⁴⁹" "Anyone can observe that two samples of speech or writing are different. Sociolinguistic analysis can show us that these differences are objectively measurable, and that there are patterns in the choices which a speaker/writer does make, on the one hand, and can make, on the other. Since the choices are not entirely free, we need to observe the conditions or factors that may influence them; and it is here that sociolinguistic methodology is applicable" *TQO CR G."422; "J3; : 4_.'r 035+0

⁸Alphabets are standardly assumed to represent basically at phonemic level. Sometimes they may access 'deeper' (e.g. morphophonemic) strata, but not shallower ones: decent orthographies are not phonetic. This is fortunately not always true, and the fact that (some) scribes and traditions are given to (some) allophonic writing can be a useful source of historical information" *NCUU."4222"j3; ; 9_ "r 079+0

329" It is indeed difficult to imagine a sound change that operates in a language only in words referring to the names of trees, or which only applies to verbs involving motion away from the speaker, so we probably can say that sound changes cannot be conditioned by semantic features. However, it seems that some languages do, in fact, provide evidence that at least some sound changes apply only in certain word classes (or parts of speech) and not in others. Such a sound change clearly involves grammatical rather than purely phonological conditioning" *ET̄Q̄Y ḡḡ[̄ . "3; ; 9. " r̄ 0465. " cr w̄f " I T̄C̄ḡD̄R̄ . "422: . " r̄ 0: : -0"
