the white power structure in ways that may not have matched his rhetoric. Moreover, Karenga agreed to meet with then Governor Ronald Reagan that only added to the claims that he and his organization were willingly working with the agents of repression and reaction.

By late 1969, internal FBI memos point to a 50 percent decline in membership in the US Organization and the San Diego branch completely broke away as a direct result of COINTELPRO operations. Then, in 1971, Karenga and two others were convicted for felony assault and false imprisonment in the brutal torture of two female US members—Deborah Jones and Gail Davis. The group went into hiatus until Karenga was released from prison on parole in 1975. From 1975 until the present, US has begun to slowly rebuild alliances and develop Afrocentric educational programs and institutions. Currently, US maintains the African American Cultural Center, the Kawaida School of African American Culture, an independent cultural school for children, the Kawaida Institute of Pan-African Studies, and the University of Sankore Press. After earning a PhD from USC, Karenga’s activism and influence has helped popularize Black Studies while he taught at a variety of universities across southern California, including a recent stint as department chair of Black Studies at California State University-Long Beach. In addition to Kwanzaa and Nguzo Saba, the movements to create Black Student Unions and Black Studies departments can be seen as legacies, in part, of the US Organization and its cultural nationalist agenda.

See also: Afrocentricity; Black Panther Party; Black Power; COINTELPRO; Karenga, Maulana; Kwanzaa

Walter C. Rucker

Bibliography

- Brown, Scot. Fighting for US: Maulana Karenga, The US Organization, and Black Cultural Nationalism. New York: New York University Press, 2003.
- Brown, Scot. “The US Organization, Black Power Vanguard Politics, and the United Front Ideal: Los Angeles and Beyond.” Black Scholar 31 (2001):21–30.
- Brown, Scot. “The US Organization, Maulana Karenga, and Conflict with the Panther Party: A Critique of Sectarian Influences on Historical Discourse.” Journal of Black Studies 28 (1997):157–70.
- Hayes III, Floyd W., and Judson L. Jeffries. “Us Does Not Stand for United Slaves!” In Black Power in the Belly of the Beast, Judson L. Jeffries, ed., 67–92. Chicago: University of Illinois Press, 2006.
- Karenga, Maulana. “Kawaida and Its Critics: A Sociohistorical Analysis.” Journal of Black Studies 8 (1977):125–48.
- Warren, Nagueyalti. “Pan-African Cultural Movements: From Baraka to Karenga.” Journal of Negro History 75 (Winter/Spring 1990):16–27.

Vietnam War (Black Participation in)

The Vietnam War, in which the United States was involved from 1945 to 1975, was the first American war to be fought with a completely desegregated military. Throughout the course of the war, African American attitudes would shift from viewing the military as a valuable path to respectability and prosperity to viewing it as a racist institution complicit with the oppression of blacks in America. Although the military was officially desegregated, racism among white officers and troops and institutionalized discrimination against African Americans combined with changes in black consciousness on the home front to produce an unprecedented level of racial conflict between black and white service members. During the course of the war in Vietnam, the military would also see the rise of radical black organizations composed of African Americans in the armed forces. These organizations played an important role in the GI movement against the war, itself a key element in the United States' withdrawal of combat troops.

American involvement in Vietnam began in 1945, when American naval ships aided the French in their reconquest of the country; however, significant numbers of combat troops did not reach Vietnam until 1964. At this time, large numbers of African Americans had a positive view of the military, stemming from several factors. First, drawing on a long tradition in black political thought, many argued that service in the armed forces was incontestable proof of black loyalty and entitlement to equal rights. Second, the military offered steady work at pay rates, which were often hard for African Americans to find in the civilian sector. The bonuses accruing to combat troops also help explain the high rates of black reenlistment and volunteering for combat duty during the war's early years. Finally, many African Americans joined the military out of a sense of patriotic duty to the United States.

Despite this goodwill, there were signs even during this early phase of the war that the military reproduced the racism of the larger U.S. society. Until the late 1960s, African Americans faced casualty rates disproportionate to their numbers in the armed services as a whole. Part of this disproportion is attributable to African Americans volunteering for combat duty as described previously, but a significant portion is traceable to racism in the military. African Americans often found it harder to win conscientious objector status (which exempted the recipient from combat duty) than whites. The widespread stereotype of African Americans as criminals led many draft boards to deny black draftee's profession of pacifism, and members of the Nation of Islam found that draft boards simply refused to treat their faith as a real religion. These draft boards were locally controlled, and typically composed white businessmen; in some cases, open Ku Klux Klan members headed local boards. African Americans also found themselves drafted in disproportionate numbers, as lower average incomes meant far fewer black families could afford to send their children to college and earn a student deferment.

The draft had a far different impact in black communities than in white ones. Children from white families with means and a good chance of success in civilian life generally escaped the draft. By contrast, the racism of the draft boards combined with widespread poverty in the black community meant that those drafted were much more likely to be upwardly mobile than their white counterparts. Many civil rights workers, for example, found themselves at the unfriendly attention of a local draft board, prompting Whitney Young and other black leaders to characterize the draft as a weapon against civil rights struggle.

Once inside the military, African Americans faced further discrimination. The test by which various branches of the military assigned service members to their positions, the Armed Forces Qualification Test (AFQT), was heavily biased toward whites. Because African American serving in Vietnam had often attended underfunded or segregated schools, they faced a marked disadvantage on the AFQT when compared with whites. Also, black sociologists argued that the AFQT was culturally biased toward European Americans (when the AFQT was replaced by a more culturally neutral test in 1973, black scores rose dramatically while white scores remained unchanged). As a result of their lower test scores, African Americans were often assigned to combat rather than positions like engineering or communications.

U.S. Army soldiers fire at a suspected Viet Cong position during a search-and-destroy mission. (National Archives)

Although black support for the military generally remained high during the war's early years, there were a few visible exceptions. The most important was Muhammad Ali's 1966 refusal to be drafted. Ali had caught the attention of his draft board in 1964, but he failed the reading and writing portion of the induction test. In 1966, however, the military revised its standards, and Ali became eligible to serve. Informed of the news, he made his now famous declaration that no Viet Cong had ever called him "nigger." Ali was stripped of his boxing title and charged with a felony for his refusal (the Supreme Court reversed his conviction in 1971). His linkage of the war with American racism, although isolated at the time, would become a touchstone for young African Americans opposing the war.

Part of the reason Ali's voice would prove to be prophetic was black soldiers' experiences in Vietnam. Black GIs found that in addition to disproportionate casualty rates, they also had to deal with racial friction with white service members. Although combat could be a situation in which racial tensions from back home were overcome, the situation outside the field was far different. On base, black soldiers faced the hostility of white officer corps, whose discretion in matters of military justice often weighed heavily against African Americans. Off base, local entertainment facilities such as bars or brothels were frequently segregated as rigorously as public facilities in the deep South.

Some of the worst instances of racial conflict took place between black and white enlisted personnel. The complete desegregation of the military, by allowing far greater contact between black and white soldiers, vastly increased the potential for racial conflict. The sources of tension were many. One of the most commonly cited was music programming. Whereas black soldiers wanted soul music on armed forces radio and in base recreational clubs, older white soldiers fought to keep country and western instead. Another source of friction was "dapping," the intricate handshakes that were developed primarily by black soldiers. The term originated in the Vietnamese word dep, meaning beautiful. Daps became a creative means by which black soldiers could express solidarity in the armed forces. The gestures involved could be quite complex and time consuming, and dapping in the chow line became a frequent source of tension between black and white soldiers. More generally, many whites resented the cliquishness they perceived in the practice.

Black soldiers also had to deal with the enemy in a different manner than whites. The National Liberation Front and the Democratic Republic of Vietnam were highly adept at using American racism as a weapon in the propaganda war. The Vietnamese left pamphlets informing black soldiers that they would not be hurt if they did not attack the Vietnamese. Numerous soldiers recounted stories of being found by Vietnamese forces and left uninjured. Even more devastating to black soldiers' morale were the leaflets the Vietnamese dropped that asked black soldiers why they fought for a country that lynched them. The greatest blow came when the military withheld news of Dr. Martin Luther King Jr.'s assassination out of fear of its effects on black soldiers. Instead, they were left to learn of the murder from Vietnamese.

King's death marked the moment when black support for Vietnam began dropping precipitously. In 1966, two-thirds of black soldiers reenlisted. By 1970, less than 13 percent would. The experience of racism in the armed forces, the revolution in black consciousness at home, King's assassination, and the Tet Offensive's exposure of American military vulnerability all combined to drastically change black perceptions of the military.

One sign that black soldiers were not as pleased with the military as they had been in the past was the sharp increase in racial violence. From 1968 onwards, the armed services were plagued with violence between white and black soldiers. Dr. King's assassination was one of the earliest sparks for this violence. Some white soldiers openly celebrated King's murder. At the Naval Headquarters Building in Cam Ranh Bay, whites hoisted a confederate flag over the base when they heard the news. Black grief and anger over the assassination often translated into a refusal to accept further racist treatment in the military. Violence between black and white soldiers spread throughout the military, and soon reports of incidents were coming in from all over the world, from Vietnam to bases in Germany to training camps in the United States.

The growing manifestations of black anger were intimately linked with the rise in black political militancy inside the armed forces. As the civilian antiwar movement grew in size after 1968, it found a counterpart inside the military. Black soldiers played a key role in this movement. Several large antiwar GI groups, the Movement for a Democratic Military, GIs United Against the War, and the American Servicemen's Union, had significant black membership. Other groups, like the Black Berets and the Malcolm X Society, were entirely black. Even largely white groups like Vietnam Veterans Against the War, the largest GI antiwar group, paid special attention to racism in the military as a result of the organizing done by black soldiers.

The rise of a politically radical black antiwar movement in the military contributed to the larger breakdown of the American military in Vietnam. Given the disproportionate presence of black soldiers in combat units, their radicalization had a relatively larger effect on combat units than that of white GIs. In the I Corps (the army corps stationed at the northern edge of South Vietnam, where the fighting was the most intense), racial conflict and demonstrations by black soldiers were nearly constant after a fight between black and white soldiers in 1970. Military police found that large numbers of soldiers were carrying illegal weapons to defend themselves against attacks by other GIs. Black GIs' refusal to accept racist treatment meant that the American military could not continue functioning as it had.

Military officials reacted with panic to the rise of black radicalism inside the ranks. In 1970, Commander George L. Jackson published his article "Constraints of the Negro Civil Rights Movement on American Military Effectiveness." Jackson argued that Dr. King's stand against the war in 1967 and increasing use of the American military in peacekeeping operations at home threatened the morale of black soldiers and reduced American military effectiveness. In response, he advocated increased sensitivity to black grievances.

Department of Defense officials implemented a whole host of reforms in response to the rise of black militancy. In 1970, the Defense Department instituted an aggressive affirmative action program. In 1971, they opened the Defense Race Relations Institute in Florida to monitor racial tension in the military and encourage equal treatment by officers. As mentioned earlier, the culturally biased Armed Forces Qualification test was removed in favor of the Army Classification Battery. In addition to these ameliorative programs, the military began quietly moving black troops away from the front in hopes of restoring military effectiveness. By 1972, African Americans accounted for only 7.6 percent of annual American casualties.

The shifting of black soldiers away from the front occurred simultaneously with the larger American troop withdrawal from Vietnam. Once back in the United States, black veterans found themselves with an entirely new set of problems. Their unemployment rate was about 1 in 3, whereas white veterans had a rate of 1 in 20. Black veterans also found themselves incarcerated at disproportionate rates. A 1976 Veterans Administration study found that veterans made up a quarter of the prison population, and half of all imprisoned veterans were black.

Thirty years after the end of the Vietnam War, its effects are still being felt in black America. The epidemic of black veteran homelessness and poverty continues. The shift to an all-volunteer military, partially in response to the troop rebellion in Vietnam, has meant increased attention by recruiters to low-income minority communities. In turn, the armed services have used black soldiers as a signifier of the progressive, diverse nature of the American military. Far from heralding the end of the tangle of race and the military, Vietnam signaled an era in which the two would be more visibly linked than ever.

See also: Ali, Muhammad; Black Power; King, Martin Luther Jr.; Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee; Students for a Democratic Society; X, Malcolm

Paul M. Heideman

Bibliography

- Allen, Joe. Vietnam: The (Last) War the U.S. Lost. Chicago: Haymarket Books, 2008.
- Cortright, David. Soldiers in Revolt: GI Resistance During the Vietnam War. Chicago: Haymarket Books, 2005.
- Gettleman, Marvin E. et al., eds. Vietnam and America: A Documented History. New York: Grove Press, 1995.
- Terry, Wallace. Bloods: An Oral History of the Vietnam War. New York: Random House, 1984.
- Westheider, James E. Fighting on Two Fronts: African Americans and the Vietnam War. New York: New York University Press, 1997.

Voting Rights Act of 1965

---

In July 1964, President Lyndon Johnson signed in the Civil Rights Act, which contained some voting-related provisions. Title I condemned state discrimination in voter registration. The bill prompted outrage from conservative white southerners, who were only slightly mollified that it was signed by a Texan. Yet many in the African American community criticized the act as well, feeling that it had not gone far enough. Just as the Fourteenth Amendment of 1868 had failed to secure full legal rights for freed slaves, so the 1964 Civil Rights Act did not ensure the voting rights of African Americans. Recognizing this, Johnson followed the Civil Rights Act with a bill on voting rights, in an echo of Congress's actions in ratifying the Fifteenth Amendment in 1870 to prevent restriction of the ballot on the basis of race.

Existing federal antidiscrimination laws had not been sufficient to overcome state officials' resistance to the Fifteenth Amendment. Even after passage of the Enforcement Act of 1870 and the Force Act of 1871, black citizens encountered strong resistance to their enfranchisement. White supremacist groups practiced violent intimidation and election districts were gerrymandered. In the 1890s, some states enacted disenfranchising laws: poll taxes, literacy tests, and disqualification for "crimes of moral turpitude." By 1910, nearly all black citizens in the former Confederate states were disenfranchised, and in 1965 only a third of eligible African Americans (compared to two-thirds of eligible whites) were registered in these states. Literacy tests and poll taxes kept black voting registration low, especially in Mississippi, Alabama, and Louisiana. Only 6 percent of eligible black citizens were registered in Mississippi.

Johnson began work on the new bill in the fall of 1964, right after "Freedom Summer," which saw three voter registration volunteers murdered in Mississippi. The FBI declared that local law enforcement officials were involved in the murders. He announced the bill in his State of the Union address of January 1965, and on March 15, 1965, he gave a speech to Congress on voting rights. The speech, titled "The American Promise," pointed to the unkept promises of the Declaration of Independence and the Emancipation Proclamation, then heralded the civil rights protest as the driving force behind the new legislation. There would have been no progress, Johnson said, were it not for the faith and bravery of black campaigners. He quoted the anthem of the Civil Rights movement, a freedom song titled "We shall overcome."

On August 5, Congress passed Johnson's bill, which was the most comprehensive voting rights legislation to date. Section 2 followed the language of the Fifteenth Amendment: "No voting qualification or prerequisite to voting, or standard, practice, or procedure shall be imposed or applied by any State or political subdivision to deny or abridge the right of any citizen of the United States to vote on account of race or color.” Section 4 ended the use of literacy requirements for voting in Alabama, Georgia, Louisiana, Mississippi, South Carolina, and Virginia, and many North Carolina counties. The bill also provided for unprecedented federal intervention. It authorized the attorney general to appoint federal voting examiners and decreed that the Justice Department would take control of the registration process if any county failed to register 50 percent of eligible black voters. It did not prohibit the poll tax, instead directing the attorney general to challenge its use, but in 1966 the Supreme Court found Virginia’s poll tax to be unconstitutional under the Fourteenth Amendment.

President Lyndon B. Johnson moves to shake hands with Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. in the Capitol rotunda following the signing of the Voting Rights Act on August 6, 1965. The law was the first national legislation to guarantee all Americans the right to vote. (Yoichi R. Okamoto/Lyndon B. Johnson Library)

After his voting rights speech, Johnson went on to express support for equal outcomes policies. On June 4, 1965, he gave an address at Howard University titled “To Fulfill These Rights.” In language that would later be used by affirmative action advocates, he told the graduating students: “You do not take a person who, for years, has been hobbled by chains and liberate him, bring him up to the starting line of a race and then say, ‘you are free to compete with all the others,’ and still justly believe that you have been completely fair” (Freedom Is Not Enough, p. 16). It was not enough, Johnson explained, just to open the gates of opportunity. Citizens needed the ability to walk through.

Nonetheless, the act did have an impact. Most southern states opened voter registration lists to black citizens and control passed to the Justice Department in the 62 counties that remained resistant. In Mississippi, black voting enrollment went from 6 percent to 44 percent by 1968. Johnson’s bill was extended in 1970, again in 1975 (when it was amended to protect language minority citizens from voting discrimination), and again in 1982. On January 20, 2001, ahead of the Shadow Inauguration, some 2000 people marched to the Supreme Court and took a vow to uphold Johnson’s Voting Rights Act.

See also: Disfranchisement; Grandfather Clause; Johnson, Lyndon Baines; Literacy Tests; National Association for the Advancement of Colored People; Selma March; Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee

Zoe Trodd

Bibliography

Branch, Taylor. Pillar of Fire: America in the King Years, 1963–65. New York: Simon & Schuster, 1998.

Garrow, David J. Protest at Selma: Martin Luther King, Jr. and the Voting Rights Act of 1965. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1978.

Kotz, Nick. Judgment Days: Lyndon Baines Johnson, Martin Luther King Jr., and the Laws That Changed America. New York: Houghton Mifflin, 2005.

Walters, Ronald W. Freedom Is Not Enough: Black Voters, Black Candidates, and American Presidential Politics. Lanham, MD: Rowman and Littlefield, 2007.

Walker, Alice

Alice Walker (1944–), an African American writer, is most famous for the novel The Color Purple. Walker was born in the small town of Eatonton, Georgia to sharecroppers, Willie Lee Walker and Minnie Tallulah Grant Walker. The youngest child of eight, she had five brothers and two sisters. In 1952, she was accidentally shot in the right eye with a BB gun by her older brother during a game of Cowboys and Indians. She never fully recovered and was left partially blind in that eye. With her loss of sight in her eye, she lost confidence. Walker grew depressed and as she frequently contemplated suicide, she used writing as an outlet for her emotional pain.

After reconstructive surgery to her eye, at 14, she eventually gained back some confidence, becoming prom queen and graduating valedictorian from high school, before going on to college via scholarships. She attended Spelman College in Atlanta, Georgia from 1961–1963 and graduated from Sarah Lawrence College in Yonkers, New York, in 1965. Before leaving Spelman College, she was an activist in the Civil Rights movement. In 1964, as a senior at Sarah Lawrence College, she wrote her first book, Once, a collection of essays. Also during 1964, Walker discovered she was pregnant. Before terminating her pregnancy, she grew more depressed. Considering suicide, she continued to turn to writing to channel her emotions, and with the help of her teacher, Muriel Ruykeyser, she published, in 1965, To Hell with Dying.

After college, she moved to New York, to work for the welfare system. She soon after returned to the South to continue participating in the Civil Rights movement. In 1966, she taught black studies and writing in many universities throughout Mississippi. In 1968, Once was eventually published.

In 1966, while in Mississippi, she met Melvyn Rosenman Leventhal, an attorney, who was also an activist in civil rights. The pair married in March 1967, but there was much controversy over the interracial match, which was the only one in Mississippi, at that time. Soon after she became writer-in-residence at Tougaloo College, and in 1972 taught at Wellesley College, where she began one of the first “Gender Studies” courses in the country. While looking for course material, she was greatly influenced by the work of Zora Neale Hurston. In 1974, Walker became a fiction editor of Ms. magazine, and, in 1975, she published an article that brought restored awareness to Zora Neal Hurston’s work.

In 1976, after nine years of marriage, Leventhal and Walker divorced. They had a daughter, Rebecca Walker, who is a feminist like her mother. Soon after her divorce from Leventhal, she fell in love Robert Allen, a colleague and editor of Black Scholar. Four years later, in 1978, Walker moved to San Francisco’s Japantown, where she still lives today.

Walker’s work includes poems, stories, essays, criticism, and novels, but she is most widely known for her third novel, The Color Purple, published in 1982. This novel won the National Book Award in 1983, and in the same year she became the first African American woman to win a Pulitzer Prize for fiction. In 1988, it was made into a Steven Spielberg motion picture, casting Oprah Winfrey and Whoopi Goldberg. The Color Purple depicts discrimination against African American woman in a sexist and racist society. The novel caused some controversy because of Walker’s negative portrayals of men as sexist, abusers, and rapists through its depiction of socially oppressed, African American women who rise above discrimination through their female relationships. The major theme in the novel is womanhood, focusing on African American women, their interactions with men who abuse them, and how these women relate to one another. The novel’s subordinate themes include self-discovery and growth, which is developed in letters exchanged between Celie and Nettie, two sisters, and in letters Celie addresses to God tell the story. In the spring of 1982, because of The Color Purple’s success, Walker was offered a position as a professor at the University of California at Berkeley. She also went on to work at Brandeis University the following fall.

Her other works include novels The Third Life of Grange Copeland (1970), Meridian (1976), By the Light of My Father’s Smile (1994), and Now Is the Time to Open Your Heart (2004). The Temple of My Familiar (1989) and Possessing the Secret of Joy (1992) are novels about female circumcision in Africa. Volumes of her poetry include Once (1968),

Alice Walker, celebrated author, womanist, and social activist. (AP/Wide World Photos)

Revolutionary Petunias and Other Poems (1973), and Goodnight, Willie Lee, I’ll See You in the Morning (1979). Walker’s nonfiction essay collection includes In Search of Our Mothers’ Gardens: Womanist Prose (1983) and Living by the Word (1988), where Walker defines “womanist” a term she uses for the black feminist, and Anything We Love Can Be Saved (1997). Her short-story collection includes In Love & Trouble: Stories of Black Women (1973), You Can’t Keep a Good Woman Down (1981), and the partially autobiographical Her Blue Body Everything We Know: Earthling Poems 1965–1990 (1991), The Way Forward Is with a Broken Heart (2000), and Absolute Trust in the Goodness of the Earth (2003). Her most recent work, Sent by Earth: A Message from the Grandmother Spirit After the Bombing of the World Trade Center and the Pentagon, was written in response to New York City’s World Trade Center tragedy. See also: Hurston, Zora Neale; King, Martin Luther Jr.

Nicole Joy DeCarlo

Bibliography

Banks, Erma Davis, and Keith Byerman. Alice Walker: An Annotated Bibliography, 1968–1986. New York: Garland, 1989.

- Butler-Evans, Elliott. Race, Gender, and Desire: Narrative Strategies in the Fiction of Tini Cade Bambara, Toni Morrison, and Alice Walker. Philadelphia: Temple University Press, 1989.
- Gates, Henry L., ed. Alice Walker: Critical Perspectives, Past and Present. New York: Amistad, 1993.
- Howard, Lillie P., ed. Alice Walker and Zora Neale Hurston: The Common Bond. Westport, CT: Greenwood Press, 1993.
- Lauret, Maria. Alice Walker. New York: Palgrave Macmillan, 2000.
- White, Evelyn C. Alice Walker: A Life. New York: W. W. Norton, 2004.

War on Poverty

The War on Poverty was declared by Lyndon Johnson in his State of the Union address in 1964. It was a critical component of his larger vision of a Great Society and was intended to expand the reach of government to improve life for all Americans. At the time, approximately 35 million Americans lived in poverty. Moreover, the Civil Rights movement and events such as the Brown v. Board of Education decision, the Montgomery bus boycott, the decision to send federal troops to enforce desegregation at Central High School in Little Rock, and the Birmingham, Harlem, and Watts “riots” all highlighted previously unacknowledged links between race, poverty, and opportunity.

Ideologically, the War on Poverty was a progressive campaign drawn from the belief that the causes of poverty were a systemic lack of opportunity. Only government leadership directed toward changing the structures of opportunity that kept people impoverished could defeat the problem. In this way, Johnson’s ideas aligned themselves with the liberal tradition of Franklin Delano Roosevelt and his New Deal.

For the War on Poverty to be fully implemented, all branches of government had to work together. For Johnson, this commitment was the only way to solve America’s problems. Thus, the Economic Opportunity Act (EOA) required federal, state, and local participation and was designed to mobilize the resources of the country to address the numerous challenges it faced. The aim was not merely to expand old programs or improve what is already being done, but to chart a new course and address the cause of poverty, thereby eliminating it. The EOA was committed to lowering barriers to political participation, employment, housing, and education for African Americans. It also proposed economic development programs for America’s cities and towns. Johnson subsequently established the Office of Economic Opportunity (OEO) as the legislative site with responsibility for administering War on Poverty programs. Some of the programs were Head Start, the Community Action Program, the Job Corps, food stamps, work study, Medicare/Medicaid, Volunteers in Service to America (VISTA), Upward Bound, comprehensive health services, family planning, emergency food and medical services, Senior Opportunity Services, and legal services. The OEO reported directly to the president. It existed from 1964 to 1973. Between the time of its inception in 1964 and its demise in 1973, social welfare spending increased from $75 billion to $185 billion. In terms of percent, spending increased ~4.6 percent between 1950 and 1965 and ~7.2 percent between 1965 and 1976.

OEO was officially disbanded in 1973 by President Richard Nixon. Responsibility for its many social welfare programs was transferred to the newly established Community Services Administration (CSA) in the Department of Health and Human Services. CSA received little support from President Carter and was finally dismantled by the Reagan administration in 1981. Between 1964 and 1973, however, the impact of the War on Poverty was such that it was impossible for government to embrace any new initiative without being asked, “How does it help the poor?”

Looking back, the results of the Great Society and its War on Poverty were less than hoped for. There are several explanations for its limited effectiveness. The first was funding. As military engagement in the Vietnam War escalated and thoughts of how to extricate U.S. troops occupied more of the nation’s attention, the OEO received less of the funding it needed to carry out the programs it proposed. Local areas that had responsibility for many medical, emergency food, and legal services found themselves with little money to continue. Programs funded at the federal level (e.g., Head Start) remained intact but suffered under the weight of diminishing resources.

A second explanation was ideological. Four concerns have been cited. First, there was the split between those who viewed welfare as social insurance and those who saw it as public assistance. Second, there were those who claimed that the War on Poverty was unwilling to attribute the cause of poverty to the American economic system. Accordingly, the result was superficial, Band-aid solutions. Although opportunities were created, structural inequalities were untouched. Third, many claim that the attention given to black America created a racial backlash. The white middle class felt that it was footing the bill for ever-increasing services to the poor and as the economy declined during the 1970s, many whites lost sympathy for Great Society programs. Finally, women also felt they had been ignored. Despite the fact that the majority of positions (e.g., community aide, community worker, and parent aide) were filled by women, the OEO held the traditional view that women's work was voluntary, unpaid labor. Strategies for preventing poverty focused on expanding employment opportunities for poor men and neglected the actual contributions of women as staff members and administrators.

Today, of the many Great Society programs, most support remains for Medicare, which serves the elderly, and for Head Start, which serves the youngest of the poor. The basic assumption of the Great Society—that government must take the leadership in reducing poverty—has been replaced by the 1990s belief that government support for the poor leads to dependency and undermines the work ethic. Whereas the Great Society emphasized the institutional and structural roots of poverty, contemporary poverty policy focuses on the individual behaviors and choices of people who are poor.

See also: Johnson, Lyndon Baines; Kerner Commission Report; Long Hot Summer Riots, 1965–1967; Urban Ghetto

Rickie Sanders

Bibliography

- Clark, Robert. The War on Poverty: History, Selected Programs, and On-going Impact. Lanham, MD: University Press of America, 2002.
- Harrington, Michael. The Other America, Poverty in the United States. New York: Touchstone, 1962.
- Haveman, Robert. A Decade of Federal Antipoverty Programs: Achievements, Failures, and Lessons. New York: Academic Press, 1977.
- Katz, Michael. In the Shadow of the Poorhouse: A Social History of Welfare in America. New York: Basic Books, 1996.

Ware, Bill

William “Bill” Ware (1935–) was born in Cannonsburg, Mississippi. At the age of six, he and his family moved to the small rural town of Stanton, Mississippi, 12 miles outside of Natchez. There Ware received his grade school education, first in a dilapidated one-room schoolhouse where two teachers, but most often one teacher, provided instruction for eight grades of students and later at a local Catholic school named Holy Garden, which he attended for high school. As a young child raised during the height of the Great Depression, Ware's parents and paternal grandparents stressed the importance of education. Although both had little formal education, they understood its value and instilled its importance into their children. Named after his paternal grandfather who labored as a sharecropper, Ware adopted many of his esteemed characteristics and saw education as a tool to improve not only his personal lot but also his community's condition. As a result, he developed a fondness for learning and, as time went on, excelled academically.

In 1950, Ware entered high school at Holy Garden where he gradually became known for his outstanding academic achievements. His hard work would eventually earn him a citizenship award and, most important, a scholarship to attend St. John's University, an all-male, predominantly white, Catholic school in Minnesota. In the fall of 1954, Ware left the humid confines of the Magnolia state for the cold terrain of Minnesota. Although Ware had a full tuition scholarship, he did not have much money to cover living expenses; in fact, he arrived to campus with only $35. Because of his financial straits, he quickly found work at the school cafeteria as a dishwasher and enrolled in St. John's ROTC program to cover his living expenses. Although lack of money at times proved challenging, Ware also had to confront the North's racism. Ware was no stranger to racial bigotry, having been fed a steady diet from Mississippi's white supremacist menu, but it still proved challenging. As time went on, however, he developed several amicable relationships with his white counterparts.

Once Ware became settled, he pursued a degree in English and became involved in various extracurricular activities such as the Young Christian Students Organization in addition to writing for the school newspaper. His involvement in these endeavors proved to be critical to his development as a person and as a student, but they would pale in comparison to something that occurred during his junior year. In 1957, Ware witnessed a transformative event in the form of Ghana's declaration of independence in March of the same year. Not only did Ghana provide people of African descent with a tangible model for liberation, it gave many African people great hope and enormous psychological upliftment. Moreover, Ghana's independence countered the myriad racist images of Africa and her descendants, and the notions of buffoonery and anti-intellectualism that whites commonly associated with African-descended people throughout the world. Ghana's independence quickly resonated with Ware, as it did with countless people of African descent, and it piqued his interest in one day visiting the coastal West African country. This sojourn would have to wait almost five years. In the meantime, Ware graduated with a bachelors of arts in English in the spring of 1958, and, in October 1960, his obligation to the military ended. In January 1961, he embarked on a brief term as a history teacher at a local high school in Minneapolis.

After his stint as a history teacher ended, Ware joined the Peace Corps in 1962. Admittedly, he notes that he primarily joined the organization after he learned that members had the option to travel to Ghana. After joining the Peace Corps, he became enamored with the teachings of black sociologist St. Clair Drake, who developed one of the first African studies programs in the United States and helped train Peace Corps volunteers. While in Ghana, Ware quickly absorbed Ghana's first Prime Minister Kwame Nkrumah's teachings of black nation-building and Pan-Africanism. He soon embraced the idea of uniting African people worldwide, as well as certain elements of cultural nationalism such as wearing African garb and adopting African names. In June 1963, he returned to the United States to work with the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee (SNCC) in Mississippi shortly after white supremacist Byron De La Beckwith assassinated NAACP field secretary Medgar Evers. In 1964, after a brief stint in Minnesota on a SNCC fundraising trip, he returned to the South to become a full-time worker within the organization.

In the fall of 1965 en route to a civil rights workshop in Frogmore, South Carolina at the behest of civil rights activist Septima Clark, Ware became aware of the Georgia State Legislature's refusal to seat former SNCC member and legislator-elect Julian Bond because of his unwavering support of SNCC's statement against the Vietnam War. The news immediately created great shock and anger within the black community. As such, Ware did not see the value of attending a civil rights workshop in South Carolina if Bond could not take his seat in Atlanta. He immediately decided to go to Atlanta, where he and a small number of SNCC members urged James Forman, SNCC's executive secretary, to organize a group that would galvanize the residents of Bond's Vine City district in support of him. Thus, in February 1966, SNCC established the Atlanta Vine City Project under the direction of Bill Ware and Gwendolyn Robinson in which both served as co-directors.

Although the Atlanta Project engaged in numerous grassroots organizing activities, it is most commonly known for the release of the black power position paper. In March 1966, project members Michael Simmons, Ronald Snelings, and Ware wrote and released a position paper that called for, among other things, the outright expulsion of whites from the organization. The paper immediately generated tremendous controversy, and, although both black and white SNCC members believed the paper to be anti-white and counterproductive, its black nationalist and Pan-Africanist threads resonated with many within SNCC. The release of the position paper came at a critical time when SNCC members constantly debated the role of whites and the organization's ideological and tactical direction. Before the position paper's release, SNCC organizers discussed white participation only in small circles. The position paper created space for the open discussion of this question, led to the outright expulsion of whites from SNCC in December of 1966, and in turn pushed the organization towards black nationalism and black power. Thus the Atlanta Project's position paper played a critical role in the emergence of the Black Power movement.

Ultimately ideological and tactical conflicts plagued the relationship between the Atlanta Project and SNCC's national leadership throughout most of the branch's one-year existence. At the beginning of 1967, SNCC's national leadership effectively disbanded the Atlanta Project as a result of a dispute over a SNCC-owned vehicle. This marked the end of the Atlanta Project and left a tremendous grassroots organizing void that SNCC never filled.

Bill Ware currently resides in Baton Rouge, Louisiana, where he continues to be of great service to the black community. He mentors Southern University students as well as young people in the surrounding community through his work with Bob Moses's Algebra Project and he also teaches young adults how to play chess.

See also: Black Nationalism; Black Power; Nkrumah, Kwame; Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee

Jason M. Perkins

Bibliography

- Carson, Clayborne. In Struggle: SNCC and the Black Awakening of the 1960s. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1981.
- Forman, James. The Making of Black Revolutionaries. New York: Macmillan, 1972.
- Grady-Willis, Winston A. Challenging U.S. Apartheid: Atlanta and Black Struggles for Human Rights, 1960–1977. Durham, NC: Duke University Press, 2006.
- Harmon, David Andrew. Beneath the Image of the Civil Rights Movement and Race Relations: Atlanta, Georgia, 1946–1981. New York: Garland Publishing, 1996.
- Jeffries, Hasan, Kwame. “SNCC, Black Power, and Independent Political Party Organizing in Alabama, 1964–1966.” Journal of African American History. 92, no. 2 (Spring 2006):171–206.
- King, Mary. Freedom Song: A Personal Story of the 1960s Civil Rights Movement. New York: William Morrow, 1987.
- Lewis, John, and Michael D’Orso. Walking with the Wind: A Memoir of the Movement. New York: Harcourt Brace, 1998.
- Ogbar, Jeffrey O. G. Black Power: Radical Politics and African American Identity. Baltimore: The John Hopkins University Press, 2004.
- Perkins, Jason, M. “The Atlanta Vine City Project, SNCC, and Black Power, 1965–1967.” Unpublished Thesis, The Ohio State University, 2008.
- Sellers, Cleveland. The River of No Return: The Autobiography of a Black Militant and the Life and Death of SNCC. New York: William Morrow, 1973.

Washington, Booker T.

As a former slave, coal miner, and educator, Booker Taliaferro Washington (1856–1915) lifted himself up out of the lowest levels of poverty and oppression to represent and advocate a distinctive approach to improving race relations in the U.S. South. He insisted that African Americans must begin forging their own pathway to equality through work, determination, skills development, and education. For Washington, self-sufficiency was the key attribute that would facilitate legal and social reform. He led by example, creating and building the preeminent center for educating African Americans following emancipation—the Tuskegee Institute. Located in the heart of the former Confederacy, in Tuskegee, Alabama, many African Americans such as George Washington Carver and the “Tuskegee Airmen” benefited from Washington’s work.

Washington possessed the gift of tenacity, a virtue that helped lift him out of the ignorant, oppressive condition of slavery and into the respected role as a professor and founder of Tuskegee Institute. The opportunity for an education and social advancement for African Americans during Reconstruction in the South was limited at best; poverty and oppression, however, failed to deter his overwhelming desire to obtain an education and help improve the conditions of his race.

Washington believed that regardless of race, if an individual performed with a high degree of skill in his or her profession, whatever it may be, then that individual would eventually become recognized and given an equal place in society. He publicly elaborated this creed in an address delivered at the 1895 Cotton States International Exposition in Atlanta, Georgia. In what would become known as the “Atlanta Compromise,” Washington told African Americans to “cast down your bucket where you are,” as he urged them to learn useful skills and perform them so well that they would become invaluable partners with their white neighbors. The address greatly increased his popularity among white southerners; however, he received considerable opposition from many of his African American colleagues, most notably W. E. B. Du Bois.

Washington’s life and struggle was testimony to the benefits of hard work and determination. Born into slavery near Hale’s Ford, in Franklin County, Virginia on April 5, 1856, he lived the earliest part of his life toiling in slave labor. Just as he was unable to control the conditions into which he was born, he was also unable to control the conditions of his freedom, a life that included: poverty, white supremacists, and lack of opportunity for educational and social improvement. This precarious condition failed to ignite resentment or ill feelings. He knew that many people have had to struggle for freedom and prosperity, and his race would be no exception.

As a young man he recalled only two siblings and his mother. He never met his father. At a very early age he developed an appetite for knowledge. His mother helped him the only way she could by giving him a “blue-back” speller; he used the book to teach himself the alphabet. His family later moved to West Virginia, where he worked in the coal mine to earn a meager living for his family. Whenever possible, although not very often, he attended the segregated and newly formed school for blacks. The majority of his time, however, was spent in the deep, dark, coal-rich mine shafts of West Virginia.

One day while working in the mines, he overheard two of his co-workers talking about an educational facility for African Americans called Hampton Normal and Agricultural Institute located near the Tidewater area of Eastern

Booker T. Washington was the founder of the Tuskegee Institute, a leading center of African American education. (Library of Congress)

Virginia. He immediately made up his mind to attend. Upon completing the 500-mile journey to Hampton, he was given an admissions test that consisted of sweeping a room. He was aware his future depended on how well he performed the task assigned to him. He set out to make the room spotless; upon finishing, the room was inspected, and he was promptly admitted to the school.

Hampton Institute was founded in 1868 by General Samuel C. A. Armstrong, who quickly became a mentor and moral inspiration to Washington. After completing his training at Hampton, Washington devoted his time to teaching, eventually returning to Hampton to teach Indians. It was during this time that Armstrong recommended him to oversee the development of a normal school for blacks in the small southern town of Tuskegee. In June 1881 he arrived in the heart of the “Black Belt” with no place to hold classes, as he noted in Up From Slavery, except an old horse stable and a hen house.

Washington’s autobiographical account, first published in 1901, quickly became an important and influential piece of American nonfiction literature. In clear and concise prose, he recounts episodes from his early life through his ascendance into historical prominence. In the book, Washington skillfully recalls how his character and political philosophy were shaped by his experiences and firsthand observations. He offers considerable commentary on building the school and curriculum at Tuskegee, as well as his 1895 speech in Atlanta. In print for more than a century, Up From Slavery continues to introduce new generations to the rewards of self-help.

Soon after his arrival in Tuskegee, Washington set out to observe the culture of the local community. After careful evaluation, he realized the enormity of his task. With this in mind Washington set an educational agenda for Tuskegee that included the basic practice of personal hygiene, the development of social manors, farming, and craftsmanship skills. The permanent site of Tuskegee Institute would be located on an abandoned plantation, about a mile outside the town. The lot was purchased for $500. Washington was innovative when it came to the construction of the buildings—the students built them. They made bricks, dug the holes, laid the foundations, all while attending classes in make-shift buildings.

In his writing, Washington reported an agreeable perception of his white neighbors. He found the citizens of Tuskegee as helpful and enthusiastic as any he had met throughout the South. He realized the importance of making the best of a difficult situation. The two races had no choice except to live together in the South, so every effort should be made to live in harmony. In fact, Washington often cited the advantages of making every effort to respectfully acquaint one’s self with his or her white neighbors rather than resting their hopes on white integrationists who lived hundreds of miles to the North.

Washington, however, did not overlook the help that northerners could provide; he spent a considerable amount of time there fundraising for the school, as he traveled extensively throughout northern states in an effort to secure funds from philanthropist. During this time he was often invited to speak at engagements, an area he greatly excelled in. Although he was often very nervous, he had the ability to bring crowds to their feet. It was his gift of oratory, coupled with his conservative approach to integration, that prompted the invitation from the directors of the Atlanta

Exposition. He humbly accepted, noting in his autobiography that with the invitation to speak came much responsibility and opportunity.

As Washington rose to the platform to begin his speech in Atlanta, he stood before an overflowing and segregated crowd of onlookers. His audience was attentive as he focused on the task before him. He was completely unmoved by an insult the previous speaker launched at him. In his speech, he noted that African Americans accounted for one-third of the southern population, and that it would be unwise to ignore such a dominant constituency. He also recognized the importance of the Exposition in bridging the social gap between the races. Only three decades had passed since ratification of the Thirteenth Amendment that ended slavery. Washington believed that following the bitter American Civil War, not only did the Southern white men need time to adapt to the newly reconstructed South, but, the former slaves needed time to adapt to free life.

Washington largely ignored the social and legal oppression African Americans had suffered since 1865. He viewed the Atlanta Exposition as the beginning of a lasting friendship between the races for two reasons. First, the event planners had dedicated an entire section of the Exposition to showcase African American achievement. Second, his invitation to address a white audience on the same platform with white members was evidence that the times had drastically changed. Less than 30 years earlier, he could have been their legal property. He viewed that day as the beginning of the future as he urged members of his race to look forward instead of dwelling on the past.

Washington recalls in his autobiography that during some of his travels, he observed a church congregation consisting of a membership of just over 200 but with 18 ministers. Also, he met a family who owned a grandfather clock that they were making payments on, but no one in the family could tell time. Washington's point is that the majority of the population must make their living by working with their hands, and in the South there was much opportunity for skilled work. Frivolous ornamentation such as grandfather clocks, he felt, was a mere distraction from the important necessities of everyday life.

In his Atlanta speech, Washington made a resounding case for the white citizens of the South to accept and embrace the education of African Americans. By working together, either they can advance the nation as a whole, or, alternatively, one-third of the South's citizens can contribute to ignorance and crime. He was not urging members of his race to accept an inferior position. He knew that the opportunity to earn a dollar must precede the opportunity to spend the dollar.

Washington's popularity greatly increased after his speech, and he became a major, but controversial, figure of history. His legacy has centered on his "Atlanta Compromise" speech, while critics largely overlook his personal achievements or his work at Tuskegee. Many viewed the compromise as accommodating. His life was testimony to the difficulties of the period. It was a transitory stage in American history. The transition, however, would evolve over many years, culminating with the Civil Rights movement in the 1960s. Washington's compromise was an initial step in that evolution. He firmly believed his race deserved full social and political equality. His insistence on individual self-improvement through education would help equip the next generation with the background they would need for direct-action, nonviolent confrontation.

Washington died in 1915 at age 59. He was buried on the grounds of the school he founded; today it is called Tuskegee University.

See also: Accommodationism; Cotton States Exposition; Du Bois, W. E. B.; Tuskegee Airmen; Tuskegee Institute

Bobby R. Holt

Bibliography

- Harlan, Louis R. Booker T. Washington: The Making of a Black Leader, 1856–1901. New York: Oxford University Press, 1975.
- Harlan, Louis R. Booker T. Washington: The Wizard of Tuskegee, 1901–1915. New York: Oxford University Press, 1986.
- Meier, August. Negro Thought in America, 1880–1915: Racial Ideologies in the Age of Booker T. Washington. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 1963.
- Norrell, Robert J. Reaping the Whirlwind: The Civil Rights Movement in Tuskegee. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1998.
- Washington, Booker T. Up From Slavery. New York: Dodd, Mead, 1965.

Washington, Harold

Harold Washington (1922–1987) was an articulate and astute lawyer and elected official who served his city and constituency in numerous capacities. He deserves attention for being the first black mayor of Chicago, Illinois. Washington used his rich professional and political career to address civil liberties, civil rights, and political equity. In this way he permanently changed the political landscape of Chicago.

During the 1960s and 1970s, the Chicago Democratic Party machine controlled 35,000 jobs in the public sector and 10,000 jobs in the private sector. These jobs and control of the city's government contracts were only a small part of the patronage system in Chicago. The machine and its operatives controlled the electoral apparatus, that is, the counting and casting of ballots, determining the validity of all nominating petitions, certifying election outcome, validating the legality of voter status, and deciding when voter fraud has taken place. The influence and clout of machine politics allowed a white minority of citizens to maintain political power and privilege at the expense of black citizens and other ethnic groups.

Washington helped form a reformist coalition of all ethnic groups outside the political mainstream created by Mayor Richard J. Daley who was one of the last of the big city machine bosses. As mayor, Harold Washington set a progressive agenda for reform, which included equal treatment of all Chicago's citizens in regard to housing, jobs, and reducing the city's budget deficit. Much of his energy during his first term as mayor was spent on dealing with the resistance of the white political alliance. Before Washington could serve his second term and implement more of his progressive plans, he died on November 25, 1987, the day before Thanksgiving.

Washington was the fourth child born to Bertha and Roy Lee Washington on April 15, 1922, in Cook County Hospital, in Chicago's segregated South Side. His father was from a small town in Kentucky. He moved to Chicago and worked in a meat packing company during the day and attended law school during the night. He later became an ordained African Methodist Episcopal minister and a Democratic precinct captain concerned with recruiting voters for the Democratic Party.

He graduated from Chicago Kent College of Law two months after Washington's birth. During this same year, Roy Lee Washington Sr. passed the Illinois bar examination and opened his own law practice. Several years later, he became an assistant prosecutor for the city. His mother was a comely and vigorous lady who was aspiring to attain a career in the theater. Consequently, she left Roy Washington Sr. and their children in the summer of 1926; they were divorced four years later. Roy was granted legal custody of their children.

Washington and his brother Edward were sent to St. Benedict The Moor, a Catholic boarding school in Milwaukee, Wisconsin. The Moor was considered perfect for the children of African American professionals; Washington remembers having sound judgment and a free spirit that was never broken by The Moor's institutionalized regimentation. Within the next 34 months, the brother ran away from school 14 times. Washington grew up around the black political elite, and by the age of 12 he was helping his father in the precinct and running errands for the Democratic Party. While attending Du Sable High School, he was known as an avid reader and a talented athlete.

In 1939, Washington dropped out of school and joined the Civilian Conservation Corps (CCC), one of Franklin Delano Roosevelt's New Deal programs that provided employment for young men in forests and fields. The CCC sent him to Michigan to do limestone quarrying and to plant evergreen trees. He was drafted into the Army Air Force when the Japanese attacked Pearl Harbor. Washington earned his high school equivalency diploma between army missions. He became a soil technician and a first sergeant while in the South Pacific.

In 1941, Washington and his girl friend, Nancy, whom he called Peaches, obtained parental permission to get married; the marriage ceremony was performed by his father in his living room. After leaving the army in 1945, Washington used his GI Bill benefits to pay for matriculation in Roosevelt University and later Northwestern University Law School. Roosevelt was one of the few racially integrated institutions of higher education. His major was political science and economics; he was a serious student who was appointed a part-time lecturer during his junior year. His classmates, 95 percent of whom were white, also elected him senior class president in 1949.

After graduation from Northwestern University Law School, Washington worked in his father's law firm. Their office was across the hall from alderman Ralph Metcalfe, a popular African American figure in the city. After his father died in 1954, Washington served as an assistant city prosecutor from 1954 to 1958. For the next six years, he was the only African American arbitrator for the Illinois Industrial Commission. He then opened a successful law practice until he decided to engage himself on a fulltime basis in Illinois politics. Washington served in the Illinois

House from 1965–1976. During this time he began to show his independence by voting against machine-supported bills and helping to organize the first black caucus for the state. Washington was concerned with attaining recognition of Martin Luther King's birthday as a statewide holiday. He also helped establish the Fair Employment Practices Commission.

After Daley died in 1976, Washington ran for mayor but garnered only 11 percent of the vote, losing even among African American voters. He then vowed to continuously challenge Chicago's Democratic Party machine. While serving in the State Senate from 1977–1980, he was nominated 11 times as one of the 10 best state legislators by his colleagues. From 1981–1983, Harold Washington was a member of the U.S. Congress. His constituency was so pleased with him that they reelected him with 92 percent of the vote. In 1983, Harold Washington became Chicago's first African American mayor. He was reelected to serve as mayor of Chicago in 1987, but tragically Washington died in office on November 25, 1987.

See also: World War II (Black Participation in)

Marva Strickland-Hill

Bibliography

- Clavel, Pierre, and Wim Wiewel. Harold Washington and the Neighborhoods: Progressive City Government in Chicago, 1983–1987. New Brunswick, NJ: Rutgers University Press, 1991.
- Kleppner, Paul. Chicago Divided: The Making of a Black Mayor. Dekalb: Northern Illinois University Press, 1985.
- Rivlin, Gary. Fire on the Prairie: Chicago's Harold Washington and the Politics of Race. New York: H. Holt, 1992.
- Travis, Dempsey. "Harold": The People's Mayor: An Authorized Biography of Mayor Harold Washington. Chicago: Urban Research Press, 1989.

Wells-Barnett, Ida

Ida B. Wells-Barnett (1862–1931) was an African American journalist, civil rights activist, and most important, an active critic of lynching in the South. She was also instrumental in aiding in women's suffrage, which ultimately ended in the passage of the Nineteenth Amendment in 1920.

In the early 1860s, the United States was embroiled in a violent Civil War. In the small town of Holly Springs, Mississippi, a slave carpenter witnessed the birth of his daughter, Ida Wells. On July 16, 1862, Ida Wells was born in Holly Spring, Mississippi. Because she was born in the slave state of Mississippi, the young Ida was born into a life of slavery. Her parents, Jim and Elizabeth Wells, were slaves and she became the property of the respective plantation owner. With the conclusion of the Civil War in 1865, the life of the Wells family did not improve dramatically. The father decided to continue working for the slave owner. Unfortunately, Ida's life assumed a tragic tone in 1878 when her parents became victims of a yellow fever epidemic that ravaged Holly Springs. This left the 16-year-old Ida in charge of her seven brothers and sisters. She decided to get her certificate in teaching and gain employment in one of the local schools. In 1881, Ida took two of her younger siblings and went to Memphis, Tennessee in search of better economic and financial opportunities. While in Memphis, she continued to teach to support her siblings. At the same time, Ida decided that a college education was a necessity for an African American woman. As a result, in 1880, the 18-year-old Ida entered Fisk (Rust) University.

One of the issues that most concerned Ida Wells was the issue of racial equality. In the South, law was still governed by the Jim Crow. That is, a state of legal segregation continued to be the rule throughout much of the South. In the 1880s, Wells decided to challenge a particular aspect of the Jim Crow South. In 1884, she started a campaign against segregation on local railroads. In the summer of 1884, she was forcibly removed from a white only carriage. Ida Wells believed this to be a moral injustice. She sued the Chesapeake, Ohio, and Southwestern Railroad. The lawsuit was instigated to try to weaken the Jim Crow laws in regard to segregation. The local courts judged in favor of Ida Wells. The Court of Appeals repeatedly overturned the lower court decisions. She recounted her story of the lawsuit in the black church weekly called The Living Way. Despite the setbacks, the resistance initiated by Wells became a symbol of African American resistance to the Jim Crow laws of the South.

In the late 1880s, Wells also became involved in journalism. In the summer of 1887, she was appointed as the secretary of the Afro-American Press Association. She also became part-owner of the Memphis Free Speech and was in charge of the editorial operations.

As Wells recovered from the challenges of the segregationist laws of the South, she engaged in another campaign, which became the centerpiece of Wells's career as an activist. In the late 1880s, lynching was a severe problem in the

Ida B. Wells was a civil rights activist, journalist, and crusader against lynching. (Library of Congress)

South. The local governments tolerated the actions while the national government looked the other way. In 1889, 728 African American men and women were lynched. The lynchings were mostly unprovoked. Of the 728 lynchings, 66 percent were over small differences and issues. As an African American intellectual, Wells could not tolerate this behavior. In addition, her activism in regards to lynching stemmed from a personal experience. On March 9, 1891, three African American proprietors, who were also Wells's personal friends, Thomas Moss, Calving McDowell, and Wil Stewart of the People's Grocery Store, were lynched. Allegedly, an interracial dispute in front of the store led to the violent lynching. Wells wrote and a scathing editorial indictment of lynching called "Eight Men Lynched" in the Free Speech on May 21, 1892. This led to the destruction of the newspaper and her exile from the South. She then began writing for the New York Age and adjusted to her new life in the North. This event was significant in Wells's life. She immediately started a public campaign to publicize the atrocities of lynching. She became part-owner of the newspaper,

The Free Speech and Head Light. Wells, under the pseudonym of Iola, would write editorial pieces and eyewitness accounts of lynchings in the South. Despite the repeated threats on her life, she continued to publicize lynching in the North, as well as internationally.

Her public life in essence started in 1892. On October 5, 1892, Wells gave a speech in New York City in front of 250 African American women about her difficult experiences dealing with the Southern lynch codes. She subsequently published "Southern Horrors: Lynch Law in All its Phases," a pamphlet describing the realities of African Americans in the reconstructed South. In Southern Horrors, Wells traced a pervasive belief that African American men are natural "rapists." She also reminded her readers that during the Civil War, Southern men left their plantations and families in the hands of black men. She concluded by noting that "lynching was an institutionalized practice supported and encouraged by established leaders of the community and the press they influenced." Wells had brought the atrocities of lynching to the fore in the public mind.

In 1893, Wells decided (or was forced) to move to Chicago, Illinois to continue her career in journalistic writing. The Chicago newspaper, the Chicago Inter-Ocean, hired Wells as editor to write exposé articles against lynching in the South. In a particular exposé, the paper proposed that Wells secretly pose as a widower to examine the lynching of C. J. Miller in the small town of Bardwell, Kentucky. By the time she arrived in Bardwell, the lynchers publicly acknowledged that they had killed the wrong man. After investigating the case, Wells concluded that the victim, Miller, was used as a scapegoat. Although thousands were involved in the lynching, no one was punished. Wells decided to depart for Chicago when she realized that there was not a resolution to the problem. Her reporting and the risks she was willing to take earned Wells an international reputation. She received an invitation from the "Brotherhood of Man" to visit Great Britain for a lecture tour. She cheerfully accepted the offer as a way to spread her opposition to lynching. While on her lecture tour, Wells shared her antilynching message with several groups. At the same time, she sent articles to the Chicago Inter-Ocean newspaper. While still in England, the American press began writing insipid articles about Wells. She also lectured at the British Anti-Lynching Commission, as well as other prominent antilynching societies in England. While in England, she received assurance that the issue of lynching was indeed an issue with international repercussions. She also lectured throughout towns of England with the purpose of drumming up international support for antilynching. Unfortunately for Wells, the threats against her life in the South had become more vicious. In addition, opponents of her vision firebombed her newspaper headquarters. She thus had to move to Chicago, Illinois to escape the threats and violence.

In 1895, after her marriage to the prominent African American lawyer from Chicago, Ferdinand Barnett, Wells-Barnett continued to be a vocal and outspoken critic against lynching in the South. She published numerous articles and books, which offered statistical analysis of this chronic social problem. Her most important book was entitled, The Red Record, in which she offered the first statistical report on lynching in the South. The book was hailed as a masterpiece, as well as symbolic of the state of race relations in the late 19th century. As a nationally prominent figure in the crusade against lynching, Wells-Barnett visited President McKinley in 1898, demanding government action in the case against a black postmaster who was lynched in South Carolina. A few years later, in 1901, she wrote Lynching and the Excuse for It. She offered a sociological examination of the reasons southerners engaged in this violent behavior. Wells-Barnett noted that white southerners engaged in lynching as a way to intimidate blacks from getting involved in politics. The end result of this alienation was that power would continue to reside in the White South. The impact of Lynching was national. As Progressives and Theodore Roosevelt read the works of Ida Wells-Barnett, they became more disgusted by the state of race relations in the nation. The political system in the South was repressive to the extent that any challenge to that system would be viewed as a radical challenge. In 1896, Wells-Barnett formed a collective organization called the National Association of Colored Women. Even though she helped form the organization, she asked Mary Tyrell to serve as its first president while Wells-Barnett raised her children. The creation of this organization acted as a starting point for Wells-Barnett's political activism. As Booker T. Washington dined with President Roosevelt, other "radical" leaders like Wells-Barnett and W. E. B. Du Bois sought alternative forms of equality.

While becoming active on the issue of racial equality and lynching, Wells-Barnett also became entangled with the local chapter of the progressive movement. In August 1889, two women in Chicago, Jane Addams and Ellen Gates Starr, founded a settlement home in Chicago. At Hull House, college-educated women would settle in local immigrant enclaves and teach the immigrants the ideals of American life. The ideal was to create a sense of civic pride in the recently arrived immigrants, thus creating productive citizens.

Wells-Barnett, who was a friend of Jane Addams, decided that the "settlement house" concept could be tried among the African American community. Sensing that there existed a need for the same type of social relief, Wells-Barnett opened a settlement house in Chicago, geared primarily for African Americans. She founded the Woman's Era Club, which was the first civic organization for African American women. The name of the club was later changed in honor of the founder of the club. The club aided African American women in occupations and culture. It was an efficient organization that in the long run proved to be successful in aiding the community. In addition to the settlement houses, Wells-Barnett and Addams also became involved in a campaign to block the continued segregation of public schools in Chicago. Wells-Barnett also served as secretary for the National African American Council and the Negro Fellowship League. Wells-Barnett's national fame as a promoter of civil rights was reaching an apex.

In addition to the Woman's Era Club, Wells-Barnett also became involved in national politics. The leadership of Booker T. Washington, who she viewed as accommodationist, particularly angered Ida Wells-Barnett. She believed that Washington's accommodationist stance was too lenient and did not offer African Americans any semblance of identity. Other African Americans, including W. E. B. Du Bois, agreed with Wells-Barnett's beliefs. In June 1905, W. E. B. Du Bois led a delegation of 29 blacks to Niagara Falls, New York, demanding equality and political rights. Ida Wells-Barnett was one of two African American women who supported the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP) and their quest for political and social equality. In the short term, Wells-Barnett had a falling out with Du Bois over her seeming radicalism, and the NAACP developed without her strong leadership qualities. When the first edition of The Crisis was published, Wells-Barnett's name was not even mentioned as a founding member of the organization.

With the NAACP appearing on the national scene, Wells-Barnett turned her attention to other issues, specifically women's suffrage. In the early 20th century, women had struggled for suffrage; Carrie Chapman Catt and her National American Woman Suffrage Association (NAWA) clamored for a suffrage amendment. Nationally, the progressives were ill prepared to offer women the right to vote. Ida Wells-Barnett became involved in the local suffrage movement in Chicago. In 1909, she became the first black woman suffrage associate at the Alpha Suffrage Club of Chicago, which had been a predominantly white organization. She was instrumental in women gaining the right to vote as she gained national acclaim for her struggles with civil rights and lynchings. She now became a standard bearer for the Nineteenth Amendment. As the NAWSA marched in Washington, D.C. in 1916, she also led the way to gain suffrage for all women.

In 1917, the United States became militarily involved in World War I. During the war, African Americans performed a variety of functions in numerous capacities. Many served on the domestic front as cooks and sanitation workers. There was a substantial amount of African Americans who fought in Europe, the most significant being the 369th Regiment out of Brooklyn. Thus, African Americans served in a variety of areas during the war.

The issue that bothered Wells-Barnett during World War I was a contradiction. Many African Americans sacrificed their lives in Europe to protect the freedoms of Americans. Yet, in the United States, African Americans were not given political and social rights, despite their sacrifices. She became especially concerned over the events in Houston in 1917 involving African American soldiers.

In August 1917, black soldiers reacting to segregation and abuse by the local police attacked white citizens; 16 whites and black 4 soldiers died. The U.S. Army indicted 118 soldiers, 110 of whom court martialed. Nineteen blacks were executed by hanging. This event, along with an increase in discrimination and violence, angered Wells-Barnett. She publicized the event on the national stage as another form of lynching.

In the years after the war, Ida Wells-Barnett focused on rearing her four children. This new caretaker role did not diminish her continued activities toward racial and social activity. During the 1920s, she worked with the national government to legally end the practice of lynching. Her last work was the publication of her autobiography, Crusade for Justice. A few months before her death, legislation was signed making lynching a federal crime. This was the highpoint of her active political career. In 1931, Ida Wells-Barnett, mother, civil rights leader, journalist, and activist died of uremia in Chicago.

See also: Antilynching Campaign; Black Self-Defense; Exoduster Movement; Great Migration; Lynching; National Association for the Advancement of Colored People; Niagara Movement; Suffrage Movement, Women's; Washington, Booker T.; White Mob Violence

Jaime Ramón Olivares

Bibliography

- Barnett, Ida. Crusade for Justice: The Autobiography of Ida Wells. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1970.
- Davis, Simone W. "The 'Weak Race' and the Winchester: Political Voices in the Pamphlets of Ida B. Wells-Barnett." Legacy: A Journal of American Women Writers 12, no. 2 (1995):77-97.
- Fradia, Dennis. Ida B. Wells: Mother of the Civil Rights Movement. New York: Clarion Books, 2000.
- Ida B. Wells: A Passion for Justice*. Videotape. William Greaves Productions, 1990. 58 min.
- Logan, Shirley W. "Rhetorical Strategies in Ida B. Wells's 'Southern Horrors': Lynch Law in All Its Phases." SAGE: A Scholarly Journal on Black Women 8, no. 1 (1991):3-9.
- McMurry, Linda O. To Keep the Water Troubled: The Life of Ida B. Wells. New York: Oxford University Press, 1998.
- Ochiai, Akiko. "Ida B. Wells and Her Crusade for Justice: An African American Woman's Testimonial Autobiography." Soundings 75 (1992):365-81.
- Schechter, Patricia. Ida B. Wells Barnett and American Reforms, 1880-1930. Chapel Hill: North Carolina Press, 2001.
- Thompson, Mildred I. Ida B. Wells-Barnett: An Exploratory Study of an American Black Woman, 1893-1930. Brooklyn, NY: Carlson, 1990.

White, Walter

Born in Atlanta, Georgia, Walter Francis White (1893-1955) led the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP) from 1929 to 1955. The White family was part of the black social elite of the early 20th century, some of whom had light skin, demonstrating their biracial backgrounds. Walter White had blond hair and blue eyes, features that allowed him secretly to attend whites-only affairs to get information for his black allies. The fact that White did not look physically black, yet chose to identify with the group of his birth, confounded those people who at the time could not realize any value in African American cultural life. Walter White, in contrast, knew that he was a black man and believed that the violence perpetrated against blacks by southern whites was reason enough to validate his championing of the race.

The Atlanta Race Riot of 1906 served as a catalyst for the race consciousness of Walter White. Thirteen-year-old White had accompanied his father, a federal postal carrier, in the mail carriage. For weeks, two competing city newspapers published sensationalized articles describing the brutal assaults of white women by black men. Although most of these stories had little truth to them, white Atlantans became incensed over the supposed attacks. On September 22, 1906, after both papers printed multiple stories of the alleged attacks of white women in both morning and evening editions, mobs of whites attacked blacks in streets, in businesses, and in homes. Walter White and his father escaped the downtown mobs because attackers assumed they were white. Along the way home, the father rescued a black woman chased by whites, demonstrating to his son that despite the seeming advantage in their light complexions, they still had an obligation to help other blacks no matter the consequences. Later that night a mob attempted to burn down the White family home, turning back only when harassed by gunshots from a neighboring store. Later in life, White would express both gratitude toward the neighbors who helped him avoid becoming a killer at 13, and dismay toward the whites who almost forced him to kill at such a young age to protect his home.

Certain of his racial obligations, White attended historically black Atlanta University, graduating in 1916, and going to work for Standard Life Insurance Company. He also helped found the Atlanta branch of the NAACP in 1916, serving as its executive secretary. Early in 1918, he relocated to New York at the urging of national secretary James Weldon Johnson to assist in antilynching reform. For 10 years, White would serve as assistant secretary, using his skin complexion as a cover to witness antiblack disturbances across the nation. In some instances, White became the target of would-be lynchers when someone revealed his racial identity. White sent wire reports to the NAACP in New York that became part of a series printed in the Crisis, the national journal edited by W. E. B. Du Bois.

White also published Rope and Faggot in 1929, a book detailing more than 30 lynchings and race riots. The book created renewed calls for antilynching legislation in Congress and eventually forced southern officials to do better at protecting blacks alleged with crimes against whites. One finding White made that agreed with the investigations done by reformer Ida B. Wells was that most lynchings did not have a direct connection to real black criminal activity. Instead, angry whites attacked blacks perceived as economic competitors who refused to submit to the racial status quo in the nation.

Living in New York, White participated in the artistic period known as the Harlem Renaissance. During these years, he published Fire in the Flint in 1924, a fictional book based on his travels for the NAACP. Two years later came Flight, a story about the black migration from the rural South to the North during the Great Migration. White also involved himself socially in New York, working with other prominent leaders to secure philanthropic funding for Harlem Renaissance artists.

As head of the NAACP, White provided the needed leadership that produced the 1954 Brown v. Board of Education decision by the United States Supreme Court, ending the legal sanctioning of racial segregation that had existed since Plessy v. Ferguson in 1896. White hired Charles Hamilton Houston and Thurgood Marshall, both from Howard University Law School in Washington, D.C., to plan a strategy to attack legalized segregation in the South. After years of court victories that chipped away at segregation, the NAACP won Brown, the case that finally called for overturning the precedent set in Plessy. Walter White died the next year, survived by his second wife, Poppy Canon.

See also: Atlanta, Georgia, Riot of 1906; Du Bois, W. E. B.; Houston, Charles Hamilton; Lynching; Marshall, Thurgood; National Association for the Advancement of Colored People

David Kenneth Pye

Bibliography

- Cannon, Poppy. A Gentle Knight: My Husband, Walter White. New York: Rinehart, 1956.
- Janken, Kenneth R. "Civil Rights and Socializing in the Harlem Renaissance: Walter White and the Fictionalization of the New Negro in Georgia," Georgia Historical Quarterly 80 (1996):817–34.
- Janken, Kenneth R. White: The Biography of Walter White, Mr. NAACP. New York: New Press, 2003.
- White, Walter. A Man Called White: The Autobiography of Walter White. New York: Viking Press, 1948.
- White, Walter. Rope and Faggot: A Biography of Judge Lynch. New York: A. A. Knopf, 1929.

White Citizens' Council

The White Citizens' Council was the Southern white reaction to the Supreme Court's landmark 1954 Brown v. Board of Education decision, which mandated the end of racially segregated public schools, varied widely. Groups such as the Ku Klux Klan sought to resist integration through ritual violence and terror, and “high-minded” southern politicians hoped to forestall the demise of Jim Crow with a revival of archaic constitutional theories, such as nullification and interposition. The White Citizens’ Council, a segregationist organization that would eventually draw in thousands of anxious members across the South, appealed to the more “respectable” elements of society in its quest to undermine Brown and sustain the racial caste. Eschewing the predatory tactics of the Klan, the Councils instead relied on political pressure, economic intimidation, and legal maneuvering to achieve its goals. Before petering out in the 1960s, the Citizens’ Council became one of the most powerful and effective instruments in rallying white public opinion against desegregation.

Residents of Indianola, Mississippi organized the first chapter of the White Citizens’ Council in July 1954. Within a matter of months, the council movement had spilled over into Alabama, Georgia, Virginia, and eventually all the former states of the Confederacy. Events such as the Montgomery bus boycott and the integration of the University of Alabama by Autherine Lucy, along with efforts by the NAACP to desegregate local school districts in the wake of Brown, propelled thousands of whites into the group. By 1956, arguably the council’s peak year, organizers claimed more than 250,000 dues-paying members, making it, in the vaunted words of one official, one of the greatest mass movements of public opinion in American history. To better facilitate action and policy between the scattered chapters, council officials created the Citizens’ Councils of America (CCA) in April 1956 and established headquarters in the Delta town of Greenwood, Mississippi. Leadership of the national organization fell to Robert Patterson, cofounder of the original Citizens’ Council in Indianola, and William J. Simmons, who became the editor of the group’s widely distributed newsletter, the Citizens’ Council.

The council movement found its most fertile ground in the Black Belt regions of the South, where African Americans composed a substantial portion of the population and, for the most part, continued to earn their livings as sharecroppers and tenant farmers. The ranks of the early councils were filled with the middle and upper classes of southern white society—planters, lawyers, bankers, doctors, businessmen, and politicians—who foresaw an erosion of their political hegemony with the implementation of

Brown and who shuddered at the thoughts of their children attending class alongside the offspring of their employees and clients. To counter such a threat, thousands of prominent lowland whites readily adopted the council philosophy, which demanded a rigorous defense of the social order, strict conformity to the ideals of white supremacy, and a veritable holy war against the evils of “miscegenation” and “mongrelization.”

In its crusade to stamp out proponents of integration, the Citizens’ Councils used numerous legal and economic tactics. Members were encouraged to fire black workers who supported desegregation or who attempted to register to vote. Tenants and sharecroppers were ordered to vacate farms if they were suspected of “radical” or otherwise questionable activity. And the council routinely published the names of NAACP members to discourage their continued activism.

African Americans were not the sole targets of the council’s wrath. White racial moderates and others who appeared “soft” on integration also found themselves at the mercy of the expanding movement. Council leaders conducted scurrilous campaigns to destroy the political careers of such “neo-Populists” as Jim Folsom of Alabama and Earl Long of Louisiana, men who refused to trumpet the rhetoric of white supremacy and racism. As a result, both men lost sway with the electorate. In Arkansas, the Capital Citizens’ Council led the opposition to the 1957 integration of Central High School in Little Rock. Members flooded Governor Orval Faubus’s office with letters, urging him to use emergency powers to prevent integration; harangued local school board members for “betraying” the white race with plans for desegregation; and took out newspapers ads to expose the plot between the NAACP and school officials. Largely because of such efforts, the integration of Central High flared into a constitutional crisis. In Mississippi, council officials, led by William J. Simmons, enjoyed a veritable stranglehold on state government and routinely flexed their political muscle to ensure strict adherence to the organization’s racial orthodoxy. Councilors there pressured lawmakers into passing favorable segregationist legislation, scoured libraries and schools for pro-integration materials, and waged a brutal campaign to subvert the freedom of the press. As a result, the Magnolia State, according to one observer, became a “closed society,” where moderation was tantamount to treason.

By the early 1960s, after enjoying years of unbridled political and social influence, the Citizens’ Council movement began to decline. Random acts of violence by council members, petty infighting, and, most important, its failure to uphold segregation destroyed the organization. After passage of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 and the Voting Rights Act of 1965, all that remained were the diehards and “bitter-enders” who refused to accept the inevitable tide of history. See also: Ku Klux Klan; National Association for the Advancement of Colored People; White Supremacy

Gary S. Sprayberry

Bibliography

- Bartley, Numan V. Rise of Massive Resistance: Race and Politics in the South during 1950's. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1969.
- Cook, James Graham. The Segregationists. New York: Appleton-Century-Crofts, 1962.
- Martin, John Bartlow. The Deep South Says Never. New York: Ballantine Books, 1957.
- McMillen, Neil R. The Citizens' Council: Organized Resistance to the Second Reconstruction, 1954-64. Chicago: University of Illinois Press, 1971.

White Mob Violence

White mob violence toward African Americans in the late 19th and early 20th centuries was both frequent and brutal. White mobs killed around 3,000 African Americans in the South between 1882 and 1930, although the exact figures will never be known because many of these crimes went unrecorded. African American men, however, were not the only victims of white supremacist brutality. White mobs attacked Jews, Catholics, Mexicans, and other minority groups all over the United States in this period, including some women and children. Nonetheless, African American men bore the brunt of white racism from the Civil War until the mid-20th century; and most of these attacks took place in the Jim Crow South.

Before the Civil War, deviant white men, such as thieves or abolitionists, who threatened Southern values were most likely to suffer at the hands of mob violence, or “lynch law.” Punishments tended to be much milder than later in the century, as mobs flogged their victims or banished them from the area rather than put them to death. Slaves were rarely the targets of white mob violence in the antebellum period because they were valuable property and thus protected by their masters. Only in extreme circumstances like insurrection scares were slaves subjected to lynch law. During Reconstruction, however, African Americans became the main focus of white supremacist violence. Southern lynch mobs, some ephemeral and reactionary, but others longstanding and organized (such as the Ku Klux Klan), victimized and intimidated African Americans on a daily basis, with the full support of their community.

Definitions of what constitutes a “mob” vary, but the usually involve a group of more than three or four people, acting in concert. Early work on collective violence, such as that of Gustave LeBon, seemed to justify the actions of mobs, arguing that people in a crowd lose their individual morals and character and form a collective mentality. Although this theory has been criticized for absolving the members of lynch mobs of their crimes, it is important to note that the perpetrators of mob violence against African Americans were ordinary people of all ranks of society and were not deviant members of the community. It is therefore necessary to try to understand why they committed such terrible atrocities.

Mob violence was an expression of collective values; it unified the white community by reaffirming white supremacy, and thus the perpetrators of such violence did not risk punishment. This was particularly the case with the highly ritualized, spectacle lynchings that attracted audiences in the thousands, including women and children. Mob violence toward African Americans took place when whites thought that the black population was threatening the social order. Whites believed that they needed to keep African Americans “in their place,” as after the Civil War the boundary that divided black and white along caste lines (which had been less crucial under slavery because of the legal subjugation of African Americans) became increasingly blurred.

This perceived threat from the black population came in a variety of forms. Whites maintained that they were merely protecting white women from the sexual aggression of black men, but in 1892 antilynching campaigner Ida B. Wells dispelled this myth; her investigations found that only one third of lynchings of African Americans were for raping a white woman. Historians have instead pointed to political and economic factors to explain the virulence of white mob violence. Whites used lynching to intimidate African Americans in order to prevent them from voting or seeking employment coveted by whites. White mobs also targeted those African Americans who they perceived as having achieved too much economic success, as they thought they were attempting to cross the caste boundary. This is why mob violence tended to increase during times of economic depression.

Whites often used African Americans as scapegoats for their feelings of inadequacy, as they both psychologically and physically emasculated black men in order to reassert their supremacy. White mobs hanged or shot most of their victims, but they reserved the most brutal punishments for those African Americans who had committed the most serious “crimes” and sometimes burned them alive or tortured them to death. This process was often highly ritualized, involving mutilation of the body, including castration, both before and after death.

African Americans did not just passively accept lynching, however. Individuals such as W. E. B. Du Bois and Ida B. Wells, and later the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP), campaigned tirelessly on a national level against white supremacist violence, and in doing so risked their lives. Many African Americans also pushed the boundaries of caste in their own communities, challenging white supremacy on all levels despite the possibility of retaliation. After World War II the tide had turned against lynching, and in 1946 President Truman hosted the National Emergency Committee Against Mob Violence, which condemned the actions of the Ku Klux Klan and the lynching of African Americans, and eventually led to the establishment of a permanent civil rights commission and the desegregation of the military. Although white mob violence did not disappear with civil rights, and still sometimes takes place today, by mid century—the majority of the white population no longer considered it acceptable.

See also: Jim Crow; Ku Klux Klan; Lynching; Plan de San Diego; Wells-Barnett, Ida

Lydia Plath

Bibliography

- Brundage, William Fitzhugh. Under Sentence of Death: Lynching in the South. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1997.
- Royster, Jacqueline Jones, ed. Southern Horrors and Other Writings: The Anti-Lynching Campaign of Ida B. Wells, 1892–1900. Boston: Bedford Books, 1997.
- Shapiro, Herbert. White Violence and Black Response: From Reconstruction to Montgomery. Amherst: The University of Massachusetts Press, 1988.

- Waldrep, Christopher, ed. Lynching in America: A History in Documents. New York: New York University Press, 2006.
- White, Walter. Rope and Faggot: A Biography of Judge Lynch. New York: A. A. Knopf, 1929.
- Williamson, Joel. The Crucible of Race: Black/White Relations in the American South since Emancipation. New York: Oxford University Press, 1984.

White Primaries

During the early-20th century all southern states except Florida, North Carolina, and Tennessee barred African Americans from voting in Democratic Party primary elections. Established to nominate candidates for political office, primaries are an integral part of the electoral process. This was especially true in the American South where, in the years after Reconstruction, government was dominated by the Democratic Party. Because there was no effective opposition, the South was virtually a one-party state. Like the poll tax, literacy test, and grandfather clause, the whites-only primary was designed to restrict African American's constitutional right to vote.

In establishing white primaries, southern Democrats were motivated by two major assumptions. First they desired to prevent African Americans from achieving social and political equality, and second, white southerners mistakenly believed that African Americans would forever remain loyal to the Republican Party. Despite white resistance, southern blacks challenged their exclusion from the American political process.

In 1923, the Texas legislature passed a law declaring all African Americans ineligible to vote in a Democratic primary election. The next year Dr. Lawrence A. Nixon, an El Paso physician and member of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP), attempted to vote in the Democratic primary election. When he was prevented from casting a ballot, Nixon filed suit arguing the new law violated his Fourteenth Amendment right to equal protection and his right to vote guaranteed by the Fifteenth Amendment. The case made its way to the U.S. Supreme Court, which upheld Nixon's argument that his right to equal protection under the law was violated; however, the court did not rule on the question of voting rights.

Undaunted by the Supreme Court's action, the Texas legislature granted political parties the authority to decide who could vote in party elections. Soon afterwards, the state Democratic Executive Committee adopted a resolution that stated only white citizens were allowed to vote in primaries. Nixon, refusing to accept these discriminatory actions, tried to vote and was again rebuffed. Filing a second lawsuit, Nixon's case was again heard by the U.S. Supreme Court. The equal protection clause was again used by the court to strike down the Texas primary law. But this did not settle the matter.

In 1932, the Texas Democratic Party convention adopted the policy that only white Texans were eligible to vote in party primaries. The NAACP declined to challenge the suit, but Houston barber Richard R. Grovey did. For the third time in a decade the U.S. Supreme Court heard a case regarding the constitutionality of white primaries. Grovey argued along the same lines as Nixon, but the court did not accept that the actions of the Texas Democratic Party violated his Fourteenth Amendment rights. Instead, the court held that the white primary was created by a private association rather than the state and thus was not bound by the equal protection clause.

Despite this setback, African Americans continued to challenge white primaries. In 1940, Houston dentist Lonnie E. Smith was prevented from voting in the Texas Democratic primary by election official S. S. Allwright. Like Nixon and Grovey, Smith filed suit and arguments were heard by the U.S. Supreme Court. Reversing itself, the court ruled that the white primary violated Smith's, and by extension all African Americans, Fifteenth Amendment right to vote. As a result, black voting across the south increased dramatically. In Texas, for example, voter registration increased from 30,000 in 1940 to 100,000 in 1947. Although it did not eliminate all voting restrictions, the Smith decision was an important step in achieving lasting civil rights for African Americans in the United States.

See also: Disfranchisement; MFDP; National Association for the Advancement of Colored People; Voting Rights Act 1965

Gerald Wayne Dowdy

Bibliography

Key, V. O. Jr. Southern Politics in State and Nation. New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 1949.
Klarman, Michael J. From Jim Crow to Civil Rights. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press, 2004.

White Supremacy

White supremacy is a racist ideology that has existed for hundreds of years. When Bartolomé de las Casas argued in the 16th century that Spaniards were cruel and barbaric in enslaving the Taino of Hispaniola, his critics responded that Native Americans were more like monkeys than humans and the indigenous people were mere children.

White supremacy shaped every aspect of antebellum society and undergirded a paternalistic society built on the superiority of slaveholders over their property, enslaved Africans. Slaveholders gained immense benefits from supremacist ideology. The inferiority of African Americans confirmed the benevolence and necessity of the institution of slavery. Furthermore, racist ideologies encouraged poor whites to identify with slaveholders and discriminate against African Americans.

With the destruction of the institution of slavery after the Civil War and the passage of the Thirteenth Amendment in 1865, white supremacy thrived during and after Reconstruction in the South. After 4 million African Americans gained their freedom, Southerners and other Americans looked for ways to control them and to justify white economic, political, and social dominance. After the Civil War, African Americans endeavored to join the middle class in order to counter white supremacy. They graduated from colleges and universities and black men won elections at the state and local levels.

The rise of the Ku Klux Klan was one attempt to undo the gains of African Americans and enforce white supremacy. The Mississippi Plan was a bold effort by the Democrats to use force to win elections and uphold white supremacy in the South. The rise of Jim Crow politics systematized disfranchisement, and the Democratic Party promoted black disfranchisement and white supremacy.

The forced separation of races became the foundation for white racial identity, but black homes, businesses, churches, and bodies threatened to buttress black autonomy and provide a challenge to white supremacy. Lynchings, however, denied the existence of black space, and even the bodies of African Americans could be invaded at any time by whites.

See also: Jim Crow; Ku Klux Klan; Lynching; White Citizens' Council; White Mob Violence

Nathan Herrod

Bibliography

- Berlin, Ira. Many Thousands Gone: The First Two Generations of Slavery in North America. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1998.
- Blight, David. Race and Reunion: The Civil War in the American Memory. Cambridge, MA: The Belknap Press, 2001.
- Gilmore, Glenda Elizabeth. Gender and Jim Crow: Women and the Politics of White Supremacy in North Carolina, 1896–1920. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1996.
- Grace Elizabeth Hale, Making Whiteness: The Culture of Segregation in the South, 1890–1940. New York: Vintage Books, 1998.

Wilkins, Roy

Roy Wilkins (1901–1981) was a prominent member and leader of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP). During his tenure with the organization, Wilkins and the NAACP helped to usher in the popular Civil Rights movement of the 1960s and push for popular legislation such as the Civil Rights Act of 1964 and the Voting Rights Act of 1965.

Roy Ottoway Wilkins was born August 30, 1901, in St. Louis, Missouri. Wilkins remained in Missouri with his mother, father, sister Armeda, and brother Earl until the death of his mother. Then Armeda, Earl, and Roy moved to St. Paul, Minnesota to live with their deceased mother's sister Elizabeth and her husband Sam. Although Roy's father was still alive, in many ways he respected and viewed his Uncle Sam as his stand-in father.

Wilkins began school at the Whittier Grammar School at the age of six. He graduated salutatorian of his class in June 1919 and then went to the University of Minnesota. Wilkins grew up with a benign look at race. Although he was the only African American at Whittier, he was always treated fairly and never viewed race as an issue. When Wilkins began studying at the University of Minnesota, however, this view changed. In the summer of 1920, three African Americans in Duluth, Minnesota, were unfairly lynched for the rape of a white woman. While all the evidence supported the innocence of the African American boys, they nonetheless were found guilty. This incident in Duluth forever altered Wilkins's view of race.

In 1922, Wilkins became the editor of the St. Paul Appeal—the voice of African Americans at the University of Minnesota and in the St. Paul community at large. The next year Wilkins graduated from the University with a degree in sociology and a minor in journalism. After graduation in October 1923, Wilkins moved to Kansas City to take a job with the Kansas City Call. Once in Kansas City, Wilkins became entrenched in the Jim Crow South. As he saw members of his race being treated unfairly and he himself was treated unfairly, he turned more and more active in the promotion of black equality. While at The Call, Wilkins fought southern racism in his articles and editorials.

In the late 1920s, Wilkins lost his Aunt Elizabeth, Uncle Sam, and sister Armeda within one week's time. Roy's brother Earl moved to Kansas City to be with him. In September 1929, Wilkins then married Minnie Badeau. The two never had any children, but stayed together until Wilkins's death. Wilkins's outspoken editorials at The Call gained national attention from the NAACP. The organization offered Wilkins a position with their newspaper, The Crisis, but Wilkins turned it down. A few years later, in 1931, the NAACP again offered Wilkins a position as assistant secretary, which he accepted. The position at The Crisis was merely a business position to Wilkins. As assistant secretary, however, Wilkins would be able to work side by side with some of the most prominent civil rights advocates in the country. In August, Roy moved to New York and began work with the NAACP. In 1934, when W. E. B. Du Bois left the organization, Roy took over as editor of The Crisis.

In 1949, Executive Secretary Walter White requested a leave of absence from the NAACP. Wilkins temporarily took over the position. In 1951 White returned. Four years later, in 1955, White died and Wilkins became the executive secretary of the NAACP. Although many African Americans in the 1950s were promoting a gradual or slow pace for civil rights, Wilkins pushed for more progress. He felt blacks had been treated unfairly long enough. As executive secretary, Wilkins not only promoted, but participated in, civil rights events such as the March on Washington in 1963 and the Selma marches in 1966.

In the 1960s, the Civil Rights movement exploded. The NAACP had ushered in the Civil Rights movement, but many other organizations were on the scene by 1965. Many of these new groups supported black power and separation of the races. Wilkins fought hard for black equality, but he would never support separatism as advocated by black power supporters. To Wilkins separatism was a reinstatement of Plessy v. Ferguson and the case's separate but equal doctrine.

Roy Wilkins, Executive Secretary of the NAACP, holds a hangman's noose mailed to his organization's headquarters, undated photo. (Library of Congress)

Throughout Wilkins's time with the NAACP, he met with Presidents Roosevelt, Truman, Eisenhower, Kennedy, Johnson, Nixon, Ford, and Carter. Through these meetings Wilkins helped to promote black equality. He encouraged Kennedy and Johnson to pass the famed Civil Rights Act of 1964 and the Voting Rights Act of 1965. Wilkins always advocated civil rights through legislative means. He protested to the legislative, executive, and judicial branches of the government. He felt it was through these organizations that African Americans would receive their long-awaited equality.

In July 1977, Wilkins retired from the NAACP. Although this was not the end of the relationship between Wilkins and the NAACP, it was the end of his active role in the organization's leadership. Until his death in 1981, Wilkins continued to advocate for the NAACP and civil rights.

See also: Cold War and Civil Rights; Du Bois, W. E. B.; March on Washington, 1963; National Association for the Advancement of Colored People; Robeson, Paul; White, Walter

Mindy R. Weidman

Bibliography

Wilkins, Roy with Tom Mathews. Standing Fast: The Autobiography of Roy Wilkins. New York: DeCapo Press, 1982.

Williams, Hosea

Hosea Lorenzo Williams (1926–2000) was a pastor and civil rights activist known for his boundless energy. Born January 5, 1926, in Attapulgus, Georgia, to blind parents, Williams was raised by his grandparents after his mother died while giving birth to his younger sister Teresa. His mother's untimely death left them in the care of her parents, Turner and Lela Williams, with whom he stayed until he was 13 years old. While growing up under his grandparents' guidance in Decatur County, a poor area in southwest Georgia, Williams's affection and concern for the poor and underprivileged began as he became aware that many whites limited the life chances of African Americans in order to prevent them from accumulating wealth and property.

In 1939, Williams had a more intense introduction to the racial tension of the segregated South. A group of racist whites from Decatur County accused him of having an "affair" with a white girl from the area and sought to lynch him for his alleged inappropriate behavior. This mob approached his grandparents' home seeking Williams, but as he described later, his grandfather held them at bay with a gun until a friendly white neighbor interceded to prevent further violence.

Williams would later move to Tallahassee, Florida, and then back to Decatur County finding work on farms, cleaning homes, serving as a caretaker, and working at a bus station between Decatur County, Georgia and Tallahassee Florida. Williams enlisted in the United States Army in 1942, serving as a weapons carrier, as well as time as a staff sergeant under General George S. Patton, and fought in the Battle of the Bulge, one of the most significant battles in France during World War II.

After returning to the United States, Williams was awarded the Purple Heart for wounds received in service. Life after military service for Williams was not the happiest of times. At a segregated Greyhound bus station in Americus, Georgia, he drank from a "Whites Only" water fountain and a mob of whites nearly beat him to death for his actions. Williams later enrolled at Morris Brown College in Atlanta, Georgia, receiving a BS in chemistry in 1951, and later an MA in chemistry from Atlanta University.

Williams moved to Savannah, Georgia, and was employed by the U.S. Department of Agriculture Bureau of Entomology, becoming one of the first African American research chemists in the South. In Savannah, he began working with W. W. Law, who was the Savannah National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP) president. Under Law's direction, Williams became vice president of the Savannah NAACP branch, and they would lead the first sit-ins and night marches in Savannah in the early 1960s. He would also help desegregate the DeSoto Hotel. Williams gained statewide attention with this local movement and later became vice president of the Georgia NAACP.

In 1962, Williams left Savannah for Atlanta to become part of the national Civil Rights movement as head of the national board of the NAACP. Faced with discrimination within the organization, in 1963 he was brought into the Southern Christian Leadership Conference (SCLC) by Dr. Martin Luther King Jr., who saw Williams as someone who could be beneficial to the movement. At this time, the SCLC began to implement marches as a tactic to combat the injustices adhered to through segregation.

Williams's role in the SCLC is first remembered as he and John Lewis, the national leader of the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee (SNCC), led a march from Selma, Alabama, to Montgomery, Alabama, on March 7, 1965. This march became known as "Bloody Sunday." The objective of the march was to give then Governor George C. Wallace a petition demanding the voting rights of blacks in Alabama as guaranteed by the Fifteenth Amendment to the United States Constitution. In the aftermath of Bloody Sunday, many marchers endured injuries; Williams suffered a concussion and fractured skull. Within days, President Lyndon B. Johnson passed legislation guaranteeing voting rights for blacks in America. On August 6, 1965, this legislation was put into law, as it disposed of the literacy tests and other policies that were designed to disfranchise blacks in the South from voting.

Despite the rifts within leadership, Hosea Williams was of great use to Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. and SCLC. Many people did not agree with Williams's ideology but still had respect for him. Aside from his role in "Bloody Sunday," Williams served numerous roles after the Civil Rights movement. In 1968, he was director of Dr. King's Poor People's Campaign, a movement whose mission was to end poverty in the United States. Much of the aspirations for the Poor People's Campaign dwindled with the assassination of Martin Luther King Jr. at the Lorraine Motel in Memphis, Tennessee, on April 4, 1968. Williams was present with King at this unfortunate time.

The numerous arrests of Hosea Williams's demonstrated his dedication to African Americans gaining civil rights. Williams also founded the Hosea Williams Feed the Hungry and Homeless Foundation in 1970. In 1973, he led a boycott against the department store Rich's Incorporated, and later took Richard H. Rich, the founder of Rich's, to court on a civil action suit against the corporation's practices.

While serving in the Georgia General Assembly, which he was elected to in 1974, Williams, as head of the Atlanta chapter of the SCLC, led a demonstration outside of an Atlanta hotel where President Gerald Ford was in attendance. Williams and 50 other demonstrators demanded to see the president to ask for jobs for the poor. After refusing to listen to the pleas of one of the aides to President Ford, Williams and three others were arrested and charged with trespassing and disorderly conduct. In 1987, Williams led 20,000 people into Forsyth County, Georgia, just north of Atlanta, to protest the racial tensions in the area that were elevated by the Ku Klux Klan.

Throughout his life, Williams showed determination to accomplish what he had his heart set on—changing the social, political, and economic status of blacks in America. Williams died in 2000 after a three-year battle with cancer. See also: King, Martin Luther Jr.; National Association for the Advancement of Colored People; Southern Christian Leadership Conference

Robert A. Bennett III

Bibliography

- Branch, Taylor. Parting the Waters: America in the King Years 1954–63. New York: Simon & Schuster, 1989.
- Fayer, Steve with Sarah Flynn. Voices of Freedom: An Oral History of the Civil Rights Movement from the 1950s through the 1980s. New York: Bantam Books, 1990.
- Friedly, Michael with David Gallen. Martin Luther King, Jr.: The FBI File. New York: Carroll and Graf Publishers, 1993, 720.
- Garrow, David J. Bearing the Cross: Martin Luther King, Jr., and the Southern Christian Leadership Conference. New York: Vintage Books, 1988.
- Hannah, John A., chairman. Hearing before the United States Commission on Civil Rights. Washington, D.C.: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1969.
- Hornsby, Jr., Alton. Chronology of African American History: From 1492 to the Present. Detroit, MI: Gale Research, 1997.
- Hornsby, Jr., Alton. Milestones in 20th-Century African American History. Detroit, MI: Visible Ink Press, 1993, 529.
- Hornsby, Jr., Alton. A Short History of Black Atlanta, 1847–1990. Atlanta, GA: Apex Museum, 2003.
- Marable, Manning. Race, Reform, and Rebellion: The Second Reconstruction in Black America, 1945–1990. Jackson: University Press of Mississippi, 1991, 283.
- Raines, Howell. My Soul is Rested: Movement Days in the Deep South Remembered. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons, 1977.
- Shapiro, Herbert. "After Montgomery." Freedomways, First Quarter 1966, 89.
- Washington, James Melvin, ed. A Testament of Hope: The Essential Writings of Martin Luther King, Jr. San Francisco: Harper & Row, Publishers, 1986.

Williams, Robert F.

Robert F. Williams (1925–1996) was born on February 26, 1925, in Monroe, North Carolina. In the 1950s, he became a militant civil rights activist whose radicalism would have a tremendous influence on the Black Power movement. As early as 1941, his resistance to racial discrimination during a federal job-training program prompted the Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI) to launch an investigation into his ties with Communists. Racial clashes in American cities during World War II, coupled with his 18-month military service, further politicized Williams, who was discharged in 1946. Between 1947, when he married Mabel Ola Robinson, and 1953, Williams worked in the auto industry in Detroit before returning to the South, where he honed his skills as a writer at several all-black colleges. In 1954, after working in Harlem and California, financial problems prompted Williams to join the U.S. Marines, but his defiance toward racist discrimination in the military led to an early discharge in 1955.

Back in Monroe, Williams revived the town's defunct chapter of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP). As the chapter's president, he attracted many working-class members and, in 1957, launched a nonviolent protest campaign against Monroe's segregated swimming pool. Faced with a wave of violent intimidation from the Ku Klux Klan, Williams organized a black self-defense organization that successfully protected the local movement against white aggression. A year later, Williams widely publicized the controversial case of two black boys, who had been sentenced to reform school for kissing a white girl. Skillfully exploiting the ideological Cold War struggle between the United States and the Soviet Union, the NAACP activist eventually secured the release of the two children.

In 1959, Williams's public statement that blacks would have to meet violence with violence when confronted with racist terrorism cemented his radical reputation and prompted the national NAACP to dismiss him as president of the Monroe chapter. Undaunted, Williams continued his civil rights activism, publishing the newsletter Crusader to disseminate his militant ideas on self-defense, black pride, economic nationalism, and anticolonial internationalism. Williams counted among his friends white socialists, black nationalists such as Malcolm X, and revolutionaries such as Fidel Castro, but his uncompromising militancy prevented his acceptance into the mainstream of the Civil Rights movement.

In 1961, Williams and his family were forced into Cuban exile. That year, a nonviolent protest by student activists in Monroe escalated into racial violence. Williams fled to avert bloodshed and to elude the FBI, which sought to prosecute him for allegedly kidnapping a white couple during the race riot. In Havana, Williams produced his own radio program, Radio Free Dixie, and continued to publish the Crusader to spread his ideas, which became increasingly radical. Going beyond his original call for black self-defense to protect the struggle for racial integration, he now advocated revolutionary guerilla warfare and favored black separatism. During the second half of the 1960s, Williams's militant program had a tremendous impact on black power groups such as the Black Panther Party, the Revolutionary Action Movement, and the Republic of New Africa.

By 1965, Williams's relations with the Cuban government had soured, prompting him to move to China. Residing in Beijing, he became an ardent opponent of the escalating Vietnam War and sought to influence its outcome by producing antiwar propaganda. In 1969, Williams finally returned to the United States, where he briefly worked at the University of Michigan's Center for Chinese Studies before withdrawing from the national limelight to settle for a secluded life in Baldwin, Michigan. In 1976, the state of North Carolina dropped the remaining criminal charges against him. Robert Williams died of Hodgkin's disease on October 15, 1996.

See also: Black Nationalism; Black Power; Black Self-Defense; Castro, Fidel; Destination, Cuba; Ku Klux Klan; National Association for the Advancement of Colored People; Republic of New Afrika; Revolutionary Action Movement; X, Malcolm

Simon Wendt

Bibliography

- Cohen, Robert Carl. Black Crusader: A Biography of Robert Franklin Williams. Secaucus, NJ: Lyle Stuart, 1972.
- Rucker, Walter. "'Crusader in Exile': Robert F. Williams and the Internationalized Struggle for Black Freedom in America." Black Scholar. 36 (2006):19–34.
- Tyson, Timothy B. Radio Free Dixie: Robert F. Williams and the Roots of Black Power. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1999.
- Williams, Robert F. Negroes with Guns. New York: Marzani and Munsell, 1962.

Wills, Frank

Frank Wills (1948–2000) is best known as the man who revealed the Watergate conspiracy; an event that forever transformed American politics and the American presidency. Born in North Augusta, South Carolina, on February 4, 1948, Frank Wills was a high school dropout who earned his GED through the Georgia Job Corps. Wills traveled to Detroit and Fort Custer, Michigan, in search of employment before eventually settling in Washington D.C. in 1971. In 1972, Wills was 24 years old when he was hired by General Security Services, a private security firm in Washington, D.C. Wills earned $80 a week working as a night security guard in an office building in the Watergate complex.

While Wills was making his rounds on June 17, 1972, he discovered a conspiracy that led to the resignation of the highest elected official in the United States. Shortly after midnight Wills noticed a door taped so that it would not latch properly. He removed the tape, thinking the building's maintenance staff responsible and continued his rounds. Several hours later, just before 2 A.M., he checked the door again and found someone had replaced the tape. Wills immediately phoned the police. Three plainclothes policemen arrived within minutes and he showed them the taped door. Wills was told to stay in the lobby in case anyone tried to escape while the police went upstairs to investigate. The police arrested five men in the process of placing surveillance equipment in the Democratic National Committee headquarters. Wills's diligence sparked a chain of events that became known as "Watergate." The scandal eventually led to the resignation of, among others, President Richard Nixon, who had approved the break-in plan.

The immediate aftermath of Watergate treated Frank Wills well. Soon Wills took a new security job that afforded him a $5 a week raise. He was paid for interviews and photographs, he hired an attorney to manage his business affairs, and he was given a lifetime membership by the NAACP. A little over a year later, however, Wills was unemployed and claimed that fear of the Nixon administration, which was still in power, kept potential employers from hiring him. Wills's lawyer, Dorsey Evans, claimed that it was Wills's race that kept him from being a national hero and gaining the recognition he deserved.

In August 1974, while still unemployed, Wills was given the Southern Christian Leadership Conference's highest honor, the Martin Luther King award. In 1976, Wills appeared as himself in the opening scenes of Woodward and Bernstein's tale of Watergate, the film All the President's Men. As the years passed Wills tried to write a book about his life and participation in Watergate, but publishers were not interested. Wills became increasingly bitter about his role and lack of recognition. In 1982, Wills was arrested for shoplifting a pair of $12 tennis shoes from a store in Augusta, Georgia. The shoes were allegedly a present for his son. Several New Jersey politicians raised money to post Wills's bond and he did not serve his one-year sentence for the theft.

In 1990, Wills moved back to his hometown of North Augusta, South Carolina to care for his ill mother. She died several years later, but Wills remained in his hometown. On September 27, 2000, Frank Wills died while at the University Hospital in Augusta Georgia from complications relating to a brain tumor; he was only 52 years old.

See also: National Association for the Advancement of Colored People

Kara M. Kvaran

Bibliography

Olsen, Keith W. Watergate: The Presidential Scandal that Shook America. Lawrence: University Press of Kansas, 2003.

Winfrey, Oprah

Oprah Winfrey (1954–) is most famous for rising to prominence as a talk show host in the late 20th century, but she has also garnered attention as an actress, film and television producer, magazine publisher, and philanthropist. Winfrey was born in rural Mississippi and spent a number of her early years with her grandparents. Her relationship with both of her parents and half-siblings was troubled, and by her own account, she had a difficult childhood. She was sexually abused as a child and became pregnant at the age of 14. Her son, born prematurely, died shortly after birth.

Oprah Winfrey won the Miss Black Tennessee pageant in 1971, and soon began her media career on the radio in Nashville. She attended Tennessee State University, but did not complete her degree until 1987. Her work on the radio led to opportunities on television, and Winfrey became the first African American woman and the youngest person to anchor the news at Nashville's WTVG-TV. She worked in Baltimore as a co-anchor on the 6:00 News and as co-host of a local talk show, and then moved to Chicago in 1983 to host a show that would become The Oprah Winfrey Show.

In the midst of starting her broadcasting career, Winfrey also began a film career, playing roles in adaptations of prominent African American novels such as Richard Wright's Native Son (1986) and Alice Walker's The Color Purple (1985). Winfrey received an Academy Award nomination for her role as Sofia in The Color Purple, a film adaptation directed by Steven Spielberg that was very controversial. Both the novel and the film were accused of presenting coonish or demonizing representations of African American men. Winfrey would later star in The Women of Brewster Place (1989), There Are No Children Here (1993), and Before Women Had Wings. Her most high-profile leading role was in the adaptation (1998) of Toni Morrison's Pulitzer Prize winning novel Beloved (1988), a story inspired by escaped slave Margaret Garner's decision to kill her child rather than allow all of her family to be taken back into slavery. Winfrey played the lead, Sethe, to mixed reviews.

Winfrey's most prominent success, however, has been through her talk show. Winfrey's show became nationally syndicated in 1986 and she is credited—and disparaged—for revolutionizing the industry. The talk show host broke down the boundary between host and guest with her confessional style of show. She brought her history with sexual abuse, pregnancy, drug use, and ongoing struggles with weight loss into the show, thereby forging a bond with audiences. Winfrey's success inspired a new term—"Oprahfication"—connoting intimate, confessional forms of public interaction.

Another innovation of Winfrey's talk show format was the successful inclusion of a book club that encouraged a national audience to read selected texts and tune in for the discussion on the show. Like many of Winfrey's projects, the book club has garnered both praise and denigration, but it was embraced by many in the publishing industry and inspired a number of scholarly discussions of Winfrey's importance to a culture of reading in the waning days of print culture's influence. Winfrey's love of reading and literature is well documented, and she has not only starred in but produced a number of adaptations of her favorite books.

In 2003, Oprah Winfrey became the first black woman billionaire, and one of the few black billionaires in the world. Her wealth was not only a result of her lucrative talk show but also of her other business interests. Her talk show is produced by Harpo Productions, a company behind a variety of other successful film and television productions. In 2000, Winfrey launched O, The Oprah Magazine, a successful monthly woman's magazine with a self-help thrust. She was also one of the founders of the Oxygen television network.

Oprah Winfrey on the cover of her O magazine. (PRNewsFoto/Oxmoor House)

Winfrey is a well-known philanthropist. She formed The Oprah's Angel Network (1997), which has given money to projects in the United States and around the world. Such projects include education, housing, and youth development. Her most high-profile philanthropic project was the creation of a $40-million school for girls in South Africa in 2007. A luxurious boarding school designed to meet the educational and psychological needs of the girls and prepare them for leadership, the school was met with a number of criticisms and was troubled by controversy about its management shortly after opening.

Because of Winfrey's wealth and popularity, people have periodically suggested that she run for public office. In the early 21st century, the closest Winfrey has come to state or presidential politics is her support of Barack Obama during his campaign for president. Winfrey's high-profile support for a political candidate was unprecedented for her. Winfrey champions many causes, but she has explicitly stated that she is not a political person.

See also: Obama, Barack

Rebecca Wanzo

Bibliography

- Illouz, Eva. Oprah Winfrey and the Glamour of Misery. New York: Columbia University Press, 2003.
- Konchar, Cecilia Farr. Reading Oprah: How Oprah's Book Club Changed the Way America Reads. Albany: State University of New York Press, 2005.
- Mosk, Matthew. "The Magic Touch? Winfrey Lends Her Brand and Her Empire in Support of Obama's Presidential Bid." The Washington Post, September 5, 2007, p. A06.
- Otis, Ginger Adams. "Oprah's Painful Years." The New York Post, May 27, 2007, p. 18.
- Ridgeway, Karen. "Winfrey Says She Had Baby at 14." USA Today, May 4, 1990, 1D.
- Samuels, Allison. "Oprah Goes to School." Newsweek, January 8, 2007:46–49.
- Shattuc, Jane. The Talking Cure. New York: Routledge, 1997.

Woodson, Carter Godwin

Dr. Carter Godwin Woodson (1875–1950), one of the most prominent African American historians and social analysts of the 20th century, earned his much deserved notoriety as the innovator of "Negro History Week" celebrations (now Black History Month). He never married, spending much of his time, energy, money, and resources launching the foundations for the inclusion of black studies as a legitimate intellectual inquiry in American schools. Woodson wanted to reestablish dignity to people of African descent so that the world would no longer have to wonder what the Negro was good for.

Woodson was born on December 19, 1875, in New Canton, Buckingham County, Virginia, to proud parents and former slaves Anne Eliza Riddle and James Henry Woodson. Woodson was born 18 years after the infamous Dred Scott decision and 1 year before the 1876 presidential election between Democrat Samuel Tilden and Republican Rutherford B. Hayes.

The United States Supreme Court speaking through Chief Justice Roger Taney proclaimed in the Dred Scott case that no African free or slave could be a citizen; whites were not bound to respect any rights proclaimed by African Americans. The 1876 presidential election brought an end to the Reconstruction era and enabled the Southern states to reduce African Americans to near slave status. The social and political system placed little value on the lives of African Americans; between 1890 and 1926, an African American was lynched every two-and-a-half days. Many people of African descent were so humiliated, dehumanized, and afflicted with low self-esteem that they did not attempt to know their past.

The Social Darwinism era, whereby much of America unashamedly condoned slavery and segregation, the academic community that justified racial subjugation and discrimination, and Dr. Woodson's proud parents inspired Woodson to search for the truth, refuting the misrepresentations of the African contributions to world civilization. He used education in black history as a primary conduit for political empowerment of African Americans. Carter Goodson was the first and only African American of slave parentage to earn a PhD in history. This child of former slaves nurtured a desire for learning that culminated in a rich and extraordinary career spanning 40 years.

Woodson was undaunted by the prejudice, challenges, and difficulties of his life. His father was an impoverished carpenter who had to supplement his income by sharecropping. Woodson was the eldest of nine children; two of his siblings died in infancy. He was required to work long, arduous hours to help his family. Because the local schools in Virginia operated on an agricultural calendar, opening only four months of the year owing to the rigors of farming, Woodson was primarily self-taught until age 19.

After working long hours during the day, he would often read aloud newspapers to his father, thereby learning about national and international events and places. During this time period, he would listen to accounts of slavery shared by the adults around him. Although his parents could not read or write, Woodson gave his father credit for influencing the course of his life. He later wrote that his father insisted that one could lose one's soul if one betrayed one's people, misled one's fellow human being, compromise on principle, and accept insult.

His knowledge about black history expanded when his family moved to West Virginia where they worked in the coalmines. During off-duty times, black laborers would rest and eat at the establishment of Oliver Jones, a black civil war veteran who was interested in black history. Woodson would read the newspaper to these workers and, in exchange, listen to their accounts of life in antebellum days. He acquired appreciation for African folk culture and the African American masses.

Woodson went to school full time when he turned 20 and earned enough money to support himself. In 1895, he enrolled in Douglas High School in Huntington, West Virginia, where he finished the four-year curriculum and earned his diploma in less than two years in 1896. From 1896 through 1898, he continued his education by attending Berea College, which was racially integrated in all aspects of institutional life: dormitories, classrooms, dining hall, entertainment, and extracurricular activities.

While matriculating at Berea, Woodson experienced interpersonal contact with William Frost, the president of the college. From Frost, the faculty, and his colleagues, he acquired a commitment to teaching and an abiding respect for the value of a combination of vocational and classical education to transform the lower income classes of society, believing this would build character and prepare them for life. The next three years, 1897–1900, Woodson began teaching in a one-room school established by black miners for their children in Winona Fayette County, West Virginia. He returned to his high school alma mater, Douglass High School, in 1900–1903 to teach history and serve as acting principal, replacing his cousin Carter Harrison Barnett. Finally, in 1903, he graduated from Berea College with a bachelor of literature degree.

Carter taught English, health, and agriculture in the Philippines from 1903 through 1909 and became the general superintendent of education with the U.S. Bureau of Insular Affairs. He took correspondence courses in French and English from the University of Chicago so that he could effectively communicate with his students at the school in San Isidro. Having become fluent in French and Spanish, he traveled in Europe and Asia and studied history for a semester at the Sorbonne in Paris, France. He went to a myriad of museums and libraries, learning basic principles of locating primary materials for research and strategies for incorporating this material into his scholarly works.

On his return to the United States, Woodson decided to begin graduate studies at the University of Chicago. Just as Berea did not accept all of his credits from Douglas High School, the University of Chicago did not give him full credit for his course work at Berea. Woodson was not disheartened; he simultaneously worked on his master's degree and another bachelor's degree. His major was history and his thesis examined French diplomatic relations with Germany in the 18th century. After completing his BA in 1907 and his MS in history, romance and literature, one year later, Woodson enrolled in Harvard University and finished his coursework by 1909.

He accepted a teaching position with the Washington, D.C. public schools system. While working full-time at M Street High School, he inspired many students to study Negro history, prepared for his PhD comprehensive examinations, and worked on his dissertation on the secession of Virginia at the Library of Congress. In 1912, he became the second African American in the United States to receive a doctorate in history. Du Bois, who came from a free Northern background, was the first African American to earn a PhD in history in 1895. The third African American to receive a doctorate in history was Charles H. Wesley, whose parents were born free in Kentucky. Although James Henry Woodson's other children and their relatives had professional careers as teachers, doctors, and businessmen, only Carter Godwin Woodson became widely known as an intellectual.

Woodson sought the support of his dissertation committee to publish his dissertation. This was an exercise in futility in that Frederick Jackson Turner, the most positive member of the committee, declined to provide assistance to acquire publication. He wrote in a letter two months after Woodson's request stating that the dissertation was too similar to Charles Henry Ambler's, Sectionalism in Virginia from 1776 to 1861, which was published in 1910. Ambler's book was a revision of his 1908 University of Wisconsin doctoral dissertation. Turner explained that he doubted that the Harvard history department would include Woodson's dissertation in its series of published dissertations or the Harvard University Press would publish it. Turner also warned Woodson that he might have to pay a subvention to have the dissertation published, as the book would probably not have a market and would not make money.

Woodson encountered similar difficulty with his first book, which was completed while he made revisions to his dissertation. He ended up submitting a subvention and The Education of the Negro Prior to 1861 to G. P. Putnam's Sons; they agreed to publish it in 1915. The book was favorably and widely reviewed in historical journals, as well as the white popular press. Mary Church Terrell, a civil rights advocate and African American suffragist, indicated that she was pleased with the book as "a work of profound historical research." Even Turner praised the book as a "substantial contribution to the subject."

All the while, publishers who refused to publish Woodson's dissertation, did so for white historians writing on the same subject. Four authors prevented Charles Henry Ambler from having the final say on the succession movement in Western Virginia. Only Richard Orr Curry's House Divided: A Study of Statehood, Politics and the Copperhead Movement in West Virginia cited Woodson's 1912 dissertation. This book is still cited by contemporary historians.

Despite these achievements and struggles, Woodson did not begin his life's mission until he and George Cleveland Hall, personal physician to Booker T. Washington and a surgeon at Chicago's Provident Hospital; Alexander L. Jackson, then executive secretary of the YMCA; and James E. Stamps, a Yale University graduate student founded the Association for the Study of Negro Life and History on September 9, 1915. This was the first historical society devoted exclusively to researching the life and history of African Americans in America, Africa, and throughout the world. Also in 1915, D. W. Griffith released the racist movie The Birth of a Nation, which was vehemently protested by blacks and some white liberals. From the establishment of the association until his death on April 4, 1950, Woodson made the association and its work his life's mission. He never wavered in maintaining his independence from outside control.

The annual meetings of the association provided black scholars an opportunity to present papers before their peers. The next year the association launched its scientific quarterly the Journal of Negro History. Woodson included substantial portions of his never published dissertation into articles that appeared in the Journal. The Journal documented information that was previously ignored by mainstream historians. It was innovative in its methods of research used to collect data and in its interpretation of history. Woodson covered a wide range of subjects and emphasized a shift in the focus of historical analysis to the perspective of slave, away from that of the master's.

Journal contributors used oral histories, birth and death certificates, marriage registers, letters, diaries, and census data to research black history. Today many historians have adopted these methods. Benjamin E. Mays wrote in his "I Knew Carter G. Goodson," that the Journal documented black life so well that any research on the Negro by perforce had to refer to it.

Woodson published the first issue of the Journal of Negro History at his own expense. Although the association had an executive council, Woodson did much of the work directing, organizing, producing, writing, and providing most of the funding. Obtaining adequate funding was a constant challenge; Woodson exerted much of his energy to keeping the organization afloat. He had to secure further employment in order for him and the association to survive.

From 1918 to 1919, he was principal of Armstrong Manual Training School in Washington, D.C. He then worked for one year at Howard University as professor of history, head of the graduate faculty, and dean of the School of Liberal Arts. He developed the graduate program but only one of his five students, Arnett J. Lindsay, completed the Howard graduate program under his tutelage. Later, Woodson published part of Lindsay's thesis in the Journal. He left Howard because of disputes with University President J. Stanley Durkee over academic freedom.

The next year Woodson became dean of West Virginia Collegiate Institute (now State College) in 1920. During this time, he established the Associated Publishers and wrote several books: The History of the Negro Church in 1921, The Negro in Our History in 1922, and The Mind of the Negro As Reflected in Letters Written During the Crisis, 1800–1860 in 1926. After his second position as dean, he retired from the teaching profession in 1922 to concentrate on the association. Although he obtained small contributions from rich white supporters such as Julius Rosenwald and grants from the Carnegie and Rockefeller Foundations, Woodson and his association stayed afloat mainly on his teaching salary, book royalties, the black masses, and the contributions of African American organizations. The foundation funding dried up as a result of concerns of power broker Thomas Jesse Jones who wanted Woodson to relinquish control and affiliate the association with a university. The problem of funding became acute because Woodson was forced to rely more on the black masses and organizations at the zenith of the Great Depression.

Through the difficult times, Woodson was able to accomplish much. He was interested in the black nationalist movement led by Marcus Garvey. He became a frequent contributor for Garvey's weekly publication, the Negro World. He wrote more than 100 articles and 125 book reviews in his capacity as a contributor to the Journal. Woodson was also editor and founder of the Negro History Bulletin and author of more than 30 books. His most popular book is The Mis-Education of the Negro, originally issued by Associated Publisher in 1933. In this book, he criticized any educational enterprise that did not serve the needs of the students.

In 1926, Woodson launched Negro History Week, which became Black History month in 1976. This pioneering educator, historian, and social analyst died in Washington, D.C. on April 3, 1950 at the age of 74. His mission and message provided an opportunity for America to acknowledge and understand the heritage of African Americans. See also: Association for the Study of African American Life and History; Du Bois, W. E. B.; Franklin, John Hope.

Marva Strickland-Hill

Bibliography

- Conyers, James L. Carter G. Woodson: A Historical Reader. New York: Garland Publishers, 2000.
- Goggin, Jacqueline. Carter G. Woodson: A Life in Black History. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1993.
- Scally, M. Anthony. Carter G. Woodson: A Bio-Bibliography. Westport, CT: Greenwood Press, 1985.
- Woodson, Carter Godwin. The Mis-Education of the Negro. Trenton, NJ: Africa World Press, 1990.

World War I (Black Participation in)

---

African Americans have participated in every American war from colonial times to Iraqi Freedom, and their contributions to American military history have been severely underappreciated and virtually ignored. The United States entered World War I in 1917, and the all-black 92nd and 93rd Infantry divisions were sent to France and served bravely until the Armistice in 1918 and play a vital role in the defeat of Germany.

As African Americans were asked to sacrifice for their country, a wave of violence was perpetrated against them in 1916–1917, with about 120 lynchings, mostly in the South. Race riots occurred in New York, St. Louis, and Houston as a result of the combination of African American troops demanding their basic rights as citizens and American soldiers in a largely Jim Crow city. These waves of violence prompted the United States Army to rely on National Guard and conscripts rather than regular African American enlistees. Famous units such as the 9th and 10th Cavalries, the Buffalo Soldiers, were not sent to France; however, these units provided much needed border security in Arizona and California and were spared the carnage of European battlefields.

The first American troops arrived in France in 1917 as the American Expeditionary Force (AEF) led by General John Pershing and included units of the 93rd Infantry division. The 93rd, the last of which arrived in April, under American leadership guarded German prisoners of war and directed supplies to the other units.

President Woodrow Wilson's Secretary of War Newton D. Baker ordered Pershing to keep the AEF under American command while in Europe. The all-black 93rd, under the command of white officers, was seen as undesirable and detrimental to the American war effort and was quickly transferred to French command where they had to turn in all American equipment except for their uniforms. This included the Springfield 30.06 rifles, which were far superior to the French Lebel rifle. The Springfield was better suited for open warfare, rather than trench warfare, for which the U.S. soldiers had trained, and many were expert marksmen with the Springfield.

The 93rd consisted of three National Guard units and one drafted unit and was organized into four regiments: the 369th, 370th, 371st, and 372nd. The 369th set an American World War I record for 191 days of unbroken combat with

Some of the men of the 369th Infantry, also known as the Harlem Hellfighters, who received the Croix de Guerre for gallantry in action during World War I. (National Archives)

French black colonial troops in the French sector of the Argonne Forest where they repelled massive German assaults at Chateau-Thierry and Belleau Wood.

Known as the Blue Helmet soldiers, they came to be respected by the French and feared by the Germans for their fierce determination and bravery under fire. Approximately 3,500 Blue Helmet soldiers were killed in action. Moreover, they distinguished themselves by earning 42 American Distinguished Service Crosses, 4 Medaille Militaire (the highest French military honor), 325 Croix de Guerre, and 1 Congressional Medal of Honor. President George Herbert Walker Bush posthumously awarded the Medal of Honor to Corporal Freddie Stowers who was killed in action in 1918.

The all-Black 92nd Infantry Division did not enjoy the same success. Made up of all draftees, the 92nd was organized into four infantry regiments and, like their brothers-in-arms, received insufficient training, poor equipment, and white officers. General Charles C. Ballou was the first commander. Despite his prejudices, Ballou sought to give a square deal to his troops and treat them fairly. Once they arrived in Europe in June 1918, however, command of the division was given to General Robert Bullard who shared the typical racial views of the era.

In August 1918, the 92nd was assigned to the St. Dié sector close to the German border and was supposed to train with French units until their withdrawal and subsequently take over the sector; however, the friction of war caused both French and American delays. The division arrived in the midst of German counterattacks and was quickly introduced to trench and chemical warfare. By the time they were pulled out of the sector in September 1918, the 92nd had repelled 11 German patrols and secured the French villages at Frapelle and Ormont.

Less than a week later, the 92nd was reassigned to the American sector of the Argonne Forest in preparation for the large American assault. Pershing's plan called for a simultaneous push with French units on the left and American units on the right. His plan had one fatal flaw that created an 800-meter gap between the French and American lines. Reserve French units and the largely inexperienced 92nd were to fill the chasm. In the fog of battle, inexperience, lapses in communications, and poor planning resulted in the 92nd's failure to hold the line. Subsequently the 92nd was ordered out of the Argonne and relegated to patrol duty until the Armistice in November and was largely regarded as ineffective in combat.

See also: Buffalo Soldiers; Houston, Texas, Mutiny, 1917; "If We Must Die"; Red Summer Race Riots

Jeffery Othele Mahan

Bibliography

- Barbeau, Arthur E., and Florette Henri. The Unknown Soldiers: Black American Troops in World War I. Philadelphia: Temple University Press, 1974.
- Ellis, Mark. Race, War, and Surveillance: African Americans and the United States Government during World War I. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 2001.
- Jamieson, J. A. et al. Complete History of the Colored Soldiers. New York: Bennett and Churchill, 1919.
- Roberts, Frank E. The American Foreign Legion: Black Soldiers of the 93rd in World War I. Annapolis, MD: Naval Institute Press, 2004.

World War II (Black Participation in)

Since colonial times the African American has served this nation in war and peace. The first all-black unit in American history was the 54th Massachusetts Infantry that fought bravely in the Civil War. The 10th cavalry, the famed Buffalo Soldiers, won acclaim fighting Native Americans and at San Juan Hill with future U.S. President Theodore Roosevelt. African Americans served in World War I in the 93rd Infantry Division, a segregated unit, and won countless medals. World War II was a unique era, as African Americans fought a war on two fronts against a tough and deadly enemy abroad and against strong, often violent, racial attitudes at home. Yet this period created more opportunities for black participation in the military, produced meaningful victories against discrimination, and planted the seeds for the Civil Rights movement of the mid-20th century.

After World War I, the National Urban League (1907), the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (1910), and the Universal Negro Improvement Association challenged social norms. Moreover, almost half of all southern African Americans moved north or from rural areas to the city during the Great Migration. In New York during the 1920s, this migration ignited the Harlem Renaissance movement, which was a celebration of black artistry, culture, and an increased recognition of the black struggle for racial equality.

In black history, World War II represented a gap between the Harlem Renaissance and the landmark Brown v. the Board of Education that legally ended segregation. In this period, approximately 12.8 million African Americans resided in the United States. Membership in the NAACP grew and the organization gained momentum politically. Moreover, some institutions within the federal government took a more active role in protecting civil rights. For example, U.S. Attorney General Frank Murphy created the Civil Liberties Unit within the Department of Justice and Wisconsin Governor Robert La Follette started the Civil Liberties Committee.

Before Pearl Harbor, President Franklin D. Roosevelt and many political leaders realized that America would be in the war as Nazi armies swept across Europe and amid ever increasing tensions with Japan. Both human and material resources would be at a premium for the war effort. Discussions were well underway how to best use the black population in the war effort.

Black leaders and politicians directed their efforts at war industries that were still hiring African Americans in nonessential jobs. In an investigation, the National Urban League uncovered discriminatory hiring practices that prevented African Americans from receiving the proper training for top jobs. Acting on these findings, A. Philip Randolph, Walter White, Mary McLeod Bethune, Dr. Channing H. Tobias, George E. Haynes, and Lester B. Grange organized and threatened to march on Washington, D.C.

Eleanor Roosevelt and New York Governor Fiorello La Guardia feared this march would alienate southern voters and convinced organizers to cancel the march and meet with President Roosevelt. The eventual meeting produced Executive Order 8802 and the Committee of Fair Employment Practice, which were among the first efforts to ensure fair hiring practices in industry and coupled with good timing more opportunities were created for black women and men not in the military.

At the same time, World War I veteran Rayford W. Logan with the support of the NAACP and the all-black newspaper the Pittsburgh Courier established the Committee for the Participation of Negroes and National Defense and pushed for larger black quotas in the military. Successful in their efforts, an amendment to the Selective Service Bill of 1940 increased black enlistments but did not end segregation in the military.

At the end of World War I, there were more than 400,000 African Americans in uniform including about 1,300 commissioned officers. By 1939, however, less than 3,500 black soldiers and five commissioned officers, mostly chaplains, were in the army. Few African Americans served in the navy as support and kitchen personnel. African Americans were denied entry into the Marine Corps and the Army Corps. By 1942, however, Colonel Benjamin O. Davis was made the first African American general and enlistments were above 460,000 and entrance into the Army Air Corps and Marines had been gained.

Despite the new quotas, African Americans were rejected for military service at a higher rate than whites for several reasons. Segregation retarded African American education and caused poor performance on entrance exams. With many African Americans already impoverished, the deprivations of the Great Depression left many in poor physical condition. Statistically, 12 percent of African Americans were rejected as a result of poor health, 15.8 percent for reasons unrelated to physical, and 35.6 percent were rejected because of their educational background. The units that did serve ultimately, however, opened the door for President Harry S. Truman to desegregate America's Armed Forces in 1948.

The first African American unit to see action was the 99th Pursuit Squadron of the 332nd Fighter Group, collectively known as the Tuskegee Airmen because of their flight training at the Tuskegee Institute in Alabama. The first 40 pilots were rushed into service because of manpower needs in the North African campaign. Rather than opting for top recruits, only pilots that had already completed civilian courses through the Civil Aeronautics Board were chosen. Basic training was shortened by several weeks.

Nevertheless, the 99th was shipped to Africa in early 1943 and produced disappointing early results. Inexperienced and not as aggressive as their white counterparts, the 99th was assigned to the rear for more training and to await less hastily trained African American pilots who had arrived from the United States. While there, the 99th flew missions with the 79th Fighter Group, an independent air wing. Experiencing fair treatment from the 79th, the Tuskegee Airmen gained invaluable experience and confidence that would serve them well in the skies over Italy and Europe. By the end of the war, the famed "Red Tails" of the 332nd escorted heavy bombers, raided oil refineries, and targeted key installations in Italy, the Balkans, and key components of the Nazi infrastructure deep in the heart of Germany. The 332nd became a hardened, battle-tested unit in the final months of World War II.

Another unit of the Tuskegee Airmen was the 447th Bombardier Group. Frustration, conflict, and a well-disciplined, nonviolent strategy against the institutional racism of the army marked their wartime efforts. Black leaders and politicians realized that flying the huge bombers would better serve African Americans in the postwar world. Although gallant in their efforts, the 332nd fighter experience would be virtually useless in commercial aviation. Bomber experience could open doors for better jobs for African Americans as commercial pilots.

Racism and insufficient numbers prevented this unit from seeing active combat. Less than 20,000 African Americans served in the air corps, far below the necessary numbers required to supply replacement pilots for the 332nd or flight and maintenance crews for bombers. Throughout their training, however, they challenged army reluctance to press the unit into service at their installations and they were a forerunner of the Civil Rights movement of the 1950s.

Subsequently, the 93rd Infantry Division of World War I fame was reactivated in May 1942. Unlike other segregated units, the 93rd trained at one military post and was not truncated. In 1944, the 93rd was sent to the Pacific theater as an occupation force. They arrived on Guadalcanal after the majority of the Japanese resistance had ended. Only the 24th Infantry of the 93rd saw any appreciable action on Bougainville in March 1944. Inexperienced, they were overrun by the Japanese. For the remainder of the war, the 93rd was relegated to patrol and guard duty.

Unlike the 93rd, the 92nd Infantry Division saw extensive combat action in Italy and trained at four separate installations across the nation: Fort McClellan, Alabama, Camp Atterbury, Indiana, Camp Breckenridge, Kentucky, and Camp Robinson, Arkansas. Part of Mark Clark's Fifth Army, poorly trained, and equipped, with an average fourth grade education because of educational discrimination, the 92nd fought against a deadly veteran German Army and suffered a high casualty rate. Several incidents of self-sacrifice and bravery, however, were noted during the war and recognized more than 50 years later by President William Jefferson Clinton, who awarded two of its members the Congressional Medal of Honor.

First Lieutenant John Robert Fox was a forward observer for the 598th Field Artillery Battalion, undertaking training maneuvers near Sommocolonia, Italy on Christmas Day 1944. Stopping to rest for the night in the village, Fox and his platoon awoke to discover that Germans disguised as partisans had encircled their positions during the night. Rapidly under assault, Fox's platoon was nearly overwhelmed and outnumbered.

Many rescue attempts could not breach the German lines, which prompted Fox to call for artillery fire only 60 yards from his platoon. Desperate, Fox called for artillery to fire directly on his own position killing Fox and most of his platoon; however, about 100 Germans were killed, and several hours later an Allied counterattack reclaimed the village. Fox was awarded the Purple Heart and Bronze Star at the time of the incident. Years later he was awarded the Distinguished Cross and the Medal of Honor.

Lieutenant Vernon J. Baker was a member of the 360th Regimental Combat Team of the 92nd Infantry Division. Ordered to assault Hill X and Castle Aghilnofi behind German Gothic Line on 5 April 1945, Baker lost nearly two-thirds of his platoon. Intense German artillery fire prevented Baker from obeying orders to withdraw his decimated unit. Baker destroyed one machine gun nest and a German observation tower virtually single handedly. Accompanied by a fellow platoon member, Baker demolished more gun emplacements and drew enemy fire away from rescue efforts.

The next day Baker led the counterattack through mine fields to eventually take the original objectives of the mission, earning him the Purple Heart, Bronze Star, and Distinguished Service Cross and, like Fox, the Medal of Honor. Only five other black Americans, all posthumously, received the nation's highest honor from World War II: Private George Watson, Sergeant Edward A. Carter Jr., Private Willy F. James Jr., Sergeant Ruben Rivers, and First Lieutenant Charles L. Thomas. See also: Double-V Campaign; Evers, Medgar; National Association for the Advancement of Colored People; Randolph, A. Philip; Robinson, Jackie; Tuskegee Airmen; World War I (Black Participation in)

Jeffery Othele Mahan

Bibliography

- Baker, Vernon J., and Ken Olson. Lasting Valor. New York: Bantam Books, 1997.
- Buchanan, Russell A. Black Americans in World War II. Santa Barbara, CA: ABC-CLIO, 1997.
- Hine, Darlene Clark. Black Women in White: Racial Conflict and Cooperation in the Nursing Profession, 1890-1950. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1989.

- Honey, Maureen, ed. Bitter Fruit: African American Women in World War II. Columbia: University of Missouri Press, 1999.
- Lee, Ulysses. The United States Army in World War II: The Employment of Negro Troops. Washington D.C.: Center for Military History, 1963.
- Motley, Mary Penick. The Invisible Soldier: The Experience of the Black Soldier, World War II. Detroit, MI: Wayne State University Press, 1975.
- Sandler, Stanley. Segregated Skies: All-Black Combat Squadrons of World War II. Washington, D.C.: Smithsonian Institution Press, 1992.
- Wynn, Neil A. The Afro-American and the Second World War. New York: Holmes & Meier, 1976.

X, Malcolm

Malcolm X (1925–1965) was an author, activist, and minister of the Nation of Islam who has become the most enduring contemporary symbol of African American militant protest. Given the name Malcolm Little at birth, he became Malcolm X after entering the Nation of Islam and finally changed his name to el-Hajj Malik el-Shabazz while on pilgrimage to Mecca in 1964. Malcolm X's public career lasted only six years and ended abruptly with his assassination. Nonetheless, his influence on recent African American history is enormous. He left behind no lasting organization or movement, no record of changed legislation, no institutional legacy, no accomplishment of improved conditions for black people in America, and no developed political philosophy. His achievements were cultural. His most important and long-lasting contribution was The Autobiography of Malcolm X, written with Alex Haley. Beyond that, as a media figure between 1959 and 1964, he introduced the black community to a new model of black leadership, an unprecedented public display of black rage, and a new mode of aggressive black masculinity that continues to have a profound effect on popular culture today.

Born May 19, 1925, in Omaha, Nebraska, Malcolm was his father's seventh child. Reverend Earl (Early) Little, a freelance Baptist minister and a part-time organizer for Marcus Garvey's Universal Negro Improvement Association (UNIA), already had three children from a previous marriage and three children with his second wife, Louise (Louisa), Malcolm's mother. According to Malcolm, Louise was so fair that she looked white while his father was very dark-skinned. Malcolm begins his autobiography with an account of his mother, pregnant with him, confronting armed Ku Klux Klan riders who surrounded the family house in Omaha while his father was away; however, Louise Little has denied that this incident ever occurred.

Malcolm was more light-skinned than any of his brothers and sisters, with reddish-brown hair. He was apparently his father's favorite child. His relationship with his mother was more troubled. There was considerable violence within the home. Earl beat Louise and also beat his children almost savagely, except for Malcolm. All of Malcolm's beatings came from his mother. In 1931, when Malcolm was six years old, his father was killed. Malcolm would later insist that he was murdered by white supremacists, but all contemporary evidence indicates that he died in a street car accident. With seven children to care for and overwhelmed by poverty during the Depression, Louise Little tried to maintain her family intact, but without success. Malcolm was placed in the care of a white family by the welfare authorities. He admitted to being glad when it happened. In 1939, after giving birth to an eighth child and being abandoned by the new baby's father, Louise was judged insane and was formally committed to a state mental hospital. She remained there for 25 years. Malcolm visited her occasionally, but she did not recognize him. In his autobiography, he blames social workers for driving his mother insane.

In 1941, at the age of 15, Malcolm moved to Boston to live with his half-sister, a daughter of his father's first marriage, Ella Collins. Despite her efforts to introduce him to her respectable friends and to keep him in school, Malcolm was almost immediately attracted to the criminal underworld of the city. His first part-time job as a shoeshine boy in the Roseland State Ballroom men's room was a thin disguise for a number of illegal activities, such as selling marijuana or putting his customers in touch with prostitutes. He also began a long-term relationship, over Ella's furious objections, with an older white woman he called "Sophia" in his autobiography (Beatrice Caragulian, later Beatrice Bazarian). Drafted into the army during World War II, he managed to avoid service by feigning insanity. He pursued a career of petty criminality that included a short stay in Harlem before he returned to Boston. There he was arrested for burglaries he had carried out with the help of his white girlfriend, her sister, and his male cohorts. In February 1946, at the age of 20, he was sentenced to three concurrent 8- to 10-year sentences at hard labor. Malcolm attributed the harsh punishment to the judge's anger over his sexual relationship with a white woman.

During his early days in prison, Malcolm earned the nickname “Satan” because of his outspoken atheism and his hostility toward religion. As he relates in his autobiography, his efforts to educate himself in prison began long before his conversion to the Nation of Islam. He enrolled in correspondence courses, studied the dictionary, and voraciously read books from the prison library. While serving time in prison, Malcolm was introduced to the teachings of the Nation of Islam by his brother Reginald, who had joined the group. Initially showing no interest, Malcolm was a deeply committed convert by the time he was released from prison in August 1952.

Ella had arranged for Malcolm to move to Detroit, where his brothers Wilfred, Philbert, and Wesley and his sister Hilda lived, after his release from prison. All of his siblings were now active members of the Nation of Islam there. Malcolm soon visited the leader of the movement, Elijah Muhammad, in Chicago, where he was given special recognition. Like most members of the Nation of Islam, he changed his last name to X, to symbolize his rejection of white oppression. He explained in his book: “The Muslim’s ‘X’ symbolized the true African family name that he never could know. For me, my ‘X’ replaced the white slavemaster name of ‘Little’ which some blue-eyed devil named Little had imposed upon my paternal forebears... Mr. Muhammad taught that we would keep this ‘X’ until God Himself returned and gave us a Holy Name from His own mouth.” (The Autobiography of Malcolm X, p. 199.)

He actively recruited new converts for the Nation of Islam and was an effective proselytizer. The Federal Bureau of Investigation opened a file on Malcolm in 1953, after learning that he had referred to himself as a communist. He remained under FBI surveillance for the rest of his life. He expanded the Nation of Islam in Detroit, established the Nation’s first Temple in Boston, and found new recruits in Philadelphia. In 1954, he was chosen to head Temple No. 7 in Harlem, and he rapidly expanded its membership there also.

In 1958, after receiving permission from Elijah Muhammad, Malcolm married Betty X (née Sanders, later Betty Shabazz) in Lansing, Michigan. The couple eventually had six daughters: Attallah (b. 1958), Qubilah (b. 1960), Ilyasah (b. 1962), Gamilah Lumumba (b. 1964); and twin girls, Malaak and Malikah, born in 1965 after their father’s death. During the marriage, Malcolm was often away from the home traveling, speaking, or attending to the business of the Nation of Islam.

Malcolm X during a press conference for Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. in 1964. (Library of Congress)

Malcolm X first became a public media figure in 1959, when he appeared in a television documentary broadcast in New York City, entitled “The Hate That Hate Produced.” On that program he explained that, according to the teaching of the Nation of Islam, black people were a divine race; he frankly denounced the white race as evil, incapable of good. The audience saw footage of the University of Islam, where Muslim children were taught that whites were devils. This message appeared in such sharp contrast to the theme of brotherhood being put forward by the Civil Rights movement that the Nation of Islam, and Malcolm in particular, immediately became the objects of national media attention. Although Malcolm would later complain about the negative publicity, it was his almost demonic media image that brought the Nation of Islam into the fore. He did everything he could to cultivate that image in media interviews.

At this time, Malcolm’s public statements adhered strictly to the teachings of the Nation of Islam as given by Elijah Muhammad. Malcolm unabashedly spoke of a self-righteous hatred of whites. In his autobiography, begun in 1963, Malcolm repeated the Nation of Islam's official teaching that white people were an artificial race of mutant people who had been created in prehistory, through genetic experimentation, by an evil black scientist named Yacub.

Elijah Muhammad imposed a strict rule against political activity and protest on the Nation of Islam, including banning social involvement that might improve conditions for blacks. His teaching was that God would soon liberate his people without effort on their part, and that the followers of the Nation of Islam should simply wait for this inevitable divine event. All of these teachings would eventually become a problem for Malcolm X and lead to his break with the movement.

Malcolm X became the national representative, the chief spokesman, for the Nation of Islam. He was in much demand as a public speaker on college campuses and other venues and was sought after for television appearances. He was also interviewed as a spokesman for black Americans by journalists from other countries. He established the Nation of Islam's first national newspaper, Muhammad Speaks. From these platforms he sharply criticized the leaders of the Civil Rights movement for advocating that blacks should integrate into white society, rather than build separate black institutions. He rejected their stance that black people should respond with nonviolence when faced with attacks from the white community.

Malcolm's popularity with the media and his obvious position as the second most important leader of the Nation of Islam, after Elijah Muhammad himself, caused tensions to develop within the movement. A book about the Nation of Islam, When the Word Is Given, published in 1963, featured Malcolm X on its cover and included transcripts of five of his speeches, but only one of Elijah Muhammad's, much to the chagrin of the latter. Publishers asked for the rights to Malcolm's autobiography, not for Elijah Muhammad's. Members of Elijah Muhammad's family and other high-ranking Muslim leaders in Chicago began to maneuver against Malcolm's position within the Nation.

Tensions developed between Malcolm and his leader, Elijah Muhammad, over the Nation of Islam's general non-involvement policy, with Malcolm moving toward more action and engagement in the black social struggle taking place around them in the early 1960s. For example, when Ronald Stokes, member of the Nation, was killed and six other Muslims were wounded in a police raid on the Muslim Temple in Los Angeles in April 1962, a furious Malcolm

X sought to organize the black community around the issue and bring a legal case against the police for brutality. Elijah Muhammad, however, eventually ordered him to discontinue his efforts in Los Angeles and return to New York. In the summer of 1963, Malcolm (without authorization from Elijah Muhammad) announced that Temple No. 7, in Harlem, would begin a voter registration drive. Against standing policy, he publicly advocated that the Nation of Islam should form a "united black front" with civil rights organizations. Malcolm was also deeply shaken by his knowledge of financial corruption at the Nation's headquarters in Chicago and the increasing confirmation he received of Elijah Muhammad's adulterous affairs and illegitimate children with former secretaries. He began discussing these issues with a few other Muslims.

These conflicts came to a head with the assassination of President John Kennedy. In keeping with his policy of caution and noninvolvement, Elijah Muhammad had strictly instructed all Muslim ministers to make no comment on the assassination. Malcolm complied for a few days, but then after one of his talks in New York, someone asked about Kennedy. Comparing the assassination to that of Patrice Lumumba and other deaths that he said the president had been responsible for, Malcolm remarked: "Chickens coming home to roost never did make me sad; they've always made me glad." (The Autobiography of Malcolm X, pp. 300–301). This statement was widely reported and criticized in the press.

The next day, Elijah Muhammad suspended Malcolm from making any public statements for 90 days in order to distance the Nation of Islam from his remarks. A few weeks later, Malcolm was relieved of his positions as the national representative of the Nation and as the Minister of Temple No. 7. Loyal Muslims were quietly told to shun him and perhaps even to kill him. The ban on his public speaking was extended indefinitely. Realizing that his disputes with the Nation of Islam were now irreconcilable, Malcolm announced his break with the movement on March 8, 1964. He formed the Muslim Mosque, Inc., in Harlem, to continue his work to liberate and uplift African American people. He would later also found the Organization of Afro-American Unity (OAAU), a secular organization devoted to the same ends. Both organizations were a direct challenge to the Nation of Islam.

Almost immediately after leaving the Nation of Islam, Malcolm decided to make a pilgrimage to Mecca. The trip was financed by his sister, Ella. He was received with hospitality by the Saudi royal family, who made him a guest of the state. The deputy chief of protocol for Prince Faisal accompanied him on his pilgrimage. Malcolm claimed that his pilgrimage amounted to a conversion experience that allowed him to reject the idea that white men were devils and embrace the racial brotherhood taught by orthodox Islam. While in Mecca he changed his name to el-Hajj Malik el-Shabazz. In any case, the pilgrimage provided Malcolm with an opportunity to reformulate his message to his followers and to the public. From Saudi Arabia, he conducted a campaign of writing letters, postcards, and public statements to proclaim his conversion to orthodox Islam and his newfound belief in the unity of the human race.

After his return from pilgrimage, Malcolm X remained a popular media figure. He spoke regularly at the Muslim Mosque, Inc., and at meetings of the Organization of African Unity. Tensions with the Nation of Islam escalated, and there were a number of threats and attempts on his life. On February 21, 1965, while addressing a meeting of the OAAU at the Audubon Ballroom in New York, and before an audience of 400 supporters, who included his wife and children, Malcolm was shot 16 times, with a shotgun and with pistols, by at least three assassins. He died at the podium. The gunmen were seized by the crowd and by Malcolm's bodyguards. Three men, all affiliated with the Nation of Islam, were eventually convicted of the murder and served prison sentences. They have since been released.

Malcolm X certainly had a greater impact on the African American community after his death than he did while he was alive. His autobiography was published posthumously and became a best seller. His militant stance was echoed by subsequent black activists such as the Black Power movement and the Black Panthers, for which his book was a standard inspiration. During the late 1980s and early 1990s, Malcolm's face and the symbol "X" were marketed on T-shirts, baseball caps, and other casual attire. The clutter of "X" products and paraphernalia eventually lost touch with any political message. In 1992, Spike Lee released a major motion picture based on Malcolm's life that was successful at the box office. While this commercial popularity has since waned, Malcolm X remains an iconic figure for an entire generation of African American youth.

See also: Black Nationalism; Black Power; Haley, Alex; Muhammad, Elijah; Nation of Islam; Organization of Afro-American Unity; Pan-Africanism; Shabazz, Beatty X; Universal Negro Improvement Association

Anthony A. Lee

Bibliography

- Carson, Clayborne. Malcolm X: The FBI File. New York: Carroll & Graf, 1991.
- Clegg III, Claude Andrew. An Original Man: The Life and Times of Elijah Muhammad. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1997.
- Collins, Rodney P., and A. Peter Bailey. The Seventh Child: A Family Memoir of Malcolm X. London: Turnaround, 2002.
- Dyson, Michael Eric. Making Malcolm: The Myth and Meaning of Malcolm X. New York: Oxford University Press, 1996.
- Jenkins, Robert L., ed. The Malcolm X Encyclopedia. Westport, CT: Greenwood Press, 2002.
- Perry, Bruce. Malcolm: The Life of a Man Who Changed Black America. Barrytown, NY: Station Hill Press, 1991.
- Shabazz, Ilyasah with Kim McLarin. Growing Up X. New York: One World, 2002.
- X, Malcolm with the assistance of Alex Haley. The Autobiography of Malcolm X. New York: Ballantine Books, 1965.

Categorical Index

---

Atlantic African, American, and European Backgrounds to Contact, Commerce, and Enslavement

Acculturation, 9–10. See also Amalgamation; Atlantic Creoles; Double consciousness; Salt-water negroes
African Burial Ground, New York City, 10–12, 11 (photo), 130. See also Africanisms; Grave decorations
African Diaspora, 12–13, 117, 127, 128, 145, 202, 223, 234, 247, 248, 251, 268, 269, 362–363, 443, 691, 759, 945, 980, 1010. See also Atlantic slave trade; Black Atlantic; Pan-Africanism; Ring shout; Trans-Saharan slave trade
Africanisms, 13–15, 152, 191, 199–200, 206, 259. See also Black folk culture; Slave culture; Slave religion
Asiento, 15. See also Atlantic slave trade; Dutch West India Company; Hispaniola
Atlantic Creoles, 16–17. See also Acculturation; Black Atlantic
Atlantic Islands, 17–18. See also Atlantic slave trade; Sugar plantations
Atlantic slave trade, 18–23, 108, 118, 208, 268, 284, 324, 325, 400. See also African Diaspora; Asiento; Cugoano, Quobna Ottobah; Equiano, Olaudah
Bacon's Rebellion, 23–24, 32, 55, 56, 58, 86. See also Chesapeake Colonies;

Indentured servitude; Racialized slavery
Barracoons, 24–25, 25 (illustration). See also Atlantic slave trade
Bight of Benin, 25–27, 130. See also Atlantic slave trade; Kingdom of Benin; Kingdom of Dahomey
Bight of Biafra, 27–28, 52–53, 128, 129, 174. See also Atlantic slave trade; Chesapeake Colonies; Equiano, Olaudah; Igbo
Bosman, Willem, 28. See also Atlantic slave trade; Dutch West India Company; Elmina; Factors; Gold Coast; Gulf of Guinea
Bunce Island, 28–29, 64. See also Carolinas; Gullah; Laurens, Henry; Rice cultivation; Royal African Company; Sierra Leone
Cape Coast Castle, 29–30, 30 (illustration). See also Atlantic slave trade; Elmina
Carolinas, 30–31, 36, 46, 50, 52, 64, 90–91, 101, 103–104, 108, 114, 128, 130, 172–173, 261, 523. See also Angolan/Kongolese; Atlantic slave trade; Bunce Island; Gold Coast; Gullah; Juba Dance; Malaria; Rice cultivation; Senegambia; Sierra Leone; Stono Rebellion; Task system; Turner, Lorenzo Dow; West-Central Africa
Chesapeake Colonies, 32–33, 50, 53–54, 82. See also Atlantic slave trade;

Bacon's Rebellion; Freedom dues; Headright system; Indentured servitude; Jamestown, Virginia; Jefferson, Thomas; Lord Dunmore; Rolfe, John; Tobacco
Cugoano, Quobna Ottobah, 33–34. See also Abolition; Atlantic slave trade; Slave trade
de Las Casas, Bartolomé, 34–35, 35 (illustration), 42. See also Atlantic slave trade; Encomienda; Hispaniola
Destination, Florida, 36. See also Atlantic Creoles; Black Seminoles; Fugitive slaves; Gullah; Kongo Kingdom; Seminole Wars; Stono Rebellion; West-Central Africa
Du Sable, Jean Baptiste Point, 36–37. See also American Revolution
Dutch New Netherland, 38–39, 239–241. See also Atlantic slave trade; Dutch West India Company; Gold Coast; Patroonship
Dutch West India Company, 28, 38, 39–40, 81, 184, 493. See also Atlantic slave trade; Dutch New Netherland; Elmina; Gold Coast
Elmina, 28, 39, 40–41, 43. See also Atlantic slave trade; Cape Coast Castle; Gold Coast
Encomienda, 41–42. See also de las Casas, Bartolomé; Hispaniola; Reconquista
Estévan, 42–43. See also Atlantic Creoles; Hispaniola

- Factors, 43. See also Atlantic slave trade; Bosman, Willem; Dutch West India Company; Elmina; Gold Coast; Royal African Company
- Freedom dues, 44. See also Chesapeake Colonies; Headright system; Indentured servitude; Jamestown, Virginia
- Futa Jallon, 44–45, 99. See also Senegambia; Sierra Leone
- Ghana, 45, 104–105. See also Mali; Sahel; Senegambia; Songhai; Sudanic Empires; Timbuktu; Tribute
- Gold Coast, 28, 29, 30–31, 39, 40, 43, 45–46, 128, 130, 176, 184, 202, 876. See also Atlantic slave trade; Coromantee; Elmina; Kingdom of Asante; Nkrumah, Kwame
- Gorée Island, 46–47, 47 (photo), 99–100
- Griot, 47–48, 79, 100, 106, 109. See also Mali; Occupational castes; Oral culture; Senegambia; Songhai; Sundiata: The Epic of Old Mali
- Gulf of Guinea, 28, 48–49, 49 (illustration). See also Atlantic slave trade; Bight of Benin; Bight of Biafra; Bosman, Willem; Gold Coast; Kingdom of Dahomey; Sierra Leone
- Headright system, 49–50. See also Chesapeake Colonies; Freedom dues; Indentured servitude; Jamestown, Virginia; Patroonship; Tobacco
- Hispaniola, 41, 50–51, 51 (illustration). See also Asiento; Boyer, Jean Pierre; de Las Casas, Bartolomé; Encomienda; Haitian Revolution; Las Siete Partidas; Louverture, Toussaint
- Igbo, 52–53, 128, 188, 203. See also Buckra; Coromantee; Ebo Landing; Transmigration
- Indentured servitude, 53–55, 60. See also Bacon's Rebellion; Chesapeake Colonies; Freedom dues; Headright system; Jamestown, Virginia; Johnson, Anthony; Malaria; Tobacco
- Jamestown, Virginia, 49–50, 55–58, 57 (illustration), 84–85, 93–94, 113–114. See also Bacon's Rebellion; Chesapeake Colonies; Freedom dues; Headright system; Indentured servitude; Racialized slavery; Rolfe, John
- John, Prester, 58–59. See also Reconquista
- Johnson, Anthony, 5–6, 56–57, 59–60. See also Chesapeake Colonies; Freedom dues; Indentured servitude; Jamestown, Virginia; Tobacco
- Kingdom of Asante, 60–61. See also Atlantic slave trade; Elmina; Gold Coast
- Kingdom of Benin, 61. See also African imperialism; Atlantic slave trade; Bight of Benin; Gulf of Guinea
- Kingdom of Dahomey, 25–26, 61–62, 176. See also African imperialism; Atlantic slave trade; Bight of Benin; Gulf of Guinea
- Kongo Kingdom, 36, 38, 62, 118, 119–121, 152. See also Kongo cosmogram; Mbebma, Nzinga (Afonso I); Vita, Dona Beatriz-Kimpa; West-Central Africa
- Las Siete Partidas*, 63–64. See also Atlantic slave trade; Hispaniola
- Laurens, Henry, 29, 64. See also American Revolution; Bunce Island; Carolinas; Jay, John; Rice cultivation; Sierra Leone
- Loose pack, 65. See also Abolition, slave trade; Atlantic slave trade; Factors; Royal African Company; Tight pack
- Malaria, 65–66. See also Atlantic slave trade; Chesapeake Colonies; Gulf of Guinea; Hispaniola
- Mali, 48, 66–68, 67 (photo), 74, 104–106. See also Ghana; Musa, Mansa; Sahel; Senegambia; Songhai; Sudanic Empires; Sundiata: The Epic of Old Mali
- Matrilineal societies, 68–69. See also Coromantee; Gold Coast; Kingdom of Asante
- Mbebma, Nzinga (Afonso I), 69–70. See also Kongo Kingdom; West-Central Africa
- Middle colonies, 70–72. See also African Burial Ground, New York City; African Methodist Episcopal Church; Dutch New Netherland; Dutch West India Company; Gradual emancipation; New England colonies; New York Conspiracy of 1741; Northern slavery; Patroonship; Pinkster Festival
- Musa, Mansa, 68, 73–74, 112–113, 116. See also Mali; Sudanic Empires; Timbuktu
- New England colonies, 74–75, 146. See also Attucks, Crispus; Election Day; Northern slavery; Tituba; Wheatley, Phillis
- New York Conspiracy of 1741, 71–72, 75–76, 76 (photo), 202. See also New York Revolt of 1712; Slave resistance
- New York Revolt of 1712, 76–77. See also African Burial Ground, New York City; Coromantee; New York Conspiracy of 1741; Northern slavery; Slave resistance; Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts
- Newton, John, 77–78, 111. See also Abolition, slave trade; Atlantic slave trade
- Occupational castes, 79–80. See also Ghana; Senegambia; Sudanic Empires
- Oral culture, 80–81, 150. See also Griot; Sundiata: The Epic of Old Mali
- Patroonship, 81. See also Dutch New Netherland; Dutch West India Company; Headright system; Middle Colonies
- Punch, John, 82. See also Chesapeake Colonies; Freedom dues; Indentured servitude; Racialized slavery
- Queen Nzinga (Njinga Mbande), 82–84, 83 (photo). See also Angolan/Kongoese; West-Central Africa
- Racialized slavery, 22, 38, 82, 84–87. See also Bacon's Rebellion; Chesapeake Colonies; Punch, John
- Reconquista, 41, 88–90. See also John, Prester
- Rice cultivation, 30–31, 64, 90–92, 92 (illustration), 98, 110, 129, 214. See also Bunce Island; Carolinas; Gullah; Sierra Leone; Sweetgrass baskets; Task system; Thurber, John
- Rolfe, John, 56, 93–94, 113–114. See also Chesapeake Colonies; Jamestown, Virginia; Tobacco
- Royal African Company, 29, 65, 85, 94–96, 108. See also Atlantic slave trade; Cape Coast Castle; Factors; Gold Coast; Sierra Leone
- Sahel, 96–98, 97 (photo). See also Ghana; Mali; Rice cultivation; Senegambia; Songhai; Sudanic Empires; Timbuktu; Trans-Saharan slave trade

- Seasoning, 98–99. See also Acculturation; Atlantic slave trade; Gullah; Salt-water negroes
- Senegambia, 20, 27, 30, 31, 99, 129, 130. See also Atlantic slave trade; Futa Jallon; Ghana; Gorée Island; Mali; Rice cultivation; Sahel; Sierra Leone; Songhai
- Signares, 99–101, 100 (illustration). See also Atlantic slave trade; Gorée Island; Senegambia
- Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts (SPG), 101, 193. See also Evangelism; Middle colonies; New York Revolt of 1712
- Songhai, 102, 104, 107, 114, 116. See also Ghana; Mali; Sudanic Empires; Timbuktu; Toure, Askia Muhammad
- Stono Rebellion, 36, 103–104, 129, 251, 278. See also Angolan/Kongolesse; Carolinas; Destination, Florida; Slave resistance
- Sudanic Empires, 104–107. See also Ghana; Mali; Sahel; Senegambia; Songhai; Trans-Saharan slave trade
- Sugar plantations, 108–109, 113–114. See also Hispaniola; Royal African Company
- Sundiata: The Epic of Old Mali, 48, 67–68, 105–106, 109–110. See also Mali; Oral culture; Sudanic Empires
- Task system, 110–111. See also Carolinas; Gang system; Gullah; Rice cultivation
- Tight pack, 111–112. See also Atlantic slave trade; Loose pack; Newton, John
- Timbuktu, 45, 67 (photo), 68, 73–74, 97 (photo), 102, 106–107, 112–113, 113 (photo), 114, 116. See also Mali; Musa, Mansa; Songhai; Sudanic Empires; Toure, Askia Muhammad
- Tobacco, 32, 49–50, 54, 56, 93, 113–114. See also Chesapeake Colonies; Indentured servitude; Jamestown, Virginia; Johnson, Anthony
- Toure, Askia Muhammad, 102, 107, 114–116, 115 (photo). See also Songhai; Sudanic Empires; Timbuktu
- Trans-Saharan slave trade, 98, 104–105, 116–117. See also Atlantic slave trade; Sahel
- Tribute, 117–118. See also Atlantic slave trade
- Vita, Dona Beatriz-Kimpa, 119–121. See also Kongo Kingdom; Stono Rebellion; West-Central Africa
- West-Central Africa, 31, 36, 38, 118, 121–122, 127, 129, 130, 168–169, 176, 208, 248. See also Angolan/Kongolesse; Kongo cosmogram; Kongo Kingdom
- Wheatley, Phillis, 122–123, 123 (illustration). See also American Revolution; Hammon, Jupiter; Senegambia
- Woolman, John, 123–124, 507. See also Abolition, slave trade; Quakers (Society of Friends)
- Culture, Identity, and Community: From Slavery to the Present
- Amalgamation, 132–133. See also Acculturation; Miscegenation
- Anansi the Spider*, 133. See also Africanisms; Black Folk Culture; Gold Coast
- Ancestral spirits, 134. See also Africanisms; Black Folk Culture; Slave religion; Transmigration
- Anderson, Marian, 134–136, 135 (photo). See also Cold War and civil rights; National Association for the Advancement of Colored People; Roosevelt, Eleanor
- Angolan/Kongolesse, 136. See also Gullah; Kongo cosmogram; Stono Rebellion
- Animal trickster stories, 136–137. See also Africanisms; Anansi the Spider; Black Folk Culture
- Armstrong, Louis, 138–141, 140 (photo), 167, 181, 185, 198, 215–216, 217. See also Black Folk Culture; Jazz
- Bailey, Pearl, 141–142. See also Black Folk Culture; Poitier, Sidney
- Basie, Count, 142–143. See also Black Folk Culture; Jazz
- Bebop, 143–144, 216. See also Black Folk Culture; Ellington, Duke; Jazz; Parker, Charlie
- Black Atlantic, 144–145. See also African Diaspora; Atlantic Creoles; Atlantic slave trade
- Black churches, 145–148, 147 (illustration). See also African Methodist Episcopal Church; First African Baptist Church; Slave religion
- Black English, 149–150, 203. See also Africanisms; Gullah; Turner, Lorenzo Dow
- Black Folk Culture, 150–153. See also Africanisms; Animal trickster stories; Blues music; Field hollers; Goofers dust; Grave dirt; Hoodoo; Jazz; Laveau, Marie; Ragtime; Ring shout; Slave culture; Soul food; Work songs
- Black fraternal societies, 153–156, 243. See also Benevolent societies; Prince Hall Masonry
- Black Seminoles, 36, 156–157. See also Destination, Florida; Seminole Wars
- Black wedding traditions, 157–159, 158 (illustration). See also Africanisms; Black churches; Black Folk Culture
- Blackface minstrelsy, 159–165, 161 (illustration). See also The Birth of a Nation; Jim Crow; Lee, Spike; White supremacy
- Blue notes, 165. See also Africanisms; Blues music
- Blues music, 165, 166–168. See also Africanisms; Armstrong, Louis; Blue notes; Ellington, Duke; Field hollers; Parker, Charlie
- Bottle trees, 168–169, 168 (photo). See also Africanisms; Slave culture; Slave religion
- Brer Rabbit (Brother Rabbit), 125, 150, 169–170, 170 (illustration), 207, 260. See also Africanisms; Animal trickster stories; Black Folk Culture
- Brooks, Gwendolyn, 170–172. See also Chicago Defender; Harlem Renaissance
- Brown, James, 172–174, 173 (photo), 196, 1018. See also Black Folk Culture
- Buckra, 174. See also Igbo; Slave culture
- Call-and-response, 175–176. See also Africanisms; Black churches; Ring shout; Slave culture; Slave religion; Work songs
- Caul, 176. See also Africanisms; Black Folk Culture
- Charms, 176–177. See also Africanisms; Black Folk Culture; Slave culture
- Coltrane, John, 177–180, 178 (photo), 217. See also Black Folk Culture; Davis, Miles; Jazz; Parker, Charlie
- Congo Square, New Orleans, 180–181. See also Africanisms; Laveau, Marie
- Conjure, 181–184, 207, 208. See also Africanisms; Pritchard, Gullah Jack; Root doctors; Slave culture; Slave resistance
- Coromantee, 184. See also Akan; Atlantic slave trade; Slave resistance

- Davis, Miles, 179, 185–187, 186 (photo), 216, 238. See also Black Folk Culture; Coltrane, John; Jazz; Parker, Charlie
- Double consciousness, 187–188. See also Du Bois, W.E.B.
- Ebo Landing, 188–189, 198
- Election Day, 189–190. See also Africanisms; Black Folk Culture; Pinkster Festival; Slave culture
- Ellington, Duke, 143, 167, 190–191, 198, 216, 739. See also Black Folk Culture; Jazz; Ragtime
- Ethnic randomization, 191–192. See also African Diaspora; Africanisms; Atlantic slave trade
- Evangelism, 192–193. See also African Methodist Episcopal Church; Daddy Grace; Elaw, Zilpha; Father Divine; Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts
- Family patterns, 193–195, 195 (illustration). See also Frazier, E. Franklin; Herskovits, Melville J.; Slave culture
- Field hollers, 196. See also Africanisms; Blues music; Call-and-response; Douglass, Frederick; Field hands; Slave culture
- Fitzgerald, Ella, 196–198, 197 (photo), 739. See also Black Folk Culture; Jazz
- Flying African stories, 198–199. See also Africanisms; Ebo Landing; Gullah; Transmigration
- Frazier, E. Franklin, 14, 68, 126, 194, 199–200, 259. See also Africanisms; Family patterns; Herskovits, Melville J.; Turner, Lorenzo Dow
- Full immersion baptism, 200. See also Slave culture; Slave religion
- Goofer dust, 200–201. See also Africanisms; Grave dirt; Hoodoo; New York Conspiracy of 1741; Slave culture
- Grave decorations, 201. See also Africanisms; Black Folk Culture; Hurston, Zora Neale; Kongo cosmogram; Laveau, Marie; Slave culture
- Grave dirt, 202. See also Africanisms; Black Folk Culture; Goofer dust
- Gullah, 31, 99, 136, 203–204. See also Black English; Pritchard, Gullah Jack; Ring shout; Sierra Leone; Slave culture; Sweetgrass baskets; Task system; Turner, Lorenzo Dow
- Gumbo, 205. See also Black Folk Culture; Jambalaya
- Herskovits, Melville J., 9–10, 14, 126–127, 150, 191, 194, 199–200, 205–207, 259, 949. See also Acculturation; Africanisms; Frazier, E. Franklin; Locke, Alain LeRoy; Slave culture; Turner, Lorenzo Dow
- High John the Conqueror Root, 207. See also Black Folk Culture; Conjure; Hoodoo; Hurston, Zora Neale; Root doctors
- Hoodoo, 200–201, 207, 208–209. See also Black Folk Culture; Conjure; Hurston, Zora Neale; Laveau, Marie; Root doctors
- Hurston, Zora Neale, 201, 207, 208, 209–211, 210 (photo), 797, 818, 925. See also Black Folk Culture; Harlem Renaissance; Hoodoo; Hughes, Langston; New Negro Movement
- Hush harbors, 212. See also Slave culture; Slave religion
- Infanticide, 212–213. See also Garner, Margaret; Slave resistance
- Jambalaya, 213–214. See also Africanisms; Black Folk Culture; Gumbo
- Jas, 214–215. See also Africanisms; Black Folk Culture; Jazz
- Jazz, 138–139, 143–144, 151, 190, 215–217. See also Africanisms; Armstrong, Louis; Bebop; Black Folk Culture; Coltrane, John; Congo Square, New Orleans; Davis, Miles; Fitzgerald, Ella; Gillespie, Dizzy; Jas; Parker, Charlie; Ragtime
- John the Slave tales, 218. See also Black Folk Culture; Hurston, Zora Neale; Slave culture
- Joplin, Scott, 218–220, 219 (photo), 246. See also Ragtime
- Juba dance, 220. See also Angolan/Kongo; Black Folk Culture; Kongo cosmogram; Ring shout; West-Central Africa
- Kongo cosmogram, 136, 169, 201, 220–221, 221 (illustration), 268. See also Flying African stories; Juba dance; Kongo Kingdom; Ring shout; Transmigration
- Kwanzaa, 221–223, 604–605. See also Afrocentricity; Black Power; Karanga, Maulana; US Organization
- Laveau, Marie, 152, 181, 211, 223–224. See also Conjure; Hoodoo; Hurston, Zora Neale
- Locke, Alain LeRoy, 13, 224–227, 225 (illustration), 795–799, 925–926. See also Du Bois, W.E.B.; Harlem Renaissance; New Negro Movement; Woodson, Carter Godwin
- Mardis Gras (New Orleans), 228–229, 228 (photo). See also Armstrong, Louis; Black Folk Culture; Congo Square, New Orleans
- Miscegenation, 229–231. See also Amalgamation; Mulatto; Quadroon
- Mulatto, 231–232. See also Amalgamation; Miscegenation
- Names debate, 232–233. See also Cornish, Samuel; Whipper, William
- Negritude, 233–235, 234 (photo). See also Harlem Renaissance; New Negro Movement
- Obeah, 236–237. See also Conjure; Coromantee; Igbo; Slave religion
- Octoroon, 237. See also Amalgamation; Miscegenation; Mulatto; Quadroon
- Parker, Charlie, 143–144, 167, 185, 216, 237–239. See also Bebop; Black Folk Culture; Jazz
- Pinkster Festival, 239–241. See also Dutch New Netherland; Middle colonies
- Poisonings, 241–242. See also New York Conspiracy of 1741; Pritchard, Gullah Jack; Slave resistance
- Prince Hall Masonry, 154–155, 243–244, 441–442, 569. See also Black fraternal societies; Hall, Prince
- Pryor, Richard, 244–245, 244 (photo), 963. See also Cosby, Bill; Poitier, Sidney
- Quadroon, 245–246. See also Amalgamation; Miscegenation
- Ragtime, 151, 190, 218–220, 219 (photo), 246–247. See also Black Folk Culture; Jazz
- Ring shout, 247–248, 261. See also Kongo cosmogram; Slave culture; Slave religion
- Rogers, Joel Augustus, 249–250. See also African Diaspora; Harlem Renaissance; Woodson, Carter Godwin
- Root doctors, 182, 250–251. See also Conjure; Hoodoo; Slave religion
- Salt-water Negroes, 251. See also Atlantic slave trade
- Sambo, 251–252. See also Slave resistance

- Sanchez, Sonia, 253–254, 254 (photo).
See also Black Arts Movement; X, Malcolm
- Shakur, Tupac “2Pac” Amaru, 254–257, 255 (photo), 1016. See also Black Panther Party; Hip-hop
- Shrine of the Black Madonna, 257–258.
See also Black churches; Black nationalism; Pan-Africanism; Republic of New Afrika
- Signifying, 258–259. See also Anansi the Spider; Animal trickster stories; Brer Rabbit; John the Slave tales
- Slave culture, 259–260. See also Africanisms; Animal trickster stories; Black Folk Culture; Conjure; Ring shout; Slave diet; Slave religion; Work songs
- Slave religion, 260–261. See also Black Folk Culture; Hush Harbors; Ring shout; Slave culture
- Soul food, 262–263. See also Africanisms; Black Folk Culture; Rice cultivation; Slave culture; Slave diet
- Sweetgrass baskets, 263–264, 264 (photo)
- Syncretism, 264–265. See also Acculturation; Africanisms; Amalgamation
- Tituba, 266–267, 267 (illustration). See also Conjure; New England colonies; Slave religion
- Transmigration, 268–269. See also Ebo Landing; Flying African stories; Slave religion
- Turner, Lorenzo Dow, 13, 14, 204, 248, 269–270. See also Africanisms; Gullah; Herskovits, Melville J.
- Walker, Margaret, 270–271. See also Brooks, Gwendolyn; Haley, Alex; Wright, Richard
- Wonder, Stevie, 271–272. See also Black Folk Culture
- Work songs, 272–273. See also Blues music; Field hands; Field hollers; Slave culture; Slave plantations
- Wright, Richard, 273–274, 274 (photo), 626–627, 663, 1037. See also Ellison, Ralph; Hughes, Langston; McKay, Claude
- Political Activity and Resistance to Oppression: From the American Revolution to the Civil War
- Abelman v. Booth*, 282–284. See also Dred Scott v. Sandford; Fugitive Slave Act of 1793; Fugitive Slave Act of 1850; Fugitive slaves
- Abolition, slave trade, 26, 29, 33, 72, 283, 284–287. See also Atlantic slave trade; Cugoano, Quobna Ottobah; Equiano, Olaudah; Wilberforce, William
- Abolition, slavery, 287–291, 453. See also American and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society; American Anti-Slavery Society; Birney, James; Brown, John; Douglass, Frederick; Emancipation Proclamation; Fugitive Slave Act of 1850; Fugitive slaves; Garrison, William Lloyd; Gradual emancipation; Immediatism; Kansas-Nebraska Act, 1854; Liberia; Smith, Gerrit; Tappan, Arthur; Tappan, Lewis; Thirteenth Amendment; Truth, Sojourner; Tubman, Harriet
- African Civilization Society, 293–294, 307, 393, 426, 539. See also Delany, Martin; Douglass, Frederick; Garnet, Henry Highland; Nell, William Cooper; Pennington, James William Charles; Remond, Charles L.; Smith, James McCune
- African Dorcas Association, 295–296, 357. See also African free schools; Jennings, Elizabeth
- African Free Schools, 296–297, 365, 424, 456, 509, 510, 578. See also African Dorcas Association; Crummell, Alexander; Garnet, Henry Highland; Smith, James McCune; Williams, Peter, Jr.
- African Grove Theater, 297. See also Black Folk Culture
- African Methodist Episcopal Church (AMEC), 145, 148, 193, 281, 298–300, 300–303, 341, 499–500, 502, 990, 1012, 1060–1062. See also Allen, Richard; Black churches; Jones, Absalom
- Allen, Richard, 298, 300–303, 301 (illustration), 318, 325, 344, 409, 410, 413, 523. See also African Methodist Episcopal Church; Jones, Absalom
- American and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society, 303–304, 305, 394, 508. See also Abolition, slavery; American Anti-Slavery Society; Douglass, Frederick; Garrison, William Lloyd; Smith, Gerrit; Tappan, Arthur; Tappan, Lewis
- American Anti-Slavery Society, 281, 289, 303, 304–305, 318, 326, 345, 357, 394, 397, 398, 433, 448, 460, 464, 500, 506, 508, 511–512, 513, 577. See also Abolition, slavery;
- Douglass, Frederick; Garrison, William Lloyd; Immediatism; Tappan, Arthur; Tappan, Lewis
- American Colonization Society, 288, 303, 306–308, 307 (photo), 340, 345, 367–368, 378, 443–444, 463, 466, 520, 569, 577. See also Cuffe, Paul; Liberia; Russwurm, John
- American Moral Reform Society (AMRS), 309–310, 346, 506, 573–574. See also Colored Convention Movement; Cornish, Samuel; Whipper, William
- American Revolution, 33, 64, 70, 72, 74–75, 86, 96, 132, 243, 245, 276, 277, 279, 287, 310–312, 317, 320, 325, 355–356, 367, 370 (illustration), 374, 377, 379, 418–419, 431, 475, 494, 518, 522. See also Attucks, Crispus; Boston Massacre; Continental Army; Declaration of Independence; Lord Dunmore; Poor, Salem; Salem, Peter; Washington, George; Williams, Peter, Sr.
- Amistad* (schooner), 279, 293, 312–316, 313 (illustration), 336–337, 378, 534. See also Abolition, slave trade; Adams, John Quincy; Cinque, Joseph; Tappan, Lewis
- Anglo-African Magazine*, 316–317, 539. See also Abolition, slavery; Garnet, Henry Highland; Pennington, James William Charles
- Antislavery societies, 317–318. See also Abolition, slavery; American and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society; American Anti-Slavery Society
- Attucks, Crispus, 319–320, 320 (photo), 327–328, 329
- August First celebrations, 320–321. See also Black Folk Culture
- Ball, Charles, 321–322. See also Fugitive slaves; Slave culture
- Banneker, Benjamin, 322–323, 323 (illustration), 333, 453, 805. See also Jefferson, Thomas
- Bell, Philip A., 324, 342, 508, 1051–1052. See also Abolition, slavery; Colored American newspaper; Colored Convention Movement; The Elevator
- Benevolent societies, 325. See also African Dorcas Association; Antislavery societies; Brown Fellowship Society; Free African Society; Prince Hall Masonry
- Birney, James, 326–327. See also American Anti-Slavery Society; American Colonization Society;

- Douglass, Frederick; Garrison, William Lloyd; Liberty Party; Smith, Gerrit; Tappan, Arthur; Tappan, Lewis
- Boston Massacre, 278, 311, 319, 327–329, 328 (illustration). See also American Revolution; Attucks, Crispus
- Boyer, Jean Pierre, 329, 376. See also Destination, Florida; Haitian Revolution; Louverture, Toussaint
- Brown, John, 330–331, 330 (photo), 426, 536–537, 543, 559, 655, 933. See also Abolition, slavery; Kansas-Nebraska Act, 1854; Slave resistance; Smith, Gerrit
- Brown, William Wells, 318, 332–333, 348, 512, 535. See also Abolition, slavery; American Anti-Slavery Society; Douglass, Frederick; Fugitive slaves; Jefferson, Thomas; Slave culture; Underground Railroad
- Brown Fellowship Society, 325, 333. See also Benevolent societies
- Carpetbaggers, 334–335. See also Congressional reconstruction; Ku Klux Klan; Radical Republicans
- Cary, Mary Ann Shadd, 335–336. See also Colored Convention Movement; Delany, Martin; Destination, Canada; Douglass, Frederick; Shadd, Abraham
- Cinque, Joseph, 336–338, 338 (illustration). See also Adams, John Quincy; Amistad (schooner); Pennington, James William Charles; Tappan, Lewis
- Clarkson, Thomas, 338–339, 378, 399. See also Abolition, slave trade; Equiano, Olaudah; Wilberforce, William
- Clay, Henry, 339–340, 345, 349, 350 (illustration), 462, 484, 521, 465. See also Compromise of 1850; Missouri Compromise
- Coker, Daniel, 341. See also African Methodist Episcopal Church; American Colonization Society; Destination, Sierra Leone
- Colored American* newspaper, 341–343, 358, 508, 516, 526, 573–574, 580. See also Abolition, slavery; Bell, Philip A.; Cornish, Samuel; Ray, Charles; Smith, James McCune
- Compromise of 1850, 349–350, 368, 458, 559. See also Clay, Henry; Destination, Canada; Free Soil Party; Fugitive Slave Act of 1850; Fugitive slaves; Missouri Compromise
- Confederate States of America, 351–353, 369, 402, 406. See also Davis, Jefferson; Emancipation Proclamation; Fort Pillow Massacre
- Confiscation Acts, 354–355. See also Confederate States of America; Emancipation Proclamation
- Continental Army, 355–356. See also American Revolution; Poor, Salem; Salem, Peter
- Cornish, Samuel, 309, 342, 343, 356–358, 357 (photo), 413–414, 508, 516, 517, 573–574, 580. See also American Anti-Slavery Society; American Colonization Society; Colored American newspaper; Freedom's Journal; Moral uplift; Russwurm, John
- Craft, William and Ellen, 318, 358–359
- Crandall, Prudence, 359–360, 360 (illustration), 507. See also Abolition, slavery
- Crummell, Alexander, 296, 361–364. See also Abolition, slavery; African Free Schools; Cooper, Anna Julia; Crummell, Boston; Delany, Martin; Douglass, Frederick; Du Bois, W.E.B.; Fugitive Slave Act of 1850; Garnet, Henry Highland; Liberia; Walker, David; Washington, Booker T.
- Cuffe, Paul, 307, 311, 365–368, 376, 378, 414, 520, 576. See also Abolition, slavery; Black Nationalism; Sierra Leone
- Davis, Jefferson, 353, 368–369, 369 (photo), 403. See also Confederate States of America
- Declaration of Independence, 293, 310, 319–320, 332, 370–372, 370 (illustration), 420, 452, 458–459, 465, 521, 549, 570. See also American Revolution; Jefferson, Thomas
- Delany, Martin R., 294, 316, 317, 347, 363, 372–374, 378, 655. See also American Colonization Society; Black Nationalism; Pan-Africanism
- Destination, Canada, 374–375, 560–561, 572, 577. See also Fugitive Slave Act of 1850; Fugitive slaves
- Destination, Haiti, 375–377. See also Boyer, Jean Pierre; Douglass, Frederick; Garnet, Henry Highland; Haitian Revolution
- Destination, Sierra Leone, 377–378. See also American Colonization Society; Clarkson, Thomas; Coker, Daniel; Cuffe, Paul; Wilberforce, William
- Dismal Swamp maroons, 378–380. See also Fugitive slaves; Slave resistance
- Domestic slave trade, 380–384. See also Family patterns; Slave breeding
- Douglass, Anna Murray, 384–385. See also Douglass, Frederick; Fugitive slaves; Underground Railroad
- Douglass, Frederick, 163, 196, 281–282, 290, 299, 309–310, 316, 318, 327, 332, 335, 347, 348, 363, 373, 377, 386–392, 387 (photo), 393, 400, 426, 428, 479, 488, 500–501, 512, 516, 535, 536, 538–539, 553, 559, 605, 621, 655, 758, 829, 837, 1045, 1049. See also Abolition, slavery; American Anti-Slavery Society; Colored Convention Movement; Douglass, Anna Murray; Fugitive Slave Act of 1850; Fugitive slaves; Garrison, William Lloyd; Lincoln, Abraham
- Downing, George, 377, 392–393, 537. See also Abolition, slavery; American Colonization Society; Downing, Thomas; Garnet, Henry Highland; Smith, James McCune
- Downing, Thomas, 392, 393–395. See also Abolition, slavery; American and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society; American Anti-Slavery Society; Downing, George; Jennings, Thomas L.
- Dred Scott v. Sandford*, 283, 395–396, 426, 506, 521, 775, 959. See also Kansas-Nebraska Act, 1854; Missouri Compromise; Scott, Dred
- Elaw, Zilpha, 396–397. See also Evangelism
- The Emancipator, 397–398, 398 (illustration). See also Abolition, slavery; American Anti-Slavery Society; Garrison, William Lloyd; Tappan, Arthur
- Equiano, Olaudah, 285, 399–401, 571. See also Abolition, slave trade; Bight of Biafra; Black Atlantic; Cugoano, Quobna Ottobah; Igbo
- Field hands, 402. See also Gang system; Slave plantations
- Field Order No. 15, 402–403, 774. See also Forty acres and a mule; Union Army
- First African Baptist Church (FABC), 404–405. See also Black churches; Underground Railroad
- Fort Pillow Massacre, 353, 405–406, 564. See also Ku Klux Klan; Union Army

- Forten, Charlotte, 407–408. See also Abolition, slavery; Forten, James
- Forten, James, 378, 413, 461, 506, 573
- Free African Society (FAS), 281, 298, 301, 325, 410–411, 457. See also Benevolent societies
- Free Soil Party, 349, 411–412, 412 (illustration), 484. See also Abolition, slavery; Brown, John; Fugitive Slave Act of 1850; Republican Party
- Freedom's Journal*, 280–281, 295, 318, 347, 356–357, 413–414, 516–518, 569, 580. See also American Colonization Society; Cornish, Samuel; Crummell, Boston; Liberia; Russwurm, John
- Fugitive Slave Act of 1793, 415–416, 521. See also Compromise of 1850; Fugitive Slave Act of 1850; Fugitive slaves
- Fugitive Slave Act of 1850, 282, 324, 340, 350, 359, 393, 416–417, 418 (illustration), 423, 508, 521, 535, 538, 562, 758. See also Destination, Canada; Fugitive Slave Act of 1793; Fugitive slaves; Uncle Tom's Cabin; Underground Railroad
- Fugitive slaves, 417–420. See also Destination, Canada; Fugitive Slave Act of 1793; Fugitive Slave Act of 1850; Underground Railroad
- Gabriel (Prosser), 420–421, 475, 534. See also Slave resistance
- Gang system, 422. See also Slave plantations; Task system
- Garner, Margaret, 422–424, 423 (illustration). See also Fugitive slaves; Slave resistance; Underground Railroad
- Garnet, Henry Highland, 293, 296, 307, 317, 318, 346, 363, 377, 393, 424–427, 425 (illustration), 479, 509–510, 537, 539, 569. See also African Civilization Society; Colored Convention Movement; Liberty Party
- Garrison, William Lloyd, 281, 303–304, 305, 324, 326, 343, 345, 388, 394, 397, 417, 427–430, 428 (photo), 435, 448, 461–462, 464, 488, 506, 508, 512, 513, 525, 549, 553, 573, 580. See also American and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society; American Anti-Slavery Society; Douglass, Frederick; Immediatism; the Liberator; Lincoln, Abraham; Tappan, Arthur; Tappan, Lewis
- Gradual emancipation, 430–431. See also Abolition, slavery; Garrison, William Lloyd; Jefferson, Thomas; Lincoln, Abraham; Northern slavery
- Great Awakening, 431–433, 481. See also Abolition, slavery; Evangelism
- Grimke, Angelina and Sarah, 289, 304, 408, 433–436, 434 (illustration), 1046. See also Abolition, slavery; Garrison, William Lloyd
- Haitian Revolution, 375, 436–441, 469, 470–474, 475, 510, 520, 567, 569; foreign invasion, 438–439; Leclerc-Rochambeau expedition, 440–441; Louverture's reign, 438 (illustration), 439–440; road to revolution, 436–437; slave uprising, 437–438. See also Louverture, Toussaint
- Hall, Prince, 441–442. See also Abolition, slavery; American Revolution; Continental Army; Prince Hall Masonry
- Hamilton, William, 442–444. See also Abolition, slave trade; Black Nationalism; Colored Convention Movement; Freedom's Journal; Pan-Africanism; Williams, Peter, Sr.
- Hammon, Jupiter, 444–445. See also Abolition, slave trade; Abolition, slavery; Moral uplift
- Hemings, Sally, 445–446. See also Jefferson, Thomas; Miscegenation
- House servants, 446–447. See also Field hands; Hemings, Sally; Jacobs, Harriet; Newsom, Celia; Slave plantations
- Immediatism, 447–448. See also Abolition, slavery; Garrison, William Lloyd; the Liberator; Liberty Party
- Jacobs, Harriet, 449–450. See also Douglass, Frederick; Fugitive Slave Act of 1850; Fugitive slaves; House servants; Slave resistance
- Jay, John, 296, 450–452, 451 (illustration), 550. See also Abolition, slavery; American Revolution; Gradual emancipation
- Jefferson, Thomas, 132, 276, 280, 288, 332, 370–372, 420, 431, 445–446, 452, 452–453, 462, 469, 571, 849. See also American Revolution; Banneker, Benjamin; Declaration of Independence; Gabriel (Prosser); Haitian Revolution; Hemings, Sally; Louisiana Purchase
- Jennings, Elizabeth, 454–455. See also Douglass, Frederick;
- Garnet, Henry Highland; Jennings, Thomas L.; New York Draft Riots; Pennington, James William Charles
- Jennings, Thomas L., 344, 394, 455–456, 577. See also Abolition, slavery; Colored Convention Movement; Destination, Haiti; Jennings, Elizabeth; Williams, Peter, Jr.
- Jones, Absalom, 298, 301, 318, 325, 410, 457–458, 523. See also African Methodist Episcopal Church; Allen, Richard; Benevolent societies
- Kansas-Nebraska Act, 1854, 290–291, 331, 412, 458–459, 465, 469. See also Brown, John; Louisiana Purchase; Missouri Compromise
- Langston, John Mercer, 316, 459–461, 459 (photo). See also Abolition, slavery; Destination, Canada; Reconstruction Era Black Politicians; Republican Party; Underground Railroad
- The Liberator, 428–429, 431, 435, 448, 461–462, 488, 511, 525, 542, 580. See also Abolition, slavery; Garrison, William Lloyd; Thirteenth Amendment
- Liberia, 14, 30, 288, 294, 299, 307–308, 358, 362–363, 462–463, 510, 518, 822, 948, 954. See also Abolition, slavery; American Colonization Society; Crummell, Alexander; Crummell, Boston; Destination, Sierra Leone
- Liberty Party, 426, 448, 463–464, 508, 536, 539. See also Abolition, slavery; American Anti-Slavery Society; Birney, James; Free Soil Party; Garrison, William Lloyd; Smith, Gerrit; Tappan, Lewis
- Lincoln, Abraham, 351, 354, 369, 372, 373, 390, 429, 458, 464–467, 489, 545–546, 554, 621, 652, 719, 756 (photo), 762, 763, 830, 849, 941, 975, 1035. See also Abolition, slavery; American Colonization Society; Civil War (U.S.); Clay, Henry; Compromise of 1850; Emancipation Proclamation; Kansas-Nebraska Act, 1854; Missouri Compromise; Union Army
- Lord Dunmore, 33, 311–312, 355, 468–469. See also American Revolution; Fugitive slaves; Slave resistance
- Louisiana Purchase, 109, 469, 470 (illustration), 527. See also Haitian

- Revolution; Jefferson, Thomas; Kansas-Nebraska Act, 1854; Missouri Compromise
- Louverture, Toussaint, 50–51, 329, 438, 439–440, 470–474, 471 (illustration), 534, 567. See also Destination, Haiti; Haitian Revolution; Slave resistance
- Manumission, 63, 72, 117, 278, 281, 287–288, 296, 301, 306, 308, 325, 344, 475–476. See also Abolition, slavery; Gradual emancipation; New York Manumission Society
- Maroon societies, 476–478. See also Dismal swamp maroons; Fugitive slaves; Slave resistance
- Massachusetts 54th Regiment, 478–481, 480 (illustration), 563. See also Douglass, Frederick; Lincoln, Abraham; Union Army
- Methodist camp meetings, 481–482. See also Evangelism; Ring shout; Second Great Awakening
- Mexican War, 289, 293, 349, 411, 463, 483–484, 527. See also Free Soil Party; Missouri Compromise
- Missouri Compromise, 290, 292, 340, 458, 465, 469, 484–485. See also Compromise of 1850; Kansas-Nebraska Act, 1854; Louisiana Purchase
- Moral uplift, 485–488. See also Cornish, Samuel; Douglass, Frederick; Du Bois, W.E.B.; Hammon, Jupiter; Washington, Booker T.
- Nell, William Cooper, 294, 316, 479, 488–489, 501. See also Abolition, slavery; Douglass, Frederick; Free Soil Party; Fugitive Slave Act of 1850; Underground Railroad
- New York Draft Riots, 489–491. See also Union Army; White mob violence
- Newsom, Celia, 491–492. See also Slave resistance
- Northern slavery, 492–495. See also Middle colonies; New England colonies; New York Conspiracy of 1741; New York Revolt of 1712; Pinkster Festival
- Northup, Solomon, 495–496, 496 (illustration). See also Abolition, slavery
- Overseers, 496–498, 497 (photo). See also Slave plantations
- Patrollers, 498–499. See also Overseers; Slave codes; Slave plantations
- Payne, Daniel A., 299, 316, 499–500. See also African Methodist Episcopal Church; Historically Black Colleges and Universities; Southern free blacks; Tappan, Arthur; Tappan, Lewis; Williams, Peter, Jr.
- Pennington, James William Charles, 294, 316, 317, 337, 489, 500–502. See also Abolition, slavery; American Anti-Slavery Society; Douglass, Frederick; Fugitive slaves
- Poor, Salem, 502–503. See also American Revolution; Salem, Peter
- Port Royal Experiment, 503–504, 785. See also Forten, Charlotte; Union Army
- Pritchard, Gullah Jack, 176–177, 504–505, 565, 567. See also Conjure; Slave religion; Slave resistance; Vesey, Denmark
- Purvis, Robert, 506, 573. See also Abolition, slavery; American Anti-Slavery Society; Forten, Charlotte; Forten, James; Garrison, William Lloyd; Southern free blacks; Underground Railroad
- Quakers (Society of Friends), 123–124, 287, 289, 317, 359, 366, 397, 433, 492–493, 492–495, 506–507, 555, 560, 562, 572, 1002. See also Abolition, slavery; Crandall, Prudence; Cuffe, Paul; Northern slavery; Underground Railroad; Woolman, John
- Ray, Charles, 342–343, 508–509, 509. See also Abolition, slavery; American and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society; American Anti-Slavery Society; Colored American newspaper; Colored Convention Movement; Fugitive Slave Act of 1850; Garnet, Henry Highland; Garrison, William Lloyd; Tappan, Arthur; Tappan, Lewis; Underground Railroad
- Reason, Charles, 509–510. See also Abolition, slavery; African Free Schools; American Anti-Slavery Society; Garnet, Henry Highland; Ray, Charles; Reason, Patrick
- Reason, Patrick, 510–511. See also Abolition, slavery; African Free Schools; American and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society; American Anti-Slavery Society; Ray, Charles; Reason, Charles; Smith, James McCune; Tappan, Arthur; Tappan, Lewis; Wright, Theodore S.
- Remond, Charles L., 294, 511–512, 829. See also Abolition, slavery; Massachusetts 54th Regiment; Remond, Sarah Parker
- Remond, Sarah Parker, 512–513. See also Abolition, slavery; Remond, Charles L.
- Republican Party, 412, 458, 461, 465–466, 491, 514–515, 581–582, 632, 650–651, 652, 682–683, 689, 701, 706, 715, 743, 893, 966, 974–976. See also Compromise of 1877; Hayes, Rutherford B.; Radical Republicans; Reconstruction Era Black Politicians; Revels, Hiram
- Ruggles, David, 394, 398, 501, 515–516, 553, 829, 1052. See also Abolition, slavery; the Emancipator; Fugitive slaves; Underground Railroad
- Russwurm, John, 356, 414, 516–518, 517 (photo). See also Abolition, slavery; African Dorcas Association; American Colonization Society; Cornish, Samuel; Freedom's Journal; Liberia
- Salem, Peter, 518–519. See also American Revolution; Continental Army; Poor, Salem
- Saunders, Prince, 519–520. See also Cuffe, Paul; Destination, Haiti
- Scott, Dred, 395 (photo), 521. See also Civil Rights Act of 1866; Dred Scott v. Sandford; Fourteenth Amendment; Missouri Compromise
- Second Great Awakening, 288, 481, 522–523. See also Abolition, slavery; Black churches; Evangelism; Methodist camp meetings; Slave religion
- Seminole Wars, 36, 523–525, 524 (illustration). See also Black Seminoles; Maroon societies
- Shadd, Abraham, 335, 525–526. See also Abolition, slavery; American Anti-Slavery Society; Cary, Mary Ann Shadd; Destination, Canada; Underground Railroad
- Sierra Leone, 28–29, 30–31, 34, 129, 288, 299, 307, 314, 315–316, 336–337, 338, 366–367, 413, 477, 520, 526–527, 568, 576. See also Cuffe, Paul; Destination, Sierra Leone; Liberia
- Slave breeding, 527–528. See also Slave plantations
- Slave codes, 528–529, 665. See also Patrollers; Slave plantations
- Slave diet, 262–263, 529–530. See also Black Folk Culture; Slave culture; Soul food
- Slave driver, 531. See also Gang system; Overseers

- Slave plantations, 446–447, 496–498, 531–532, 533 (photo). See also House servants; Overseers; Slave quarters
- Slave quarters, 532–534. See also Field hands; House servants; Slave culture; Slave plantations; Washington, Booker T.
- Slave resistance, 103–104, 534–536. See also Brown, John; Cinque, Joseph; Douglass, Frederick; Fugitive slaves; Gabriel (Prosser); Maroon societies; New York Revolt of 1712; Slave culture; Stono Rebellion; Turner, Nat; Underground Railroad; Vesey, Denmark; Walker, David
- Smith, Gerrit, 304, 330, 345, 347, 536–537, 537 (photo), 572. See also Abolition, slavery; American Colonization Society; Brown, John; Free Soil Party; Liberty Party; Underground Railroad
- Smith, James McCune, 294, 296, 342, 377, 393, 511, 535, 537–539. See also Abolition, slavery; African Free Schools; Anglo-African Magazine; Colored Convention Movement; Douglass, Frederick; Downing, George; Fugitive Slave Act of 1850; Garnet, Henry Highland; Liberty Party; Smith, Gerrit; Williams, Peter, Jr.
- Southern free blacks, 540–541. See also Vesey, Denmark
- Stewart, Maria, 541–542. See also Abolition, slavery; Garrison, William Lloyd; the Liberator; Walker, David
- Still, William, 542–543. See also Abolition, slavery; Brown, John; Destination, Canada; Fugitive slaves; Tubman, Harriet; Underground Railroad
- Stowe, Harriet Beecher, 290, 373, 417, 436, 461, 501, 543–545, 544 (photo), 553–554, 559–560, 573. See also Abolition, slavery; Fugitive Slave Act of 1850; Lincoln, Abraham; Uncle Tom's Cabin
- Sumner, Charles, 416–417, 521, 545–546, 546 (photo), 699. See also Free Soil Party; Freedmen's Bureau; Johnson, Andrew; Kansas-Nebraska Act, 1854; Lincoln, Abraham; Radical Republicans; Republican Party; Stevens, Thaddeus
- Tappan, Arthur, 288, 289, 305, 326, 345, 397–398, 508, 511, 547, 580. See also American and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society; American Anti-Slavery Society; American Colonization Society; Crandall, Prudence; the Emancipator; Garrison, William Lloyd; Immediatism; Liberty Party; Tappan, Lewis; Underground Railroad
- Tappan, Lewis, 288, 289, 305, 326, 337, 345, 464, 508, 511, 543, 548, 572–573, 580. See also Abolition, slavery; American and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society; American Anti-Slavery Society; Amistad; Cinque, Joseph; the Emancipator; Garrison, William Lloyd; the Liberator; Tappan, Arthur; Underground Railroad
- Thirteenth Amendment (U.S. Constitution), 448, 539, 549–550, 581, 700, 719, 769, 959, 960, 1017. See also Abolition, slavery; Lincoln, Abraham; Radical Republicans
- Three-fifths compromise, 550–551. See also Fourteenth Amendment; Thirteenth Amendment
- Transportation (as punishment for slave resistance), 551–552. See also Slave resistance
- Truth, Sojourner, 305, 552–554, 553 (photo), 720. See also Abolition, slavery; Douglass, Frederick; Garrison, William Lloyd
- Tubman, Harriet, 331, 419, 543, 554–557, 555 (photo), 561–562, 805. See also Fugitive Slave Act of 1850; Fugitive slaves; Slave resistance; Underground Railroad
- Turner, Nat, 280, 288–289, 318, 332, 427, 463, 535, 557–559. See also Slave driver; Slave religion; Slave resistance
- Uncle Tom's Cabin* (Stowe), 163, 290, 373, 393, 417, 436, 461, 501, 543–545, 559–560, 573. See also Abolition, slavery; Compromise of 1850; Fugitive Slave Act of 1850; Lincoln, Abraham; Stowe, Harriet Beecher
- Underground Railroad, 260, 331, 373, 385, 390, 419, 423, 459, 508, 526, 536, 543, 554–556, 560–563, 561 (illustration). See also Abolition, slavery; Brown, John; Destination, Canada; Fugitive Slave Act of 1850; Fugitive slaves; Tubman, Harriet; Wills, Frank
- Union Army, 108, 271, 333, 336, 354, 369, 373, 374, 391, 405, 408, 429, 459, 466, 480, 497–498, 503, 563–564, 683–686, 756–757. See also Buffalo Soldiers; Confederate States of America; Confiscation Acts; Field Order No. 15; Fort Pillow Massacre; Lincoln, Abraham; Massachusetts 54th Regiment
- Urban slavery, 564–565. See also Gabriel (Prosser); Slave resistance
- Vesey, Denmark, 534, 565–568. See also Negro Seamen Acts; Pritchard, Gullah Jack; Slave resistance
- Walker, David, 280, 298, 426, 453, 535, 557, 569–572. See also Abolition, slavery; Du Bois, W.E.B.; Freedom's Journal; Prince Hall Masonry; Turner, Nat
- Ward, Samuel Ringgold, 572–573. See also Abolition, slavery; African Free Schools; American Anti-Slavery Society; Free Soil Party; Fugitive Slave Act of 1850; Fugitive slaves; Liberty Party; Smith, Gerrit; Tappan, Lewis
- Whipper, William, 309, 573–574. See also Abolition, slavery; American Moral Reform Society; Cornish, Samuel; Destination, Canada; Douglass, Frederick; Forten, James; Fugitive Slave Act of 1850; Garrison, William Lloyd; Purvis, Robert; Underground Railroad
- Wilberforce, William, 285, 378, 520, 574–576, 575 (illustration). See also Abolition, slave trade; Cugoana, Quobna Ottobah; Equiano, Olaudah
- Williams, Peter, Jr., 295, 296, 344, 356, 456, 537, 576–577. See also Abolition, slave trade; Abolition, slavery; American Anti-Slavery Society; Colored Convention Movement; Cuffe, Paul; Destination, Canada; Destination, Haiti; Williams, Peter, Sr.
- Williams, Peter, Sr., 311, 576, 578–579, 578 (illustration). See also Abolition, slavery; African Methodist Episcopal Church; American Revolution; Williams, Peter, Jr.
- Wright, Theodore S., 344, 345, 358, 426, 577, 579–580, 605. See also Abolition, slavery; American and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society; American Anti-Slavery Society; Cornish, Samuel; Garrison, William Lloyd; Tappan, Arthur; Tappan, Lewis

Political Activity, Migration, and Urbanization: Reconstruction, Civil Rights, and Modern African America

- Abernathy, Ralph David, 594, 851, 898, 966. See also Albany, Georgia, Movement; King, Martin Luther, Jr.; Montgomery Bus Boycott; Southern Christian Leadership Conference
- Abu Jamal, Mumia, 594–596, 595 (photo). See also Black Power; COINTELPRO
- Accommodationism, 596–597. See also Black Nadir; Cotton States Exposition; Jim Crow; Washington, Booker T.
- Affirmative action, 597–599. See also Fourteenth Amendment; Johnson, Lyndon Baines; Kennedy, John Fitzgerald
- African Blood Brotherhood (ABB), 599–600. See also Black Nationalism; Harlem Renaissance
- African imperialism, 600–601. See also Berlin Conference, 1884–1885; Fanon, Frantz; Pan-Africanism
- African National Congress (ANC), 601–603, 877, 879. See also Antipartheid movement; Mandela, Nelson; Pan-Africanism
- Afrocentricity, 187–188, 603–605, 619, 920. See also Asante, Molefi Kete; Karenga, Maulana; Kwanzaa; National Council for Black Studies
- Al-Amin, Jamil Abdullah (H. Rap Brown), 605–606, 606 (photo). See also Black Panther Party; Black Power; COINTELPRO; Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee
- Albany, Georgia, Movement, 606–607. See also Abernathy, Ralph David; King, Martin Luther, Jr.; National Association for the Advancement of Colored People; Southern Christian Leadership Conference; Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee
- Ali, Muhammad, 607–612, 805, 910–911, 919. See also Black athletes; Muhammad, Elijah; Nation of Islam; Till, Emmett; X, Malcolm
- Ali, Noble Drew, 612–613, 901–902. See also Black Nationalism; Moorish Science Temple
- Antipartheid movement, 613–616. See also Ashe, Arthur; Congressional Black Caucus; Jackson, Jesse; King, Coretta Scott; King, Martin Luther, Jr.; National Association for the Advancement of Colored People; Pan-Africanism; X, Malcolm
- Antilynching campaign, 616–618, 913–914. See also Du Bois, W.E.B.; Ku Klux Klan; National Association for the Advancement of Colored People; National Association of Colored Women; Terrell, Mary Church; Wells-Barnett, Ida; White, Walter
- ASALH (Association for the Study of African American Life and History), 621–622. See also Woodson, Carter Godwin
- Asante, Molefi Kete, 187–188, 603–604, 618–619. See also Afrocentricity; National Council for Black Studies
- Ashe, Arthur, 614, 619–620, 648. See also Antipartheid movement; Black athletes
- Association for the Study of African American Life and History (ASALH), 621–622
- Atlanta, Georgia, Riot of 1906, 622–624. See also Disfranchisement; Du Bois, W.E.B.; Jim Crow; White, Walter; White mob violence
- Baker, Ella, 625–626, 626 (photo), 634, 781, 912. See also Carmichael, Stokely; Southern Christian Leadership Conference; Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee
- Baldwin, James, 175, 278, 545, 626–627. See also Black Folk Culture; Wright, Richard
- Baraka, Amiri, 628–630, 629 (photo), 645, 736. See also Black Arts Movement; Black Nationalism; Black Power; Destination, Cuba; X, Malcolm
- Bass, Charlotta Amanda Spears, 630–633. See also The Birth of a Nation; Brotherhood of Sleeping Car Porters; Cold War and civil rights; Garvey, Marcus; Ku Klux Klan; National Association for the Advancement of Colored People; Republican Party; Universal Negro Improvement Association; White supremacy
- Bates, Daisy, 633–634, 634 (photo), 862. See also Brown v. Board of Education; Little Rock Nine; National Association for the Advancement of Colored People
- Belafonte, Harry, 615, 635–636, 963. See also Black Folk Culture; King, Martin Luther, Jr.; Robeson, Paul; Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee
- Bensonhurst, New York, Incident of 1989, 636–637. See also Sharpton, Al; White mob violence; White supremacy
- Berlin Conference (1884–1885), 638–640. See also African imperialism
- BET (Black Entertainment Television), 640–641. See also Ebony magazine; Jet magazine
- Biko, Steve, 643–644, 644 (photo). See also Antipartheid movement
- The Birth of a Nation* (Griffith), 164, 854, 889, 915, 1050–1051. See also Ku Klux Klan; Lynching; White supremacy
- Black Arts Movement (BAM), 122, 645. See also Baraka, Amiri; Black Power
- Black athletes, 646–649. See also Aaron, Hank; Ali, Muhammad; Ashe, Arthur; Brown, Jim; Chamberlain, Wilt; Frazier, Joe; 1936 Summer Olympics, Berlin; 1968 Summer Olympics, Mexico City; Owens, Jesse; Paige, Leroy “Satchel”; Patterson, Floyd; Robeson, Paul; Robinson, Jackie; Simpson, Orenthal James (O.J.); Williams, Serena; Williams, Venus; Woods, Eldrick “Tiger”
- Black Cabinet, 649–651. See also Bethune, Mary McCloud; Bunche, Ralph; Roosevelt, Eleanor
- Black Codes, 651, 700, 719, 774, 787, 830, 986. See also Civil Rights Act of 1866; Fourteenth Amendment; Jim Crow; Johnson, Andrew; Radical Republicans; White supremacy
- Black conservatives, 652–654. See also Thomas, Clarence; Washington, Booker T.
- Black Nadir, 654–655. See also Disfranchisement; Du Bois, W.E.B.; Jim Crow; Lynching; Plessy v. Ferguson; Sharecropping; Washington, Booker T.
- Black Nationalism, 345, 368, 373–374, 426, 571, 614, 655–668. See also Black Panther Party; Black Power; Cuffe, Paul; Delany, Martin R.; Five Percenters; Garvey, Marcus; Muhammad, Elijah; Nation of Islam; A Negro Nation Within the Nation; Organization of African Unity; Universal Negro Improvement Association; X, Malcolm
- Black Panther Party (BPP), 255, 591, 595, 600, 605, 656, 658–662, 659

- (photo), 666, 678, 689, 706, 707, 731, 794, 805, 837, 870, 930–931, 941, 970, 992, 1008–1009, 1014, 1015–1016, 1030, 1077. See also Black Nationalism; Black Power; BPP, Chicago Branch; BPP, Los Angeles Branch; BPP, New York Branch; BPP, Oakland Branch; Brown, Elaine; Cleaver, Eldridge; COINTELPRO; Fanon, Frantz; Lowndes County Freedom Organization; Newton, Huey P.; Seale, Bobby; Shabazz, Betty X; Williams, Robert F.; X, Malcolm growth to national status, 660–661 repression and decline of, 661
- Black Power, 134, 222, 262, 591, 599, 662–664, 837, 920, 964, 991, 1004. See also Black Panther Party; COINTELPRO; Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee; US Organization
- Black Radical Congress (BRC), 664–665. See also Baraka, Amiri; Black Nationalism; Davis, Angela; Sanchez, Sonia
- Black self-defense, 665–667. See also Black Panther Party; Black Power; Deacons for Defense and Justice; Republic of New Afrika; Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee; US Organization; Williams, Robert F.; X, Malcolm
- Black Star Line, 667–668, 782–783. See also Black Nationalism; Garvey, Marcus; Universal Negro Improvement Association
- Bloody Sunday, 668–669, 861, 1012–1013. See also Abernathy, Ralph David; Jim Crow; King, Martin Luther, Jr.; Lewis, John; Southern Christian Leadership Conference; Selma March; Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee; Voting Rights Act of 1965; Williams, Hosea
- Bombingham, 669–671, 1019–1020. See also Civil Rights Act of 1964; Jim Crow; King, Martin Luther, Jr.; Shuttlesworth, Fred; Sixteenth Street Baptist Church
- BPP, Chicago Branch, 671–672, 794–795. See also Black Panther Party; COINTELPRO; Hampton, Fred
- BPP, Los Angeles Branch, 672–674, 970–971. See also Black Panther Party; Brown, Elaine; Cleaver, Eldridge; Pratt, Geronimo Ji Jaga; US Organization
- BPP, New York Branch, 674–675. See also Black Panther Party; Shakur, Assata
- BPP, Oakland Branch, 675–676, 707. See also Black Panther Party; Brown, Elaine; Cleaver, Eldridge; COINTELPRO; Karenga, Maulana; Newton, Huey P.; Seale, Bobby; US Organization
- Brotherhood of Sleeping Car Porters, 632, 677–678, 881, 977. See also Great Migration; Randolph, A. Philip
- Brown, Elaine, 673, 676, 678–679. See also Black Panther Party; BPP, Los Angeles Branch; COINTELPRO; Newton, Huey P.; US Organization
- Brown, Ron, 679–680. See also Clinton, William Jefferson; Jackson, Jesse
- Brown v. Board of Education*, 300, 680–682, 681 (photo), 687, 712, 723, 761, 775, 776, 808, 812, 819–820, 829, 832, 838–839, 855, 862, 885, 899, 959, 961, 1020, 1054, 1096–1097. See also Busing; Fourteenth Amendment; Houston, Charles Hamilton; Little Rock Nine; Marshall, Thurgood; National Association for the Advancement of Colored People; Plessy v. Ferguson
- Bruce, Blanche K., 682–683, 683 (photo), 983. See also Radical Republicans; Reconstruction Era black politicians; Republican Party
- Buffalo Soldiers, 683–686, 684 (photo). See also Jim Crow; Union Army
- Bunche, Ralph, 613, 686–687. See also Black Cabinet; Vietnam War (black participation in)
- Busing, 687–688. See also Brown v. Board of Education
- Carmichael, Stokely, 187, 258, 593, 605, 628, 656, 688–690, 689 (photo), 779, 850, 906, 936, 1012, 1042. See also Black Nationalism; Black Panther Party; Black Power; CORE; King, Martin Luther, Jr.; Lowndes County Freedom Organization; MFDP; Mississippi Freedom Summer, 1964; Nkrumah, Kwame; Pan-Africanism; Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee
- Castro, Fidel, 658, 675, 690–691, 717–718, 736–737, 805, 823–824. See also Destination, Cuba; Williams, Robert F.; X, Malcolm
- Chicago Defender*, 692–694, 714, 733–734, 746. See also Destination, Chicago, Illinois; Great Migration; National Association for the Advancement of Colored People; White, Walter
- Chicago race riot of 1919, 694–696, 695 (photo). See also Destination, Chicago, Illinois; Great Migration; “If We Must Die”; Jim Crow; Red Summer Race Riots; White mob violence
- Civil Rights Act of 1866, 651, 698–699, 774, 975. See also Black Codes; Disfranchisement; Dred Scott v. Sandford; Fourteenth Amendment; Jim Crow; Johnson, Andrew; Ku Klux Klan; Radical Republicans; Thirteenth Amendment
- Civil Rights Act of 1875, 699–700, 975. See also Disfranchisement; Fourteenth Amendment; Jim Crow
- Civil Rights Act of 1957, 700, 839, 1021. See also Disfranchisement; Fourteenth Amendment; Jim Crow; Johnson, Lyndon Baines
- Civil Rights Act of 1960, 700–701. See also Civil Rights Act of 1875; Disfranchisement; Fourteenth Amendment; Jim Crow; Voting Rights Act of 1965
- Civil Rights Act of 1964, 701, 701–702, 775, 835, 855, 862, 884, 970, 1019. See also Affirmative action; Brown v. Board of Education; Civil Rights Act of 1968; Disfranchisement; Fourteenth Amendment; Jim Crow; Johnson, Lyndon Baines; Kennedy, John Fitzgerald; March on Washington Movement, 1963; Voting Rights Act of 1965
- Civil Rights Act of 1968, 702–704, 703, 836, 1008. See also Civil Rights Act of 1964; Disfranchisement; Fourteenth Amendment; Jim Crow; Johnson, Lyndon Baines; Kennedy, John Fitzgerald; King, Martin Luther, Jr.; National Association for the Advancement of Colored People
- Clark, Septima, 704–705. See also Baker, Ella; Du Bois, W.E.B.; National Association for the Advancement of Colored People; Parks, Rosa; Southern Christian Leadership Conference
- Cleaver, Eldridge, 661, 672–673, 706–707, 706 (photo), 707, 710, 736, 1014. See also Black Panther Party; Cleaver, Kathleen Neal; Newton, Huey P.; Seale, Bobby
- Cleaver, Kathleen Neal, 707–708. See also Abu Jamal, Mumia; Black Nationalism; Black Panther Party; Black Power; BPP, Chicago Branch; BPP, Los Angeles Branch; BPP, New York Branch; BPP, Oakland Branch; Cleaver, Eldridge; Newton,

- Huey P.; Pratt, Geronimo Ji Jaga; Shakur, Assata
- COINTELPRO, 605, 657, 661, 671, 676, 678, 709–710, 794–795, 838, 931–932, 971–972, 990, 992, 1015, 1044, 1077. See also Black Panther Party; Black Power; Carmichael, Stokely; Hoover, J. Edgar; King, Martin Luther, Jr.; Muhammad, Elijah; Southern Christian Leadership Conference; Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee; US Organization; X, Malcolm
- Cold War and civil rights, 711–713. See also Brown v. Board of Education; Bunche, Ralph; Du Bois, W.E.B.; King, Martin Luther, Jr.; Little Rock Nine; National Association for the Advancement of Colored People; Robeson, Paul; White, Walter; Wright, Richard
- Coleman, Bessie, 713–715, 714 (photo). See also Chicago Defender; Destination, Chicago, Illinois; Great Migration; Wells-Barnett, Ida
- Colored Farmers Alliance, 715, 966. See also Black Nationalism; Jim Crow; Populist Party; Sharecroppers Union
- Compromise of 1877, 716–717. See also Black Nadir; Confederate States of America; Hayes, Rutherford B.; Republican Party; Union Army; White supremacy
- Congressional Black Caucus, 717–718, 718 (photo). See also Antipartheid movement; Castro, Fidel; Chisholm, Shirley; Million Man March; Norton, Eleanor Holmes; Obama, Barack
- Congressional Reconstruction, 334, 718–719. See also Black Codes; Compromise of 1877; Fourteenth Amendment; Johnson, Lyndon Baines; Lincoln, Abraham; Radical Republicans; Reconstruction Era black politicians; Thirteenth Amendment
- Cooper, Anna Julia, 363, 719–721, 1046. See also Du Bois, W.E.B.; National Association of Colored Women; Terrell, Mary Church; Truth, Sojourner; Tuskegee Institute; Washington, Booker T.
- CORE (Congress of Racial Equality), 585, 666, 668, 688, 705, 722–725, 732, 778–779, 810, 822, 840, 848, 857, 882, 894, 938, 1002–1003, 1032 (photo), 1038, 1040. See also Black Conservatives; Black Nationalism; Black Power; Brown v. Board of Education; Freedom Rides; Jim Crow; March on Washington Movement, 1941; March on Washington Movement, 1963; National Association for the Advancement of Colored People; Southern Christian Leadership Conference
- Cosby, Bill, 725–726. See also BET; Black athletes; Historically Black Colleges and Universities; National Association for the Advancement of Colored People; Poitier, Sidney
- Cotton States Exposition, 596, 726–727, 745. See also Accommodationism; Du Bois, W.E.B.; Trotter, William Monroe; Washington, Booker T.
- Daddy Grace, 193, 728–729. See also Black churches; Evangelism
- Davis, Angela, 729–732, 730 (photo), 1030. See also Black Panther Party; Jackson, George; Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee; Soledad Brothers
- Deacons for Defense and Justice (DDI), 666, 732–733. See also Black Nationalism; Black Power; CORE; Ku Klux Klan
- Destination, Chicago, Illinois, 733–734. See also Chicago Race Riot of 1919; Great Migration; Red Summer Race Riots; Urbanization
- Destination, Cuba, 734–737, 1016. See also Baraka, Amiri; Black Nationalism; Black Panther Party; Castro, Fidel; Harlem Renaissance; Negritude; Shakur, Assata; Williams, Robert F.; X, Malcolm
- Destination, Detroit, Michigan, 737–738. See also Black Nadir; Detroit, Michigan, Riot of 1943; Great Migration; Muhammad, Elijah
- Destination, Harlem, New York, 738–739. See also Du Bois, W.E.B.; Garvey, Marcus; Great Migration; Harlem Renaissance; Urbanization
- Detroit, Michigan, Riot of 1943, 739–741. See also Destination, Detroit, Michigan; Great Migration
- Detroit, Michigan, Riot of 1967, 741–742. See also Johnson, Lyndon Baines; Kerner Commission Report; League of Revolutionary Black Workers; Long Hot Summer Riots, 1965–1967; Vietnam War (black participation in)
- Diallo, Amadou, 742–743. See also Racial profiling
- Disfranchisement, 743–745. See also Fifteenth Amendment; Grandfather Clause; Jim Crow; Literacy tests; Voting Rights Act of 1965; Washington, Booker T.; White primaries
- Double V campaign, 745–746. See also Anderson, Marian; Powell, Adam Clayton, Jr.; Randolph, A. Philip; Wilkins, Roy; World War II (black participation in)
- Du Bois, W.E.B., 145, 187, 194, 226, 232, 234, 364, 411, 486, 487, 545, 581, 582, 583, 592–593, 597, 599, 605, 613, 623, 645, 652, 663, 727, 738, 746–748, 747 (photo), 773, 805, 807, 853, 873, 874–875, 913–914, 913–915, 925–926, 929–930, 932–934, 935, 947–949, 952–953, 959, 962, 998, 1011, 1023, 1047–1048. See also African Diaspora; Double consciousness; National Association for the Advancement of Colored People; Niagara Movement; Pan-African Congress; Pan-Africanism
- East St. Louis, Illinois, Riot of 1917, 748–749. See also Great Migration; White mob violence
- Ebony* magazine, 244, 749–750, 827. See also BET; Jet magazine
- Elaine, Arkansas, Riot of 1919, 750–752. See also National Association for the Advancement of Colored People; Red Summer Race Riots; Wells-Barnett, Ida; White mob violence
- The Elevator* (Bell), 1051–1052. See also Abolition, slavery; Bell, Philip A.; Colored Convention Movement; Republican Party
- Ellison, Ralph, 752–754, 753 (photo). See also Wright, Richard
- Emancipation Proclamation, 353, 363–364, 369, 391, 426, 460, 467, 478, 754–758, 756 (photo). See also Abolition, slavery; Douglass, Frederick; Lincoln, Abraham; Thirteenth Amendment
- Ethiopian Peace Movement, 759–760. See also African Diaspora; Black Nationalism; National Association for the Advancement of Colored People; Pan-Africanism; Selassie, Haile
- Evers, Medgar, 760–761. See also Ku Klux Klan; National Association for the Advancement of Colored People; World War II (black participation in)

- Exoduster movement, 762–764. See also Nicodemus, Kansas; Singleton, Benjamin “Pap”; Wells-Barnett, Ida
- Father Divine, 193, 767–768. See also Destination, Harlem, New York; Evangelism
- Fifteenth Amendment (U.S. Constitution), 456, 581, 668, 700, 768–770, 769, 854, 915, 959, 1047. See also Disfranchisement; Radical Republicans; Voting Rights Act of 1965
- Five Percenters, 770–772. See also Black Nationalism; Nation of Islam
- Fortune, T. Thomas, 772–773. See also Du Bois, W.E.B.; Garvey, Marcus; Universal Negro Improvement Association; Washington, Booker T.; Wells-Barnett, Ida
- Forty acres and a mule, 773–774. See also Field Order No. 15
- Fourteenth Amendment (U.S. Constitution), 581, 598, 651, 655, 681–682, 700, 716, 774–775, 854, 915, 959, 960. See also Civil Rights Act of 1866; Dred Scott v. Sandford; Plessy v. Ferguson; Radical Republicans
- Franklin, John Hope, 776. See also Association for the Study of African American Life and History; Tulsa, Oklahoma, Riot of 1921
- Freedmen’s Bureau, 777–778. See also Historically Black Colleges and Universities; Johnson, Andrew; Joint Committee of Fifteen; Radical Republicans
- Freedom Rides, 594, 724, 778–780, 834, 857, 861, 883, 913, 1038. See also CORE; Lewis, John; Nash, Diane; Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee
- Freedom Schools, 780–781. See also Mississippi Freedom Summer, 1964; Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee
- Garvey, Marcus, 193, 257, 308, 593, 604, 605, 608, 612–613, 619, 631, 656–658, 666, 696, 773, 781–785, 783 (photo), 837, 875, 900–901, 902, 909, 935, 948, 953, 1010. See also Black Star Line; Pan-Africanism; Universal Negro Improvement Association
- Georgia Educational Association, 785–786. See also Black Nationalism; Freedmen’s Bureau; Port Royal Experiment; Reconstruction Era black politicians
- Grandfather Clause, 786–787. See also Black Codes; Disfranchisement; Fifteenth Amendment; Jim Crow
- Great Migration, 54, 677, 693, 733, 762, 787–790, 900, 926, 983, 1017. See also Black Nadir; Destination, Chicago, Illinois; Destination, Detroit, Michigan; Destination, Harlem, New York; Harlem Renaissance; Urbanization
- Griggs, Sutton, 790–791, 1011. See also Accommodationism; Black Nationalism; Jim Crow; A Negro Nation Within the Nation; Self-segregation
- Haley, Alex, 48, 791–792. See also Atlantic slave trade; Senegambia; X, Malcolm
- Hamer, Fannie Lou, 792–794, 793 (photo), 896, 1042. See also Johnson, Lyndon Baines; MFDP; Poor People’s Campaign; Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee
- Hampton, Fred, 671–672, 794–795. See also Black Panther Party; BPP, Chicago Branch; COINTELPRO; Hoover, J. Edgar
- Harlem Renaissance, 122, 171, 209, 216, 226, 232, 234, 630, 646, 738–739, 790, 795–799, 816, 925–927, 984. See also Baraka, Amiri; Du Bois, W.E.B.; Father Divine; Garvey, Marcus; Hughes, Langston; Hurston, Zora Neale; Locke, Alain LeRoy; New Negro Movement
- Hayes, Rutherford B., 716–717, 719, 762, 799–800. See also Black Nadir; Compromise of 1877; Republican Party; White supremacy
- Hill, Anita, 800–801. See also Thomas, Clarence
- Hip-hop, 801–806. See also Black Folk Culture; Shakur, Tupac “2Pac” Amaru; Urbanization
- Historically Black Colleges and Universities, 806–809. See also Freedmen’s Bureau
- Hoover, J. Edgar, 657, 661, 671, 794, 809–810, 992, 1008. See also Black Panther Party; COINTELPRO; Garvey, Marcus; King, Martin Luther, Jr.; National Association for the Advancement of Colored People
- Houston, Charles Hamilton, 810–813, 811 (photo). See also Brown v. Board of Education; Jim Crow; Marshall, Thurgood; National Association for the Advancement of Colored People; Plessy v. Ferguson
- Houston, Texas Mutiny, 1917, 813–814. See also Jim Crow; National Association for the Advancement of Colored People; World War I (black participation in)
- Hughes, Langston, 171, 217, 234, 630, 645, 739, 797–798, 816–820, 817 (photo), 925. See also Harlem Renaissance; Hurston, Zora Neale; Locke, Alain LeRoy; National Association for the Advancement of Colored People; New Negro Movement
- “If We Must Die” (McKay), 820–821. See also Black self-defense; Chicago Race Riot of 1919; Harlem Renaissance; McKay, Claude; Red Summer Race Riots
- Jackson, Jesse, 615, 821–824, 823 (photo), 893, 942–943, 969, 1018. See also Abernathy, Ralph David; CORE; Farrakhan, Louis; King, Martin Luther, Jr.; Obama, Barack; Operation PUSH; Southern Christian Leadership Conference
- Jackson, Maynard, 824–827
- Jet* magazine, 827–828. See also Ebony magazine; King, Martin Luther, Jr.; Montgomery Bus Boycott; Till, Emmett
- Jim Crow, 32, 150, 151, 159–162, 194, 224, 252, 592, 614, 624, 655, 668, 701, 715, 719, 722, 727, 732, 745, 787, 789, 825, 828–829, 917, 933, 935, 962, 978, 987, 1002, 1005, 1040. See also Black Nadir; Brown v. Board of Education; Civil Rights Act of 1964; Montgomery Bus Boycott; Plessy v. Ferguson
- Johnson, Andrew, 355, 460, 546, 651, 698–699, 719, 774, 777, 829–831, 975. See also Black Codes; Freedmen’s Bureau; Joint Committee of Fifteen; Lincoln, Abraham; Radical Republicans
- Johnson, Lyndon Baines, 598, 605, 669, 700, 701, 703 (photo), 711, 829, 831–836, 832 (photo), 837, 840, 845 (photo), 892, 964, 968, 978, 1013, 1081–1083, 1082 (photo). See also Civil Rights Act of 1964; Civil Rights Act of 1968; Hoover, J. Edgar; Kennedy, John Fitzgerald; Kerner Commission Report; King, Martin Luther, Jr.; Voting Rights Act of 1965; War on poverty

- Joint Committee of Fifteen, 836–837. See also Civil Rights Act of 1866; Douglass, Frederick; Fifteenth Amendment; Fourteenth Amendment; Freedmen's Bureau; Radical Republicans
- Karenga, Maulana, 222, 604, 619, 837–838, 920, 1076–1077. See also Afrocentricity; Asante, Molefi Kete; Black Power; Kwanzaa; National Council for Black Studies; US Organization
- Kennedy, John Fitzgerald, 136, 597–598, 680, 703, 833–834, 838–841, 857, 911. See also Castro, Fidel; Civil Rights Act of 1964; Hoover, J. Edgar; Johnson, Lyndon Baines; King, Martin Luther, Jr.; March on Washington Movement, 1963; Marshall, Thurgood; Voting Rights Act of 1965
- Kennedy, Robert F., 616, 780, 841–842, 848–849, 913, 966. See also Civil Rights Act of 1964; Freedom Rides; Hoover, J. Edgar; Kennedy, John Fitzgerald; King, Coretta Scott; King, Martin Luther, Jr.; Los Angeles, California, Riot of 1965; Meredith, James
- Kenyatta, Jomo, 842–844, 844 (photo). See also African imperialism; Du Bois, W.E.B.; Nkrumah, Kwame; Pan-Africanism
- Kerner Commission Report, 844–845, 964. See also Johnson, Lyndon Baines; Long Hot Summer Riots, 1965–1967; Urban ghetto; War on poverty
- King, Coretta Scott, 615–616, 846–847. See also Antipartheid movement; King, Martin Luther, Jr.; Southern Christian Leadership Conference
- King, Martin Luther, Jr., 146, 175, 224, 272, 300, 515, 594, 604, 607, 614, 634, 635, 644, 666, 669, 687, 703–704, 706, 713, 723, 794, 805, 832–833, 832 (photo), 840, 846, 847–851, 879, 882, 890–891, 893, 942, 964, 978, 998, 1003–1004, 1012–1014, 1020, 1031–1033, 1040. See also Abernathy, Ralph David; Affirmative action; Baker, Ella; Bombingham; Civil Rights movement; COINTELPRO; King, Coretta Scott; March on Washington Movement, 1963; Montgomery Bus Boycott; Poor People's Campaign; Southern Christian Leadership Conference; Selma March
- Korean War (black participation in), 851–853. See also Cold War and civil rights; Du Bois, W.E.B.; Jim Crow; Robeson, Paul
- Ku Klux Klan, 271, 353, 406, 498–499, 514, 529, 599, 618, 631, 665, 729, 779, 789, 853–856, 872, 874, 884, 970, 975, 983, 989, 1050–1051. See also The Birth of a Nation; Fifteenth Amendment; Fourteenth Amendment; Lynching; White Citizens' Council; White mob violence; White supremacy
- Lawson, James, 856–858. See also CORE; Freedom Rides; King, Martin Luther, Jr.; Lewis, John; Nash, Diane; Southern Christian Leadership Conference; Sit-In movement; Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee
- LCFO (Lowndes County Freedom Organization), 663–664, 689, 870–871. See also Black Panther Party; Black Power; Carmichael, Stokely; MFDP; Mississippi Freedom Summer Project, 1964; Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee
- League of Revolutionary Black Workers, 858–859. See also Detroit, Michigan, Riot of 1967
- Lee, Spike, 164–165, 272, 859–860, 860 (photo). See also The Birth of a Nation; Bombingham; Million Man March; X, Malcolm
- Lewis, John, 669, 860–862, 893, 1012. See also Black Power; Bloody Sunday; Freedom Rides; Lawson, James; March on Washington Movement, 1963; Mississippi Freedom Summer Project, 1964; Selma March; Sit-In movement; Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee
- Little Rock Nine, 634, 862–863. See also Bates, Daisy; Brown v. Board of Education; National Association for the Advancement of Colored People
- Long Hot Summer Riots, 1965–1967, 863–864. See also Detroit, Michigan, Riot of 1967; Johnson, Lyndon Baines; Kerner Commission Report; Los Angeles, California, Riot of 1965
- Los Angeles, California, Riot of 1965, 865–867. See also Johnson, Lyndon Baines; Kerner Commission Report; Long Hot Summer Riots, 1965–1967; Urban ghetto; Urbanization
- Los Angeles, California, Riot of 1992, 867–869. See also Los Angeles, California, Riot of 1965; Urban ghetto; Urbanization
- Louima, Abner, 869–870. See also Sharpton, Al
- Lynching, 871–874, 1034. See also Antilynching campaign; Ku Klux Klan; National Association for the Advancement of Colored People; Wells-Barnett, Ida; White mob violence
- Manchester Conference, 1945, 874–876, 954. See also African imperialism; Du Bois, W.E.B.; Garvey, Marcus; Gold Coast; Kenyatta, Jomo; Nkrumah, Kwame; Organization of African Unity; Pan-African Congress; Pan-Africanism
- Mandela, Nelson, 47, 601–602, 613, 877–880. See also African imperialism; African National Congress; Anti-apartheid movement; Biko, Steve; Castro, Fidel
- March on Washington Movement, 1941, 880–882. See also Brotherhood of Sleeping Car Porters; March on Washington Movement, 1963; National Association for the Advancement of Colored People; Randolph, A. Philip; Roosevelt, Eleanor; White, Walter
- March on Washington Movement, 1963, 882–885. See also Abernathy, Ralph David; Anderson, Marian; Bates, Daisy; Civil Rights Act of 1964; Kennedy, John Fitzgerald; King, Martin Luther, Jr.; Lewis, John; March on Washington Movement, 1941; National Association for the Advancement of Colored People; Rustin, Bayard; Southern Christian Leadership Conference; Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee; X, Malcolm
- Marshall, Thurgood, 681–682, 703 (photo), 801, 811, 840, 885–886, 886 (photo), 1054. See also Brown v. Board of Education; Houston, Charles Hamilton; Johnson, Lyndon Baines; National Association for the Advancement of Colored People; Thomas, Clarence
- Matthews, Victoria Earle, 886–887. See also Antilynching campaign; National Association of Colored Women; Wells-Barnett, Ida
- McKay, Claude, 234, 820–821, 888, 925. See also Chicago Race Riot of 1919;

- Harlem Renaissance; "If We Must Die"; New Negro Movement; Red Summer Race Riots
- Media stereotypes, 889–890. See also BET; The Birth of a Nation; Jim Crow
- Meredith, James, 890–891, 891 (photo). See also Black conservatives; Kennedy, John Fitzgerald; Republican Party; White mob violence
- MFDP (Mississippi Freedom Democratic Party), 625–626, 656, 724, 793, 861, 870–871, 891–893, 895–896, 906, 939, 1040–1041. See also Baker, Ella; Disfranchisement; Hamer, Fannie Lou; Johnson, Lyndon Baines; Lowndes County Freedom Organization; Literacy tests; Mississippi Freedom Summer, 1964; Moses, Robert; Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee; Voting Rights Act of 1965
- Million Man March, 605, 657, 717, 767, 893–894, 901, 919, 1015. See also Clinton, William Jefferson; Farrakhan, Louis; March on Washington Movement, 1963; Nation of Islam
- Mississippi Freedom Summer Project (1964), 780–781, 894–897, 906. See also Carmichael, Stokely; CORE; Freedom Schools; Hamer, Fannie Lou; MFDP; Moses, Robert; National Association for the Advancement of Colored People; Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee; Voting Rights Act of 1965
- Montgomery Bus Boycott, 678, 897–900, 955–957, 996–997. See also Brown v. Board of Education; Jim Crow; King, Coretta Scott; King, Martin Luther, Jr.; Parks, Rosa; Rustin, Bayard; White Citizens' Councils
- Moore, Queen Mother Audley, 900–901. See also Black Nationalism; Garvey, Marcus; Million Man March; Universal Negro Improvement Association
- Moorish Science Temple, 901–902, 909, 918. See also Ali, Noble Drew; Black Nationalism; Garvey, Marcus; Great Migration; Universal Negro Improvement Association
- Morrison, Toni, 189, 902–904, 903 (photo). See also Davis, Angela; Ebo Landing; Haley, Alex; Transmigration
- Moses, Robert, 904–907. See also Carmichael, Stokely; MFDP; Mississippi Freedom Summer, 1964; National Association for the Advancement of Colored People; Rustin, Bayard; Southern Christian Leadership Conference; Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee
- MOVE bombing, 595, 907–908. See also Black Power
- Muhammad, Elijah, 258, 593, 604, 609, 767, 770, 908–911, 909 (photo), 918. See also Ali, Muhammad; Black Nationalism; Destination, Detroit, Michigan; Farrakhan, Louis; Nation of Islam; X, Malcolm
- NAACP (National Association for the Advancement of Colored People), 155, 187, 209, 224–225, 274, 507, 584, 592, 599, 617, 617 (photo), 623, 625–626, 631, 633–634, 666, 668, 681, 691, 696–697, 703, 713, 722, 739, 748, 751, 760, 761, 794, 810, 812, 814, 820, 840, 847, 862, 873, 875, 882, 894, 905, 913–916, 930, 955, 974, 984, 995, 1002, 1011, 1019–1020, 1040, 1054. See also Antipartheid movement; Antilynching campaign; Du Bois, W.E.B.; Houston, Charles Hamilton; Jim Crow; Marshall, Thurgood; Niagara Movement; Springfield Race Riot of 1908; Terrell, Mary Church; Wells-Barnett, Ida; White, Walter; Wilkins, Roy
- NACW (National Association of Colored Women), 557, 642, 916–917, 921. See also Antilynching campaign; Bethune, Mary McCloud; Pan-Africanism; Terrell, Mary Church; Tubman, Harriet; Universal Negro Improvement Association; Wells-Barnett, Ida
- Nash, Diane, 911–913. See also Baker, Ella; Freedom Rides; Lawson, James; Lewis, John; Southern Christian Leadership Conference; Sit-In movement; Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee
- Nation of Islam, 605, 609, 612–613, 656, 710, 766–767, 770–771, 802, 823, 884, 908–910, 918–919, 919, 945. See also Ali, Muhammad; Black Nationalism; Farrakhan, Louis; Million Man March; Muhammad, Elijah; X, Malcolm
- National Council for Black Studies, 920–921. See also Afrocentricity; Asante, Molefi Kete
- National Council of Negro Women (NCNW), 642, 921–922. See also Bethune, Mary McCloud; Black Cabinet; National Association of Colored Women; Roosevelt, Eleanor; Terrell, Mary Church
- Negro League Baseball, 923–924. See also Black athletes; Jim Crow; Robinson, Jackie
- A Negro Nation Within the Nation, 592–593, 1012. See also Black Nationalism; Black Power; Du Bois, W.E.B.; National Association for the Advancement of Colored People; Self-segregation
- Negro Seamen Acts, 568, 924–925. See also Vesey, Denmark
- New Negro Movement, 234, 925–927, 984. See also Du Bois, W.E.B.; Harlem Renaissance; Hughes, Langston; Locke, Alain LeRoy; McKay, Claude; Negritude
- New Orleans Riot of 1900, 927–928. See also Jim Crow; Lynching; Turner, Henry McNeil; Wells-Barnett, Ida; White mob violence
- New York Silent March of 1917, 928–930, 929 (photo)
- Newton, Huey P., 245, 593, 656, 660, 661–662, 675–676, 678, 706, 707, 710, 930–932, 1008 (photo), 1012, 1030. See also Black Panther Party; Black Power; Brown, Elaine; Cleaver, Eldridge; COINTELPRO; Seale, Bobby
- Niagara Movement, 913, 932–934. See also Du Bois, W.E.B.; Jim Crow; National Association for the Advancement of Colored People; Springfield Race Riot of 1908; Trotter, William Monroe
- Nicodemus, Kansas, 934. See also Black Nationalism; Exoduster movement; Singleton, Benjamin "Pap"
- 1936 Summer Olympics, Berlin, 588–590. See also Black athletes; Owens, Jesse
- 1968 Summer Olympics, Mexico City, 591–592, 614. See also Black athletes; Black Power
- Nkrumah, Kwame, 658, 876, 935–938, 936 (photo), 950, 1003. See also African imperialism; Du Bois, W.E.B.; Garvey, Marcus; Manchester Conference, 1945; Pan-African Congress; Pan-Africanism
- Norton, Eleanor Holmes, 718, 938–940, 939 (photo)
- Obama, Barack, 515, 708, 824, 940–942, 941 (photo), 970. See also Clinton, William Jefferson; Congressional Black Caucus

- Operation PUSH, 822, 942–943. See also Abernathy, Ralph David; Jackson, Jesse; Southern Christian Leadership Conference
- Organization of African Unity (OAU), 615, 656, 901, 936, 943–944, 954–955, 992, 1010, 1076–1077. See also African imperialism; African National Congress; Antipartheid movement; Nkrumah, Kwame; Pan-Africanism
- Organization of Afro-American Unity (OAAU), 944–945, 992. See also Black Nationalism; Organization of African Unity; Pan-Africanism; X, Malcolm
- Owens, Jesse, 589, 590, 592, 805, 945–947, 946 (photo). See also Black athletes; 1936 Summer Olympics, Berlin
- Pan-African Congress (PAC), 602, 874, 878, 935, 947–951. See also African imperialism; Du Bois, W.E.B.; Garvey, Marcus; Kenyatta, Jomo; Manchester Conference, 1945; Nkrumah, Kwame; Pan-Africanism
- Pan-Africanism, 129, 187, 376, 443, 567, 568, 690, 875, 901, 935, 951–954, 998. See also Du Bois, W.E.B.; Garvey, Marcus; Manchester Conference, 1945; Nkrumah, Kwame; Organization of African Unity; Pan-African Congress
- Parks, Rosa, 847, 893, 898–900, 913, 955–957, 956 (photo), 996–997. See also King, Coretta Scott; King, Martin Luther, Jr.; Montgomery Bus Boycott; Robinson, Jo Ann
- Plan de San Diego, 957–958. See also Lynching; Mexican War; Texas Revolution; White mob violence
- Plessy v. Ferguson*, 549, 582, 624, 655, 668, 680–682, 775, 789, 828, 885, 959–962. See also Brown v. Board of Education; Fourteenth Amendment; Jim Crow
- Poitier, Sidney, 880, 963–964. See also Beaufonte, Harry; Cosby, Bill; King, Martin Luther, Jr.; Marshall, Thurgood; National Association for the Advancement of Colored People; Pryor, Richard
- Poor People's Campaign, 794, 810, 851, 964–966, 965 (photo). See also Abernathy, Ralph David; Jackson, Jesse; Johnson, Lyndon Baines; King, Martin Luther, Jr.; Southern Christian Leadership Conference; War on poverty
- Populist Party, 966–967. See also Colored Farmers Alliance
- Powell, Adam Clayton, Jr., 967–969, 968 (photo)
- Powell, Colin, 969–970. See also Clinton, William Jefferson; Congressional Black Caucus; Obama, Barack
- Pratt, Geronimo Ji Jaga, 673, 970–972, 971 (photo). See also Abu Jamal, Mumia; Black Panther Party; BPP, Los Angeles Branch; Cleaver, Kathleen Neal; COINTELPRO
- Racial profiling, 972–974. See also Fourteenth Amendment
- Radical Republicans, 546, 581, 655, 716, 830, 974–976. See also Civil Rights Act of 1866; Civil Rights Act of 1875; Fifteenth Amendment; Fourteenth Amendment; Hayes, Rutherford B.; Johnson, Andrew; Joint Committee of Fifteen; Lincoln, Abraham; Reconstruction Era Black Politicians; Republican Party; Stevens, Thaddeus; Sumner, Charles
- Randolph, A. Philip, 880–882, 976–979, 1002–1003. See also Brotherhood of Sleeping Car Porters; Jim Crow; March on Washington Movement, 1963
- Ray, James Earl, 979. See also King, Martin Luther, Jr.; Southern Christian Leadership Conference
- Reagon, Bernice Johnson, 980–981. See also Albany, Georgia, Movement; National Association for the Advancement of Colored People; Poor People's Campaign; Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee
- Reconstruction Era black politicians, 981–983, 982 (illustration). See also Bruce, Blanche K.; Disfranchisement; Fifteenth Amendment; Ku Klux Klan; Republican Party; Revels, Hiram; White supremacy
- Red Summer race riots, 789, 983–984. See also Chicago Race Riot of 1919; Elaine, Arkansas, Riot of 1919; Great Migration; "If We Must Die"; Jim Crow; Lynching; McKay, Claude; National Association for the Advancement of Colored People; New Negro Movement; White mob violence
- Redlining, 985–986. See also Urban ghetto; Urbanization
- Reparations, 986–988. See also Field Order No. 15; Forty acres and a mule; Jim Crow; King, Martin Luther, Jr.; Muhammad, Elijah; Nation of Islam; Rosewood, Florida, Riot of 1923; Stevens, Thaddeus; Tulsa, Oklahoma, Race Riot of 1921; Tuskegee experiment; X, Malcolm
- Republic of New Afrika (RNA), 664, 989–990. See also Black Nationalism; Black Power; COINTELPRO; Shabazz, Betty X; Williams, Robert F.
- Revels, Hiram, 990–991, 991 (photo). See also African Methodist Episcopal Church; Lincoln, Abraham; Reconstruction Era black politicians; Southern free blacks; Union Army Revolutionary Action Movement (RAM), 991–992. See also Black Panther Party; COINTELPRO; Republic of New Afrika; Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee; Williams, Robert F.; X, Malcolm
- Robeson, Paul, 613, 853, 873, 993–995, 996. See also African imperialism; Black athletes; Black Folk Culture; Cold War and civil rights; Du Bois, W.E.B.; Harlem Renaissance; Robinson, Jackie
- Robinson, Jackie, 923–924, 995–996. See also Black athletes; Negro League Baseball; Robeson, Paul; World War II (black participation in)
- Robinson, Jo Ann, 996–997. See also Jim Crow; King, Martin Luther, Jr.; Montgomery Bus Boycott; Parks, Rosa
- Robinson, Ruby Doris Smith, 997–998. See also Black Power; Freedom Rides; Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee
- Rustin, Bayard, 625, 781, 883, 884, 904, 978, 1002–1004. See also CORE; King, Martin Luther, Jr.; March on Washington Movement, 1963; Montgomery Bus Boycott; Randolph, A. Philip; Southern Christian Leadership Conference; Scottsboro, Alabama case
- SCLC. See Southern Christian Leadership Conference
- Scottsboro, Alabama case, 1004–1007, 1005 (photo). See also Jim Crow; National Association for the Advancement of Colored People
- Seale, Bobby, 656, 659, 675, 707, 1007–1009, 1008 (photo). See also Black Panther Party; Civil Rights Act of

- 1968; Cleaver, Eldridge; COINTELPRO; Newton, Huey P.
- Selassie, Haile, 250, 759, 1009–1010.
See also African Diaspora; African imperialism; Ethiopian Peace Movement; Garvey, Marcus; Organization of African Unity; Pan-Africanism
- Self-segregation, 1011–1012. See also Black Nationalism; Black Power; Du Bois, W.E.B.; Garvey, Marcus; Griggs, Sutton; A Negro Nation Within the Nation
- Selma March, 1012–1014, 1013 (photo).
See also Bloody Sunday; Johnson, Lyndon Baines; King, Martin Luther, Jr.; Lewis, John; Southern Christian Leadership Conference; Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee; Voting Rights Act of 1965; Williams, Hosea
- Shabazz, Betty X, 659, 766, 989, 1014–1015. See also Black Nationalism; Muhammad, Elijah; Nation of Islam; X, Malcolm
- Shakur, Assata, 737, 1015–1016. See also Black Panther Party; COINTELPRO; Destination, Cuba
- Sharecroppers Union (SCU), 1016–1017.
See also Colored Farmers Alliance
- Sharecropping, 1017. See also Black Nadir; Forty acres and a mule; Sharecroppers Union; Thirteenth Amendment; Washington, Booker T.
- Sharpton, Al, 637, 641, 816 (photo), 870, 1018, 1019 (photo). See also Bensonhurst, New York, Incident of 1989; Brown, James; Diallo, Amadou; Howard Beach Incident, 1986; Jackson, Jesse
- Shuttlesworth, Fred, 1019–1021. See also Bombingham; Jim Crow; National Association for the Advancement of Colored People; Southern Christian Leadership Conference; Sixteenth Street Baptist Church
- Simpson, Orenthal James (O.J.), 647, 1022–1024. See also Black athletes
- Singleton, Benjamin “Pap,” 763–764, 1024–1025. See also Exoduster movement; Nicodemus, Kansas
- Sit-In movement, 1025–1026, 1027 (photo), 1038. See also Baker, Ella; Freedom Rides; Nash, Diane; Southern Christian Leadership Conference; Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee
- Sixteenth Street Baptist Church, 1027–1028, 1028 (photo). See also Black churches; Bombingham; King, Martin Luther, Jr.; Shuttlesworth, Fred
- SNCC. See Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee
- Soledad Brothers, 731, 1029–1031. See also Black Panther Party; Black Power; Davis, Angela; Newton, Huey P.
- Southern Christian Leadership Conference (SCLC), 193, 584, 594, 605, 607, 625–626, 669, 705, 710, 724–725, 810, 839, 840, 848–850, 905, 964–966, 969, 979, 1003, 1012–1014, 1020, 1026, 1031–1033, 1031–1033. See also Abernathy, Ralph David; Albany, Georgia Movement; King, Martin Luther, Jr.; March on Washington Movement, 1963; Montgomery Bus Boycott; Selma March; Shuttlesworth, Fred; Williams, Hosea
- Springfield race riot of 1908, 1033–1034.
See also Lynching; National Association for the Advancement of Colored People; White mob violence
- Stevens, Thaddeus, 581, 1034–1036, 1035 (photo). See also Civil Rights Act of 1866; Fourteenth Amendment; Johnson, Andrew; Lincoln, Abraham; Radical Republicans; Republican Party; Sumner, Charles; Thirteenth Amendment; Underground Railroad
- “Strange Fruit,” 1036–1037. See also Antilynching campaign; Black Folk Culture; Lynching; White mob violence
- Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee (SNCC), 584–586, 625–626, 656, 660, 663, 669, 689, 705, 707, 710, 724, 731, 779, 780–781, 793, 840, 848–850, 860–862, 870–871, 882, 891–893, 894–896, 905–906, 912–913, 938, 980, 997–998, 1012–1014, 1026, 1032 (photo), 1037–1042, 1043–1044. See also Baker, Ella; Black Power; Lowndes County Freedom Organization; Lewis, John; Nash, Diane; Robinson, Ruby Doris Smith; Sit-In movement
- Students for a Democratic Society (SDS), 585, 794, 810, 1043–1044. See also Black Panther Party; Black Power; COINTELPRO; Johnson, Lyndon Baines
- Suffrage movement, women’s, 1044–1047. See also Cary, Mary Ann
- Shadd; Cooper, Anna Julia; Douglass, Frederick; Fifteenth Amendment; Liberty Party; National Association of Colored Women; Smith, Gerrit; Terrell, Mary Church; Truth, Sojourner; Wells-Barnett, Ida
- Talented tenth, 1047–1048. See also Du Bois, W.E.B.; Historically Black Colleges and Universities; Locke, Alain LeRoy; Washington, Booker T.
- Terrell, Mary Church, 720, 805, 873, 915, 916–917, 1046, 1048–1050, 1049 (photo). See also Antilynching campaign; National Association for the Advancement of Colored People; National Association of Colored Women; Washington, Booker T.; Wells-Barnett, Ida
- Thomas, Clarence, 515, 654, 800–801, 1052–1054, 1053 (photo)
- Till, Emmett, 827, 832, 1054–1055, 1055 (photo). See also Jet magazine; Lynching; White supremacy
- “To Secure these Rights,” 1055–1057.
See also Cold War and civil rights; National Association for the Advancement of Colored People; White, Walter
- Trotter, William Monroe, 727, 932–934, 1057–1058. See also Du Bois, W.E.B.; Houston, Texas, Mutiny, 1917; Niagara Movement; Washington, Booker T.
- Tulsa, Oklahoma, Race Riot of 1921, 987, 1058–1060. See also Franklin, John Hope; Ku Klux Klan; White mob violence; White supremacy
- Turner, Henry McNeil, 299, 308, 378, 1060–1062. See also African Methodist Episcopal Church; American Colonization Society; Jim Crow; Ku Klux Klan; Lincoln, Abraham; Pan-Africanism; Republican Party
- Tuskegee Airmen, 1063–1065. See also National Association for the Advancement of Colored People; Roosevelt, Eleanor; Tuskegee Institute; White, Walter; World War II (black participation in)
- Tuskegee experiment, 987, 1066–1067.
See also Clinton, William Jefferson; Tuskegee Institute
- Tuskegee Institute, 721, 871–872, 1067–1068. See also Historically Black Colleges and Universities; Tuskegee Airmen; Washington, Booker T.

- UNIA (Universal Negro Improvement Association), 193, 631, 667–668, 773, 781–784, 900–901, 909, 948, 953, 1069–1071. See also Black Nationalism; Black Star Line; Garvey, Marcus; Ku Klux Klan; Pan-Africanism; Queen Mother Moore
- Urban ghetto, 1071–1072. See also Great Migration; Kerner Commission Report; Urbanization; War on poverty
- Urbanization, 1073–1076. See also Great Migration; Kerner Commission Report; Urban ghetto
- US Organization, 222, 837, 1076–1078. See also Afrocentricity; Black Panther Party; Black Power; COIN-TELPRO; Karenga, Maulana; Kwanzaa
- Vietnam War (black participation in), 607, 610, 1078–1081. See also Ali, Muhammad; Black Power; King, Martin Luther, Jr.; Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee; Students for a Democratic Society; X, Malcolm
- Voting Rights Act of 1965, 594, 645, 656, 663, 705, 835, 841, 862, 892, 1081–1083. See also Disfranchisement; Grandfather Clause; Johnson, Lyndon Baines; Literacy tests; National Association for the Advancement of Colored People; Selma March; Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee
- Walker, Alice, 1083–1084, 1084 (photo). See also Hurston, Zora Neale; King, Martin Luther, Jr.
- War on Poverty, 835, 964, 1085–1086. See also Johnson, Lyndon Baines; Kerner Commission Report; Long Hot Summer Riots, 1965–1967; Urban ghetto
- Ware, Bill, 1086–1087. See also Black Nationalism; Black Power; Nkru-mah, Kwame; Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee
- Washington, Booker T., 361, 487, 533, 593, 596, 604, 642, 652, 693, 721, 727, 745, 782, 807, 914, 926, 933, 948, 1012, 1088–1090. See also Accommodationism; Cotton States Exposition; Du Bois, W.E.B.; Tuskegee Airmen; Tuskegee Institute
- Washington, Harold, 1090–1092. See also World War II (black participation in)
- Wells-Barnett, Ida, 663, 773, 873, 914–915, 1092–1095. See also Antilynching campaign; Black self-defense; Exoduster movement; Great Migration; Lynching; National Association for the Advancement of Colored People; Niagara Movement; Suffrage movement, women's; Washington, Booker T.; White mob violence
- White, Walter, 693–694, 713, 738, 873, 1095–1096. See also Atlanta, Georgia, Riot of 1906; Du Bois, W.E.B.; Houston, Charles Hamilton; Lynching; Marshall, Thurgood; National Association for the Advancement of Colored People
- White Citizens' Council, 1096–1098. See also Ku Klux Klan; National Association for the Advancement of Colored People; White supremacy
- White mob violence, 490 (illustration), 492, 1098–1099. See also Jim Crow; Ku Klux Klan; Lynching; Plan de San Diego; Wells-Barnett, Ida
- White primaries, 1099–1100. See also Disfranchisement; MFDP; National Association for the Advancement of Colored People; Voting Rights Act of 1965
- White supremacy, 187, 230, 253, 258, 265, 458–459, 489, 582, 588, 592, 613, 1100. See also Jim Crow; Ku Klux Klan; Lynching; White Citizens' Council; White mob violence
- Wilkins, Roy, 892, 1101–1102. See also Cold War and civil rights; Du Bois, W.E.B.; March on Washington Movement, 1963; National Association for the Advancement of Colored People; Robeson, Paul; White, Walter
- Williams, Hosea, 669, 826, 1102–1104. See also King, Martin Luther, Jr.; National Association for the Advancement of Colored People; Southern Christian Leadership Conference
- Wills, Frank, 1105–1106. See also National Association for the Advancement of Colored People
- Winfrey, Oprah, 1106–1107, 1107 (photo). See also Obama, Barack
- Woodson, Carter Godwin, 187, 619, 621–622, 643, 1107–1110. See also Association for the Study of African American Life and History; Du Bois, W.E.B.; Franklin, John Hope
- World War I (black participation in), 1110–1112. See also Buffalo Soldiers; Houston, Texas, Mutiny, 1917; "If We Must Die"; Red Summer Race Riots
- World War II (black participation in), 1112–1114. See also Double V Campaign; Evers, Medgar; National Association for the Advancement of Colored People; Randolph, A. Philip; Robinson, Jackie; Tuskegee Airmen; World War I (black participation in)
- X, Malcolm, 175, 253, 257, 604, 609, 628, 656, 658–659, 663, 675, 689, 691, 737, 767, 791–792, 805, 837, 910–911, 918–919, 930, 944–945, 989, 998, 1014, 1076–1077, 1115–1118. See also Black Nationalism; Black Panther Party; Black Power; Haley, Alex; Muhammad, Elijah; Nation of Islam; Organization of African Unity; Pan-Africanism; Shabazz, Betty X; Universal Negro Improvement Association

Index

---

- Aaron, Hank, 647
Abbott, Thomas, 692–693
Abdul-Jabbar, Kareem, 646
Abelman v. Booth, 282–284. See also Dred Scott v. Sandford; Fugitive Slave Act of 1793; Fugitive Slave Act of 1850; Fugitive slaves
Abernathy, Ralph David, 594, 851, 898, 966. See also Albany, Georgia, Movement; King, Martin Luther, Jr.; Montgomery Bus Boycott; Southern Christian Leadership Conference
Abolition, slave trade, 26, 29, 33, 72, 283, 284–287. See also Atlantic slave trade; Cugoano, Quobna Ottobah; Equiano, Olaudah; Wilberforce, William in England, 284–286
    in the U.S., 286–287
Abolition, slavery, 287–291, 453. See also American and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society; American Anti-Slavery Society; Birney, James; Brown, John; Douglass, Frederick; Emancipation Proclamation; Fugitive Slave Act of 1850; Fugitive slaves; Garrison, William Lloyd; Gradual emancipation; Immediatism; Kansas-Nebraska Act, 1854; Liberia; Smith, Gerrit; Tappan, Arthur; Tappan, Lewis; Thirteenth Amendment; Truth, Sojourner; Tubman, Harriet
Abolition of Slavery Bill (1834), 320
Abu Jamal, Mumia, 594–596, 595 (photo). See also Black Power; COINTELPRO
Accommodationism, 596–597. See also Black Nadir; Cotton States Exposition; Jim Crow; Washington, Booker T.
Acculturation, 9–10. See also Amalgamation; Atlantic Creoles; Double consciousness; Salt-water negroes
Adams, Henry, 762
Adams, John Quincy, 292–293, 292 (photo), 328, 337, 340, 372, 411, 453, 484. See also Abolition, slavery; Amistad (schooner)
Affirmative action, 597–599. See also Fourteenth Amendment; Johnson, Lyndon Baines; Kennedy, John Fitzgerald
Afonso (King of Kongo), 8
Afric-American Literary Society, 542
Africa and Africans in the Making of the Atlantic World (Thornton), 7, 127
African American Civil Rights movement, 712–713
African American English (AAE), 149–150
African American Vernacular English (AAVE), 149–150
African Blood Brotherhood (ABB), 599–600. See also Black Nationalism; Harlem Renaissance
African Burial Ground, New York City, 10–12, 11 (photo), 130. See also Africanisms; Grave decorations
African Civilization Society, 293–294, 307, 393, 426, 539. See also Delany, Martin; Douglass, Frederick; Garnet, Henry Highland; Nell, William Cooper; Pennington, James William Charles; Remond, Charles L.; Smith, James McCune
African Diaspora, 12–13, 117, 127, 128, 145, 202, 223, 234, 247, 248, 251, 268, 269, 362–363, 443, 691, 759, 945, 980, 1010. See also Atlantic slave trade; Black Atlantic; Pan-Africanism; Ring shout; Trans-Saharan slave trade
African Dorcas Association, 295–296, 357. See also African free schools; Jennings, Elizabeth
African Free Schools, 296–297, 365, 424, 456, 509, 510, 578. See also African Dorcas Association; Crummell, Alexander; Garnet, Henry Highland; Smith, James McCune; Williams, Peter, Jr.
African Grove Theater, 297. See also Black Folk Culture
African imperialism, 600–601. See also Berlin Conference, 1884–1885; Fanon, Frantz; Pan-Africanism
African Methodist Episcopal Church (AME), 145, 148, 193, 281, 298–300, 300–303, 341, 499–500, 502, 990, 1012, 1060–1062. See also Allen, Richard; Black churches; Jones, Absalom

- African Methodist Episcopal Zion Church (AMEZ), 146
- African National Congress (ANC), 601–603, 877, 879. See also Antipartheid movement; Mandela, Nelson; Pan-Africanism
- African Society for Mutual Relief (ASMR), 365, 442–443, 576
- Africanisms, 13–15, 152, 191, 199–200, 206, 259. See also Black folk culture; Slave culture; Slave religion
- Africanisms in the Gullah Dialect* (Turner), 13, 14, 269
- Africans in the New World* (Thornton), 191
- Afrocentricity, 187–188, 603–605, 619, 920. See also Asante, Molefi Kete; Karenga, Maulana; Kwanzaa; National Council for Black Studies
- Agyeman, Jaramogi Abebe. See Cleage, Albert B., Jr.
- Al-Amin, Jamil Abdullah (H. Rap Brown), 605–606, 606 (photo). See also Black Panther Party; Black Power; COINTELPRO; Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee
- Alabama Christian Movement for Human Rights (ACMHR), 1019–1020, 1019–1021
- Albany, Georgia, Movement, 606–607. See also Abernathy, Ralph David; King, Martin Luther, Jr.; National Association for the Advancement of Colored People; Southern Christian Leadership Conference; Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee
- Ali, Muhammad, 607–612, 805, 910–911, 919. See also Black athletes; Muhammad, Elijah; Nation of Islam; Till, Emmett; X, Malcolm
- Ali, Noble Drew, 612–613, 901–902. See also Black Nationalism; Moorish Science Temple
- Ali, Sunni, 102, 107
- All African Peoples Revolutionary Party (AAPRP), 690
- All Eyes on Me* (Tupac), 256
- All Things Considered (NPR), 596
- Allah Is Not Obligated* (Kourouma), 48
- Allen, Richard, 298, 300–303, 301 (illustration), 318, 325, 344, 409, 410, 413, 523. See also African Methodist Episcopal Church; Jones, Absalom
- Almorvid Islamic kingdom, 45
- Amalgamation, 132–133. See also Acculturation; Miscegenation
- American and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society, 303–304, 305, 394, 508. See also Abolition, slavery; American Anti-Slavery Society; Douglass, Frederick; Garrison, William Lloyd; Smith, Gerrit; Tappan, Arthur; Tappan, Lewis
- American Anti-Slavery Society, 281, 289, 303, 304–305, 318, 326, 345, 357, 394, 397, 398, 433, 448, 460, 464, 500, 506, 508, 511–512, 513, 577. See also Abolition, slavery; Douglass, Frederick; Garrison, William Lloyd; Immediatism; Tappan, Arthur; Tappan, Lewis
- The American Churches the Bulwark of Slavery* (Birney), 327
- American Civil Liberties Union (ACLU), 939, 974
- American Colonization Society, 288, 303, 306–308, 307 (photo), 340, 345, 367–368, 378, 443–444, 463, 466, 520, 569, 577. See also Cuffe, Paul; Liberia; Russwurm, John
- American Convention for the Abolition of Slavery, 520
- American Equal Rights Association, 512
- American Female Bond Benevolent Society, 318, 325
- American League of Colored Laborers, 393, 510, 538
- American Moral Reform Society (AMRS), 309–310, 346, 506, 573–574. See also Colored Convention Movement; Cornish, Samuel; Whipper, William
- American Negro Academy, 364
- American Revolution, 33, 64, 70, 72, 74–75, 86, 96, 132, 243, 245, 276, 277, 279, 287, 310–312, 317, 320, 325, 355–356, 367, 370 (illustration), 374, 377, 379, 418–419, 431, 475, 494, 518, 522. See also At-tucks, Crispus; Boston Massacre; Continental Army; Declaration of Independence; Lord Dunmore; Poor, Salem; Salem, Peter; Washington, George; Williams, Peter, Sr.
- American Slavery as It Is: Testimony of a Thousand Witnesses* (Weld), 288
- American Society of Free Persons of Colour, 281
- Americans for South African Resistance (AFSAR), 614
- Americans With Disabilities Act (ADA), 702
- Ames, Jessie Daniel, 617
- Amistad* (schooner), 279, 293, 312–316, 313 (illustration), 336–337, 378, 534. See also Abolition, slave trade; Adams, John Quincy; Cinque, Joseph; Tappan, Lewis
- An Appeal to the Coloured Citizens of the World* (Walker), 298
- Anansi the Spider*, 133. See also Africanisms; Black Folk Culture; Gold Coast
- ANC Youth League (ANCYL), 601–602
- Ancestral spirits, 134. See also Africanisms; Black Folk Culture; Slave religion; Transmigration
- Anderson, Marian, 134–136, 135 (photo). See also Cold War and civil rights; National Association for the Advancement of Colored People; Roosevelt, Eleanor
- Anglo-African Magazine*, 316–317, 539. See also Abolition, slavery; Garnet, Henry Highland; Pennington, James William Charles
- Angolan/Kongolese, 136. See also Gullah; Kongo cosmogram; Stono Rebellion
- Animal trickster stories, 136–137. See also Africanisms; Anansi the Spider; Black Folk Culture
- Annihilationist School, 9–10, 125
- Anokye, Okomfo, 60–61
- Anthony, Susan B., 305, 1046
- Anti-Slavery Reporter*, 362
- Anti-Slavery Society, 308, 333, 342, 357, 427, 428
- Antipartheid movement, 613–616. See also Ashe, Arthur; Congressional Black Caucus; Jackson, Jesse; King, Coretta Scott; King, Martin Luther, Jr.; National Association for the Advancement of Colored People; Pan-Africanism; X, Malcolm
- Antilynching campaign, 616–618, 913–914. See also Du Bois, W.E.B.; Ku Klux Klan; National Association for the Advancement of Colored People; National Association of Colored Women; Terrell, Mary Church; Wells-Barnett, Ida; White, Walter
- Antislavery societies, 317–318. See also Abolition, slavery; American and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society; American Anti-Slavery Society
- Appeal to the Coloured Citizens of the World* (Walker), 280, 535, 569–571
- Arawak natives (Bahamas), 4
- Armstrong, Louis, 138–141, 140 (photo), 167, 181, 185, 198, 215–216, 217. See also Black Folk Culture; Jazz
- Army Life in a Black Regiment* (Higginson), 203–204
- ASALH (Association for the Study of African American Life and History), 621–622. See also Woodson, Carter Godwin

- Asante, Molefi Kete, 187–188, 603–604, 618–619. See also Afrocentricity; National Council for Black Studies
- Asante Kingdom, 60–61
- Asbury, Francis, 300–301
- Ashe, Arthur, 614, 619–620, 648. See also Antiapartheid movement; Black athletes
- Ashmun, Jehudi, 307
- Asiento, 15. See also Atlantic slave trade; Dutch West India Company; Hispaniola
- Association of Southern Women for the Prevention of Lynching (ASWPL), 617
- Atlanta, Georgia, Riot of 1906, 622–624. See also Disfranchisement; Du Bois, W.E.B.; Jim Crow; White, Walter; White mob violence
- Atlantic Creoles, 16–17. See also Acculturation; Black Atlantic
- Atlantic Islands, 17–18. See also Atlantic slave trade; Sugar plantations
- Atlantic slave trade, 18–23, 108, 118, 208, 268, 284, 324, 325, 400. See also African Diaspora; Asiento; Cugonano, Quobna Ottobah; Equiano, Olaudah
- Attucks, Crispus, 319–320, 320 (photo), 327–328, 329
- August First celebrations, 320–321. See also Black Folk Culture
- Auld, Hugh, 388–389
- An Authentic Narrative* (Newton), 78
- Awash in a Sea of Faith: Christianizing the American People* (Butler), 126
- Bacon's Rebellion, 23–24, 32, 55, 56, 58, 86. See also Chesapeake Colonies; Indentured servitude; Racialized slavery
- Bailey, Pearl, 141–142. See also Black Folk Culture; Poitier, Sidney
- Baker, Ella, 625–626, 626 (photo), 634, 781, 912. See also Carmichael, Stokely; Southern Christian Leadership Conference; Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee
- Bakke, Alan, 598
- Baldwin, James, 175, 278, 545, 626–627. See also Black Folk Culture; Wright, Richard
- Ball, Charles, 321–322. See also Fugitive slaves; Slave culture
- Bamboozled* film, 164–165
- Bangor (Maine) Female Anti-Slavery Society, 512
- Banjo music, 153
- Banks, J. J., 502
- Banneker, Benjamin, 322–323, 323 (illustration), 333, 453, 805. See also Jefferson, Thomas
- Baraka, Amiri, 628–630, 629 (photo), 645, 736. See also Black Arts Movement; Black Nationalism; Black Power; Destination, Cuba; X, Malcolm
- Barracoons, 24–25, 25 (illustration). See also Atlantic slave trade
- Basie, Count, 142–143. See also Black Folk Culture; Jazz
- Bass, Charlotta Amanda Spears, 630–633. See also The Birth of a Nation; Brotherhood of Sleeping Car Porters; Cold War and Civil Rights; Garvey, Marcus; Ku Klux Klan; National Association for the Advancement of Colored People; Republican Party; Universal Negro Improvement Association; White supremacy
- Bates, Daisy, 633–634, 634 (photo), 862. See also Brown v. Board of Education; Little Rock Nine; National Association for the Advancement of Colored People
- Bebop, 143–144, 216. See also Black Folk Culture; Ellington, Duke; Jazz; Parker, Charlie
- Belafonte, Harry, 615, 635–636, 963. See also Black Folk Culture; King, Martin Luther, Jr.; Robeson, Paul; Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee
- Bell, James Madison, 294
- Bell, Philip A., 324, 342, 508, 1051–1052. See also Abolition, slavery; Colored American newspaper; Colored Convention Movement; The Elevator
- Benevolent societies, 325. See also African Dorcas Association; Antislavery societies; Brown Fellowship Society; Free African Society; Prince Hall Masonry
- Bensonhurst, New York, Incident of 1989, 636–637. See also Sharpton, Al; White mob violence; White supremacy
- Berkeley, William, 23–24, 55
- Berlin, Ira, 5, 86–87
- Berlin Conference, 1884–1885, 638–640. See also African imperialism
- Berlin Summer Olympics, 1936, 588–590. See also Black athletes; Owens, Jesse
- BET (Black Entertainment Television), 640–641. See also Ebony magazine; Jet magazine
- Bethel Church for Black Methodists, 302, 303
- Bethune, Mary McCloud, 619, 641–643, 642 (photo), 650, 855, 873, 915, 916–917, 921–922, 922 (photo), 999. See also Association for the Study of African American Life and History; Black Cabinet; Historically Black Colleges and Universities; National Association of Colored Women; World War II (black participation in)
- Between You and Me* (Bailey), 142
- Bight of Benin, 25–27, 130. See also Atlantic slave trade; Kingdom of Benin; Kingdom of Dahomey
- Bight of Biafra, 27–28, 52–53, 128, 129, 174. See also Atlantic slave trade; Chesapeake Colonies; Equiano, Olaudah; Igbo
- Biko, Steve, 643–644, 644 (photo). See also Antiapartheid movement
- Bill of Rights (U.S. Constitution), 549, 631
- Birney, James, 326–327. See also American Anti-Slavery Society; American Colonization Society; Douglass, Frederick; Garrison, William Lloyd; Liberty Party; Smith, Gerrit; Tappan, Arthur; Tappan, Lewis
- The Birth of a Nation* (Griffith), 164, 854, 889, 915, 1050–1051. See also Ku Klux Klan; Lynching; White supremacy
- The Birth of African-American Culture* (Mintz and Price), 10, 126, 191
- Black Arts Movement (BAM), 122, 645. See also Baraka, Amiri; Black Power
- Black athletes, 646–649. See also Aaron, Hank; Ali, Muhammad; Ashe, Arthur; Brown, Jim; Chamberlain, Wilt; Frazier, Joe; 1936 Summer Olympics, Berlin; 1968 Summer Olympics, Mexico City; Norton, Ken; Owens, Jesse; Paige, Leroy “Satchel”; Patterson, Floyd; Robeson, Paul; Robinson, Jackie; Simpson, Orenthal James (O.J.); Williams, Serena; Williams, Venus; Woods, Eldrick “Tiger”
- Black Atlantic, 144–145. See also African Diaspora; Atlantic Creoles; Atlantic slave trade
- Black Boy* (Wright), 274
- Black Cabinet, 649–651. See also Bethune, Mary McCloud; Bunche, Ralph; Roosevelt, Eleanor
- Black Cargoes* (Mannix), 65

- Black Christian Nationalism: New Directions for the Black Church* (Cleage), 258
- Black churches, 145–148, 147 (illustration). See also African Methodist Episcopal Church; First African Baptist Church; Slave religion
- Black Codes, 651, 700, 719, 774, 787, 830, 986. See also Civil Rights Act of 1866; Fourteenth Amendment; Jim Crow; Johnson, Andrew; Radical Republicans; White supremacy
- Black Consciousness Movement (BCM), 643
- Black conservatives, 652–654. See also Thomas, Clarence; Washington, Booker T.
- Black Culture and Black Consciousness* (Levine), 13, 275
- Black English, 149–150, 203. See also Africanisms; Gullah; Turner, Lorenzo Dow
- The Black Family in Slavery and Freedom* (Gutman), 194
- Black Folk Culture, 150–153. See also Africanisms; Animal trickster stories; Blues music; Field hollers; Goofers; Grave dirt; Hoodoo; Jazz; Laveau, Marie; Ragtime; Ring shout; Slave culture; Soul food; Work songs
- Black fraternal societies, 153–156, 243. See also Benevolent societies; Prince Hall Masonry
- Black Guerilla Family (BGF), 1030
- Black History Month, 621–622
- Black Liberation Army (BLA), 600, 675, 1015
- The Black Messiah* (Cleage), 258
- Black Nadir, 654–655. See also Disfranchisement; Du Bois, W.E.B.; Jim Crow; Lynching; Plessy v. Ferguson; Sharecropping; Washington, Booker T.
- Black Nationalism, 345, 368, 373–374, 426, 571, 614, 655–668. See also Black Panther Party; Black Power; Cuffe, Paul; Delany, Martin R.; Five Percenters; Garvey, Marcus; Muhammad, Elijah; Nation of Islam; A Negro Nation Within the Nation; Organization of African Unity; Universal Negro Improvement Association; X, Malcolm
- Black Nationalist movement (U.S.), 253
- Black Panther Party (BPP), 255, 591, 595, 600, 605, 656, 658–662, 659 (photo), 666, 678, 689, 706, 707, 731, 794, 805, 837, 870, 930–931, 941, 970, 992, 1008–1009, 1014, 1015–1016, 1030, 1077. See also Black Nationalism; Black Power; BPP, Chicago Branch; BPP, Los Angeles Branch; BPP, New York Branch; BPP, Oakland Branch; Brown, Elaine; Cleaver, Eldridge; COINTELPRO; Fanon, Frantz; Lowndes County Freedom Organization; Newton, Huey P.; Seale, Bobby; Shabazz, Betty X; Williams, Robert F.; X, Malcolm
- growth to national status, 660–661
- repression and decline of, 661
- Black Power, 134, 222, 262, 591, 599, 662–664, 837, 920, 964, 991, 1004. See also Black Panther Party; COINTELPRO; Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee; US Organization
- Black Power: The Politics of Liberation in America* (Carmichael and Hamilton), 187
- Black Radical Congress (BRC), 664–665. See also Baraka, Amiri; Black Nationalism; Davis, Angela; Sanchez, Sonia
- Black Reconstruction in America, 1860–1880* (Du Bois), 593
- Black self-defense, 665–667. See also Black Panther Party; Black Power; Deacons for Defense and Justice; Republic of New Afrika; Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee; US Organization; Williams, Robert F.; X, Malcolm
- Black Seminoles, 36, 156–157. See also Destination, Florida; Seminole Wars
- Black Star Line, 667–668, 782–783. See also Black Nationalism; Garvey, Marcus; Universal Negro Improvement Association
- Black United Front, 628
- Black wedding traditions, 157–159, 158 (illustration). See also Africanisms; Black churches; Black Folk Culture
- Black Yankees: The Development of an Afro-American Subculture* (Piersen), 14
- Blackface minstrelsy, 159–165, 161 (illustration). See also The Birth of a Nation; Jim Crow; Lee, Spike; White supremacy
- Blossingame, John W., 14
- Bloody Sunday, 668–669, 861, 1012–1013. See also Abernathy, Ralph David; Jim Crow; King, Martin Luther, Jr.; Lewis, John; Southern Christian Leadership Conference; Selma March; Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee; Voting Rights Act of 1965; Williams, Hosea
- Blue notes, 165. See also Africanisms; Blues music
- Blues music, 166–168. See also Africanisms; Armstrong, Louis; Blue notes; Ellington, Duke; Field hollers; King, Albert; King, B. B.; Parker, Charlie
- Blyden, Edward Wilmot, 363, 427
- Bombingham, 669–671, 1019–1020. See also Civil Rights Act of 1964; Jim Crow; King, Martin Luther, Jr.; Shuttlesworth, Fred; Sixteenth Street Baptist Church
- The Book of American Negro Spirituals* (Johnson and Locke), 13
- Booth, Sherman, 283
- Bosman, Willem, 28. See also Atlantic slave trade; Dutch West India Company; Elmina; Factors; Gold Coast; Gulf of Guinea
- Boston Massacre, 278, 311, 319, 327–329, 328 (illustration). See also American Revolution; Attucks, Crispus
- Boston Tea Party, 372
- Bottle trees, 168–169, 168 (photo). See also Africanisms; Slave culture; Slave religion
- Boyer, Jean Pierre, 329, 376. See also Destination, Florida; Haitian Revolution; Louverture, Toussaint
- BPP, Chicago Branch, 671–672, 794–795. See also Black Panther Party; COINTELPRO; Hampton, Fred
- BPP, Los Angeles Branch, 672–674, 970–971. See also Black Panther Party; Brown, Elaine; Cleaver, Eldridge; Pratt, Geronimo Ji Jaga; US Organization
- BPP, New York Branch, 674–675. See also Black Panther Party; Shakur, Assata
- BPP, Oakland Branch, 675–676, 707. See also Black Panther Party; Brown, Elaine; Cleaver, Eldridge; COINTELPRO; Karenga, Maulana; Newton, Huey P.; Seale, Bobby; US Organization
- Bradford, William F., 405
- Brer Rabbit (Brother Rabbit), 125, 150, 169–170, 170 (illustration), 207, 260. See also Africanisms; Animal trickster stories; Black Folk Culture
- Briggs, Cyril, 599
- Briggs v. Elliot* (Clarendon County case), 300
- British and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society, 339

- “Broadside Quartet” black poets, 253–254
- Brooks, Gwendolyn, 170–172. See also Chicago Defender; Harlem Renaissance
- Brotherhood of Sleeping Car Porters, 632, 677–678, 881, 977. See also Great Migration; Randolph, A. Philip
- Brown, Elaine, 673, 676, 678–679. See also Black Panther Party; BPP, Los Angeles Branch; COINTELPRO; Newton, Huey P.; US Organization
- Brown, H. Rap. See Al-Amin, Jamil Abdullah
- Brown, Hallie Quinn, 720
- Brown, Hubert Gerald. See Al-Amin, Jamil Abdullah
- Brown, James, 172–174, 173 (photo), 196, 1018. See also Black Folk Culture
- Brown, Jim, 610, 647, 792, 859
- Brown, John, 330–331, 330 (photo), 426, 536–537, 543, 559, 655, 933. See also Abolition, slavery; Kansas-Nebraska Act, 1854; Slave resistance; Smith, Gerrit
- Brown, Ron, 679–680. See also Clinton, William Jefferson; Jackson, Jesse
- Brown, William Wells, 318, 332–333, 348, 512, 535. See also Abolition, slavery; American Anti-Slavery Society; Douglass, Frederick; Fugitive slaves; Jefferson, Thomas; Slave culture; Underground Railroad
- Brown Fellowship Society, 325, 333. See also Benevolent societies
- Brown v. Board of Education*, 300, 680–682, 681 (photo), 687, 712, 723, 761, 775, 776, 808, 812, 819–820, 829, 832, 838–839, 855, 862, 885, 899, 959, 961, 1020, 1054, 1096–1097. See also Busing; Fourteenth Amendment; Houston, Charles Hamilton; Little Rock Nine; Marshall, Thurgood; National Association for the Advancement of Colored People; Plessy v. Ferguson
- Bruce, Blanche K., 682–683, 683 (photo), 983. See also Radical Republicans; Reconstruction Era black politicians; Republican Party
- Bryan, Andrew, 404
- Buckra, 174. See also Igbo; Slave culture
- Buffalo Soldiers, 683–686, 684 (photo). See also Jim Crow; Union Army
- Bullins, Ed, 645
- Bunce Island, 28–29, 64. See also Carolinas; Gullah; Laurens, Henry; Rice cultivation; Royal African Company; Sierra Leone
- Bunche, Ralph, 613, 686–687. See also Black Cabinet; Vietnam War (black participation in)
- Burns, Anthony, 417
- Bush, George H. W., 515, 801, 1053–1054
- Bush, George W., 515, 598, 808
- Busing, 687–688. See also Brown v. Board of Education
- Butler, Benjamin F., 352, 354, 699
- Butler, Jon, 126
- Calhoun, John C., 340, 349
- Call-and-response, 175–176. See also Africanisms; Black churches; Ring shout; Slave culture; Slave religion; Work songs
- Campaign of Defiance of Unjust Laws in South Africa, 614
- Campanella, Roy, 647, 924
- Canada. See Destination, Canada
- Canadian Anti-Slavery Society, 573
- Cape Coast Castle, 29–30, 30 (illustration). See also Atlantic slave trade; Elmina
- Carey, Archibald J., Jr., 300, 302
- Carmichael, Stokely, 187, 258, 593, 605, 628, 656, 688–690, 689 (photo), 779, 850, 906, 936, 1012, 1042. See also Black Nationalism; Black Panther Party; Black Power; CORE; King, Martin Luther, Jr.; Lowndes County Freedom Organization; MFDP; Mississippi Freedom Summer, 1964; Nkrumah, Kwame; Pan-Africanism; Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee
- Carolinas, 20, 29, 30–31, 36, 46, 50, 52, 64, 90–91, 101, 103–104, 108, 114, 128, 130, 172–173, 261, 312, 403, 523, 715, 855. See also Angolan/Kongolese; Atlantic slave trade; Bunce Island; Gold Coast; Gullah; Juba Dance; Malaria; Rice cultivation; Senegambia; Sierra Leone; Stono Rebellion; Task system; Turner, Lorenzo Dow; West-Central Africa
- Carpenters, 334–335. See also Congressional reconstruction; Ku Klux Klan; Radical Republicans
- Carter, Amy, 615–616
- Carter, Jimmy, 598, 615, 705, 808, 862, 939, 946
- Carver, George Washington, 805, 1088
- Cary, Mary Ann Shadd, 335–336. See also Colored Convention Movement; Delany, Martin; Destination, Canada; Douglass, Frederick; Shadd, Abraham
- Castro, Fidel, 658, 675, 690–691, 717–718, 736–737, 805, 823–824. See also Destination, Cuba; Williams, Robert F.; X, Malcolm
- Caul, 176. See also Africanisms; Black Folk Culture
- Chamberlain, Wilt, 646–647
- Charles, Robert, 927–928
- Charms, 176–177. See also Africanisms; Black Folk Culture; Slave culture
- Chase, Salmon P., 411–412, 416, 503
- Chesapeake Colonies, 32–33, 50, 53–54, 82. See also Atlantic slave trade; Bacon’s Rebellion; Freedom dues; Headright system; Indentured servitude; Jamestown, Virginia; Jefferson, Thomas; Lord Dunmore; Rolfe, John; Tobacco
- Chicago Race Riot of 1919, 694–696, 695 (photo). See also Destination, Chicago, Illinois; Great Migration; “If We Must Die”; Jim Crow; Red Summer Race Riots; White mob violence
- Chicago Defender*, 692–694, 714, 733–734, 746. See also Destination, Chicago, Illinois; Great Migration; National Association for the Advancement of Colored People; White, Walter
- Chisholm, Shirley, 696–698, 697 (photo). See also Clinton, William Jefferson; Jackson, Jesse; National Association for the Advancement of Colored People
- Christophe, Henri, 375–376, 520
- Cinque, Joseph, 336–338, 338 (illustration). See also Adams, John Quincy; Amistad (schooner); Pennington, James William Charles; Tappan, Lewis
- Civil Rights Act of 1866, 651, 698–699, 774, 975. See also Black Codes; Disfranchisement; Dred Scott v. Sandford; Fourteenth Amendment; Jim Crow; Johnson, Andrew; Ku Klux Klan; Radical Republicans; Thirteenth Amendment
- Civil Rights Act of 1868, 1036
- Civil Rights Act of 1871, 872
- Civil Rights Act of 1875, 699–700, 975. See also Disfranchisement; Fourteenth Amendment; Jim Crow
- Civil Rights Act of 1957, 700, 839, 1021. See also Disfranchisement; Fourteenth Amendment; Jim Crow; Johnson, Lyndon Baines
- Civil Rights Act of 1960, 700–701. See also Civil Rights Act of 1875; Disfranchisement; Fourteenth Amendment; Jim Crow; Voting Rights Act of 1965

- Civil Rights Act of 1964, 701, 701–702, 775, 835, 855, 862, 884, 970, 1019. See also Affirmative action; Brown v. Board of Education; Civil Rights Act of 1968; Disfranchisement; Fourteenth Amendment; Jim Crow; Johnson, Lyndon Baines; Kennedy, John Fitzgerald; March on Washington Movement, 1963; Voting Rights Act of 1965
- Civil Rights Act of 1968, 702–704, 703, 836, 1008. See also Civil Rights Act of 1964; Disfranchisement; Fourteenth Amendment; Jim Crow; Johnson, Lyndon Baines; Kennedy, John Fitzgerald; King, Martin Luther, Jr.; National Association for the Advancement of Colored People
- Civil Rights movement (U.S.), 7, 148, 150, 217, 224, 231, 246, 253, 262, 507, 554, 581–587, 609, 616, 625–626, 627, 645, 656, 658, 662–663, 669, 678, 685, 688, 711, 719, 739–740, 810, 1020, 1033. See also Abernathy, Ralph David; Affirmative action; Ali, Muhammad; Anderson, Marian; Baker, Ella; Baldwin, James; Bates, Daisy; Black churches; Black Power; Bloody Sunday; Brown v. Board of Education; Carmichael, Stokely; Carpetbaggers; Cold War and civil rights; CORE (Congress of Racial Equality); Detroit, Michigan, Riot of 1943; Double consciousness; First African Baptist Church; Jackson, Jesse; Johnson, Lyndon Baines; Kennedy, John Fitzgerald; Kennedy, Robert F.; King, Martin Luther, Jr.; Lewis, John; Little Rock Nine; March on Washington Movement, 1941; March on Washington Movement, 1963; Marshall, Thurgood; Meredith, James; MFDP; Montgomery Bus Boycott; National Association for the Advancement of Colored People; 1968 Summer Olympics, Mexico City; Parks, Rosa; Poor People's Campaign; Randolph, A. Philip; Rustin, Bayard; Southern Christian Leadership Conference; Selma March; Shuttlesworth, Fred; Sit-In movement; Sixteenth Street Baptist Church; Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee; Till, Emmett
- Civil War (U.S.), 108–109, 133, 146, 152, 154, 163, 208, 230, 245, 261, 278, 290, 292, 305, 325, 331, 333, 340, 348, 351–353, 363–364, 373, 374, 390–391, 429–430, 459, 461, 463, 464, 478, 529, 554, 651. See also Black Codes; Buffalo Soldiers; Confederate States of America; Davis, Jefferson; Emancipation Proclamation; Lincoln, Abraham; Massachusetts 54th Regiment; Union Army
- Clark, Kenneth B., 194
- Clark, Septima, 704–705. See also Baker, Ella; Du Bois, W.E.B.; National Association for the Advancement of Colored People; Parks, Rosa; Southern Christian Leadership Conference
- Clarkson, Thomas, 338–339, 378, 399. See also Abolition, slave trade; Equiano, Olaudah; Wilberforce, William
- Clay, Cassius Marcellus. See Ali, Muhammad
- Clay, Henry, 339–340, 345, 349, 350 (illustration), 462, 484, 521, 4655. See also Compromise of 1850; Missouri Compromise
- Cleage, Albert B., Jr., 257–258
- Cleaver, Eldridge, 661, 672–673, 706–707, 706 (photo), 707, 710, 736, 1014. See also Black Panther Party; Cleaver, Kathleen Neal; Newton, Huey P.; Seale, Bobby
- Cleaver, Kathleen Neal, 707–708. See also Abu Jamal, Mumia; Black Nationalism; Black Panther Party; Black Power; BPP, Chicago Branch; BPP, Los Angeles Branch; BPP, New York Branch; BPP, Oakland Branch; Cleaver, Eldridge; Newton, Huey P.; Pratt, Geronimo Ji Jaga; Shakur, Assata
- Clinton, Hillary Rodham, 941
- Clinton, William Jefferson, 47, 598, 679–680, 708–709, 824. See also Brown, Ron; Obama, Barack
- Coastal Contact Period (1475–1850), 26
- COINTELPRO, 605, 657, 661, 671, 676, 678, 709–710, 794–795, 838, 931–932, 971–972, 990, 992, 1015, 1044, 1077. See also Black Panther Party; Black Power; Carmichael, Stokely; Hoover, J. Edgar; King, Martin Luther, Jr.; Muhammad, Elijah; Southern Christian Leadership Conference; Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee; US Organization; X, Malcolm
- Coker, Daniel, 341. See also African Methodist Episcopal Church; American Colonization Society; Destination, Sierra Leone
- Cold War and civil rights, 135, 582–583, 587, 614, 711–713. See also Brown v. Board of Education; Bunche, Ralph; Du Bois, W.E.B.; King, Martin Luther, Jr.; Little Rock Nine; National Association for the Advancement of Colored People; Robeson, Paul; White, Walter; Wright, Richard
- Coleman, Bessie, 713–715, 714 (photo). See also Chicago Defender; Destination, Chicago, Illinois; Great Migration; Wells-Barnett, Ida
- Colored American* newspaper, 341–343, 358, 508, 516, 526, 573–574, 580. See also Abolition, slavery; Bell, Philip A.; Cornish, Samuel; Ray, Charles; Smith, James McCune
- Colored Convention Movement, 324, 336, 344–348, 539. See also Abolition, slavery; American Colonization Society; Douglass, Frederick; Garnet, Henry Highland; Jennings, Thomas L.; Williams, Peter, Jr.; Wright, Theodore S.
- Colored Farmers Alliance, 715, 966. See also Black Nationalism; Jim Crow; Populist Party; Sharecroppers Union
- Colored Golfers Association, 649
- Colored Man's Journal*, 324
- Colored Methodist Episcopal Church (CME), 146, 148
- Colored National Convention, 502
- Colored Orphan Asylum, 538
- Colored Reading Society of Philadelphia, 573
- Colored Women's Clubs, 557
- Colored Women's League, 721
- Coltrane, John, 177–180, 178 (photo), 217. See also Black Folk Culture; Davis, Miles; Jazz; Parker, Charlie
- Columbus, Christopher, 2, 4, 41, 50, 51 (illustration), 94, 108
- Combs, Sean “Puff Daddy,” 256
- Committee of Racial Equality (CORE), 300
- Committee of the Liverpool African Merchants, 285
- Committee on the Move to Equality (COME), 858
- Compromise of 1850, 349–350, 368, 458, 559. See also Clay, Henry; Destination, Canada; Free Soil Party; Fugitive Slave Act of 1850; Fugitive slaves; Missouri Compromise
- Compromise of 1877, 716–717. See also Black Nadir; Confederate States of America; Hayes, Rutherford B.; Republican Party; Union Army; White supremacy

- Confederate Conscription Act, 497
- Confederate States of America, 351–353, 369, 402, 406. See also Davis, Jefferson; Emancipation Proclamation; Fort Pillow Massacre
- Confiscation Acts, 354–355. See also Confederate States of America; Emancipation Proclamation
- Congo Square, New Orleans, 180–181. See also Africanisms; Laveau, Marie
- Congressional Black Caucus, 717–718, 718 (photo). See also Antipartheid movement; Castro, Fidel; Chisholm, Shirley; Million Man March; Norton, Eleanor Holmes; Obama, Barack
- Congressional Reconstruction, 334, 718–719. See also Black Codes; Compromise of 1877; Fourteenth Amendment; Johnson, Lyndon Baines; Lincoln, Abraham; Radical Republicans; Reconstruction Era black politicians; Thirteenth Amendment
- Conjure, 181–184, 207, 208. See also Africanisms; Pritchard, Gullah Jack; Root doctors; Slave culture; Slave resistance
- Constitution (U.S.), 276, 284, 452–453, 456, 458, 466, 570, 668. See also Bill of Rights; Fifteenth Amendment; First Amendment; Fourteenth Amendment; Nineteenth Amendment; Thirteenth Amendment
- Continental Army, 355–356. See also American Revolution; Poor, Salem; Salem, Peter
- Continuity and Change* (Herskovits), 207
- Convention of Colored Citizens of Philadelphia, 573
- Cooper, Anna Julia, 363, 719–721, 1046. See also Du Bois, W.E.B.; National Association of Colored Women; Terrell, Mary Church; Truth, Sojourner; Tuskegee Institute; Washington, Booker T.
- CORE (Congress of Racial Equality), 585, 666, 668, 688, 705, 722–725, 732, 778–779, 810, 822, 840, 848, 857, 882, 894, 938, 1002–1003, 1032 (photo), 1038, 1040. See also Black Conservatives; Black Nationalism; Black Power; Brown v. Board of Education; Freedom Rides; Jim Crow; March on Washington Movement, 1941; March on Washington Movement, 1963; National Association for the Advancement of Colored People; Southern Christian Leadership Conference
- Cornish, Samuel, 309, 342, 343, 356–358, 357 (photo), 413–414, 508, 516, 517, 573–574, 580. See also American Anti-Slavery Society; American Colonization Society; Colored American newspaper; Freedom's Journal; Moral uplift; Russwurm, John
- Coromantee, 184. See also Akan; Atlantic slave trade; Slave resistance
- Corwin Amendment (U.S. Constitution), 466
- Cosby, Bill, 725–726. See also BET; Black athletes; Historically Black Colleges and Universities; National Association for the Advancement of Colored People; Poitier, Sidney
- Cotton States Exposition, 596, 726–727, 745. See also Accommodationism; Du Bois, W.E.B.; Trotter, William Monroe; Washington, Booker T.
- Council of Federated Organizations (CFO), 905–906
- Council on African Affairs (CAA), 613–614
- Covey, Edward, 387
- Craft, William and Ellen, 318, 358–359
- Crandall, Prudence, 359–360, 360 (illustration), 507. See also Abolition, slavery
- Croly, David Goodman, 133
- Crooks, Lesane Parish. See Shakur, Tupac “2Pac” Amaru
- Crummell, Alexander, 296, 361–364. See also Abolition, slavery; African Free Schools; Cooper, Anna Julia; Crummell, Boston; Delany, Martin; Douglass, Frederick; Du Bois, W.E.B.; Fugitive Slave Act of 1850; Garnet, Henry Highland; Liberia; Walker, David; Washington, Booker T.
- Crummell, Boston, 364–365, 413. See also Abolition, slavery; Crummell, Alexander; Destination, Haiti; Freedom's Journal
- Cuffe, Paul, 307, 311, 365–368, 376, 378, 414, 520, 576. See also Abolition, slavery; Black Nationalism; Sierra Leone
- Cugoano, Quobna Ottobah, 33–34. See also Abolition; Atlantic slave trade; Slave trade
- Customary (behavioral) folklore, 150
- Daddy Crow, 728–729. See also Black churches; Evangelism
- Daddy Grace, 193
- The Daemonic Genius of Richard Wright* (Turner), 271
- Dahomey Kingdom, 25–26, 152, 176
- Dark Ghetto* (Clark), 194
- Daughters of the American Revolution (D.A.R.), 135
- Davis, Angela, 729–732, 730 (photo), 1030. See also Black Panther Party; Jackson, George; Student Non-violent Coordinating Committee; Soledad Brothers
- Davis, Jefferson, 353, 368–369, 369 (photo), 403. See also Confederate States of America
- Davis, Miles, 179, 185–187, 186 (photo), 216, 238. See also Black Folk Culture; Coltrane, John; Jazz; Parker, Charlie
- de Las Casas, Bartolomé, 34–35, 35 (illustration), 42. See also Atlantic slave trade; Encomienda; Hispaniola
- Deacons for Defense and Justice (DDI), 666, 732–733. See also Black Nationalism; Black Power; CORE; Ku Klux Klan
- Declaration of Independence, 293, 310, 319–320, 332, 370–372, 370 (illustration), 420, 452, 458–459, 465, 521, 549, 570. See also American Revolution; Jefferson, Thomas
- Delany, Martin R., 294, 316, 317, 347, 363, 372–374, 378, 655. See also American Colonization Society; Black Nationalism; Pan-Africanism
- Democracy Now (radio show), 596
- Democratic Party, 458, 464, 465, 484, 514, 615, 632, 650–651, 680, 689, 697–698, 701, 715, 744, 793, 826–827, 861, 966, 1042
- Denny, Reginald, 867–868
- Destination, Canada, 374–375, 560–561, 572, 577. See also Fugitive Slave Act of 1850; Fugitive slaves
- Destination, Chicago, Illinois, 733–734. See also Chicago Race Riot of 1919; Great Migration; Red Summer Race Riots; Urbanization
- Destination, Cuba, 734–737, 1016. See also Baraka, Amiri; Black Nationalism; Black Panther Party; Castro, Fidel; Harlem Renaissance; Negritude; Shakur, Assata; Williams, Robert F.; X, Malcolm
- Destination, Detroit, Michigan, 737–738. See also Black Nadir; Detroit, Michigan, Riot of 1943; Great Migration; Muhammad, Elijah
- Destination, Florida, 36. See also Atlantic Creoles; Black Seminoles; Fugitive slaves; Gullah; Kongo Kingdom;

- Seminole Wars; Stono Rebellion;
West-Central Africa
- Destination, Haiti, 375–377. See also Boyer, Jean Pierre; Douglass, Frederick; Garnet, Henry Highland; Haitian Revolution
- Destination, Harlem, New York, 738–739. See also Du Bois, W.E.B.; Garvey, Marcus; Great Migration; Harlem Renaissance; Johnson, James Weldon; Urbanization
- Destination, Sierra Leone, 377–378. See also American Colonization Society; Clarkson, Thomas; Coker, Daniel; Cuffe, Paul; Wilberforce, William
- Detroit, Michigan, Riot of 1943, 739–741. See also Destination, Detroit, Michigan; Great Migration
- Detroit, Michigan, Riot of 1967, 741–742. See also Johnson, Lyndon Baines; Kerner Commission Report; League of Revolutionary Black Workers; Long Hot Summer Riots, 1965–1967; Vietnam War (black participation in)
- Diallo, Amadou, 742–743. See also Racial profiling
- Disfranchisement, 743–745. See also Fifteenth Amendment; Grandfather Clause; Jim Crow; Literacy tests; Voting Rights Act of 1965; Washington, Booker T.; White primaries
- Dismal Swamp maroons, 378–380. See also Fugitive slaves; Slave resistance
- Does Your House Have Lions?* (Sanchez), 254
- Dolben Act, 111
- Domestic slave trade, 380–384. See also Family patterns; Slave breeding
- Don Kiluminati: The 7 Day Theory* (Tupac), 256
- Double consciousness, 187–188. See also Du Bois, W.E.B.
- Double V campaign, 745–746. See also Anderson, Marian; Powell, Adam Clayton, Jr.; Randolph, A. Philip; Wilkins, Roy; World War II (black participation in)
- Douglas, Stephen, 465
- Douglass, Anna Murray, 384–385. See also Douglass, Frederick; Fugitive slaves; Underground Railroad
- Douglass, Frederick, 163, 196, 281–282, 290, 299, 309–310, 316, 318, 327, 332, 335, 347, 348, 363, 373, 377, 386–392, 387 (photo), 393, 400, 426, 428, 479, 488, 500–501, 512, 516, 535, 536, 538–539, 553, 559, 605, 621, 655, 758, 829, 837, 1045, 1049. See also Abolition, slavery; American Anti-Slavery Society; Colored Convention Movement; Douglass, Anna Murray; Fugitive Slave Act of 1850; Fugitive slaves; Garrison, William Lloyd; Lincoln, Abraham
- Douglass, Sarah Mapps, 318
- Douglass, Stephen, 458
- Downing, George, 377, 392–393, 537. See also Abolition, slavery; American Colonization Society; Downing, Thomas; Garnet, Henry Highland; Smith, James McCune
- Downing, Thomas, 392, 393–395. See also Abolition, slavery; American and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society; American Anti-Slavery Society; Downing, George; Jennings, Thomas L.
- Dred Scott v. Sandford*, 283, 395–396, 426, 506, 521, 775, 959. See also Kansas-Nebraska Act, 1854; Missouri Compromise; Scott, Dred
- Du Bois, W.E.B., 145, 187, 194, 226, 232, 234, 364, 411, 486, 487, 545, 581, 582, 583, 592–593, 597, 599, 605, 613, 623, 645, 652, 663, 727, 738, 746–748, 747 (photo), 773, 805, 807, 853, 873, 874–875, 913–914, 913–915, 925–926, 929–930, 932–934, 935, 947–949, 952–953, 959, 962, 998, 1011, 1023, 1047–1048. See also African Diaspora; Double consciousness; National Association for the Advancement of Colored People; Niagara Movement; Pan-African Congress; Pan-Africanism
- Du Sable, Jean Baptiste Point, 36–37. See also American Revolution
- Dube, John, 601
- Dunning, William A., 334
- Dutch New Netherland, 38–39, 239–241. See also Atlantic slave trade; Dutch West India Company; Gold Coast; Patroonship
- Dutch North Africa, 38
- Dutch West India Company, 28, 38, 39–40, 81, 184, 493. See also Atlantic slave trade; Dutch New Netherland; Elmina; Gold Coast
- Dyer Anti-Lynching Bill, 873
- Dyer Bill, 617–618
- Early, Sarah Woodson, 720
- East St. Louis, Illinois, Riot of 1917, 748–749. See also Great Migration; White mob violence
- Ebo Landing, 188–189, 198
- Ebonics, 149–150
- Ebony* magazine, 244, 749–750, 827. See also BET; Jet magazine
- The Economic Life of Primitive People* (Herskovits), 207
- Economic Transition in Africa* (Herskovits), 207
- Edwards, Jonathan, 432, 522
- Eisenhower, Dwight D., 300, 634, 701, 712, 833, 862–863, 946, 968
- Elaine, Arkansas, Riot of 1919, 750–752. See also National Association for the Advancement of Colored People; Red Summer Race Riots; Wells-Barnett, Ida; White mob violence
- Elaw, Zilpha, 396–397. See also Evangelism
- Elder, Larry, 653
- Election Day, 189–190. See also Africanisms; Black Folk Culture; Pinkster Festival; Slave culture
- The Elevator* (Bell), 1051–1052. See also Abolition, slavery; Bell, Philip A.; Colored Convention Movement; Republican Party
- Elkins, Stanley, 252
- Elks fraternal society, 155
- Ellington, Duke, 143, 167, 190–191, 198, 216, 739. See also Black Folk Culture; Jazz; Ragtime
- Elliot, George, 323
- Ellison, Ralph, 752–754, 753 (photo). See also Wright, Richard
- Elmina, 28, 39, 40–41, 43. See also Atlantic slave trade; Cape Coast Castle; Gold Coast
- Emancipation Proclamation, 353, 363–364, 369, 391, 426, 460, 467, 478, 754–758, 756 (photo). See also Abolition, slavery; Douglass, Frederick; Lincoln, Abraham; Thirteenth Amendment
- The Emancipator*, 397–398, 398 (illustration). See also Abolition, slavery; American Anti-Slavery Society; Garrison, William Lloyd; Tappan, Arthur
- Emerson, Ralph Waldo, 290
- Encomienda, 41–42. See also de Las Casas, Bartolomé; Hispaniola; Reconquista
- Enrollment Act (1863), 489
- “The Epic of Sundiata.” See Sundiata: The Epic of Old Mali
- Equal Opportunity Commission (U.S.), 654
- Equiano, Olaudah, 285, 399–401, 571. See also Abolition, slave trade;

- Bight of Biafra; Black Atlantic;
Cugoano, Quobna Ottobah; Igbo
- Erving, Julius, 646
- Estévan, 42–43. See also Atlantic Creoles; Hispaniola
- Ethiopian Peace Movement, 759–760. See also African Diaspora; Black Nationalism; National Association for the Advancement of Colored People; Pan-Africanism; Selassie, Halie
- Ethnic randomization, 191–192. See also African Diaspora; Africanisms; Atlantic slave trade
- Evangelism, 192–193. See also African Methodist Episcopal Church; Daddy Grace; Elaw, Zilpha; Father Divine; Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts
- Evers, Medgar, 760–761. See also Ku Klux Klan; National Association for the Advancement of Colored People; World War II (black participation in)
- Exchanging Our Country Marks* (Gomez), 127
- Exoduster movement, 762–764. See also Nicodemus, Kansas; Singleton, Benjamin “Pap”; Wells-Barnett, Ida
- Factors, 43. See also Atlantic slave trade; Bosman, Willem; Dutch West India Company; Elmina; Gold Coast; Royal African Company
- Fage, J. D., 7
- Fair Housing Act of 1969, 701
- Family patterns, 193–195, 195 (illustration). See also Frazier, E. Franklin; Herskovits, Melville J.; Slave culture
- Fanon, Frantz, 187, 644, 658, 675, 764–766, 765 (photo), 837, 930. See also African imperialism
- Farmer, James, 723–724, 723 (photo), 725
- Farrakhan, Louis, 766–767, 823, 893–894, 910, 919, 1014–1015. See also Black Nationalism; Million Man March; Muhammad, Elijah; Nation of Islam; X, Malcolm
- Father Divine, 193, 767–768. See also Destination, Harlem, New York; Evangelism
- Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI), 605–606, 633, 661, 666–667, 671, 676, 678, 709–710, 733, 779, 809–810, 838, 931, 971, 989–990, 992, 1008, 1015, 1029, 1044, 1077. See also COINTELPRO
- Federal Council of Negro Affairs, 649–650
- Federal Negro Theater, 274
- The Federalist* (Jay), 450–451
- Federalist Papers*, 275
- Fellowship of Reconciliation (FOR), 722–723, 857, 1002–1003
- Ferdinand (Spanish King), 3, 42
- Field hands, 402. See also Gang system; Slave plantations
- Field hollers, 196. See also Africanisms; Blues music; Call-and-response; Douglass, Frederick; Field hands; Slave culture
- Field Order No. 15, 402–403, 774. See also Forty acres and a mule; Union Army
- Fields, Barbara, 87
- Fifteenth Amendment (U.S. Constitution), 456, 581, 668, 700, 768–770, 769, 854, 915, 959, 1047. See also Disfranchisement; Radical Republicans; Voting Rights Act of 1965
- Fillmore, Millard, 349
- Finley, Robert S., 462–463
- Finney, Charles G., 522, 523 (photo)
- First African Baptist Church (FABC), 404–405. See also Black churches; Underground Railroad
- First Amendment (U.S. Constitution), 939
- Fisher, Bernice, 300
- Fitzgerald, Ella, 196–198, 197 (photo), 739. See also Black Folk Culture; Jazz
- Five Percenters, 770–772. See also Black Nationalism; Nation of Islam
- Flash of the Spirit: African and Afro-American Art and Philosophy* (Thompson), 14
- Flying African stories, 198–199. See also Africanisms; Ebo Landing; Gullah; Transmigration
- Folk Beliefs of the Southern Negro* (Puckett), 259
- Ford, Gerald, 611, 946
- Foreign Anti-Slavery Society, 289
- Foreman, George, 611
- Forrest, Nathan Bedford, 353, 405–406
- Fort Pillow Massacre, 353, 405–406, 564. See also Ku Klux Klan; Union Army
- Forten, Charlotte, 407–408. See also Abolition, slavery; Forten, James
- Forten, James, 378, 409–410, 413, 461, 506, 573. See also Abolition, slavery; Cuffe, Paul; Destination, Haiti; Forten, Charlotte
- Fortune, T. Thomas, 772–773. See also Du Bois, W.E.B.; Garvey, Marcus; Universal Negro Improvement Association; Washington, Booker T.; Wells-Barnett, Ida
- Forty acres and a mule, 773–774. See also Field Order No. 15
- Foster, Rube, 923–924
- Foster, Stephen, 163
- Fourteenth Amendment (U.S. Constitution), 581, 598, 651, 655, 681–682, 700, 716, 774–775, 854, 915, 959, 960. See also Civil Rights Act of 1866; Dred Scott v. Sandford; Plessy v. Ferguson; Radical Republicans
- Franklin, John Hope, 776. See also Association for the Study of African American Life and History; Tulsa, Oklahoma, Riot of 1921
- Frazier, E. Franklin, 14, 68, 126, 194, 199–200, 259. See also Africanisms; Family patterns; Herskovits, Melville J.; Turner, Lorenzo Dow
- Frazier, Joe, 610–612, 648
- Frederickson, George M., 87
- Free African Society (FAS), 281, 298, 301, 325, 410–411, 457. See also Benevolent societies
- Free Persons of Colour Convention, 525
- Free Soil Party, 289–290, 349, 411–412, 412 (illustration), 484. See also Abolition, slavery; Brown, John; Fugitive Slave Act of 1850; Republican Party
- Freedmen’s Bureau, 777–778. See also Johnson, Andrew; Joint Committee of Fifteen; Radical Republicans
- Freedom Charter, 602
- Freedom dues, 44. See also Chesapeake Colonies; Headright system; Indentured servitude; Jamestown, Virginia
- Freedom Rides, 594, 724, 778–780, 834, 857, 861, 883, 913, 1038. See also CORE; Lewis, John; Nash, Diane; Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee
- Freedom Schools, 780–781. See also Mississippi Freedom Summer, 1964; Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee
- Freedom’s Journal*, 280–281, 295, 318, 347, 356–357, 413–414, 516–518, 569, 580. See also American Colonization Society; Cornish, Samuel; Crummell, Boston; Liberia; Russwurm, John
- French and Indian War, 278, 327
- French Revolution, 436–437, 471–472
- From “Superman” to Man* (Rogers), 249
- Fugitive Slave Act of 1793, 415–416, 521. See also Compromise of 1850; Fugitive Slave Act of 1850; Fugitive slaves
- Fugitive Slave Act of 1850, 282, 324, 340, 350, 359, 393, 416–417, 418

- (illustration), 423, 508, 521, 535, 538, 562, 758. See also Destination, Canada; Fugitive Slave Act of 1793; Fugitive slaves; Uncle Tom's Cabin; Underground Railroad
- Fugitive Slave Act of 1854, 373
- Fugitive slaves, 417–420. See also Destination, Canada; Fugitive Slave Act of 1793; Fugitive Slave Act of 1850; Underground Railroad
- Full immersion baptism, 200. See also Slave culture; Slave religion
- Futa Jallon, 44–45, 99. See also Senegambia; Sierra Leone
- Gabriel (Prosser), 420–421, 475, 534. See also Slave resistance
- Gabriel's Rebellion (Virginia), 279–280
- Gaines, John Pollard, 422–423
- Gandhi, Mahatma, 644, 1002
- Gang system, 422. See also Slave plantations; Task system
- Garner, Margaret, 422–424, 423 (illustration). See also Fugitive slaves; Slave resistance; Underground Railroad
- Garnet, Henry Highland, 293, 296, 307, 317, 318, 346, 363, 377, 393, 424–427, 425 (illustration), 479, 509–510, 537, 539, 569. See also African Civilization Society; Colored Convention Movement; Liberty Party
- Garrett, Thomas, 543
- Garrison, William Lloyd, 281, 303–304, 305, 324, 326, 343, 345, 388, 394, 397, 417, 427–430, 428 (photo), 435, 448, 461–462, 464, 488, 506, 508, 512, 513, 525, 549, 553, 573, 580. See also American and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society; American Anti-Slavery Society; Douglass, Frederick; Immediatism; the Liberator; Lincoln, Abraham; Tappan, Arthur; Tappan, Lewis
- Garvey, Marcus, 193, 257, 308, 593, 604, 605, 608, 612–613, 619, 631, 656–658, 666, 696, 773, 781–785, 783 (photo), 837, 875, 900–901, 902, 909, 935, 948, 953, 1010. See also Black Star Line; Pan-Africanism; Universal Negro Improvement Association
- Gates, Henry Louis, Jr., 258, 604, 926
- General Convention for the Improvement of the Free Colored People, 500
- Genius of Universal Emancipation*, 427
- Georgia Educational Association, 785–786. See also Black Nationalism; Freedmen's Bureau; Port Royal Experiment; Reconstruction Era black politicians
- Ghana, 45, 104–105. See also Mali; Sahel; Senegambia; Songhai; Sudanic Empires; Timbuktu; Tribute
- Gillespie, Dizzy, 143–144, 197, 216, 238–239
- Going through the Storm: The Influence of African Art in History* (Stuckey), 14
- Gold Coast, 28, 29, 30–31, 39, 40, 43, 45–46, 128, 130, 176, 184, 202, 876. See also Atlantic slave trade; Coromantee; Elmina; Kingdom of Asante; Nkrumah, Kwame
- Gomes, Diogo, 3
- Gomez, Michael, 127, 128
- Gone With the Wind*, 164
- Gofer dust, 200–201. See also Africanisms; Grave dirt; Hoodoo; New York Conspiracy of 1741; Slave culture
- Gorée Island, 46–47, 47 (photo), 99–100
- Gradual emancipation, 430–431. See also Abolition, slavery; Garrison, William Lloyd; Jefferson, Thomas; Lincoln, Abraham; Northern slavery
- Grand Old Party (GOP). See Republican Party
- Grandfather Clause, 786–787. See also Black Codes; Disfranchisement; Fifteenth Amendment; Jim Crow
- Granville, Jonathas, 329
- Gratz v. Bollinger*, 598
- Grave decorations, 201. See also Africanisms; Black Folk Culture; Hurston, Zora Neale; Kongo cosmogram; Laveau, Marie; Slave culture
- Grave dirt, 202. See also Africanisms; Black Folk Culture; Gofer dust
- Great Awakening, 431–433, 481. See also Abolition, slavery; Evangelism
- Great Depression (U.S.), 141, 155, 176
- Great Migration, 54, 677, 693, 733, 762, 787–790, 900, 926, 983, 1017. See also Black Nadir; Destination, Chicago, Illinois; Destination, Detroit, Michigan; Destination, Harlem, New York; Harlem Renaissance; Urbanization
- Green v. County School Board of New Kent County*, 688
- Greenberg, Jack, 681
- Griffith, D. W., 164, 854, 1050–1051
- Griggs, Sutton, 790–791, 1011. See also Accommodationism; Black Nationalism; Jim Crow; A Negro Nation Within the Nation; Self-segregation
- Grimke, Angelina and Sarah, 289, 304, 408, 433–436, 434 (illustration), 1046. See also Abolition, slavery; Garrison, William Lloyd
- Griot, 47–48, 79, 100, 106, 109. See also Mali; Occupational castes; Oral culture; Senegambia; Songhai; Sundiata: The Epic of Old Mali
- Gronniosaw, Ukawsaw, 5
- Grutter v. Bollinger*, 598
- Guinn v. United States*, 787
- Gulf of Guinea, 28, 48–49, 49 (illustration). See also Atlantic slave trade; Bight of Benin; Bight of Biafra; Bosman, Willem; Gold Coast; Kingdom of Dahomey; Sierra Leone
- Gullah, 31, 99, 136, 203–204. See also Black English; Pritchard, Gullah Jack; Ring shout; Sierra Leone; Slave culture; Sweetgrass baskets; Task system; Turner, Lorenzo Dow
- Gumba the Tyrant* film (Cheick Oumor Sissoko), 48
- Gumbo, 205. See also Black Folk Culture; Jambalaya
- Gutman, Herbert, 194
- Haitian Revolution, 375, 436–441, 469, 470–474, 475, 510, 520, 567, 569 foreign invasion, 438–439
Leclerc-Rochambeau expedition, 440–441
Louverture's reign, 438, 439–440
road to revolution, 436–437 slave uprising, 437–438
- Hale, John P., 411–412
- Hale v. Kentucky*, 812
- Haley, Alex, 48, 791–792. See also Atlantic slave trade; Senegambia; X, Malcolm
- Hall, Prince, 441–442. See also Abolition, slavery; American Revolution; Continental Army; Prince Hall Masonry
- Hamer, Fannie Lou, 792–794, 793 (photo), 896, 1042. See also Johnson, Lyndon Baines; MFDP; Poor People's Campaign; Student Non-violent Coordinating Committee
- Hamilton, Alexander, 296, 451, 452
- Hamilton, Charles V., 187
- Hamilton, Thomas, 316–317
- Hamilton, William, 442–444. See also Abolition, slave trade; Black Nationalism; Colored Convention Movement; Freedom's Journal; Pan-Africanism; Williams, Peter, Sr.
- Hammarskjöld, Dag, 687
- Hammon, Jupiter, 444–445. See also Abolition, slave trade; Abolition, slavery; Moral uplift
- Hampton, Fred, 671–672, 794–795. See also Black Panther Party; BPP,

- Chicago Branch; COINTELPRO;
Hoover, J. Edgar
Hampton, Lionel, 199
Handgrenades (Sanchez), 254
Harlem Globetrotters, 646–647
Harlem Renaissance, 122, 171, 209, 216, 226, 232, 234, 630, 646, 738–739, 790, 795–799, 816, 925–927, 984. See also Baraka, Amiri; Du Bois, W.E.B.; Father Divine; Garvey, Marcus; Hughes, Langston; Hurston, Zora Neale; Johnson, James Weldon; Locke, Alain LeRoy; New Negro Movement
Harper, Frances Ellen Watkins, 316, 318, 720, 1045
Harris, Joel Chandler, 260
Harrison, Benjamin, 809
Hayes, Rutherford B., 716–717, 719, 762, 799–800. See also Black Nadir; Compromise of 1877; Republican Party; White supremacy
Haytien Emigration Society, 356, 365, 577
Headright system, 49–50. See also Chesapeake Colonies; Freedom dues; Indentured servitude; Jamestown, Virginia; Patroonship; Tobacco
Hemings, Sally, 445–446. See also Jefferson, Thomas; Miscegenation
Herskovits, Melville J., 9–10, 14, 126–127, 150, 191, 194, 199–200, 205–207, 259, 949. See also Acculturation; Africanisms; Frazier, E. Franklin; Locke, Alain LeRoy; Slave culture; Turner, Lorenzo Dow
Heyrick, Elizabeth, 447
Higginson, Thomas Wentworth, 203–204, 290, 558–559
High John the Conqueror Root, 207. See also Black Folk Culture; Conjure; Hoodoo; Hurston, Zora Neale; Root doctors
Hill, Anita, 800–801. See also Thomas, Clarence
Hillard, Asa, 604
Hints to the Colored People (Shadd), 335
Hip-hop, 801–806. See also Black Folk Culture; Shakur, Tupac “2Pac” Amaru; Urbanization
Hispaniola, 41, 50–51, 51 (illustration). See also Asiento; Boyer, Jean Pierre; de Las Casas, Bartolomé; Encomienda; Haitian Revolution; Las Siete Partidas; Louverture, Toussaint
Historia de las Indias (de las Casas), 35
Historically Black Colleges and Universities, 806–809. See also Freedmen’s Bureau
Hitler, Adolf, 588–589, 648
Hollins v. Oklahoma, 812
Holloway, Joseph, 126–127
Holly, James Theodore, 316, 363
Holmes, Oliver Wendell, 751–752
Holy Koran (Ali, Noble Drew), 612–613
Homegirls (Sanchez), 254
Homestead Act (1862), 763
Hoodoo, 200–201, 207, 208–209. See also Black Folk Culture; Conjure; Hurston, Zora Neale; Laveau, Marie; Root doctors
Hoover, J. Edgar, 657, 661, 671, 794, 809–810, 992, 1008. See also Black Panther Party; COINTELPRO; Garvey, Marcus; King, Martin Luther, Jr.; National Association for the Advancement of Colored People
Hopkins, Charles T., 623–624
House servants, 446–447. See also Field hands; Hemings, Sally; Jacobs, Harriet; Newsom, Celia; Slave plantations
Houston, Charles Hamilton, 810–813, 811 (photo). See also Brown v. Board of Education; Jim Crow; Marshall, Thurgood; National Association for the Advancement of Colored People; Plessy v. Ferguson
Houston, Texas, Mutiny, 1917, 813–814. See also Jim Crow; National Association for the Advancement of Colored People; World War I (black participation in)
How I Wrote Jubilee (Turner), 271
Howard Beach Incident, 1986, 814–816. See also Bensonhurst, New York, Incident of 1989; Sharpton, Al; White mob violence
Howe, Samuel Gridley, 290
Hughes, Langston, 171, 217, 234, 630, 645, 739, 797–798, 816–820, 817 (photo), 925. See also Harlem Renaissance; Hurston, Zora Neale; Locke, Alain LeRoy; National Association for the Advancement of Colored People; New Negro Movement
The Human Factor in Changing Africa (Herskovits), 207
Hurd v. Hodge, 812
Hurry Up America, and Spit (Bailey), 142
Hurston, Zora Neale, 201, 207, 208, 209–211, 210 (photo), 797, 818, 925. See also Black Folk Culture; Harlem Renaissance; Hoodoo; Hughes, Langston; New Negro Movement
Hurt, “Mississippi” John, 167
Hush harbors, 212. See also Slave culture; Slave religion
“If We Must Die” (McKay), 820–821. See also Black self-defense; Chicago Race Riot of 1919; Harlem Renaissance; McKay, Claude; Red Summer Race Riots
Igbo, 52–53, 128, 188, 203. See also Buckra; Coromantee; Ebo Landing; Transmigration
Immediatism, 447–448. See also Abolition, slavery; Garrison, William Lloyd; the Liberator; Liberty Party
Immigration Act of 1965, 701
In Montgomery and Other Poems (Brooks), 171
In the Castle of My Skin (Lammings), 277
In the Mecca (Brooks), 171
Indentured servitude, 53–55, 60. See also Bacon’s Rebellion; Chesapeake Colonies; Freedom dues; Headright system; Jamestown, Virginia; Johnson, Anthony; Malaria; Tobacco
Indian Removal Act (1830), 156, 524
Infanticide, 212–213. See also Garner, Margaret; Slave resistance
The Interesting Life of Olaudah Equiano or Gustavus Vassa, the African (Equiano), 399
Invisible Man (Ellison), 752–754
Isabella (Spanish Queen), 3, 41–42
Isichei, Elizabeth, 8
Islam, 44–45, 116–117, 901–902
Italo-Ethiopian War, 759–760
Jackson, Andrew, 158, 292, 306, 308, 524. See also American Colonization Society
Jackson, George, 731, 1030–1031
Jackson, Jesse, 615, 821–824, 823 (photo), 893, 942–943, 969, 1018. See also Abernathy, Ralph David; CORE; Farrakhan, Louis; King, Martin Luther, Jr.; Obama, Barack; Operation PUSH; Southern Christian Leadership Conference
Jackson, Maynard, 824–827
Jackson, Michael, 272
Jacobs, Harriet, 449–450. See also Douglass, Frederick; Fugitive Slave Act of 1850; Fugitive slaves; House servants; Slave resistance
Jambalaya, 213–214. See also Africanisms; Black Folk Culture; Gumbo
James, William Laurence, 196
James Meredith March Against Fear (1966), 663, 666, 690
Jamestown, Virginia, 49–50, 55–58, 57 (illustration), 84–85, 93–94, 113–114. See also Bacon’s Rebellion; Chesapeake Colonies; Freedom

- dues; Headright system; Indentured servitude; Racialized slavery; Rolfe, John
- Jas, 214–215. See also Africanisms; Black Folk Culture; Jazz
- Jay, John, 296, 450–452, 451 (illustration), 550. See also Abolition, slavery; American Revolution; Gradual emancipation
- Jazz, 138–139, 143–144, 151, 190, 215–217. See also Africanisms; Armstrong, Louis; Bebop; Black Folk Culture; Coltrane, John; Congo Square, New Orleans; Davis, Miles; Fitzgerald, Ella; Gillespie, Dizzy; Jas; Parker, Charlie; Ragtime
- The Jazz Singer* (Jolson), 164
- Jefferson, Thomas, 132, 276, 280, 288, 332, 370–372, 420, 431, 445–446, 452, 452–453, 462, 469, 571, 849. See also American Revolution; Bancker, Benjamin; Declaration of Independence; Gabriel (Prosser); Haitian Revolution; Hemings, Sally; Louisiana Purchase
- Jeffries, Leonard, 604
- Jennings, Elizabeth, 454–455. See also Douglass, Frederick; Garnet, Henry Highland; Jennings, Thomas L.; New York Draft Riots; Pennington, James William Charles
- Jennings, Thomas L., 344, 394, 455–456, 577. See also Abolition, slavery; Colored Convention Movement; Destination, Haiti; Jennings, Elizabeth; Williams, Peter, Jr.
- Jet* magazine, 827–828. See also Ebony magazine; King, Martin Luther, Jr.; Montgomery Bus Boycott; Till, Emmett
- Jim Crow, 32, 150, 151, 159–162, 194, 224, 252, 592, 614, 624, 655, 668, 701, 715, 719, 722, 727, 732, 745, 787, 789, 825, 828–829, 917, 933, 935, 962, 978, 987, 1002, 1005, 1040. See also Black Nadir; Brown v. Board of Education; Civil Rights Act of 1964; Montgomery Bus Boycott; Plessy v. Ferguson
- John, Prester, 58–59. See also Reconquista
- John the Slave tales, 218. See also Black Folk Culture; Hurston, Zora Neale; Slave culture
- Johnson, Andrew, 355, 460, 546, 651, 698–699, 719, 774, 777, 829–831, 975. See also Black Codes; Freedmen's Bureau; Joint Committee of Fifteen; Lincoln, Abraham; Radical Republicans
- Johnson, Anthony, 5–6, 56–57, 59–60. See also Chesapeake Colonies; Freedom dues; Indentured servitude; Jamestown, Virginia; Tobacco
- Johnson, Earvin, 647
- Johnson, Jack, 230–231
- Johnson, James Weldon, 13, 171, 217, 232, 630, 739, 797–798, 818, 925, 928–929
- Johnson, John Harold, 749–750
- Johnson, Lyndon Baines, 598, 605, 669, 700, 701, 703 (photo), 711, 829, 831–836, 832 (photo), 837, 840, 845 (photo), 892, 964, 968, 978, 1013, 1081–1083, 1082 (photo). See also Civil Rights Act of 1964; Civil Rights Act of 1968; Hoover, J. Edgar; Kennedy, John Fitzgerald; Kerner Commission Report; King, Martin Luther, Jr.; Voting Rights Act of 1965; War on poverty
- Johnson, Robert, 167
- Joint Committee of Fifteen, 836–837. See also Civil Rights Act of 1866; Douglass, Frederick; Fifteenth Amendment; Fourteenth Amendment; Freedmen's Bureau; Radical Republicans
- Jolson, Al, 164
- Jones, Absalom, 298, 301, 318, 325, 410, 457–458, 523. See also African Methodist Episcopal Church; Allen, Richard; Benevolent societies
- Jones v. Alfred H. Mayer Co.*, 550
- Joplin, Scott, 218–220, 219 (photo), 246. See also Ragtime
- Juba dance, 220. See also Angolan/Kongolese; Black Folk Culture; Kongo cosmogram; Ring shout; West-Central Africa
- Judgkins, Steveland Hardaway. See Wonder, Steve
- Kansas-Nebraska Act, 1854, 290–291, 331, 412, 458–459, 465, 469. See also Brown, John; Louisiana Purchase; Missouri Compromise
- Karenga, Maulana, 222, 604, 619, 837–838, 920, 1076–1077. See also Afrocentricity; Asante, Molefi Kete; Black Power; Kwanzaa; National Council for Black Studies; US Organization
- Kathrada, Ahmed, 602
- Kennedy, John Fitzgerald, 136, 597–598, 680, 703, 833–834, 838–841, 857, 911. See also Castro, Fidel; Civil Rights Act of 1964; Hoover, J. Edgar; Johnson, Lyndon Baines; King, Martin Luther, Jr.; March on Washington Movement, 1963; Marshall, Thurgood; Voting Rights Act of 1965
- Kennedy, Robert F., 616, 780, 841–842, 848–849, 913, 966. See also Civil Rights Act of 1964; Freedom Rides; Hoover, J. Edgar; Kennedy, John Fitzgerald; King, Coretta Scott; King, Martin Luther, Jr.; Los Angeles, California, Riot of 1965; Meredith, James
- Kenyatta, Jomo, 842–844, 844 (photo). See also African imperialism; Du Bois, W.E.B.; Nkrumah, Kwame; Pan-Africanism
- Kerner Commission Report, 844–845, 964. See also Johnson, Lyndon Baines; Long Hot Summer Riots, 1965–1967; Urban ghetto; War on poverty
- King, Albert, 5
- King, B. B., 167–168
- King, Coretta Scott, 615–616, 846–847. See also Antiapartheid movement; King, Martin Luther, Jr.; Southern Christian Leadership Conference
- King, Martin Luther, Jr., 146, 175, 224, 272, 300, 515, 594, 604, 607, 614, 634, 635, 644, 666, 669, 687, 703–704, 706, 713, 723, 794, 805, 832–833, 832 (photo), 840, 846, 847–851, 879, 882, 890–891, 893, 942, 964, 978, 998, 1003–1004, 1012–1014, 1020, 1031–1033, 1040. See also Abernathy, Ralph David; Affirmative action; Baker, Ella; Bombingham; Civil Rights movement; COINTELPRO; King, Coretta Scott; March on Washington Movement, 1963; Montgomery Bus Boycott; Poor People's Campaign; Southern Christian Leadership Conference; Selma March
- King, Rodney, 867–869, 970
- Kingdom of Asante, 60–61. See also Atlantic slave trade; Elmina; Gold Coast
- Kingdom of Benin, 61. See also African imperialism; Atlantic slave trade; Bight of Benin; Gulf of Guinea
- Kingdom of Dahomey, 25–26, 61–62, 176. See also African imperialism; Atlantic slave trade; Bight of Benin; Gulf of Guinea
- Knights of Pythias fraternal society, 155
- Kongo cosmogram, 136, 169, 201, 220–221, 221 (illustration), 268. See also Flying African stories; Juba

- dance; Kongo Kingdom; Ring shout; Transmigration
- Kongo Kingdom, 36, 38, 62, 118, 119–121, 152. See also Kongo cosmogram; Mbebma, Nzinga (Afonso I); Vita, Dona Beatriz-Kimpa; West-Central Africa
- Korean War (black participation in), 851–853. See also Cold War and civil rights; Du Bois, W.E.B.; Jim Crow; Robeson, Paul
- Kourouma, Ahmadou, 48
- The Krio Language of the Sierra Leone* (Turner), 269
- Krio Texts: With Grammatical Notes and Translation in English* (Turner), 269
- Ku Klux Klan, 271, 353, 406, 498–499, 514, 529, 599, 618, 631, 665, 729, 779, 789, 853–856, 872, 874, 884, 970, 975, 983, 989, 1050–1051. See also The Birth of a Nation; Fifteenth Amendment; Fourteenth Amendment; Lynching; White Citizens' Council; White mob violence; White supremacy
- Kwanzaa, 221–223, 604–605. See also Afrocentricity; Black Power; Karinga, Maulana; US Organization
- Ladies Literary Society, 296
- Lammings, George, 277
- Langston, John Mercer, 316, 459–461, 459 (photo). See also Abolition, slavery; Destination, Canada; Reconstruction Era black politicians; Republican Party; Underground Railroad
- Las Siete Partidas*, 63–64. See also Atlantic slave trade; Hispaniola
- Laurens, Henry, 29, 64. See also American Revolution; Bunce Island; Carolinas; Jay, John; Rice cultivation; Sierra Leone
- Laveau, Marie, 152, 181, 211, 223–224. See also Conjure; Hoodoo; Hurston, Zora Neale
- Law, Robin, 7
- Laws of Burgos (1512–1513), 42
- Lawson, James, 856–858. See also CORE; Freedom Rides; King, Martin Luther, Jr.; Lewis, John; Nash, Diane; Southern Christian Leadership Conference; Sit-In movement; Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee
- LCFO (Lowndes County Freedom Organization), 663–664, 689, 870–871. See also Black Panther Party; Black Power; Carmichael, Stokely; MFDP; Mississippi Freedom Summer Project, 1964; Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee
- League of Gileadites, 535
- League of Nations, 250, 759–760, 764, 950, 952, 954, 1009–1010, 1011
- League of Revolutionary Black Workers, 858–859. See also Detroit, Michigan, Riot of 1967
- League of Struggle for Negro Rights, 618
- Leclerc-Rochambeau expedition (Haitian revolution), 440–441
- Lee, Robert E., 353
- Lee, Spike, 164–165, 272, 859–860, 860 (photo). See also The Birth of a Nation; Bombingham; Million Man March; X, Malcolm
- Légitime Défense*, 233–234
- Lemon, Meadowlark, 646
- Lenin, V. I., 658, 859, 1030
- Levine, Lawrence, 13, 14, 275
- Lewis, John, 669, 860–862, 893, 1012. See also Black Power; Bloody Sunday; Freedom Rides; Lawson, James; March on Washington Movement, 1963; Mississippi Freedom Summer Project, 1964; Selma March; Sit-In movement; Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee
- The Liberator*, 428–429, 431, 435, 448, 461–462, 488, 511, 525, 542, 580. See also Abolition, slavery; Garrison, William Lloyd; Thirteenth Amendment
- Liberia, 14, 30, 288, 294, 299, 307–308, 358, 362–363, 462–463, 510, 518, 822, 948, 954. See also Abolition, slavery; American Colonization Society; Crummell, Alexander; Crummell, Boston; Destination, Sierra Leone
- Liberty Party, 426, 448, 463–464, 508, 536, 539. See also Abolition, slavery; American Anti-Slavery Society; Birney, James; Free Soil Party; Garrison, William Lloyd; Smith, Gerrit; Tappan, Lewis
- Liele, George, 404
- Lincoln, Abraham, 351, 354, 369, 372, 373, 390, 429, 458, 464–467, 489, 545–546, 554, 621, 652, 719, 756 (photo), 762, 763, 830, 849, 941, 975, 1035. See also Abolition, slavery; American Colonization Society; Civil War (U.S.); Clay, Henry; Compromise of 1850; Emancipation Proclamation; Kansas-Nebraska Act, 1854; Missouri Compromise; Union Army
- Liston, Sonny, 609
- Literacy tests, 743, 770, 787, 834, 870–871, 897, 975, 1082, 1103
- Little Rock Nine, 634, 862–863. See also Bates, Daisy; Brown v. Board of Education; National Association for the Advancement of Colored People
- Locke, Alain LeRoy, 13, 224–227, 225 (illustration), 795–799, 925–926. See also Du Bois, W.E.B.; Harlem Renaissance; New Negro Movement; Woodson, Carter Godwin
- Long Hot Summer Riots, 1965–1967, 863–864. See also Detroit, Michigan, Riot of 1967; Johnson, Lyndon Baines; Kerner Commission Report; Los Angeles, California, Riot of 1965
- Loose pack, 65. See also Abolition, slave trade; Atlantic slave trade; Factors; Royal African Company; Tight pack
- Lord Dunmore, 33, 311–312, 355, 468–469. See also American Revolution; Fugitive slaves; Slave resistance
- Los Angeles, California, Riot of 1965, 865–867. See also Johnson, Lyndon Baines; Kerner Commission Report; Long Hot Summer Riots, 1965–1967; Urban ghetto; Urbanization
- Los Angeles, California, Riot of 1992, 867–869. See also Los Angeles, California, Riot of 1965; Urban ghetto; Urbanization
- Los Angeles Negro Victory Committee, 632
- Louima, Abner, 869–870. See also Sharpton, Al
- Louisiana Purchase, 109, 469, 470 (illustration), 527. See also Haitian Revolution; Jefferson, Thomas; Kansas-Nebraska Act, 1854; Missouri Compromise
- Louverture, Toussaint, 50–51, 329, 438, 439–440, 470–474, 471 (illustration), 534, 567. See also Destination, Haiti; Haitian Revolution; Slave resistance
- Louverture's reign (1798–1802), 439–440
- A Love Supreme* (Coltrane), 180
- Loving v. Virginia* (1967) court case, 231, 232
- Lundy, Benjamin, 345
- Lutz, Charles, 352
- Lynching, 871–874, 1034. See also Anti-lynching campaign; Ku Klux Klan; National Association for the Advancement of Colored People; Wells-Barnett, Ida; White mob violence

- Maddox, Lester, 610
- Madison, James, 288, 367, 462, 550
- Malaria, 65–66. See also Atlantic slave trade; Chesapeake Colonies; Gulf of Guinea; Hispaniola
- Mali, 48, 66–68, 67 (photo), 74, 104–106. See also Ghana; Musa, Mansa; Sahel; Senegambia; Songhai; Sudanic Empires; Sundiata: The Epic of Old Mali
- Malinke clan, 105–106
- Man and His Works* (Herskovitz), 207
- Manchester Conference, 1945, 874–876, 954. See also African imperialism; Du Bois, W.E.B.; Garvey, Marcus; Gold Coast; Kenyatta, Jomo; Nkrumah, Kwame; Organization of African Unity; Pan-African Congress; Pan-Africanism
- Mandela, Nelson, 47, 601–602, 613, 877–880. See also African imperialism; African National Congress; Anti-apartheid movement; Biko, Steve; Castro, Fidel
- Mandenka (People of Mande) clan, 105
- Mannix, Daniel P., 65
- Manumission, 63, 72, 117, 278, 281, 287–288, 296, 301, 306, 308, 325, 344, 475–476. See also Abolition, slavery; Gradual emancipation; New York Manumission Society
- Many Thousands Gone* (Berlin), 5
- March on Washington Movement, 1941, 880–882. See also Brotherhood of Sleeping Car Porters; March on Washington Movement, 1963; National Association for the Advancement of Colored People; Randolph, A. Philip; Roosevelt, Eleanor; White, Walter
- March on Washington Movement, 1963, 882–885. See also Abernathy, Ralph David; Anderson, Marian; Bates, Daisy; Civil Rights Act of 1964; Kennedy, John Fitzgerald; King, Martin Luther, Jr.; Lewis, John; March on Washington Movement, 1941; National Association for the Advancement of Colored People; Rustin, Bayard; Southern Christian Leadership Conference; Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee; X, Malcolm
- Mardis Gras (New Orleans), 228–229, 228 (photo). See also Armstrong, Louis; Black Folk Culture; Congo Square, New Orleans
- Maroon societies, 476–478. See also Dismal swamp maroons; Fugitive slaves; Slave resistance
- Marshall, John, 288, 738
- Marshall, Thurgood, 681–682, 703 (photo), 801, 811, 840, 885–886, 886 (photo), 1054. See also Brown v. Board of Education; Houston, Charles Hamilton; Johnson, Lyndon Baines; National Association for the Advancement of Colored People; Thomas, Clarence
- Marx, Karl, 658, 930, 935, 1030
- Massachusetts Anti-Slavery Society, 388, 511, 513
- Massachusetts General Colored Association (MGCA), 569
- Massachusetts 54th Regiment, 478–481, 480 (illustration), 563. See also Douglass, Frederick; Lincoln, Abraham; Union Army
- Material (physical) folklore, 150
- Matrilinial societies, 68–69. See also Coromantee; Gold Coast; Kingdom of Asante
- Matthews, Victoria Earle, 886–887. See also Antilynching campaign; National Association of Colored Women; Wells-Barnett, Ida
- Maud Martha* (Brooks), 171
- Mbande, Njinga. See Queen Nzinga (Njinga Mbande)
- Mbebma, Nzinga (Afonso I), 69–70. See also Kongo Kingdom; West-Central Africa
- McBride, A. J., 623–624
- McCain, John, 941
- McCarthy, Joseph, 582–583
- McCone Commission, 865–866
- McDaniel, Hattie, 164
- McDermott, Gerald, 133
- McKay, Claude, 234, 820–821, 888, 925. See also Chicago Race Riot of 1919; Harlem Renaissance; “If We Must Die”; New Negro Movement; Red Summer Race Riots
- McKissack, Floyd, 725
- McLaurin v. Oklahoma State Regents*, 681
- Me Against the World* (Tupac), 256
- Media stereotypes, 889–890. See also BET; The Birth of a Nation; Jim Crow
- Mencken, H. L., 273
- Meredith, James, 890–891, 891 (photo). See also Black conservatives; Kennedy, John Fitzgerald; Republican Party; White mob violence
- Metcalf, Ralph, 590
- Methodist camp meetings, 481–482. See also Evangelism; Ring shout; Second Great Awakening
- Mexican-American War, 340, 368
- Mexican War, 289, 293, 349, 411, 463, 483–484, 527. See also Free Soil Party; Missouri Compromise
- MFDP (Mississippi Freedom Democratic Party), 625–626, 656, 724, 793, 861, 870–871, 891–893, 895–896, 906, 939, 1040–1041. See also Baker, Ella; Disfranchisement; Hamer, Fannie Lou; Johnson, Lyndon Baines; Lowndes County Freedom Organization; Literacy tests; Mississippi Freedom Summer, 1964; Moses, Robert; Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee; Voting Rights Act of 1965
- MFSP. See Mississippi Freedom Summer Project, 1964
- Middle colonies, 70–72. See also African Burial Ground, New York City; African Methodist Episcopal Church; Dutch New Netherland; Dutch West India Company; Gradual emancipation; New England colonies; New York Conspiracy of 1741; Northern slavery; Patroonship; Pinkster Festival
- Middle Passage, 17, 19, 22–23, 25, 46, 65, 111, 128, 191, 284, 399–400, 530, 578, 591–592
- Million Man March, 605, 657, 717, 767, 893–894, 901, 919, 1015. See also Clinton, William Jefferson; Farakhan, Louis; March on Washington Movement, 1963; Nation of Islam
- Mintz, Sidney, 10, 126, 130, 191
- Mis-Education of the Negro* (Woodson), 187
- Miscegenation, 229–231. See also Amalgamation; Mulatto; Quadroon
- Mississippi Freedom Summer Project, 1964, 780–781, 894–897, 906. See also Carmichael, Stokely; CORE; Freedom Schools; Hamer, Fannie Lou; MFDP; Moses, Robert; National Association for the Advancement of Colored People; Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee; Voting Rights Act of 1965
- Missouri Compromise, 290, 292, 340, 458, 465, 469, 484–485. See also Compromise of 1850; Kansas-Nebraska Act, 1854; Louisiana Purchase
- Missouri ex. rel. Gaines v. Canada*, 812
- Monk, Thelonious, 179, 216, 238
- Monroe, James, 288, 307, 462, 534
- Montgomery Bus Boycott, 678, 897–900, 955–957, 996–997. See also Brown v. Board of Education; Jim Crow; King, Coretta Scott; King, Martin Luther, Jr.; Parks, Rosa; Rustin, Bayard; White Citizens’ Councils
- Moore, Queen Mother Audley, 900–901. See also Black Nationalism;

- Garvey, Marcus; Million Man March; Universal Negro Improvement Association
- Moorish Science Temple, 901–902, 909, 918. See also Ali, Noble Drew; Black Nationalism; Garvey, Marcus; Great Migration; Universal Negro Improvement Association
- Moral Rearmament (MRA) Conference, 643
- Moral uplift, 485–488. See also Cornish, Samuel; Douglass, Frederick; Du Bois, W.E.B.; Hammon, Jupiter; Washington, Booker T.
- Morrison, Toni, 189, 902–904, 903 (photo). See also Davis, Angela; Ebo Landing; Haley, Alex; Transmigration
- Moses, Robert, 904–907. See also Carmichael, Stokely; MFDP; Mississippi Freedom Summer, 1964; National Association for the Advancement of Colored People; Rustin, Bayard; Southern Christian Leadership Conference; Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee
- Mother Bethel Church, 411
- Mott, Lucretia, 507, 512
- MOVE bombing, 595, 907–908. See also Black Power
- Moynihan, Daniel P., 194
- Mudimbe, V. Y., 2
- Muhammad, Askia, 114–116
- Muhammad, Elijah, 258, 593, 604, 609, 767, 770, 908–911, 909 (photo), 918. See also Ali, Muhammad; Black Nationalism; Destination, Detroit, Michigan; Farrakhan, Louis; Nation of Islam; X, Malcolm
- Muhammad, Farrad, 656, 770, 910, 918
- Mulatto, 231–232. See also Amalgamation; Miscegenation
- Mules and Men* (Hurston), 211, 224
- Murray v. Pearson*, 885
- Musa, Mansa, 68, 73–74, 112–113, 116. See also Mali; Sudanic Empires; Timbuktu
- Muslim religion, 58–59, 88–90, 107, 117
- The Myth of the Negro Past* (Herskovits), 9–10, 14, 126, 191, 200, 207, 259
- NAACP (National Association for the Advancement of Colored People), 155, 187, 209, 224–225, 274, 507, 584, 592, 599, 617, 617 (photo), 623, 625–626, 631, 633–634, 666, 668, 681, 691, 696–697, 703, 713, 722, 739, 748, 751, 760, 761, 794, 810, 812, 814, 820, 840, 847, 862, 873, 875, 882, 894, 905, 913–916, 930, 955, 974, 984, 995, 1002, 1011, 1019–1020, 1040, 1054. See also Antipartheid movement; Antilynching campaign; Du Bois, W.E.B.; Houston, Charles Hamilton; Jim Crow; Marshall, Thurgood; Niagara Movement; Springfield Race Riot of 1908; Terrell, Mary Church; Wells-Barnett, Ida; White, Walter; Wilkins, Roy
- NACW (National Association of Colored Women), 557, 642, 916–917, 921. See also Antilynching campaign; Bethune, Mary McCloud; Pan-Africanism; Terrell, Mary Church; Tubman, Harriet; Universal Negro Improvement Association; Wells-Barnett, Ida
- Names debate, 232–233. See also Cornish, Samuel; Whipper, William
- The Narrative of Sojourner Truth: A Northern Slave* (Garrison), 553
- Narrative of the Life of Frederick Douglass* (Douglass), 260, 290, 389, 400
- Nash, Diane, 911–913. See also Baker, Ella; Freedom Rides; Lawson, James; Lewis, John; Southern Christian Leadership Conference; Sit-In movement; Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee
- Nashville Christian Leadership Conference (NCLC), 912
- Nation of Islam, 605, 609, 612–613, 656, 710, 766–767, 770–771, 802, 823, 884, 908–910, 918–919, 919, 945. See also Ali, Muhammad; Black Nationalism; Farrakhan, Louis; Million Man March; Muhammad, Elijah; X, Malcolm
- National Baptist Convention of the United States (NBCUSA), 146
- National Colored Convention, 293, 303, 347, 426, 509, 510
- National Convention of Colored Americans and Their Friends, 501
- National Council for Black Studies, 920–921. See also Afrocentricity; Asante, Molefi Kete
- National Council of Negro Women (NCNW), 642, 901, 917, 921–922, 999. See also Bethune, Mary McCloud; Black Cabinet; National Association of Colored Women; Roosevelt, Eleanor; Terrell, Mary Church
- National Council of the Colored People (NCCP), 539
- National Equal Rights League, 460
- National Free Colored People's Convention, 501
- National Negro Business League, 652
- National Urban League, 722
- National Woman's Suffrage Association, 1045–1046
- National Youth Administration (NYA), 642–643
- National Youth Movement (NYM), 1018
- Nations of Gods and Earth (NGE). See Five Percenters
- Native Americans, 41–42, 49–50, 108, 132, 192, 205, 230, 380
- Native Son* (Wright), 273
- Neau, Elias, 101
- Negritude, 233–235, 234 (photo). See also Harlem Renaissance; New Negro Movement
- The Negro Family: The Case for National Action* (Moynihan), 194
- The Negro Family in the United States* (Frazier), 14, 199–200
- Negro History Bulletin*, 621
- Negro History Week, 621
- Negro League Baseball, 923–924. See also Black athletes; Jim Crow; Robinson, Jackie
- A Negro Nation Within the Nation, 592–593, 1012. See also Black Nationalism; Black Power; Du Bois, W.E.B.; National Association for the Advancement of Colored People; Self-segregation
- Negro Seamen Act, 568, 924–925. See also Vesey, Denmark
- Negro Voters League, 606
- Negroes Burying Ground. See African Burial Ground, New York City
- Nell, William Cooper, 294, 316, 479, 488–489, 501. See also Abolition, slavery; Douglass, Frederick; Free Soil Party; Fugitive Slave Act of 1850; Underground Railroad
- A New and Accurate Description of the Coast of Guinea* (Bosman), 28
- New Black Panther Party (NBPP), 656
- New England Anti-Slavery Society (NEASS), 305, 345, 428
- New England colonies, 74–75, 146. See also Attucks, Crispus; Election Day; Northern slavery; Tituba; Wheatley, Phillis
- New National Era*, 391
- New Negro Movement, 234, 925–927, 984. See also Du Bois, W.E.B.; Harlem Renaissance; Hughes, Langston; Locke, Alain LeRoy; McKay, Claude; Negritude
- New Orleans. See Congo Square, New Orleans; Mardis Gras
- New Orleans Riot of 1900, 927–928. See also Jim Crow; Lynching; Turner, Henry McNeil; Wells-Barnett, Ida; White mob violence
- New Panther Vanguard Movement, 656

- New York Anti-Slavery Society, 456, 509, 511, 536, 572, 580
- New York City, African Burial Ground, 10–12, 268
- New York Committee of Vigilance, 516
- New York Conspiracy of 1741, 71–72, 75–76, 76 (photo), 202. See also New York Revolt of 1712; Slave resistance
- New York Draft Riots, 489–491. See also Union Army; White mob violence
- New York Manumission Society, 296, 424, 516
- New York Revolt of 1712, 76–77. See also African Burial Ground, New York City; Coromantee; New York Conspiracy of 1741; Northern slavery; Slave resistance; Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts
- New York Silent March of 1917, 928–930, 929 (photo)
- New York Society for the Promotion of Education Among Colored Children, 358
- New York State National Guard (NYSNG), 490–491
- New York State Vigilance Committee (NYSVC), 508
- Newark Rebellion, 628
- Newsom, Celia, 491–492. See also Slave resistance
- Newton, Huey P., 245, 593, 656, 660, 661–662, 675–676, 678, 706, 707, 710, 930–932, 1008 (photo), 1012, 1030. See also Black Panther Party; Black Power; Brown, Elaine; Cleaver, Eldridge; COINTELPRO; Seale, Bobby
- Newton, John, 77–78, 111. See also Abolition, slave trade; Atlantic slave trade
- Niagara Movement, 913, 932–934. See also Du Bois, W.E.B.; Jim Crow; National Association for the Advancement of Colored People; Springfield Race Riot of 1908; Trotter, William Monroe
- Nicodemus, Kansas, 934. See also Black Nationalism; Exoduster movement; Singleton, Benjamin “Pap”
- Nigerian Hinterland Project, 127
- 1936 Summer Olympics, Berlin, 588–590. See also Black athletes; Owens, Jesse
- 1968 Summer Olympics, Mexico City, 591–592, 614. See also Black athletes; Black Power
- Nineteenth Amendment (U.S. Constitution), 768, 1047
- Nixon, Richard, 598, 615, 697, 836, 839, 972
- Nkrumah, Kwame, 658, 876, 935–938, 936 (photo), 950, 1003. See also African imperialism; Du Bois, W.E.B.; Garvey, Marcus; Manchester Conference 1945; Pan-African Congress; Pan-Africanism
- Nobles, Wade, 604
- Non-Violent Action Group (NAG), 605
- Northern slavery, 492–495. See also Middle colonies; New England colonies; New York Conspiracy of 1741; New York Revolt of 1712; Pinkster Festival
- Northup, Solomon, 400–401, 495–496, 496 (illustration). See also Abolition, slavery
- Norton, Eleanor Holmes, 718, 938–940, 939 (photo)
- Norton, Ken, 611
- Notes on the State of Virginia* (Jefferson), 132, 452–453, 571
- Notes on Virginia* (Jefferson), 280
- NUL (National Urban League), 668
- Obama, Barack, 515, 708, 824, 940–942, 941 (photo), 970. See also Clinton, William Jefferson; Congressional Black Caucus
- Obeah, 236–237. See also Conjure; Coromantee; Igbo; Slave religion
- Obenge, Theophile, 604
- Occupational castes, 79–80. See also Ghana; Senegambia; Sudanic Empires
- Octoroon, 237. See also Amalgamation; Miscegenation; Mulatto; Quadroon
- Odd Fellows fraternal society, 155
- Olajuwon, Hakeem, 646
- Olympic Project for Human Rights (OPHR), 591
- Operation PUSH, 822, 942–943. See also Abernathy, Ralph David; Jackson, Jesse; Southern Christian Leadership Conference
- Oral culture, 80–81, 150. See also Griot; Sundiata: The Epic of Old Mali
- Organization of African Unity (OAU), 615, 656, 901, 936, 943–944, 954–955, 992, 1010, 1076–1077. See also African imperialism; African National Congress; Anti-apartheid movement; Nkrumah, Kwame; Pan-Africanism
- Organization of Afro-American Unity (OAAU), 944–945, 992. See also Black Nationalism; Organization of African Unity; Pan-Africanism; X, Malcolm
- Organization of American States (OAS), 737
- Oswald, Richard, 29
- Ovando, Nicolas de, 41–42
- Overseers, 496–498, 497 (photo). See also Slave plantations
- Owens, Jesse, 589, 590, 592, 805, 945–947, 946 (photo). See also Black athletes; 1936 Summer Olympics, Berlin
- Pace v. Alabama* (1883) court case, 231
- Paige, Leroy “Satchel,” 647
- Paine, Tom, 371
- Pan-African Congress (PAC), 602, 874, 878, 935, 947–951. See also African imperialism; Du Bois, W.E.B.; Garvey, Marcus; Kenyatta, Jomo; Manchester Conference, 1945; Nkrumah, Kwame; Pan-Africanism
- Pan African Orthodox Christian Church (PAOCC), 257, 258
- Pan-Africanism, 129, 187, 376, 443, 567, 568, 690, 875, 901, 935, 951–954, 998. See also Du Bois, W.E.B.; Garvey, Marcus; Manchester Conference, 1945; Nkrumah, Kwame; Organization of African Unity; Pan-African Congress
- Parker, Charlie, 143–144, 167, 185, 216, 237–239. See also Bebop; Black Folk Culture; Jazz
- Parker, Theodore, 290
- Parks, Rosa, 847, 893, 898–900, 913, 955–957, 956 (photo), 996–997. See also King, Coretta Scott; King, Martin Luther, Jr.; Montgomery Bus Boycott; Robinson, Jo Ann
- Parris, Samuel, 266–267. See also Tituba “The Pathology of Race Prejudice” (Frazier), 199
- Patrollers, 498–499. See also Overseers; Slave codes; Slave plantations
- Patroonship, 81. See also Dutch New Netherland; Dutch West India Company; Headright system; Middle Colonies
- Patterson, Floyd, 609
- Patterson, Mary Jane, 721
- Paul, Nathaniel, 413
- Payne, Daniel A., 299, 316, 499–500. See also African Methodist Episcopal Church; Historically Black Colleges and Universities; Southern free blacks; Tappan, Arthur; Tappan, Lewis; Williams, Peter, Jr.
- Peace and Freedom Party, 706
- Pearl’s Kitchen* (Bailey), 142

- Pennington, James William Charles, 294, 316, 317, 337, 489, 500–502. See also Abolition, slavery; American Anti-Slavery Society; Douglass, Frederick; Fugitive slaves
- Pennsylvania Abolitionist Society, 281
- Pennsylvania Anti-Slavery Society, 543
- People United to Save Humanity. See Operation PUSH
- Peters, Thomas, 377–378
- Petersen, Edmund, 653–654
- Philadelphia Vigilance Committee, 543
- Phillips, Wendell, 305
- Phoenix Society, 365, 456
- Piersen, William D., 14
- Pinkster Festival, 239–241. See also Dutch New Netherland; Middle colonies
- Plan de San Diego, 957–958. See also Lynching; Mexican War; Texas Revolution; White mob violence
- Plantation slavery, 31
- “A Plea for the Poor: or, A Word of Remembrance and Caution for the Rich” (Woolman), 124
- Plessy v. Ferguson*, 549, 582, 624, 655, 668, 680–682, 775, 789, 828, 885, 959–962. See also Brown v. Board of Education; Fourteenth Amendment; Jim Crow
- Poems on Various Subjects Religious and Moral* (Wheatley), 122
- A Poetic Equation: Conversations between Margaret Walker and Nikki Giovanni* (Turner), 271
- Poisonings, 241–242. See also New York Conspiracy of 1741; Pritchard, Gullah Jack; Slave resistance
- Poitier, Sidney, 880, 963–964. See also Belafonte, Harry; Cosby, Bill; King, Martin Luther, Jr.; Marshall, Thurgood; National Association for the Advancement of Colored People; Pryor, Richard
- Poor, Salem, 502–503. See also American Revolution; Salem, Peter
- Poor People’s Campaign, 794, 810, 851, 964–966, 965 (photo). See also Abernathy, Ralph David; Jackson, Jesse; Johnson, Lyndon Baines; King, Martin Luther, Jr.; Southern Christian Leadership Conference; War on poverty
- Populist Party, 966–967. See also Colored Farmers Alliance
- Port Royal Experiment, 503–504, 785. See also Forten, Charlotte; Union Army
- Powell, Adam Clayton, Jr., 967–969, 968 (photo)
- Powell, Colin, 969–970. See also Clinton, William Jefferson; Congressional Black Caucus; Obama, Barack
- Pratt, Geronimo Ji Jaga, 673, 970–972, 971 (photo). See also Abu Jamal, Mumia; Black Panther Party; BPP; Los Angeles Branch; Cleaver, Kathleen Neal; COINTELPRO
- Price, Richard, 10, 126, 191
- Prigg v. Pennsylvania*, 415–416
- Prince Hall Masonry, 154–155, 243–244, 441–442, 569. See also Black fraternal societies; Hall, Prince
- Pritchard, Gullah Jack, 176–177, 504–505, 565, 567. See also Conjure; Slave religion; Slave resistance; Vesey, Denmark
- Pritchett, Laurie, 607, 849
- Progressive National Baptist Convention (PNBC), 146
- Provincial Freeman* abolition newspaper, 336
- Pryor, Richard, 244–245, 244 (photo), 963. See also Cosby, Bill; Poitier, Sidney
- Punch, John, 82. See also Chesapeake Colonies; Freedom dues; Indentured servitude; Racialized slavery
- Purvis, Robert, 506, 573. See also Abolition, slavery; American Anti-Slavery Society; Forten, Charlotte; Forten, James; Garrison, William Lloyd; Southern free blacks; Underground Railroad
- Quadroon, 245–246. See also Amalgamation; Miscegenation
- Quakers (Society of Friends), 123–124, 287, 289, 317, 359, 366, 397, 433, 492–493, 492–495, 506–507, 555, 560, 562, 572, 1002. See also Abolition, slavery; Crandall, Prudence; Cuffe, Paul; Northern slavery; Underground Railroad; Woolman, John
- Queen Mother Moore, 901
- Queen Nzinga (Njinga Mbande), 82–84, 83 (photo). See also Angolan/Kongolese; West-Central Africa
- Race and Culture Contacts in the Modern World* (Frazier), 259
- Racial profiling, 972–974. See also Fourteenth Amendment
- Racial uplift. See Moral uplift
- Racialized slavery, 22, 38, 82, 84–87. See also Bacon’s Rebellion; Chesapeake Colonies; Punch, John
- Radical Reconstruction, 334, 394, 581, 593, 719, 1012. See also Congressional Reconstruction
- Radical Republicans, 546, 581, 655, 716, 830, 974–976. See also Civil Rights Act of 1866; Civil Rights Act of 1875; Fifteenth Amendment; Fourteenth Amendment; Hayes, Rutherford B.; Johnson, Andrew; Joint Committee of Fifteen; Lincoln, Abraham; Reconstruction Era; Reconstruction Era Black Politicians; Republican Party; Stevens, Thaddeus; Sumner, Charles
- Ragtime, 151, 190, 218–220, 219 (photo), 246–247. See also Black Folk Culture; Jazz; Joplin, Scott
- Rainbow Coalition, 671, 822–823, 942
- Ramsey, James, 399
- Randolph, A. Philip, 880–882, 976–979, 1002–1003. See also Brotherhood of Sleeping Car Porters; Jim Crow; March on Washington Movement, 1963
- Rap music, 152
- Ras Tafari. See Selassie, Halie
- Rastafarianism, 1010–1011
- The Raw Pear* (Bailey), 142
- Ray, Charles, 342–343, 508–509, 509. See also Abolition, slavery; American and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society; American Anti-Slavery Society; Colored American newspaper; Colored Convention Movement; Fugitive Slave Act of 1850; Garnet, Henry Highland; Garrison, William Lloyd; Tappan, Arthur; Tappan, Lewis; Underground Railroad
- Ray, James Earl, 979. See also King, Martin Luther, Jr.; Southern Christian Leadership Conference
- Reagan, Ronald, 598, 615, 698, 709, 732, 822, 939, 969, 1053
- Reagon, Bernice Johnson, 980–981. See also Albany, Georgia, Movement; National Association for the Advancement of Colored People; Poor People’s Campaign; Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee
- Reason, Charles, 509–510. See also Abolition, slavery; African Free Schools; American Anti-Slavery Society; Garnet, Henry Highland; Ray, Charles; Reason, Patrick
- Reason, Patrick, 510–511. See also Abolition, slavery; African Free Schools; American and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society; American Anti-Slavery Society; Ray, Charles; Reason, Charles; Smith, James McCune; Tappan, Arthur; Tappan, Lewis; Wright, Theodore S.

- Rebel Destiny* (Herskovits and Herskovits), 206
- Reconciliados, 42
- Reconquista, 41, 88–90. See also John, Prester
- Reconstruction Acts, 546
- Reconstruction Era, 581, 651, 654
- Reconstruction Era black politicians, 981–983, 982 (illustration). See also Bruce, Blanche K.; Disfranchisement; Fifteenth Amendment; Ku Klux Klan; Republican Party; Revels, Hiram; White supremacy
- Red Summer Race Riots, 789, 983–984. See also Chicago Race Riot of 1919; Elaine, Arkansas, Riot of 1919; Great Migration; “If We Must Die”; Jim Crow; Johnson, James Weldon; Lynching; McKay, Claude; National Association for the Advancement of Colored People; New Negro Movement; White mob violence
- Redlining, 985–986. See also Urban ghetto; Urbanization
- Reed, Ishmael, 245
- Regents of California v. Bakke*, 598
- Remond, Charles L., 294, 511–512, 829. See also Abolition, slavery; Massachusetts 54th Regiment; Remond, Sarah Parker
- Remond, Sarah Parker, 512–513. See also Abolition, slavery; Remond, Charles Lenox
- Reparations, 986–988. See also Field Order No. 15; Forty acres and a mule; Jim Crow; King, Martin Luther, Jr.; Muhammad, Elijah; Nation of Islam; Rosewood, Florida, Riot of 1923; Stevens, Thaddeus; Tulsa, Oklahoma, Race Riot of 1921; Tuskegee experiment; X, Malcolm
- Repartimiento, 41
- Republic of Biafra (ROB), 27–28
- Republic of New Afrika (RNA), 664, 989–990. See also Black Nationalism; Black Power; COINTELPRO; Shabazz, Betty X; Williams, Robert F.
- Republican Party, 412, 458, 461, 465–466, 491, 514–515, 581–582, 632, 650–651, 652, 682–683, 689, 701, 706, 715, 743, 893, 966, 974–976. See also Compromise of 1877; Hayes, Rutherford B.; Radical Republicans; Reconstruction Era Black Politicians; Revels, Hiram
- Revels, Hiram, 990–991, 991 (photo). See also African Methodist Episcopal Church; Lincoln, Abraham; Reconstruction Era black politicians; Southern free blacks; Union Army
- Revolutionary Action Movement (RAM), 991–992. See also Black Panther Party; COINTELPRO; Republic of New Afrika; Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee; Williams, Robert F.; X, Malcolm
- Revolutionary Peoples Communications Network (RPCN), 707
- Revolutionary War, 101, 133, 240, 278, 310–312, 317, 370, 379, 400, 404, 409, 462, 488, 537, 578, 871
- Rice, T. D., 159–162
- Rice cultivation, 30–31, 64, 90–92, 92 (illustration), 98, 110, 129, 214. See also Bunce Island; Carolinas; Gullah; Sierra Leone; Sweetgrass baskets; Task system; Thurber, John
- Ring shout, 247–248, 261. See also Kongo cosmogram; Slave culture; Slave religion
- Robeson, Paul, 613, 853, 873, 993–995, 996. See also African imperialism; Black athletes; Black Folk Culture; Cold War and civil rights; Du Bois, W.E.B.; Harlem Renaissance; Robinson, Jackie
- Robinson, Jackie, 923–924, 995–996. See also Black athletes; Negro League Baseball; Robeson, Paul; World War II (black participation in)
- Robinson, Jo Ann, 996–997. See also Jim Crow; King, Martin Luther, Jr.; Montgomery Bus Boycott; Parks, Rosa
- Robinson, Ruby Doris Smith, 997–998. See also Black Power; Freedom Rides; Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee
- Rodney, Walter, 7, 8
- Rogers, Elymas Payson, 294
- Rogers, Joel Augustus, 249–250. See also African Diaspora; Harlem Renaissance; Woodson, Carter Godwin
- Rogers, Nathaniel Peabody, 512
- Rolfe, John, 56, 93–94, 113–114. See also Chesapeake Colonies; Jamestown, Virginia; Tobacco
- Romanus Pontifex* (Nicholas V), 2
- Roosevelt, Eleanor, 135, 614, 634, 873, 881, 998–999. See also Anderson, Marian; Bethune, Mary McCloud; Kennedy, John Fitzgerald; Ku Klux Klan; National Association for the Advancement of Colored People; National Council of Negro Women; Tuskegee Airmen
- Roosevelt, Franklin Delano, 514, 642, 649–650, 678, 687, 745–746, 831, 873, 998–999
- Roosevelt, Theodore, 873, 998–999
- Root doctors, 182, 250–251. See also Conjure; Hoodoo; Slave religion
- Roots: The Saga of an American Family* (Haley), 48
- Rosewood, Florida, Riot of 1923, 987, 1000–1002. See also Jim Crow; Lynching; White mob violence; White supremacy
- Rosewood Massacre, 987
- Royal African Company, 29, 65, 85, 94–96, 108. See also Atlantic slave trade; Cape Coast Castle; Factors; Gold Coast; Sierra Leone
- Rucker, Walter C., 7
- Ruggles, David, 394, 398, 501, 515–516, 553, 829, 1052. See also Abolition, slavery; the Emancipator; Fugitive slaves; Underground Railroad
- Rush, Bobby, 671, 941
- Russwurm, John, 356, 414, 516–518, 517 (photo). See also Abolition, slavery; African Dorcas Association; American Colonization Society; Cornish, Samuel; Freedom's Journal; Liberia
- Rustin, Bayard, 625, 781, 883, 884, 904, 978, 1002–1004. See also CORE; King, Martin Luther, Jr.; March on Washington Movement, 1963; Montgomery Bus Boycott; Randolph, A. Philip; Southern Christian Leadership Conference; Scottsboro, Alabama case
- Ruth, Babe, 647
- Sahel, 96–98, 97 (photo). See also Ghana; Mali; Rice cultivation; Senegambia; Songhai; Sudanic Empires; Timbuktu; Trans-Saharan slave trade
- Salem, Peter, 518–519. See also American Revolution; Continental Army; Poor, Salem
- Salt-water Negroes, 251. See also Atlantic slave trade
- Sambo, 251–252. See also Slave resistance
- Sanborn, Franklin B., 290
- Sanchez, Sonia, 253–254, 254 (photo). See also Black Arts Movement; X, Malcolm
- Sanders, Betty Dean. See Shabazz, Betty X
- Santeria, 236
- São Jorge de Mina. See Elmina
- Satchmo: My Life in New Orleans* (Armstrong), 139
- Saunders, Prince, 519–520. See also Cuffe, Paul; Destination, Haiti

- SCLC (Southern Christian Leadership Conference), 193, 584, 594, 605, 607, 625–626, 669, 705, 710, 724–725, 810, 839, 840, 848–850, 905, 964–966, 969, 979, 1003, 1012–1014, 1020, 1026, 1031–1033, 1031–1033. See also Abernathy, Ralph David; Albany, Georgia Movement; King, Martin Luther, Jr.; March on Washington Movement, 1963; Montgomery Bus Boycott; Selma March; Shuttlesworth, Fred; Williams, Hosea
- Scott, Dred, 395 (photo), 521. See also Civil Rights Act of 1866; Dred Scott v. Sandford; Fourteenth Amendment; Missouri Compromise
- Scottsboro, Alabama case, 1004–1007, 1005 (photo). See also Jim Crow; National Association for the Advancement of Colored People
- Seale, Bobby, 656, 659, 675, 707, 1007–1009, 1008 (photo). See also Black Panther Party; Civil Rights Act of 1968; Cleaver, Eldridge; COINTELPRO; Newton, Huey P.
- Seasoning, 98–99. See also Acculturation; Atlantic slave trade; Gullah; Salt-water negroes
- SEAST. See Society for Effecting the Abolition of the Slave Trade
- Second Great Awakening, 288, 481, 522–523. See also Abolition, slavery; Black churches; Evangelism; Methodist camp meetings; Slave religion
- Second Seminole War (1835), 156–157
- Selassie, Haile, 250, 759, 1009–1010. See also African Diaspora; African imperialism; Ethiopian Peace Movement; Garvey, Marcus; Organization of African Unity; Pan-Africanism
- Self-segregation, 1011–1012. See also Black Nationalism; Black Power; Du Bois, W.E.B.; Garvey, Marcus; Griggs, Sutton; A Negro Nation Within the Nation
- Selma March, 1012–1014, 1013 (photo). See also Bloody Sunday; Johnson, Lyndon Baines; King, Martin Luther, Jr.; Lewis, John; Southern Christian Leadership Conference; Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee; Voting Rights Act of 1965; Williams, Hosea
- Seminole Wars, 36, 523–525, 524 (illustration). See also Black Seminoles; Maroon societies
- Senegambia, 20, 27, 30, 31, 99, 129, 130. See also Atlantic slave trade; Futa Jallon; Ghana; Gorée Island; Mali; Rice cultivation; Sahel; Sierra Leone; Songhai
- Senghor, Leopold Sedar, 234 (photo)
- Seward, William H., 349
- Shabazz, Betty X, 659, 766, 989, 1014–1015. See also Black Nationalism; Muhammad, Elijah; Nation of Islam; X, Malcolm
- Shadd, Abraham, 335, 525–526. See also Abolition, slavery; American Anti-Slavery Society; Cary, Mary Ann Shadd; Destination, Canada; Underground Railroad
- Shakur, Assata, 737, 1015–1016. See also Black Panther Party; COINTELPRO; Destination, Cuba
- Shakur, Tupac “2Pac” Amaru, 254–257, 255 (photo), 1016. See also Black Panther Party; Hip-hop
- Sharecroppers Union (SCU), 1016–1017. See also Colored Farmers Alliance
- Sharecropping, 1017. See also Black Nadir; Forty acres and a mule; Sharecroppers Union; Thirteenth Amendment; Washington, Booker T.
- Sharp, Granville, 399
- Sharpeville Massacre, 602, 878
- Sharpton, Al, 637, 641, 816 (photo), 870, 1018, 1019 (photo). See also Bensonhurst, New York, Incident of 1989; Brown, James; Diallo, Amadou; Howard Beach Incident, 1986; Jackson, Jesse
- Shaw, Robert Gould, 479–481, 512
- Shay’s Rebellion, 243
- Shelley v. Kramer*, 812
- Sherman, William T., 402–403
- Shrine of the Black Madonna, 257–258. See also Black churches; Black nationalism; Pan-Africanism; Republic of New Afrika
- Shuttlesworth, Fred, 1019–1021. See also Bombingham; Jim Crow; National Association for the Advancement of Colored People; Southern Christian Leadership Conference; Sixteenth Street Baptist Church
- Sierra Leone, 28–29, 30–31, 34, 129, 288, 299, 307, 314, 315–316, 336–337, 338, 366–367, 413, 477, 520, 526–527, 568, 576. See also Cuffe, Paul; Destination, Sierra Leone; Liberia
- Las Siete Partidas* (Seven-Part Code), 63–64. See also Atlantic slave trade; Hispaniola
- Signare, 99–101, 100 (illustration). See also Atlantic slave trade; Gorée Island; Senegambia
- Signifying, 258–259. See also Anansi the Spider; Animal trickster stories; Brer Rabbit; John the Slave tales
- The Signifying Monkey* (Gates), 258
- Simpson, Orenthal James (O.J.), 647, 1022–1024. See also Black athletes
- Singleton, Benjamin “Pap,” 763–764, 1024–1025. See also Exoduster movement; Nicodemus, Kansas
- Sit-In movement, 1025–1026, 1027 (photo), 1038. See also Baker, Ella; Freedom Rides; Nash, Diane; Southern Christian Leadership Conference; Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee
- Sixteenth Street Baptist Church, 1027–1028, 1028 (photo). See also Black churches; Bombingham; King, Martin Luther, Jr.; Shuttlesworth, Fred
- The Slaughterhouse Cases*, 775
- Slave breeding, 527–528. See also Slave plantations
- Slave codes, 528–529, 665. See also Patrollers; Slave plantations
- The Slave Community: Plantation Life in the Antebellum South* (Blassingame), 14
- Slave culture, 259–260. See also Africanisms; Animal trickster stories; Black Folk Culture; Conjure; Ring shout; Slave diet; Slave religion; Work songs
- Slave Culture: Nationalist Theory and the Foundation of Black America* (Stuckey), 14
- Slave diet, 262–263, 529–530. See also Black Folk Culture; Slave culture; Soul food
- Slave driver, 531. See also Gang system; Overseers
- Slave plantation, 446–447, 496–498, 531–532, 533 (photo). See also House servants; Overseers; Slave quarters
- Slave quarters, 532–534. See also Field hands; House servants; Slave culture; Slave plantations; Washington, Booker T.
- Slave religion, 260–261. See also Black Folk Culture; Hush Harbors; Ring shout; Slave culture
- Slave resistance, 103–104, 534–536. See also Brown, John; Cinque, Joseph; Douglass, Frederick; Fugitive slaves; Gabriel (Prosser); Maroon societies; New York Revolt of 1712; Slave culture; Stono Rebellion; Turner, Nat; Underground Railroad; Vesey, Denmark; Walker, David

- Slave Songs of the Georgia Islands* (Parrish), 247
- Slave Trade Act, 285–286
- Slave uprising (Haitian revolution, 1791–1793), 437–438
- Slavery, 4–5. See also Barracoons; Bight of Biafra; Carolinas; Elmina; Gold Coast
- Slavery Abolition Act, 1863, 339
- Slavery in the United States: A Narrative of the Life and Adventures of Charles Ball* (Ball), 321
- Smith, Gerrit, 304, 330, 345, 347, 536–537, 537 (photo), 572. See also Abolition, slavery; American Colonization Society; Brown, John; Free Soil Party; Liberty Party; Underground Railroad
- Smith, James McCune, 294, 296, 342, 377, 393, 511, 535, 537–539. See also Abolition, slavery; African Free Schools; Anglo-African Magazine; Colored Convention Movement; Douglass, Frederick; Downing, George; Fugitive Slave Act of 1850; Garnet, Henry Highland; Liberty Party; Smith, Gerrit; Williams, Peter, Jr.
- Smith v. Allwright*, 770
- SNCC (Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee), 584–586, 625–626, 656, 660, 663, 669, 689, 705, 707, 710, 724, 731, 779, 780–781, 793, 840, 848–850, 860–862, 870–871, 882, 891–893, 894–896, 905–906, 912–913, 938, 980, 997–998, 1012–1014, 1026, 1032 (photo), 1037–1042, 1043–1044. See also Baker, Ella; Black Power; Lowndes County Freedom Organization; Lewis, John; Nash, Diane; Robinson, Ruby Doris Smith; Sit-in movement
- Society for Effecting the Abolition of the Slave Trade (SEAST), 284–286
- Society for the Promotion of Education Among Colored Children (SPECC), 509, 510
- Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts (SPG), 101, 193. See also Evangelism; Middle colonies; New York Revolt of 1712
- Society of Free People of Color for Promoting the Instruction and School Education of Children of African Descent, 302
- Society of Friends. See Quakers (Society of Friends)
- Soledad Brothers, 731, 1029–1031. See also Black Panther Party; Black Power; Davis, Angela; Newton, Huey P.
- Some Considerations on the Keeping of Negroes, Part I* (Woolman), 124
- Somerset v. Stuart*, 284
- Songhai, 102, 104, 107, 114, 116. See also Ghana; Mali; Sudanic Empires; Timbuktu; Toure, Askia Muhammad
- Soul food, 262–263. See also Africanisms; Black Folk Culture; Rice cultivation; Slave culture; Slave diet
- The Souls of Black Folk* (Du Bois), 187, 364
- South Africa Defense Fund, 614
- South African Coloured People's Organization (SACPO), 602
- South African Indian Congress (SAIC), 602
- South Carolina v. Katzenbach*, 770
- Southern free blacks, 540–541. See also Vesey, Denmark
- Sowell, Thomas, 653
- Spingarn, Arthur, 915
- Springfield Race Riot of 1908, 1033–1034. See also Lynching; National Association for the Advancement of Colored People; White mob violence
- St. John slave revolt, 268
- Stamp Act (1765), 327
- Stanton, Elizabeth Cady, 390, 1046
- State of Missouri v. Celia, a Slave*, 492
- Steele, Shelby, 653
- Stevens, Thaddeus, 581, 1034–1036, 1035 (photo). See also Civil Rights Act of 1866; Fourteenth Amendment; Johnson, Andrew; Lincoln, Abraham; Radical Republicans; Republican Party; Sumner, Charles; Thirteenth Amendment; Underground Railroad
- Stewart, Maria, 541–542. See also Abolition, slavery; Garrison, William Lloyd; the Liberator; Walker, David
- Still, William, 542–543. See also Abolition, slavery; Brown, John; Destination, Canada; Fugitive slaves; Tubman, Harriet; Underground Railroad
- Stono Rebellion, 36, 103–104, 129, 251, 278. See also Angolan/Kongolese; Carolinas; Destination, Florida; Slave resistance
- Stowe, Harriet Beecher, 290, 373, 417, 436, 461, 501, 543–545, 544 (photo), 553–554, 559–560, 573. See also Abolition, slavery; Fugitive Slave Act of 1850; Lincoln, Abraham; Uncle Tom's Cabin
- “Strange Fruit” 1036–1037. See also Anti-lynching campaign; Black Folk Culture; Lynching; White mob violence
- A Street in Bronzeville* (Brooks), 171
- Strictly 4 My N.I.G.G.A.Z.* (Tupac), 256
- Stuart, John. See Cugoano, Quobna Ottobah
- Stuckey, Sterling, 14
- Students for a Democratic Society (SDS), 585, 794, 810, 1043–1044. See also Black Panther Party; Black Power; COINTELPRO; Johnson, Lyndon Baines
- Sudanic Empires, 104–107. See also Ghana; Mali; Sahel; Senegambia; Songhai; Trans-Saharan slave trade
- Suffrage movement, women's, 1044–1047. See also Cary, Mary Ann Shadd; Cooper, Anna Julia; Douglass, Frederick; Fifteenth Amendment; Liberty Party; National Association of Colored Women; Smith, Gerrit; Terrell, Mary Church; Truth, Sojourner; Wells-Barnett, Ida
- Sugar Act (1764), 327
- Sugar plantations, 108–109, 113–114. See also Hispaniola; Royal African Company
- Sumner, Charles, 416–417, 521, 545–546, 546 (photo), 699. See also Free Soil Party; Freedmen's Bureau; Johnson, Andrew; Kansas-Nebraska Act, 1854; Lincoln, Abraham; Radical Republicans; Republican Party; Stevens, Thaddeus
- Sundiata: The Epic of Old Mali, 48, 67–68, 105–106, 109–110. See also Mali; Oral culture; Sudanic Empires
- Supreme Court cases, 231, 282–283, 415–416, 506, 549–550, 582, 598, 611, 624, 632, 655, 668, 680–682, 687, 712, 724, 744, 761, 787, 812, 885, 899, 915, 959–962, 1003, 1006. See also individual cases
- Suriname Folk Lore* (Herskovits and Herskovits), 206
- Swamm v. Charlotte-Mecklenburg*, 688
- Sweat v. Painter*, 681
- Sweetgrass baskets, 263–264, 264 (photo)
- Syncretism, 264–265. See also Acculturation; Africanisms; Amalgamation
- Talented tenth, 1047–1048. See also Du Bois, W.E.B.; Historically Black Colleges and Universities; Locke, Alain LeRoy; Washington, Booker T.

- Talking to Myself* (Bailey), 142
- Tallmadge, James, 484
- Tambo, Oliver, 602
- Taney, Roger, 283, 396, 521
- Tappan, Arthur, 288, 289, 305, 326, 345, 397–398, 508, 511, 547, 580. See also American and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society; American Anti-Slavery Society; American Colonization Society; Crandall, Prudence; the Emancipator; Garrison, William Lloyd; Immediatism; Liberty Party; Tappan, Lewis; Underground Railroad
- Tappan, Lewis, 288, 289, 305, 326, 337, 345, 464, 508, 511, 543, 548, 572–573, 580. See also Abolition, slavery; American and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society; American Anti-Slavery Society; Amistad; Cinque, Joseph; the Emancipator; Garrison, William Lloyd; the Liberator; Tappan, Arthur; Underground Railroad
- Task system, 110–111. See also Carolinas; Gang system; Gullah; Rice cultivation
- Tell My Horse: Voodoo and Life in Haiti and Jamaica* (Hurston), 211
- Terrell, Mary Church, 720, 805, 873, 915, 916–917, 1046, 1048–1050, 1049 (photo). See also Antilynching campaign; National Association for the Advancement of Colored People; National Association of Colored Women; Washington, Booker T.; Wells-Barnett, Ida
- Texas Revolution, 527
- The Theory of the Blending of the Races, Applied to the American White Man and Negro* (Croly), 133
- Thirteenth Amendment (U.S. Constitution), 448, 539, 549–550, 581, 700, 719, 769, 959, 960, 1017. See also Abolition, slavery; Lincoln, Abraham; Radical Republicans
- This Is My Century: New and Collected Poems* (Turner), 271
- Thomas, Clarence, 515, 654, 800–801, 1052–1054, 1053 (photo)
- Thoreau, Henry David, 417
- Thornton, John, 5, 7, 127, 191
- Thoughts and Sentiments on the Evil and Wicked Traffic of the Slavery and Commerce of the Human Species* (Cugoana), 33–34
- Thoughts upon the African Slave Trade* (Newton), 78
- Three-Fifths Clause (U.S. Constitution), 549
- Three-fifths compromise, 550–551. See also Fourteenth Amendment; Thirteenth Amendment
- Thurber, John, 31
- Tight pack, 111–112. See also Atlantic slave trade; Loose pack; Newton, John
- Till, Emmett, 827, 832, 1054–1055, 1055 (photo). See also Jet magazine; Lynching; White supremacy
- Timbuktu, 45, 67 (photo), 68, 73–74, 97 (photo), 102, 106–107, 112–113, 113 (photo), 114, 116. See also Mali; Musa, Mansa; Songhai; Sudanic Empires; Toure, Askia Muhammad
- Tituba, 266–267, 267 (illustration). See also Conjure; New England colonies; Slave religion
- “To Secure these Rights,” 1055–1057. See also Cold War and civil rights; National Association for the Advancement of Colored People; White, Walter
- Tobacco, 32, 49–50, 54, 56, 93, 113–114. See also Chesapeake Colonies; Indentured servitude; Jamestown, Virginia; Johnson, Anthony
- Toure, Askia Muhammad, 102, 107, 114–116, 115 (photo). See also Songhai; Sudanic Empires; Timbuktu
- Tourgée, Winegar, 334
- Trans-Saharan slave trade, 98, 104–105, 116–117. See also Atlantic slave trade; Sahel
- TransAfrica lobbying group, 615
- Transmigration, 268–269. See also Ebo Landing; Flying African stories; Slave religion
- Transportation (as punishment for slave resistance), 551–552. See also Slave resistance
- Treason Trial, 602
- Tribute, 117–118. See also Atlantic slave trade
- Tristo, Nuno, 48
- Trotter, William Monroe, 727, 932–934, 1057–1058. See also Du Bois, W.E.B.; Houston, Texas, Mutiny, 1917; Niagara Movement; Washington, Booker T.
- Truman, Harry S., 712, 851, 978, 1002. See also “To Secure these Rights”
- Truth, Sojourner, 305, 552–554, 553 (photo), 720. See also Abolition, slavery; Douglass, Frederick; Garrison, William Lloyd
- Truth and Reconciliation Commission, 644
- Tubman, Harriet, 331, 419, 543, 554–557, 555 (photo), 561–562, 805. See also Fugitive Slave Act of 1850; Fugitive slaves; Slave resistance; Underground Railroad
- Tulsa, Oklahoma, Race Riot of 1921, 987, 1058–1060. See also Franklin, John Hope; Ku Klux Klan; White mob violence; White supremacy
- Turner, Henry McNeil, 299, 308, 378, 1060–1062. See also African Methodist Episcopal Church; American Colonization Society; Jim Crow; Ku Klux Klan; Lincoln, Abraham; Pan-Africanism; Republican Party
- Turner, Lorenzo Dow, 13, 14, 204, 248, 269–270. See also Africanisms; Gullah; Herskovits, Melville J.
- Turner, Nat, 280, 288–289, 318, 332, 427, 463, 535, 557–559. See also Slave driver; Slave religion; Slave resistance
- Tuskegee Airmen, 1063–1065. See also National Association for the Advancement of Colored People; Roosevelt, Eleanor; Tuskegee Institute; White, Walter; World War II (black participation in)
- Tuskegee experiment, 987, 1066–1067. See also Clinton, William Jefferson; Tuskegee Institute
- Tuskegee Institute, 721, 871–872, 1067–1068. See also Historically Black Colleges and Universities; Tuskegee Airmen; Washington, Booker T.
- Tutu, Osei, 60–61
- Twelve Years a Slave* (Northrup), 495
- 2Pacalypse Now* (Tupac), 255
- Umayyad Caliphate Dynasty, 88–89
- Uncle Remus: Songs and Sayings* (Harris), 260
- Uncle Tom’s Cabin* (Stowe), 163, 290, 373, 393, 417, 436, 461, 501, 543–545, 559–560, 573. See also Abolition, slavery; Compromise of 1850; Fugitive Slave Act of 1850; Lincoln, Abraham; Stowe, Harriet Beecher
- Uncle Tom’s Children* (Wright), 274
- Underground Railroad, 260, 331, 373, 385, 390, 419, 423, 459, 508, 526, 536, 543, 554–556, 560–563, 561 (illustration). See also Abolition, slavery; Brown, John; Destination, Canada; Fugitive Slave Act of 1850; Fugitive slaves; Tubman, Harriet; Wills, Frank
- UNIA (Universal Negro Improvement Association), 193, 631, 667–668, 773, 781–784, 900–901, 909, 948, 953, 1069–1071. See also

- Black Nationalism; Black Star Line; Garvey, Marcus; Ku Klux Klan; Pan-Africanism; Queen Mother Moore
- Union Army, 108, 271, 333, 336, 354, 369, 373, 374, 391, 405, 408, 429, 459, 466, 480, 497–498, 503, 563–564, 683–686, 756–757. See also Buffalo Soldiers; Confederate States of America; Confiscation Acts; Field Order No. 15; Fort Pillow Massacre; Lincoln, Abraham; Massachusetts 54th Regiment
- United Gold Coast Convention (UBCC), 935–936
- United Nations Charter, 687, 712
- United Nations Commission on Human Rights, 999
- United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO), 29–30, 47, 113
- United Negro College Fund (UNCF), 808
- United States Colored Troops (U.S.C.T.), 563
- Universal Negro Improvement Association, 608
- Urban ghetto, 1071–1072. See also Great Migration; Kerner Commission Report; Urbanization; War on poverty
- Urban slavery, 564–565. See also Gabriel (Prosser); Slave resistance
- Urbanization, 1073–1076. See also Great Migration; Kerner Commission Report; Urban ghetto
- US Organization, 222, 837, 1076–1078. See also Afrocentricity; Black Panther Party; Black Power; COINTELPRO; Karenga, Maulana; Kwanzaa
- Van Buren, Martin, 314–315, 337, 411, 412 (illustration)
- Van Rensalaer, Thomas, 394, 398
- Vashon, John B., 501
- Vesey, Denmark, 534, 565–568. See also Negro Seamen Acts; Pritchard, Gullah Jack; Slave resistance
- Vietnam War (black participation in), 607, 610, 1078–1081. See also Ali, Muhammad; Black Power; King, Martin Luther, Jr.; Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee; Students for a Democratic Society; X, Malcolm
- Virginia Minstrels, 161
- Virginia Plan, 550–551
- Vita, Dona Beatriz-Kimpa, 119–121. See also Kongo Kingdom; Stono Rebellion; West-Central Africa
- Voodoo, 134, 152, 181, 182, 208, 223, 236
- Voting Rights Act of 1965, 594, 645, 656, 663, 705, 835, 841, 862, 892, 1081–1083. See also Disfranchisement; Grandfather Clause; Johnson, Lyndon Baines; Literacy tests; National Association for the Advancement of Colored People; Selma March; Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee
- Wagadu. See Ghana
- Waiting for the Wild Beasts* (Kourouma), 48
- Walker, Alice, 1083–1084, 1084 (photo). See also Hurston, Zora Neale; King, Martin Luther, Jr.
- Walker, David, 280, 298, 426, 453, 535, 557, 569–572. See also Abolition, slavery; Du Bois, W.E.B.; Freedom's Journal; Prince Hall Masonry; Turner, Nat
- Walker, Margaret, 270–271. See also Brooks, Gwendolyn; Haley, Alex; Wright, Richard
- War of 1812, 367, 524, 577
- War on Poverty, 835, 964, 1085–1086. See also Johnson, Lyndon Baines; Kerner Commission Report; Long Hot Summer Riots, 1965–1967; Urban ghetto
- Ward, Samuel Ringgold, 572–573. See also Abolition, slavery; African Free Schools; American Anti-Slavery Society; Free Soil Party; Fugitive Slave Act of 1850; Fugitive slaves; Liberty Party; Smith, Gerrit; Tappan, Lewis
- Ware, Bill, 1086–1087. See also Black Nationalism; Black Power; Nkrumah, Kwame; Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee
- Warren, Earl, 682
- Washington, Booker T., 361, 487, 533, 593, 596, 604, 642, 652, 693, 721, 727, 745, 782, 807, 914, 926, 933, 948, 1012, 1088–1090. See also Accommodationism; Cotton States Exposition; Du Bois, W.E.B.; Tuskegee Airmen; Tuskegee Institute
- Washington, Bushrod, 463
- Washington, George, 311, 355, 415, 450–452, 475, 550
- Washington, Harold, 1090–1092. See also World War II (black participation in)
- Watkins, Frances Ellen, 1046
- Watkins, William, 377
- “We Are the World” initiative, 272
- Webb, William, 177
- Webster, Daniel, 416, 453
- Weld, Theodore Dwight, 288, 580
- Wells-Barnett, Ida, 663, 773, 873, 914–915, 1092–1095. See also Antilynching campaign; Black self-defense; Exoduster movement; Great Migration; Lynching; National Association for the Advancement of Colored People; Niagara Movement; Suffrage movement, women’s; Washington, Booker T.; White mob violence
- Wesley, John, 481
- West-Central Africa, 31, 36, 38, 118, 121–122, 127, 129, 130, 168–169, 176, 208, 248. See also Angolan/Kongolese; Kongo cosmogram; Kongo Kingdom
- Wheatley, Phillis, 122–123, 123 (illustration). See also American Revolution; Hammon, Jupiter; Senegambia
- Whig Party, 289, 458, 484, 545, 1035
- Whipper, William, 309, 573–574. See also Abolition, slavery; American Moral Reform Society; Cornish, Samuel; Destination, Canada; Douglass, Frederick; Forten, James; Fugitive Slave Act of 1850; Garrison, William Lloyd; Purvis, Robert; Underground Railroad
- White, Walter, 693–694, 713, 738, 873, 1095–1096. See also Atlanta, Georgia, Riot of 1906; Du Bois, W.E.B.; Houston, Charles Hamilton; Lynching; Marshall, Thurgood; National Association for the Advancement of Colored People
- White Citizens’ Council, 1096–1098. See also Ku Klux Klan; National Association for the Advancement of Colored People; White supremacy
- White mob violence, 490 (illustration), 492, 1098–1099. See also Jim Crow; Ku Klux Klan; Lynching; Plan de San Diego; Wells-Barnett, Ida
- White primaries, 1099–1100. See also Disfranchisement; MFDP; National Association for the Advancement of Colored People; Voting Rights Act of 1965
- White supremacy, 187, 230, 253, 258, 265, 458–459, 489, 582, 588, 592, 613, 1100. See also Jim Crow; Ku Klux Klan; Lynching; White Citizens’ Council; White mob violence
- Wilberforce, William, 285, 378, 520, 574–576, 575 (illustration). See

- also* Abolition, slave trade; Cugano, Quobna Ottobah; Equiano, Olaudah
- Wilkins, Roy, 892, 1101–1102. See also Cold War and civil rights; Du Bois, W.E.B.; March on Washington Movement, 1963; National Association for the Advancement of Colored People; Robeson, Paul; White, Walter
- Williams, Eugene, 1004–1005
- Williams, Hosea, 669, 826, 1102–1104. See also King, Martin Luther, Jr.; National Association for the Advancement of Colored People; Southern Christian Leadership Conference
- Williams, Peter, Jr., 295, 296, 344, 356, 456, 537, 576–577. See also Abolition, slave trade; Abolition, slavery; American Anti-Slavery Society; Colored Convention Movement; Cuffe, Paul; Destination, Canada; Destination, Haiti; Williams, Peter, Sr.
- Williams, Peter, Sr., 311, 576, 578–579, 578 (illustration). See also Abolition, slavery; African Methodist Episcopal Church; American Revolution; Williams, Peter, Jr.
- Williams, Robert F., 658, 663–664, 675, 691, 989, 998, 1104–1105. See also Black Nationalism; Black Power; Black self-defense; Castro, Fidel; Destination, Cuba; Ku Klux Klan; National Association for the Advancement of Colored People; Republic of New Afrika; Revolutionary Action Movement; X, Malcolm
- Williams, Serena, 648
- Williams, Venus, 648
- Williams v. Mississippi*, 744
- Wills, Frank, 1105–1106. See also National Association for the Advancement of Colored People
- Winfrey, Oprah, 1106–1107, 1107 (photo). See also Obama, Barack
- Women's Christian Temperance Union (WCTU), 1046
- Wonder, Stevie, 271–272. See also Black Folk Culture
- Woods, Eldrick "Tiger," 649
- Woodson, Carter G., 187, 619, 621–622, 643, 1107–1110. See also Association for the Study of African American Life and History; Du Bois, W.E.B.; Franklin, John Hope
- Woolman, John, 123–124, 507. See also Abolition, slave trade; Quakers (Society of Friends)
- Work songs, 272–273. See also Blues music; Field hands; Field hollers; Slave culture; Slave plantations
- World Anti-Slavery Convention, 326–327, 501
- World Heritage Sites
Cape Coast Castle, 29–30
Gorée Island, 46–47, 47 (photo)
- World Peace Appeal (Stockholm Appeal) (1950), 135
- World War I (black participation in), 1110–1112. See also Buffalo Soldiers; Houston, Texas, Mutiny, 1917; "If We Must Die"; Red Summer Race Riots
- World War II (black participation in), 1112–1114. See also Double V Campaign; Evers, Medgar;
- National Association for the Advancement of Colored People; Randolph, A. Philip; Robinson, Jackie; Tuskegee Airmen; World War I (black participation in)
- Wretched of the Earth* (Fanon), 187
- Wright, Elizur, 304
- Wright, Richard, 273–274, 274 (photo), 626–627, 663, 1037. See also Ellison, Ralph; Hughes, Langston; McKay, Claude
- Wright, Theodore S., 344, 345, 358, 426, 577, 579–580, 605. See also Abolition, slavery; American and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society; American Anti-Slavery Society; Cornish, Samuel; Garrison, William Lloyd; Tappan, Arthur; Tappan, Lewis
- X, Malcolm, 175, 253, 257, 604, 609, 628, 656, 658–659, 663, 675, 689, 691, 737, 767, 791–792, 805, 837, 910–911, 918–919, 930, 944–945, 989, 998, 1014, 1076–1077, 1115–1118. See also Black Nationalism; Black Panther Party; Black Power; Haley, Alex; Muhammad, Elijah; Nation of Islam; Organization of African Unity; Pan-Africanism; Shabazz, Betty X; Universal Negro Improvement Association
- Young Men's Antislavery Society, 506, 508, 538
- Youth March for Integrated Schools, 904
- Zedong, Mao, 658, 930
- Zimbabwe's African Union (ZANU), 944